THE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

EDITED BY

CARSTEN STAHN

OXFORD

THE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court

Edited by
CARSTEN STAHN

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS
Great Clarendon Street, Oxford, OX2 6DP,
United Kingdom

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide. Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press in the UK and in certain other countries

© the several contributors 2015

Some parts of this publication are available online as open access. Except where otherwise noted, chapters 2, 4, 10, 47, and 49 are distributed under the terms of a Creative Commons Attribution-Non Commercial-No Derivatives 4.0 International licence (CC BY-NC-ND), a copy of which is available at http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-nd/4.0/.
Enquiries concerning use outside the scope of the licence terms should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the above address.

The moral rights of the authors have been asserted

First Edition published in 2015

Impression: 1

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press, or as expressly permitted by law, by licence or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this work in any other form and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

Crown copyright material is reproduced under Class Licence Number C01P0000148 with the permission of OPSI and the Queen's Printer for Scotland

Published in the United States of America by Oxford University Press
198 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10016, United States of America

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available

Library of Congress Control Number: 2015934530

ISBN 978–0–19–870516–1

Printed and bound by
CPI Group (UK) Ltd, Croydon, CR0 4YY

Links to third party websites are provided by Oxford in good faith and for information only. Oxford disclaims any responsibility for the materials contained in any third party website referenced in this work.

Editor's Preface and Acknowledgements

The law and practice of the ICC is in constant flux. The Court navigates between success and failure. Accountability is part and parcel of discourse in almost any modern conflict situation. The ICC has witnessed some unexpected successes and certain drastic failures. There are many 'knowns', but also significant 'known unknowns' and 'unknown unknowns'. In the ebb and flow of practice, it is often difficult to keep track of the large amount of decisions and documents that shape ICC jurisprudence and policy. It is even more difficult to understand their impact and context, including their effect on conflict dynamics, politics, and affected societies. While key decisions and policy papers of the Court receive considerable attention, many procedural decisions or working practices behind the scenes go partly unnoticed, although they set important footprints for future directions. Discussion on achievements and challenges of the Court remain often entrenched in disciplinary boundaries or other dichotomies (e.g., law v. politics, peace v. justice, international v. local justice, substantive law v. procedure, retributive v. restorative justice).

This work seeks to refine this vision. It examines major areas of jurisprudence and practice, as well as the broader impact of the Court. It covers many well-known sites of debate but also areas that are rarely treated (e.g., funding, governance, interim release). It combines normative and critical analysis of ICC law and policies with context-related assessment and reflection on alternative approaches. Many authors will be known to the reader based on their work in the field of international criminal justice. But some space is also given to fresh voices.

Several contributions were discussed on the occasion of a Conference on the tenth anniversary of the entry into force of the Rome Statute, held at the Peace Palace on 26-27 September 2012, with the kind support of the Open Society Justice Initiative and the MacArthur Foundation. All chapters are newly written and revised for this book. The focus of this work is linked to a research project of the Grotius Centre for International Legal Studies on the theme of 'Post-Conflict Justice and Local Ownership', funded by the Netherlands Organization for Scientific Research (NWO).

The book is a truly collective effort. It involves scholars, practitioners, and voices from different disciplines, parts of the globe and communities of practice. Huge thanks go, first of all, to all contributors for their immense care, dedication, and fresh thinking on core issues, and most of all for making diversity an asset. Together, they have provided a spectrum of perspectives that no single author could have offered alone.

Many other individuals have played a key role in bringing this project to fruition. Deep gratitude is owed to Teodora Jugrin and Luca Ferro who have provided invaluable editorial help and support in the production of the book. Noah Al-Malt, Stephanie Fowler, Daniel Huck, Vanessa Otero, Anda Scarlat, Havneet Sethi, and Nivedita S, who graduated from the Advanced LL.M. Programme in Public International Law at Leiden, deserve special credit for reviewing chapters and assisting in editing. Many of the 'partners in crime' at the Grotius Centre for International Legal Studies have contributed to ideas in this book, in their own individual way, including but not limited to Larissa van den Herik, Joseph Powderly, Dov Jacobs, Catherine Harwood, Jens Iverson, Jennifer Easterday, Sara Kendall, Christian de Vos, and Marieke Wierda. I further owe gratitude to Judges Neroni Slade and Ekaterina Trendafilova who shaped my vision and approach towards international criminal justice at the ICC.

A special thank you goes to John Louth, Merel Alstein, Anthony Hinton, and Emma Endean for supporting this project since its inception and ensuring its successful publication.

This book is dedicated to the memory of the late Judge Hans-Peter Kaul whose relentless fight and support for the ideals enshrined in the Statute have pushed the frontiers of international criminal justice and brought the law a step closer to reality. As he put it in the 2011 LI Haopei Lecture,[1] with his unique sense of idealism and pragmatism: 'Leaders all over the world… may reflect on which policy should henceforth be followed in the field.'

The Hague, January 2015
CS

[1] H-P Kaul, 'Is It Possible to Prevent or Punish Future Aggressive War-Making?, FICHL, Occasional Paper Series (Oslo: Torkel Opsahl Academic Epublisher, 2011), at http://www.fichl.org/fileadmin/fichl/documents/FICHL_OPS/FICHL_OPS_1_Kaul.pdf.

Foreword

HE Judge Sang-Hyun Song
President, International Criminal Court, 2009–2015

When the first judges of the International Criminal Court (ICC) met in March 2003 after their inauguration, a first fundamental task lay ahead with the drafting of the Regulations of the Court. We initially struggled to overcome the differences of our legal traditions while applying the provisions of the Rome Statute for the first time in practice. However, guided by the spirit of compromise and a common objective in mind, only one year later, during the fifth plenary session in 2004, we adopted the Regulations, and States Parties accepted them in accordance with Article 52 of the Rome Statute. Over the years, we have successfully overcome countless legal obstacles and found suitable solutions—through amendments of the law or through practice—always safeguarding the fairness and integrity of the proceedings. As a result, today the Court looks back at a large body of jurisprudence on a variety of fundamental legal issues, paving the way for a smoother second decade of the ICC's proceedings. This book bears testimony of these achievements to date.

In the current geopolitical context, the Court has managed to stand its ground as a well-accepted international organization. Since its creation in 1998, the ICC has exceeded expectations in many ways. It came into being much faster than expected—less than four years after the adoption of the Rome Statute. It has not only survived but thrived with States Parties—despite early opposition by some powerful countries which sought to discredit it. The fact that, to date, four countries have referred situations on their own territory to the ICC shows the confidence States have in the Court. The first referral of a situation by the Security Council, namely the Darfur situation in 2005, also exceeded expectations, as many observers thought the United States would veto any Security Council effort to refer a situation to the ICC. The second, unanimous referral of the Libya situation in 2011 fostered international confidence in the ICC. Finally, every ad hoc acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction, including by Ukraine, demonstrates States' growing confidence in the Court, often followed by an accession to the Rome Statute system. This, in turn, marks an important step towards a universal coverage of jurisdiction and thus a comprehensive protective system for victims of mass violence.

After the first seven years of the Court's operations, the Review Conference in Kampala in 2010 marked another important step in the ICC's development. By way of yet another small revolution after the adoption of the Rome Statute itself, the ICC's Assembly of States Parties agreed on a definition for the crime of aggression and the conditions under which the Court could exercise jurisdiction with respect to this crime, setting an important contribution to the Court's role in solidifying the corpus of international criminal law. It is my sincere hope that in 2017 we will see the final adoption and acceptance of these amendments in the Rome Statute, activating the fourth of the Rome Statute's core crimes.

One of the other crucial outcomes of Kampala was the momentum that it created for developing the effectiveness and reach of the Rome Statute system. The focal areas of cooperation, complementarity, and universality have been stressed countless times and we have to keep stressing them as key factors in the success of the ICC system. With regard to substantive modifications, the Kampala Review Conference provided new vigour for the Court to move forward on many levels, from investigations to cooperation and victim participation in the proceedings.

The Court's achievements following Kampala are manifold. The ICC is now engaged in a wide variety of situations around the globe. The Court has active cases at all stages of proceedings, from pre-trial to trial to appeals. Eight situations are under active investigation and ten under preliminary examination. Over twenty cases involving more than thirty suspects have been brought before the ICC. The Court has delivered its first three judgments, one of which—the case of Germain Katanga in the Situation of the Democratic Republic of Congo—recently became final.

Further, the ICC has continued to breathe life into the victim-oriented provisions of the Rome Statute, enabling victims to participate in the proceedings, seek reparations, and receive humanitarian assistance from the Trust Fund for Victims. For some victims, perhaps, seeing justice done has alleviated an urge for violent retribution. More victims now have reason to hope that their tormentors will answer for their crimes. More communities can see that their voice is heard and that the right to justice is vigorously defended. Finally, and I come back to my first words in this introduction, internal policy and practice have further matured since 2010 and continue to do so across the organs of the Court.

At the same time, there are clearly some areas for potential improvement. In my view, judicial proceedings must speed up, and they are in fact speeding up as more and more issues are resolved and become routine. The ICC's 'lessons learnt' process—with a view to improving the efficiency of the criminal process while preserving the rights of the accused—is an important initiative in this regard, yielding effective results now in its third year. However, the biggest challenge for the ICC remains ensuring sufficient cooperation from States, especially with respect to the arrest and surrender of suspects. The lack of execution of arrest warrants is the biggest obstacle to the full implementation of the ICC's mandate.

One of the great merits of this book is that it illustrates in a comprehensive manner the achievements of the Court as well as its remaining challenges. And it does not stop there. Numerous contributions by well-respected experts in the field deal with very tangible issues of law, policy, and practice of crucial importance in the ICC's day-to-day operations. I commend Professor Stahn for having assembled a blend of seasoned academics as well as top practitioners from various institutions including the ICC itself. The topical selection of cross-disciplinary pieces on substantive international criminal law, procedural issues, policy dimensions, and also topics such as sexual and gender-based violence, protection of witnesses, victims' participation and redress, or capacity building at the national level is truly exhaustive.

Indeed, these essays reflect the many dimensions of the International Criminal Court, and they display more than just the law and practice at this institution; they bear testimony of a vibrant, rapidly developing area of international law at the helm of which stands the ICC. Just as the ICC does through its proceedings and jurisprudence, this book contributes to the further development of a stout body of international criminal law, protecting victims of mass atrocities and deterring future crimes.

The Hague
September 2014

Foreword

Fatou Bensouda
Prosecutor, International Criminal Court

The International Criminal Court (ICC) is the world's first permanent international judicial institution designed to hold perpetrators of international crimes accountable and to end impunity for such crimes. The Court has been in existence for more than a decade. This provides a timely opportunity to examine the law and practice of the Court, its contribution to international criminal law and policy, and its potential role in countries where such crimes have been committed.

During the first nine years of the existence of the ICC, the Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) was able to create a fully functioning and independent investigative and prosecutorial organ, capable of responding to the highest demands for intervention in strict accordance with the legal framework established by the Rome Statute. Over the years, the practice of the Court and the Office has evolved, and has in many ways been refined and enhanced in order to meet present and future challenges. On the strength of the early experiences acquired by the Office, as well as through candid self-assessment and lessons learned, the Office has been working on further honing its prosecutorial strategy, as well as developing policies and operating procedures, where necessary, in order to address the challenges it has faced. These changes and developments are now reflected in the Office's Strategic Plan for 2012–2015.

As an important part of this new Strategic Plan, and as one of the three core activities of the Office, stronger emphasis is now placed on the Office's preliminary examinations activities. Through its preliminary examinations work, the Office is committed to contributing to two overarching goals: the ending of impunity, by encouraging genuine national proceedings through its positive approach to complementarity, and the prevention of crimes.

Furthermore, the Office has also revised its investigative and prosecutorial strategies in order to enhance the quality, efficiency, and effectiveness of its work, and also to offset some of the challenges the Office has been facing with regard to witness intimidation and tampering. Moreover, in order to investigate effectively in complex and often difficult environments, the Office has moved from focused investigations to the concept of in-depth, open-ended investigations, while still maintaining a clear investigative focus. This has been necessitated by the fact that in some situations, it may be necessary to build cases upward gradually by investigating and prosecuting a limited number of lower- or mid-level perpetrators, with a view to reaching those alleged to be most responsible for the crimes. Lastly, in relation to more thematic aspects of its work, the Office has recently finalized its Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes following extensive consultations with, amongst others, States, civil society, and relevant agencies of the United Nations. The Office has embarked on a similar process of consultations in preparation for the drafting of a new Policy Paper on Children which will be a comprehensive elaboration of how the Office handles children's issues in all aspects of its work and at all stages of the Court's proceedings.

Yet another important development worth highlighting is the adopted Code of Conduct for the Office, which entered into force on 5 September 2013. This Code assists the Office in shaping a common organizational culture on the principles enshrined in the Rome Statute, and also provides clear guidance on the professional conduct and the standards that the Office as a whole, including myself and the deputy prosecutor, have chosen to be measured by.

The ICC continues to face important challenges. One of the main challenges faced not only by the Office but by the Court as a whole is the question of resources. Over the years, the number of preliminary examinations, investigations, and prosecutions has increased without a corresponding increase in resources to match the ever growing workload. Since the Office cannot sacrifice quality, the challenge is how consistently to ensure high quality performance without the necessary resources.

Another challenge is to receive full and timely cooperation from States. The ICC has no police force or enforcement powers of its own: it relies on States to implement its decisions and to support its work, and more importantly to execute warrants of arrest issued by the Court's judges.

Lack of knowledge about the Court is yet another challenge. Misconceptions about the Court and its mandate still pervade, and there is indeed a real need for a better and more accurate understanding of the Office and the Court's work.

As such, I believe that The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court will serve as a valuable and informative resource for practitioners, scholars, and students of international criminal law, and also others with an interest in the work of the ICC. The book is an important contribution to promoting understanding and enhancing in-depth analysis and reflection on the practices of the ICC, its impact, and its challenges as we forge ahead in our endeavour to rid the world of the most atrocious crimes known to humanity and to end impunity for these crimes. It is my hope and sincere belief that through the vector of international criminal law—impartially and independently applied—we can alter the calculus of would-be perpetrators of mass crimes and build added support for the ICC as the nucleus of an evolving international criminal justice system. Will we ever reach the next eon of civilization where mass atrocities are a distant memory in the annals of time? Human history to date seems to suggest such a coveted outcome is unlikely. What is certain, however, is that with the creation of the ICC, the foundational stones have been set for a more secure and enlightened path for humanity. It is incumbent upon us today to ensure that the Court realizes its full potential as envisaged in its founding treaty, the Rome Statute.

The Hague
September 2014

Table of Contents

Table of Cases xxv
Table of Legislation liii
List of Abbreviations lxv
List of Contributors lxix
Introduction lxxxiii

I. CONTEXT, CHALLENGES, AND CONSTRAINTS

1. The International Criminal Court (ICC) and Double Standards of International Justice 3
Richard Dicker

1.1 Introduction 3
1.2 Context 4
1.3 Double Standards in ICC-Related Practice 6
1.4 Beyond the Status Quo 11

2. The ICC and the Politics of Peace and Justice 13
Leslie Vinjamuri

2.1 Introduction 13
2.2 Arguing for Justice 15
2.3 The Triumph of Consequences 19
2.4 Four Dilemmas 20
2.5 Rewriting Justice 28

3. The Relationship between the ICC and the United Nations Security Council 30
Deborah Ruiz Verduzco

3.1 Introduction 30
3.2 The Relationship between the Court and the Council: Three Theories 31
3.3 The Framing of Referrals 35
3.4 The Funding of Referrals 38
3.5 Obligations to Cooperate with the Court 42
3.6 Non-Cooperation and Enforcement 44
3.7 Political and Operational Support for Situations Not Referred by the Council 50
3.8 Deferrals 52
3.9 Conclusions 61

4. The ICC and the AU 65
Ottilia Anna Maunganidze and Anton du Plessis

4.1 Introduction 65
4.2 The Conflation of Politics and Law: Africa and International Criminal Justice 66

4.3 African Efforts to Close the Impunity Gap 68
4.4 Complementarity in Action 71
4.5 Expanding the Jurisdiction of the African Court 79
4.6 Conclusion 82

5. How Much Money Does the ICC Need? 84
Stuart Ford

5.1 Introduction 84
5.2 How Much Does the ICC Cost and How is that Money Spent? 85
5.3 The Constituencies 89
5.4 The 2013 Budget Process 92
5.5 How Efficient is the ICC? 94
5.6 Possible Explanations for the Comparative Inefficiency of the ICC 100
5.7 Conclusion 103

6. The ICC and the ASP 105
Jonathan O'Donohue

6.1 Introduction 105
6.2 Overview of the ASP 105
6.3 Administrative Oversight 109
6.4 Budgetary Decisions 114
6.5 Legislative Decisions 116
6.6 Elections 126
6.7 Responding to Non-Cooperation 131
6.8 Other Initiatives to Support the ICC and the Rome Statute System 133
6.9 Conclusions 138

II. THE RELATIONSHIP TO DOMESTIC JURISDICTIONS

7. Jurisdiction 141
Rod Rastan

7.1 Introduction 141
7.2 Jurisdictional Parameters 141
7.3 Subject Matter Jurisdiction 147
7.4 Personal Jurisdiction 151
7.5 Territorial Jurisdiction 163
7.6 Temporal Jurisdiction 168
7.7 Conclusion 178

8. Ad Hoc Declarations of Acceptance of Jurisdiction: The Palestinian Situation under Scrutiny 179
Mohamed M. El Zeidy

8.1 Introduction 179
8.2 The 2009 Palestinian Declaration: Inconsistencies and Legal Uncertainties 183
8.3 Potential Review and Alternative Avenues 192
8.4 Palestine's New Status and its Effect on the First and Second Declaration 199
8.5 Conclusion 208

9. Self-Referrals as an Indication of the Inability of States to Cope with Non-State Actors 210
Harmen van der Wilt

9.1 Introduction 210
9.2 Self-Referrals: Genuine 'Inability' or Insidious Attempt to Frame One's Enemies? 212
9.3 Puzzled Trial Chambers Struggling with the Concepts of 'Inactivity' and 'Inability' 215
9.4 The ICC and Non-State 'Terrorists' 220
9.5 Self-Referrals and the State-Centred Paradigm of International Criminal Justice 223
9.6 Some Final Reflections 226

10. Admissibility Challenges before the ICC: From Quasi-Primacy to Qualified Deference? 228
Carsten Stahn

10.1 Introduction 228
10.2 The Status Quo 231
10.3 Dilemmas 246
10.4 Improving 'Qualified Deference' 253
10.5 Conclusions 258

11. The ICC and its Relationship to Non-States Parties 260
Robert Cryer

11.1 Introduction 260
11.2 The Rome Statute and Third Parties: The Law 262
11.3 The Practice of the Court with Respect to Third Parties 266
11.4 Conclusion 280

12. The Frog that Wanted to Be an Ox: The ICC's Approach to Immunities and Cooperation 281
Dov Jacobs

12.1 Introduction 281
12.2 Mapping the Interaction between Immunities and Cooperation in the Rome Statute 282
12.3 Preliminary Question: Can the ICC Actually Exercise Jurisdiction in the First Place? 286
12.4 Is There an Obligation to Cooperate with the ICC? 292
12.5 Conclusion 301

III. PROSECUTORIAL POLICY AND PRACTICE

13. Putting Complementarity in its Place 305
Paul Seils

13.1 Introduction 305
13.2 Meaningful National Prosecutions 306
13.3 The Role of the Office of the Prosecutor in Catalysing National Proceedings 316

13.4 Technical Analysis of National Proceedings 320
13.5 Steps for the OTP 326
13.6 Conclusions 327

14. Investigative Management, Strategies, and Techniques of the ICC's OTP 328
Susana SáCouto and Katherine Cleary Thompson

14.1 Introduction 328
14.2 Organization and Administration of the OTP 331
14.3 Size and Composition of Investigation Teams 334
14.4 Evaluating the Sufficiency of Evidence 341
14.5 Conclusion 349

15. The Selection of Situations and Cases by the OTP of the ICC 350
Fabricio Guariglia and Emeric Rogier

15.1 Introductory Remarks 350
15.2 The Selection of Situations by the OTP 353
15.3 The Selection of Cases by the OTP 358
15.4 Conclusions 363

16. Selecting Situations and Cases 365
William A. Schabas OC MRIA

16.1 Introduction 365
16.2 Distinguishing Situations and Cases 366
16.3 Selection of Situations 368
16.4 Selecting Cases 375
16.5 Conclusion 380

17. Accountability of International Prosecutors 382
Jenia Iontcheva Turner

17.1 Introduction 382
17.2 Balancing Accountability and Effectiveness 384
17.3 Internal Oversight 386
17.4 Judicial Oversight 388
17.5 Political Oversight 394
17.6 Administrative and Professional Oversight 397
17.7 Conclusion 406

IV. THE ICC AND ITS APPLICABLE LAW

18. Article 21 and the Hierarchy of Sources of Law before the ICC 411
Gilbert Bitti

18.1 Introduction 411
18.2 Internal Sources of Law 414
18.3 External Sources of Law 425
18.4 Conclusion 443

19. The Rome Statute and the Attempted Corseting of the Interpretative Judicial Function: Reflections on Sources of Law and Interpretative Technique 444
Joseph Powderly

19.1 Introduction 444
19.2 The Rome Statute as a Means of Codifying Judicial Interpretative Restraint 448
19.3 Identifying the Applicable Law—From Nuremberg to the Ad Hoc Tribunals 454
19.4 Articles 21 and 22(2) of the Rome Statute: A Deliberate Effort to Restrict the Creative Capacity of the Bench? 460
19.5 Conclusions 497

20. Perpetration and Participation in Article 25(3) 499
Elies van Sliedregt

20.1 Introduction 499
20.2 JCE and its Predecessors: A Twist on Complicity Liability 501
20.3 Control Theory: A Novel Approach 506
20.4 How to Understand Article 25(3): Some Suggestions 510
20.5 Concluding Observations 514
20.6 Outlook on the Future 516

21. Co-Perpetration: German Dogmatik or German Invasion? 517
Jens David Ohlin

21.1 Introduction 517
21.2 The Emergence of Co-Perpetration 518
21.3 Criticisms of the Control Theory of Perpetration 527
21.4 Alternative Accounts of Co-Perpetration 531
21.5 Concluding Evaluations 537

22. Indirect Perpetration 538
Thomas Weigend

22.1 Background 538
22.2 Ad Hoc Tribunals and Indirect Perpetration 541
22.3 The Inception of Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute 542
22.4 Application of Article 25(3)(a) of the Statute by the ICC 543
22.5 Criticism of the Pre-Trial Chamber's Approach 548
22.6 A Narrow Version of Indirect Perpetration? 550
22.7 Outlook 554

23. Forms of Accessorial Liability under Article 25(3)(b) and (c) 557
Héctor Olásolo and Enrique Carnero Rojo

23.1 Introduction 557
23.2 Ordering, Instigating, and Planning (Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute) 560
23.3 Aiding, Abetting, or Otherwise Assisting (Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute) 578
23.4 Conclusions 590

24. The ICC and Common Purpose—What Contribution is Required under Article 25(3)(d)? 592
Kai Ambos

24.1 Preliminary Remarks: Key Features of Article 25(3)(d) and Necessary Delimitations 592
24.2 The Key Issue: What Objective Contribution is Required? 596
24.3 Conclusion 607

25. Command Responsibility under Article 28 of the Rome Statute 608
Alejandro Kiss

25.1 Introduction 608
25.2 Development of this Mode of Liability 609
25.3 Commanders and Forces, Superiors and Subordinates 612
25.4 Effective Command, Authority, and Control 618
25.5 Duties on Commanders and Superiors 622
25.6 Proof of Causation 634
25.7 Mens Rea Requirements 638
25.8 Brief Concluding Words 648

26. Rethinking the Mental Elements in the Jurisprudence of the ICC 649
Mohamed Elewa Badar and Sara Porro

26.1 Introductory Observations: The (Quest for) Balance between Intent, Specificity, and Proportionality 649
26.2 The Default Rule of Article 30 ICC Statute: A Groundbreaking Step in the History of ICL or the Source of Irresolvable Interpretative Uncertainties? 650
26.3 The Default Rule of Article 30 ICC Statute between Applicability and Non-applicability 665
26.4 Concluding Remarks 667

27. The ICC's First Encounter with the Crime of Genocide: The Case against Al Bashir 669
Claus Kreß

27.1 Introduction 669
27.2 The ICC's Al Bashir Case Law on the Crime of Genocide 670
27.3 An Acquittal in re Genocide—A Failure? On the Rhetorics of Genocide 703

28. Crimes against Humanity: A Better Policy on 'Policy' 705
Darryl Robinson

28.1 Introduction 705
28.2 The Theory Behind the Policy Element 707
28.3 Concerns about ICC Jurisprudence 713
28.4 The Gbagbo Adjournment Decision: Direct Proof of Formal Adoption? 716

28.5 Mbarushimana: Distracted by Ulterior Purposes? 724
28.6 Conclusion and Proposal for Reform 729

29. Charging War Crimes: Policy and Prognosis from a Military Perspective 732
Michael A. Newton

29.1 Introduction 732
29.2 The Underlying Permissiveness of the jus in bello Regime 734
29.3 Understanding the Underlying Structure of Article 8 739
29.4 Interrelationship of the Court with Operational Realities 749
29.5 Conclusions 760

30. The Characterization of Armed Conflict in the Jurisprudence of the ICC 762
Anthony Cullen

30.1 Introduction 762
30.2 The Exercise of Jurisdiction over War Crimes 762
30.3 The Characterization of Armed Conflict under the Rome Statute 764
30.4 Issues Impacting on the Characterization of Armed Conflict by the ICC 774
30.5 Conclusion 777

31. The Crime of Aggression 778
Roger S. Clark

31.1 Introduction 778
31.2 The Kampala Amendments on the Crime of Aggression 779
31.3 Implementing the Kampala Amendments Domestically 793
31.4 Conclusion 800

32. La Lutte Continue: Investigating and Prosecuting Sexual Violence at the ICC 801
Niamh Hayes

32.1 Introduction 801
32.2 Charges for Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes: The OTP's Attrition Problem 805
32.3 Ocampo and Investigations: The OTP's Evidence Problem 813
32.4 Bensouda and the Policy Paper: The OTP's Future Strategy 824
32.5 Conclusion 839

33. Cumulative Charges and Cumulative Convictions 840
Carl-Friedrich Stuckenberg

33.1 Introduction 840
33.2 Cumulative Convictions 842
33.3 Cumulative Charges 852
33.4 Conclusion 858

V. FAIRNESS AND EXPEDITIOUSNESS OF ICC PROCEEDINGS

34. The International Criminal Standard of Proof at the ICC—Beyond Reasonable Doubt or Beyond Reason? 861
Simon De Smet

34.1 Introduction 861
34.2 Some Theoretical Considerations 864
34.3 Subjective Standard of Proof 865
34.4 Formal Standard of Proof 872
34.5 Which Model for the ICC? 882
34.6 Where to Set the Standard of Proof? 882
34.7 A Fixed or Variable Standard of Proof? 887
34.8 Conclusion 889

35. Confirmation of Charges 891
Ignaz Stegmiller

35.1 Introduction 891
35.2 Proceedings during the Confirmation of Charges Phase 893
35.3 Procedural Avenues for the Pre-Trial Chamber 896
35.4 Subsequent Modification of the Legal Characterization 902
35.5 Conclusion: The Necessity of an Intermediary Filter Mechanism for Complex International Criminal Trials 905

36. Trial Procedures—With a Particular Focus on the Relationship between the Proceedings of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909
Håkan Friman

36.1 Introduction 909
36.2 Trial Experiences 910
36.3 Relationship between the Pre-Trial and Trial Process 913
36.4 Charges—From Confirmation to Adjudication 916
36.5 Proper Disclosure of Evidence 922
36.6 The Role of the Trial Chamber 926
36.7 Concluding Remarks 930

37. Proportionate Sentencing at the ICC 932
Margaret M. deGuzman

37.1 Introduction 932
37.2 The ICC's First Sentencing Judgment 933
37.3 Proportionality Theories 935
37.4 Proportionality Principles in the ICC's Applicable Law 943
37.5 Rejecting International Retributivism 948
37.6 Preventive International Proportionality 956
37.7 Conclusion 962

38. The Role of the Appeals Chamber 963
Volker Nerlich

38.1 Introduction 963
38.2 The Appeals Chamber in the Context of the ICC 964

38.3 Jurisdiction of the Appeals Chamber 966
38.4 Early Jurisprudence: Cautious Exercise of its Powers 978

39. 'A Stick to Hit the Accused With': The Legal Recharacterization of Facts under Regulation 55 981
Kevin Jon Heller

39.1 Introduction 981
39.2 Is Regulation 55 Ultra Vires? 982
39.3 Has the Judiciary Correctly Interpreted Regulation 55? 989
39.4 Is Regulation 55 Consistent with the Rights of the Prosecution and the Defence? 993
39.5 Conclusion 1006

40. Disclosure Challenges at the ICC 1007
Alex Whiting

40.1 Introduction 1007
40.2 The Framework 1009
40.3 The Challenges 1017
40.4 Conclusion 1025

41. Sitting on Evidence?: Systemic Failings in the ICC Disclosure Regime—Time for Reform 1029
Karim A A Khan QC and Caroline Buisman

41.1 Introduction 1029
41.2 General Legal Principles 1031
41.3 Incriminatory Information 1031
41.4 Information which is Exculpatory or Assists the Defence 1040
41.5 Exemptions from Disclosure Obligations 1047
41.6 Concluding Remarks 1059
41.7 Proposals for Reform 1060

42. The Roads to Freedom—Interim Release in the Practice of the ICC 1063
Aiste Dumbryte

42.1 Introduction 1063
42.2 Burden of Proof 1064
42.3 Interim Release under Article 60(2): Failing to Meet the Grounds for Detention 1067
42.4 Interim Release under Article 60(4): Unreasonable Length of Detention 1078
42.5 Interim Release in Exceptional Humanitarian Circumstances 1080
42.6 Conclusions and Recommendations 1081

43. Testifying behind Bars—Detained ICC Witnesses and Human Rights Protection 1084
Joris van Wijk and Marjolein Cupido

43.1 Introduction 1084
43.2 Legal Proceedings 1086
43.3 Taking Stock 1094

43.4 Future Implications 1096
43.5 Possible Solutions 1099
43.6 Concluding Remarks 1103

44. External Support and Internal Coordination—The ICC and the Protection of Witnesses 1105
Markus Eikel

44.1 Introduction 1105
44.2 Legal Framework 1107
44.3 Disagreements about Responsibilities for Protective Measures 1113
44.4 Developed Practices 1118
44.5 Conclusion 1131

45. Victim Participation Revisited—What the ICC is Learning about Itself 1133
Sergey Vasiliev

45.1 Introduction 1133
45.2 Challenges of Victim Participation at the ICC: A Bird's-Eye View 1138
45.3 Implementation of Victim Participation: Problems and Solutions 1146
45.4 Victim Participation as Governance Matter 1187
45.5 Conclusion 1200

46. The Rome Statute's Regime of Victim Redress: Challenges and Prospects 1203
Conor McCarthy

46.1 Introduction 1203
46.2 Overview of Rome Statute's Regime of Victim Redress 1204
46.3 The Character of the Rome Statute's Reparations Regime 1207
46.4 The Failure of Victim Redress at the National Level: Reparations and Complementarity 1211
46.5 Early Trends: Towards a More Flexible System of Victim Redress? 1216
46.6 Conclusion 1220

VI. IMPACT, 'LEGACY', AND LESSONS LEARNED

47. The Deterrent Effect of the ICC on the Commission of International Crimes by Government Leaders 1225
Nick Grono and Anna de Courcy Wheeler

47.1 Introduction 1225
47.2 The Effect of Prosecutions on Political Calculations 1226
47.3 The Wider Context, Public Policymaking 1236
47.4 Conclusions 1243

48. The ICC and Capacity Building at the National Level 1245
Olympia Bekou

48.1 Introduction 1245
48.2 Complementarity and the Challenges of National Capacity 1246
48.3 Challenges to Domestic Capacity 1249
48.4 Positive Complementarity: A Suitable Basis for Capacity Building? 1252

48.5 The 'How To' of Capacity Building 1254
48.6 Concluding Remarks 1257

49. Completion, Legacy, and Complementarity at the ICC 1259
Elizabeth Evenson and Alison Smith

49.1 Introduction 1259
49.2 Adapting the Concept of 'Completion' to the ICC 1263
49.3 Lessons Learned for Capacity Building, Outreach, and Archive Management 1269
49.4 A Role for the Court and the ASP 1273
49.5 Conclusion 1275

50. A Look towards the Future—The ICC and 'Lessons Learnt' 1277
Philipp Ambach

50.1 Introduction 1277
50.2 Operational Challenges of the ICC 1278
50.3 The ICC's 'Lessons Learnt' Initiative to Increase the Efficiency of its Criminal Process 1284
50.4 Conclusion 1293

Name Index 1297
Subject Index 1303

Table of Cases

DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF CONGO

Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006 214

The Prosecutor v Thomas Lubanga Dyilo

Decision on the Admissibility of the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Décision sur la confirmation des charges' of 29 January 2007, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-926 (OA8), AC, ICC, 13 June 2007 969

Decision on the Admissibility of the Appeals against Trial Chamber I's 'Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations' and Directions on the Further Conduct of Proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2953 (A1, A2, A3, OA21), AC, ICC, 14 December 2012 ..... 422, 974

Decision on Agreements between the Parties, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1179, TC I, ICC, 8 January 2010 1002

Decision on the Confirmation of the Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-0l/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007..... 420, 430, 431, 499, 520, 543, 594, 653, 757, 918, 989

Decision on Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Article 54(3) (e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1401, TC I, ICC, 13 June 2008..... 382, 821, 1109

Decision on the Defence Request to Reconsider the 'Order on Numbering of Evidence' of 12 May 2010, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2707, TC I, ICC, 30 March 2011 413

Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure Pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-108-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 19 May 2006..... 485, 1117

Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure Pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-108-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 26 May 2006 1047

Decision Establishing the Principles and Procedures to be Applied to Reparations, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2904, TC I, ICC, 7 August 2012 ..... 489, 912, 974, 1203

Decision on the Final System of Disclosure and the Establishment of a Timetable, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-102, PTC I, ICC, 15 May 2006..... 463, 922

Decision on a General Framework Concerning Protective Measures for Prosecution and Defence Witnesses, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-447, PTC I, ICC, 19 September 2006 1119

Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2049, TC I, ICC, 14 July 2009 809

Decision on the Legal Representatives' Joint Submissions Concerning the Appeals Chamber's Decision on 8 December 2009 on Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2223, TC I, ICC, 8 January 2010 998
Decision on the Manner of Questioning Witnesses by the Legal Representatives of Victims, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2127, TC I, ICC, 16 September 2009 1178
Decision on the Observations Submitted by Counsel Representing Defence Witness 19 in the Dutch Asylum Proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2835, TC I, ICC, 15 December 2001 1090
Decision on the Practices of Witness Familiarization and Witness Proofing, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-0l/04-0l/06-679, PTC I, ICC, 8 November 2006, and 30 ICC-/04-01/06-1049, TC I, ICC, 30 November 2007 . . . . . 428, 429, 432, 462
Decision on the Prosecutor's 'Application for Leave to Reply to "Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d'appel du Procureur" ', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-424, AC, ICC, 12 September 2006 461
Decision on the Prosecution and Defence Applications for Leave to Appeal the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-915, PTC I, ICC, 24 May 2007 . . . . . 895, 989
Decision on the Prosecution Motion for Reconsideration and, in the Alternative, Leave to Appeal, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-166, PTC I, ICC, 23 June 2006 462
Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultations with the VWU, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2517-Red, TC I, ICC, 8 July 2010 390
Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1049, PTC I, ICC, 11 June 2007 462
Decision Regarding the Timing and Manner of Disclosure and the Date of Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1019, TC I, ICC, 9 November 2007. . . . . 924, 1114, 1127
Decision on the Release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1418, TC I, ICC, 2 July 2008 389
Decision on the Request by victims a/0225/06, a/0229/06, and a/0270/07 to express their views and concerns in person and to present evidence during the trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2032-Anx, TC I, ICC, 26 June 2009 1165
Decision on Responsibilities for Protective Measures, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1311-Anx2, 24 April 2008 1114
Decision on the Schedule and Conduct of the Confirmation Hearing, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-678, PTC I, ICC, 7 November 2006 894
Decision on Sentence Pursuant to Art. 76 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2901, TC I, ICC, 10 July 2012 . . . . . 996, 852
Decision on Sentence Pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3122, AC, ICC, 12 January 2014 . . . . . 528, 912, 934

Decision on the Status before the Trial Chamber of the Evidence Heard by the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber in Trial Proceedings, and the Manner in which Evidence shall be submitted, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1084, TC I, ICC, 13 December 2007. . . . . 900, 920, 995
Decision on Two Requests for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision on the request by DRC-D01-WWWW-0019 for special protective measures relating to his asylum application', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2779, TC I, ICC, 4 August 2011 973
Decision on the 'Urgent Request for Directions' of the Kingdom of The Netherlands of 17 August 2011, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2799 (OA19), AC, ICC, 26 August 2011. . . . . 974, 1292
Decision on Victims' Participation, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 18 January 2008, ICC-01/04-01/06-1119, TC I, ICC, 18 January 2008 435
Judgment on the Appeals against the "Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations", Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06 A A 2 A 3, Appeals Chamber, ICC, 3 March 2015. . . 1203
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Lubanga Dyilo against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber I of 18 January 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1433, AC, ICC, 11 July 2008 . . . . . 1012, 1021
Judgment on the Appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts may be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, TC I, ICC, 8 December 2009 . . . . . 488, 809, 886, 902, 981
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his Conviction, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04–01/06-A-5, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014 . . . . . 595, 663
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Article 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006 . . . . . 388, 425, 427, 463, 437, 484
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision of Pre- Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Requests and Amended Requests for Redactions under Rule 81', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 14 December 2006, ICC-0l/04-0l/06-773, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006. 436
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-824 (OA7), AC, ICC, 13 February 2007 . . . . . 422, 463, 969, 1068
Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Article 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, Together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1486, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008 . . . . . 389, 424, 437, 1016
Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1487, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008 391

Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 8 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultations with the VWU', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2582, AC, ICC, 8 October 2010 . . . . . 391, 1052
Judgment on the Appeals of the Prosecutor and the Defence against Trial Chamber I's Decision on Victims' Participation of 18 January 2008', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1432, AC, ICC, 11 July 2008 . . . . . 463, 919
Judgment on the Appeals of the Prosecutor and Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the 'Decision on Sentence pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06 A 4 A 6, TC I, ICC, 1 December 2014 935
Judgment on the Prosecutor's Appeal Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81 (2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006 . . . . . 384, 818, 900, 1117, 1038, 1014
Judgment Pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 . . . . . 329, 499, 463, 522, 542, 599, 654, 764, 810, 852, 900, 912, 990, 1133, 1286, 1044
Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2074, OTP, ICC, 12 August 2009 809
Warrant of Arrest, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2- tEN, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006 809

The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui

Decision on the Admissibility of the Appeal against the 'Decision on the Application for the Interim Release of Detained Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 and DRC-D02-P-0350', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3424, AC, ICC, 20 January 2014 440
Decision on an Amicus Curiae Application and on the 'Requête tendant à obtenir présentations des témoins DRC-D02-P-0350, DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 aux aux autorités néerlandaises aux fins d'asile (Arts 68 and 93(7) of the Statute), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3003-tENG, TC II, ICC, 9 June 2011 . . . . . 439, 1084
Decision on the 97 Applications for Participation at the Pre-Trial Stage of the Case, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-579, PTC I, ICC, 10 June 2008 1147
Decision on the Application for the Interim Release of Detained Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3405-tENG, TC II, ICC, 1 October 2013 439
Decision on the Application for Interim Release of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-345, PTC I, ICC, 27 March 2008 1069
Decision on the Application for the Interim Release of Detained Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228, and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3405-tENG, TC II, ICC, 1 October 2013 1090

Decision on the Applications for Leave to Appeal the Decision on the Admission of the Evidence of Witnesses 132 and 287 and on the Leave to Appeal on the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-727, PTC I, ICC, 24 October 2008 566
Decision on Application for Leave to Appeal by the Defence of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui against the Decision on Joinder, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-0l/04-01/07-384, PTC I, ICC, 9 April 2008 ..... 423, 463
Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of Applicants a/0327/07 toa/0337/07 and a/0001/08, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-357, PTC I, ICC, 2 April 2008 423
Decision on Article 54(3)(e) Documents Identified as Potentially Exculpatory or Otherwise Material to the Defence's Preparation for the Confirmation Hearing, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-621, PTC I, ICC, 20 June 2008. ..... 480, 894, 1031
Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008 ..... 329, 499, 526, 544, 619, 651, 713, 757, 763, 992, 1036
Decision on the Defence Request to Redact the Identity Source of DRC-D03-0001-0707, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3122, TC II, ICC, 22 August 2011 1048
Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319-tENG/ FRA, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012. ..... 488, 811
Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012 ..... 488, 514, 810, 903, 912
Decision on the Interpretation of the Court Proceedings, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1473, TC II, 15 September 2009 913
Decision on the Filing of a Summary of the Charges by the Prosecutor, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1547, TC II, ICC, 29 October 2009 920
Decision on the Joinder of the Cases against Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-257, PTC I, ICC, 10 March 2008 ..... 436, 463, 810, 910
Decision on the Modalities of Victim Participation at Trial, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1788-tENG, TC II, ICC, 22 January 2010 ..... 1166, 1169, 1293
Decision on 'Mr Mathieu Ngudjolo's Complaint under Regulation 221(1) of the Regulations of the Registry against the Registrar's Decision of 18 November 2008', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-RoR-217-02/08-8, Presidency, ICC, 10 March 2009 434
Decision on the Prosecutor's Appeal against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Request to Amend the Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1123, AC, ICC, 13 December 2013 433
Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information from Certain Evidence under Article 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (ICC-01/04-01/07-957), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1098-tENG, TC II, ICC, 30 December 2009 1048

Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information under Article 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1101-tENG, TC II, ICC, 4 May 2009 1122
Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information under Article 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (ICC-01/04-01/07-934), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1101-tENG, TC II, ICC, 5 May 2009 ..... 1048, 1051
Decision on the Prosecutor's Bar Table Motions, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2635, TC II, ICC, 17 December 2010 927
Decision on Prosecution Requests ICC-01/04-01/07-1386 and ICC-01/04-01/07-1407 Made Pursuant to Regulation 35 of the Regulations, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1552, TC II, ICC, 23 October 2009. 1039
Decision on the 'Prosecution's Urgent Application to Be Permitted to Present as Incriminating Evidence Transcripts and Translations of Videos and Video DRC-OTP-1042-0006 pursuant to Regulation 35 and Request for Redactions (ICC-01/04-01/07-1260)', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1336, TC II, ICC, 27 July 2009. 1037
Decision Rejecting the Prosecution Urgent Request and Establishing a Calendar for the Disclosure of the Supporting Materials of the Prosecution Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Germain Katanga, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-5, PTC I, ICC, 6 July 2007 894
Décision relative à la mise en œuvre de la norme 55 du Règlement de la Cour et prononçant la disjonction des charges portées contre les accuses, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012 858
Décision relative à la peine (article 76 du Statut), Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3484, TC II, ICC, 23 May 2014 ..... 208, 852, 912
Decision on the Request for Release of Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228, and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, TC II, ICC, 8 February 2013 1094
Decision on the Schedule for the Confirmation Hearing, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-587, PTC I, ICC, 13 June 2008 894
Decision on the Set of Procedural Rights Attached to the Procedural Status of Victims at the Pre-Trial Stage of the Case, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-475, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008 485
Decision on Three Prosecutor's Applications to Maintain Redactions or Reinstate Redacted Passages (ICC-01/04-01/07-859, ICC-01/04-01/07-860, and ICC-01/04-01/07-862), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1034-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 November 2009 1051
Decision on the Treatment of Applications for Participation, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-933, TC II, ICC, 26 February 2009. 1148
Decision on the Urgent Request for Convening a Status Conference on the Detention of Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228, and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3254, TC II, ICC, 1 March 2012 1085

Judgment on the Appeal against the Decision on Joinder Rendered on 10 March 2008 by the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui Cases, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-573, AC, ICC, 9 June 2008 494
Judgment in the Appeal by Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui of 27 March 2008 against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I on the Application of the Appellant for Interim Release, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-572, AC, ICC, 9 June 2008 1070
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statements', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-476, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008 1049
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Defence Request Concerning Languages', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-522, AC, ICC, 27 May 2008 913
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497 (OA8), AC, ICC, 25 September 2009. . . . . 216, 228, 978
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 21 November 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3363, AC, ICC, 27 March 2013 . . . . . 488, 858, 992
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Katanga against the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 22 January 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Modalities of Victim Participation at Trial', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2288, AC, ICC, 16 July 2010. . . . . 928, 1042
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Statements of Witnesses 4 and 9', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-521, AC, ICC, 27 May 2008 463
Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statements', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-475, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008 . . . . . 1015, 1047, 1110
Judgement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014 . . . . . 472, 508–9, 542, 594, 595, 662, 730, 764, 811, 852, 862, 1185, 1133
Prosecution's Appeal against Trial Chamber II's 'Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3462, OTP, ICC, 9 April 2014 812
Warrant of Arrest for Germain Katanga, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04 01/07-1-US-tENG, PTC I, ICC, 2 July 2007. 810

The Prosecutor v. Bosco Ntaganda

Decision on the Defence's Application for Interim Release', Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-147, PTC II, PT Ch II, 18 November 2013. 1072
Decision Establishing Principles on the Victims' Application Process, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-67, PTC II, ICC, 28 May 2013 1158

Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx2, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006 378
Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Bosco Ntaganda, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-309, PTC II, ICC, 9 June 2014 .... 809, 618, 857, 911
Decision Setting the Regime for Evidence Disclosure and Other Related Matters, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-47, PTC II, ICC, 12 April 2013 1010
Decision on Victims' Participation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-211, PTC II, ICC, 15 January 2014 1147
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Bosco Ntaganda against the Decision of Pre-Trial chamber II of 18 November 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Defence's Application for Interim Release', Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-271-Red, AC, ICC, 5 March 2014 1070

The Prosecutor v. Callixte Mbarushimana

Decision on the 138 Applications for Victims' Participation in the Proceedings, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-351, PTC, ICC, 11 August 2011 1148
Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011 ..... 522, 594, 705, 724, 808, 1241
Decision on Issues Relating to Disclosure, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-87, PTC I, ICC, 30 March 2011 922
Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the "Decision on the Confirmation of Charges" ', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-487, PTC I, ICC, 1 March 2012 895
Decision on the Prosecution's Request for Stay of Order to Release Callixte Mbarushimana, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-469, PCT I, ICC, 19 December 2011 970
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Callixte Mbarushimana against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 19 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the "Defence Request for Interim Release" ', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-283, AC, ICC, 14 July 2011 1078
Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 16 December 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-514, AC, ICC, 30 May 2012 ..... 342, 598, 895, 915

The Prosecutor v. Sylvestre Mudacumura

Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58, Mudacumura, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, PTC II, ICC, 13 July 2012 ..... 808, 857

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo

Decision Adjourning the Hearing pursuant to Article 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Rome Statute, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-388, PTC III, ICC, 3 March 2009 ..... 462, 764, 900, 917, 988
Decision on Application for Interim Release, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-321, PTC III, ICC, 16 December 2008 ... 1069, 1072, 1074

Decision on 772 Applications by Victims to Participate in the Proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1017, TC III, ICC, 18 November 2010 1150
Decision on the Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2818, TC III, ICC, 17 September 2013 1101
Decision on Common Legal Representation of Victims for the Purpose of Trial, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1005, TC III, ICC, 10 November 2010 . . . . . 1182, 1183
Decision on the Defence Application for Corrections to the Document Containing the Charges and for the Prosecution to File a Second Amended Document Containing the Charges, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-836, 20 July 2010, TC III 918
Decision on the 'Defence Motion for Disclosure of VWU Security Assessments of Defence Witnesses', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2588, TC III, ICC, 19 April 2013 1120
Decision on the Defence's Urgent Request Concerning Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba's Attendance of his Father's Funeral, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-437-Red, PTC II, ICC, 3 July 2009 1080
Decision on the Evidence Disclosure System and Setting a Timetable for Disclosure between the Parties, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-55, PTC II, ICC, 31 July 2008 923
Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participant that the Legal Characterization of the Facts May be Subject to Change in accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2324, TC III, ICC, 21 September 2012 . . . . . 760, 917, 998
Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-475, PTC II, ICC, 14 August 2009 911
Decision on the Defence's 'Submission on the Anticipated Witness Schedule' and the Testimony of Witness and 'Submissions on the Remaining Defence Evidence' and the Appearance of Witnesses D04-23, D04-26, D04-25, D04-36, D04-29, and D04-30 via Video-Link, D04-54 Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, (ICC-01/05-01/08-2806-Conf) ICC-01/05-01/08-2740, TC III, ICC, 15 August 2013 1101
Decision on Directions for the Conduct of the Proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1023, TC III, ICC, 19 November 2010 927
Decision Lifting the Temporary Suspension of the Trial Proceedings and Addressing Additional Issues raised in Defence Submissions ICC-01/05-01/08-2490-Red and ICC-01/05-01/08-2497, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2500, TC III, ICC, 6 February 2013 917
Decision on the Participation of Victims in the Trial and on 86 Applications by Victims to Participate in the Proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-807, TC III, ICC, 30 June 2010 . . . . . 1149, 1292
Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, PTC III, ICC, 10 June 2008 . . . . . 757, 806, 855
Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-523, PTC II, ICC, 18 September 2009 . . . . . 856, 895, 991
Decision on the 'Prosecution's Submissions on the Trial Chamber's 8 December 2009 Oral Order Requesting Updating of the In-Depth Analysis Chart', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-682, TC III, ICC, 29 January 2010 927

Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7) (a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009 . . . . . 430, 526, 603, 614, 651, 715, 760, 764, 813, 852, 909, 917, 990
Decision on the Review of the Detention of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Pursuant to Rule 118(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-743, TC III, ICC, 1 April 2010 . . . . . 1066, 1074
Decision on the Temporary Suspension of the Proceedings Pursuant to Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court and Related Procedural Deadlines, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2480, TC III, ICC, 13 December 2012. . . . . 903, 917
Decision on the Supplemented Applications by the Legal Representatives of Victims to Present Evidence and the Views and Concerns of victims, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2138, TC III, ICC, 22 February 2012. . . . 1167, 1174
Fourth Decision on Victims' Participation, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-320, PTC III, ICC, 12 December 2008. 1147
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 24 June 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08OA3, ICC, AC, 19 October 2010. 232–3
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 28 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Review of the Detention of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Pursuant to Rule 118(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1019, AC, ICC, 19 November 2010 1065
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 26 September 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Accused's Application for Provisional Release in Light of the Appeals Chamber's Judgment of 19 August 2011', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1937-Red2, AC, ICC, 15 December 2011. 1076
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Georghios M Pikis, Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled 'Decision on Application for Interim Release', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-323, AC, ICC, 16 December 2008 1066
Judgment on the Appeals of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber III entitled 'Decision on the Admission into Evidence of Materials Contained in the Prosecution's List of Evidence', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1386, AC, ICC, 3 May 2011 928
Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against Pre-Trial Chamber II's 'Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-631-Red, AC, ICC, 2 December 2009 1068
Warrant of Arrest for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo replacing the Warrant of Arrest issued on 23 May 2008, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-15, PTC II, ICC, 10 June 2008. 510

The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Aimé Kilolo Musamba, Jean-Jacques Mangenda Kabongo, Fidèle Babala Wandu and Narcisse Arido

Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, TC III, ICC, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, 24 June 2010 . . . . . 217, 487

Decision on the 'Demande de Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Maître Aimé Kilolo Musamba', Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-259, PTC II, ICC, 14 March 2014 1072
Decision on the 'Requête de Mise en Liberté' Submitted by the Defence for Jean-Jacques Mangenda, Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-261, PTC II, 17 March 2014 1072
Decision on the 'Requête Urgente de la Défense Sollicitant la Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Monsieur Fidèle Babala Wandu', Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-258, PTC II, 14 March 2014 1069
Decision on the Submission of an Updated, Consolidated Version of the In-Depth Analysis Chart of Incriminatory Evidence, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-232, PTC III, ICC, 10 November 2008..... 420
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Aimé Kilolo Musamba against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 14 March 2014 entitled 'Decision on the "Demande de Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Maître Aimé Kilolo Musamba" ', Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-558, AC, ICC, 11 July 2014 1071
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Fidèle Babala Wandu against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 14 March 2014 entitled 'Decision on the "Requête Urgente de la Défense Sollicitant la Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Monsieur Fidèle Babala Wandu" ', Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-559, AC, ICC, 11 July 2014 1074
Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against Pre-Trial Chamber II's 'Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-631-Red, AC, ICC, 2 December 2009 ..... 928, 1065, 1066, 1068
Warrant of Arrest for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Aimé. Kilolo Musamba, Jean-Jacques Mangenda Kabongo, Fidèle Babala Wandu, and Narcisse Arido, Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-1-Red2-tENG, PTC II, ICC, 20 November 2013..... 561, 1105

UGANDA

Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II to Redact Factual Decision on Victims' Applications for Participation, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-101, PTC II, ICC, 10 August 2007 1148
Decision on Victims' Applications for Participation a/0014/07 to a/0020/07 and a/0076/07 to a/0125/07, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-172, PTC II, ICC, 21 November 2008 1148
Decision on Victims' Applications for Participation a/0192/07 to a/0194/07, a/0196/07, a/0200/07, a/0204/07, a/0206/07, a/0209/07, a/0212/07, a/0216/07, a/0217/07, a/0219/07 to a/0221/07, a/02228/07 to a/0230/07, a/0234/07, a/0235/07, a/0237/07, a/0324/07, and a/0326/07 under Rule 89, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-180, PTC II, ICC, 10 March 2009..... 1148
Decision on Victim's Participation in Proceedings Related to the Situation in Uganda, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-191, PTC II, ICC, 9 March 2012..... 1150
Descriptions of Crimes from the Warrants of Arrest, Motion for Reconsideration and Motions for Clarification, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-60, PTC II, ICC, 28 October 2005 462
Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC II, 27 September 2005 ..... 212, 560

The Prosecutor v. Joseph Kony

Decision to Convene a Status Conference on the Investigation in the Situation in Uganda in Relation to the Application of Article 53, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-68, PTC II, ICC, 2 December 2005 . . . . . 213, 362
Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II to Redact Factual Descriptions of Crimes from the Warrants of Arrest, Motion for Reconsideration, and Motion for Clarification, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-60, PTC II, ICC, 28 October 2005 . . . . . 415, 423, 428, 481
Decision to Terminate the Proceedings against Raska Lukwiya, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-248, PTC II, ICC, 11 July 2007 . . . . . 328, 560
Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony Issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC II, 27 September 2005 . . . . . 212, 560

The Prosecutor v. Dominic Ongwen

Warrant of Arrest for Dominic Ongwen, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-57, PTC II, ICC, 8 July 2005 560

SUDAN

Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-94, PTC I, ICC, 12 July 2010. 670
Decision on Issues Related to the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges, Banda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-103, PTC I, ICC, 17 November 2010. 895
Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009 768

The Prosecutor v. Ahmad Muhammad Harun ("Ahmad Harun") and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-Al-Rahman ("Ali Kushayb")

Decision Informing the United Nations Security Council about the Lack of Cooperation by the Republic of Sudan, Harun and Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-10/07-57, PTC I, ICC, 25 May 2010 1240
Decision on the Prosecution Application under Article 58(7) of the Statute, Harun and Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, lCC-02/05-01/07-1, PTC I, ICC, 27 April 2007 . . . . . 420, 569
Warrant of Arrest for Ahmad Harun, Harun and Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/07-2-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 27 April 2007 569

The Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir

Corrigendum to Decision Pursuant to Article 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-139-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 12 December 2011 285–7
Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/056-01/09-195, PTC II, ICC, 9 April 2014 . . . . . 269, 288, 424
Decision Informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's Presence in the Territory of the Republic of Kenya, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-107, PTC I, ICC, 27 August 2010 271
Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009 . . . . . 291, 471, 543, 670, 857

Decision Pursuant to Article 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-139, PTC I, ICC, 12 December 2011 ..... 268–9, 421, 424, 1280
Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Potential Travel to the State of Kuwait, ICC 02/05-01/09, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-192, PTC II, ICC, 24 March 2014 260
Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Potential Travel to the United States of America, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-162, PTC II, ICC, 18 September 2013 260
Decision Regarding the Visit of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir to the Federal Republic of Ethiopia, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-199, PTC II, ICC, 29 April 2014 ..... 260, 1280
Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir', Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-73 OA, AC, ICC, 3 February 2010 ..... 670, 863
Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009 768
Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-94, PTC I, ICC, 12 July 2010 670
Second Warrant of Arrest for Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-95, PTC I, ICC, 12 July 2010 ..... 807, 1282
Warrant of Arrest, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-1, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009 757
Warrant of Arrest for Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-1, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009 ..... 510, 823, 1282

The Prosecutor v. Bahar Idriss Abu Garda

Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, PTC I, ICC, 8 February 2010 ..... 322, 328, 471, 808, 930
Second Decision on Issues Relating to Disclosure, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-35, PTC I, ICC, 15 July 2009 923

The Prosecutor v. Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain

Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain and Mr Saleh Mohammed Jerbo Jamus against the Decision of Trial Chamber IV of 23 January 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Defence's Request for Disclosure of Documents in the Possession of the Office of the Prosecutor', Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-501, AC, ICC, 28 August 2013 1042
Warrant of Arrest for Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain, Banda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-606, TC IV, ICC, 11 September 2014 909

REPUBLIC OF KENYA

Decision on the Admissibility of the 'Appeal of the Government of Kenya against the "Decision on the Request for Assistance Submitted on Behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 93(10) of the Statute and Rule 194 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence"', Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-78 (OA), AC, ICC, 10 August 2011 968

Decision on the 'Application for Leave to Participate in the Proceedings before the Pre-Trial Chamber Relating to the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58(7)', Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-42, PTC II, ICC, 11 February 2011 441
Decision on Application for Leave to Submit Amicus Curiae Observations, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-35, PTC II, ICC, 18 January 2011 441
Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010 ..... 221, 240, 367, 463, 1212
Decision on the Request for Assistance Submitted on Behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 93(10) of the Statute and Rule 194 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09, PTC II, ICC, 29 June 2011 236
Decision on Victims' Participation in Proceedings Related to the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-24, PTC II, ICC, 3 November 2010..... 435, 1147

The Prosecutor v. William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang

Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber V(a) of 18 June 2013 entitled 'Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Ruto and San g, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, AC, ICC, 25 October 2013....., 415
Application on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Ruto, Kosgey, Sang, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-26, 31 March 2011..... 234, 317
Decision on the Appeals of Mr William Samoei Ruto and Mr Joshua Arap Sang against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 23 January 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-414 (OA3, OA4), AC, ICC, 24 May 2012..... 968
Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation on Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-101, PTC II, ICC, 30 May 2011 235
Decision on Applications for Notice of Possibility of Variation of Legal Characterisation—Annex A: Reproduction of Annex A of the Prosecution Additional Submission (ICC-01/09-01/11-943-AnxA), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1122-AnxA, 12 December 2013 561
Decision on Applications for Notice of Possibility of Variation of Legal Characterization, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1122, TC V(A), ICC, 12 December 2013 ..... 561, 857, 921, 1002
Decision Concerning the Start Date of Trial, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-642, TC V, ICC, 8 March 2013..... 1039, 1129
Decision on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (General Directions), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-847, TC V(A), ICC, 9 August 2013 ..... 926, 1180
Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012 ..... 329, 808, 471, 546, 595, 619, 852, 896, 919
Decision on the Content of the Updated Document Containing the Charges, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-522, TC V, ICC, 28 December 2012..... 920
Decision on Excusal from Presence at Trial under Rule 134quater, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1186, TC V(A), ICC, 18 February 2014..... 418

Decision on the 'Defence's Application for Extension of Time to Submit Properly Justified Proposals for Redactions', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-215, PTC II, ICC, 21 July 2011 1033
Decision on the Defences' Applications for Leave to Appeal the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-399, PTC II, ICC, 9 March 2012 895
Decision on Defence Applications for Leave to Appeal the Decision on Disclosure of Information on VWU Assistance, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1154, TC V(A), ICC, 21 January 2014 1043
Decision on the Defence Application of Time to Submit Information on Viva Voce Witnesses to be Called at the Confirmation Hearing, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-176, PTC II, ICC, 11 July 2011 1034
Decision on Disclosure of Information related to Prosecution Intermediaries, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-904-Red, TC V(A), ICC, 4 September 2013 1045
Decision on the Legal Representative's Report on the Withdrawal of Victims, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1098, TC V(A), ICC, 14 November 2013. 911
Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, AC, ICC, 25 October 2013. 1291
Decision on the 'Motion from Victims a/0041/10, a/0045/10, a/0051/10, and a/0056/10 requesting the Pre-Trial Chamber to Reconsider the Appointment of Common Legal Representative Sureta Chana for All Victims', Ruto et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-330, PTC II, ICC, 9 September 2011 1182
Decision No. 2 on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (General Directions), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-900, TC V(A), ICC, 3 September 2013 929
Decision No. 5 on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (Principles and Procedure on 'No case to Answer' Motions), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1134, TC V(A), ICC, 3 June 2014. . . . . 420, 429
Decision on the Prosecutor's Appeal against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Request to Amend the Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1123, AC, ICC, 13 December 2013 433
Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application for Extension of Time Limit for Disclosure', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-82, PTC II, ICC, 10 May 2011 1033
Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the "Decision Setting the Regime for Evidence Disclosure and Other Related Matters" (ICC-01/09-01/11-44)', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-74, PTC II, ICC, 2 May 2011 922
Decision on Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision on Disclosure of Information related to Prosecution Intermediaries', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1018-Red, TC V(A), ICC, 8 October 2013. 1045
Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Summons to Appear for William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey, and Joshua Arap Sang, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1, PTC II, ICC, 8 March 2011 904
Decision on Prosecutor's Application for Witness Summonses and Resulting Request for State Party Cooperation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1274-Corr2, TC V(A), ICC, 17 April 2014 . . . . . 416, 429, 432

Decision on Prosecution Requests to Add Witnesses and Evidence and Defence Requests to Reschedule the Trial Start Date, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-762, TC V(A), ICC, 3 June 2013 1038
Decision on the 'Prosecution's Request to Amend the Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-859, PTC II, ICC, 16 August 2013 ..... 900, 921
Decision on the 'Prosecution's Request for Extension of Page Limit for the Document Containing the Charges', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-154, PTC II, ICC, 1 July 2011 1035
Decision on the Protocol Establishing a Redaction Regime, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-458, TC V, ICC, 27 September 2012 924
Decision on the 'Request by the Victims' Representative for authorization by the Chamber to make written submissions on specific issues of law and/or fact', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-274, PTC II, 19 August 2011 918
Decision Requesting the Parties to Submit Information for the Preparation of the Confirmation of Charges Hearing, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-153, PTC II, ICC, 29 June 2011 1034
Decision on the Schedule leading up to trial, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-440, TC V, ICC, 9 July 2012 1128
Decision Setting the Regime for Evidence Disclosure and Other Related Matters, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-44, PTC II, ICC, 6 April 2011..... 922, 1035
Decision on Victims' Representation and Participation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-460, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012..... 419, 916, 1005, 1292, 1155
Decision on Witness Preparation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-524, TC V, ICC, 2 January 2013..... 419
Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11 OA, ICC, AC, 30 August 2011 230
Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber V(a) of 18 June 2013 Entitled 'Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, AC, ICC, 25 October 2013 ..... 417, 415

The Prosecutor v. Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta et al.

Application on behalf of the Government of The Republic of Kenya pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Ruto, Kosgey, Sang, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-26, 31 March 2011..... 234
Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012.... 329, 471, 526, 653, 806, 817, 1030
Decision on the Content of the Updated Document Containing the Charges, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-584, TC V, ICC, 28 December 2012..... 900, 920
Decision on Defence Application for a Permanent Stay of the Proceedings Due to Abuse of Process, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-868-Red, TC V(B), ICC, 5 December 2013..... 424
Decision on Defence Application Pursuant to Article 64(4) and Related Requests, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-728, TC V, ICC, 26 April 2013 ..... 347, 387, 1007, 1060

Decision on Prosecution's Applications for a Finding of Non-Compliance Pursuant to Article 87(7) and for an Adjournment of the Provisional Trial Date, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-908, TC V(B), ICC, 31 March 2014 1280
Decision on Prosecution's Application for a Further Adjournment, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-981,TC V(B), ICC, 3 December 2014 909
Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Summonses to Appear, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-01, PTC II, ICC, 8 March 2011 806
Decision on the Request Submitted Pursuant to Rule 103(1) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-373, PTC I, ICC, 17 August 2007 363
Decision on the schedule leading up to trial, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-451, TC V, ICC, 9 July 2012 1128
Decision on victims' representation and participation, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-498, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012 1155
Decision on the Withdrawal of Charges against Mr Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-696, TC V, ICC, 18 March 2013 . . . . . 329, 902, 1030
Decision on Witness Preparation, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-588, TC V, ICC, 2 January 2013 424
Judgment on the Appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11 OA, AC, ICC, 30 August 2011 230

The Prosecutor v. Walter Osapiri Barasa

Warrant of Arrest for Walter Osapiri Barasa, Barasa, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/13-11-US-Exp, PTC II, ICC, 2 August 2013 1105

LIBYA

The Prosecutor v. Abdullah Al-Senussi and Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi

Application on behalf of the Government of Libya pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-130, 1 May 2012 . . . . . 234, 241, 255–7
Application relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11, 14 August 2013 251
Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, AC, ICC, 24 July 2014 1281
Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, PTC I, ICC, 11 October 2013 . . . . . 217, 218, 231, 237, 273, 1281
Decision following the declaration of inadmissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi before the Court, Gadafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/011-01/011, PTC I, ICC, 7 August 2014 249
Decision of the Request of the Defence of Abdullah Al-Senussi to Make a Finding on Non-cooperation by the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and Refer the Matter to the Security Council, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-420, PTC I, ICC, 28 August 2013 260
Decision to Terminate the Case against Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Gaddafi et al., Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-28, PTC I, ICC, 22 November 2011 328

Judgment on the Appeal of Libya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, AC, ICC, 21 May 2014 . . . . . 228–31, 236, 273, 313
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October entitled 'Decision on the admissibility of the case against Addullah Al-Senussi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11 OA 6, AC, ICC, 24 July. 228–9, 231, 236

SITUATION IN THE REPUBLIC OF CÔTE D'IVOIRE

The Prosecutor v. Simone Gbagbo

Simone Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/12-11-Red, 30 September 2013 233

The Prosecutor v. Laurent Gbagbo and Charles Blé Goudé

Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-432, PTC I, ICC, 3 June 2013, 22. . . . . 329, 705, 892, 1010, 1036
Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Against Laurent Gbagbo, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, PTC I, ICC, 12 June 2014 . . . . . 809, 625, 730, 857, 911
Decision on Defence Request on the Suspension of Time Limits During Judicial Recess, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of C.te d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-585, PTC I, ICC, 27 December 2013 422
Decision Establishing a Disclosure System and a Calendar for Disclosure, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-30, PTC I, ICC, 24 January 2012 923
Decision on the Fitness of Laurent Gbagbo to Take Part in the Proceedings before this Court, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-286-Red, PTC I, ICC, 2 November 2012 436
Decision on Issues Related to the Victims' Application Process, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-33, PTC III, ICC, 6 February 2012. 1153
Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest against Laurent Koudou Gbagbo (Public redacted version), Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-9-Red, 30 November 2011 . . . . . 713, 822
Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Cote d'Ivoire, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14, PTC III, ICC, 3 October 2011. 367
Decision on the 'Requête de la Défense Demandant la Mise en Liberté Provisoire du Président Gbagbo', L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-180-Red, PTC I, ICC, 13 July 2012 1069
Decision on the 'Requête relative à la recevabilité de l'affaire en vertu des Articles 19 et 17 du Statut', Laurent Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11, PTC I, ICC, 11 June 2013 233
Decision on the Request for the Conditional Release of Laurent Gbagbo and on his Medical Treatment, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-362-Red, PTC I, ICC, 18 January 2013 1081
Decision on Victims' Participation and Victims' Common Legal Representation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-138, PTC I, ICC, 4 June 2012 1292

Fourth Decision on the Review of Laurent Gbagbo's Detention Pursuant to Article 60(3) of the Rome Statute, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC- 02/11-01/11-558, PTC I, ICC, 11 November 2013 1077
Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Laurent Gbagbo against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 July 2013 entitled 'Third Decision on the Review of Laurent Gbagbo's Detention Pursuant to Article 60(3) of the Rome Statute, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-548-Red, AC, ICC, 29 October 2013. 1069
Second decision on Issues Related to the Victims' Application Process, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-86, PTC III, ICC, 5 April 2012 1154
Third Decision on the Review of Laurent Gbagbo's Detention Pursuant to Article 60(3) of the Rome Statute, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-454, PTC I, ICC, 11 July 2013. 1064

ICC APPLICATIONS

Application on behalf of the Government of Libya pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-130, 1 May 2012. 234
Application on behalf of the Government of Libya relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-307-Conf-Exp, 2 April 201 241
Application on behalf of the Government of Libya relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11, 2 April 2013. 255–7
Application on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Ruto, Kosgey, Sang, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-26, 31 March 2011. 234
Application on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Ruto et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-19, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2011. 317
Application relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11, 14 August 2013. 251
Joint Application of the Legal Representatives of Victims for the Implementation of the Procedure under Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC 01/04-01/06-1891-tENG, TC I, ICC, 22 May 2009. 809
Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2074, OTP, ICC, 12 August 2009 809
Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) on the Charges against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-427, OTP, ICC, 22 June 2009. 853

ICTY

Decision on Accused's Motion for a New Trial for Disclosure Violations, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, TC, ICTY, 3 September 2012 1046

Decision on Accused's Second Motion for New Trial for Disclosure Violations, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, TC, ICTY, 14 August 2014 1046
Decision on Accused's Eighty-Ninth and Ninetieth Disclosure Violation Motions, Karadžić, IT-95- 5/18-T, TC III, ICTY, 16 April 2014 1022
Decision on Accused's Ninety-First Disclosure Violation Motion, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, TC III, ICTY, 7 May 2014 ..... 1007, 1025
Decision on the Accused Vojislav Šešelj's Request for Provisional Release, Šešelj, IT-03-67-T, TC III, ICTY, 23 March 2012 1079
Decision on Appellant's Motion for the Extension of the Time-Limit and Admission of Additional Evidence, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 October 1998 492
Decision on Communication between the Parties and their Witnesses, Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16, TC, ICTY, 21 September 1998 1040
Decision on Defence Interlocutory Appeal against the Trial Chamber's Decision on EDS Disclosure Methods, Mladić, IT-09-92-AR73.2, TC I, ICTY, 28 November 2013 1007
Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, AC, ICTY, 2 October 1995 ..... 222, 766
Decision on Dragoljub Ojdanić's Motion Challenging Jurisdiction—Joint Criminal Enterprise, Milutinović et al., IT-99-37-AR72, AC, ICTY, 21 May 2003 589
Decision on Dragoljub Ojdanic's Motion Challenging Jurisdiction—Joint Criminal Enterprise, Ojdanić, IT-99-37-AR72, AC, ICTY, 21 May 2003 494
Decision on Evidence of the Good Character of the Accused and the Defence of Tu Quoque, Kupreškić, IT-95-16-T, TC II, ICTY, 17 February 1999 1021
Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility, Separate and Partially Dissenting Opinion of Judge Davit Hunt, Hadžihasan ović et al., IT-01-47-AR72, TC, ICTY, 16 July 2003 466
Decision on Joint Challenge to Jurisdiction, Hadžihasanović et al., IT-01-47-PT, TC, ICTY, 12 November 2002 622
Decision on the Motion by the accused Zejnil Delalić for the disclosure of evidence, Delalić, IT-96- 21-T, TC II quater, ICTY, 26 September 1996 1012
Decision on Motions to Extend for Filing Appellant's Briefs, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2, TC, ICTY, 11 May 2001 1040
Decision on Motion for Judgment of Acquittal, Slobodan Milošević, IT-02-54-T, TC, ICTY, 16 June 2004 586
Decision on the Motions by the Prosecution for Protective Measures for the Prosecution Witnesses Pseudonymed 'B' through to 'M', Delalić et al., IT-96-21, TC, ICTY, 28 April 1997 1057
Decision on the Motion for Provisional Release of the Accused Prlić, Prlić et al., IT-04-74-T, TC III, ICTY, 11 June 2007 1071
Decision on Motion for Provisional Release of Miroslav Kvočka, Kvočka et al., IT-98-30-PT, TC, ICTY, 2 February 2000 1079
Decision on Motion for Provisional Release Filed by the Accused Zejnil Delalić, Delalić, IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 25 September 1996 1064
Decision on Motion for Provisional Release Filed by Zoran Kupreškić, Mirjan Kupreškić, Drago Josipović, and Dragan Papić (Joined by Marinko Katava and Vladimir Šantić), Kupreškić et al., IT-95- 16-T, TC, ICTY, 15 December 1997 1073
Decision on Motion for Reconsideration, Perišić, IT-04-81-A, AC, ICTY, 20 March 2014 584
Decision on Motion by Radoslav for Provisional Release, Brđanin and Talić, IT-99-36-T TC II, ICTY, 25 July 2000 1065
Decision on Ojdanic Motion for Disclosure of Witness Statements and for Finding of Violation of Rule 66(A)(ii), Milutinović et al., IT-05-87-T, TC, ICTY, 29 September 2006 1053
Decision on Provisional Release of the Accused, Simić, IT-95-9-T, TC, ICTY, 26 March 1998 1081

Decision on Ramush Haradinaj's Motion for Provisional Release, Haradinaj et al., IT-04-84-PT, TC II, ICTY, 6 June 2005 1073
Decision on Rule 11 bis Referral', Stanković, IT-96-23/2-AR11bis, ICTY, AC, 11 September 2005 256
Decision on Rule 11 bis Referral, Stanković, Case No. IT-96-23/2-AR11bis.2, AC, ICTY, 15 November 2005 250
Judgment, Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-T, TC, ICTY, 25 June 1999 . . . . . 577, 600, 617
Judgment, Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-A, AC, ICTY, 24 March 2000 . . . . . 479, 980
Judgment, Blagojević and Jokić, IT-02-60-T, TC I (Section A), ICTY, 17 January 2005 . . . . 586, 692
Judgment, Blagojević and Jokić, IT-02-60-A, AC, ICTY, 9 May 2007 600
Judgment, Blagojević and Jokić, IT-02-60-A, AC, ICTY, 9 May 2007 . . . . . 578, 613
Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-A, AC, ICTY, 29 July, 2004 . . . . . 563, 1040, 612, 658
Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, TC, ICTY, 3 March 2000 . . . . . 563, 630, 709
Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, TC II, ICTY, 1 September 2004 563
Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-A, AC, ICTY, 3 April 2007 . . . . . 505, 541, 624
Judgment, Boškoski and Tarčulovski, IT-04-82-T, TC II, ICTY, 10 July 2008 . . . . . 563, 629
Judgment, Boškoski and Tarčulovski, IT-04-82-A, AC, ICTY, 19 May 2010 562
Judgment, Delić, IT-04-83-T, TC I, ICTY, 15 September 2008 615
Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, AC, ICTY, 20 February 2001 . . . . . 359, 613, 844, 947
Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 16 November 1998 . . . . . 222, 581, 617
Judgment, Đorđević, IT-05-87/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 23 February 2011 563
Judgment, Dragomir Milošević, IT-98-29/1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 November 2009 . . . . . 612, 658
Judgment, Erdemović, IT-96-22-T, TC, ICTY, 29 November 1996 539
Judgment, Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, TC, ICTY, 10 December 1998 . . . . . 579, 596, 624
Judgment, Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-A, AC, ICTY, 21 July 2000 . . . . . 840, 871
Judgment, Galić, IT-98-29-T, TC I, ICTY, 5 December 2003 650
Judgment, Galić, IT-98-29-A, AC, ICTY, 30 November 2006 . . . . . 219–20, 562, 624, 650, 846, Judgment, Gotovina and Markač, IT-06-90-A, AC, ICTY, 16 November 2012 . . . . . 589, 599
Judgment, Hadžihasanović and Kubura, IT-01-47-T, TC, ICTY, 15 March 2006 628
Judgment, Hadižihasanović and Kubura, IT-01-47-A, AC, ICTY, 22 April 2008 613
Judgment, Halilović, IT-01-48-T, TC I, ICTY, 16 November 2005 620
Judgment, Halilović, IT-01-48-A, AC, ICTY, 16 October 2007 612
Judgment, Haradinaj, IT-04-84, TC, ICTY, 3 April 2008 713
Judgment, Jelisić, IT-95-10-T, TC I, ICTY, 14 December 1999 672
Judgment, Jelisić, IT-95-10-A, AC, ICTY, 5 July 2001 . . . . . 844, 846
Judgment, Jelisić, IT-95-10-A, AC, ICTY, 5 July 2001 678
Judgment, Kordić, IT-95-14/2-A, AC, ICTY, 17 December 2004 846
Judgment, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, TC, ICTY, 26 February 2001 . . . . . 563, 718
Judgment, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, AC, ICTY, 17 December 2004 . . . . . 561, 625, 1040
Judgment, Krajišnik, IT-00-39-A, AC, ICTY, 17 March 2009 578
Judgment, Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, TC II, ICTY, 15 March 2002 . . . . . 504, 600, 634
Judgment, Krnojelac, IT-97-25-A, AC, ICTY, 17 September 2003 . . . . . 578, 848
Judgment, Krstić, IT-98-33-T, TC, ICTY, 2 August 2001 . . . . . 570, 677, 840, 848
Judgment, Krstić, IT-98-33-A, AC, ICTY, 19 April 2004 . . . . . 581, 678, 1025
Judgment, Kunarac et al., IT-96-23-T & IT-96-23/1-T, TC, ICTY, 22 February 2001 . . . . . 614, 707, 840
Judgment, Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 & IT-96-23/1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 June 2002 . . . . . 712, 763, 844
Judgment, Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16-T, TC, ICTY, 14 January 2000 . . . . . 552, 564, 841
Judgment, Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16-A, AC, ICTY, 23 October 2001 563
Judgment, Kvočka, Radić, Žicić, and Prcać, IT-98-30/1-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2005 663
Judgment, Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, TC, ICTY, 2 November 2001 . . . . . 505, 630
Judgment, Limaj et al., IT-03-66-T, TC II, ICTY, 30 November 2005 . . . . . 563, 629, 771
Judgment, Martić, IT-95-11-T, TC I, ICTY, 12 June 2007 715
Judgment, Martić, IT-95-11-A, AC, ICTY, 8 October 2008 565

Judgment, Milošević, IT-98-29/1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 November 2009 846
Judgment, Milutinović et al., IT-05-87-T, TC, ICTY, 26 February 2009 715
Judgment, Mrkšić et al., IT-95-13/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 27 September 2007 . . . . . 574, 629, 771
Judgment, Mucić et al., IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 16 November 1998 459
Judgment, Naletilić, IT-98-34-T, TC, ICTY, 31 March 2003 853
Judgment, Naletilić, IT-98-34-A, AC, ICTY, 3 May 2006 846
Judgment, Orić, IT-03-68-T, TC II, ICTY, 30 June 2006 . . . . . 569, 615
Judgment, Orić, IT-03-68-A, AC, ICTY, 3 July 2008 613
Judgment, Perišić, IT-IT-04-81-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2013 536
Judgment, Perišić, IT-04-81-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2013 . . . . . 606, 620
Judgment, Perišić, IT-04-81-T, TC I, 6 September 2011 650
Judgment, Popović et al., IT-05-88-T, TC II, ICTY, 10 June 2010 . . . . . 686, 846
Judgment, Prlić, IT-04-74-T, TC, ICTY, 29 May 2013 846
Judgment, Šainović et al., IT-05-87-A, AC, ICTY, 23 January 2014 505
Judgment, Stakić, ICTY-97-24-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 July 2003 526
Judgment, Stakić IT-97-24-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 July 2003 . . . . . 526, 540, 630, 688
Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-A, AC, ICTY, 22 March 2006 . . . . . 540, 683, 758, 846
Judgment, Stanišić and Simatović, IT-03-69-T, TC I, ICTY, 30 May 2013 . . . . . 535, 599
Judgment, Strugar, IT-01-42-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 January 2005 562
Judgment, Strugar, IT-01-42-A, AC, 17 July 2008 . . . . . 650, 846
Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-T, TC, ICTY, 7 May 1997 . . . . . 599, 707
Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999 . . . . . 504, 518, 541, 772–3, 840, 947, 979
Judgment, Vasiljević, IT-98-32-T, TC II, ICTY, 29 November 2002 . . . . . 600, 849
Judgment, Vasiljević, IT-98-32-A, AC, ICTY, 25 February 2004 . . . . . 599, 848
Sentencing Judgment, Erdemović, IT-96-22-T, TC, ICTY, 29 November 1996 947
Sentencing Judgment, Nikolić, IT-02-60/1-S, TC I, ICTY, 2 December 2003 384
Sentencing Judgment, Obrenović, IT-02-60/2-S, TC I, ICTY, 10 December 2003 384
Sentencing Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-Tbis-R117, TC, ICTY, 11 November 1999 946

ICTR

Decision on the Defence Motion for Release, Bagosora et al., ICTR-98-41-T, TC III, ICTR, 12 July 2002 1079
Decision on Defence Motion to Fix a Date for the Commencement of the Trial of Father Emmanuel Rukundo or, in the Alternative, to Request his Provisional Release, Rukundo, ICTR-2001-70-I, TC III, ICTR, 18 August 2003 1065
Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Regarding the Role of the Prosecutor's Electronic Disclosure Suite in Discharging Disclosure Obligations, Karemera et al., ICTR-98-44-AR73.7, AC, ICTR, 30 June 2006 1040
Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion for, inter alia, Modification of the Decision of 8 June 2001, Nyiramasuhuko et al., ICTR-97-21-T, TC II, ICTR, 25 September 2001 1053
Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion to Withdraw the Indictment, Ntuyahaga, ICTR-98-40-T, TC I, ICTR, 18 March 1999 377
Décision relative à la Requête de la Défense en extreme urgence tenant au respect, par le Procureur, de la 'Décision relative à la Requête de la Défense en Communication de preuves' rendue le 1er novembre 2000', Nyiramasuhuko et al., ICTR-97-21-T, TC II, ICTR, 8 June 2001 1053
Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, TC I, ICTR, 2 September 1998 . . . . . 492, 671, 713, 847
Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-A, AC, ICTR, 1 June 2001 571
Judgment, Bagilishema, ICTR-95-01A-T, TC I, ICTR, 7 June 2001 . . . . . 571, 617, 707
Judgment, Bagilishema, ICTR-95-1A-A, AC, ICTR, 3 July 2002 617
Judgment, Bagosora and Nsengiyumva, ICTR-98-41-A, AC, ICTR, 14 December 2011 562
Judgment, Elizaphan and Gerard Ntakirutimana, ICTR-96-10-A and ICTR-96-17-A, AC, ICTR, 13 December 2004 585

Judgment, Gacumbitsi, ICTR-97-20-A, AC, ICTR, 7 July 2006 562
Judgment, Kambanda, ICTR 97-23-A, AC, ICTR, 19 October 2000 625
Judgment, Kamuhanda, ICTR-95-54A-T, TC II, ICTR, 22 January 2004 ..... 570, 853
Judgment, Kamuhanda, ICTR-99-54A-A, AC, ICTR, 19 September 2005 850
Judgment, Kanyarukiga, ICTR-02-78-A, AC, ICTR, 8 May 2012 575
Judgment, Kajelijeli, ICTR-98-44A-T, TC II, ICTR, 1 December 2003 570
Judgment, Kajelijeli, ICTR-98-44A-A, AC, ICTR, 23 May 2005 624
Judgment, Kayishema and Ruzidana, ICTR-95-1-T, TC II, ICTR, 21 May 1999 ..... 492, 571, 624, 684, 707
Judgment, Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-A, AC, ICTR, 1 June 2001 580
Judgment, Mpambara, ICTR-01-65-T, TC I, ICTR, 11 September 2006 600
Judgment, Muvunyi, ICTR-00-55A-T, TC III, ICTR, 11 February 2010 620
Judgment, Musema, ICTR-96-13-T, TC, ICTR, 27 January 2000 492
Judgment, Musema, ICTR-96-13-A, AC, ICTR, 16 November 2001 846
Judgment, Muvunyi, ICTR-00-55A-T, TC III, ICTR, 12 September 2006 562
Judgment, Nahimana, ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2007 846
Judgment, Nahimana, ICTR-99-52-T, TC, ICTR, 3 December 2003 ..... 616, 850
Judgment, Nahimana et al., ICTR-99-52-T, TC I, ICTR, 3 December 2003 571
Judgment, Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2007 ..... 612, 658
Judgment, Nchamihigo, ICTR-2001-63-A, AC, ICTR, 18 March 2010 573
Judgment, Ndindabahizi, ICTR-2001-71-I, TC I, ICTR, 15 July 2004 571
Judgment, Ndindiliyimana et al., ICTR-00-56-A, AC, ICTR, 11 February 2014 562
Judgment, Ntagerura et al., ICTR-99-46-A, AC, ICTR, 7 July 2006 562
Judgment, Ntakirutimana and Ntakirutimana, ICTR-96-10-A and ICTR-96-17-A, AC, ICTR, 13 December 2004 ..... 658, 846
Judgment, Renzaho, ICTR-97-31-A, AC, ICTR, 1 April 2011 562
Judgment, Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-T, TC, ICTR, 6 December 1999 ..... 492, 580
Judgment, Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-A, AC, ICTR, 26 May 2003 870
Judgment, Seman za, ICTR-97-20-A, AC, ICTR, 20 May 2005 562
Judgment, Seromba, ICTR-2001-66-A, AC, ICTR, 12 March 2008 ..... 511, 573
Judgment, Seromba, ICTR-2001-66-I, TC, ICTR, 13 December 2006 600
Judgment, Setako, ICTR-04-81-A, AC, ICTR, 28 September 2011 562
Judgment, Simba, ICTR-01-76-A, AC, ICTR, 27 November 2007 599
Judgment, Zigiranyirazo, ICTR-01-73-T, TC III, ICTR, 18 December 2008 600
Judgment and Sentence, Bisengimana, ICTR 00-60-T, TC II, ICTR, 13 April 2006 600
Judgment and Sentence, Elizaphan and Gerard Ntakirutimana, ICTR-96-10-T & ICTR-96-17-T, TC I, ICTR, 21 February 2003 580
Judgment and Sentence, Kambanda, ICTR-97-23-S, TC, ICTR, 4 September 1998 704
Judgment and Sentence, Muhimana, ICTR-95-1B-T, TC III, ICTR, 28 April 2005 571
Judgment and Sentence, Musema, ICTR-96-13-A, TC, ICTR, 27 January 2000 ..... 580, 850
Judgment and Sentence, Nahimana, ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2008 714
Judgment and Sentence, Ndindabahizi, ICTR-07-71, TC I, ICTR, 15 July 2004 685
Judgment and Sentence, Ndindabahizi, ICTR-2001-71-I, TC, ICTR, 15 July 2004 846
Judgment and Sentence, Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-T, TC I, ICTR, 6 December 1999 718
Judgment and Sentence, Semanza, TC, ICTR, ICTR-97-20-T, 15 May 2003 ..... 758, 848

SCSL

Decision on the Motion by Morris Kallon for Bail, Sesay et al., SCSL-04- 15-PT, TC,
SCSL, 23 February 2004 1065
Judgment, Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, TC II, SCSL, 20 June 2007 ..... 562, 632
Judgment, Fofana, SCSL-04-14-T, TC I, SCSL, 2 August 2007 718
Judgment, Fofana and Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-T, TC I, SCSL, 2 August 2007 ..... 562, 846

Judgment, Fofana and Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-A, AC, SCSL, 28 May 2008 . . . . . 718, 846
Judgment, Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, TC I, SCSL, 2 March 2009 . . . . . 600, 622
Judgment, Sesay et al., SCSL-04-15-A, AC, SCSL, 26 October 2009 . . . . . 562, 846
Judgment, Taylor, SCSL-03-01-A, AC, SCSL, 26 September 2013 . . . . . 288, 564, 606

STL

Decision on the Applicable Law: Terrorism, Conspiracy, Homicide, Perpetration, Cumulative Charging, Ayyash et al., STL-11-01/1, AC, STL, 16 February 2011 221

ECCC

Decision on Appeal against Closing Order Indicting Kaing Guek Eav alias 'Duch', Kaing, 011/18-07- 2007-ECCC/OCIJ (PTC 02), PTC, ECCC, 5 December 2008 854
Kaing Guek Eav (Duch), (Appeal Judgment), 001/18-07-2007-ECCC/SC, ECCC, SCC, 3 February 2012 . . . . . 531, 840

INTER-AMERICAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Almonacid v Chile (Judgment), Inter-American Court of Human Rights Series C No. 15 (26 September 2006) 311
Barrios Altos v Peru (Judgment), Inter-American Court of Human Rights Series C No. 15 (14 March 2001) 311
Blake v. Guatemala (IACtHR, 24 January 1998) 438
The Massacres of El Mozote and Nearby Places v El Salvador (Judgment), Inter-American Court of Human Rights Series C No. 252 (25 October 2012) 325
Velazquez Rodriguez v Honduras (Judgment), Inter-American Court of Human Rights Series C No. 4 (29 July 1988) 311

ECtHR

Assanidze v Georgia App. no. 71503/01 (ECtHR, 8 April 2004) 1063
Becciev v Moldova App. no. 9190/03 (ECtHR, 4 October 2005) 1076
Clooth v Belgium App. no. 12718/87 (ECtHR, 12 December 1991) 10067
C R v United Kingdom (Judgment) 22 November 1995 493
Cyprus v. Turkey (App. no. 25781/94), Judgment of 10 May 2001, ECtHR 191
Eckle v. Germany App. no. 8130/79 (ECtHR, 15 July 1982) 442
Foti and Others v. Italy App. nos 7604/76, 7719/76, 7781/77, and 7913/77 (ECtHR, 10 December 1982) 442
Ilijkov v Bulgaria App. no. 33977/96 (ECtHR, 26 July 2001) 1064
Kokkinakis v Greece (Judgment) 17 EHRR 397 493
Kravtas v. Lithuania App. no. 12717/06 (ECtHR, 18 January 2011) 442
Labita v Italy App. no. 26772/95 (ECtHR, 6 April 2000) 1079
Loizidou v. Turkey (Merits) (Application No. 15318/89), Judgement of 18 December 1996, ECtHR 190–1
Loizidou v. Turkey (Preliminary Objections) (Application No. 15318/89), Judgement of 23 March 1995, ECtHR 190
Longa v the Netherlands App. no. 33917/12 (ECtHR, 9 October 2012) 1092
McKay v UK App. no. 543/03 (ECtHR, 3 October 2006) 1063
MC Kerr v. United Kingdom App. no. 28883/95 (ECtHR, 4 May 2001) 442
Mooren v Germany App. no. 11364/03 (ECtHR, 9 July 2009) 1079

Nachova v Bulgaria, App. nos 43577/98 and 43579/98, European Court of Human Rights (Grand Chamber) 6 July 2005 888
Nevmerzhitsky v Ukraine App. no. 54825/00 (ECtHR, 5 April 2005) 1076
Ogur v. Turkey App. no. 21594/93, (ECtHR Grand Chamber, 20 May 1999) 442
Othman v the United Kingdom App. no. 8139/09 (ECtHR, 17 January 2012) 1095
Perez v. France App. no. 47287/99 (ECtHR Grand Chamber, 12 February 2004) 438
Panchenko v Russia App. no. 45100/98 (ECtHR, 8 February 2005) 1073
Shikuta v Russia App. no. 45373/05 (ECtHR, 11 April 2013) 1067
Stran Greek Refineries and Stratis v. Greece App. no. 13427/87 (ECtHR, 9 December 1994) 418
Tiron v Romania App. no. 17689/03 (ECtHR, 7 April 2009) 1070
Tomasi v France App. no. 12850/87 (ECtHR, 27 August 1992) 1067
Werner v Austria, ECHR (24 November 1997) 1057
Zielinski et al. v. France App. nos 24846/94 and 34165/96 to 34173/96 (ECtHR, 28 October 1999) 418

ICJ

Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DR Congo v. Uganda) [2005] ICJ Rep 168 . . . 786
Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro) [1996] ICJ Reports 595, Judgment of 11 July 1996 (Preliminary Objections) 202
Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia and Montenegro) 26 February 2007, ICJ Reports 2007 . . . . . 683, 774, 888
Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (New Application: 2002) (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda), Jurisdiction and Admissibility, Judgment, ICJ Reports 2006 203
Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium) [2002] ICJ Reports 3, Judgment of 14 February 2002 . . . . . 203, 280, 794
Case Concerning Right of Passage overIndian Territory (Portugal v. India) [1957] ICJ Reports 125, Judgment of 26 November 1957 (Preliminary Objection) 205
Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v United States of America) (Merits) [1986] ICJ Rep 4 773
Fisheries Jurisdiction (United Kingdom v. Iceland) Judgment of 2 February 1973 (Jurisdiction of the Court), [1973] ICJ Reports 3. 188
Judgment, Corfu Channel (United Kingdom v Albania), ICJ Reports 1949 888
Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy), Judgment of 3 February 2012, [2012] ICJ Reports 99 280
Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria: Equatorial Guinea intervening) [1998] ICJ Reports 275 196
Military and Paramilitary Activities In and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) [1984] ICJ Reports 392 206
North Sea Continental Shelf Cases (Federal Republic of Germany/Denmark; Federal Republic of Germany/Netherlands) [1969] ICJ Rep 9. 266
Nottebohm Case (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala), Judgment of 6 April 1955 [1995] ICJ Reports 4 . . . . . 153–4, 188, 205
Question of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahirya v United Kingdom) [1998] ICJ Rep 9. 799
Request for Interpretation of the Judgment of 15 June 1962 in the Case Concerning the Temple of Preah Vihear (Cambodia v. Thailand), ICJ, Judgment of 11 November 2013 . . . 196

Whaling in the Antarctic (Australia v. Japan: New Zealand Intervening), Judgment of 31 March 2014 (Merits), ICJ 189

PCIJ

Case of the SS Lotus (France v Turkey) (Merits) [1927] PCIJ Rep Series A No. 10. 792
France v Turkey (Lotus case), PCIJ, Series A. No. 10 (1927) 156

ARBITRATION

Island of Palmas Case (Netherlands v U.S.), Permanent Court of Arbitration (1928), 2 UN Rep. International Arbitral Awards 163

OTHER

General Tribunal of the Military Government of the French Zone of Occupation in Germany, Judgment Rendered on 30 June 1948 in the Case versus Hermann Roechling and Others Charged with Crimes against Peace, War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 (Vol. XIV, Washington: United States Government Printing Office). 645
Gustav Alfred Jepsen and Others, UK, Proceedings of a War Crimes Trial held at Lueneburg, Germany (13–24 August 1946), Judgment of 24 August 1946. 518
Judgment of 19 February 1948, United States of America v Wilhelm List et al., in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 (Vol. XI/2, Washington: United States Government Printing Office) 1271. . . . 613
Judgment of 27 October 1948, United States of America vs Wilhelm von Leeb et al., in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 (Vol. XI/1, Washington: United States Government Printing Office) 543–4, 618
Judgment of 25 January 1949 in the Case Versus Hermann Roechling and Others Charged with Crimes against Peace, War Crimes, and Crimes against Humanity. Decision on Writ of Appeal against the Judgment of 30 June 1948, in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 (Vol. XIV, Washington: United States Government Printing Office) 645
Judgment, United States of America v Karl Brandt et al. ('The Medical Case'), in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 (Vol. II, Washington: United States Government Printing Office),. 208–10, 610
Trial of Erich Heyer and Six Others [Essen Lynching], British Military Court for the Trial of War Criminals, Essen, 18–19 and 21–22 December (1945) UNWCC, vol. I 518
Trial of Dr. Joseph Buhler, Supreme National Tribunal of Poland, United Nations War Crimes Commission, Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, Vol. XIV, 23 (1949) 577
United States of America v. Altstoetter et al., Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, Nuremberg, Washington (1949–53) ('TWC'), Vol. III, 954–1201 577

NATIONAL CASES

Australia

Brown v The King (1913) 17 CLR 570. 867
Dawson v The Queen (1961) 106 CLR 1 867

Green v The Queen (1971) 126 CLR 28 ..... 868, 887
SRYYY v. Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [2006] AATA 320 (5 April 2006) (Administrative Appeals Tribunal of Australia) 723

Canada

R v Lichtfus [1997] 3 SCR 320 870

Germany

Bundesgerichtshof, Judgment of 26 July 1994 521
Bundesgerichtshof, Judgment of 15 September 1988, 35 Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsac hen 347 539

Ireland

B.v. Refugee Appeals Tribunal & Anor [2011] IEHC 198 (05 May 2011) (Ireland)..... 723

Israel

Judgment of 12 December 1961, Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v Eichmann (1968) 36 International Law Reports 18 701

Italy

Aratano and Others, No. 102, Judgment (Ct of Cassation, February 21, 1949) 518

New Zealand

Attorney General v Tamil X [2010] NZSC 107; [2011] 1 NZLR 721 (27 August 2010)..... 723
R v Wanhalla [2006] NZCA 229; [2007] 2 NZLR 573 869–70

Peru

Barrios Altos, La Cantuta and Army Intelligence Service Basement Cases, Case No. AV 19-2001, Sala Penal Especial de la Corte Suprema, 7 April 2009 (Peru) 718

South Africa

Southern African Litigation Centre and another v National Director of Public Prosecutions and others 2012 (10) BCLR 1089 (GNP) 75

Uganda

Kwoyelo alias Latoni v Uganda Constitutional Petition. No. 036 of 2011, [2011] UGCC 10 78

United Kingdom

Bater v Bater [1951] P 35 887
DPP v Ottewell (1970) AC 642..... 491
Knuller v DPP [1973] AC 435..... 493
Miller v Minister on Pensions (1947) 1 All ER 373 870
R (Al-Sweady) v The Secretary of State for Defence [2009] EWHC 2387 (Admin) 320
R (oao) Moussa and The Secretary of State and another [2011] EWCA Civ 1344..... 322
R v Alan Edwards Stephens [2002] EWCA Crim 1529 868
R v Jones [2006] UKHL 16 266
R v Majid [2009] EWCA Crim 2563..... 868
R v Payne, Mendonca and Others [2006] 321
R v Sawoniuk, Court of Appeal (Criminal Division), 10 February 2000..... 155

USA

Blockburger v United States (1932) 284 US 299 847
Bowoto v. Chevron Corporation, 2007 US Dist. LEXIS 59374 (US District Court, Northern California) 729

Cage v Louisiana (1990) 498 US 39 869
Doe v. Alvaro Rafael Saravia, 348 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (E.D. Cal. 2004) 719
Doe I.v Nestl. USA Inc (9th Cir) Order, 19 December 2013 587
Doe VIII v Exxon Mobil Corporation, 654 F.3d 11 (DC Circuit 2011 585
Hartford Fire Insurance v California, 509 US 764,113 Sup.Ct.2891 (1993) 167
F. Hoffman-LaRoche Ltd v Empagran S.A.124 S.Ct.2359 (2004) 167
Holland v. United States, 348 U.S. 121 (1954) 867
Jackson v Virginia (1979) 443 US 307 869
Johnson v Louisiana (1972) 406 US 356 869
Laker Airwarys v Sabena, 731 F.2d 909 (1984) 167
Pinkerton v. United States, 328 US 640, 648 (1946) 518
Presbyterian Church of Sudan v Talisman Energy Inc, 582 F.3d 244 (2nd Circuit 2009) 259 . . . 585
Sandoval v California (1994) 511 US 1101 869
Sexual Minorities Uganda v Scott Lively, 2013 US Dist. LEXIS 114754 719
Timberlane Lumber Co. v Bank of Maerica, 549 F.2d 597 (1976) 167
United States of America v. Goebell et al. [Borkum Island Case], Case No. 12–489 (1946) 518
United States v. Bailey, 444 US 394, 404 (US 1980) 653
United States v Dzhokhar Tsarnaev, Order (D. Ma., 27 November 2013) 1011
United States v Glass (7th Circuit 1988) 846 F.2d 386 867
United States v Olsen, Ordering denying petition for rehearing, No. 10-36063 (9th Circuit, 10 December 2013) 1019
United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 US 422, 445 (US 1978) 653
United States v Zhen Zhou Wu, 680 F.Supp.2d 287 1011
Upjohn Co. v United States, 449 US 383, 393 (1981) 1017
US v Soemu Toyoda, 6 September 1949 (vol. 39, Official Transcript of Record of Trial) 5005 . . . 641
Victor v Nebraska (1994) 511 US 1 868
Winship, Re (1970) 397 US 358, 364, 90 S. Ct. 1068, 1073, 25 L. Ed. 2d 368 869

Table of Legislation

TABLE OF INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (adopted 27 June 1981, entered into force 21 October 1986) OAU Doc CAB/LEG/67/3 Rev. 5 81
Art 7 (2) 490
Art 58 81
African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child 464
African Court Protocol
Art 5 (1)(a) 81
Agreement between the United Nations and the Lebanese Republic on the Establishment of a Special Tribunal for Lebanon ('Lebanon Tribunal') 412
Art 17 429
Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of a SCSL (signed 16 January 2002, entered into force 12 April 2002) 2178 UNTS 137 ('SCSL Statute') 287–8, 412
Art 3 (2) 611
Art 3 (d) 219
Art 6 (1) 567, 575, 578
Art 6 (3) 611
Art 14 1289
Art 19 934
Art 20 (3) 428, 480
Art 23 1266
Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis, and Establishing the Charter of the International Military Tribunal (IMT) (adopted and entered into force 8 August 1945) 82 UNTS 279
Art 1 368–9
Art 5 369
Art 10 593
American Convention on Human Rights (adopted 22 November 1969, entered into force 18 July 1978) 1144 UNTS . . . 123
Art 8 (2)(h) 963
Art 9 490
Charter of the International Military Tribunal, Annex to the Agreement by the Government of the United States of America, the Provisional Government of the French Republic, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals of the European Axis (signed 8 August 1945, entered into force 8 August 1945) ("Nuremberg Charter") 82 UNTS 279 . . . . . 412, 801
Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East in its original version of 19 January 1946 or its amended version of 26 April 1946 412
Charter of the United Nations (signed 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 1 UNTS XVI ('UN Charter') 270, 300
ChVII 3, 31–2, 43–4, 142, 157, 162–3, 169, 261, 284–5, 287–9, 294, 296, 669
Art 12 (7) 754
Art 13 (1)(a) 448
Art 17 (1) 40
Art 25 . . . . . 162, 297, 299, 799
Art 27 (2) 60
Art 103 . . . . . 162, 268–9, 297, 299
Convention Against the Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs (adopted 20 December 1988, entered into force 11 November 1990) 1582 UNTS 95
Art 4 (2)(b) 164
Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (adopted 10 December 1984, entered into force 26 June 1987) 1465 UNTS 85
Art 5 (2) 164
Convention on the High Seas (adopted 29 April 1958, entered into force 30 September 1962) 450 UNTS 11
Arts 14-22 164

Convention on Non-statutory Limitations for War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity (adopted 26 November 1968, entered into force on 11 November 1970) 754 UNTS 73 611
Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents (adopted 14 December 1973, entered into force 20 February 1977) 1035 UNTS 167
Art 3 164
Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (adopted 9 December 1948, entered into force 12 January 1951) 78 UNTS 277 . . . . . 164, 284, 300, 451
Art II 672
Art VI 296–7
Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Maritime Navigation (signed 10 March 1988, entered into force 1 March 1992) 1678 UNTS 221
Art 3 164
Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft (signed 16 December 1970, entered into force 14 October 1971) 860 UNTS 105
Art 4 164
Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (signed 18 July 1951, entered into force 22 April 1954) 189 UNTS 137 . . . . . 452, 1053
Art 1 (f) 1087, 1094–5, 1103
European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (concluded 11 April 1950, entered into force 3 September 1953) 213 UNTS 221
Art 2 1097
Art 3 . . . . . 1087–9, 1097, 1099
Art 5 . . . . . 1090, 1097
Art 6 . . . . . 418, 442, 1095, 1097, 1099, 1103–4
Art 7 490
Art 13 1090
Art 35 (2)(b) 241
Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 31 ('Geneva Convention I') 278, 451, 616
Art 2 765
Art 3 765
Art 13 616
Art 47 742
Art 49 . . . . . 155, 164, 560
Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 85 ('Geneva Convention II') 278, 451
Art 2 765
Art 3 765
Art 48 742
Art 50 . . . . . 155, 164, 560
Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 137 ('Geneva Convention III') 278, 451
Art 2 765
Art 3 765
Art 127 742
Art 129 . . . . . 155, 164, 560
Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 287 ('Geneva Convention IV')
Art 2 765
Art 3 . . . . . 765, 152, 278, 451
Art 4 152
Art 27 802
Art 33 220
Art 49 746
Art 144 742
Art 146 . . . . . 156, 164, 560
Hague Convention (II) (1899)
Art 23 745
Hague Convention (IV) respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land (adopted 18 October 1907, entered into force 26 January 1910) 610–1
Art 3 609
Regulations Annexe, Art 23 (b) 149
Headquarters Agreement between the ICC and the Netherlands
Art 44 1091
International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages (adopted 17 December 1979, entered into force 3 June 1983) 1316 UNTS 205
Art 5 164

International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism (9 December 1999, entered into force 10 April 2002) 2178 UNTS 197
Art 7 164
International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, UN Doc A/ RES/52/164 (1997), (adopted 15 December 1997, entered into force 23 May 2001) 2149 UNTS 256
Art 2 (3)(c) 592
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (adopted by UNGA Res 2200A (XXI) (16 December 1966), entered into force 23 March 1976) 999 UNTS 171
Art 14 (5) 963
Art 15 490
Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation (concluded 23 September 1971, entered into force 26 January 1973) 974 UNTS 178
Art 5 164
Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (signed 16 December 1966, entered into force 23 March 1976) 999 UNTS 171 311–2
Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Fixed Platforms Located on the Continental Shelf (concluded 10 March 1988, entered into force 1 March 1992) 1678 UNTS 304
Art 2 164
Protocol No.1 to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms
Art 1 190
Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I) (adopted 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 3 . . . . . 464, 611
Art 1 (4) 765
Art 10 (2) 737, 743
Art 12 (4) 738
Art 48 649
Art 51 . . . . . 649, 748
Art 51 (2) 220, 649
Art 51 (3) 743
Art 51 (5)(b) 649, 736
Art 55 (5) 738
Art 56 (3) 738
Art 57 . . . . . 649, 738, 748
Art 57 (2)(a) 738
Art 57 (2)(b) 736
Art 57 (2)(c) 738
Art 58 738
Art 76 (1) 802
Art 77 (3) 738
Art 78 738
Art 83 (1) 738
Art 85 802
Art 86 . . . . . 609, 611, 632, 646, 738
Art 86 (2) 644–6
Art 87 . . . . . 609, 611, 623–4, 632
Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II) (adopted 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 609 . . . . . 455, 464
Art 1 (1) 765
Art 1 (2) 770
Art 4 (2)(e) 802
Art 13 (2) 220, 649
Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty 952
Protocol No. 6 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 952
Protocol No. 7 to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (adopted 22 November 1984, entered into force 1 November 1988) ETS No. 117
Art 2 963
Protocol No. 13 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 952
Relationship Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the United Nations (entered into force 4 October 2004) ('UN–ICC Relationship Agreement') 31, 116, 135
Art 13 40
Art 13 (1) 40

Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force on 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute') 3–4, 33, 74, 80–1, 133–4, 138, 259–60, 274, 328, 384
Art 1 . . . . . 189, 1245, 1260
Art 2 . . . . . 116, 143, 462
Art 2 (2) 492
Arts 5-8 bis 147, 180
Arts 5-12 146
Art 5 . . . . . 779, 1074
Art 5 (1) 762, 779
Art 5 (2) 147
Art 5 (3) 147
Art 5 (5) 779
Art 6 . . . . . 420–1, 445, 452, 454–5, 462, 496–7, 673, 741, 988, 1205
Arts 6-8 bis 180, 494
Art 7 . . . . . 420–1, 445, 452, 454, 462, 482, 672, 706, 709, 712–4, 720–1, 741, 812, 988, 1205
Art 7 (1) 713–4, 721, 723, 730
Art 7 (1)(g) 803, 805, 812
Art 7 (1)(h) 803
Art 7 (1)(k) 496
Art 7 (2)(a) 708, 711, 714–5, 718–9, 721–5, 729–30, 797, 968
Art 7 (3) 764, 805
Art 8 . . . . . 420–1, 445, 452, 454, 462, 482, 732–6, 738–9, 741–2, 749, 760, 812, 955, 988, 1205
Art 8 (1) 359, 797
Art 8 (2) 763, 785, 797, 955
Art 8 (2)(a) 741–2, 762
Art 8 (2)(b) 147, 149–50, 220, 360, 666–7, 732, 735, 737–8, 740, 742–8, 760, 762, 790, 803, 901, 989
Art 8 (2)(c) 740, 742, 762, 803, 989
Art 8 (2)(d) 770
Art 8 (2)(e) 147, 220, 464, 666–7, 732, 735, 743–5, 761–2, 812, 901, 989
Art 8 (2)(f) 768, 770
Art 8 bis 147, 780–2, 784, 796, 800
Art 8 bis(2) 782
Art 9 . . . . . 420, 496, 784
Art 9 (1) 116, 421
Art 9 (2) 106
Art 9 (3) 421, 785
Art 10 452–3
Art 11 . . . . . 144, 168, 170–3, 201
Art 11 (1) 201
Art 11 (2) 169
Art 12 . . . . . 3, 6, 69, 142, 145, 151, 157, 163, 166, 171, 184, 188–91, 197–8, 264, 753, 792
Art 12 (1) 168, 170, 180
Art 12 (2) 38, 168, 181, 283, 1278
Art 12 (2)(a) 6, 151, 156, 163
Art 12 (3) 145–6, 151, 163, 167–71, 174–5, 179–84, 199–202, 206–8, 233, 261, 265, 276–7, 309, 374
Art 12 (5) 146
Arts 13-21 146
Art 13 . . . . . 3, 86, 169, 175, 186, 206, 219, 366–7, 788
Art 13 (a) 284
Art 13 (b) 6, 30, 35, 42, 63, 69, 145, 157, 163, 171, 261, 297, 669, 752, 787, 1278
Art 13 (c) 69, 283
Art 14 . . . . . 175, 206, 209–10, 367
Arts 14 (1)-(2) 158, 163
Art 15 . . . . . 69, 147–8, 150, 170, 173–5, 177, 185, 187, 195, 201, 206, 240, 264, 365, 367, 449, 712, 1212, 1260
Art 15 (1) 1260
Art 15 (2) 186, 262, 1279
Art 15 (3) 185–6, 188, 190, 194, 371, 374, 429, 896, 1146
Art 15 (4) 896
Art 15 (6) 150, 186, 188, 190, 193–5, 200
Art 15 bis 266, 780, 787–90
Art 15 bis(3) 267
Art 15 bis(4) 145, 791
Art 15 bis(5) 146
Art 15 bis(6) 792
Art 15 bis(7) 792
Art 15 bis(8) 792
Art 15 ter 146, 780, 787–9
Art 16 . . . . . 30, 53–60, 63, 67, 118, 124, 126, 158, 160–1, 442–3, 669, 793, 799
Art 17 . . . . . 102, 214–5, 228, 230, 232, 248, 256–7, 323, 378, 794, 1211–3, 1215, 1245–6, 1260, 1281
Art 17 (1) . . . 66, 235, 239, 244, 246, 257, 1213
Art 17 (1)(a) 242, 1281
Art 17 (1)(b) 232–3
Art 17 (1)(d) 359, 602
Art 17 (2) 227, 235, 239, 244, 251–2, 325, 1213
Art 17 (2)(a) 324, 326
Art 17 (2)(c) 243–4, 324, 326
Art 17 (3) 235, 239, 251–2
Art 18 . . . . . 239, 251, 967
Art 18 (2) 157, 262
Art 18 (5) 239, 250–1

Art 18 (6) 254
Art 18 (7) 240, 245
Art 19 . . . . . 141, 147, 227–8, 231–4, 240–1, 245–6, 255–6, 317, 967
Art 19 (1) 189, 247, 255–6
Art 19 (2) 231, 255
Art 19 (2)(a) 231, 248
Art 19 (2)(b) 157, 231, 234–5, 967
Art 19 (2)(c) 234, 967
Art 19 (3) 429, 1146
Art 19 (4) 245–7
Art 19 (5) 245–6
Art 19 (7) 254
Art 19 (10) 247–8, 251, 255–6
Art 19 (11) 250–1, 255
Art 20 144
Art 21 . . . . . 171, 189–90, 290–1, 411, 413–4, 420, 427, 430, 433, 436–7, 443, 447–8, 454, 460, 466–7, 470, 473, 476, 478, 484, 507, 516, 658, 721–2, 764, 852, 943, 945
Art 21 (1) 188, 413, 424–5, 433, 437, 470–1, 473, 476, 480, 482, 484–5, 489, 497–8
Art 21 (1)(a) 189, 414, 417, 419–22, 461, 466, 468, 482, 507, 765–6, 1157
Art 21 (1)(b) 190, 425–30, 433, 461, 464, 468, 474, 478–9, 481–3, 559, 712, 740, 764–5
Art 21 (1)(c) 425–7, 431–3, 461, 468, 472, 478, 482–3, 948
Art 21 (2) 417, 422–5, 479–80, 484, 980
Art 21 (3) 243, 359–60, 413, 424–5, 433–9, 441–3, 461, 464–5, 474, 476, 484–9, 494, 498, 765, 1066, 1075, 1081, 1087, 1091
Art 22 . . . . . 144, 157, 168, 172–3, 447–8, 460, 476, 486, 490, 674, 782
Art 22 (1) 491
Art 22 (2) 465, 467–8, 471–2, 473, 484, 486, 490–1, 494–8, 509, 549, 675, 740
Art 23 (1) 121–2, 58
Art 24 . . . . . 144, 168
Arts 25-28 904
Art 25 . . . . . 32, 467, 482, 500–1, 511–2, 515, 517, 522, 524, 526, 528, 532, 535, 560, 573, 601, 634, 724, 903, 917
Art 25 (1) 151
Art 25 (3) 431, 471, 479, 500, 507–8, 510, 512, 515–6, 524, 528, 532, 542, 548–9, 552, 555, 557, 575, 599, 602, 607, 782, 1001
Art 25 (3)(a) 448, 467–73, 479, 494, 497, 507–9, 511–4, 522, 524, 528, 540, 543–4, 550–1, 554, 557, 559–61, 568–70, 575, 579, 615, 629, 757, 992
Art 25 (3)(b) 514, 559–60, 564–5, 567–9, 571–3, 575–6, 588–90
Art 25 (3)(b)-(d) 512–3, 528, 558
Art 25 (3)(c) 559, 578–9, 582, 584–6, 587–91, 631
Art 25 (3)(d) . . . 166, 514, 522, 524, 546, 558, 561, 570, 579, 589, 592, 594, 596, 600, 606, 631, 811, 992, 997, 1003, 1005
Art 25 (3)(e) 571–2
Art 25 (3)(f) 575, 634
Art 25 (4) 781
Art 26 151
Art 27 . . . 38, 48, 123–6, 164, 263, 268 281–2, 285–6, 288, 290–5, 796
Art 27 (1) 122, 286
Art 27 (2) 286, 289–92
Art 28 . . . . . 496, 540, 608–9, 613–5, 619, 622–3, 630, 637–40, 643, 647–8, 749, 757–9, 761, 837, 903, 917, 998
Art 28 (a) 618, 631, 634, 640, 917
Art 28 (b) 618, 621, 631, 640, 648
Art 30 . . . . . 495, 533–4, 536, 566, 573, 606, 650, 652, 655, 659, 661–8, 741, 784–5, 787, 837
Art 30 (1) . . . 564, 572, 576, 591, 639, 651, 653
Art 30 (2) 166, 565–6, 587, 640, 643, 651, 653–4, 668
Art 30 (3) 567, 574, 577, 587, 654, 664–5
Art 31 . . . . . 785, 799
Art 32 . . . . . 785, 787
Art 33 . . . . . 476, 560, 634, 785
Art 34 . . . . . 87, 1108
Art 34 (b) 964
Art 36 404
Art 36 (2)(b) 106
Arts 36 (3)-(8) 964
Art 36 (4)(c) 127
Art 36 (5) 127–8
Art 36 (6) 106
Art 36 (8)(a) 127
Art 36 (9)(a) 423
Art 37 1113
Art 37 (2) 964
Art 39 416–7
Art 39 (1) 96
Art 39 (2) 977
Art 39 (2)(a) 964
Art 39 (2)(b) 416–7
Art 39 (3)(b) 965

Art 39 (4) 965
Art 42 . . . . . 129, 385, 398
Art 42 (1) 358, 994
Art 42 (2) 386
Art 42 (3) 375
Art 42 (4) 106, 130, 386
Art 42 (8) 977
Art 42 (9) 804, 838
Art 43 1112–3
Art 43 (6) 1107, 1110–1, 1113–6, 1131
Art 44 1113
Art 44 (3) 116
Art 46 . . . . . 363, 394–5, 399
Art 47 394–5
Art 48 116
Art 49 1113
Art 51 1292
Art 51 (1) 116
Art 51 (2) . . . 106, 417, 1157, 1285, 1288, 1291
Art 51 (2)(b) 416
Art 51 (3) 1157
Art 51 (4) 417–8, 1157
Art 51 (5) 121, 125, 416, 419, 461, 1157
Art 52 461
Art 52 (1) 982–4
Art 53 . . . . . 194, 228, 240, 314, 362, 370, 438, 669, 814, 1212, 1215, 1242, 1259
Art 53 (1) 185–6, 188, 193, 318, 357–8, 371, 750, 893, 907, 1212
Art 53 (1)(a) 141, 150, 175, 186–7
Arts 53 (1)(a)-(c) 148, 193
Art 53 (1)(b) 195, 359, 602
Art 53 (1)(c) 353, 362, 602
Art 53 (2) 358, 362–3, 893, 896, 907
Art 53 (2)(b) 359
Art 53 (2)(c) 362–3
Art 53 (3) 148, 193, 357
Art 53 (3)(a) 151
Art 53 (3)(b) 195, 353
Art 53 (4) 150, 251
Art 54 . . . . . 256, 751, 814, 971
Art 54 (1) 343, 817, 986, 1282
Art 54 (1)(a) 346, 751, 816–7, 1005, 1009, 1014
Art 54 (1)(b) 804, 986
Art 54 (3)(c) 1279
Art 54 (3)(e) 821, 893–4, 1016–7
Art 54 (3)(f) 1109, 1115–7
Art 55 (2) 34
Art 56 (3) 970
Art 56 (3)(a) 971
Art 56 (3)(b) 971
Art 57 (2) 416
Art 57 (3)(c) 1108
Art 57 (3)(d) 966
Art 58 . . . . . 175, 441, 669
Art 58 (1) 342
Art 58 (1)(a) 141, 150, 751, 753, 896, 1068–70, 1082
Art 58 (1)(b) 1065, 1068, 1070, 1072, 1074, 1076–7
Art 60 1082
Art 60 (1) 893
Art 60 (2) 1063–5, 1067–8, 1070, 1074, 1080–2
Art 60 (3) 1065
Art 60 (4) 1064, 1078, 1080–2
Art 60 (6)(f) 1080
Art 61 . . . . . 751, 910, 921, 984–7, 1069
Art 61 (1) 342, 345
Art 61 (1)(c) 899
Art 61 (3) 1010, 1032
Art 61 (4) 900, 902
Art 61 (5) 342, 896, 914, 1036, 1049
Art 61 (7) 150, 248, 420, 897, 914, 985, 988–91, 1069, 1283
Art 61 (7)(a) 189, 479, 546, 603, 715, 768, 806, 813, 909
Art 61 (7)(b) 189, 479, 546, 603, 715, 768, 806, 813, 909
Art 61 (7)(c) . . . 248, 705, 899–900, 918, 985, 988, 992
Art 61 (8) 908
Art 61 (9) 900, 902–3, 984–7
Art 61 (10) 899, 969
Art 61 (11) 984–6
Art 63 . . . . . 123, 417
Art 63 (1) 120–3, 418, 993
Art 63 (2) 123, 125
Art 63 (3) 893
Art 64 . . . . . 925, 927
Art 64 (2) 898, 1040, 1055, 1107–8
Art 64 (3)(c) 1010, 1037
Art 64 (4) 346
Art 64 (5) 494
Art 64 (6) 974
Art 64 (6)(d) 1171
Art 64 (6)(e) 1055, 1109
Art 64 (6)(f) 898
Art 64 (7) 1057
Art 64 (8)(a) 898
Art 64 (8)(b) 1169
Art 64 (10) 993
Art 66 (2) 898, 1171
Art 66 (3) 861–3, 888–9, 896, 914
Art 67 . . . . . 487, 994, 1013, 1030–1

Art 67 (1) 898, 1000, 1005, 1057
Art 67 (1)(a) 1031
Art 67 (1)(b) 1031, 1039
Art 67 (1)(c) 998, 1174
Art 67 (1)(g) 1003
Art 67 (2) 893, 922, 924–5, 1014, 1016, 1040–1
Art 67 (7) 905
Art 68 . . . . . 101, 960, 1086, 1100
Art 68 (1) 250, 818, 1055, 1107–9, 1112, 1115–7, 1131
Art 68 (2) 1055
Art 68 (3) 419, 429, 1137, 1139–40, 1145–7, 1153, 1155, 1164–5, 1167–8, 1175–7, 1180–1, 1185
Art 68 (4) 1110–1, 1113, 1115–6
Art 68 (5) 914, 924, 930, 1014, 1049, 1110, 1113
Art 69 (2) 927, 1100
Art 69 (3) 1168–71, 1175–6, 1178, 1186
Art 69 (7) 388
Art 70 . . . . . 123, 125, 360, 388, 397, 909, 978, 1044, 1053, 1058, 1074, 1105
Art 70 (1) 123
Art 71 . . . . . 388, 393
Art 72 1017
Art 74 . . . . 72, 150, 766, 768–9, 904, 912, 928, 993, 1133, 1165
Art 74 (2) 464, 903, 905, 919–20
Art 75 . . . . . 960, 1137, 1206, 1208, 1284
Art 75 (1) 1206–9, 1217–8
Art 75 (2) 1206–8
Art 75 (2)(a) 1217
Art 76 . . . . . 912, 926, 1133
Art 76 (1) 1172
Art 77 551
Art 77 (1)(a) 953
Art 77 (1)(b) 944, 953
Art 77 (2)(a) 1206
Art 78 . . . . . 513, 551, 944
Art 78 (3) 851–2
Art 79 . . . . . 1137, 1206
Art 79 (3) 116
Art 81 (2)(a) 943
Art 81 (2)(d) 895
Art 81 (3)(c) 967, 970
Art 82 (1) 966–7, 971
Art 82 (1)(a) 967
Art 82 (1)(b) 440, 969
Art 82 (1)(c) 970
Art 82 (1)(d) . . . 415, 423, 465, 967, 971–4, 1287
Art 82 (2) 966–7, 1287
Art 82 (4) 976, 1137
Art 83 (2) 976
Art 84 976
Arts 84 (1)(a)-(c) 977
Art 85 388
Art 86 . . . . . 70, 256, 1279
Art 87 256
Art 87 (1)(a) 70
Art 87 (5) 44, 106, 131, 262, 1280
Art 87 (7) 44, 48, 70, 106, 131–2, 1280
Art 88 . . . . . 70, 256
Art 89 . . . . . 70, 1279
Art 89 (1) 283
Art 90 262
Art 92 1279
Art 93 . . . . . 256, 1279
Art 93 (1)(e) 416
Art 93 (1)(j) 1118
Art 93 (7) 1090–1
Art 93 (7)(b) 438–9, 441
Art 93 (10) 235–6, 250, 252
Art 95 189
Art 96 1279
Art 97 70
Art 98 . . . 132, 154, 159, 161–2, 164, 263, 268, 281, 292–6
Art 98 (1) 268–9, 289, 294, 298–300
Art 98 (2) 160, 263, 416
Art 99 1279
Art 110 977
Art 112 . . . . . 84, 112, 123, 125, 394, 1285
Art 112 (1) 105–6
Art 112 (2) 397
Art 112 (2)(b) 106, 109–10
Art 112 (2)(d) 84, 115
Art 112 (2)(e) 106
Art 112 (2)(g) 106, 188
Art 112 (3) 106
Art 112 (4) 106, 109, 125, 397
Art 112 (6) 106, 122, 396
Art 112 (7) 106
Art 112 (9) 107
Art 113 116
Art 115 . . . . . 39–41, 84
Art 115 (b) 40
Art 116 . . . . . 39, 84
Art 117 . . . . . 41, 84
Art 119 (1) 196–7
Art 121 . . . . . 106, 423, 779, 789–90, 1288–9
Art 121 (1) 147
Art 121 (2) 122
Art 121 (3) 788–9
Art 121 (4) 1289
Art 121 (5) 146, 790, 1289

Art 122. . . . . 106, 417, 1288–9
Art 122 (1). 1289
Art 123. 779
Art 123 (2). 118
Art 124. . . . . 117–8, 145, 162, 169–70
Art 125. . . . . 168, 189, 199
Art 125 (1). 732
Art 126. 169
Elements of crimes
Art 6. 177
Art 6 (b), para 1 807
Art 7 (1)(i) 171, 173
Art 7 (1) (d). 785
Art 7 (1)(g)-2 805
Art 8 (2)(b)(xi) 149
Art 8 (2)(b)(xxvi). 173
Art 8 (2)(c)(iii) 220
Art 8 (2)(e)(vii). 173
Art 9 (1). 116, 421, 462
Art 9 (2). 106
Art 21. 430
Art 22. 496
Art 61 (7)(a) 764
Art 61 (7) (b). 764
Art 74. . . . . 463, 481
RCSL Statute
Art 1. 1271
Art 7. 1273
Rules of Procedure
R 4, ICC–ASP/10/Res.1, 20 December 2011. 117
R 4 bis 965
R 24 (1)(a), ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 395
R 25 395
R 25 (a). 395
R 26 395
R 28 (A). 377
R 44 (2), ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 181
R 48, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 . . . . . 141, 192, 194
R 49 193
R 49 (1). 194
R 49 (2) 194, 367
R 61 709
R 63 (4) 832
R 65 (B) 1064, 1067, 1068
R 66, IT/32/Rev 49. 1032
R 67 (3) 1102
R 68, ICTR-98-44-I, TC III, ICTR, 7 October 2003, para. 20 1053
R 69 1109
R 70, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002. 804
R 71, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002. 804
R 72, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002. 804
R 75 1109
R 77 . . . . . 1048, 1051, 1056, 1122
R 81 (1). 1047
R 81 (2), ICC-01/04-01/06-108-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 19 May 2006. . . . . 485, 1117
R 81 (2), ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006, para. 54 . . . . . 346, 384, 818, 900, 907, 1014, 1038, 1047, 1048, 1117
R 81 (4), ICC-01/04-01/06-108-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 19 May 2006. . . . . 485, 1117
R 81 (4), ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006, para. 54 . . . . . 346, 384, 818, 900, 907, 1014, 1038, 1047, 1048, 1117
R 87 1055
R 88 1055
R 92, IT/32/Rev. 49, 11 February 1994 . . . 888
R 93–5, ICC–ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties) part II.C 107
R 96, UN Doc ITR/3/Rev.1 804
R 96, UN Doc IT/32/Rev.45. 804
R 98 (5) 1203
R 121 (1). 1035
R 103, ICC-02/05-19, 10 October 2006, para. 64. 819
R 103, ICC-01/05-01/08-406, para. 39 637
R 103, ICC- 01/09-01-11-478, Amicus Curiae, ICC, 23 November 2012, para. 26 1156
R 103, ICC-01/09-01/11-519, Amicus Curiae, ICC, 24 December 2012, para. 8 1156
R 103, ICC-02/11-01/11-62. 1154
R 103 (1), ICC-01/04-373, PTC I, ICC, 17 August 2007 . . . . . 193, 363
R 103 (1), ICC-01/04-373, PTC I, ICC, 20 August 2007 1052
R 105 (1). 193, 194
R 105 (2) 192, 193, 194
R 105 (3) 193

R 105 (4) 192, 193, 194
R 118 (2). 464, 1065
R 118 (2), ICC-01/05-01/08-1019, AC, ICC, 19 November 2010, note 74 559
R 121, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002. 915
R 121 (4), ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 1032
R 121 (5), ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 1032
R 121 (6) 1032
R 121 (7), ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 345
R 130 923
R 131 854
R 132 bis 416, 926, 964
R 134, ICC-01/09-01/11-1189, OTP, ICC, 24 February 2014. 122
R 140 (2)(c) 929
R 145 625
R 145 (1)(a) 944
R 149 964
R 153, UN Doc A/520/Rev.15, last amended September 2007, p. 33 40
R 166 1123
R 194, ICC-01/09, PTC II, ICC, 29 June 2011, para. 33. 236
R 194, 01/09-78 (OA), AC, ICC, 10 August 2011, para. 15 968
Regulations of the Court
Reg 1, ICC-BD/01-02-07, 14 June and 14 November 2007 461
Reg 1, ICC-02/11-01/11-585, PTC I, ICC, 27 December 2013, para. 7. 422
Reg 4 1286
Reg 23, ICC-BD/01-03-11, 26 May 2004 . . . 414
Reg 46 (3) 197, 198
Reg 55, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319-tENG/FRA, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012 . . . . . 488, 514, 1284
Reg 55, ICC-01/04-01/07-3363, AC, ICC, 27 March 2013 . . . . . 558, 488
Reg 55(2), ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009, para. 69. 198
Reg 55(2), ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009, paras 84–5 . . . 488
Reg 86(2)(e), ICC-01/04-417, PTC I, ICC, 7 December 2007, para. 6. 495
Reg 109 (4) 46
Reg 121(2) 395
Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 952
Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs (adopted 39 March 1961, entered into force 13 December 1964) 520 UNTS 151
Art 36 (2)(iv). 164
Statute of the International Court of Justice (adopted 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 33 UNTS 933 ("ICJ Statute")
Art 38. . . . . 413, 448, 458–9, 475, 525
Art 38 (1). 458–9
Art 38 (1)(c). 483
Art 38 (1)(d) 468, 481
Art 59. 480
Art 60. 196
Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute'). 5, 32, 412
Art 1. 1260
Art 3. 219
Art 4. 42
Art 5 (g). 802
Art 7. . . . . 518, 541
Art 7 (1) 541, 560, 567, 575, 578
Art 7 (3). 611
Art 9 (2). 101
Art 15. 12989
Art 16 (2). 369
Art 18. 1260
Art 18 (4). 896
Art 19. 1260
Art 19 (1). 896
Art 24. 934
Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1994) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute'). 5, 412
Art 1. 1260
Art 2. 42
Art 3. 803
Art 4. 803
Art 4 (d). 219
Art 6 (1) 541, 560, 567, 575, 578, 611
Art 14. 1289
Art 15 (2). 369
Art 17 (4). 896
Art 18. 1260
Art 18 (1). 896
Art 19. 1260
Art 24. 934

Statute of the International Residual Mechanism for Criminal Tribunals, UNSC Res 1966 (22 December 2010) UN Doc S/RES/1966, Annex 1 ('IRMCT Statute')
Art 1 1271
Art 2 1271
Treaty of Versailles
Art 227 368
United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (adopted 10 December 1982, entered into force 16 November 1994) 1833 UNTS 3
Arts 100-7 164
United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child 1991 464
Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of April 18, 1961 753
Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (signed 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331 . . . . . 260, 437, 721, 777
Art 2 204
Art 7 (1) 204
Art 7 (2) 203, 205
Art 7 (2)(a) 204
Arts 31-3 446
Art 31 . . . . . 299, 426, 437, 460, 462, 465, 471, 516, 775
Art 31 (1) 559, 1112, 1208
Art 31 (3)(c) 712, 721
Art 32 . . . . . 426, 437, 462, 466, 1112
Art 34 259
Art 36 (2) 262
Art 40 (5) 791

TABLE OF NATIONAL STATUTES

Austria
Penal Code
Art 278 593

Botswana
Penal Code Art
Art 68 (a) 593

Brazil
Law No.12.850 of 2 August 2013
Art 2 594
Penal Code
Art 288 594

Colombia
Constitution 324
La 975 324–5
Law 1424 324–5
Legal Framework for Peace 324
Peace and Justice Law 2005 1232

France
Penal Code
Art 60 (2) 502
Art 60 (3) 502
Arts 121-6 538
Arts 121-7 538
Art 353 866

Germany
Code of Crimes against International Law (VStGB) 664
s 7 (3) 664
s 8 (4) 664
s 11 (2) 664
s 12 (2) 664
Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch, StGB)
s 9 167
Criminal Procedure Code (Strafprozessordnung)
s 244 (2) 866
Penal Code
s 26 538
s 129 593
s 129a 593

Holland
Decree of 22 December 1943
Art 12 503
Penal Code
Art 45 503
Art 47 (1) 513
Art 49 503

Italy
Codice Penale
Art 416 593

Lebanon
Criminal Code 412
Law of 11 January 1958
Art 6 412
Art 7 412

Netherlands East Indies
Statute Book Decree No.45 of 1946
Art 5 503

Norway
War Crimes Law
Art 4. 503

Poland
Penal Code
Art 18 (2). 538
Art 19 (1). 538

Republic of Congo
Constitution of the Democratic Republic of Congo 2005
Art 153. 72
Art 215. 73

South Africa
Geneva Conventions Act 8 of 2010. 74
Police Service Act 1995
s 17C. 74
Police Service Amendment Act 57 of 2008. 74–5
Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002 ('South Africa ICC Act') 74–6
s 3 74
s 4 (3)(c) 74
s 5 (2) 74

Spain
Criminal Procedure code
Art 683 866
Art 701. 866
Art 713. 866
Art 726 866
Penal Code
Art 28 (2)(a) 538

Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC)
Constitution
Art 159. 190

Uganda
Amnesty Act
Pt11 78–9
Geneva Conventions Act 78
International Criminal Court Act, 2010 ('Uganda ICC Act'). 77
s 18 (d) 77
Penal Code Act. 78

UK
Terrorism Act
s 11 593

USA
American Service Members Protection Act of 2002 HR 4775 Public Law 107–206, Title II (2 August 2002), Sec 2005 36
Consolidated Appropriations Public Law of 2000, amended 2002 39
Crimes and Criminal Procedure (18 US Code)
s 2 (a) 519
Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure
r 16 (a)(1)(E) 1011
Model Penal Code
s 2.02 654
s 2.02 (2) 655
s 2.02 (2)(a) 653
s 2.02 (2)(c) 656–7
18 United States Code para 2331. 800
para 2332. 800

List of Abbreviations

ACLT	Advisory Committee of Legal Texts
ACT	Accountability, Coherence, and Transparency Group
AFISMA	African-led Support Mission in Mali
AMIS	African Union Mission in Sudan
ASP	Assembly of States Parties
AU	African Union
AUC	United Self-defence Forces of Colombia (Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia)
B&H	Bosnia and Herzegovina
CALS	Aids Consortium, Centre for Applied Legal Studies
CAR	Central African Republic
CATS	Crimes Against the State
CBF	Committee on Budget and Finance
CICC	Coalition for the International Criminal Court
CNDP	National Congress for the Defence of the People
CPA	Comprehensive Peace Agreement
CSVR	Crime Prevention Centre for the Study of Violence & Reconciliation
DCC	Document Containing the Charges
DPCI	Directorate for Priority Crimes Investigation
DPRK	Democratic People's Republic of Korea
DRC	Democratic Republic of Congo
ECCC	Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia
ECOWAS	Economic Community of West African States
ECtHR	European Court of Human Rights
EDS	Electronic Disclosure Suite
EIDHR	European Instrument for Democracy and Human Rights
Ex Com	Executive Committee
FARC	Armed Revolutionary Forces of Colombia
FDLR	Forces Démocratiques de la Libération du Rwanda
FIDH	International Federation for Human Rights
GDR	German Democratic Republic
HURIFO	Human Rights Focus
HURISA	Human Rights Institute of South Africa
IACHR	Inter-American Court of Human Rights
IAP	International Association of Prosecutors
IBA	International Bar Association
IBE	Inference to the Best Explanation
ICC	International Criminal Court
ICCPP	ICC's Witness Protection Programme
ICCPR	International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights
ICD	International Crimes Division
ICJ	International Court of Justice
ICRC	International Committee of the Red Cross
ICTJ	International Centre for Transitional Justice

ICTR	International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda
ICTY	International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia
IHAT	Iraqi Historical Allegations Team
ILC	International Law Commission
IMT	International Military Tribunal
IND	Dutch Immigration and Naturalization Services
IOM	Independent Oversight Mechanism
IRA	Individual Risk Assessment
IRS	Initial Response System
ISS	Institute for Security Studies
JCCD	Jurisdiction, Complementarity, and Cooperation Division
JCE	joint criminal enterprise
KLA	Kosovo Liberation Army
LHR	Lawyers for Human Rights
LRA	Lord's Resistance Army
LRC	Legal Resources Centre
MICT	Mechanism for International Criminal Tribunals
MINUSMA	Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali
MONUSCO	United Nations Mission in the DRC
MoU	Memorandum of Understanding
MRN	Media Review Network
MSF	Médecins Sans Frontières
NCP	National Congress Party
NGOs	Non-governmental organizations
NOW	Netherlands Organization for Scientific Research
NPA	National Prosecution Authority
ODM	Orange Democratic Movement
OPCD	Office of Public Counsel for the Defence
OPCV	Office of Public Counsel for the Victims
OSCE	Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe
OSF-SA	Open Society Foundation of SA
OSISA	Open Society Initiative of Southern Africa
OSP	Organized Structure of Power
OTP	Office of the Prosecutor
PCIJ	Permanent Court of International Justice
PCLU	Priority Crimes Litigation Unit
PIDS	Public Information and Documentation Section
PSA	Palestinian Solidarity Alliance
PTC	Pre-Trial Chamber
RoC	Regulations of the Court
ROK	Republic of Korea
RPE	Rules of Procedure and Evidence
RTLM	Radio télévision libre des mille collines
RUF	Revolutionary United Front
SAHA	South African History Archive
SAHRC	South African Human Rights Commission
SALC	Southern African Litigation Centre
SAPS	South African Police Services

SCSL	Special Court for Sierra Leone
SOFA	Status of forces agreements
SOMA	Status of mission agreements
SPLM	Sudan People's Liberation Movement
SRA	Security Risk Assessment
STL	Special Tribunal for Lebanon
SWGCA	Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression
TC	Trial Chamber
TRNC	Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus
UN	United Nations
UNAMID	African Union-United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur
UNGA	UN General Assembly
UNHAS	UN Humanitarian Air Service
UNICRI	United Nations Interregional Crime and Justice Research Institute
UNSC	United Nations Security Council
UNSMIS	United Nations Supervision Mission in Syria
UPC	Union of Congolese Patriots
UPDF	Ugandan People's Defence Forces
UPR	Universal Periodic Review
VCLT	Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties
VPRS	Victims Participation and Reparations Section
VWRG	Victims' Rights Working Group
VWU	Victims and Witnesses Unit
WCL	Washington College of Law
WCRO	War Crimes Research Office
WGLL	Working Group on Lessons Learnt

List of Contributors

Philipp Ambach is Special Assistant to the President of the International Criminal Court. He holds a PhD in International Criminal Law from Freie Universität Berlin. He has previously worked as Associate Legal Officer at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda.

Kai Ambos has been Chair of Criminal Law, Criminal Procedure, Comparative Law and International Criminal Law at the Georg-August-Universität Göttingen since May 2003 and Judge at the Provincial Court (Landgericht) of Göttingen since 2006. He has been Dean of Student Affairs between summer 2008 and 2010. From 1991 to 2003, he was senior research fellow at the Max-Planck-Institute for Foreign and International Criminal Law (Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany) in charge of the International Criminal Law and Spanish-speaking Latin America Sections. On behalf of Germany, he has participated in the negotiations on the creation of the International Criminal Court and later became a member of the Expert Working Group of the German Federal Ministry of Justice on implementing the Rome Statute. He has also worked extensively in Latin America on human rights, drug-related issues and criminal law reforms. He has written widely on international criminal law and procedure and is inter alia author of the 'Treatise on International Criminal Law' (Oxford University Press, 2013, 2014).

Mohamed Elewa Badar is Associate Professor and Reader in Comparative and International Criminal Law and Islamic Law at Northumbria School of Law, Newcastle. Dr. Badar's main research and teaching interests are in international and comparative criminal justice as well as in international human rights and post-conflict justice. He is the author of 'The Concept of Mens Rea in International Criminal Law' (Hart Publishing, 2015), and of numerous book chapters and articles in refereed journals. From 1997 to 2006 he served as a judge and senior prosecutor for the Egyptian Ministry of Justice.

Olympia Bekou is Professor of Public International Law at the University of Nottingham. She is Head of the International Criminal Justice Unit of the University of Nottingham Human Rights Law Centre. She completed her LL.M. in International Law at the University of Cambridge and obtained her PhD in International Criminal Law from the University of Nottingham, for which she had been awarded a NATO Fellowship. Professor Bekou has provided research and capacity building support for 63 states, intensive training to more than 75 international government officials, drafting assistance to Samoa (with legislation enacted in November 2007), Fiji, and Jamaica, and has been involved in training the Thai Judiciary. She has also undertaken capacity building missions in post-conflict situations such as Uganda, the DRC, and Sierra Leone.

Gilbert Bitti is Senior Legal Adviser to the Pre-Trial Division of the International Criminal Court. He has been a member of the French Delegation during the ICC negotiations in the Ad Hoc Committee (1995), Preparatory Committee (1996-1998), Rome Conference (1998) and Preparatory Commission (1999-2002). Before that, he was Counsel to the French Government at the European Court of Human Rights (1993-2002). He is also a former Assistant Professor at the Faculty of Law in Paris. He is the author of numerous publications on the ICC.

Caroline Buisman is a defence lawyer. She has worked in several defence teams before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the International Criminal Court. She is the author of various publications in the field of international justice and co-editor of 'Principles of Evidence in International Criminal Law' (Oxford University Press, 2010). She holds a PhD from Brunel University, based on a work on 'The Ascertainment of the Truth in International Criminal Justice'.

Roger S. Clark is Board of Governors Professor at Rutgers University. Professor Clark teaches courses in international law, international protection of human rights, international organizations, international criminal law and criminal justice policy, United States foreign relations and national security law and criminal law. Prior to joining the Rutgers faculty in 1972, he worked for the New Zealand Justice Department and Ministry of Foreign Affairs; taught law in New Zealand; served as an American Council of Learned Societies Fellow and Doctoral Fellow at the Columbia University School of Law; interned at the United Nations; and taught at the law school of the University of Iowa. Since 1995, he has represented Samoa in negotiations to create the International Criminal Court and to get the Court running successfully. He was very active in Court's Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression which had the task of drafting an amendment to the Court's Statute to activate its nascent jurisdiction over the crime of aggression.

Robert Cryer is Professor of International and Criminal Law at Birmingham Law School. His major teaching and research interests are in international law and criminal law. In addition to a number of articles and book chapters, he is the author of 'Prosecuting International Crimes: Selectivity and the International Criminal Law Regime' (Cambridge: CUP, 2005) and co-author (with Hakan Friman, Darryl Robinson and Elizabeth Wilmshurst) of 'An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure' (Cambridge: CUP, 3rd ed., 2014) and (with Neil Boister) of 'The Tokyo International Military Tribunal: A Reappraisal' (Oxford: OUP, 2008) He is co-editor of the Journal of Conflict and Security Law and a member of the editorial board of the Journal of International Criminal Justice.

Anthony Cullen is Senior Lecturer in Law at the School of Law, Middlesex University, London. Prior to taking up this position, he was a Research Fellow at the School of Law, University of Leeds (2011-2013) and a Research Fellow at the Lauterpacht Centre for International Law, University of Cambridge (2007-2011). His research interests focus mainly on international humanitarian law, international human rights law and the development of foreign policy in these areas. His field experience includes periods in Africa, India, and the Middle East. He was previously employed on the joint Customary International Humanitarian Law Project of the British Red Cross and International Committee of the Red Cross. He also served for a period in the Human Rights Unit of the Irish Department of Foreign Affairs during Ireland's presidency of the European Union.

Marjolein Cupido obtained a PhD from the Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam. She holds an LL.M. in Criminal Law (summa cum laude) from Leiden University where she also participated in the Talent program. She is currently working as a lecturer at VU University Amsterdam and conducts research in the program Empirical and Normative Studies.

Simon De Smet is a Lecturer in International Law at Cambridge University and former Legal Officer in Chambers of the International Criminal Court. He has served as a Law Clerk at the International Court of Justice (to Judges Thomas Buergenthal and Pieter Kooijmans, 2002-2003), and was a First Lieutenant (Reserve) in the Belgian Air Force (1993-2005). He holds a PhD from Cambridge University, an LL.M. from Columbia University School of Law, and a Licentiaat in de Rechten from the University of Ghent.

Margaret M. deGuzman is Associate Professor of Law at Temple University Beasley School of Law. She is a graduate of Yale Law School, the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, and Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service. Before joining the Temple faculty, she clerked on the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and practiced law in San Francisco for six years, specializing in criminal defence. Her cases involved charges ranging from insider trading and trade secret theft to mail fraud and drug trafficking. She also served as a legal advisor to the Senegal delegation at the Rome Conference on the International Criminal Court and as a law clerk in the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for Former Yugoslavia. She has authored a number of publications on such issues as the definitions of international crimes, the role of case and situational gravity in the legitimacy of the International Criminal Court (ICC), and the theoretical underpinnings of selection decisions at the ICC.

Richard Dicker is Director of Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program. He has worked at Human Rights Watch since 1991 and led the Human Rights Watch multi-year campaign to establish the International Criminal Court. He is a former civil rights attorney in New York. He graduated from New York University School of Law and received his LL.M. from Columbia University.

Aiste Dumbryte is Assistant Lawyer at the Registry of the European Court of Human Rights. She holds an Advanced LL.M in Public International Law (Cum Laude) from Leiden University. She has previously worked as a junior professional officer at the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (Presence in Albania, Rule of Law and Human Rights Department), as a contractor at the International Criminal Court (Victims' Participation and Reparations Section) and as legal assistant at the Lithuanian Red Cross Society (Department of Refugee Affairs).

Anton du Plessis is Managing Director of the Institute for Security Studies (ISS). He has more than 14 years of legal and management experience in the field of human security, international criminal justice, and rule of law issues in over 20 African countries. He has worked as a consultant and expert advisor to various UN entities and other intergovernmental organisations, including the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, the UNSC's Counter-Terrorism Executive Directorate, and the UN Counter-Terrorism Implementation Task Force. He has also worked as a Senior State Advocate at the National Prosecuting Authority of South Africa where he specialized in the prosecution of serious and violent offences. Anton is a World Economic Forum Young Global Leader (2014–2020). He has three law degrees and is an admitted advocate of the High Court of South Africa.

Markus Eikel is Investigation Team Leader at the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court. He holds an M.A. and a PhD from the University of Hamburg, as well as an LL.M. in Public International Law from Leiden University.

Mohamed M. El Zeidy is Legal Adviser for the Pre-Trial Chamber of the International Criminal Court since 2007. Prior to his position at the Court (1997-2007), he served as a judge at the South Cairo Elementary Court, Egyptian Ministry of Justice, senior public prosecutor and a public prosecutor, at the Office of the Prosecutor General of Egypt. He holds a PhD in international criminal law and an LL.M. in international human rights law (National University of Ireland, Galway), an LL.M. in public law (Cairo University), a licence en droit and bachelor of Police Sciences (Police College-Cairo). He has published widely in the area of international criminal law, both in English and Arabic. He is a member of the International Association of Penal Law, the Egyptian Society of Criminal Law and a member of the editorial boards of the Criminal Law Forum and the International Criminal Law Review.

Elizabeth Evenson is Senior Counsel at the International Justice Programme of Human Rights Watch. Her research and advocacy centers on the International Criminal Court (ICC), monitoring the Court's institutional development and conducting advocacy toward the Court and its member countries. She also authors briefing papers and reports on policy issues confronting the court, including prosecutorial strategies and enhancing the international community's support of and cooperation with the Court. Evenson also focuses on the ICC's investigations of the 2007–2008 election-related violence in Kenya and advocates for domestic prosecutions of serious crimes in Kenya. Previously, she conducted human rights missions in Uganda for Human Rights Watch as a Leonard H. Sandler fellow.

Stuart Ford is Assistant Professor of Law at the John Marshall Law School, Chicago, Illinois, USA. His academic interest is, in particular, international criminal law and international criminal courts. He has published articles on the International Criminal Court, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the responsibility to protect doctrine, crimes against humanity, and genocide. His current research explores the cost, value, and efficiency of international criminal tribunals, with the goal of improving their functioning. Prior to joining John Marshall, Professor Ford worked as an Assistant Prosecutor at the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC). Stuart Ford received his J.D., with honours, from the University of Texas School of Law, and holds an LL.M. in Public International Law and Armed Conflict, with Distinction, from the University of Nottingham.

Håkan Friman is Deputy Director-General in the Swedish Ministry of Justice, and former head of the Division for International Judicial Cooperation and Criminal Cases. He is also Visiting Professor at University College London, Faculty of Laws, United Kingdom, and visiting scholar at George Washington University, Washington D.C. Prior to this, he has been an Associate Judge of Appeal, Svea Court of Appeal, Sweden, and Extraordinary Professor at the University of Pretoria, South Africa. He has long been involved in international and national work in the area of international criminal law, including work within the European Union. He has published extensively in this field and is co-author of 'An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure' (Cambridge University Press, 2014).

Nick Grono is CEO of the Freedom Fund, a seven-year effort to raise and deploy $100 million or more to combat modern-day slavery. Prior to his work at the Freedom Fund, he was the inaugural CEO of the Walk Free Foundation, a leading international actor in the fight against modern slavery. Before that, he was Deputy President and Chief Operating Officer of the International Crisis Group (ICG), the world's leading conflict prevention NGO, headquartered in Brussels, Belgium. He is a lawyer by background and was Chief of Staff and National Security Adviser to the Australian Attorney-General.

Fabricio Guariglia is Prosecution Coordinator at the Office of the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Court (ICC). He has previously served as Appeals Counsel at the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and as member of Argentina's delegation to the ICC at the Rome Conference. His academic appointments include the positions as visiting fellow at the London School of Economics, where he taught international law and international criminal law, Permanent Adjunct Professor of Criminal Law and Procedure at the Faculty of Law of the University of Buenos Aires, and Visiting Professor at the University of Münster where he obtained his PhD. He has published extensively in the field.

Niamh Hayes is Head of the Hague Office of the Institute for International Criminal Investigations. She is completing a PhD on the investigation and prosecution of sexual violence by international criminal tribunals at the Irish Centre for Human Rights, National University of Ireland Galway. She previously worked for Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice as a legal consultant and as an intern for the defence at the ICTY in the Karadzic trial. She has lectured on international criminal law and international law at Trinity College Dublin and, along with Prof. William A. Schabas and Dr. Yvonne McDermott, is a co-editor of 'The Ashgate Research Companion to International Criminal Law: Critical Perspectives' (Ashgate, 2013).

Kevin Jon Heller is Professor of Criminal Law at the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London. Until 2014, he was Associate Professor & Reader at Melbourne Law School, where he also served as Project Director for International Criminal Law at the Asia Pacific Centre for Military Law, a joint project of Melbourne

Law School and the Australian Defence Force. Heller's academic writing has appeared in a variety of journals and he has written several books. For the past eight years, he has also been a permanent member of the international-law blog Opinio Juris. On the practical side, Heller has been involved in the International Criminal Court's negotiations over the crime of aggression, served as Human Rights Watch's external legal advisor on the trial of Saddam Hussein, and served from December 2008 until February 2011 as one of Radovan Karadzic's formally-appointed legal associates.

Dov Jacobs is an Assistant Professor of Public International Law at Leiden University. Previously, he was a postdoctoral researcher at the University of Amsterdam, a PhD researcher at the European University Institute in Florence and a lecturer in Public International Law at the University Roma Tre. He holds degrees in Law from King's College in London, Paris I Panthéon-Sorbonne and Paris II Panthéon Assas and a degree in Political Science from Sciences Po, Paris. He is currently a member of the editorial board of the Leiden Journal of International Law and the senior editor of international law of the European Journal of Legal Studies. Dov Jacobs regularly comments on international law issues on his blog, 'Spreading the Jam'.

Karim A. A. Khan QC is a Barrister at Temple Garden Chambers, London. He has previously worked as a Senior Crown Prosecutor and at the Law Commission of England & Wales. From 1997 to 2000 he was a Legal Advisor in the Office of the Prosecutor in the United Nations International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) and Rwanda (ICTR). He is inter alia co-author of 'Archbold International Criminal Courts' (Sweet & Maxwell, 1st ed 2003; 2nd ed 2005, 3rd ed 2009, 4th edition 2014) and co-editor and contributing author to 'Principles of Evidence in International Criminal Law' (Oxford University Press, 2010).

Alejandro Kiss is Legal Officer in Chambers at the International Criminal Court. He holds an LL.M. and a PhD from the University of Münster. He was former legal advisor to Argentina's Attorney General.

Claus Kreß is Professor of Criminal Law and Public International Law and Director of the Institute for International Peace and Security Law at the University of Cologne. He studied law at the University of Cologne, received his Masters of Law at the University of Cambridge in 1993 and his Doctorate in Law in 1994. Since 2010, he has been a Life Member of Clare Hall at the University of Cambridge. He has been a member of Germany's delegation in the negotiations on the International Criminal Court (ICC) since 1998. Between 1999 and 2001, he assisted in the drafting of the German Code of Crimes under International Law. In 2001, he acted as War Crimes Expert for the Prosecutor General for East Timor. In 2003 and 2004, he was Head of the Drafting Board for the ICC's Regulations of the Court, and in 2005 and 2006 he was a consultant to the Presidency of the ICC for work on the Regulations of the Registry. His works include books on 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and Domestic Legal Orders' (ed., with Flavia Lattanzi, 2000, 2005) and 'The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression' (Cambridge University Press, with Stefan Barriga).

Ottilia Anna Maunganidze is a researcher and strategist at the Institute for Security Studies (South Africa). She is an LL.D. Candidate (UNISA), and has previously obtained an LL.M. in Fundamental Rights Litigation and International Human Rights Law (UNISA), PDIS (Rhodes University), and LL.B. (Rhodes University).

Conor McCarthy is a Barrister at Monckton Chambers, London. He was formerly fellow of the British Institute of International and Comparative Law and completed his doctorate at the University of Cambridge. He publishes frequently on questions of reparation and remedies in international law. He is author of 'Reparations and Victim Support in the International Criminal Court' (Cambridge University Press, 2012).

Volker Nerlich is Legal Adviser in the Appeals Division at the International Criminal Court. He holds a PhD from Humboldt University Berlin and an LL.M. from the University of Western Cape. He is member of the Editorial Committee of the Journal of International Criminal Justice and author of numerous essay in the field.

Michael A. Newton is Professor of the Practice of Law at Vanderbilt University Law School. He has published more than 80 books, articles, and book chapters and currently serves as senior editor of the Terrorism International Case Law Reporter, published by Oxford University Press. He formerly taught at the United States Military Academy at West Point and at the Judge Advocate General's School and Center. He has written extensively about use of force issues, international jurisprudence, and the enforcement of international law. His co-authored work, 'Enemy of the State: The Trial and Execution of Saddam Hussein' (with Michael Scharf, St. Marin's Press, 2008) won book-of-the-year honors from the American Section of International Association of Penal Law. He also won Article of Year honors in 2011 for his article entitled 'Evolving Equality: The Development of the International Defense Bar', published in the Stanford Journal of International Law.

Jonathan O'Donohue is Legal Adviser at the International Secretariat of Amnesty International. He has represented Amnesty International at the International Criminal Court (ICC) and the Assembly of States Parties since 2002. He also leads the Coalition for the International Criminal Court's Budget and Finance Team, which conducts advocacy for adequate resources for the ICC around the annual budget processes.

Jens David Ohlin is Professor of Law at Cornell Law School. Before that, he was associate-in-law at Columbia University, where he received his JD and a PhD in philosophy. His research focuses on the application of criminal law theory to international criminal justice and on the laws of war, in particular the impact of new technology on the regulation of warfare, and the role of non-state actors in armed conflicts. His books include 'Targeted Killings: Law and Morality in an Asymmetrical World' (Oxford University Press 2012, with A. Altman & C. Finkelstein); 'Cyber-War: Law & Ethics for Virtual Conflicts' (Oxford University Press forthcoming, with C. Finkelstein & K. Govern); and 'Defending Humanity: When Force is Justified and Why' (Oxford University Press 2008, with George Fletcher).

Héctor Olásolo is Chair of International Law at the University of El Rosario, Colombia. He is Chairman of the Ibero-American Institute of The Hague for Peace, Human Rights and International Justice and Director of the Ibero-American Yearbook of International Criminal Law. He previously held the Chair in International Criminal Law at the University of Utrecht (2010–2012), and served as Legal Officer in Chambers of the International Criminal Court (2004–2009) and the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (2002-2004). He was Legal Adviser to the Spanish Delegation to the Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court (1999–2002).

Sara Porro holds a PhD from the University of Hamburg's Faculty of Law. Her doctoral research focused on the treatment of the mental element of crimes in International Criminal Law. Before her doctoral studies, she interned at the Italian Embassy in Washington DC (2010), as well as at the EU Delegation to the US (2010). In these capacities she focused on transnational and US-national justice, freedom and security issues.

Joseph Powderly is Assistant Professor of Public International Law at Leiden University. Prior to this, he was a Research Fellow in International Criminal and Humanitarian Law at the TMC Asser Institute, The Hague. Between September 2008 and January 2010, he was a Doctoral Fellow/Researcher at the Irish Centre for Human Rights. Along with Dr. Shane Darcy of the Irish Centre for Human Rights, he is co-editor of and contributor to 'Judicial Creativity in International Criminal Tribunals' (Oxford University Press, 2010). He has written over 80 case-reports for the Oxford Reports on International Criminal Law, as well as numerous book chapters on topics ranging from the principle of complementarity to Irish involvement in the drafting of the Geneva Conventions. He is Managing Editor of the Criminal Law Forum.

Rod Rastan is Legal Adviser for the Office of the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Court (ICC). Within the Office, Rod Rastan deals with international law issues, in particular, jurisdiction, admissibility and judicial assistance. Prior to joining the ICC, he worked for several years in the area of human rights, rule of law, and mediation with the United Nations missions in Bosnia and Herzegovina, East Timor and Cyprus, as well as with field presences of the European Union and the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe. He also participated in the negotiation of the Rome Statute and the Rule of Procedure and Evidence of the ICC. He holds a PhD in Law from the London School of Economics and has published and lectured on international criminal law. Rod Rastan is a member of the editorial board of the Criminal Law Forum.

Darryl Robinson is Associate Professor of Law at Queen's University, Canada. From 1997 to 2004, he was a Legal Officer at Foreign Affairs Canada, working inter alia on the negotiation of the Rome Statute and subsidiary instruments. From 2004 to 2006, he was an adviser in the Office of the Prosecutor. In 2006 he became the Director of the International Human Rights Clinic at the University of Toronto Faculty of Law, remaining in the office until 2008. He was awarded the Antonio Cassese Prize for International Criminal Law Studies. His research and writing projects concern the criminal theory, international implications, and patterns of argument and discourse in International Criminal Law.

Emeric Rogier is Chief of Situation Analysis Section in the Jurisdiction, Complementarity and Cooperation Division of the Office of the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Court.

Enrique Carnero Rojo is Legal Officer at the Office of Public Counsel for Victims of the International Criminal Court. He previously served as Associate Legal Adviser at the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (2004–2009) and completed an internship at the Appeals Section of the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (2003).

Susana SáCouto is Professorial Lecturer-in-Residence at American University, Washington College of Law, where she teaches courses on advanced topics in international criminal law and procedure, gender and human rights law and international legal responses to women affected by conflict. She is also Director of the War Crimes Research Office (WCRO), which promotes the development and enforcement of international criminal and humanitarian law. Prior to joining the WCRO, Ms. SáCouto directed the Legal Services Program at Women Empowered Against Violence and clerked for the Office of the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and the Center for Human Rights Legal Action in Guatemala. She also served as co-chair of the Women's International Law Interest Group of the American Society for International Law (2006–2009 term), and was awarded The Women's Law Center 22nd Annual Dorothy Beatty Memorial Award for significant contributions to women's rights.

William A. Schabas OC MRIA is Professor of Human Rights Law and International Criminal Law at Middlesex and Leiden University. He is the author of more than twenty books dealing in whole or in part with international human rights law and has also published more than 300 articles in academic journals, principally in the field of international human rights law and international criminal law. Professor Schabas is Editor-in-Chief of the Criminal Law Forum.

Paul Seils is Vice President and General Counsel of the International Center for Transitional Justice, New York. He has held senior positions in the Office of the Prosecutor of the ICC, in the Rule of Law section of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, and at the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG). He has written widely on theory and practice in transitional justice, particularly on the importance of national prosecutions and complementarity, challenges in investigating mass crimes in transitional contexts, and on mapping and selection issues.

Alison Smith is Legal Counsel and Director for International Criminal Justice Programme for No Peace Without Justice. She has formerly worked as the Country Director of No Peace Without Justice in Sierra Leone. She has served as chief legal adviser to the Vice President of Sierra Leone on the Special Court for Sierra Leone. She has acted as international legal adviser to a number of clients including the Tibetan Government in Exile, Kosovar politicians and has worked with No Peace Without Justice and UNICEF on the production of a book on international criminal law and children. Since 2000, she has worked as a legal adviser to the government of Thailand during the United Nations Preparatory Commissions for the establishment of an International Criminal Court and during the first sessions of the Assembly of States Parties.

Carsten Stahn is Professor of International Criminal Law and Global Justice at Leiden University and Program Director of the Grotius Centre for International Legal Studies (The Hague). He has previously worked as Legal Officer in Chambers of the International Criminal Court (2003–2007) and as Research Fellow at the Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law (2000–2003). He obtained his PhD degree (summa cum laude) from Humboldt University Berlin after completing his First and Second State Exam in Law in Germany. He holds LL.M. degrees from New York University and Cologne/Paris I (Panthéon-Sorbonne). He is author of 'The Law and Practice of International Territorial Administration: Versailles to Iraq and Beyond' (Cambridge University Press, 2008/2010) which received the Ciardi Prize 2009 of the International Society for Military Law and the Law of War. He has published over 50 articles/essays in different fields of international law and edited several collections of essays in the field, including 'Jus Post Bellum: Mapping the Normative Foundations' (Oxford University Press 2014. He directs research projects on 'Jus Post Bellum' and 'Post-Conflict Justice and Local Ownership', funded by the Netherlands Organization for Scientific Research (NWO). He is Co-Editor-in-Chief of the Leiden Journal of International Law, Executive Editor of the Criminal Law Forum and Correspondent of the Netherlands International Law Review. His work has been cited in the jurisprudence of the ICC, the ICJ and the European Court of Human Rights.

Ignaz Stegmiller is Coordinator for International Programs at the Franz von Liszt Institute for International and Comparative Law at the University of Giessen. In 2009, he obtained a PhD from the Georg August University of Göttingen (summa cum laude), with a work on 'The Pre-Investigation Stage of the International Criminal Court – Criteria for Situation Selection'. He has worked as a Technical Advisor of GIZ/CPS for the Cambodian Human Rights Action Committee (CHRAC) in Cambodia.

Carl-Friedrich Stuckenberg is Professor of German and International Criminal Law and Criminal Procedure, Comparative Criminal Law and Criminal Law History at the University of Bonn. Before that, he taught at the universities of Marburg, Münster, Dresden and Greifswald and held the chair in international and European criminal law at Saarland University. He studied law at the universities of Bonn and Geneva, received a master's degree from Harvard Law School (1992) and was a clerk at the Federal Constitutional Court. His doctoral thesis (Bonn University, 1997) analyzes the presumption of innocence on a comparative law basis and his Habilitationsschrift (Bonn 2006) explores the concepts of intention and mistake as prolegomena for a theory of responsibility in international criminal law. His research interests include the philosophical and historical foundations of criminal law and criminal procedure as well as the comparative and international perspectives.

Katherine Cleary Thompson is Assistant Director at the War Crimes Research Office, American University, Washington College of Law.

Jenia Iontcheva Turner is a Professor at Southern Methodist University Dedman School of Law, where she teaches criminal procedure, comparative criminal procedure, international criminal law, European Union law, and international organizations. Before joining SMU, she served as a Bigelow Fellow at the University of Chicago Law School, where she taught legal research and writing and comparative criminal procedure. She attended law school at Yale, where she was a Coker Fellow and articles editor for the Yale Law Journal and the Yale Journal of International Law. Her articles have appeared in the Virginia Law Review, the Michigan Law Review, the American Journal of Comparative Law, the Virginia Journal of International Law, the Chicago Journal of International Law, and the Stanford Journal of International Law. In 2009, Professor Turner completed a textbook, 'Plea Bargaining Across Borders' (Wolters Kluwer, 2009), exploring plea bargaining in several national and international jurisdictions.

Harmen van der Wilt is Professor of International Criminal law at the University of Amsterdam. His research interests lie in international criminal tribunals, the International Criminal Court, criminal law philosophy, terrorism, corporate criminal responsibility, transnational crimes, extradition/ European Arrest Warrant, human rights and criminal law. He has been an ad litem Judge in the Criminal Court of Roermond and is currently an ad litem judge in the Extradition Chamber of the District Court in Amsterdam. He is a member of the editorial board of the Journal of International Criminal justice and the Netherlands Yearbook of International Law.

Joris van Wijk is Associate Professor of Criminology at Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam where he received his Law and Criminology degree. In 2007 he obtained his PhD at this same university, with a study on irregular (asylum) migration from Angola to the Netherlands. In 2008, he was the recipient of the ESC Young Criminologist Award. He has previously worked as a coordinator for the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) and as independent consultant for Hoopoe Migration Expertise.

Elies van Sliedregt is Professor of Criminal Law, Dean of the Faculty of Law, and Director of the Center for International Criminal Justice at the Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam. She previously worked as associate professor at Leiden University and as a lecturer at Utrecht University and held visiting fellowships in Cambridge, Oxford, Bologna, and at the University of New South Wales, Sydney. She was a visiting professional with Chambers at the International Criminal Court (2010) and fellow-in-residence at the Netherlands Institute for Advanced Studies in the Humanities and Social Sciences (2011). She has published extensively in the field of international and European criminal law. She is inter alia author of 'Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law' (Oxford University Press, 2012) and co-editor of 'Pluralism in International Criminal Law' (with Sergey Vasiliev, Oxford University Press, 2014).

Sergey Vasiliev is Postdoctoral Researcher at Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam. From 2006 until 2012, he has worked as a research fellow at the Department of Criminal Law at the University of Amsterdam where he obtained his PhD (cum laude) with a work on the trial phase in international criminal proceedings. Since 2009, he has served a member and (managing) editor of the International Expert Framework on International Criminal Procedure (IEF). He has published widely in international criminal justice. He is inter alia co-editor of 'International Criminal Procedure: Principles and Rules' (Oxford University Press, 2012) and 'Pluralism in International Criminal Law' (Oxford University Press, 2014). He is a member of the editorial board of the Leiden Journal of International Law.

Deborah Ruiz Verduzco is Special Assistant to the President of the Assembly of States Parties to the International Criminal Court. She has previously served as Deputy Director of the International Law and Human Rights Programme of Parliamentarians for Global Action. She holds a PhD from the Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies in Geneva.

Leslie Vinjamuri is Co-director of the Centre for the International Politics of Conflict, Rights and Justice and a Senior Lecturer (Associate Professor) in International Relations at the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS) at University of London. She founded and Co-Chairs the London Transitional Justice Network. Prior to joining SOAS, she was on the faculty of the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University, and worked at the United States Agency for International Development, and Congressional Research Service. She has also been a Visiting Fellow at the Centre for the Study of Human Rights at the London School of Economics, and at the Olin Institute for Strategic Studies at Harvard University. She is the author of several articles and a contributor to many edited volumes on the international politics of conflict, norms, and rights related topics. Her current research projects include the politics and impact of international criminal justice and accountability, competition and change in the international humanitarian market, and the role of transitional justice in democratic transitions, religion and human rights, and UN Security Council Diplomacy. She is on the Editorial Board of the International Journal of Transitional Justice, a member of the Advisory Group of the Institute for Integrated Transitions and Associate Fellow on the U.S. Programme at Chatham House.

Thomas Weigend is Professor of Criminal Law and Criminal Procedure at the University of Köln (Cologne, Germany). He has published several books, as well as more than 100 articles in Germany and abroad, mostly on problems of (comparative) criminal procedure and international criminal law. He has been co-editor of the Zeitschrift für die gesamte Strafrechtwissenschaft since 1988, and member of the Board of Editors of Journal of International Criminal Justice since 2008.

Anna de Courcy Wheeler is Research analyst at the International Crisis Group. De Courcy Wheeler interned with the International Bar Association in London, worked with the Humanitarian Law Project at London School of Economics, and served as a researcher for multiple human rights organizations based in both America and the United Kingdom working on discrimination, minority and indigenous rights, and the interaction between human rights and humanitarian law. In 2007, she worked for African Rights in Rwanda, focusing her research efforts on the genocide and its aftermath, with a particular emphasis on the prosecution of sex crimes by the ICTR. Since then she has worked at NYU Law School, supporting the work of the UN special rapporteur on extrajudicial executions, and at Columbia University, where she was a research scholar at the Institute for the Study of Human Rights.

Alex Whiting is Professor of Practice at Harvard Law School. He teaches, writes and consults on domestic and international criminal prosecution issues. From 2010 until 2013, he was in the Office of the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Court in The Hague where he served first as the Investigations Coordinator, overseeing all of the investigations in the office, and then as Prosecutions Coordinator, overseeing all of the office's ongoing prosecutions. From 2002 to 2007, he was a Trial Attorney and then a Senior Trial Attorney with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in The Hague.

Introduction

More than a Court, Less than a Court, Several Courts in One?

The International Criminal Court in Perspective

*Carsten Stahn

1. The International Criminal Court and Crisis

The International Criminal Court (ICC) has been in existence for more than a decade. It has faced criticisms from many sides in its lifespan.[1] Shortcomings and risks of failure have been associated with the Court for almost two decades, yet it still stands, partly as a beacon of hope and partly as a symbol of deception. Before its establishment, the Court was said to have been crippled at birth due to its limited jurisdiction and lack of means of enforcement. This was gently captured by the image of the 'giant without arms and legs'.[2] After entry into force of the Rome Statute, the ICC managed to gain significant importance in international law and international relations, despite opposition or divided support by major powers (e.g. the USA, Russia, China). In particular, the Statute has seen unexpected successes. Although it is a compromise text with many imperfections,[3] it serves as a primus inter pares among treaty instruments in international criminal justice. It has been applied as a model in many contexts, judicial and non-judicial settings, inside and outside the ICC. But the ICC as an institution has stepped from crisis to crisis. Critiques have evolved in cycles.

When the Court started its activities, it was diagnosed with 'teething' problems.[4] First, there were problems related to timing issues, such as the long start-off phase, delayed action in relation to Darfur, and political mistakes, such as the London press conference of the Prosecutor with President Museveni at the beginning of the Ugandan situation. At five years, the ICC was criticized for performing poorly in comparison to the ad hoc tribunals,[5] with its failure partly being tied to performance problems. It was deplored that the Court had not 'yet' developed a deterrence capability.[6]

* Editor, Professor of International Criminal Law and Global Justice, Leiden University.

[1] For an account, see D Bosco, Rough Justice: The International Criminal Court in a World of Power Politics (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2014).

[2] See A Cassese, 'On the Current Trends towards Criminal Prosecution and Punishment of Breaches of International Humanitarian Law' (1998) 9 European Journal of International Law 13.

[3] See G Bitti, Chapter 21 in this volume.

[4] See A Cassese, 'Is the ICC Still Having Teething Problems?' (2006) 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice 434.

[5] See C Hall, 'Developing and Implementing an Effective Positive Complementarity Prosecution Strategy' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (The Hague: Brill, 2008), 219, 225.

[6] See C Bassiouni, 'The ICC—Qui Vadis?' (2006) 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice 421.

Dilemmas became more apparent with the commencement of the first trials. With its focus on one defendant and relatively narrow charges, the Lubanga case marked an apparently easy start for the Court. But it was on the verge of collapse throughout trial due to disputes over provider confidentiality and disclosure of exculpatory evidence, as well as non-disclosure of the identity of intermediaries by the Office of the Prosecutor (OTP).[7] These problems led to several stays of proceedings that nearly derailed the case. Other cases have advanced rather slowly. The docket of preliminary examinations has grown significantly over the years, with some high-profile situations, such as Iraq, Palestine, and Ukraine.[8] Several preliminary examinations (e.g. Colombia, Afghanistan) have endured for years, with few signs of progress. In Uganda, Darfur, and Libya, the issuance of warrants of arrest was perceived either as an obstacle to peace negotiations (e.g. the Juba talks, Sudanese peace negotiations) or as an impediment to a quick ending of conflict (e.g. exile for Gaddafi).[9] In cases where proceedings went ahead, ICC procedure triggered a flood of motions which engaged armies of lawyers from parties (Defence, Prosecution) and participants (Victims, States). In several instances, charges were not confirmed at pre-trial stage (e.g. Mbarushimana, Abu Garda, Kosgey and Hussein Ali), were withdrawn by the Prosecution (e.g. Muthaura), or failed to be supported by necessary evidence at trial (e.g. Ndugjolo Chui, Kenyatta). The Katanga conviction remained deeply split.[10]

This outcome is a partial victory for Defence strategies and testimony of the application of standards of fairness in proceedings, but it has caused significant concern relating to the work of the Prosecutor. The Prosecutor was blamed for outsourcing investigations, ill-founded speculation on political outcomes, and pursuing too much, too thinly.[11] Non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that counted among the most loyal supporters of the Court have partly turned against the Court. Prosecutorial strategy and means and modalities of investigations were called into question.[12] The effectiveness of the Court as a whole was more openly questioned.[13] This has triggered some review and internal reform, reflected in the Strategic Plan (2012–15) of the OTP[14] and the 'Lessons Learned' initiative.[15]

More fundamentally, some of the very foundations of ICC justice have come under challenge. Performance problems were followed by impact and perception problems. Victims were gradually frustrated by lack of communication, limited charges, delays, or [7] Alex Whiting, Chapter 40 in this volume.

[8] P Seils, Chapter 13 in this volume. On Palestine, see Chapter 8, in this volume.

[9] L Vinjamuri, Chapter 2 in this volume.

[10] See C Stahn, 'Justice Delivered or Justice Denied: The Legacy of the Katanga Judgment' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 809.

[11] S Sácouto and K Cleary Thompson, Chapter 14 in this volume; J Turner, Chapter 17 in this volume.

[12] N Hayes, Chapter 32 in this volume.

[13] See Expert Initiative on Promoting Effectiveness at the International Criminal Court, December 2014, at <http://ilawyerblog.com/wp-content/uploads/2014/12/Final-Report-Swiss-Expert-Group-2-Dec-2014.pdf>.

[14] OTP, Strategic Plan 2012–15, 11 October 2013, at <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/policies%20and%20strategies/Documents/OTP-Strategic-Plan-2012-2015.pdf>.

[15] P Ambach, Chapter 50 in this volume.

outcomes of proceedings.[16] Some judges contested the feasibility of criminal proceedings to provide an appropriate forum for restorative justice.[17] Ten years on,[18] ICC selection policy has been criticized for its reluctance to confront 'hard cases' that threaten powerful states,[19] and its inability to address the relationship between economic interests and criminal networks.[20] In Africa, the ICC was perceived as an instrument of Western politics or as an impediment to regional solutions.[21] The Court faced similar critiques to former colonial regimes, namely, equality concerns (e.g. afro-centricity), sovereignty objections (e.g. immunity of acting heads of states), and identity challenges. It prompted unintended side effects, such as threats of African States to withdraw from the Statute and the extension of the jurisdiction of the African Court on Justice and Human Rights to provide a regional solution to 'African problems'.

Initially, the Court was praised as an illustration of the obligation-related side of sovereignty, i.e. the claim that domestic sovereignty becomes answerable internally and externally[22] or even subject to jurisdictional substitution. But situations such as Kenya show that the ICC system is struggling to put this promise into practice. Investigation, evidence, and courtroom problems coincided with deep political controversies over the feasibility and impact of ICC action. The Prosecutor used its bargaining power and proprio motu authority to demonstrate that electoral violence is an impermissible means of maintaining state authority. But this ambition failed due to a number of interrelated factors, including evidentiary shortcomings, miscalculation of the effects of the charges, shifting public opinion over the ICC, witness problems, and cooperation struggles. Problems became thus more systemic. The termination of proceedings against Kenyatta and the deadlock in the Ruto case call into question a fundamental premise of ICC justice, namely, its very ability to successfully pursue cases against the will of a government in power.

A certain amount of faith was placed in the idea that the Court could overcome some its weaknesses (e.g. lack of jurisdiction over non-States Parties, cooperation problems) through support and interaction with the Security Council. But this relationship has been marked by friction and disappointment.[23] The Council effectively used the ICC as a drop box for unsettled human security problems in Darfur and Libya, while providing it with very limited means to succeed. None of the existing referrals have resulted in trial proceedings. The close nexus between the Security [16] On dichotomies and challenges, see S Kendall and S Nouwen, 'Representational Practices at the International Criminal Court: The Gap between Juridified and Abstract Victimhood' (2014) 76 Law and Contemporary Problems 235.

[17] See C Van den Wyngaert, 'Victims before International Criminal Courts: Some Views and Concerns of an ICC Trial Judge' (2012) 44 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 475.

[18] See A Ušacka, 'Promises Fulfilled? Some Reflections on the International Criminal Court in its First Decade' (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 473.

[19] See W A Schabas, Chapter 16 in this volume; id. 'The Banality of International Justice' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 545.

[20] See M Delmas-Marty, 'Ambiguities and Lacunae: The International Criminal Court Ten Years On' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 553.

[21] O Maunganidze and A Plessis, Chapter 4 in this volume.

[22] B Broomhall, International Justice and the International Criminal Court: Between Sovereignty and the Rule of Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003) 6.

[23] R Dicker, Chapter 1 in this volume; D Ruiz Verduzco, Chapter 3 in this volume. See also C Stahn, 'Marital Stress or Grounds for Divorce? Re-Thinking the Relationship Between R2P and International Criminal Justice' (2015) 26 Criminal Law Forum 13.

Council referral in Libya and the politics of intervention has triggered calls for greater separation of ICC justice and collective security, in order to protect the independence of the Court.[24] In December 2014 the ICC Prosecutor openly criticized the Council's lack of support and follow-up action in relation to Darfur, noting that there would be 'little or nothing to report' to the Council in the foreseeable future 'unless there is a change of attitude and approach'.[25]

2. Refining Premises and Narratives

This account of the first decade appears to present a rather grim picture of the status quo. As David Luban put it in 2013, the 'honeymoon' is over.[26] Much of the optimism associated with the Court at the turn of the millennium has turned into realism and, at times, scepticism. One might thus be tempted to say that, rather than managing crisis, the Court has been in a permanent state of crisis since its inception. But this judgment is deceptive. Reality is more nuanced.

2.1 Reality and perception

There is a strong discrepancy between expectation and reality. From the outside, the Court is often viewed as a unitary entity; it is seen as one voice (i.e. Hague Justice[27]), although it encompasses a spectrum of voices with partly competing interests. This unified makes the Court an easy target of criticism and vulnerable to unfair claims. The ICC is a highly diverse entity, with multiple identities. Its actions, outputs, and effects are the result of complex institutional processes and multiple dependent variables. It is misleading to criticize ICC effectiveness in relation to Court management or length of proceedings without determining relevant comparisons,[28] or taking into account resources and investment by the Assembly of States Parties.[29] Each situation is a universe of its own in terms of crime-base, complexity, structure, and context. Each stage of proceedings, i.e. preliminary examination, investigation, pre-trial,[30] trial,[31] and appeal,[32] has its own functions and methodologies. Outcomes cannot merely be judged by quantitative considerations, such as the number of convictions. Nor are ICC proceedings easily comparable to those of the highest courts in municipal systems or

[24] See L Arbour, 'Doctrines Derailed? Internationalism's Uncertain Future', at <http://www.crisisgroup.org/en/publication-type/speeches/2013/arbour-doctrines-derailed-internationalism-s-uncertain-future.aspx>.

[25] See Statement to the United Nations Security Council on the Situation in Darfur, pursuant to UNSCR 1593 (2005), 12 December 2014, at <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/otp/stmt-20threport-darfur.pdf>.

[26] D Luban, 'After the Honeymoon: Reflections on the Current State of International Criminal Justice' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 505.

[27] On geography images, see D Koller, '… and New York and The Hague and Tokyo and Geneva and Nuremberg and …: The Geographies of International Law' (2012) 23 European Journal of International Law 97.

[28] S Ford, Chapter 5 in this volume.

[29] J O'Donohue, Chapter 6 in this volume.

[30] I Stegmiller, Chapter 35 in this volume.

[31] H Friman, Chapter 36 in this volume.

[32] V Nerlich, Chapter 38 in this volume.

other international criminal courts and tribunals. ICC action is unique in some respects[33] and defies external comparison. It can only be viably judged over time.

All organs of the Court have different roles, functions, and constituencies which are governed by different checks and balances, hierarchies, and institutional pressures. Not everything that happens inside the Court is visible to the outside. Controversies on specific issues (e.g. investigation practices, disclosure,[34] Regulation 55,[35] function of the pre-trial) show that failure by one entity may mean partial success or even victory for another, or be an indication that judicial safeguards work. ICC action must thus be judged systemically, i.e. with regard to operational processes and institutional dynamics as a whole, rather than in an isolated fashion.[36]

Most importantly, the Court is not a single court, but multiple courts in one.[37] It is first and foremost a criminal court, but it encompasses aspects of inter-state litigation (e.g. complementarity), civil litigation (e.g. reparation[38]), human rights functions that go beyond fairness or fair trial protection (e.g. assessment and scrutiny of human rights violations), and certain general (prevention, deterrence[39]) and specific security-related functions (e.g. protection of witnesses and victims[40]). These functions involve different types of power[41]: coercive powers over individuals; formal and informal institutional powers (e.g. rules, procedures, decision-making affecting other actors); structural power, i.e. the ability to transform social reality through discourse and interaction; and productive power, i.e. the capacity to create new subjectivities (e.g. victim), stigmas (suspect, perpetrator), or labels (e.g. conflict,[42] crimes) through action.[43]

Most criticisms have been voiced in relation to the ICC's functioning as a criminal institution. With three final judgments, the trial record of the Court in its first decade is modest.[44] Existing trials (e.g. Lubanga, Njudgolo Chui, Katanga, Bemba) have presented challenges relating to fairness and expeditiousness of proceedings. While there are some indications that the ICC as a 'system of justice' enhances the prospects for greater application and adherence to law,[45] it remains difficult to provide hard scientific grounding for prevention and deterrence on the ground. Involvement of the Court in ongoing conflict has remained divisive in light of conflicting priorities and [33] On uniqueness and ICC procedure, see C Kress, 'The Procedural Law of the International Criminal Court in Outline: Anatomy of a Unique Compromise' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 603.

[34] K Khan and C Buisman, Chapter 41 in this volume.

[35] K Heller, Chapter 39 in this volume.

[36] On the ICC and the role of practice, see J Meierhenrich, 'The Practice of International Law: A Theoretical Analysis' (2014) 76 Law and Contemporary Problems 1.

[37] F Jessberger and J Geneuss, 'The Many Faces of the International Criminal Court' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1081; G P Fletcher and J D Ohlin, 'The ICC—Two Courts in One?' (2006) 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice 428.

[38] C McCarthy, Chapter 46 in this volume.

[39] N Grono and A de Courcy Wheeler, Chapter 47 in this volume.

[40] M Eikel, Chapter 44 in this volume.

[41] M Barnett and R Duvall, 'Power in International Politics' (2005) 59 International Organization 39.

[42] A Cullen, Chapter 30 in this volume.

[43] On stigmatization, see F Mégret, 'Practices of Stigmatization' (2014) 76 Law and Contemporary Problems 287.

[44] H Friman, Chapter 36 in this volume.

[45] For a study of complementarity, see C Stahn and M El Zeidy, The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2011).

competing interests of victim groups. Fears have been expressed that ICC intervention marginalizes or stifles other creative ways of addressing situations of mass atrocity.[46]

Despite these concerns, the ICC remains a persistent object of faith.[47] The threat of ICC investigation and prosecution is routinely used as a political argument (e.g. as a strategic tool), a human rights instrument (e.g. as leverage for international attention), or a factor mitigating guilt or failure. Its role navigates between salvation and apology. The ICC is part and parcel of justice discourse in almost any conflict situation. There is a quasi-automatic reflex by some actors to view the ICC as a solution to human security dilemmas. States and the Security Council use ICC jurisdiction to solve all kinds of societal conflict, ranging from the protection of civilians to electoral politics, gender biases, or specific patterns of victimization. Humanitarian actors promote ICC engagement to draw attention to human rights abuses or to strengthen accountability strategies. The imagined vision of the Court often transcends its actual capacity. The Court is presented or perceived as a giant, although it might de facto be no more than a paper tiger. Where ICC scrutiny is not present or not visible enough, its absence is partly deplored as a loss or even a failure (e.g. Syria, North Korea), triggering calls for alternative forms of action (e.g. fact-finding, hybrid courts).

The relationship between the ICC and human rights protection is governed by a similar paradox. The Court has a dual face: it is both a protective agent and a potential violator of human rights. The ICC has transformed dimensions of human rights discourse. Some scholars argue that international criminal trials improve human rights protection, e.g. through their normative impact and their catalytic effect on domestic justice and accountability approaches.[48] Certain victims and human rights actors associate participation and reparation with restorative features, such as material support or transformation of social reality, but ICC proceedings have also revealed significant human rights dilemmas.

Ethical dilemmas caused by ICC intervention, including agency, disengagement,[49] and care after trial, remain underdeveloped. Many of the victims recruited by intermediaries and NGOs have fallen off the radar after communication with the Court due to capacity and logistical problems, lack of nexus to the charges, and limited follow-up. The treatment of defendants has caused human rights concerns. The Court has claimed that 'deprivation of liberty should be an exception and not the rule'.[50] But due to the unwillingness of States to receive suspects, it has been put in a decision to hold defendants in custody, despite doubts as to the need for continued detention.[51]

[46] S Nouwen and W Werner, 'Monopolizing Global Justice: International Criminal Law as Challenge to Human Diversity' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 157.

[47] On the role of faith, see C Stahn, 'Between "Faith" and "Facts": By What Standards Should We Assess International Criminal Justice?' (2012) 25 Leiden Journal of International Law 251.

[48] E.g. K Sikkink, 'The Justice Cascade: How Human Rights Prosecutions are Changing World Politics' (New York: Norton, 2011).

[49] E Evenson and A Smith, Chapter 49 in this volume.

[50] A Dumbryte, Chapter 42 in this volume, Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa, Situation in the Central African Republic, Bemba, PTC II, ICC-01/05-01/08-475, 14 August 2009, para. 77.

[51] Ibid.

Similar dilemmas have arisen in relation to witnesses testifying before the ICC. Relocation of witnesses after testimony remains a continuing problem, since it requires States' consent and cooperation.[52] Asylum claims by detained witnesses in the Netherlands have created a 'catch 22' situation.[53] The Court found that it had no jurisdiction over the Detained Witnesses' asylum claims, 'as they fall within the sole purview of The Netherlands'.[54] Witnesses were held in the Court's detention unit for more than two years after completion of their testimony, until Dutch authorities agreed to host the witnesses once the decision on their asylum applications had been made.

2.2 Productive and irreconcilable tensions

The mandate of the Court is shaped by tensions and contradictions. Some of the Court's lofty primary goals (e.g. ending impunity, prevention) can at best be understood as optimization commands. Not all tensions can be solved. With its move from the periphery to the centre, the Court is likely to disappoint one group or entity, whatever it does.

Some alleged symptoms of crisis are productive tensions. One example is the interplay between law and politics.[55] The debate has moved in artificial binaries. In some cases (e.g. Darfur, Columbia), ICC action has been perceived as undue external interference by States; in other cases, inaction has been branded as undue non-interference. The Court has sought to gain legitimacy for unpopular choices by relying on its role as legal agent following the evidence, or shifting the burden onto others such as the UN (e.g. Palestine[56]). This strict separation between political and legal space is partly misleading.[57] Political choice and engagement with politics are an inherent and legitimate part of situation- and case-related analysis, such as selection strategy, assessment of context, arrest, charging policy, or security assessments. Reliance on legal formalism is not always the best strategy to demonstrate judicial or prosecutorial independence. Court inaction may be interpreted as a false sign of endorsement of violations by actors not targeted. Ultimately, ICC justifications may be more convincing and credible if difficult choices are properly explained and grounded in legal and policy [52] M Eikel, Chapter 44 in this volume. On preventive relocation, see Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the 'Decision on Evidentiary Scope of the Confirmation Hearing, Preventive Relocation and Disclosure under Article 67(2) of the Statute and Rule 77 of the Rules' of Pre-Trial Chamber I, Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-776, AC, 26 November 2011.

[53] J van Wijk and M Cupido, Chapter 43 in this volume, See G Sluiter, 'Shared Responsibility in International Criminal Justice: The ICC and Asylum' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 661.

[54] Order on the implementation of the cooperation agreement between the Court, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo concluded pursuant to Art 93(7) of the Statute, Njudgolo Chui, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04.02/12 A, AC, 20 January 2014, para. 24.

[55] K Rodman, 'Justice as a Dialogue between Law and Politics: Embedding the International Criminal Court within Conflict Management and Peacebuilding' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 437.

[56] M El Zeidy, Chapter 8 in this volume.

[57] S Nouwen and W Werner, 'Doing Justice to the Political: The International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan' (2010) 21 European Journal of International Law 941.

considerations, rather than legal categories (e.g. gravity) that do not always offer a proper fit.

A second productive tension is the relationship between the ICC and other jurisdictions. The ICC continues to be presented as a threat to domestic or other justice mechanisms. Overall, this is a healthy phenomenon. The Statute establishes a 'system of justice', and mandates the pursuit of justice but leaves some leeway as to where, when, and how by virtue of the complementarity principle. Complementarity does not require uniformity.[58] Competition over the choice of forum or the establishment of additional regional mechanisms illustrates that the system works. One of the main challenges of the future is to ensure that the Court and other jurisdictions positively complement each other's strengths, instead of mirroring each other's weaknesses.[59] There is a need to put in place structures and forms of action that allow two-way dialogue, reception, translation, and possible internalization of accountability strategies.[60] Otherwise, ICC justice may reproduce narratives that remain detached from local constituencies or leave superficial footprints.

Similar considerations apply in relation to the interplay between retributive and restorative justice.[61] The Statute contains traces of both and requires both; the two work in tandem. Restorative dimensions are typically invoked as a comparative advantage of the ICC when the case for ICC engagement is made. The focus on retributive features moves to the forefront when limitations of the Court are explained, or when the budget is negotiated. The essential question is what forms of punishment and sanction[62] ICC justice should allow in a specific case, and what restorative features it should promote.

Other tensions are more difficult to reconcile. Victim participation is one example,[63] marked by an inherent agency dilemma. The Court needs to satisfy conflicting imperatives, namely, to give voice to victims and mediate that voice through representation, neither of which can be sacrificed for the benefit of the other without altering the statutory framework. Another example is the peace versus justice debate.[64] In six out of eight situations (Democratic Republic of Congo, Central African Republic, Uganda, Darfur, Libya, and Mali) the Court has acted in ongoing violent political conflict. These challenges cannot be addressed solely on the premise that there can be no lasting peace without justice. ICC intervention causes immediate and mid-term effects that need to be more fully understood. The underlying tensions can be mitigated, but they cannot be solved, let alone by the ICC. They require continuing inquiry from both angles—peace and justice—and their respective constituencies. One of the challenges of the future is not to buy too easily into entrenched dichotomies, but rather to develop the shades of grey.

[58] C Stahn, Chapter 10 in this volume.

[59] H Van der Wilt, Chapter 9 in this volume. See also S Nouwen, Complementarity in the Line of Fire (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2013), 400 ('catalysing effect paradox').

[60] O Bekou, Chapter 48 in this volume.

[61] C Garbett, 'The Truth and the Trial: Victim Participation, Restorative Justice, and the International Criminal Court' (2013) 16 Contemporary Justice Review 193. See also Chapter 2 in this volume.

[62] M deGuzman, Chapter 37 in this volume.

[63] S Vasiliev, Chapter 45 in this volume.

[64] J Clark, 'Peace, Justice, and the International Criminal Court: Limitations and Possibilities' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 521.

3. The Law in Motion

The law of the ICC is clearly in motion. The ICC Statute differs from the legal framework of other international criminal courts and tribunals by its high degree of regulation and its commitment to precision (e.g. Elements of Crime). But the diversity of decisions, legal motions, and policy specifications in the ICC context shows how many issues have been left open or are in need of interpretation or clarification.

The work of the OTP has been subject to multiple criticisms, but the OTP deserves considerable praise for its transparency in clarifying prosecutorial strategy. The Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence are relatively silent on monitoring and assessment processes, criteria for selection of situations and cases, the scope of prosecutorial discretion, and options for judicial review. The OTP has shaped many new directions and approaches through policy papers and strategies that have been open to consultation and dialogue with NGOs and other stakeholders, and these serve as a paradigm example of how informal processes and subsequent institutional practice may inform treaty clarification and evolution.

In the context of the ad hoc tribunals, gaps in the law were closed through regulatory law-making by judges or Appeals Chamber jurisprudence. In the ICC context, the legal framework is both more predetermined and more decentralized. ICC practice has reversed the methodology of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) or the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR). The ICC Appeals Chamber has exercised caution and restraint,[65] while pre-trial chambers have served as forces of innovation and creation. Some dissents at pre-trial or trial (e.g. Judge Kaul on the 'policy' requirement of crimes against humanity,[66] Judge Ušacka on the 'same conduct test',[67] or Judge Van den Wyngaert on standards of proof[68] or construction of modes of liability[69]) count among the most significant contributions to jurisprudence.

The ICC has been relatively introverted. With a few exceptions (e.g. application of the 'overall control' test in the qualification of armed conflict, interpretation of material elements of crimes), the ICC has been cautious in relying on external sources. The most striking deviation from other courts and tribunals is the construction of modes of liability under Article 25. The ICC has devised a system which distinguishes principal and accessory liability by the contribution and degree of control over the crime, rather than subjective elements.[70] It has also considerably developed the concept of indirect perpetration,[71] and distinguished 'common purpose' liability under Article 25(3)(d) from the concept of 'Joint Criminal Enterprise',[72] applied by UN tribunals.

At the same time, there are striking parallels to other international courts and tribunals. Like other courts, the ICC struggles with certain issues, such as charging

[65] V Nerlich, Chapter 38 in this volume.
[66] D Robinson, Chapter 28 in this volume.
[67] C Stahn, Chapter 10 in this volume.
[68] S De Smet, Chapter 34 in this volume.
[69] E Van Sliedregt, Chapter 20 in this volume.
[70] J D Ohlin, Chapter 21 in this volume; H Olásolo and E Carnero Rojo, Chapter 23 in this volume.
[71] T Weigend, Chapter 22 in this volume.
[72] K Ambos, Chapter 24 in this volume.

practice,[73] disclosure, including disclosure of exculpatory evidence, fact-finding at trial, and sentencing.[74]

4. Structure and Content of the Book

This book examines ICC practice, including its reception and critiques. It differs partly from commentaries,[75] since it does not merely present the status quo of law and jurisprudence, but also seeks to present ICC practices, approaches, and challenges in context. Contributors combine analysis with proposals to refine or improve the law. The chapters reflect different, and sometimes divergent, positions on key aspects of ICC practice. The work includes academic voices and practitioners from different contexts (e.g. Judiciary, Prosecution, Defence, NGOs). Some contributions (e.g. Chapters 15 and 16, Chapters 40 and 41) stand in dialogue with each other in order to reflect different strands of opinion.

This work is organized by six major themes that will continue to evolve in years to come: (i) the context of ICC investigations and prosecutions; (ii) the relationship to domestic jurisdictions; (iii) prosecutorial policy and practice; (iv) the ICC's applicable law; (v) fairness and expeditiousness of proceedings; and (vi) impact and lessons learned.

4.1 Context, challenges, and constraints

Part I of the book puts existing controversies and dilemmas into perspective, and analyses the four major challenges that the Court faced in its operation in its first decade: the interplay with collective security and regional organizations, engagement in ongoing conflict, funding, and governance issues.

In his opening chapter, Richard Dicker addresses the double standards of international criminal justice. He argues that more equal application of the ICC Statute may be facilitated through greater coherence and less selectivity in Security Council decisions on referrals, changing and strengthening the substantive text of referring resolutions, and better follow-up. Leslie Vinjamuri examines the tension between the ICC and peace and justice. She endorses justice intervention in principle, but argues that it should be deployed in circumstances where it is likely to deliver both more peace and more justice. Deborah Ruiz Verduzco analyses the controversial relationship between the ICC and the Security Council. She claims that the ICC has been predominantly treated as an instrument of the Council, to the detriment of two other modes of interaction: institutional autonomy and strengthening of ICC action through collective security structures. Chapter 4 explores the relationship between the Court and the

[73] C-F Stuckenberg, Chapter 33 in this volume; K Heller, Chapter 39 in this volume.

[74] M deGuzman, Chapter 37 in this volume.

[75] A Cassese, P Gaeta, and J R W D Jones (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002); O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Observers' Notes, Article by Article, 2nd edn (Baden-Baden: Nomos, 2008); W A Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010).

African Union, and discusses the origin and foundation of divergent positions (e.g. head of state immunity and cooperation duties) and the extension of jurisdiction of the African Court on Justice and Human Rights. It cautions against an oversimplification of 'African' views, arguing that a broad understanding of complementarity emerging in Africa is key to the success of international criminal justice on the continent. Stuart Ford deals with the issue of funding and its relationship to effectiveness. His analysis suggests that the ICC is less efficient than the ICTY at conducting trials. He concedes that the structural differences between the two entities make it difficult to draw accurate comparisons. Chapter 6 examines the link between the Court and the Assembly of States Parties (ASP), and provides a differentiated picture. It argues that the ASP had a positive impact on some aspects of the law and practice, such as efficiency, accountability for misconduct, complementarity, and cooperation, and stresses that the ASP must respect the independence of the Prosecutor and the Judiciary, the importance of the work of the ICC, and the integrity of the Statute.

4.2 Relationship to domestic jurisdictions

Part II of the book examines the relationship of the ICC to domestic jurisdictions, which has come under challenge. In multiple situations (Democratic Republic of Congo, Kenya, Libya), the Court has been criticized for transforming complementarity into primacy through its reading of Article 17 and the interpretation of the 'same conduct' test. Jurisprudence on jurisdictional issues, immunity, and the relationship to non-Parties States remain contested. This second part considers the core issues of debate: jurisdictional and conceptual dilemmas related to the distinction between 'situation' and cases, the interpretation of complementarity, and cooperation.

Rod Rastan analyses the jurisdictional regime of the ICC, including jurisdiction ratione materiae, ratione personae, ratione loci, and ratione temporis. He clarifies that jurisdictional parameters are relevant not only for the Court's competence, but also for the nexus between specific alleged acts and the situation under consideration. Mohamed El Zeidy examines dilemmas of declarations under Article 12(3) based on discussion of the case of Palestine. He argues that the Court should take responsibility for resolving questions of a purely judicial nature (jurisdictional questions), instead of 'dumping' them on the United Nations or on the ASP. Harmen van der Wilt addresses controversies over the practice of self-referrals in Chapter 9, claiming that the Court has largely side-stepped the issue of inability in its admissibility assessments. Chapter 10 revisits admissibility challenges, and argues that the modalities of deference to domestic jurisdiction need to be refined in order to take into account the process-based nature of complementarity and challenges in situations of transition. It suggests that ICC practice should pay greater attention to 'qualified deference', i.e. management of parallel proceedings, strengthening of monitoring structures, and clarification of conditions of deference. Robert Cryer examines problems arising in the relationship between the ICC and non-States Parties. He argues that principles such as the duty not to evade treaty obligation under the UN Charter, ex injuria jus non oritur, or estoppel might provide justification for the Court to disregard immunity in the context of Security Council referrals. He concludes that the ICC is largely dependent on the goodwill of non-States Parties in the absence of coercive powers or Council support. Dov Jacobs addresses the relationship between immunities and State cooperation, including the interplay between Articles 27 and 98 of the Statute. He identifies possible legal avenues to circumvent the obstacles posed by immunities, which include reference to customary international law, analysis of the powers of the UN Security Council, and the Genocide Convention.

4.3 Prosecutorial policy and practice

ICC prosecutorial strategy has brought some innovations, in terms of analysis, investigative methods, or approaches to complementarity and cooperation. Particular aspects (e.g. selection criteria, use of intermediaries, sequencing of investigations, disengagement strategy) have been subject to criticism, and some are under review. Part III of this book examines the principles and policies of ICC prosecutorial practice, combining perspectives from within and outside the Court. It covers key aspects of prosecutorial strategy, including preliminary examination, investigation, selection of situations and cases, and prosecutorial accountability.

Preliminary examination has turned into one of the most important and powerful instruments of prosecutorial practice.[76] The OTP has been criticized for opening too many situations without follow-up and lacking effectiveness in promoting national proceedings. Paul Seils, former Senior Analyst at the OTP, proposes an adjustment of policies. He argues that the OTP should make more constructive use of ambiguity, keep situations under investigation until the State has taken reasonable steps to address cases, and take a more assertive stand on the analysis of national proceedings. Chapter 14 examines problematic aspects of investigative practices that have been identified by the judges of the Court and outside observers, and offers targeted recommendations to improve organization and administration of the OTP, investigative teams, and collection of evidence. Fabricio Guariglia and Emeric Rogier provide an OTP perspective on the practice and criteria guiding the selection of situations and cases, noting that cases chosen should present, whenever possible, a representative sample of forms of victimization. They defend a wide conception of prosecutorial discretion under Article 53, arguing that disagreements as to where the Prosecutor is focusing her investigative and prosecutorial efforts are outside the ambit of judicial review. William Schabas presents a different perspective. He criticizes the coherence of prosecutorial choices and charging practice based on an analysis of ICC criteria (e.g. gravity) and methods, and argues that existing practice has made the ICC vulnerable to criticisms of selective justice and politicization, for example with respect to Palestine and Iraq. Jenia Turner addresses the issue of accountability of prosecutors, which is only randomly treated in practice. She argues that the ICC should adopt a structured balancing approach in relation to prosecutorial misconduct, including internal bureaucratic controls within the OTP, judicial intervention, and disciplinary measures by the ASP, the Independent Oversight Mechanism (IOM), and national or international bar associations.

[76] OTP, Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations, November 2013, at <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/Documents/OTP%20Preliminary%20Examinations/OTP%20-%20Policy%20Paper%20Preliminary%20Examinations%20%202013.pdf>.

4.4 The ICC and its applicable law

The subsequent part of the book is devoted to the ICC and its applicable law. ICC practice offers fresh perspectives on the theorization and conception of crimes, charges, and individual criminal responsibility. This jurisprudence has repercussions for domestic law, criminal theory, and the law of other international courts and tribunals. Part IV examines the contribution of ICC practice to three core areas: the treatment of sources, the interpretation of modes of liability, and the adjudication of 'core crimes'. Finally, it reflects critically on the choices taken in existing practice.

Gilbert Bitti considers Article 21 and the hierarchy of sources. He shows that the drafters introduced a 'a multiplicity of hierarchies', namely, a hierarchy between the different formal sources of law in Article 21(1), between formal and material sources of law in Article 21(3), and between the different sources of law described in Article 21(1)(a). He examines how the ICC interpreted and applied internal law and external sources. Joseph Powderly addresses statutory interpretation and the space for judicial creativity, and concludes that judges managed to breathe life into the law, despite the required focus on textualism and sources under Article 21 and the rule of strict construction under Article 22(2).

The following chapters provide a detailed discussion of individual criminal responsibility. Elies van Sliedregt introduces the structure of Article 25, its doctrinal specificities, and controversies over the application of the control of the crime theory in the Lubanga, Katanga, and Bemba cases. She pleads for greater grounding of existing interpretive approaches in the text of the Statute, cautioning that the law should not be moulded to fit the facts. Jens David Ohlin situates current doctrines on co-perpetration within a historical context and an emerging international Dogmatik. He argues that the ICC should not be blamed for relying on German doctrine, including Claus Roxin's control theory. He submits that the Court has done insufficient work to justify its methodology and properly ground its importation of domestic criminal law theory within a general theory of sources of international law. Thomas Weigend analyses the concept of indirect perpetration, including ICC approaches on perpetration through an organization[77] and indirect co-perpetration. He argues that ICC practice should concentrate more closely on the key requirement of indirect perpetration: control over another person. Chapter 23 considers the accessorial forms of liability under Article 25(3)(b) and (c), and examines the differences in the material and mental elements of ordering, instigating, planning, and aiding and abetting, also in relation to other international courts and tribunals. It shows that the accessory must make use of a 'position of authority' over the perpetrator only in cases of liability for ordering under [77] C Roxin, 'Crimes as Part of Organized Power Structures' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 193.

Article 25(3)(b), while instigators, planners, and aiders and abettors are not required to enjoy the same degree of influence. Kai Ambos explores common purpose liability under Article 25(3)(d), including the relevant contribution required. He makes it clear that the provision is distinct from the concept of 'Joint Criminal Enterprise' as applied by the UN ad hoc tribunals, and that it does not cover responsibility for mere membership in a criminal or terrorist organization, as envisaged in Nuremberg. He argues that it is necessary to develop further normative criteria, such as legality/illegality or risk creation, in order to deal with the controversial problem of 'neutral' acts of assistance. Alejandro Kiss discusses the concept of command responsibility under Article 28, which was developed to hold individuals in positions of authority responsible for mass criminality. He covers the unique features of the ICC regime and main legal controversies, including the superior–subordinate relationship, the requirement of effective control, the duties imposed on commanders and superiors, the role of causation, and the mental element. This contribution is followed by an in-depth treatment of the mental elements of crimes by Mohamed Badar and Sara Porro in Chapter 26. The authors discuss ICC interpretation of Article 30, including the treatment of dolus eventualis, recklessness, and wilful blindness, as well as the implications of the opening clause ('Unless otherwise provided'). They show that the ICC contains a strict regime on dolus, which excludes extensive forms of risk-taking.

Subsequent contributions deal with different categories of crimes and charging practice. The concept of genocide has only received marginal attention in ICC practice. Claus Kress discusses the definition, structure, and elements of the crime in light of the Bashir jurisprudence. His analysis supports the view that genocide requires the existence of a real danger for the targeted group and the need for the existence of a planned genocidal campaign. He criticizes the superficial treatment of the intent versus knowledge debate in the Pre-Trial Chamber decision on Bashir, and argues in favour of a knowledge-based approach, which embodies the concept of realistic genocidal intent, using the Eichmann case as an example. Darryl Robinson treats the controversy over the interpretation of the policy element under crimes against humanity. In existing scholarship, most attention has been devoted to the question whether the organization behind a policy must be state-like. He focuses instead on broader problematic trends in the early jurisprudence of the ICC (e.g. Gbagbo, Mbarushimana), and argues that ICC jurisprudence has conflated policy with 'systematic' and infused the policy element with exceedingly formalized requirements or ulterior purposes. Michael Newton examines the war crimes provisions from a military perspective, showing that the structure of Article 8 and its accompanying Elements of Crimes were intentionally designed to comport with the historical understandings embedded in established jus in bello. He defends the view that certain compromises, such as the treatment of collateral damage under Article 8(2)(b)(iv), are grounded in international humanitarian law. He cautions against judicial creativity that might detach statutory interpretation from reality in combat. Chapter 30 examines the qualification of the nature of the armed conflict and its impact on the exercise of subject-matter jurisdiction over war crimes. The ICC relied significantly on concepts derived from case-law of the ICTY in the interpretation of the notion of armed conflict and the application of the 'overall control test'. It concludes that maintaining the integrity of armed conflict as a concept of international humanitarian law is one of the greatest challenges facing the Court in the longer term. The crime of aggression is analysed by Roger Clark, who was closely involved in the negotiation process. He presents details of the Kampala Amendments and the efforts to obtain the necessary ratifications. He concludes that States ratifying the Kampala Amendments should implement Article 8*bis* and its Elements as closely as possible, and provide jurisdiction at least over crimes by their own nationals.

The last two contributions in Part IV deal with charging practice. Niamh Hayes provides a critical perspective on ICC approaches relating to sexual and gender-based violence. She argues that the record of the ICC has been 'just as fraught and frustrating as its predecessors', despite innovations of the Statute and new hopes raised by the 2014 OTP Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes.[78] According to her analysis, investigations and prosecutions suffered from deficient evidence and investigation strategies, uncertainties relating to modes of liability, and 'conservative' interpretations of crimes and legal characterizations by the Pre-Trial Chamber. Carl Friedrich Stuckenberg covers the problem of cumulative charges and convictions, which has not received enough attention in doctrine and practice. He makes the case that future practice should develop criteria beyond the 'logical inclusion' theory, to which the Blockburger and Čelebići tests refer.

4.5 Fairness and expeditiousness of proceedings

Criminal procedure has become ever more important and complex in past years,[79] and is a foundation of fairness and expeditiousness of proceedings. The procedural system of the ICC draws on features of common law and the Romano-Germanic tradition, but moves in many respects towards a sui generis regime. Part V examines pre-trial, trial, sentencing, appeals, as well as evidence and disclosure problems. It then reviews institutional practices relating to victims and witnesses and neglected problems, such as interim release.

The opening chapter by Simon De Smet discusses the issue of standard of proof which cuts across proceedings. He argues that determination of standards of proof involves two different elements: identification of the relevant model of judicial fact-finding, and a balancing exercise to determine where to set the applicable standard. He demonstrates that the subjective approach applied by the ICC makes it difficult to identify and correct mistakes, since it offers no benchmark for what is reasonable and what is not in the context of fact-finding. Ignaz Stegmiller analyses the confirmation of charges process at the ICC, which marks an intermediary phase between investigation and trial. The function and effectiveness of this mechanism remains contested. He argues that the confirmation decision should primarily serve as a filter to determine whether a case should be sent to trial; it might also contribute to trial preparation, but should not turn into a 'mini-trial' or pre-adjudicate guilt or innocence. Håkan Friman follows up with a general analysis of the relationship between pre-trial and trial, based on experiences in ICC practice. He takes the view that the trial forms the centre of gravity in criminal proceedings and that the Trial Chamber should be the 'master of its own proceedings', including crucial parts of trial preparation. Like Stegmiller, he argues that the Pre-Trial Chamber has a limited role in coordinating disclosure, redactions, or admissibility of evidence for the purpose of trial. Margaret deGuzman discusses dilemmas of sentencing in Chapter 37, and suggests that the ICC should develop a theory of proportionate punishment to increase the perceived legitimacy of its sentencing judgments. She takes the position that sentences should be better explained and aimed at global crime prevention, rather than at local justice objectives. Volker Nerlich examines the role and approaches of the ICC Appeals Chamber, including its marked differences to the ad hoc tribunals. He shows that the ICC Appeals Chamber has exercised judicial restraint in decision-making by adopting a strict approach to the 'material effect' requirement under Article 83(2) and providing minimal reasoning. He justifies this practice by several considerations, including the density of legal regulation at the ICC, the strategic advantage of step-by-step development of the law, which leaves room for growth, and the comparative lack of hierarchy among Chambers at the ICC.

[78] OTP, Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes, June 2014, at <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/otp/OTP-Policy-Paper-on-Sexual-and-Gender-Based-Crimes--June-2014.pdf>.

[79] See G Sluiter, H Friman, S Linton, S Vasiliev, and S Zappalà, International Criminal Procedure: Principles and Rules (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2013); C Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012).

The following contributions address particular procedural issues. Kevin Heller examines ICC practice in relation to Regulation 55. He argues that the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Trial Chamber have routinely applied the Regulation in a manner that undermines both prosecutorial independence and the accused's right to a fair trial. Alex Whiting discusses disclosure problems from a prosecutorial perspective, and argues that imperfection is inherent in disclosure processes given the complexity of the task and institutional limitations. He notes that the 'core of the disclosure' can be provided in advance, but stresses the need for some continuing disclosure on a 'rolling basis' in light of gradual refinement and review of the Prosecution and the Defence cases. Karim Khan and Caroline Buisman provide a Defence perspective. They agree with Whiting that the OTP must 'focus on devising an adequate disclosure system to manage … disclosure challenges', but argue that a complete review of the current ICC disclosure regime is necessary, since it often remains difficult for the Defence to even grasp the factual matrix of the case. They propose firm and final deadlines and full disclosure as a rule. Chapter 42 addresses ICC practice in relation to interim release. It argues that existing jurisprudence fails to strike an appropriate balance between the right of the accused to liberty and the effective administration of justice, since it makes interim release de facto impossible. Judges should give greater importance to the conduct and personal circumstances of the defendant, rather than to factors that are beyond his/her control or common to all cases (e.g. advanced stage of proceedings, potential support for the defendant).

Chapters 43 and 44 discuss the role and protection of witnesses. Joris van Wijk and Marjolein Cupido examine the dispute over asylum applications of detained witnesses, and argue that the threat of future asylum applications could hamper the functioning of the ICC in light of the lack of coordination of different protection regimes. They propose three possible solutions: protective measures for detained witnesses in their home countries; video-link testimony; and rogatory commissions—all of which retain a risk that detained witnesses will not testify. Markus Eikel analyses the ICC framework relating to protection of witnesses and identifies two main weaknesses of the Court's protection system: lack of internal coordination and lack of external support (e.g. state cooperation, budgetary constraints). He proposes a comprehensive inter-organ approach for protective measures in order to improve the status quo of protection.

Chapters 45 and 46 cover victims who play a crucial role in ICC procedure. The input and status of victims as independent voices in ICC proceedings have triggered complex litigation. Sergey Vasiliev revisits ICC approaches towards victim participation, and argues that participation is inherently tied to collective forms of application, participation, and representation. He proposes a greater realignment with the Court's criminal mandate, notably the determination of truth. Conor McCarthy addresses the ICC reparation regime, including early ICC practice, and the tension between fairness and consistency in the treatment of victims and the effectiveness of remedies. He argues that reparations and social or humanitarian assistance serve different purposes that should be carefully distinguished, and pleads for a system of redress that supports rather than substitutes measures at the domestic level.

4.6 Impact, legacy, and lessons learned

The final part of the book engages with the larger issues of impact and legacy, studies the goals and effects of ICC intervention, and identifies potential exit strategies from situations. It also explores options for review of ICC practices.

Nick Grono and Anna de Courcy Wheeler analyse whether and under what conditions ICC engagement curtails the action of government or rebel leaders, based on practice in existing situations. They claim that the prospect of ICC prosecution may be one of a range of domestic and international factors that affect strategic calculation, and conclude that the success or failure of the ICC in deterring atrocity crimes rests to a large degree on its ability to pursue successful prosecutions. Olympia Bekou revisits the effect of the ICC on domestic jurisdiction and problems of capacity-building, arguing that the success of the ICC as a mechanism of accountability relies on the strength of national legal orders. She claims that national justice institutions should not imitate the ICC, but rather serve the needs of the societies they represent, while complying with requisite international standards. Elizabeth Evenson and Alison Smith study possible ICC disengagement strategies for the ICC from situations. They distinguish ICC closure of situations from completion strategies in the context of other international or internationalized tribunals, but also identify lessons in three key areas: capacity-building, outreach, and archive management. They recommend early planning, consultation with affected communities and national authorities, and strengthening of domestic jurisdiction as part of ICC disengagement. The final chapter in this book by Philipp Ambach addresses future challenges and lessons learned. He examines initiatives of the Court and the ASP to review ICC approaches and procedures, and suggests that flaws in criminal procedures should be corrected through revision of procedural practices and regulations, rather than statutory amendment.

5. Not a Conclusion

The sheer number of topics and themes treated in this volume illustrates that the ICC has come a long way. With institutional growth, the visibility of the ICC has grown. Its identity has become more diverse and its effects have become more contested. The Court is in a process of transformation. This process involves experimentation, partial deconstruction, and re-invention. There is still a long way to go until the Court reaches some of its ambitious goals and meets expectations.

Some assumptions need to be revised. The very idea of the ICC, and its imagined action, continue to reform international relations, but its actual role is rather modest. The Court does not provide a solution to many problems with which it is associated. Some of the most important contributions of the ICC lie on a broader normative level (i.e. social alarm, impact on discourse, etc.), and have long-term effects rather than providing immediate conflict resolution or actual law enforcement. ICC engagement has a spin-over effect on treatment of accountability in the human rights context or other fields (e.g. humanitarian law, transitional justice, development), although doubts remain as to whether and how the Court can contribute to political stabilization or reconciliation.

In many contexts, the ICC is only one among many concurrent factors driving change. Most attention is devoted to ICC action, which is visible in the structure of the Statute (e.g. triggering procedure, Article 53) and studies on ICC intervention. One important lesson is that inaction may be as equally important as action, and that both can produce positive and negative effects that need to be carefully evaluated and studied.

ICC procedures serve only partially as an example for domestic or local structures. The Court has set a limited demonstration effect through its own investigations and prosecution. Procedures and approaches in some areas (e.g. preliminary examination, investigation, Court management, fact-finding and evidence, victims) may need to be further revised. Critical self-scrutiny is a necessary first step towards reform. Voices of dissent, inside and outside the Court, are a natural and healthy illustration of this process.

Complementarity is fundamental to many aspects of the Court's work (e.g. admissibility, prevention, protective measures, reparation, exit strategy); it is a two-way street. The Court needs to leave sufficient space for pluralism and diversity. Domestic jurisdictions should be cautious in replicating ICC models and approaches. ICC definitions and structures require adaption to context.

After more than a decade, the Court is neither at the beginning of its end (as predicted by some) nor at the end of its beginning. Its history continues to be written, and it needs to be rewritten. This volume is part of this process. It is testimony to the changing nature of the Court and provides perspectives on some of the factors and actors that drive this process. To be continued …

PART I

CONTEXT, CHALLENGES, AND CONSTRAINTS

1

The International Criminal Court (ICC) and Double Standards of International Justice

*Richard Dicker

1.1 Introduction

The ICC faces a profound challenge in applying its mandate worldwide. The landscape on which the Court works is uneven and marked by double standards of justice. In the Court's first decade, the equal application of law to all those who may be responsible for 'the most serious crimes of concern to the international community'[1] has not been possible. Those who represent the most powerful states are beyond its reach and are unlikely to find themselves the target of an ICC arrest warrant. These governments also protect states with whom they share close economic, political, or security interests.

One actor influencing the Court's reach to those in states that have not ratified the ICC Statute is the United Nations (UN) Security Council. It is authorized, acting according to Chapter VII of the UN Charter, to refer situations to the Court's Prosecutor.[2] The Council has used this 'referral' authority twice[3] and rejected it once.[4] The Council's practice has been deeply flawed. The referrals have prompted criticism that the resulting investigations and prosecutions are tainted by their genesis in a political body and diminish the Court.

* Director, International Justice Program, Human Rights Watch.

[1] Preamble Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force on 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[2] Arts 12 and 13 ICC Statute. See generally L Condorelli and S Villalpando, 'Referral and Deferral by the Security Council' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 627–56; D Akande, 'The Legal Nature of Security Council Referrals to the ICC and its Impact on Al Bashir's Immunities' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 333–52; J Trahan, 'The Relationship between the International Criminal Court and the UN Security Council: Parameters and Best Practices' (2013) 24 Criminal Law Forum 417–73; The Relationship between the ICC and the Security Council: Challenges and Opportunities, International Peace Institute (2013) <http://www.regierung.li/files/medienarchiv/icc/IPI_E-Pub-Relationship_Bet__ICC_and_SC__2__01.pdf?t=635522210891596707> accessed 11 September 2014. See also D Ruiz Verduzco, Chapter 3, in this volume.

[3] UNSC Res 1593 (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/RES/1593; UNSC Res 1970 (26 February 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1970. On the Sudan referral, see R Cryer, 'Sudan, Resolution 1593, and International Criminal Justice' (2006) 19 Leiden Journal of International Law 195. On the Libya referral, see C Stahn, 'Libya, the ICC and Complementarity: A Test for "Shared Responsibility"' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 325–51. See also D Ruiz Verduzco, Chapter 3 in this volume.

[4] 'Russia, China Block Security Council Referral of Syria to International Criminal Court', UN News Centre, 22 May 2014.

Security Council practice has shown three distinct negative features: (i) selectivity, (ii) substantive shortcomings in the referral resolutions, and (iii) the lack of meaningful follow-up. The Council mandates Court investigations in some situations like Darfur and Libya, but has rejected a referral of Syria. It has not even considered referring Sri Lanka. As a result, the Court is depicted as a tool of the permanent members—especially the United States.[5] This permanent member advocates justice for the most serious international crimes in certain situations, but not others. Using the Council, it is seen as pursuing a political agenda against weaker actors.[6] Meanwhile, the Russians and the Chinese have protected allies in Damascus and Colombo. The referral resolutions have also contained disturbing concessions to the United States that exacerbate discrepancies in the equal application of the ICC Statute.[7] Furthermore, following its two referrals, the Council has done little to support the Court in implementing the very judicial mandate that it triggered. Linked to changed political circumstances on the ground[8] or lack of agreement among the permanent members,[9] this fickle support contributes to the perception that the ICC is an instrument to achieve political objectives desired by Council permanent members. This reality has given rise to intense debate.

1.2 Context

Accountability for the most serious crimes through international judicial mechanisms emerged for the first time after the Second World War with the Nuremberg and Tokyo tribunals.[10] The Nuremberg tribunal, more than the Tokyo tribunal, created a positive judicial legacy.[11] The trials in Nuremberg were unprecedented and represented a seismic shift towards accountability in the face of unspeakable crimes on an incomprehensible scale. For the first time ever, senior leaders were held to account in legal proceedings for massive crimes. The accused had legal counsel who were able to conduct a vigorous defence. While the tribunals undoubtedly prosecuted the most serious crimes committed, the allies' own wartime actions went unexamined.[12] There was no serious consideration of investigating potential criminal liability for the mass rape of German women, the fire-bombing of Hamburg and Dresden, and the nuclear

[5] See generally W Schabas, 'The Banality of International Justice' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 545–51.

[6] See e.g. 'Sudan Reiterates Rejection of ICC Proceedings', Sudan Vision, 18 June 2014.

[7] See UNSC Resolutions 1593 (2005) and 1970 (2011) (n 3), operative para. 6.

[8] Three years after referral, the Security Council has yet to make any statements about Libya's obligation to cooperate with the ICC arrest warrants.

[9] Differences between the Council's permanent members have precluded any statement on Sudan's failure to cooperate with Security Council Resolution 1593 (n 3).

[10] T Taylor, The Anatomy of the Nuremberg Trials: A Personal Memoir (New York: Alfred A Knopf 1992); A Neier, The International Human Rights Movement: A History (Princeton: Princeton University Press 2012), 127.

[11] The IMTFE was established by a Proclamation issued by Allied Supreme Commander General Douglas MacArthur. MacArthur made the decision not to try Japanese Emperor Hirohito. The presiding judge was appointed by General MacArthur. See P Maguire, Law and War: An American Story (New York: Columbia University Press 2000).

[12] See G Mettraux, Perspectives on the Nuremberg Trial (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008).

devastation of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. While creating an invaluable precedent, international criminal justice for the most serious crimes was born with the mark of 'victor's justice'. The victors tried the vanquished and ignored the possible criminality of some of their own acts.[13] Along with Nuremberg's enduring accomplishments, this provenance was frozen in place for 40 years amid the paralysis of the Cold War.

In 1993 and 1994 the Security Council created two ad hoc tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda.[14] This new application of Security Council authority to maintain international peace security through the creation of ad hoc tribunals triggered the revival of international criminal justice for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. These tribunals were a hoped-for step beyond the 'victor's justice' of the post-war international military tribunals. The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) was mandated, before the end of the Balkans conflict, to try those responsible regardless of ethnic or political association.[15] The tribunal, to its great credit, implemented that mandate. Unfortunately, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) prosecuted only those from the Hutu side and failed to investigate crimes believed to have been committed by the Rwandan Patriotic Front.[16] The ICTY indicted Croats, Serbs, and Bosniaks.[17] Nevertheless, because of the ethnic polarization in the communities most affected by the crimes, the tribunal was disparaged by many in the countries of the accused, and because the majority of indictees were Serb, the ICTY was harshly criticized in Belgrade. As the tribunal's work progressed and senior Bosnian Serb and Serbians were indicted, Russia became increasingly critical of the tribunal. This contrasted sharply with Western pressure on Belgrade to arrest and surrender indictees.[18]

The back-to-back genocides in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda and the creation of the two ad hoc tribunals prompted the recognition of the need for a permanent Court created by multilateral treaty negotiations, as opposed to Security Council resolution, that could respond to recurring mass atrocity crimes. In November 1994 the General Assembly's Sixth Committee decided to create an ad hoc committee to consider the draft text of a treaty for a permanent international criminal Court that had been finalized by the International Law Commission (ILC) that summer.[19] Negotiations on the ICC draft treaty got under way at UN Headquarters in April 1995.[20]

[13] Maguire (n 11) 151; G Bass, Stay the Hand of Vengeance (Princeton: Princeton University Press 2000), 203.

[14] Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute'); Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute').

[15] See generally W Schabas, The UN International Criminal Tribunals: The Former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Sierra Leone (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2006); B Swart et al., The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011).

[16] The ICTR indicted no members of the victorious Rwandan Peoples' Front.

[17] The ICTY also indicted Macedonians and Kosovar Albanians.

[18] The European Union and the United States used economic and diplomatic pressure on Serbia to arrest and surrender ICTY indictees. See V Peskin, International Justice in Rwanda and the Balkans: Virtual Trials and the Struggle for State Cooperation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2008).

[19] Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its 46th session, 2 May–22 July 1994, UN Doc A/CN.4/SER.A/1994/Add.l (Part 2) in (1994) 2 Yearbook of the International Law Commission 15.

[20] Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 50th Session, Supp. No. 11, UN Doc A/50/22, 6 September 1995. See M Bassiouni (ed.), The Legislative History

Significantly, these negotiations followed or coincided with the demise of repressive governments in several states in the Global South and the end of the Cold War. Dictatorial regimes in Argentina, Chile, South Africa, and South Korea were replaced by governments supportive of human rights and the rule of law. This shift had a profound positive impact on the negotiations finalizing an ICC treaty. Driven by their own recent and difficult transition from repression to the rule of law, government delegations and civil society groups from these states energetically participated in the ICC negotiations. They were at the core of the 'like-minded group' of states that emerged in 1996. These governments infused an intangible yet distinct dynamism into the ICC drafting process between 1996 and 2002 that helped break down a sense of north–south divide.[21] A broad multi-regional like-minded group emerged to drive the effort for a fair, effective, impartial, and independent Court. This group became a leading force in the negotiations. The commitment emanating from these newly transformed governments in Latin America, Africa, and East Asia was a game changer.

This input also contributed to a sense of possibility for a more universal justice. There was hope that the writ of the permanent Court would reach those in the most powerful states as well as those representing the least powerful. There was a feeling that the negotiations offered a unique historical opportunity in which many hoped to level the playing field so the rule of law would apply more equally to all. Unfortunately, the ICC has not been able to realize that potential to minimize the unevenness. The Court's critics condemn it harshly and unfairly for that failing.

1.3 Double Standards in ICC-Related Practice

The fundamental source of the unevenness that frames the ICC's application of its statute flows from the underlying disparity of wealth, power, and influence that marks the international system. While less pronounced, this disparity affects the application of international human rights standards. Even with the positive impact of a broad like- minded group, the Rome Statute, created in multilateral negotiations, was heavily influenced by the prevailing notions of state sovereignty and the views of the most powerful states. In fact, the negotiation process codified a limited jurisdictional regime for the Court. The ICC's exercise of jurisdiction, with some important exceptions,[22] requires the consent of the state where the crimes occurred or the state of the nationality of the accused.[23]

In addition to the systemic power disparities and the jurisdictional limitations in the Rome Statute, the double standards apparent in the UN Security Council's ICC referral practice exacerbate the limitations of the ICC's reach.[24] This highlights the tension between the norms of international criminal justice on the one hand, and the of the International Criminal Court: Introduction, Analysis and Integrated Text (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2005).

[21] Between 1997 and 2000 governments convened regional conferences for an effective, impartial, and independent Court in Pretoria, Dakar, Port-Au-Spain, Guatemala City, and Budapest.

[22] Arts 12(2)(a) and 13(b) ICC Statute. [23] Art 12 ICC Statute.

[24] On limitations, see D Akande, 'The Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court over Nationals of Non-Parties: Legal Basis and Limits' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 618–50.

political imperatives that routinely drive the Security Council's decision-making on the other. The Council has referred situations twice to the ICC: the Darfur region of Sudan in March 2005, and later the deteriorating situation in Libya in February 2011. In May 2014 a resolution referring Syria to the ICC was blocked by a double veto.[25] The Council has failed to even consider referring many situations where grave international crimes have occurred.[26] There has been no coherence, let alone consistency, in the way the Council, a political body, refers to the ICC.

Perceptions of Council selectivity and double standards referring—and more often not referring—are exacerbated by the prerogatives of the five permanent members. Three of these—China, Russia, and the United States—are not parties to the Rome Statute. Through their status as non-States Parties and veto power, they are insulated from the Court in that they have twice mandated to investigate alleged crimes on the territory of other non-States Parties. These three powerful states have also shielded some of their respective allies from the reach of the ICC, creating a virtual 'accountability free zone', most starkly in Syria, but also in Israel, Palestine, and Sri Lanka, to name a few. ICC officials did not create these circumstances, but the Court is certainly affected by them.

In addition to the selectivity characterizing referral decisions, there have also been serious shortcomings in the substance of the referral resolutions. Both successful referral resolutions (1593 and 1970) contained provisions that imposed the entire financial burden of investigation and prosecution on the Court and its States Parties.[27]

Moreover, all the referral resolutions have allowed exemptions for the nationals of non-States Parties should they be implicated in serious crimes committed in the country situation referred.[28] This exemption codifies a double standard in applying justice. Furthermore, in its referral resolutions, the Security Council has failed to require all UN Member States to cooperate with the Court.[29]

The sense of political instrumentalization of the Court has been exacerbated by Council inaction after referral. The Security Council has not adopted any subsequent resolutions to support the referrals. There has been one Presidential Statement on Darfur that recalls the language of Resolution 1593.[30] The Council has failed to respond to judicial findings of non-cooperation by a small number of UN Member States. This 'on again, off again' support makes the ICC seem like a tool of political interests at the Council rather than an expression of commitment to seeing justice done for serious crimes.

On 22 May 2014 the Council rejected, by a vote of 13–2, a French text referring the situation in Syria to the Court.[31] Russia, backed by China, vetoed the resolution to [25] See Russia, China Block Security Council Referral of Syria to International Criminal Court (n 4).

[26] The Council has never been seized with a resolution to refer the situation in Sri Lanka, Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), or Lebanon to the ICC.

[27] See UNSC Resolution 1593 (n 3) operative para. 7; UNSC Resolution 1970 (n 3) operative para. 8.

[28] Ibid., para. 6. [29] Ibid., para. 2.

[30] Statement by the President of the Security Council, UN Doc S/PRST/2008/21, 16 June 2008.

[31] For an account, see Security Council 7180th Meeting, 'Referral of Syria to International Criminal Court Fails as Negative Votes Prevent Security Council from Adopting Draft Resolution', UN Doc SC/11407, 22 May 2014 <http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2014/sc11407.doc.htm> accessed 11 September 2014.

shield the Assad regime to which it had tied itself over decades and in the last years of civil war. With more than 160,000 dead and huge numbers of Syrians living as refugees or internally displaced persons, the conflict had been fuelled by a sense of impunity on all sides. The negotiation process and the vote reflected both new and familiar aspects. The rejection, the first ever by the Security Council, was emblematic of Council selectivity,[32] this time with Russia and China wielding selectivity.

By opening the draft resolution to co-sponsorship by all UN Member States, the separation between Council and non-Council members on referral resolutions was pierced.[33] In the negotiations over the text, as penholder, France, unlike in the 2005 Darfur Resolution, initially limited itself to bilateral negotiations with the United States. The latter insisted, as the price of its acceptance, the same exemption of nationals of non-States Parties that had appeared in Resolutions 1593 and 1970. When, after weeks of negotiations, the text was presented to Council members, it gave rise to strong principled objections.

One initiative aimed at changing these shortcomings was put forward at the Council in October 2012. At that time, Guatemala, which had recently acceded to the Rome Statute, decided to use its Council Presidency to convene an unprecedented Open Debate on the relationship between the Council and the ICC.[34] This provided like-minded ICC States Parties a high-profile forum from which to convey their views on the relationship. Previously, it seemed as if the Council was the exclusive stakeholder. In the Open Debate States Parties advocated several corrective measures to the Security Council practice of ICC referrals.[35] These included

i. A coherent approach for referrals to the Court to avoid double standards;
ii. UN funding for investigations and prosecutions resulting from Council referrals;
iii. Deletion of the exemptions shielding nationals of third non-States Parties from ICC jurisdiction;
iv. Creation of a subsidiary Council unit to deal with referrals to the ICC;
v. Support to the Court following a referral; and
vi. Response to judicial notifications from the Court highlighting the lack of cooperation by states.

Both before and after the October 2012 Open Debate there was constructive discussion at think tanks and academic institutions on the overall relationship between the Security Council and the ICC.[36] These meetings involved diplomats, former diplomats, [32] Ibid., see statement by Syria, invoking double standards in the UN system.

[33] The draft resolution was backed by 100 non-governmental organizations, 65 co-sponsors, and 13 Council members. See also Letter dated 19 May 2014 from the Permanent Representative of Switzerland to the UN addressed to the Secretary-General, A/68/884–S/2014/361, 21 May 2014.

[34] See Security Council, Open Debate on 'Promotion and Strengthening of the Rule of Law in the Maintenance of International Peace and Security', UN Doc S/PV.6849 (Resumption 1), 17 October 2012.

[35] Ibid.

[36] For example, an event at Chatham House, 'The UN Security Council and the International Criminal Court', 15 March 2012; Panel Discussion at the International Peace Institute, 8 November 2012; and the Laguna Beach Workshop convened by the University of California, Irvine, 28–30 November 2012.

academics, and representatives of civil society. The exchanges deepened understanding and heightened expectations of the prospects for some change.

In 2013, however, the situation at the Council became much less favourable for Court-related initiatives. This was due to several factors. First, events in Libya: three weeks after the unanimous adoption of Council Resolution 1970 that referred the situation in Libya to the ICC, the Council adopted Resolution 1973 authorizing a no-flight zone over the country.[37] As a result, the Court became associated with the 'regime change' agenda of the powerful Western permanent members. However unfair this imputation was to the Court, it was convenient for opponents of the Court on and off the Security Council.

The situation in the Council became further polarized over the situation in Syria. The Russians and Chinese vetoed financial and travel sanctions against Syrian leaders on three different occasions.[38] In January 2013, 58 UN Member States sent a letter to the Security Council calling for a referral of the situation in Syria to the ICC.[39] Following that initiative, there was no Council action for nearly 18 months.

On 1 January 2013 Rwanda joined the Council as an elected member. Because of Kigali's intense opposition,[40] references to the ICC in both thematic and country-specific resolutions, even previously agreed upon language, became more difficult to obtain in 2013.[41] In the second half of 2013, the terrain at the Security Council regarding the ICC became even more highly charged. A few African states mounted an unprecedented drive against the Court. Some in the African Union (AU) had initiated opposition against the arrest warrants for Sudanese President Omar Al-Bashir in 2009,[42] but even more virulent opposition to the Court arose around the case of Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta.[43] In October 2013 the African Union convened an Extraordinary Session of the Assembly of Heads of States and Governments that [37] See UNSC Res 1973 (17 March 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1973.The implementation of that no-flight mandate, however, became the focus of intense controversy, as the NATO powers implemented it very broadly in their effort to topple the Gaddafi regime. Those states that felt misled by the application of UNSC Resolution 1973 tended to conflate the two very different Council resolutions on Libya into one.

[38] 'Security Council Fails to Adopt Draft Resolution Condemning Syria's Crackdown on Anti-government Protestors, Owing to the Veto by Russian Federation, China', Security Council, UN Doc SC/10403, 4 October 2011 <http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2011/sc10403.doc.htm> accessed 11 September 2014; 'Security Council Fails to Adopt Draft Resolution on Syria that would have Threatened Sanctions, Due to Negative Votes of China, Russian Federation', Security Council, UN Doc SC/10714, 19 July 2012 <http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2012/sc10714.doc.htm> accessed 11 September 2014. 'Security Council Fails to Adopt Resolution on Syria', UN News Centre, 19 July 2012 <http://www.un.org/apps/news/story.asp?NewsID=42513> accessed 11 September 2014.

[39] Letter dated 14 January 2013 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Switzerland to the UN addressed to the Secretary-General, A/67/694–S/2013/19, 16 January 2013. The letter called upon 'the Security Council to refer the situation in the Syrian Arab Republic as of March 2011 to the International Criminal Court'.

[40] Rwanda was elected to a two-year term on the Security Council and took its seat on 1 January 2013.

[41] Kigali was concerned over potential liability for crimes in eastern Congo.

[42] African Union (Assembly), Decision on the Meeting of African States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Thirteenth Ordinary Session, 1–3 July 2009 (Sirte, Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya), Doc Assembly/AU/Dec 243–67 (XIII) Rev1 Assembly/AU/Decl 1–5 (XIII). On the relationship between the ICC and the AU, see also Maunganidze and Du Plessis, Chapter 4, this volume.

[43] Prosecutor v Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11.

focused squarely on the ICC.[44] The session's final declaration called for, among other steps, a Security Council deferral of the cases against Kenyan President Kenyatta and Deputy President Ruto.[45] It created a Contact Group to press the Security Council to suspend both cases.[46] It requested the ICC to postpone the trial of President Uhuru Kenyatta and called on the Court to suspend the proceedings against Deputy President William Samoei Ruto.[47]

Among other lines of argument, proponents cited double standards in Security Council practice as a means to delegitimize the ICC.[48] The Contact Group rooted its arguments in the staunch defence of national sovereignty augmented by an appeal to regional solidarity that drew on the rightful resentment over the ravages of colonial rule in Africa. This was a rejection of the fight against impunity that used history, the unevenness of the terrain on which the Court works, and the hypocrisy of states that ignore the double standards in their own espousal of justice.

At that Extraordinary Session, President Kenyatta elaborated on these themes. Citing the spectacle of Western decline, he stated 'they abuse whatever power remains in their control'.[49] He furthermore said that 'the most active global powers… declined to ratify the Treaty, or withdrew along the way, citing several compelling grounds'.[50] Those same world powers 'were hesitant to commit to a process that might make them accountable for such spectacularly criminal adventures as the wars in Iraq, Syria, Libya, Afghanistan… and such hideous enterprises as renditions and torture'.[51] He contrasted this stance with those states of good faith that had hoped 'the ICC would administer and secure justice in a fair, impartial and independent manner and, as an international Court, could bring accountability to situations and perpetrators everywhere in the world'.[52]

The challenge driven by the Extraordinary Summit to 'terminate' the Kenya cases[53] ultimately reached the Security Council in November 2013. The AU leadership's objective was to use the Council to suspend the ICC's judicial proceedings and more broadly roll back the fight against the most serious crimes under international law. After a number of closed consultations with the Contact Group in New York, it was clear that the nine votes necessary to gain passage were lacking. Nevertheless, Rwanda on behalf of the Contact Group pushed its resolution to a vote. On 15 November 2013 eight Council members decided to abstain and seven voted in favour of the Rwandan [44] African Union (Assembly), Decision on Africa's Relationship with the International Criminal Court, Extraordinary Session of the Assembly of the African Union, 12 October 2013, Doc Ext/Assembly/AU/Decl. 1–2 (October 2013) Ext/Assembly/AU/Decl.1–4.

[45] Ibid., para. 10. [46] Ibid. [47] Ibid.

[48] Ibid., para. 4 (AU's concern on the politicization and misuse of indictments against African leaders by ICC).

[49] See President Uhuru Kenyatta's Speech at the Extraordinary Session of the Assembly of Heads of States and Governments of the African Union, 12 October 2012 <http://www.newvision.co.ug/news/648328-uhuru-blasts-us-uk-in-his-au-speech-full-speech-below.html> accessed 11 September 2014.

[50] Ibid. [51] Ibid. [52] Ibid.

[53] Note verbale dated 2 May 2014 from the Permanent Mission of Kenya to the UN Security Council <www.kenyastockholm.files.wordpress.com/2013/05/secret-letter-to-un.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014.

Resolution seeking to defer the Kenyan cases.[54] This unfolded amidst heated exchanges in the Council chamber.

1.4 Beyond the Status Quo

It is not only Court opponents who have taken the field in this confrontation. The multiple challenges facing the ICC at the Security Council have generated different responses from Court supporters.[55] To increase chances for a referral in the intractable Syrian situation, the Court's former prosecutor, Luis Moreno-Ocampo, suggested a 'conditional referral' to the Court.[56] He highlighted the flexibility the Council has in setting temporal limits on an ICC referral and recommended that the Council 'establish a deadline in the near future that would trigger the jurisdiction of the Court'.[57] He argued that a future deadline 'could provide an incentive to begin a different style of negotiations to end a conflict'.[58] This approach, however, distinctly ties the Court and its judicial mandate to a political goal, however worthy. Such linkage would explicitly merge the ICC's role with political negotiations. The former prosecutor further stated that 'should the conflict effectively stop before the deadline the national leadership could discuss adequate ways to promote justice for the past'.[59] This proposal, were it to be adopted, would have the effect of making justice through the ICC a bargaining chip in negotiations for peace. This would play directly into the arguments of Court opponents and diminish the ICC's judicial mandate.

Other justice supporters have taken an even more draconian approach on referrals. This view argues that Security Council referrals are inherently too problematic to be worth the cost. It concludes that the two referrals have brought few real results for justice and at the same time exposed the ICC to charges of politicization that taint its independence as a judicial body.[60] In the run-up to the proposed referral of Syria to the Court, that critique grew more vehement. Louise Arbour was quoted in The New York Times as saying, 'The only question in my mind is, "Will it belong to the cemetery of good intentions or the museum of political scoring?" This is, in a sense, an exercise in using the ICC and accountability for posturing.'[61]

This approach posed the alternatives starkly: abandon referrals which extend the potential reach of justice to victims where it would otherwise be unavailable, or strive to make them more effective. The former amounts to abandoning referrals on the basis of the limited, albeit flawed, practice to date.

[54] 'Security Council: Bid to Defer International Criminal Court Cases of Kenyan Leaders Fails', UN News Centre, 15 November 2013 <http://www.un.org/apps/news/story.asp?NewsID=46499> accessed 11 September 2014.

[55] For a discussion, see also C Stahn, 'Syria and the Semantics of Intervention, Aggression and Punishment: On "Red Lines" and "Blurred Lines"' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 955, 976.

[56] L Moreno-Ocampo, 'Between Bombing or Doing Nothing', The Huffington Post, 4 September 2013.

[57] Ibid. [58] Ibid. [59] Ibid.

[60] See L Arbour, 'Doctrines Derailed?: Internationalism's Uncertain Future', 28 October 2013 <http://www.crisisgroup.org/en/publication-type/speeches/2013/arbour-doctrines-derailed-internationalism-s-uncertain-future.aspx> accessed 11 September 2014.

[61] S Sengupta, 'UN Will Weigh Asking Court to Investigate War Crimes in Syria', The New York Times, 21 May 2014.

Encouragingly, some UN Member States have taken a proactive approach.[62] A group of UN Member States that called themselves the Accountability, Coherence, and Transparency Group (ACT) was launched on 2 May 2013. The ACT group consists of 22 small and medium-sized states.[63] ACT is aimed at enhancing the effectiveness of the Council through the improvement of its working methods. It includes a subgroup on accountability. The accountability cluster looks at: (i) obtaining a commitment by permanent Council members to forgo the use of the veto in situations where genocide and crimes against humanity are involved and (ii) Security Council referrals to the ICC.

A prerequisite in changing Council practice may be engaging UN Member States to press the Security Council and, in particular, its permanent members to adopt a different approach. This is an uphill prospect. A consistent voice for accountability that represents a multi-regional membership could pose a credible alternative to the Council's political imperatives. While not leading to any quick change in practice, asserting a principled approach could also, over time, raise the political price for wilful inaction where the most serious crimes have been committed. This should happen in the three areas of Council practice where shortcomings have been pronounced. Equal application of the ICC Statute may be facilitated through (i) greater coherence and less selectivity in Council decisions on referrals; (ii) changing and strengthening the substantive text of referring resolutions; and (iii) more follow-up on future referral resolutions to maximize chances for effective justice.

A key challenge may be to achieve a few intermediate goals to build a sense of momentum. While meaningful change in the Council's approach will be difficult to achieve, adopting short-sighted solutions, simply abandoning referrals, or denigrating the Court for shortcomings beyond its power, is hardly the path to obtain justice in those situations where victims would have no other access to redress.

There is an inherent flaw in the ICC's not being able to render justice equally wherever the most serious crimes occur. This tension is exacerbated by the approach of the Security Council, as a political body. The Court is not responsible for the latter, but it is certainly affected by it. There is no easy solution to remedy these problems, but addressing them in the Court's second decade will be crucial to the ICC's ability to fulfil its mission and mandate.

[62] V Lehmann, Reforming the Working Methods of the UN Security Council—The Next ACT, Friedrich-Ebert-Stiftung (2013) <http://library.fes.de/pdf-files/iez/global/10180.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014.

[63] For a survey, see <https://www.globalpolicy.org/component/content/article/200-reform/52474-reforming-the-working-methods-of-the-un-security-council-the-act-initiative.html> accessed 11 September 2014.

2

The ICC and the Politics of Peace and Justice

*Leslie Vinjamuri

2.1 Introduction

The indictment of sitting heads of state and rebel leaders during active conflict, though still more exceptional than normal, has radically altered the debate surrounding international justice.[1] Arrest warrants for former Yugoslav president Slobodan Milošević, Sudanese president Omar al-Bashir, Liberian president Charles Taylor, and Colonel Gaddafi all ignited an intense controversy over the timing of justice and its impact on the prospects for peace. In the former Yugoslavia, Sudan, Liberia, Libya, and even Syria, it has become clear that there are still significant barriers to achieving both peace and justice simultaneously, especially when perpetrators of atrocities maintain significant power. Nonetheless, advocacy for justice continues to reflect the view that such trade-offs do not exist. Leading advocacy organizations and even the first Chief Prosecutor of the ICC have stressed the role of international justice in delivering results, especially peace, the rule of law, and stability.[2] Such an approach presents a stark contrast to rationales for prosecution that claim that there is a moral

* Associate Professor in International Relations, SOAS, University of London. I would like to thank Sanne Cornelia J Verschuren for her research assistance on this chapter, and also the participants in two University of Oxford workshops, 'The Ethics of Post-Conflict Reconstruction and Statebuilding' and 'Can International Courts Do Justice?'; and participants in the 2009 Centre for Transnational Legal Studies seminar series and at the Wilton Park Conference, 'Pursuing Justice in Ongoing Conflict: Examining the Challenges'. Thank you to Cambridge University Press for granting permission, as this piece draws on L Vinjamuri, 'Deterrence, Democracy, and the Pursuit of International Justice during Conflict' (2010) 24 Ethics and International Affairs 191.

[1] E Lutz and C Reiger (eds), Prosecuting Heads of State (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press) 2009; R Teitel, 'Transitional Justice Genealogy' (2003) 16 Harvard Human Rights Journal 69, 94; F Guariglia, 'The Rules of Procedure and Evidence for the International Criminal Court: A New Development in International Adjudication of Individual Criminal Responsibility' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002); E Haslam, 'Victim Participation at the International Criminal Court: A Triumph of Hope over Experience?' in D McGoldrick et al. (eds), The Permanent International Criminal Court—Legal and Policy Issues (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2004) 319; H Friman, 'Participation of Victims in the ICC Criminal Proceedings and the Early Jurisprudence of the Court' in G Sluiter and S Vasiliev (eds), International Criminal Procedure: Towards a Coherent Body of Law (London: Cameron May 2009) 204; C Van den Wyngaert, 'Victims Before International Criminal Courts: Some Views and Concerns of an ICC Trial Judge' (2011) 44 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 475, 494–5.

[2] Notably, even key advocacy organizations promoting international justice have issued important reports evaluating it on the basis of its contributions to other values. Several recent reports reflect this trend. See e.g. most notably, Human Rights Watch, 'Selling Justice Short: Why Accountability Matters for Peace' (July 2009); D Orentlicher, 'Shrinking the Space for Denial: The Impact of the ICTY in Serbia', Open Society Justice Initiative (May 2008). There are also numerous academic studies evaluating transitional justice, and the 2010 Special Issue of the International Journal of Transitional Justice, 'Transitional Justice on Trial: Evaluating its Impact' is devoted to evaluations of its impact.

obligation or a legal duty to prosecute the perpetrators of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes.[3] Instead, recent arguments have emphasized the instrumental purposes of justice, essentially recasting justice as a tool of peacebuilding and encouraging proponents and critics alike to evaluate justice on the basis of its effects on atrocities, violence, and peace negotiations. Indicting national leaders and rebels pivotal to ongoing peace talks has turned previously academic conversations about the relationship between peace and justice into pressing policy dilemmas.

Since the 1990s two historical 'facts'—that war crime trials are held by victors, and that they are only initiated after war's end—have been challenged. Proponents of trials for Nazi war criminals emphasized the moral value of a legal approach, but deferred discussions of justice until an Allied victory was clearly in sight. The International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg was convened only when Germany was defeated and occupied.[4] The expectations for what justice could achieve were transformed by the outbreak of war and, especially, by the horrors associated with the attempt to ethnically cleanse Bosnia. During the summer of 1992, as war raged in Bosnia and Herzegovina, human rights advocates campaigned successfully for the immediate establishment of a war crimes tribunal even before any prospect for peace had emerged. A tribunal was established in the spring of 1993. In its 1994 Annual Report, the ICTY stated: 'the Tribunal is intended to act as a powerful deterrent to all parties against continued participation in inhuman acts'.[5] Bosnian Serb political and military leaders Karadžić and Mladić were indicted in the summer of 1995, just months before a peace agreement was signed in Dayton, Ohio. And, five years later, in 1999, the speed with which the indictment of Yugoslav president Slobodan Milošević followed the NATO bombing of Serbia contributed to the public perception that justice and peacemaking were part of the same project.

This judicial intervention during the war in Bosnia unleashed a discussion about the effects of justice on peace. Very quickly an unofficial consensus seemed to emerge that justice could be legitimately evaluated on the basis of its effects.[6] In the former

[3] D Orentlicher 'Settling Accounts: The Duty to Prosecute Human Rights Violations of a Prior Regime', Yale Law Journal, 100.8, 2537–615.

[4] The American Jewish Conference argued for the 'moral obligation' to prosecute those who had committed crimes, but also suggested this would serve as 'a warning against future attempts to instigate or commit similar crimes'. Statement on Punishment of War Criminals Submitted by the American Jewish Conference to the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull (25 August 1944) (National Archives, RG 107). See also A Kochavi, Prelude to Nuremberg: Allied War Crimes Policy and the Question of Punishment (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press 1998).

[5] Annual Report of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991, UN Doc A/49/342 and S/1994/1007 (29 August 1994), cited in Orentlicher, 'Shrinking the Space for Denial' (n 2) 15.

[6] Most notably, reports such as Human Rights Watch, 'Selling Justice Short' (n 2) emphasize the effects of justice on the peace process and renewed cycles of violence; by contrast, one of the most influential post-cold war statements about accountability stressed the legal duty to prosecute. See D Orentlicher, 'Settling Accounts: The Duty to Prosecute Human Rights Violations of a Prior Regime' (1991) 100 Yale Law Journal 2537; P Akhavan, 'Are International Criminal Tribunals a Disincentive to Peace? Reconciling Judicial Romanticism with Political Realism (2009) 31 Human Rights Quarterly 3; O Thoms et al., 'The Effects of Transitional Justice Mechanisms: A Summary of Empirical Research Findings and Implications for Analysts and Practitioners', Centre for International Policy Studies, University of Ottowa (April 2008); K Hunjoon and K Sikkink, 'Explaining the Deterrence Effects of Human Rights Trials', 2 <http://www.iilj.org/courses/documents/Sikkink-Kim.HC2009Oct21.pdf> accessed 6 August Yugoslavia, Uganda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Libya, and even Syria, the potential for justice to facilitate peace negotiations, reduce violence, consolidate peace, and introduce the rule of law has been the subject of advocacy, research, and policy analysis.[7] On the first day of peace talks designed to bring Liberia's civil war to a close, an arrest warrant against the then Liberian president and warlord Charles Taylor was unsealed. Taylor exited the talks and within weeks accepted an offer of exile in Nigeria. When Taylor was later transferred to The Hague, an intense debate broke out about the credibility of future deals designed to remove brutal dictators. Many feared that the 'Taylor precedent' would make it impossible to remove spoilers from peace talks in the future.

This focus on the short-term effects of international justice has left some advocates wary that the basic value of a criminal justice approach to accountability is being overshadowed by the emphasis on deterrence and peace. In the following pages, I discuss the shift in international justice advocacy from a principle or duty-based logic to one that is results based. I then evaluate the results-based rationales that have played an increasingly central role in public advocacy for international justice. Finally, I examine the implications of evaluating justice on the basis of its ability to deliver peace to situations of ongoing conflict.

2.2 Arguing for Justice

The most prominent arguments about justice have stressed two outcomes: peace and democracy.[8] First and most visibly, a deterrence rationale has been strategically deployed as a logic that links justice to peace through its ability to prevent atrocities. This rationale has been central in the most highly visible and hotly contested cases. Second, a rule-of-law rationale has been championed for justice. The symbolic power of trials increases the appeal of the law as a mechanism for dealing with atrocities. This, combined with a direct material transfer of legal skills and resources, makes justice an important mechanism for consolidating the rule of law, a central component of democracy.

2014; L Payne et al., Transitional Justice in Balance: Comparing Processes, Weighing Efficacy (Washington, D.C.: United States Institute of Peace Press 2010); J Snyder and L Vinjamuri, 'Trials and Errors: Principle and Pragmatism in Strategies of International Justice' (2003/2004) 28 International Security 5.

[7] A Dworkin, 'International Justice and the Prevention of Atrocities' (European Council on Foreign Relations) <http://www.ecfr.eu/ijp/case/introduction> accessed 6 August 2014; Human Rights Watch, 'Selling Justice Short' (n 2).

[8] A third category of rationales that stress the effects of justice draws on the notion of restorative justice. Although many theorists of restorative justice are solely concerned with restoring relations between victims and perpetrators, this type of explanation can also be used to suggest the positive effects of justice on state building. Establishing guilt and innocence may be crucial not as a means to punish perpetrators and assuage victims, but instead as a mechanism designed to reintegrate these two communities and thereby lay a foundation for reconciliation and restoration. International justice is a weak cousin of other non-legal strategies preferred by those who seek to promote restorative justice. Mechanisms designed to bring victims and perpetrators together through truth telling have been at the centre of this approach to justice. Efforts to advance international justice on the basis of its capacity to restore and repair social relations and thereby advance the project of state building are as suspect as those that base their support of justice on its capacity to deter and democratize.

Deterrence emerged as an important justification for war crimes trials in Bosnia. The boldest claim made on behalf of criminal law was summed up in the argument most central to international justice in the 1990s: 'no peace without justice'.[9] This was trumpeted as a core motivation for holding perpetrators of mass atrocities in the Balkans accountable. Its proponents argued that justice was crucial for its purported capacity to prevent and deter individual perpetrators from committing further atrocities.[10] Since these individuals faced personal sanction, the prospect of accountability would directly alter their incentive to commit war crimes.[11] Advocates of this deterrence rationale have made claims about the capacity of this model to deliver both specific deterrence and general deterrence.[12] The most basic claim about deterrence is a general one. The effects of international justice are not confined to a particular individual or territory nor time-bound. This is a long-term project that increases the costs to perpetrators of atrocities—one that will gradually lead individual would-be perpetrators to make a rational choice to comply with human rights and humanitarian norms.[13]

Despite this overarching claim, advocates of judicial deterrence have increasingly emphasized the capacity of tribunals to deter ongoing crimes in specific conflicts.[14] The logic rests implicitly on two distinct causal mechanisms. The first assumes the threat of justice will lead perpetrators of atrocities to engage with peace processes. A second logic anticipates that justice will marginalize perpetrators from power and enable peace. The logic of engagement assumes that indictments of particular perpetrators reduce their options and give them an incentive to participate in peace talks by removing the opportunity to retain or extend their power through military methods. Human Rights Watch and others have argued that the ICC's indictment of leaders of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), a sectarian Christian militant group based in northern Uganda, is evidence of the validity of this deterrent mechanism. The LRA's decision to negotiate with the Ugandan government in July 2006, they argued, was a direct consequence of the ICC action.[15] The ability of tribunals to execute, that is, to [9] An Italian NGO established in 1993 used this name and became a key advocate of international criminal justice. See No Peace Without Justice <www.npwj.org/> accessed 6 August 2014.

[10] P Akhavan, 'Beyond Impunity: Can International Criminal Justice Prevent Future Atrocities?' (2001) 95 American Journal of International Law 7.

[11] Mark Drumbl develops a critique of this assumption that international criminal justice can prevent collective violence in M Drumbl, Atrocity, Punishment, and International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007).

[12] See e.g. P Akhavan, 'Justice in The Hague, Peace in the Former Yugoslavia? A Commentary on the United Nations War Crimes Tribunal' (1998) 20 Human Rights Quarterly 737; R Lebow, Coercion, Cooperation, and Ethics in International Relations (New York: Routledge 2007) 188.

[13] ICTY Judge Wolfgang Schomburg argued strongly on behalf of the long-term deterrent effect of contemporary tribunals. See Orentlicher, 'Shrinking the Space for Denial' (n 2) 94 footnote 34.

[14] This claim has underpinned much of the logic behind arguments in support of recent ICC indictments. It also guided the logic of those who argued that the ICTY would reduce violence and contribute to state building within the former Yugoslavia and especially in Kosovo. Indeed, Human Rights Watch argued in its study Under Orders: War Crimes in Kosovo (New York: Human Rights Watch 2001) that the violence in Kosovo was muted because of the work of the ICTY.

[15] This argument is made, e.g., in P Hayner, 'Negotiating Justice: Guidelines for Mediators', Centre for Humanitarian Dialogue and International Center for Transitional Justice (February 2009) 17. Human Rights Watch, 'Selling Justice Short' (n 2). enforce arrest warrants, is essential for the success of a strategy that seeks to engage perpetrators by threatening their arrest.

A second logic holds that justice is a tool for marginalizing rather than engaging perpetrators of mass atrocities.[16] Indictments undermine the domestic legitimacy of their targets and thereby weaken their base of support. This facilitates a transition of power away from those who threaten to spoil the prospects for peace. Even in the absence of an arrest, proponents of justice argue that indictments alone have powerful shaming effects. The logic of marginalization is compelling but flawed. Indictments and arrest warrants may have the opposite effect. Savvy leaders in Sudan and Kenya under arrest warrant by the ICC have mobilized domestic support by treating the ICC as a threat to sovereignty and democracy. Sudan's president al-Bashir was not marginalized by the ICC arrest warrant. Instead, he ran for political office and succeeded in securing the presidency once again. In the short term, the indictment generated a backlash from the African Union and the Arab League, and prompted al-Bashir to force the exit of many key humanitarian agencies providing relief in Sudan. In Libya, an arrest warrant against Muammar Gaddafi did not diminish his determination to fight. In the former Yugoslavia, the indictment of Bosnian Serb political and military leaders Karadžić and Mladić reinforced the Milošević strategy which entailed a decision by the US government to work directly with Milošević, and not the Bosnian Serbs, to secure a peace agreement. Justice followed, but it did not lead in the former Yugoslavia.[17]

The assumption that removing key individuals is a sufficient basis for ending violence is central to both logics for pursuing justice in conflict. At its core, criminal justice assumes that individuals rather than groups are central to preventing atrocities. International justice has been seen as a tool that can help shift responsibility away from the group and back to the individual.[18] By refocusing polities away from dangerous clan identities and attributions of guilt, the focus on individual accountability seeks to defuse future cycles of violence, and especially revenge killings. Thus, rather than blaming 'the Serbs' for the atrocities in Srebrenica, for example, this form of accountability seeks to ensure that blame is placed squarely on the shoulders of key individuals. International tribunals do not take the side of any particular warring party. In this sense they are at least theoretically neutral; they seek to deter all perpetrators of the crimes associated with war rather than to privilege the values, interests, or rights of a particular party to conflict. In practice, though, international criminal tribunals have more often pursued only one side in a conflict.

Ultimately, deterrence is difficult to measure and even more difficult to achieve. The capacity of justice to deter atrocities is undermined in part because enforcement is so difficult to achieve. The threat to inflict justice also cannot easily be matched by a promise not to pursue justice. The law lacks this kind of flexibility.[19]

[16] See K Roth, 'Why Indictment Matters' <http://www.hrw.org/video/2009/03/03/why-indictment-matters> accessed 6 August 2014.

[17] Snyder and Vinjamuri, n 6.

[18] For a critical perspective on this and related issues, see Drumbl (n 11).

[19] For contrasting perspectives, see e.g. K Rodman, 'Darfur and the Limits of Legal Deterrence' (2008) 30 Human Rights Quarterly 529; K Sikkink and C Walling, 'The Impact of Human Rights Trials in Latin

A second rationale for promoting international criminal justice is that this strengthens the rule of law in post-conflict and transitional states through a demonstration effect.[20] Trials perform a symbolic and social function that spreads the rule of law by example. This logic has been central to campaigns for justice. Its moral appeal rests in part on its use of one morally desirable value (international justice) to advance a second morally desirable value (democracy and the rule of law). War crimes trials provide a beacon of hope, a symbol of moral authority for all of humanity, and it is the power of this symbol that facilitates an acceptance and embrace of the rule of law. This logic is intuitively compelling, but only in the presence of other conditions that facilitate a transition to democracy. All too often, elite perpetrators have drawn on a range of tactics to counter any positive symbolic effects of international justice by casting international courts especially as the handmaiden of colonial powers.

On a more practical level, advocates have argued that international tribunals help consolidate the rule of law by providing groups and individuals in civil society with a legal resource that facilitates their ability to mobilize and press for compliance with the law.[21] In some cases linkage has been fostered by international non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that have sought out local NGOs and national governments to develop accountability strategies and practices. In Kenya and Liberia, for example, the International Center for Transitional Justice worked extensively with local NGOs to develop practical solutions for increasing accountability in the aftermath of serious crimes.

Democracy promotion through the mechanism of international tribunals also operates through tangible material transfers. Skills and practices associated with the rule of law are transferred through a 'spillover' logic that involves the transfer of human and material resources, such as courtrooms and support for reform of the legal sector. The material component of democracy promotion has been formalized through a range of institutional mechanisms, such as the ICC's 'complementarity principle' and the ICTY's 'Rules of the Road'. In effect, complementarity encourages states to develop legal capacity by offering the carrot of national rather than international trials if they are found to be both 'willing and able' to investigate the crimes of their own nationals. Similarly, the Rules of the Road sought to inspire legal capacity building by introducing a formal mechanism for transferring expertise and cases from the ICTY to the former Yugoslavia.

America' (2007) 44 Journal of Peace Research 427; H Kim and K Sikkink, 'Explaining the Deterrence Effect of Human Rights Prosecutions' (2010) 54 International Studies Quarterly 939.

[20] The effort to build institutions is complicated by the pursuit of justice during conflict, making it seem that the logic of this argument is more naturally conducive to the pursuit of international justice in the aftermath of conflict than during ongoing violence. For an example of this type of argument, see K Sikkink, 'Contra Trial Skepticism' (African Arguments, 16 July 2008) <http://africanarguments.org/2008/07/16/contra-trial-skepticism/> accessed 7 August 2014.

[21] Similarly, Beth Simmons argues that treaties foster greater compliance with human rights norms because they serve as a resource for civil society that enables citizens to more easily mobilize and pressure their governments to comply. See B Simmons, Mobilizing for Human Rights: International Law in Domestic Politics (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009).

2.3 The Triumph of Consequences

Deterrence and democracy promotion have formed the basis of advocacy campaigns for justice, inspired criticism, and defined research programmes across a broad array of public policy and academic institutions. Public justifications that stress the fundamental values of 'guilt and innocence' have become less common paradoxically as have attacks on the basic principle of justice and accountability, even by those who adamantly oppose specific cases or are themselves targets of arrest warrants.[22] Instead, advocates and opponents alike have debated the effects of international justice. In some cases, opponents of international justice have sought to challenge the legitimacy of particular forms of institutional authority to be the arbiter of justice. But, international human rights advocates share a commitment to the non-negotiable nature of core universal human rights. Individuals who have come under the purview of the ICC have refrained from undertaking overt attacks on the basic tenets of justice. In Kenya, elites asserted that heads of state should have immunity but did not contest the basic principle of accountability. Likewise, Sudan's President al-Bashir challenged the legitimacy of the ICC, but not the basic principle of justice.

The consensus that has emerged on an impact-based evaluation of international justice is the by-product of several closely related developments, most notably the international community's use of soft policy instruments, especially international justice, to respond to violence and mass atrocities, and an inherent organizational tendency, especially in new institutions, to expand and extend their role.

In the former Yugoslavia, soft policy instruments were a substitute for military intervention. Pressure for military intervention in the former Yugoslavia was initially met with great reluctance. The European and American response stressed diplomatic negotiations, peacekeepers, and an ad hoc international war crimes tribunal. In Sudan and especially Libya, the ICC was also conceived in part as an instrument deployed by the international community to enhance the prospects for peace.[23] In each of these cases, discussion about the effects of justice on peace intensified.

New tribunals created to investigate abuses and atrocities have also taken on increasingly challenging cases and sought to extend rather than limit their engagement in ongoing conflict. The ICTY's indictments of Radovan Karadžić and Ratko Mladić during the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina and its pursuit of Slobodan Milošević during the bombing of Kosovo ensured that the Court would be viewed as a player that could not be ignored in any analysis of the peace process. The pursuit of justice prior to a settlement radically altered the terms of the ensuing debate, and [22] Remarks by Juan Mendez, 'Fifteen Years of International Justice: Assessing Accomplishments, Failures and Missed Opportunities—Lessons Learned' (14–15 April 2008).

[23] Many of the debates, e.g., about the ICC and Sudan focus on the consequences of the ICC's role there. For a summary of some of these debates, see A de Waal, 'Sudan and the International Criminal Court: A Guide to the Controversy' (Open Security, 14 July 2008) <http://www.opendemocracy.net/article/sudan-and-the-international-criminal-court-a-guide-to-the-controversy> accessed 7 August 2014. Another example of the type of debate that has surrounded the ICC is contained in N Waddell and P Clark (eds), Courting Conflict? Justice, Peace and the ICC in Africa (London: Royal African Society 2008).

international justice became an instrument that was evaluated in terms of its impact on efforts to negotiate peace with Serbia. Indeed, much of the immediate controversy centred on whether the indictment would impede or facilitate peace negotiations rather than whether it fulfilled a legal duty or satisfied a moral imperative. As one commentator argued, '[t]he tribunal has always said it wants to stay clear of politics, but charging a current head of state with war crimes will take it right to the center of the diplomatic and political arena'.[24]

Pursuing justice 'in real time' increased the visibility of the tribunals and generated heightened expectations of what they could accomplish. Practitioners often fell into a trap of trying to oversell the tribunal's activities, pursuing an overly ambitious agenda in their efforts to secure the strategic goods of peace, deterrence, and democracy. Just a few days after the indictment of Milošević, ICTY Chief Prosecutor Louise Arbour argued, 'I have been stressing… our commitment to functioning as a real time law enforcement operation.'[25] The need to consolidate a public role and secure public support may inadvertently bias tribunals against deferring justice until conflicts are resolved. Proponents argue that the arrest warrant issued for Sudanese President al-Bashir may bolster moderates and weaken his base of support domestically, thereby paving the way for the selection of a new leader in forthcoming elections. This tendency to oversell criminal law's contribution to stopping ongoing conflict has been intensified by concern that international justice will be marginalized or obstructed by mediators and political leaders with conflicting priorities. The concern is not unwarranted. Historically, the formal incorporation of provisions for justice into peace agreements has been exceedingly limited. Even over the past decade there have been several peace agreements that have remained silent on the issue of accountability.[26]

2.4 Four Dilemmas

The pursuit of international justice during ongoing conflict has produced four dilemmas for the future of accountability in general and international justice in particular.

2.4.1 Sequencing justice

Judicial interventions in ongoing conflict have generated intense debate about the optimal sequencing of policies designed to deliver justice and peace. But little consensus has emerged and the prospect of an ideal standard for the role that justice should play during conflict remains elusive. Three prominent rationales that underscore contemporary debate recognize that peace should be given some measure of priority when accountability measures are pursued during violent conflict. First, a 'do no harm' rationale suggests that the standard for pursuing justice during conflict should be that such an intervention will not impede the prospects for achieving peace. A second set of arguments sets a higher bar by suggesting that support of justice in ongoing conflicts should follow a 'positive effects' standard. That is, justice should only be pursued when there is clear evidence that it would be possible to achieve some measure of justice, and also to help the cause of peace.[27] This view has shaped arguments against international justice as well as those on its behalf. In a powerful op-ed to The New York Times, South Africa's former president Mbeki and Columbia University scholar Mahmood Mamdani argued that 'courts can not do justice'.[28] A third rationale suggests that justice should be pursued during conflict only as a 'last resort'. If all other instruments of statecraft, short of military intervention, have been tried and failed, then it is okay to pursue international justice.

[24] G Sharp (National Public Radio, 27 May 1999), quoted in 'Will Indictment Derail the Peace Process?' (UN Wire, 27 May 1999) <http://www.unwire.org/unwire/19990527/2855_story.asp> accessed 3 June 2014. This publication reviews the range of views that surfaced in response to this controversial indictment.

[25] 'Statement by Justice Louise Arbour, Prosecutor ICTY' (ICTY Press Release, 27 May 1999) <http://www.icty.org/sid/7764> accessed 7 August 2014.

[26] See C Bell, On the Law of Peace: Peace Agreements and the Lex Pacificatoria (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008).

In the debate over a possible Security Council referral of Syria to the ICC, each of these three standards informed the arguments made by different audiences. Some suggested that diplomacy had failed at Geneva II as had other soft measures, and so 'why not' try a referral, thus implicitly adopting a 'last resort' rationale. Others argued on the basis of 'positive effects' that unless the ICC could help increase the prospects for peace, it should not open a case.[29] Still others implicitly applied a 'do no harm' standard, suggesting that the ICC was unlikely to have an impact on Assad's behaviour, so why not refer Syria to the ICC?[30]

Ultimately, though, these differing standards and rationales were confronted by the reality of an increasingly diminished flexibility to argue critically in the public sphere about justice. By establishing a powerful precedent, judicial interventions in the former Yugoslavia galvanized moral sentiment around an uncritical support of justice and cast a shadow over debates about sequencing.

The debate about sequencing re-emerged in the context of Libya's 2011 war when the Security Council referred Libya to the ICC. The rapidity with which an arrest warrant was issued for Muammar Gaddafi and the move by NATO to defeat him sparked a new openness to debate and a scepticism about the pursuit of ICC justice during ongoing conflict. Some feared that the arrest warrant against Gaddafi would inhibit efforts to negotiate a settlement that could bring the violence to an end. Many justice proponents felt that the Security Council referral undermined the independence of justice by linking it too closely to the Security Council and especially to its peace and security mandate. Louise Arbour, a long-time proponent of justice, argued for separate, or parallel, tracks. Ultimately, though, recognizing the difficulties of achieving such a separation, Arbour recommended that although both justice

[27] R Letschert and M Groenhuijsen, 'Not Everyone Thinks the ICC in Syria is a Good Idea' (Justice in Conflict, 12 June 2014) <http://justiceinconflict.org/2014/06/12/not-everyone-thinks-the-icc-in-syria-is-a-good-idea/> accessed 7 August 2014; L Vinjamuri, 'Syria and the International Criminal Court' (Political Violence @ a Glance, 25 April 2014) <http://politicalviolenceataglance.org/2014/04/25/syria-and-the-international-criminal-court/> accessed 7 August 2014.

[28] T Mbeki and M Mamdani, 'Courts Can't End Civil Wars', The New York Times, 5 February 2014.

[29] Vinjamuri, 'Syria and the International Criminal Court' (n 27).

[30] K Cronin-Furman, 'Would an ICC Referral Have Helped Syria?' (Monkey Cage, The Washington Post, 22 May 2014) <http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/monkey-cage/wp/2014/05/22/would-an-icc-referral-have-helped-syria/> accessed 7 August 2014.

and peace should be pursued independently, proponents of each must be willing to make some compromises to make a just peace possible. In the case of Colombia, for example, she argued that uncompromising justice would not be possible, but neither would impunity.[31] Former Chief Prosecutor of the ICC Luis Moreno Ocampo surprised many justice advocates by taking a very different position, arguing for a complete integration of the instruments of justice and diplomacy through the Security Council.[32]

Three years later, a Security Council vote on a resolution that would refer Syria to the ICC pitted 13 members of the Security Council against Russia and China. This division made it easy to portray the vote as divided between those who supported justice, human rights, and liberalism, and those who sought to block it, rather than one that evaluated the specific impacts of a referral on the conflict, or the attainability of justice. But some analysts expressed concern that referring situations to the ICC that the Court would find difficult to execute would ultimately weaken the Court.[33]

Scholars have tried to evaluate debates about sequencing by drawing on careful social science research. Snyder and Vinjamuri argue that when spoilers are powerful, well-designed amnesties can be crucial devices for bargaining with spoilers and securing their removal, thereby making a peace settlement possible.[34] Others have argued that amnesties should be used to secure peace agreements, but then accountability measures can be pursued, possibly even reversing these amnesties over time.[35] In one discussion, Aryeh Neier, former president of the Open Society Foundations, argued that 'deals' could be made to secure the exit of leaders like Gaddafi, but that impunity must never be formalized.[36] Others have been more adamantly opposed to placing peace before justice and argued that in fact justice has helped to make peace possible in many cases, or that even if justice preceded peace in the past, there is no reason to assume that this sequence must be continually observed.[37]

Ultimately, an outcomes-based approach should evaluate the effects of sequencing on the short-term goal of peace not only because peace is a core value but also because it is essential for minimizing human rights abuses. It should also evaluate the impact of different sequencing strategies on the long-term goal of justice. Often, justice delayed may mean more and better justice. Trials of the major Nazi war criminals were pursued in the aftermath of military victory and facilitated by occupying powers that sought to stabilize and democratize Germany. Recent pursuits of justice in Chile

[31] Opening speech by Louise Arbour, 'Doctrines Derailed?: Internationalism's Uncertain Future', Global Briefing 2013, International Crisis Group (28 October 2013).

[32] L Moreno Ocamp, 'Between Bombing or Doing Nothing' (Huffington Post, 4 September 4 2013) <http://www.huffingtonpost.com/luis-moreno-ocampo/between-bombing-or-doing-_b_3869088.html> accessed 7 August 2014.

[33] A Dworkin, 'Europe Turns to the ICC on Syria—A Sign of Hopelessness?' (European Council on Foreign Relations, 23 April 2014) <http://www.ecfr.eu/content/entry/commentary_europe_turns_to_the_icc_on_syria_a_sign_of_hopelessness251> accessed 7 August 2014.

[34] Snyder and Vinjamuri (n 6).

[35] T Olsen et al., Transitional Justice in Balance: Comparing Processes, Weighing Efficacy (Washington D.C.: United States Institute of Peace Press 2010).

[36] A Neier on the Arab Revolutions (European Council on Foreign Relations, 9 March 2011) <http://www.ecfr.eu/content/entry/europe_and_the_arab_revolutions> accessed 7 August 2014.

[37] Human Rights Watch, 'Selling Justice Short' (n 2); K Sikkink, Justice Cascade: How Human Rights Prosecutions are Changing World Politics (New York: W.W. Norton & Company, Inc 2011).

and Argentina build on a platform of stable democratic institutions and run little risk of destabilizing the state. Quite the opposite, the arrest of Augusto Pinochet spurred additional efforts to deal with the past and has helped entrench a culture of democracy and accountability in Chile. Acknowledging past crimes may strengthen prior institutional reforms by setting the historical record straight.

Judicial interventions in ongoing atrocities present a challenge to the fundamental principle that law should be independent of politics. Advocates of the ICC and of international criminal tribunals generally reject the idea that justice can be coordinated with other international policy instruments, such as negotiations, sanctions, or military force, or that it can be sequenced based on domestic factors. But the assumption that justice can be pursued neutrally during conflict is inconsistent with the claim that justice can independently affect the prospects for peace by marginalizing some actors and empowering others.

History suggests that those judicial interventions with the greatest capacity to contribute to peace have depended for their success on prior political and military efforts. In Bosnia, Kosovo, Sierra Leone and elsewhere, diplomatic and military interventions have been highly coordinated. The successful creation of international tribunals has depended on the creation or imposition of a stable domestic balance of power. British military intervention in Sierra Leone helped to defeat the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) and thereby paved the way for the creation of the Special Court for Sierra Leone. Similarly, the ICTY only really made progress once the Serbs began to lose capacity on the ground and NATO intervention, combined with intensive diplomatic efforts, succeeded in producing a political settlement.[38] The indictment of Milošević was built on the back of a prior decision by NATO, highlighted by the bombing of Serbia, that Milošević was on the wrong side of politics. In Uganda, the failure to compel the LRA to capitulate despite the ICC indictments suggests that in the absence of superior military force or a stable negotiated settlement, judicial instruments have little effect.

2.4.2 Displacing the local Indicting alleged perpetrators during conflict threatens to undermine the complementarity principle central to the ICC that posits that national legal systems are the preferred locus for establishing accountability. In states where institutions are weak, politics are decentralized, and a high degree of instability persists, the prospects for domestic justice are low. Under such conditions, not only is securing arrests and convictions difficult but basic issues concerning who has the legitimacy, as well as the capacity, to govern may not yet have been resolved and admissibility challenges are more likely to fail than succeed.

Even where states have sufficient local capacity, the ability of local actors that are party to conflict to pursue a neutral justice, or to be seen to pursue a neutral justice, will be heavily compromised and is unlikely to be an immediate priority. The international pursuit of justice in this phase may therefore have the unintended consequence of creating a situation in which justice is routinely outsourced, thereby disenfranchising national actors and inhibiting efforts to embed accountability norms locally.

[38] L Vinjamuri, 'Justice, Peace and Deterrence in the Former Yugoslavia' (European Council on Foreign Relations) <http://www.ecfr.eu/ijp/case/bosnia_herzegovina> accessed 7 August 2014.

The pursuit of international justice during ongoing conflict may be deleterious for post-conflict state building as well. National leaders will be far better placed to make the case for domestic ownership of justice processes once conflict has been resolved. The pre-emptive pursuit of justice by external actors may restrict and inhibit the transnational and international linkages that can facilitate local autonomy, authority, and ownership of justice in post-conflict states. Outsourcing justice and removing options that are deemed to fall short of the gold standard of international justice together risk alienation of the local from the international project of accountability. Over time, this may contribute to a bifurcated system of global justice, with weak states subject to international authority and stronger democratic states answerable only to themselves. Paradoxically, efforts to institutionalize international justice through the ICC may mean abandoning the goal of decentralized justice. Absent this decentralization, the long-term prospects for the globalization of an accountability norm may suffer.

2.4.3 Impairing neutrality and undermining legitimacy

The prospect that international justice will be viewed as taking sides is great during ongoing conflict. In Uganda, the ICC has issued arrest warrants for rebels in the LRA, but has been criticized for failing to investigate government crimes. In Libya, the ICC was seen by many as an instrument that supported an American and European policy of regime change. The tribunal in Iraq was viewed as a means of legitimizing the American intervention that toppled Saddam Hussein's Sunni regime. And in the former Yugoslavia, Serbs continued to view the Yugoslav Tribunal as anti-Serb.[39]

Former or sitting heads of state indicted by international courts have challenged the legitimacy and authority of the courts that have indicted them. Milošević argued that the ICTY was both partial and illegitimate. Charles Taylor lodged similar claims against the Special Court for Sierra Leone upon his arrival at The Hague. Saddam Hussein blasted the Iraqi Special Tribunal for being the handmaiden of US imperialism; and al-Bashir and his cohort have accused the ICC of being illegitimate and having no proper authority on which to indict or prosecute them.[40]

The perception that international justice is neither neutral nor legitimate extends beyond cases where conflict is ongoing. The most sophisticated anti-ICC campaign emerged in Kenya, where Uhuru Kenyatta and William Rutu, both accused before the [39] 'Warrant Issued for Sudan's Leader', BBC News, 4 March 2009; al-Bashir also argued, 'You will find in all the world's countries that militants who take up arms against a government are classified as terrorists. Even those who resist occupation in Iraq, Afghanistan and Palestine are classified today as terrorists, except in Sudan. When some people take up arms, it's the government that's guilty'; quoted in 'ICC Prosecutor Makes Case against Sudan's President', PBS Newshour, 8 September 2009; on bias in favour of the government of Uganda, see T Raby, 'Advocacy, the International Criminal Court, and the Conflict in Northern Uganda' (Humanitarian Exchange Magazine, Humanitarian Practice Network, December 2006) <http://www.odihpn.org/humanitarian-exchange-magazine/issue-36/advocacy-the-international-criminal-court-and-the-conflict-in-northern-uganda> accessed 7 August 2014.

[40] For one example of the types of claims being made in response to the ICC's issuing of an arrest warrant against president Omar al-Bashir of Sudan, see 'Bashir Attacks West over Warrant', Al Jazeera, 5 March 2009.

ICC, forged the Jubilee Alliance to capitalize on their different ethnically defined voter bases and maximize their prospects for electoral success in the 2013 general elections. Anti-ICC rhetoric was central to their platform. The ICC was framed as an imperialist institution that constituted a threat to Kenya's sovereignty.

But the problem of neutrality has been exacerbated by the ICC's interventions in ongoing conflict. And the Court's dependence on states has increased its reluctance to alienate state officials.[41] This fact, combined with the reality that during ongoing hostilities local elites have been tempted to press for judicial intervention as a mechanism to undermine or discredit their opponents, increases the difficulties that international criminal tribunals face in maintaining their neutrality.

2.4.4 Raising the stakes for justice

Finally, emphasizing the capacity of justice to deter crimes in situations of ongoing conflict sets a very high bar for success. Sceptics will continue to find failed deterrence an easy basis for attack because, as scholars have long recognized, successful deterrence is notoriously hard to identify. International justice institutions lack the enforcement capabilities that are essential to delivering credible threats.[42] Justifications that stress outcomes also undermine the basic claim that justice is inherently valuable. International criminal justice instead is treated as one among many interchangeable policy tools used to manage conflict, alongside negotiations, economic sanctions, and military force.[43] If justice cannot bring peace and reduce violence as effectively as these other instruments, then logically it follows that it should be replaced.

The new trend towards results-based assessments and effects-based advocacy has not been supported by conclusive evidence.[44] A study by Human Rights Watch claims that the potential of justice to contribute to peace has been 'sold short', and that in many cases international justice has helped establish the rule of law, deter further atrocities, and prevent future cycles of violence.[45] In contrast, a study of the ICTY's effectiveness argues that the evidence 'did not provide an adequate basis for even provisional conclusions' to assess the ICTY's deterrent effect.[46] The report instead pointed to the Tribunal's role in contributing to the removal of criminals from the former Yugoslavia and its role in promoting local justice. Some recent research identifies the positive effects of international justice on democracy and deterrence.[47] But other [41] D Bosco, Rough Justice: The International Criminal Court in a World of Power Politics (New York: Oxford University Press 2014).

[42] K Cronin-Furman, 'Managing Expectations: International Criminal Trials and the Prospects for Deterrence of Mass Atrocity' (2013) 7 International Journal of Transitional Justice 434.

[43] Orentlicher, 'Shrinking the Space for Denial' (n 2).

[44] For an excellent review of much of the research that attempts to evaluate the effects of transitional justice, see Thoms et al. (n 6). For a recent study of the factors associated with transitional justice, see L Fletcher et al., 'Context, Timing and the Dynamics of Transitional Justice: A Historical Perspective' (2009) 31 Human Rights Quarterly 163.

[45] Human Rights Watch, 'Selling Justice Short' (n 2).

[46] Orentlicher, 'Shrinking the Space for Denial' (n 2) 16.

[47] Sikkink and Walling (n 19); Kim and Sikkink (n 19); Olsen et al., Transitional Justice in Balance (n 35); T Olsen et al., 'The Justice Balance: When Transitional Justice Improves Human Rights and Democracy' (2010) 32 Human Rights Quarterly 980; H Binningsbø et al., 'Civil War and Transitional Justice, 1946–2003: A Dataset' (paper presented to the workshop 'Transitional Justice in the Settlement studies suggest justice has had little independent effect on peace or democracy, or has even catalysed negative unintended consequences.[48] A review of the research on the effects of transitional justice argues that there was little evidence of the positive impact of trials on peace, and no sustained support for the claim that justice is necessary for peace or that it brings about peace faster.[49]

Careful qualitative empirical research may force advocates to qualify their claims and introduce statements that set out the conditions under which international trials will be successful. The claim that pursuing criminal trials is absolutely necessary for lasting peace is undermined by a number of significant and well-researched cases. Negotiated settlements in Mozambique and El Salvador were built on the back of amnesties and more recently, peace negotiators have sometimes simply deferred considerations of accountability, opting instead for a strategic 'silence'.[50] Factors entirely unrelated to international justice appear to be far more significant in explaining the sustainability of peace. For example, some studies of international justice have argued that military factors, especially one-sided victories, are a greater predictor of peace than any effort to bring war criminals to justice.[51]

Similarly, claims that justice can and should be a central component of democracy promotion may be undermined by empirical research. Successful transitions in Spain, Brazil, and Portugal were built on a buried past. The potential destabilizing effect of recent efforts in Spain to uncover the abuses of the Franco era was cushioned by a consolidated democratic state with robust institutions capable of ensuring respect for rights and the rule of law. Amnesties in Chile and Argentina helped to contain powerful spoilers who might otherwise have obstructed democratic transitions. Challenges to these amnesties in the past decade have been mounted with the support of democratic systems with strong civilian controls over the military. In each of these cases, if justice for the perpetrators of mass atrocities is now being served, it is the handmaiden of peace and not its usher.

Despite the publicity that international justice continues to receive, the uncertainty that surrounds recent indictments is likely to lead to a protracted debate about the effects of ICC arrest warrants in conflict situations. Mediators and local political elites have continued to use amnesties; and as amnesties for certain categories of crimes have been abandoned, those in power have opted for silence on the question of accountability. Writing justice into peace agreements and negotiations continues to of Conflicts and Kidnapping', Bogotá, Colombia, 18–19 October 2005); and T Lie et al., 'Post-Conflict Justice and Sustainable Peace' (2007) Post-conflict Transitions Working Paper No. 5, World Bank Policy Research Working Paper 4191 <http://www-wds.worldbank.org/servlet/WDSContentServer/WDSP/IB/2007/04/09/000016406_20070409111614/Rendered/PDF/wps4191.pdf> accessed 7 August 2014.

[48] S Nouwen, Complementarity in the Line of Fire: The Catalysing Effect of the International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2013).

[49] Thoms et al. (n 6). Others note that since 1945, wars that have been followed by sustained peace have more often than not achieved these results in the absence of accountability.

[50] H Cobban, Amnesty after Atrocity: Healing Nations after Genocide and War Crimes (Boulder: Paradigm Publishers 2007). The absence of any reference to accountability has characterized many wars that were followed by sustained periods of peace. Since 1990, international justice has more often been associated with sustained peace when it was pursued at least two years after a war ended.

[51] Thoms et al. (n 6).

be rare.[52] In Zimbabwe the costs and benefits of an amnesty programme are debated internally, but the plausibility for international recognition of such a strategy is low. Progress in Uganda has been stalled in part due to the indictment of LRA leaders. Recent efforts to end conflict in Afghanistan have focused on strategies designed to negotiate and reconcile with the Taliban. The continued use of amnesty since the end of the Cold War, and more broadly between 1970 and 2007, suggests that justice may still be considered a luxury good by those actively engaged in fighting and ending wars.[53] Especially in ongoing conflicts, amnesty remains a very popular tool. Of all armed conflicts resolved through a bargained solution, 45% contained amnesty provisions during the period 1946–2006. Indeed only 17% of civil wars during this period (1946–2006) resulted in trials.[54] This underscores a gap between the solutions proffered by the international community and those sought in states emerging from conflict.

What is at stake when the expectations outlined for international justice are set so high that justice is expected not only to spread the rule of law but also to deter crimes and bring peace? Indicting powerful nationals or rebels who are pivotal to the success of peace negotiations places international mediators in a very challenging position, except where they have a viable alternative negotiating partner. In these challenging cases, negotiators face a hard choice. They can ignore an indictment and accept the international moral opprobrium that attends negotiating with an indicted war criminal. Moral opprobrium is a sanction that penalizes not only its targets, but also third parties who fail to respect the spirit of justice. And so, arrest warrants may have the unintended consequence of increasing pressure on the international community to take more singular positions, using harder language and sometimes harder policy instruments, even military force, to force perpetrators to stand down. The prospect of a neutral intervention designed simply to stop atrocities becomes more difficult. In Libya, the perception that the ICC was one part of a broader Western strategy of regime change was intensified when the ICC issued an arrest warrant against Gaddafi.

The potential for a backlash against international justice even from its most likely supporters is stronger in cases where the ICC is set up to fail rather than to succeed. Early judicial interventions are risky because they can provoke humanitarian backsliding (as in Sudan), stall peace talks (as in Uganda), and intensify violent conflict (as in Libya). In this respect, early judicial intervention raises the stakes for the entire project of international justice.[55]

[52] L Vinjamuri and A Boesenecker, Peace Agreements and Accountability: Mapping Trends from 1980 to 2006 (Geneva: Centre for Humanitarian Dialogue 2007).

[53] T Olsen et al., 'Transitional Justice in the World, 1970–2007: Insights from a New Dataset' (2010) 47 Journal of Peace Research 803. On trends in amnesties, see L Mallinder, Amnesty, Human Rights and Political Transitions: Bridging the Peace and Justice Divide (Portland: Hart Publishing 2008). See also M Freeman, Necessary Evils: Amnesties and the Search for Justice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009).

[54] H Binningsbø et al., 'Armed Conflict and Post-Conflict Justice, 1946–2006: A Dataset' (2012) 49 Journal of Peace Research 731.

[55] For an example of this type of argument by sceptics, see A Natsios, 'A Disaster in the Making' (African Arguments, 12 July 2008) <http://africanarguments.org/2008/07/12/a-disaster-in-the-making/> accessed 7 August 2014.

2.5 Rewriting Justice

International justice has moved squarely into situations where conflict is ongoing. If it is to remain in this treacherous space, it will be politically impracticable not to investigate the effects it is having on events on the ground. This requires some real sense of the actual impact of pursuing justice in different types of states, and at different stages of conflict and peacebuilding. Despite the dilemmas these justice initiatives pose, the emphasis on outcomes has encouraged rigorous research and evaluation.

Does a lack of systematic evidence for the proclaimed effects of international justice mean that there are no grounds on which to defend its centrality in state building? Clearly not, and much important research is in process, or is only now being released, but it does raise a red flag.[56] Arguments on behalf of justice will benefit from modesty. Grandiose statements that attribute to international justice a single-handed ability to deliver peace stand a high chance of backfiring. Nor can the caution of sceptics be ignored by those engaged in post-conflict reconstruction and state building.[57] The lessons of history are often misread. There is reason for a healthy dose of scepticism among sceptics and advocates, if only to encourage debate and to displace dogmatism.

The pursuit of justice as an absolute and non-negotiable value in international politics may sometimes mean that other important goals are jeopardized. Selectively promoting justice in contexts where it is likely to deliver both more peace and more justice offers a more pragmatic and principled way of deploying a highly valuable, but also very limited resource. This also places a premium on systematic and rigorous empirical research, rather than faith, as the basis for promoting justice strategies. International justice is a limited resource that should be deployed both where it can be realized and where it can have the greatest positive effect on other values we hold in great stead, especially saving lives, ending conflicts, and building stable institutions.

As it is, mediators now face increasing pressure to introduce mechanisms for guaranteeing accountability into peace negotiations; their flexibility has been greatly limited.[58] Initiatives designed to bring accountability for mass atrocities have been integrated into the work of foreign aid and development agencies, and those NGOs whose main goal is monitoring human rights violations, negotiating peace, and rebuilding post-conflict states.[59] The claim that these initiatives are necessary for sustained peace and can play a critical role in deterring conflict has been widely articulated, and also broadly embedded as a practice in the mandates and operating guidelines of many [56] For example, see work by Binningsbø et al., 'Armed Conflict and Post-Conflict Justice, 1946–2006: A Dataset' (n 54).

[57] B Lebaw, 'The Irreconcilable Goals of Transitional Justice' (2008) 30 Human Rights Quarterly 95.

[58] Vinjamuri and Boesenecker (n 52).

[59] See M Avello, 'European Efforts in Transitional Justice' (2008) 58 Working Paper, Fundación para las Relaciones Internacionales y el Diálogo Exterior (FRIDE) <http://www.fride.org/download/WP58_Transitional_justice_ENG_sep08.pdf> accessed 7 August 2014. For an example of efforts by NGOs to ensure that development agencies embrace transitional justice, see International Center for Transitional Justice, 'Donor Strategies for Transitional Justice: Taking Stock and Moving Forward' (October 2007).

international organizations.[60] Even if this new research eventually produces a sustained evidence-based consensus, it is likely to generate debate for a considerable time to come. Evaluating the pursuit of justice during ongoing conflict is crucial. What we may discover is that contrary to the mantra that justice delayed is justice denied, the most promising way to promote justice may be to postpone it.

[60] On the normalization of accountability, see Teitel (n 1).

3

The Relationship between the ICC and the United Nations Security Council

*Deborah Ruiz Verduzco

3.1 Introduction

The relationship between the ICC (or Court) and the United Nations Security Council (Council)[1] was one of the stumbling blocks in the negotiations on the establishment of the Court. Negotiators devised this relationship based on two pillars, a 'positive one', i.e. the power of the Council to refer situations to the Court, and a 'negative one', i.e. the power of the Council to defer or suspend investigations or prosecutions.[2] These two pillars are reflected in the Rome Statute[3] in Articles 13(b) and 16. The 'negative pillar' was invoked a few days before the Statute entered into force in 2002 in SC Resolution 1422 (2002),[4] thereby inaugurating what has become ongoing practice on the part of the Council in relation to both pillars.[5]

This chapter analyses practice underlying the relationship between the Court and the Council. The emerging picture is characterized by friction. The Court has benefited from Council practice. The Court has become a central institution in the international legal arena, partly due to interaction with the Council. But this relationship

* PhD; former Deputy Director of the International Law and Human Rights Programme, Parliamentarians for Global Action. This chapter is based on a doctoral thesis defended in 2011 at the Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies, Geneva supervised by Professor Andrew B. Clapham and Emeritus Professor Vera Gowland-Debbas.

[1] See generally P Gargiulo, 'The Relationship between the ICC and the Security Council' in F Lattanzi and W Schabas (eds), The International Criminal Court: Comments on the Draft Statute (Napoli: Il Sirente 1998), 95–119; L Yee, 'The International Criminal Court and the Security Council Articles 13(b) and 16' in R Lee, The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute Issues, Negotiations, Results, ed. Roy Lee (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999), 143–52; J Trahan, 'The Relationship between the International Criminal Court and the UN Security Council' (2013) 24 Criminal Law Forum 417–73.

[2] On 'positive' and 'negative pillars', see F Berman, 'The Relationship between the International Criminal Court and the Security Council' in H von Hebel et al. (eds.), Reflections on the International Criminal Court: Essays in Honour of Adriaan Bos (The Hague 1999) 173–80.

[3] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('Rome Statute').

[4] UNSC Res 1422 (17 July 2002) UN Doc S/RES/1422. See also renewal of deferral in UNSC Res 1487 (12 June 2003) UN Doc S/RES/187.

[5] A third type of interaction relates to the Court's jurisdiction over the crime of aggression as defined by Resolution 6, Review Conference of the Rome Statute, RC/Res 6, 11 June 2010. See generally C McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2013); R Clark, Chapter 31 in this volume.

and, in particular, approaches of the Council relating to the 'positive pillar' have posed considerable challenges for the Court.[6]

This contribution examines these dilemmas. It argues that the interplay between the two institutions can be understood through three general lenses: a 'functionalist' logic, portraying the ICC as a 'tool' of the Council[7]; a contrasting vision, stressing judicial independence and the need for institutional autonomy; and one purporting the Council as executive enforcement organ for the ICC, thereby supporting the functionality of the Rome Statute. All three dimensions have become evident in different areas of practice. This chapter first treats developments and challenges in relation to the 'positive pillar', i.e. (i) referrals, (ii) funding, (iii) cooperation and enforcement, and (iv) other Council support for ICC action. It then examines (v) deferral practice. It concludes with some targeted recommendations to improve the status quo.

3.2 The Relationship between the Court and the Council: Three Theories

The relationship between the ICC and the Council can be theorized in terms of three different models: Council-related functionality, institutional autonomy, and Rome Statute-centred functionality.

3.2.1 The ICC as an instrument of international peace and security

It is typically argued that the ICC serves as an entity to strengthen international peace and security. The Court was established within the tradition of peace maintenance. This is reflected in the preamble of the Statute and the relationship to the Council, which is the primary organ tasked with the responsibility to address threats to international peace and security, and empowered to do so under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.[8]

[6] H Mistry and D Ruiz Verduzco (rapporteurs), 'The UN Security Council and the International Criminal Court', Chatham House and Parliamentarians for Global Action (March 2012) ('Chatham House, SC and the ICC'); B Stagno Ugarte, 'Strengthening the Rule of Law through the United Nations Security Council', Australian National University (September 2012) ('Stagno, Strengthening the Rule of Law 2012'); Concept Note of the Open Debate of the Security Council on 'peace and justice' with a special focus on the ICC, 17 October 2012, in Letter dated 1 October 2012 from the Permanent Representative of Guatemala to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary General UN Doc S/2012/731 (17 October 2012) ('Concept Note 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice'); UNSC 6849th meeting (17 October 2012) UN Docs S/PV6849 and S/PV6849 Resumption 1 ('UNSC 6849th meeting') ('2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting'); The Rule of Law: The Security Council and Accountability, Security Council Report (January 2013) ('Security Council Report, 2013 Rule of Law Report'); The Relationship Between the ICC and the Security Council: Challenges and Opportunities, International Peace Institute (March 2013) ('IPI, ICC and Security Council 2013'); D Kaye et al., The Council and the Court: Improving Security Council Support to the Court, School of Law University of California Irvine (May 2013); Report of the Court on the Status of Ongoing Cooperation between the International Criminal Court and the United Nations, including in the field, ICC Doc ICC-ASP/12/42 (14 October 2013) ('Report of the Court on ICC–UN Cooperation').

[7] On ICC–UN relations, see Negotiated Relationship Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the United Nations (adopted by the Assembly of States Parties ICC-ASP/3/Res 1 on 7 September 2004, by the UN General Assembly UNGA Res 58/318 on 13 September 2004 UN Doc A/RES/58/318, entered into force 4 October 2004) ('UN–ICC Relationship Agreement').

[8] Charter of the United Nations, 24 October 1945, 1 UNTS XVI ('UN Charter').

The power of the Council to refer situations to the ICC is partly grounded in the precedent of the establishment of ad hoc tribunals, which were established as subsidiary organs of the Council.[9] These tribunals were created as judicial mechanisms under Chapter VII of the UN Charter to adjudicate crimes under international law. This mode of establishment avoided delays and helped materialize the idea of a permanent tribunal.[10]

This vision of the link between criminal justice, peace, and security was ultimately retained in the Rome Statute. It is reflected in the preamble which recognizes grave crimes as threatening the peace, security, and well-being of the world, and in the activation of the 'positive' and 'negative' pillars under the Statute, which require a decision by the Council under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

The idea that the ICC serves as an instrument of the Council is reaffirmed by contemporary practice. In its referrals to the Court, the Council has routinely acknowledged that the referred situations 'constitute a threat to international peace and security'. In its declarations, the Council has highlighted the 'contribution of the International Criminal Court… in the fight against impunity for the most serious crimes of concern to the international community'.[11] This thinking is expressly reflected in Council's rhetoric. In the first ever open debate on the ICC, the discussion sought to, among others, 'explore how the ICC, as a tool of preventive diplomacy, can assist the UNSC in carrying out its mandate…'.[12] The Russian delegate conceded that '[t]he Council has a serious new tool with which to achieve [the] goal of bringing persons guilty of particularly serious crimes under international law'.[13] The idea of the ICC as a tool is also reflected in United States discourse.[14]

This approach has attraction for some, but may entail dangerous consequences when taken to the extreme. The leverage of international justice is weakened if it is used as a tool by the Council to promote specific political agendas. In its most evil version, ICC intervention may be perceived as a 'tool' to promote regime change, or as a corollary to military intervention.

The use of the ICC at the service of the Council has come at a price. It places a considerable burden on those States Parties that participate in Council decision-making. Entrenched positions about the Court held by certain permanent members, especially China, the Russian Federation, and the United States (which are not Parties to the [9] Statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute').

[10] Art 25 and commentary, Draft Statute of an International Criminal Tribunal, Report of the Working Group on a Draft Statute for an ICC, ILC UN Doc A/CN.4/L.490 and Add.1 (March 1993), Annex, ILC Yearbook 45th sess UN Doc A/CN.4/SER.A/1993/Add.1 (Part 2, 1993), 109, reads: 'The Working Group felt that a provision such as this one was necessary in order to enable the Security Council to make use of the Court, as an alternative to establishing tribunals ad hoc.'

[11] SC Presidential Statement 2012/1 (19 January 2012) UN Doc S/PRST/2012/1; SC Press Statement (5 July 2012) UN Doc SC/10700. For a variant, see SC Presidential Statement 2013/8 (17 June 2013) UN Doc S/PRST/2013/8.

[12] Concept Note 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice (n 6), para. 6.

[13] Statement of Ambassador Churkin, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting (n 6), 19.

[14] Statement of Ambassador Rice, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting (n 6), 8.

Statute), and other non-permanent members, often make it necessary to make concessions or compromises that weaken the Court. The decision to trigger ICC action in delicate political contexts creates a 'catch 22'. If the Court faces problems in tackling violence, it is perceived as a weak actor that is irrelevant and powerless in the face of extremely complex human catastrophes. Conversely, when the Court is effective, political actors worry about the 'serious political and legal consequences [that] sometimes follow Court engagement'.[15] Alternative ad hoc or regional solutions for accountability are put forward, or worse, accountability is neglected.

3.2.2 Institutional autonomy

The idea of the ICC as an 'enforcement tool of the Council' stands in conflict with concerns of judicial independence and with the necessary separation between the 'judicial' and the 'political' space. The plea for institutional autonomy has a long tradition. The vision of 'separate mandates and separate operation' dominated the Cold War era early negotiations for an international criminal jurisdiction. The Draft Statute prepared in 1991 by the ILC provided a modest role to the Security Council. For the ILC, maintaining security or peace was incompatible with the institution of criminal proceedings.[16] Keeping both organs separated, it was argued, would avoid damaging the credibility of the international court by lowering the risk of a political organ preventing genuine cases from reaching it.[17] This vision endured until 1993, which saw the naissance of the ad hoc tribunals.

In the negotiations of the Rome Statute, voices remained divided in relation to prerogatives of the Council, in light of the need to preserve judicial independence. Calls for greater institutional autonomy have gained new attention with contemporary criticisms of the interplay between the Court and the Council. In contemporary practice, the Council has 'not convincingly demonstrate[d] an exemplary commitment to the Court and its pursuit of international accountability'.[18] Former ICTY Prosecutor Louise Arbour has famously argued that the linkage to the Council 'has in fact underscore[d] the Court's impotence rather than enhance[d] its alleged deterrent effect'.[19] For this [15] Statement of Ambassador Churkin, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting (n 6), 19; Kaye, The Council and the Court (n 6), 12–13.

[16] Ninth Report on the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, by Mr Doudou Thiam, Special Rapporteur UN Doc A/CN.4/435 (8 February) and UN Doc A/CN.4/435.Add.l (15 March 1991), Section C, Criminal Proceedings, paras 56 and 58, in ILC Ybook 43rd Sess UN Doc A/CN.4/SER.A/1991/Add.l (Part 1) (1991). A role for the Council was only necessary in relation to aggression, given that this crime, contrary to the other crimes, entails 'significant violation[s] of international peace'.

[17] Eighth Report on the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, by Mr Doudou Thiam, Special Rapporteur (8 March 1990) UN Doc A/CN.4/430 and(6 April 1990) UN Doc A/CN.4/430 Add.l in ILC Ybook 42nd Sess UN Doc A/CN.4/SER.A/1990/Add.l (Part 2) (1990). See also ILC Meeting 2155th, Mr McCaffrey, para. 39 and Meeting 2156th, Mr Njenga, para. 63; Arts 5 and 2, Eleventh Report on the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, by Mr Doudou Thiam, Special Rapporteur (25 March 1993) UN Doc A/CN.4/449 and Corr 1 in ILC Ybook 45th Sess UN Doc A/CN.4/SER.A/1993/ and Add.l (1993).

[18] Chatham House, SC and the ICC (n 6), 9.

[19] L Arbour, 'Doctrine Derailed: Internationalism's Uncertain Future' (International Crisis Group Global Briefing, 28 October 2013) <http://www.crisisgroup.org/en/publication-type/speeches/2013/arbour-doctrines-derailed-internationalism-s-uncertain-future.aspx> accessed 1 November 2013.

reason, there are calls 'to be more strategic about the convergence of justice with the resolution of armed conflict'[20] and also certain regrets about past choices.[21]

3.2.3 The Council as executive enforcement organ

A third way to theorize the relationship between the Council and the Court is to view the Council as an organ for the enforcement of the ICC statutory regime. The Council may to some extent be regarded as an 'executive arm' of the ICC system. This approach was reflected in the very first proposal for an international criminal tribunal, put forward in 1818 by Alexander I of Russia to create a supranational mechanism to prosecute individuals engaged in the slave trade. The proposal recognized expressly that additional executive authority was necessary to enforce the decisions of such mechanism.[22] It stated that the international tribunal should have a naval force at its disposal to search and detain slave-trade vessels. A supreme council was charged with the mandate to coordinate the operations of the naval force, execute the orders of the tribunal, and report back to the organization's member states.[23]

A newer version of this model was proposed by Hans Kelsen in his 1944 treatise Peace through Law, written as a reaction to the failure of the League of Nations. Kelsen incorporated the idea of executive enforcement of judicial acts in his proposal for the 'Organisation for the Maintenance of Peace'. In his design, judicial adjudication, including over individuals, was a central function of the organization. He recognized that this type of activity required an executive arm. He suggested the creation of a permanent Council (to be composed of the United Kingdom, the United States, the USSR, and China) to enforce judicial activity (e.g. to adopt binding decisions, execute the decisions of the Court, and sanction those who failed to abide by its decisions).[24]

The Rome Statute incorporates traces of this vision.[25] The Court derives its jurisdiction from the jurisdiction of states. By ratifying the Rome Statute, states recognized pre-existing obligations over individuals in international law, [26] and established an additional jurisdiction to prosecute them.[27] A similar premise underlies the

[20] Ibid.

[21] Y Boisvert, 'Accuser le Président du Soudan a été une erreur, croit Louise Arbour', La Presse 15 June 2013 <http://plus.lapresse.ca/screens/4609-bec8-51bb361c-aec5-0582ac1c6068%7C_0> accessed 3 March 2015.

[22] See Opinion du Cabinet de Russie sur la Traite des Nègres, (Aix-la-Chapelle, 7 November 1818), enclosure 1 of 'Letter from Viscount Castlereagh to Earl Bathurst' in British State Foreign Papers 6 (1818–19), 68–9 (author's translation from French).

[23] Ibid.

[24] Covenant of a Permanent League for the Maintenance of Peace, Treaty Stipulations Establishing Individual Responsibility for Violations of International Law, Annex II in Hans Kelsen, Peace through Law (New York and Chapel Hill: UNC Press, 1944). For similar models of proposed tribunals with executive organs at their service, see also International Law Association, Draft Statute of the International Penal Court, 34th Report (1927), reproduced in ILC, Historical Survey of the Question of International Criminal Jurisdiction (1949) UN Doc A/CN.4/7/Rev.l, 67 ('Historical Survey'); Association du droit pénale internationale, Draft Statute for the Creation of a Criminal Chamber of the International Court of Justice (revised 1946), reproduced in Historical Survey, 75, art 36.

[25] It recognizes that the Court deals with 'the most serious crimes of concern to the international community'. See Preamble, Rome Statute.

[26] L Sadat, 'The International Criminal Court and Universal International Jurisdiction: A Return to First Principles' in T Biersteker et al. (eds), Law and International Relations: Bridging Theory and Practice (London–New York: Routledge, 2006) 187.

[27] Report of the Secretary General pursuant to para. 2 of UNSC Res 808 UN Doc S/25704 (3 May 1993), paras 22, 25–7.

jurisdiction of the ad hoc tribunals. Their jurisdiction was founded on crimes that were 'a part of international customary law',[28] or that had been ratified by treaty by the state over whose individuals the tribunals were exercising jurisdiction. Without this precondition, the Council would have been effectively legislating and therefore acting ultra vires.[29]

In relation to the ICC, the same principles must apply. Given its limitations to legislate, the Council is in principle bound to frame accountability based on pre-existing obligations when referring a situation to the Court. Legally, a Council referral does create a new jurisdiction, but also activates a pre-existing one. In such circumstances, the ICC is thus not a 'tool' in the legal sense. Rather, the Council acts as executive organ, i.e. the police that enforce the rules guarded by a judicial organ. This vision of the Council as enforcer of statutory obligations emerged throughout the negotiations of the Rome Statute. It is in particular reflected in the power of the Council to extend ICC jurisdiction and obligations of cooperation to States not Parties, and in the expected role of the Council to address instances of non-cooperation (see 3.5).

In practice, all three models are used on a case-by-case basis. Positions and assessments of participants in the system (mainly states) often drift from one vision to the other, with sometimes contradictory outcomes. This is partly rooted in the nature of the Council. The Council is, above all, a political body. Its decisions often have a rhetorical and symbolic value; they 'send signals' and position its members.[30] This institutional setting differs from that of the Court. The Court relies on fact-based decision-making. It needs to interpret language judicially. This has created tensions in interaction in various areas: the triggering of ICC jurisdiction, funding, cooperation, enforcement, and deferrals.

3.3 The Framing of Referrals

Security Council referrals have given rise to significant controversies. Article 13(b) allows the Council to refer a situation to the Court, activating its jurisdiction regardless of the consent of the state of territory or nationality, which is otherwise constrained to the territories and the nationals of States Parties.[31] The Council has referred two situations to the Court concerning acts committed in the territory of two States not Parties: Sudan (Darfur)[32] and Libya.[33]

A referral is typically considered 'positive' because it empowers the Court, by granting it jurisdiction that it might otherwise not have. The two referrals from the Council

[28] Ibid.

[29] But see M Milanovic, 'Is the Rome Statute Binding on Individuals? (And Why We Should Care),' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 27; R Bartels 'Dealing with the Principle of Proportionality in Armed Conflict in Retrospect: The Application of the Principle in International Criminal Trials' (2013) 46 Israel Law Review 2, 311–12.

[30] I Johnstone, 'Security Council Deliberations: The Power of the Better Argument' (2003) 14 European Journal of International Law 3, 439.

[31] Art 13(b) of the Statute.

[32] UNSC Res 1593 (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/RES/1593 ('SC Res 1593').

[33] UNSC Res 1970 (26 February 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1970 ('SC Res 1970').

to the Court have enjoyed sufficient, even considerable, support within the Council.[34] They have been based on concrete evidence regarding the commission of crimes under international law.[35] These features have led to the endorsement of ICC referrals as a potential response mechanism in the UN system.

But referrals have also created problems. They have been accompanied by a questionable delimitation of jurisdiction ratione personae which exempts certain nationals from the scope of ICC jurisdiction. Security Council Resolutions 1593 (2005) and 1970 (2011) provide that:

> [N]ationals, current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State outside Sudan which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that contributing State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to operations in Sudan established or authorized by the Council or the [African Union], unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by that contributing State.[36]

This limitation has been a cause of concern. Referrals are mainly intended to activate jurisdiction. Particular steps were taken to prevent selectivity and protect ICC independence. Safeguards were introduced to ensure that the prosecutor would maintain its discretion regarding whether or not to commence an investigation.[37] The power of referral was restricted to 'situations' rather than 'cases' in order to preserve the integrity of ICC proceedings and prevent the 'singling out' of specific individuals.[38]

The exemption language in Security Council Resolutions 1593 (2005) and 1970 (2011) goes against the Rome Statute. The exemption made in Security Council Resolution 1593 (Darfur) was promoted by the United States in line with its domestic legislation which precludes contributions to UN peace operations unless the UN SC Resolution establishing or authorizing the operation exempts US soldiers from ICC jurisdiction.[39] This legislation seeks to reverse the effects of Article 12 of the Rome Statute, which grants the Court jurisdiction over any acts committed in the territory of States Parties. Through Resolutions 1422 (2002) and 1487 (2003), adopted as [34] SC Res 1593 was adopted with 11 votes to 4 abstentions (Algeria, Brazil, China, and the United States). SC Res 1970 was adopted with 15 votes.

[35] Report of the International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur to the United Nations Secretary General, UN Doc S/2005/60 (1 February 2005), esp. para. 568. In the case of Libya, the extent of crimes was corroborated a few months after the referral; see Report of the International Commission of Inquiry to investigate all alleged violations of international human rights law in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya established pursuant to UN Human Rights Council, Resolution S-15/2 of 25 February 2011, UN Doc A/HRC/17/44 (1 June 2011), esp. 7.

[36] SC Res 1593, para. 6. A quasi-identical provision, not mentioning operations by the AU, is contained in para. 6 of SC Resolution 1970 (2011).

[37] Among provisions that safeguard the judicial independence of the Court is the chapeau of Art 13, which provides: '[T]he Court may exercise its jurisdiction… in accordance with the provisions of this Statute.'

[38] See, inter alia, Berman (n 2) 174; C Bassiouni, International Criminal Law (Irvington-on-Hudson: Transnational 1997) 515. This interpretation of the Statute was the basis for the Prosecutor's refusal to limit the situation of Uganda to acts committed by the LRA, despite the wording of the original referral. See Letter of the Prosecutor to the Presidency dated 17 June 2004 contained in 'Decision Assigning the Situation in Uganda to Pre-Trial Chamber II' ICC-02/04-1, Presidency, ICC, 5 July 2005.

[39] US American Service Members Protection Act of 2002 HR 4775 Public Law 107–206, Title II (2 August 2002), Sec 2005.

preconditions to the renewal of the peacekeeping operation in Bosnia (UNPROFOR), the Council seemingly deferred any prosecution or investigation involving nationals of States not Parties, thus providing a concrete precedent for a peacekeeping exemption clause in Resolution 1593 (2005).

Within the Council, only Brazil abstained, as it considered it 'unwarranted and unhelpful' to grant immunities from the jurisdiction of the Court.[40] In joining the consensus for Resolution 1970 (2011) on Libya[41], Brazil reiterated its 'strong reservation concerning paragraph 6' which exempted nationals of States not Parties from the jurisdiction of the Court. It expressed the 'conviction that initiatives aimed at establishing exemptions of certain categories of individuals from the jurisdiction of the ICC are not helpful to advancing the cause of justice and accountability and will not contribute to strengthening the role of the Court'.[42]

These exemptions were difficult to justify in rational terms. When the resolutions were adopted, there was no threat of prosecution of US peacekeepers.[43] In 2005 there was only an African Union (AU) peacekeeping force in place. The African Union–United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID), to which the US contributes through a regular UN budget, was only established in 2007.[44] These safeguards were thus mainly a means to control the Court pro futuro.

The exemption clause has created problems of perception. It highlights the application of double standards by the Council and powerful states. It suggests that the Court can be used to attack some while protecting others.[45] Ironically, many of the detractors of the Court and of the referral of the situation in Darfur benefit from the exemption clause. Both, the African Union Mission in Sudan (AMIS) and UNAMID drew mainly on nationals of States not Parties, including China, Egypt, Iran, Rwanda, the Russian Federation, and Zimbabwe.[46] In Libya several States not Parties, such as Turkey, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates, and the United States undertook military operations along with [40] Statement of Ambassador Sardenberg, UNSC 5158th meeting (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/PV/5158, 11. See also Statement of Ambassador Baja (Philippines), 6. But see statements by Ambassador Majoral (Argentina) and Ambassador de la Sablière (France) acquiescing to the limitation imposed by SC Res 1593, ibid., 7 and 8.

[41] In its SC Res 1970, the 12th preambular paragraph makes reference to Art 16.

[42] Statement of Ambassador Viotti, UNSC 6491st meeting (26 February 2011) UN Doc S/PV/6491, 7.

[43] Citing data from the Coalition for the International Criminal Court, C Stahn, 'The Ambiguities of Security Council Resolution 1422 (2002)' (2003) 14 European Journal International Law 1, 87 and n 9. In August 2003, however, the United States identified a concrete threat to prosecution when the Council authorized the establishment of a peacekeeping mission in Liberia through Resolution 1497 (2003). Therefore, it secured a clause to uphold the exclusive jurisdiction of sending States not Parties over their officials or personnel. UNSC Resolution 1497 (1 August 2003) UN Doc S/RES/1497, para. 7.

[44] The United States contributes to UNAMID through the regular budget of the United Nations. Consent from the host state is necessary to send troops. It is unlikely that Sudan would approve US troop contribution to UNAMID.

[45] Kaye (n 6), 22.

[46] Contributors to AMIS (African Union Mission in Sudan, 2004–7) included mainly Rwanda, a State not Party, and Nigeria. Eventually, Egypt and India, as well other States Parties, contributed to AMIS. UNAMID has military personnel from the following States not Parties to the Rome Statute: Cameroon, China, Egypt, Ethiopia, Indonesia, Iran, Kyrgyzstan, Malaysia, Nepal, Pakistan, Palau, Rwanda, Thailand, Togo, Turkey, Yemen, and Zimbabwe. See UNAMID, UN Mission's Contributions by Country, 30 September 2013 <www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/missions/unamid/facts.shtml> accessed 9 October 2013.

States Parties.[47] These operations fall under the exemption of paragraph 6 of Resolution 1970 (2011), to the extent that they are authorized by the United Nations under Resolution 1973 (2011).[48]

The practical effect of the clauses on the Court has been limited. In practice, the Office of the Prosecutor has not treated the clause as an obstacle to analysis or investigation. For instance, in his second report to the Council in relation to Libya, the prosecutor acknowledged the existence of allegations of war crimes by all those engaging in armed confrontation, including NATO forces.[49] Similarly, the Pre-Trial Chamber has reaffirmed the full applicability of the Rome Statute to referrals by the Council. For example, when analysing the request for a warrant of arrest against the President of Sudan the Chamber recalled its view that the Council had accepted the statutory framework established in the Statute by referring the situation to the Court.[50] This might be read as an indication of the applicability of the entire Statute, irrespective of any contrary limitations contained in the resolution.

The Court had only limited opportunity to assess the impact of such exemptions on its own jurisdiction. Legally, the Court might challenge the binding force of these clauses under the Statute, and argue that they are incompatible with Article 12(2) and Article 27, thereby severing this provision from the overall referral.[51] But thus far, the respective exemptions did not play a meaningful role in practice. They might be considered 'incidents of bad practice, devoid of any precedential value'.[52] Unless this language becomes the norm in future decisions of the Council[53], its negative effect lies mostly in its dangerous erosion of the principle of equality before the law and the judicial independence of the Court.

3.4 The Funding of Referrals

The approach towards costs incurred by Council referrals has been a second major challenge in the relationship between the two entities. Although the Rome Statute

[47] NATO operation Unified Protector Fact sheet (October 2011) <http://www.nato.int/nato_static_fl2014/assets/pdf/pdf_2011_10/20111005_111005-factsheet_protection_civilians.pdf> accessed 1 September 2013.

[48] The United States has considered their operations in Libya as authorized by Resolution 1973 (2011), see H Koh, Statement regarding the use of force in Libya (26 March 2011) <www.state.gov/s/l/releases/remarks/159201.htm> accessed 1 September 2013. See also 'Authority to Use Military Force in Libya: Memorandum Opinion for the Attorney General' (2011) 35 Opinions of the Office of Legal Counsel. Contra, 'Transcript of Interview to Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lvrov,' TV Tsentr Channel Post Scriptum, 1 May 2011 <http://www.russianembassy.org.za/IA/Brics3.html> accessed 15 January 2012; 'Libya: Russia Decries French Arms Drop to Libya Rebels' BBC News, 30 June 2011.

[49] Second Report of the Prosecutor of the ICC to the UN Security Council pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011) (2 November 2011), paras 44, 53, 57, and 58. See Statement by the Russian Federation, UNSC Meeting 6620th (16 September 2011) UN Doc S/PV.6620, 3.

[50] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Prosecutor v Omar Hassan Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, para. 45.

[51] Supporting the possibility of judicial review of Security Council resolutions for the purpose of the Rome Statute see, inter alia, Stahn (n 43), 102; Trahan (n 1), at n 72 and 472.

[52] C Kress, 'The International Criminal Court and the United States. Reflections on Resolution 1422 of the UN Security Council' (2003) 77 Fikrun Wa Fann Art & Thought, 70.

[53] But see Draft Resolution on the Referral of Syria, UN Doc S/2014/348 (22 May 2014), para. 7.

provides for the possibility of funding from the United Nations, the regular budget of the Court—including the costs associated with the investigation and prosecution of the two situations referred by the Council—has been solely funded by the States Parties.

The Council has been a vehicle for implementing the position of the United States towards the ICC. This has had an impact on the funds available to the Court. The US Consolidated Appropriations Public Law of 2000, amended in 2002, prohibits any funds from being 'obligated for use by, or for support of, the International Criminal Court'.[54] With this, the United States successfully conditioned their support or 'lack of opposition'[55] for, inter alia, the adoption of Resolutions 1593 (2005) and 1970 (2011), to the inclusion of an operative paragraph, identical in both resolutions whereby it is

> [r]ecognize[d] that none of the expenses incurred in connection with the referral, including expenses related to investigations or prosecutions in connection with that referral, shall be borne by the United Nations and that such costs shall be borne by the parties to the Rome Statute and those States that wish to contribute voluntarily.[56]

The decision of the Council regarding referrals implied that States Parties had to cover the costs of these measures. Between 2005 and 2013, the Court budgeted approximately €31.9 million for direct costs, i.e. those that can be identified as devoted to a specific situation associated with the referrals of the Council.[57] These estimated costs do not consider unquantifiable indirect costs, which amount to an average of €20 million per year for all situations.[58]

The language in the referrals is contrary to the common purpose of both organizations. It runs contrary to the policy justification for referrals by the Council, which is to fulfil demands for accountability while eliminating the high costs of ad hoc tribunals. The Rome Statute articulates this purpose and policy decision in Article 115, which provides two main sources to cover the expenses of the Court and the Assembly of States Parties (ASP): (a) assessed contributions made by States Parties, and (b) funds provided by the United Nations, subject to the approval of the General Assembly, in particular in relation to the expenses incurred due to referrals by the Security Council.[59]

[54] Consolidated Appropriations FY2000, Public Law 106–13, Sec 705 (29 November 1999) and amended by Hyde Amendment (US House Amendment, 10 January 2002).

[55] The policy of the United States was clearly articulated upon the adoption of SC Res 1593, when Ambassador Patterson stated that the 'principle [of no funding] is extremely important and we want to be perfectly clear that any effort to retrench on that principle by this or other organisations to which we contribute could result in our withholding funding or taking other action in response'. UNSC 5158th Meeting (n 40) 4.

[56] SC Res 1593, para. 7; SC Res 1970, para. 8.

[57] The Court does not produce reports on consolidated and integral costs associated with referrals from the UN Security Council. But the structure of the proposed budget allows it to identify direct costs per year per situation. The total calculated request for 2014 is €31,912,800.00, see 2014 Proposed Programme Budget of the ICC, ICC-ASP/12/10, 29 July 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties), data from Table 1.

[58] See ibid., 'operational costs' column, which constitute indirect costs for all the situations under the Court's jurisdiction.

[59] See Art 115 of the Statute. In addition, the Rome Statute allows for voluntary contributions from varied entities, such as governments, international organizations, individuals, or corporations, Rome Statute, Art 116. The Financial Rules and Regulations, adopted by the ASP, recognize that the Court may be entitled to other funds. Financial Regulation 5, adopted 9 September 2002, ICC-ASP/1/3 (Part. II-D),

Although both sources of funding are considered in equal terms in the Rome Statute, and both are governed by the term 'shall' (thus reflecting the obligation of States Parties to contribute to the budget of the Court), Article 115 is not and could not constitute an instruction to the United Nations to provide funding to the Court. In fact, Article 115(b) illustrates the very early opposition to providing the ICC with fully fledged financial support. Article 115(b) was the compromise between those states that feared that a slow ratification rate, coupled with an absence of UN funding, would render the Court de facto inoperative, and the main contributing states to the UN, that opposed the obligatory funding of the ICC.[60]

The limits to UN funding of the Court were institutionalized by the General Assembly before the March 2005 Security Council referral of the situation in Darfur. The possibility of financial contributions by the UN, approved by a decision of the General Assembly but subject to separate agreements, is recognized in Article 13(1) of the 2004 UN–ICC Relationship Agreement.[61] No such agreements exist and the referring resolutions of the Council could simply be seen as reflections of the status quo.

While the Council cannot effectively bar funding for the Court, it cannot guarantee it either, as the General Assembly is the ultimate arbiter of the budgetary structure of the UN,[62] and the UN–ICC relationship does not, at least yet, foresee funding to the Court. Nevertheless, according to UN procedures, the Security Council could decide to request a programme budget to cover the costs of the referrals to the Court, to be submitted by the UN Secretariat to the Fifth Committee (Administrative and Budgetary Committee) of the UN General Assembly.[63]

Six years after the Darfur referral, the ASP took it upon itself to discuss the costs arising from Security Council referrals, especially since unexpected costs related to the Libya referral forced the Court to request access to a considerable amount from the contingency fund.[64] Recognizing the financial situation of the ICC, the ASP Committee on Budget and Finance suggested in its June 2011 report that the Court's international relevance might merit UN funding. The Committee noted that the central role played by the Court in international criminal justice brought benefits to the entire international community and suggested that the Assembly may wish to consider engaging with the United Nations General Assembly to explore options to cover the financial burden of future referrals.[65] The Assembly last amended, ICC-ASP/7/5 (Part II-D), 21 November 2008 <http://icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/D4B6E16A-BD66-46AF-BB43-8D4C3F069786/281202/FRRENG0705.pdf> accessed 3 March 2015.

[60] M Halff and D Tolbert, 'Article 115' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Observers' Notes, Article by Article, 2nd edn (Baden-Baden: Nomos 2008), ('Triffterer, Commentary 20.08') 1712.

[61] UN–ICC Relationship Agreement (n 7), Art 13.

[62] Art 17(1) UN Charter.

[63] The General Assembly cannot approve any expenditure before the Committee considers a proposed programme budget. See UN General Assembly Rules of Procedure, Rule 153, UN Doc A/520/Rev.15, last amended September 2007, p. 33.

[64] Contingency Fund request for extra resources for the Libya situation for May to December 2011, Letter from Mr Marc Dubuisson, Director of Court Services, on behalf of the Registrar to H E Mr Santiago Wins, Chair of the CBF (2011/09/1A, 27 April 2011), referred to in Proposed Programme Budget 2012, ICC/ASP/10/10, 21 July 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) Table 1.

[65] Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance on the Work of its Sixteenth Session, ICC–ASP/10/15, 17 June 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties), para. 23.

has delegated such responsibility to the ICC by mandating the Court to engage in dialogue on the legal framework with the United Nations, to ensure funds are forthcoming.[66] Ironically, the Court has been placed in a position to seek its own funding, something that the Rome Statute may not have intended, as Article 115 suggests. The Court has engaged with the UN Secretariat on this matter, but with little reported progress.

Admittedly, the issue lies with UN Member States. The only dialogue with respect to funding at the level of the UN takes place in the context of the negotiation of the annual General Assembly resolution on the ICC. This forum offers limited opportunity. For instance, UNGA Resolution 67/295 (2013) simply notes in a preambular paragraph 'the need for funding of expenses related to investigations or prosecutions of the International Criminal Court, including in connection with situations referred to the Court by the Security Council',[67] while referring to the reimbursable nature of the cooperation in an operative paragraph.[68]

Tackling the issue of Court financing through the UN Security Council may not solve the issue entirely. Ultimately, the decision lies with the UN General Assembly. In both organs, objections to financial support to the Court may come from SC Permanent Members other than the United States, or from States Parties who were wary of UN funding to the Court from the outset. In fact, many top contributors of the UN (except the United States, China, and the Russian Federation) are also States Parties to the Statute. These States Parties carry a considerable share of whatever funds the UN may decide to allocate to the Court.[69] Certain African states might seek to block support by the General Assembly for political, rather than financial reasons.

The existing funding scheme has repercussions for prosecutorial independence. For instance, in 2011 the prosecutor alerted that further investigations in Libya were subject to the availability of funds:

> It is not yet determined whether the Office's investigation into allegations of war crimes will move forward in this or the coming period, depending on the funds available to the Office to conduct the Libya investigation.[70]

[66] Budget Resolution, ICC–ASP/11/Res.1, 21 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties), sec J. See also Budget Resolution, ASP/10/Res.4, 21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties), sec G.

[67] UNGA Resolution 67/295 (22 August 2013) UN Doc A/RES/67/295, preamble.

[68] Ibid., para. 17.

[69] From the top 15 contributors to the UN regular budget, only three (the United States, the Russian Federation, and China) are not Parties to the Statute. Should UN funding to the Court be approved, 15 States Parties (Japan, Germany, France, United Kingdom, Italy, Canada, Spain, Brazil, Australia, Republic of Korea, Mexico, Netherlands, Switzerland, Belgium, and Sweden) would have to provide a considerable portion of funding to the Court, the UN budget, and the regular budget of the Court. Data from Table III, Contributions by Member States to the United Nations' regular budget for the year 2013, (24 December 2012) UN Doc ST/Adm/Ser.B/866. The ICC applies the same scale of assessment as the United Nations. See Art 117 of the Statute.

[70] Second Report of the Prosecutor of the ICC to the UN Security Council pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), Office of the Prosecutor, 2 November 2011, para. 53.

This statement highlights the interrelation between budgetary and political control over the Court.

Similar concerns arise in relation to the possibility of voluntary contributions, which is mentioned in the funding-related paragraphs of the referral resolutions.[71] There seems to be little appetite for such contributions among States Parties or States not Parties. Following the adoption of SC Resolution 1970 (2011), the Court set up a special trust fund to receive contributions for expenses related to the Libya situation.[72] But the Court has not received any such contributions. While allowed by the Rome Statute, such contributions also have undesirable effects. They leave the Court in a position of vulnerability and may not be sustained. Tying ICC action under SC resolutions to voluntary contributions or fundraising may ultimately present a threat to the independence of the Court, and undermine the purposes of the financing-related language in this resolution.

3.5 Obligations to Cooperate with the Court

Referrals are an enforcement measure of the Council under Chapter VII. They are in principle addressed to all UN members, and might encompass corresponding duties of cooperation. But existing resolutions have embraced a more limited approach. The scope of duties of cooperation following a Security Council referral has been subject to dispute. The Council has been vague in its articulation of obligations. Obligations to cooperate cannot be inferred from the referral alone. [73] The Council must be explicit in its decision that states 'shall cooperate' with the Court.

In its current practice under Article 13(b), the Council has adopted a narrow approach in relation to the creation of obligations to cooperate with the Court. In the situation in Darfur, the Security Council has limited the obligation of cooperation to the Government of Sudan and other parties to the conflict through Resolution 1593 (2005). Other states were only urged to cooperate fully. The Libyan referral has been phrased in similar terms. Obligations to cooperate have been focused on Libyan authorities. This has left uncertainties in relation to the obligations of States not Parties to the Statute, other than the territorial state.

This limitation stands in contrast to the treatment of the ad hoc tribunals, which benefit from a broader system of cooperation. In these cases, the Council specified that all Member States have 'an obligation to cooperate with the tribunal', and are required to 'take any measures necessary under domestic law to implement the obligations on cooperation and other measures that were part of the establishment of the tribunals'.[74] It is [71] SC Res 1593, para. 7, and SC Res 1970 (2011), para. 8.

[72] Note verbale from the Registrar of the ICC to the President of the UN General Assembly, (30 June 2011) NV/2011/1150/GB/SA (in file). The letter should be public but it is not available in the record of correspondence of the President of the General Assembly. It might not have been transmitted to UN Member States as requested by the Court. See <http://www.un.org/en/ga/president/65/letters/index.shtml> accessed 30 September 2013.

[73] It has been suggested that the obligation of cooperation does not need to be literal, but could be implicit in the referral. See Gargiulo (n 1), at 101.

[74] ICTY Statute (n 9), para. 4; Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1994) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute'), para. 2.

difficult to understand why the ICC, when it is activated under Chapter VII, should benefit from lesser authority than the ad hoc tribunals.

The limits set by the Council have ' significantly diluted the potential effectiveness of the referral'.[75] The absence of a cooperation obligation has meant that fugitives sought by the Court have been able to travel freely to States not Parties.[76] The prosecutor has been left without recourse to ensure cooperation, since the Court has only been able to encourage it.[77]

It has been argued that the binding nature of cooperation duties determined by the Security Council has not been decisive for the success of the ad hoc tribunals. Arrests were facilitated by other factors such as domestic legislation, financial and political incentives to states and individuals, and socio-economic and geo-strategic incentives.[78] But the comparison with the ad hoc tribunals may be unfair to the Court. First, these instruments and incentives were developed on the basis of an absolute and universal obligation of cooperation imposed by the Council. Also, in the case of the ICC, these instruments and incentives are less developed. Further, the reluctance of the Council to extend obligations of cooperation has affected Court action. The Court has affirmed that States not Parties have no obligations vis-à-vis the Court directly arising from the Statute in the absence of an ad hoc arrangement or agreement, or a decision of the Security Council,[79] and that there is no legal basis for the Court to demand the execution of warrants of arrest from States not Parties. Therefore, Chambers have been reluctant to accept the Prosecutor's filings to inform the Council of travels of fugitives, although the Council has 'urged' States not Parties to cooperate with the Court.[80]

The legal minimalism of the Council has weakened the position of the Court in relation to defiant states. In 2009 the AU adopted a resolution in which it stated that AU Member States should not cooperate with the court in relation to the arrest of Omar Al-Bashir.[81] Backing from the Council might not have changed the course of the

[75] Chatham House, SC and the ICC (n 6), 8.

[76] President Al-Bashir has travelled to at least the following States not Parties since the issuance of the first arrest warrant against him: China (28 June 2011); Egypt (16 September 2012); Eritrea (March 2009 and on 13–16 June 2013); Ethiopia (inter alia 20–1 April 2013, 30 June 2013); Iran (August 2012); Libya (25 March 2009, 7 January 2012, 16–17 February 2013); Qatar (30 March 2009, 10 October 2011, August 2012, 5 March 2012, 26 March 2013, 27 June 2013); Saudi Arabia (April 2009, 29 December 2009, 6 November 2012, 7 March 2013); South Sudan (9 July 2011, 12 April 2013); Turkey (December 2009). See <http://bashirwatch.org> accessed 30 September 2013.

[77] The Court has reminded the United States of the existence of warrants of arrest, Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Potential Travel to the United States of America, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-162, PTC II, ICC, 18 September 2013, 6; and Saudi Arabia, Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Potential Travel to the Federal Republic of Ethiopia and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-164 PTC II, ICC, 10 October 2013, 6.

[78] Chatham House, SC and the ICC (n 6), 8.

[79] Decision on the request of the Defence of Abdullah Al-Senussi to make a finding of non-cooperation by the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and refer the matter to the Security Council, Gaddafi and Al Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-420, PTC I, ICC, 28 August 2013, paras 13–14 (notes omitted); Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Potential Travel to the United States of America (n 77), para. 11; Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Potential Travel to the Federal Republic of Ethiopia and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia (n 77), para. 8.

[80] See (n 77).

[81] African Union Assembly Decision, Thirteenth Session (Doc Assembly/AU-/245(XIII) Rev 1, 3 July 2009), para. 10.

debate about Africa and the ICC,[82] but it would have added legal authority to support the position of the Court.

The failure of the Council to create obligations on cooperation runs against the very raison d'être of the system of referrals. The ability of the Council to impose obligations of cooperation with the ICC on states, including States not Parties to the Rome Statute, is one of the primary justifications for why referral powers were granted to the Council and not any other UN organ. Technically, the option to make a referral might be extended to the UN General Assembly, which has competencies in matters of international peace and security on the basis of the UN Charter and the Uniting for Peace mechanism.[83] But granting the Assembly powers of referral would not necessarily enhance the reach of the Court in terms of cooperation. Neither the Assembly nor any other organ in the international system may oblige states to cooperate with the Court, except the Council. The fact that the Council can compel states to cooperate with the Court was one of the main reasons why the drafters accepted its referral power.[84]

3.6 Non-Cooperation and Enforcement

The role of the Council in the enforcement of the Court's decisions is another area that has given rise to concerns. Court requests are executed mainly through state action, on the basis of an international obligation or voluntarily. The Court has judicial powers to determine that a state has failed to abide by its obligation.[85] This is reflected in Article 87 (7), which provides that 'where a State Party fails to comply with a request to cooperate by the Court contrary to the provisions of this Statute, thereby preventing the Court from exercising its functions and powers under this Statute, the Court may make a finding to that effect and refer the matter to the Assembly of States Parties or, where the Security Council referred the matter to the Court, to the Security Council'.[86] While the Court can make such determinations, it has no authority to decide on remedies or consequences arising from a failure to cooperate.[87] The Statute delegates this function to two executive arms, the ASP, and in cases arising from situations referred to by the Council, the Security Council. The Council and the Assembly

[82] See, on the AU, OA Maunganidze and A Du Plessis, Chapter 4 this volume; on cooperation and immunities, D Jacobs, Chapter 12 this volume.

[83] In Certain Expenses of the United Nations, Advisory Opinion (ICJ Reports: 1962), 151.

[84] Discussions relating to Art 25 (1) of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute suggest that a referral from the Council would override the need for state consent. But it is not clear from the discussions whether this would apply to the exercise of jurisdiction or in relation to obligations to cooperate (see in particular, ILC 1994 Session, 2332nd Meeting, paras 1 and 49). During deliberations at the Rome Conference on the role of the Council [draft Arts 10(1) and 10(3)] delegations which supported the Council's power to initiate proceedings were of the view that the enforcement powers of the Council bind 'all members of the United Nations'. See Yee (n 1), at 147. But the intended effects of a referral were ambiguously explained. In his presentation to the Rome Conference, intervening on behalf of the ILC, James Crawford was of the view that a referral by the Council would serve as a 'substitute of consent' (Rome Conference, Official Records, Vol II, 2nd Plenary Meeting, para. 106).

[85] Art 87(5) and 87(7). [86] See Art 87 (7).

[87] These consequences may fall under the remedies applicable under general law. See B Simma and D Pulkowski, 'Of Planets and the Universe: Self-Contained Regimes in International Law' (2006) 17 European Journal of International Law 3, 492.

are expected to react, within the purview of their own powers, to address the instances of non-cooperation.

The provisions on non-cooperation are the sole manner in which the Court can formally and judicially denounce lack of compliance. The prosecutor has the opportunity to denounce lack of cooperation from states when the prosecutor's report is presented to the Security Council. However, these findings or notifications of non-cooperation are a measure of last resort.[88]

Decisions by the Council to refer a situation to the Court are mostly made without the consent of the territorial state involved.[89] Thus, it is very likely that cases arising from such situations will be contentious. For this reason, action by the Council is fundamental to ensure effective investigations and prosecutions. In practice, the Council action has been deficient in its acknowledgements, responses, or reactions to the situations denounced by the Court. Such silence on the part of the Council has challenged the relevance of the Court's warrants and has put into question the Council's commitment towards seeing them being enforced.

Since the issuance of their warrants of arrest, at least 67 travels or attempted travels have been undertaken by individuals sought by the ICC in connection with the Darfur situation: 65 by Omar Al-Bashir and two by Abdel Hussein.[90] When information has been available in a timely manner, many travels have been curtailed through political and diplomatic means. There is ample evidence indicating the fruitful outcomes of adequate information collection and dissemination.[91] The Council, however, has played no role in these diplomatic efforts.

The Court has not been seized about all instances of travel by persons under warrants of arrest. As of 10 October 2013, there has been judicial involvement of the Court in 21 incidents. Bringing the incidents to the judicial sphere has had positive outcomes. Filings from the prosecutor or the Registrar have had a concrete effect in addressing instances of non-cooperation. For instance, in December 2010, in light of an intended visit by Al-Bashir to the Central African Republic (CAR) reported by the media, the Court requested the host state to take all necessary measures to arrest and surrender [88] The Assembly has interpreted that non-cooperation refers to specific instances and not to measures which may lead in the medium or long term to non-cooperation such as the failure to adopt domestic legislation to ensure cooperation. Resolution ASP–ICC/10/Res 5, 21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties), Annex, para. 7.

[89] This is the case in the context of Darfur, where the Sudanese authorities have not consented to the decision by the Council. See UNSC 5158th meeting (n 40) 12. In the case of Libya, some dissenting representatives of Libya were favourable to the referral, and in fact called for it (UNSC 6491st meeting (n 42) 7).

[90] Calculation made on the basis of data by Bashir Watch, 'Bashir Travel Map' <http://bashirwatch.org/> accessed 30 October 2013; Arrest Bashir <http://www.arrestbashir.org/bashir-s-travels/> accessed 30 October 2013; the Southern African Litigation Center <http://www.southernafricalitigationcentre.org/> accessed 30 October 2013; and the website of the ICC provides further information that needs to be extracted from the filings made by the Prosecutor or Registrar to the Court in relation to each of the relevant cases (Prosecutor v Al Bashir, Prosecutor v Ali Kushayb and Ahmed Harun, and Prosecutor v Abdel Hussain).

[91] Botswana warned that it would arrest Al-Bashir should he enter the country. See Bashir Watch (n 90). Similarly, his invitation to the Africa–South America Summit in Venezuela was revoked in September 2009. It has also been reported that Al-Bashir cancelled his participation to political summits in States Parties such as Uganda, Zambia, Nigeria, and Malawi.

Al-Bashir to the ICC, and to immediately inform the Chamber of any obstacles for arrest or surrender.[92] Although the CAR did not submit any response to the Court, the visit was cancelled. Similar requests from the Chambers to States Parties (Senegal and Zambia in December of 2010[93] and to Chad in January of 2011[94]) seem to have contributed to the cancelling of travel by Al-Bashir.

In other instances, where travel of fugitives has not been successfully impeded, procedures of non-cooperation and judicial action of the Court had some positive effects. In July 2013 the Pre-Trial Chamber requested information about the presence of Al-Bashir in Nigeria. Reinforced by political demarches,[95] the Court's reminder led to the early departure of Al-Bashir. In its response to the Court, Nigeria explained that Al-Bashir had arrived without the knowledge of Nigeria and that Nigerian authorities were considering possible actions in accordance with international obligations at the time of his early departure.[96]

The Court has only involved the Council in these incidents through either communications or judicial findings on non-cooperation. The responses by the Council to this information have been deficient, thus weakening the role that the Council is expected to play as an executive arm of the Court.

3.6.1 Communications to the Council

In addition to four findings on non-cooperation discussed below, the Council has received other four communications from the Court. These communications were transmitted to the Council by the Registrar, and not by the President of the Court.[97] They were thus not findings on non-cooperation in the meaning of Article 87(7), but simply notifications of information to the Council. The first of these communications concerns Sudan and focuses on failure to arrest. In 2010 the Pre-Trial Chamber decided to inform the Council of the lack of cooperation with respect to the cases of Ahmed Harun and Ali Kushayb.[98] Further, on 31 August 2010 the Court informed the Council and the Assembly of States [92] Demande de coopération et d'informations adressée à la République Centrafricaine, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-121, PTC I, ICC, 1 December 2010, 4.

[93] Prosecution notification of possible travel in the case of The Prosecutor v Omar Al Bashir, pursuant to Art 97 of the Rome Statute, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, 02/05-01/09-122, PTC I, ICC, 8 December 2010, para. 9.

[94] Prosecution notification of possible travel in the case of T*he Prosecutor v Omar Al Bashir*, pursuant to Art 97 of the Rome Statute, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-125, PTC I, ICC, 10 January 2011.

[95] See ASP Press Release, 'President of the Assembly Calls upon the Government of Nigeria to Respect its Obligations under the Rome Statute', 16 July 2013.

[96] Report of the Registry on the Decision regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Visit to the Federal Republic of Nigeria, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-158 Ann 4, Registry, ICC, 14 August 2013. The Court decided it was not necessary to inform the Security Council or the Assembly. See Decision on the Cooperation of the Federal Republic of Nigeria Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-159, PTC II, ICC, 5 September 2013.

[97] Regulation 109(4), Regulations of the Court, ICC-BD/01-03-11 adopted 26 May 2004, amended 2 November 2011, provided that the findings on non-cooperation are transmitted to the President of the Court who in turn notifies the Assembly and, if appropriate, the Council.

[98] Decision informing the United Nations Security Council about the lack of cooperation by the Republic of Sudan, Harun and Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/07-57, PTC I, ICC, 25 May 2010; UN Doc S/2010/265 (1 June 2010).

Parties about two recent visits of Al-Bashir to Chad[99] and Kenya [100] so these bodies would take any measure they deemed appropriate. A similar communication on Djibouti was made on 12 May 2011.[101]

These communications were based on the obligations of the respective states to cooperate with the Court under the decisions of the Council.[102] Although the underlying obligations were uncontested, the Council did not react to the Court's communications. It had the opportunity to support the Court, possibly through a declaration reaffirming the importance of continued cooperation with the Court, but did not seize occasion.

However, the threat of informing the Council, and the judicial activism of the Court's organs had a positive impact on preventing the States Parties from breaching their obligations under the Rome Statute and SC Resolution 1593 (2005). For instance, a notification of travel filed by the prosecutor that was made public,[103] and the 25 October 2010 Decision of the Chamber to remind Kenya of its obligations and request information on the alleged visit may have contributed to the cancellation of a second visit of Al-Bashir to Kenya for the IGAD summit on 30 October 2010.[104] In this case, Kenya interacted positively with the Court, informing it that the Summit would not take place in Kenya and that Al-Bashir would not enter its territory.[105]

Later, the Court limited the practice of informing the Council via the Chambers of the travels of Al-Bashir, although it has been seized of numerous other travels.[106]

[99] Decision informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's recent visit to the Republic of Chad, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-109, PTC I, ICC, 27 August 2010; UN Doc S/2010/456 (31 August 2010).

[100] Decision informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's presence in the territory of the Republic of Kenya, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-107, PTC I, ICC, 27 August 2010; UN Doc S/2010/456 (31 August 2010).

[101] Decision informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's recent visit to Djibouti, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-129, PTC I, ICC, 12 May 2011; UN Doc S/2011/318 (19 May 2011).

[102] The Court considered that Sudan had the obligation to cooperate with it, an obligation directly derived from the Charter of the UN and Resolution 1593 (2005). Decision informing the United Nations Security Council about the lack of cooperation by the Republic of Sudan, 25 May 2010 (n 98), 6. Chad, Kenya, and Djibouti, being States Parties, had an obligation to cooperate with the Court in relation to the enforcement of warrants of arrest on the basis of Resolution 1593 (2005) and Art 87 of the Statute. Decision informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's recent visit to the Republic of Chad, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, 27 August 2010 (n 99) 3; Decision informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's presence in the territory of the Republic of Kenya, 27 August 2010 (n 100) 3; Decision informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's recent visit to Djibouti, 12 May 2011 (n 101) 3.

[103] Prosecution notification of possible travel to a State Party in the case of The Prosecutor v Omar Al Bashir, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-116, Office of the Prosecutor, ICC, 22 October 2010.

[104] Decision requesting observations from the Republic of Kenya, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-117, PTC I, ICC, 31 October 2010.

[105] Transmission of the Reply from the Republic of Kenya, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-119, Registry, ICC, 25 October 2010, 3.

[106] See, inter alia, travel of Al-Bashir to Chad, 7–8 August 2011, 18 March 2013, 5 May 2013, to Nigeria on 16 July 2013; travel of Abdel Hussain to Chad on 25–6 April 2013, and to CAR on 19 August 2013. See also Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-195, PTC II, ICC, 9 April 2014.

The prosecutor occasionally made reference to travels in its reports to the Council, while Chambers liaised with the Council in relation to proper judicial findings on non-cooperation.

3.6.2 Findings on non-cooperation

On 13 December 2011 the Council issued the first two judicial findings on non-cooperation under Article 87(7) of the Rome Statute, which concern Malawi and Chad. They were transmitted to the Council and the Assembly of States Parties by the President of the Court.[107] Other findings on non-cooperation were issued by the Court on 26 March 2013 (Chad) and on 8 April 2014 (Malawi).[108]

The first findings on non-cooperation were issued by the Court when the two states denied their obligation to execute the warrants of arrest. Malawi was contacted by the Court after the visit of Al-Bashir. Malawi confirmed the visit and stated that it 'accorded [Al-Bashir] all the immunities and privileges guaranteed to every visiting Head of State and Government; these privileges and immunities include freedom from arrest and prosecution within the territories of Malawi'. Malawi argued that Article 27 of the Rome Statute was not applicable to Al-Bashir. It confirmed the position of the AU with respect to the indictment of sitting heads of state and government of countries that are not parties to the Rome Statute.[109]

Chad adopted a similar position. It claimed it could not agree to the request of the prosecutor against Al-Bashir in light of the decision of the AU.[110] It reiterated its position in February 2013. It noted that in light of its desire to normalize relations with Sudan, 'the imperatives of peace prevail over those of justice'.[111]

The Chamber found that Malawi and Chad were unwilling to cooperate with the Court, and had failed to comply with their obligations to consult with the Chamber on issues that may impede the fulfilment of their obligations and to cooperate with [107] Corrigendum to the Decision Pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-139-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 13 December 2011; UN Doc S/2012/9 (9 January 2012) ('Non-cooperation decision on Malawi, December 2011'); Decision pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the refusal of the Republic of Chad to comply with the cooperation requests issued by the Court with respect to the arrest and surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-140-tENG, 13 December 2011; UN Doc S/2012/8 (9 January 2012) ('Non-cooperation decision on Chad, December 2011').

[108] Decision on the Non-compliance of the Republic of Chad with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court regarding the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-151, PTC II, ICC, 26 March 2013; UN Doc S/2013/229 (15 April 2013) ('Non-cooperation decision on Chad, March 2013').

[109] Report of the Registrar with the observations from Malawi, including two confidential annexes, referred to in ICC-02/05-01/09-139, 12-12-2011, para. 8. See also AU Assembly Decision, Thirteenth Session (3 July 2009) (n 81). See also, on the AU decision, OA Maunganidze and A Du Plessis, Chapter 4 this volume; on cooperation and immunities, D Jacobs, Chapter 12 this volume.

[110] Rapport du Greffe relatif aux observations de la République du Tchad, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-135, Registry, ICC, 30 September, Annex I, 3.

[111] Report of the Registry on the observations submitted by the Republic of Chad on Omar Al-Bashir's visit to the Republic of Chad, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, ICC-02/05-01/09-150-Anx1, Registry, ICC, 6 May 2013.

the Court by not arresting and surrendering Al-Bashir.[112] The Court transmitted these findings via the President to the Security Council and to the Assembly.

3.6.3 Responses to non-cooperation findings

The Rome Statute provides no guidance regarding how the Council or the Assembly should respond before, during, or after an instance of non-cooperation. The Assembly of States Parties has adopted procedures to address instances of non-cooperation. They are reflected in the mechanism for non-cooperation established by Resolution 5, adopted on 21 December 2011. The procedures mandate the involvement of the President of the Assembly, the Bureau, and the plenary of the Assembly in the acknowledgement, discussion, and resolution of failures to cooperate.[113] The procedure includes the holding of an emergency meeting of the Bureau of the Assembly; an open letter from the President of the Assembly to the state concerned requesting a written response; consultations with the state concerned at the ambassadorial level; a public meeting at the Assembly; the issuing of recommendations as a result of the dialogue with the state concerned; and the adoption of a resolution by the Assembly with the concrete recommendations.[114]

The President of the Assembly has further issued press releases in relation to the travels of persons sought by the Court, in order to increase public pressure. As a reaction, some states have condemned these visits.[115] This type of pressure makes it more difficult to defy requests by the Court.

In cases of a finding on non-cooperation, the President of the Assembly has followed up on Court requests through meetings with the President of the Council. These meetings are designed to clarify how the Council might properly react to communications by the Court.[116] Regrettably, there is no public record of the treatment of such matters. States Parties in the Council continue to hold informal discussions on this issue.

The Council has no established procedures to deal with this matter. Possible reactions include (i) the issuing of a Press Statement or a Presidential Statement, or (ii) the adoption of a resolution calling for cooperation, condemning failure to arrest, or calling states to arrest ICC fugitives. The Council can also take note of the communication of the Court in a relevant related resolution. States Parties in the Council have not yet found a common line. Some consider that a mere acknowledgement of receipt would be insufficient and might be counter-productive, since it would terminate the discussion. Others believe that it is more helpful to use formal instruments and to increase the [112] Non-cooperation decision on Malawi, December 2011 (n 107) 21; Non-cooperation decision on Chad, December 2011 ibid., 8; Non-cooperation decision on Chad, March 2013 (n 108) 11.

[113] Annex to ASP Resolution, Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties (ICC-ASP/10/Res 5, 21 December 2011) (n 88). The procedure also encourages cooperation and diplomatic dialogue in absence of judicial findings on non-cooperation.

[114] Ibid., para. 14.

[115] Reactions come mainly by the European Union, by members of the Inter-Ministerial network on the ICC coordinated by Liechtenstein and by Costa Rica.

[116] Report of the Bureau on Non-Cooperation, ICC-ASP/11/29, 1 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties), para. 3.

political costs of states receiving ICC fugitives in their territory. Curiously, some of the States Parties who are blamed for non-cooperation may have a seat in the Council.[117]

The failure of the Council to use these techniques sends an ambivalent message. It suggests that the Council uses the ICC whenever it is convenient for Council members, while turning a blind eye on the Court when its mandate needs to be operationalized. This contradiction raises doubts as to what extent the Council usefully serves as an executive arm for the Court.

3.7 Political and Operational Support for Situations Not Referred by the Council

Since 2007, the Court has recommended that States Parties that are members of the Security Council 'ensure that the Court's interests, needs for assistance and mandate are taken into account when relevant matters, such as sanctions, peacekeeping mandates, Security Council missions and peace initiatives are being discussed and decided on, while respecting the independence of both'.[118] This recommendation was guided by the insight that the Council could support the work of the Court in its general decision-making practice, i.e. through acknowledgement of the Court or the Rome Statute in thematic resolutions, references encouraging cooperation with the Court, or strengthening of peace operations.

References of the Council to the Court's work have taken various forms. They have been included in thematic and country-specific work. For the most part, Council practice has been selective. The first ICC-related references are found in thematic decisions of the Council, in specific in the preamble of Resolution 1261 (1999) on children and armed conflict. The Council noted that the Rome Statute considered the conscription or enlisting of children under the age of 15 into the national armed forces or their active participation in hostilities as a war crime, in an effort to bring an end to the use of children as soldiers.[119] This reference was upgraded in 2000 in an additional operative paragraph which urged all parties to conflicts 'to bear in mind the relevant provisions of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court'.[120] References to the Statute were introduced in the resolutions on children in armed conflict in 2003[121] and 2004,[122] and in resolutions or presidential statements on children and armed conflict as of 2011.[123] The role of the Statute in combatting sexual violence has been recognized in the work of the Council on women, peace, and security[124]

[117] For instance, Chad and Nigeria will have a seat on the Council in 2014 and 2015.

[118] 66 Recommendations on Cooperation from the Court to the Assembly, Resolution ICC-ASP/6/Res 2 Annex II 14 December 2007 (Sixth Session of the Assembly), recommendation 51.

[119] UNSC Res 1261 (25 August 1999) UN Doc S/RES/1261. SC Res 1261 was also the first ever resolution adopted as a result of a thematic issue. It was also the first time the Council debated the issue of children and armed conflict.

[120] UNSC Res 1314 (11 August 2000) UN Doc S/RES/1314, para. 3.

[121] UNSC Res 1460 (30 January 2003) UN Doc S/RES/1460, preamble.

[122] UNSC Res 1539 (22 April 2004) UN Doc S/RES/1539, preamble.

[123] See UNSC Res 1998 (12 July 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1998; UNSC Res 2068 (19 September 2012) UN Doc S/RES/2068; UNSC Presidential Statement 2013/8 (17 June 2013) UN Doc S/PRST/2013/8.

[124] In UNSC Press Statement (8 March 2000) UN Doc SC/6816, the Council 'welcomes the inclusion as a war crime, in the Rome Statute of all forms of sexual violence and notes the role the Court could play to ending impunity for perpetrators of such crimes'.

and the landmark Resolution 1323 (2000).[125] But there has not been full consistency.[126] Debates on the protection of civilians in armed conflict, which started in 1998, have only included references to the Court or the framework of the Rome Statute in 2009, 2010, and 2013.[127]

Concerning country-specific work, the practice has focused on States Parties, CAR, Côte d'Ivoire, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Mali, the activities of the Lord's Resistance Army, and Burundi (a State Party where the Court has no ongoing investigation). Statements include acknowledgements that a country is a State Party,[128] characterizations of certain acts as crimes under the Rome Statute,[129] references to ongoing investigations, prosecutions, or warrants of arrest,[130] and recognition of the importance of cooperation with the Court.[131]

In addition to these hortative references, the Council has established an important link between its peace operations and cooperation with the Court. Paradigm examples are the situations in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Mali. In 2011 the Security Council called the United Nations Mission in the DRC (MONUSCO) to use its authority and assist the Congolese government seeking to hold those responsible for [125] In UNSC Res 1325 (31 October 2000) UN Doc S/RES/1325, the Council recalls the provisions of the Rome Statute and calls upon all parties to armed conflict to bear in mind the relevant provisions of the Rome Statute.

[126] No ICC-related references can be found in UNSC Presidential Statement 2001/31 (31 October 2001) UN Doc S/PRST/2001/31; UNSC Presidential Statement 2002/32 (31 October 2002) UN Doc S/PRST/2002/32; UNSC Presidential Statement 2004/40 (2 November 2004) UN Doc S/PRST/2004/40; UNSC Presidential Statement 2005/52 (27 October 2005) UN Doc S/PRST/2005/52; UNSC Presidential Statement 2006/42 (26 October 2006) UN Doc S/PRST/2006/42; UNSC Presidential Statement 2007/5 (7 March 2007) UN Doc S/PRST/2007/5; UNSC Presidential Statement 2007/40 (23 October 2007) UN Doc S/PRST/2007/40; UNSC Presidential Statement 2008/39 (29 October 2008) UN Doc S/PRST/2008/39; UNSC Res 1889 (5 October 2009) UN Doc S/RES/1889; UNSC Presidential Statement 2010/8 UN Doc S/PRST/2010/8.

[127] References recognize the contribution of the Court to accountability for the most serious crimes or recall the inclusion of certain crimes in the Rome Statute, UNSC Presidential Statement 2009/1 (14 January 2009) UN Doc S/PRST/2009/1; UNSC Res 1894 (11 November 2009) UN Doc S/RES/1894 (2009); UNSC Presidential Statement 2010/25 (22 November 2010) UN Doc S/RES/2010/25; UNSC Presidential Statement 2013/2 (12 February 2013) UN Doc S/PRST/2013/2.

[128] UNSC Res 2056 (5 July 2012) S/RES/2056 on Mali; UNSC Press Statement (25 March 2013) UN Doc S/10960 on the Central African Republic; UNSC Res 2090 (13 February 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2090 on Burundi.

[129] For example, UNSC Res 1975 (30 March 2011) on Côte d'Ivoire; UNSC Res 2056 (5 July 2012) UN Doc S/RES/2056 on Mali; UNSC Res 2121 (10 October 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2121 on the Central African Republic.

[130] Recalling the warrants of arrest against members of the LRA see UNSC Presidential Statements 2008/38 (21 October 2008) UN Doc S/PRST/2008/38; UNSC Presidential Statement 2008/48 (22 December 2009) UN Doc S/PRST/2008/48; UNSC Press Statement (21 July 2011) UN Doc S/10335; UNSC Presidential Statement 2011/21 (14 November 2011) UN Doc PRST/2011/21; UNSC Presidential Statement 2012/18 (29 June 2012) UN Doc 2012/18; UNSC Presidential Statement 2012/28 (19 December 2012) UN Doc S/PRST/2012/28. With respect to the verdict on the Thomas Lubanga Case, see UNSC Press Statement (16 March 2012) UN Doc SC/10580. The Council calls for the arrest of Bosco Ntaganda, against whom the Court has issued warrants of arrest, UNSC Press Statement (16 July 2012) UN Doc SC/10709. The Council expressed appreciation for the voluntary surrender of Ntaganda in UNSC Press Statement (22 March 2013) UN Doc SC/10956.

[131] Most recently in 2013, UNSC Res 2095 (14 March 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2095 on Mali; UNSC Res 2098 (23 March 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2098 on the Democratic Republic of the Congo; UNSC Res 2101 (25 April 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2101, and UNSC Res 2112 (30 July 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2112 on Côte d'Ivoire.

war crimes and crimes against humanity accountable, including through cooperation with the ICC.[132] In March 2013 the Council granted MONUSCO an unprecedented broad mandate on the security and protection of civilians, including authorization to use force via an 'intervention brigade' (Resolution 2098 (2013)). This included authorization to 'support and work with the Government of the DRC to arrest and bring to justice those responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity in the country, including through cooperation with States of the region and the ICC'.[133]

A similar approach was adopted in relation to Mali. On 20 December 2012 Security Council Resolution 2085 (2012) called the African-led Support Mission in Mali (AFISMA) 'to support national and international efforts, including those of the International Criminal Court, to bring to justice perpetrators of serious human rights abuses and violations of international humanitarian law in Mali'.[134] In April 2013 the Council expressly mandated MINUSMA, a stabilization mission in Mali, 'to support, as feasible and appropriate, the efforts of the transitional authorities of Mali… to bring to justice those responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity in Mali, taking into account the referral by the transitional authorities of Mali of the situation in their country since January 2012 to the International Criminal Court'.

In its decision, the Council called on the transitional authorities of Mali 'to continue to cooperate with the International Criminal Court, in accordance with Mali's obligations under the Rome Statute'.[135] As a result of this mandate, MINUSMA provided ad hoc support to the Court, including access to UN Humanitarian Air Service (UNHAS) flights in areas of ICC operations.[136]

This practice illustrates concrete measures that the Council can take, especially when the direct interests of Council members do not block effective action.

3.8 Deferrals

Article 16 of the Statute, titled 'Deferral of investigation or prosecution', governs potential conflicts of interest between the maintenance of international peace and security and the pursuit of international criminal justice. It reads:

> [N]o investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with under this Statute for a period of 12 months after the Security Council, if a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, has requested the Court to that effect; that request may be renewed by the Council under the same conditions.

[132] UNSC Res 1991 (28 June 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1991, para. 19: the Council 'further stresses the importance of the Congolese Government actively seeking to hold accountable those responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity in the country and of regional cooperation to this end, including through cooperation with the International Criminal Court and calls upon MONUSCO to use its existing authority to assist the Government in this regard'. This paragraph was further extended to also '[encourage] MONUSCO to use its existing authority to assist the Congolese Government in this regard'. See UNSC Res 2012 (29 November 2011) S/RES/2021, para. 15. See also UNSC Res 2053 (27 June 2012) UN Doc S/RES/2053 (2012), para. 13; UNSC Res 2078 (28 November 2012) UN Doc S/RES/2078, para. 19.

[133] UNSC Res 2098 (28 March 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2098, para. 12(d).

[134] UNSC Res 2085 (20 December 2012) UN Doc S/RES/2085 (2012), para. 19.

[135] UNSC Res 2100 (25 April 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2011, para. 16(g), and para. 27.

[136] Report of the Court on ICC–UN Cooperation (n 6) para. 21.

This provision is the most powerful tool for the Council to directly influence investigations and prosecution of the ICC. It came into existence as a result of political considerations being 'given more weight than legal arguments in the determination of the appropriate role for the Security Council in ICC proceedings'.[137] Originally, the ILC considered the Council as a gatekeeper to the activities of the Court.[138] The power of deferral was adopted as a compromise in the negotiation of the Statute[139] in an attempt to balance the responsibilities of the Council with the mandate of the Court.

Requests of deferrals by the Council have become a reality before the entry into force of the Rome Statute, and continue to be invoked to resolve political tensions arising from the activities of the Court.

In 2002, and later in 2003, the United States successfully promoted the adoption of Security Council Resolutions 1422 (2002) and 1487 (2003) to purportedly impede commencement of investigation or prosecution by the Court of personnel or officials of states not parties to the Rome Statute on the basis of Article 16.[140] The United States threatened withdrawal of funds and contributions to the peacekeeping operation in Bosnia-Herzegovina should the deferral resolutions not be adopted. The resolutions did not emphasize a specific investigation or prosecution by the Court, nor identify the existence of a threat to international peace and security.

Later, references to Article 16 were inserted in preambular paragraphs of the referral resolutions for the situation of Darfur and the situation of Libya.[141] Article 16 was expressly invoked on 14 July 2008 in response to the application made by the ICC prosecutor for a warrant of arrest against the Sudanese President, Omar Al-Bashir. The Peace and Security Council of the AU adopted a communiqué, transmitted to the Security Council, in which it requested the application of Article 16 on the grounds that:

> [T]he approval by the Pre-Trial Chamber of the application by the ICC Prosecutor could seriously undermine the ongoing efforts aimed at facilitating the early resolution of the conflict in Darfur and the promotion of long-lasting peace and reconciliation in the Sudan as a whole and, as a result, may lead to further suffering for the

[137] M Bergsmo and J Pejić, 'Article 16' in Triffterer, Commentary 2008 (n 60) 598.

[138] Art 23(3), 1994 ILC Draft Statute.

[139] The debate in Rome centred on the Singapore proposal, a modified version of it, or its deletion. Vocal 'and persistent' opponents to any control by the Council formed a minority at the Rome Conference. Most delegates, including the United Kingdom, supported the Singapore proposal. Two amendment proposals introduced by India and Mexico were quashed in the final days of the Conference. They suggested deleting this provision or to extend power under Art 16 to the General Assembly. Mexico proposal, Rome Conference Records, 15 July 1998, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.81; Amendment Proposal by India, Rome Conference Records, 17 July 1998, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.95. See also P Kirsch and J T Holmes, 'The Rome Conference on an International Criminal Court: The Negotiating Process' (1999) 93 American Journal of International Law 2, 8; Bergsmo and Pejić, 'Article 16' (n 13) 598.

[140] SC Resolution 1422 (2002), para. 1 and Resolution 1487 (2003), para. 1 (n 4): 'Requests, consistent with the provisions of Article 16 of the Rome Statute… not to commence or proceed with investigation or prosecution…'.

[141] The identical preambular paragraphs in Resolutions 1593 (2005) and 1970 (2011) read: 'Recalling article 16 of the Rome Statute under which no investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with by the International Criminal Court for a period of 12 months after a Security Council request to that effect…'

> people of the Sudan and greater destabilization with far-reaching consequences for the country and the region.[142]

The application by the prosecutor and the subsequent AU communiqué were issued amidst negotiations between the Security Council and Sudan concerning the full deployment of a 10,000-troop UN mission in Darfur (established a year earlier) and of consolidating the renewal of the Council's mandate. In an attempt to replicate the blackmailing of the peacekeeping operation in 2002 and 2003 by the United States, Libya, as proxy of the interests of Sudan and the AU, pursued the invocation of Article 16 as a condition of its support for the resolution concerning UNAMID, against the interests of the permanent members of the Council in deploying UNAMID.

In justifying the request from the AU for a deferral, Libya contended that 'the international community [w]as close… to a political resolution of the crisis'[143] through the deployment of UNAMID, the current involvement of the Sudanese authorities, and the fact that the new Joint African Union–United Nations chief mediator was to take office. The main opposition to a deferral came from a group of states that sought to use the UNAMID resolution to remind the Sudanese government of its obligations towards the ICC.[144]

Neither group succeeded because the United Kingdom and France refused to conflate the debate about the justice component of the Darfur situation with the imperatives of a renewal of the UNAMID mandate, which required the consent of the Sudanese government. States supporting the deferral managed to secure a passage in the preamble by which the Security Council took note of the communiqué from the African Union and expressed the commitment 'to consider these matters further'.[145] Pro-ICC states pushed for language in paragraph 16, in which the Council '[d]emands that the parties to the conflict in Darfur fulfil their international obligations and their commitments under relevant agreements, this resolution and other relevant Council resolutions'. On the pro-deferral side, the Council justified its approach by the fact that the transmission of the AU communiqué did not constitute a formal request to the United Nations Security Council (UNSC).[146] Several Council members argued that the use of Article 16 'must be exceptional'[147] and the situation at hand did not meet such threshold.

A third request for deferral was made in 2008, regarding the situation in the CAR.[148] On 1 August 2008, the president of the CAR invoked Article 16 in a correspondence [142] AU, Communiqué of the 142nd Meeting of the Peace and Security Council (21 July 2008), annexed to UN Doc S/2008/481 (23 July 2008), para. 9.

[143] UNSC 5947th Meeting, 31 July 2008, UN Doc S/PV.5947, 6.

[144] UNSC Presidential Statement 2008/21 (16 June 2008) UN Doc S/PRST/2008/21.

[145] UNSC Res 1828 (31 July 2008) UN Doc S/RES/1828, 9th preambular paragraph.

[146] In response to a question from the media, the President of the Security Council (UK) acknowledged that there had been indications that the AU and the Arab League intended to present a formal request to the Council regarding Art 16 but that no request had been made and that the Council remained willing to listen to these concerns. Under the Rules of Procedure of the Council, access to request an item be placed in the agenda is restricted to States and UN organs. Informal Comments by Representative from the United Kingdom upon adoption of UNSC Res 1881, from 'UN Webcast, 30 July 2009' <http://webcast.un.org/ramgen/-ondemand/stakeout/2009/so090730am2.rm> accessed 30 September 2013.

[147] Statement from a delegate from a State Party sitting in the Council at a Meeting of the Group of Friends of the ICC, New York (29 July 2008).

[148] 'Prosecutor Opens Investigation in the Central African Republic', ICC Press Release, 22 May 2007.

with the Secretary General of the United Nations. Bozizé requested him to 'intercede with the Security Council [on the basis of Article 16] to obtain the adoption of a resolution that would ensure that the authorities of the Central African Republic remain competent over the acts covering the periods comprised by the amnesty laws' that had been adopted on the basis of Article 2 of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement signed between the government of the CAR and three rebel groups on 21 June 2008.

According to Bozizé's correspondence, the request was prompted by a communication from the prosecutor of the ICC informing him that the Office of the prosecutor was focusing special attention on ongoing acts of violence taking place in the north of the CAR. Even though Article 2 of the Accord Global excludes amnesty for crimes under the jurisdiction of the ICC,[149] the CAR government claimed that an eventual implementation of the prosecutor's letter would endanger the respect for and implementation of the peace agreement.[150] The CAR government explained lack of domestic action by factors such as 'the lack of access to such areas under control of the rebel groups' and 'support from the international community to a general amnesty law for persons implicated in such crimes'. It considered that ICC activities constituted a threat to its discretion in prosecuting individuals for Rome Statute crimes. There is no official record of the transmission of this letter by the Secretary General to the Security Council or of the consideration by the Council of this request.

A fourth request for deferral was brought forward by the government of Kenya in relation to ICC investigations concerning the post-election violence in 2007 and 2008. Following the prosecutor's request to issue summonses to appear for six individuals,[151] various branches of the Kenyan government invoked the need for a deferral. The Kenyan Parliament adopted a motion urging the government to withdraw from the Rome Statute. It decided 'that any criminal investigations or prosecutions arising out of the post-election violence of 2007–2008 be undertaken under the framework of the new Constitution'.[152] This motion prompted government officials to seek support from the AU to request a deferral from the Security Council. At the XVI Summit of Heads of States held in January 2011, the AU called on the Security Council to grant Kenya's request.

[149] 'Accord de Paix Global entre le Gouvernment de la République Centrafricaine et l'APRD, FDPC, et UFDR, Libreville (21 Juin 2008)' <http://www.ucdp.uu.se/gpdatabase/peace/CAR%2020080621fr.pdf> accessed 1 September 2013. Art 2 specifically excludes crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court.

[150] 'Une éventuelle mise en application des termes de la lettre du Procureur de la Cour Pénale Internationale risquerait de mettre en péril l'Accord Global au cas où, un quelconque combattant était mis en état d'arrestation de ces chefs d'accusation', Letter of President Bozizé, reproduced in 'Quand François Bozizé veut s'assurer à lui-même et à ses abires une impunité totale,' L'Independant, 23 October 2008 <http://www.lindependant-cf.com/Quand-Francois-Bozize-veut-s-assurer-a-lui-meme-et-a-ses-sbires-une-impunite-totale_a414.html> accessed 24 September 2013. The letter is confirmed to be valid in 'Report on the Central African Republic', Human Rights Watch, Rapport mondial, 2009.

[151] Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Art 58 as to William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey, and Joshua Arap Sang, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-30-RED1, PTC II, ICC, 15 December 2010; Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Art 58 as to Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta, and Mohammed Hussein Ali, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-31-RED2, PTC II, ICC, 15 December 2010.

[152] Parliament of Kenya, Motion No. 144 (adopted 22 December 2010). See also 'AU Chairman Backs Kenya Move on the ICC', Capital FM, 20 January 2011 <http://www.capitalfm.co.ke/news/2011/01/au-chairman-backs-kenya-move-on-icc/> accessed 1 September 2013.

The AU grounded its request in the primacy of Kenyan jurisdiction[153] and the attempt to give Kenya time to establish a special tribunal for domestic trials and a mechanism to prosecute individuals related to the post-electoral violence.[154]

On 18 March 2011 an interactive dialogue was held between the Council, the permanent representative of Kenya, and AU officials to consider the deferral of the investigations and prosecutions at the ICC on the basis of Article 16 of the Rome Statute. This dialogue reportedly led to a finding that 'the conditions of the implementation of Article 16 [were] not fulfilled'.[155] A key concern of the Council was that the Kenyan request for deferral 'did not seem to enjoy the support of both sides of the coalition Government'.[156] Within days the Government of Kenya then sought to obtain national consensus and informed the Council that the Orange Democratic Movement (ODM) supported the creation of a national mechanism to handle the cases.[157] The Council held an information consultation on 8 April 2011, but as the President of the Security Council announced, 'after full consideration the members of the Security Council did not agree on the matter'.[158] The President of the Council provided no further clarification as to whether the discussion meant that the members did not agree amongst themselves on the matter, or whether they collectively did not agree with Kenya's request. The Court moved on with the proceedings and eventually confirmed charges only against three of the original suspects, Uhuru Kenyatta, William Ruto, and Joshua Arap Sang. It also confirmed the admissibility of the case after evaluating the ability and willingness of Kenya to prosecute them.

The issue came back to the table in March 2013 when Uhuru Kenyatta and William Ruto won the elections and became President and Deputy President respectively. The Council was seized with the issue on 8 May. A letter was sent to the Council on 13 May and mobilization by Kenya at the level of the AU and of the United Nations led to a request for another interactive dialogue, which took place on 23 May 2013, on the basis of a series of letters requesting a deferral under Article 16 and dialogue at the Council. Kenya requested the Council use its enforcement powers to terminate the proceedings. Although it was clear that there was no support from the Council to move forward with the request, it was agreed that a format was necessary to hear Kenya out and the [153] AU Assembly Decision, 16th Sess., Decision on the Implementation of the Decision on the International Criminal Court (31 January 2011) Assembly/AU/Dec.334 [XVI], para. 6.

[154] Government of Kenya, State House, Press Statement on the Occasion of the visit of the President of the Assembly of States Parties to the ICC (28 January 2011) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/MediaCoverage/2011/Pres-Kenya-Statement-PASP-28Jan2011-ENG.pdf> accessed 1 September 2013.

[155] Quote of French Ambassador to the United Nations Amb. Gerard Araud in M Mutiga, 'UN Council Rejects Kenya's Deferral Bid' Saturday Nation Kenya, 19 March 2011 <http://www.nation.co.ke/News/politics/UN+council+rejects+Kenya+deferral+bid/-/1064/1128944/-/alisyrz/-/index.html> accessed on 21 March 2013.

[156] Ibid.

[157] Letter to the Security Council, Request of Kenya for deferral under Art 16 of the Rome Statute (29 March 2011) UN Doc S/2011/201.

[158] Press Statement by the President of the Council, Ambassador Nestor Osorio (Colombia) on the request of Kenya for deferral under Art 16 of the Rome Statute, UN Media Stakeout, 5:05 (8 April 2011) <http://www.unmultimedia.org/tv/webcast/2011/04/sc-president-nestor-osorio-colombia-on-dr-congo-security-council-media-stakeout-2.html> accessed 15 April 2013.

session took place[159] without leading to any decision by the Council. In October 2013 demarches continued to pursue a deferral of the cases against Mr Kenyatta and Mr Ruto.[160] The request of Kenya was seconded by the AU through a letter to the UNSC.[161] Rwanda, Morocco, and Togo tabled a resolution of deferral of the situation of Kenya. But the resolution did not receive enough votes to be adopted.[162]

These four cases of requests for deferrals illustrate the challenges brought by Article 16: (i) a lack of common understanding or clarity as to the functions and conditions of a deferral; (ii) a lack of procedures dealing with tensions following the rejection of a request for deferral (e.g. transparency, techniques to temper unmet expectations); (iii) and the absence of checks and balances, ensuring that deferrals are framed in line with the Rome Statute or contained in their impact.

3.8.1 Conditions and criteria for invoking Article 16

Article 16 has been contested since its inception.[163] States opposing the provision invoked concerns relating to the judicial independence of the ICC and the right to a fair trial. In the end, it was decided that the 'onus lies with the Security Council to decide from case to case (with full application of the veto)'.[164]

The reasons invoked to justify Article 16 in practice have differed across situations. In several instances, Council interests were placed above those of the Court. The ICC was considered a threat to the peace in the context of Resolution 1422 (2002), and in the context of the request of the AU which was meant to introduce an additional 'layer of control of the Prosecutor'.[165]

This approach contrasts with another school of thought which regards Article 16 as a mechanism to facilitate peace processes and transitional justice mechanisms. This line of reasoning was, inter alia, used by the Conseil d'État of Belgium. In its analysis of the constitutionality of the Rome Statute, the Conseil expressed the view that Article 16 pursues a higher political objective in the realm of conflict resolution, namely to facilitate peace

[159] 'What's in Blue: Informal Interactive Dialogue with Kenya on ICC Issue', Security Council Report, 22 May 2013 <http://www.whatsinblue.org/2013/05/informal-interactive-dialogue-with-kenya-on-icc-issue.php> accessed 15 September 2013.

[160] Identical letters dated 21 October 2013 from the Permanent Representative of Kenya to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary General and the President of the Security Council, 21 October 2013, UN Doc S/2013/624.

[161] Letter 1 November 2013, UN Doc S/2013/639.

[162] In favour, States not Parties: Azerbaijan, China, Morocco, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Rwanda, and Togo. Abstention, States Parties: Argentina, Australia, France, Guatemala, Luxembourg, Republic of Korea, United Kingdom; and States not Party: the United States. UN Doc S/2013/660; UNSC 7060th Meeting (15 November 2013) UN Doc S/PV.7060.

[163] The unrecorded voting procedure makes it difficult to identify states that abstained. But a reconstruction of statements suggests that the following five states abstained, partly based on opposition to Art 16: Cuba, India, Mexico, Pakistan, and Sudan on behalf of the Group of Arab States. Ironically, some of these states later supported the invocation of Art 16. The United States voted against the Statute. In its statement, it expressed opposition to Art 16, but not because of the functions of the provision; rather, due to the procedural limitations to the deferral. See Rome Conference, Official Records (n 140), 9th Plenary Meeting.

[164] Berman (n 2) 177–8.

[165] African Union, Communiqué 2008 (n 142), para. 9.

operations.[166] Other commentators have interpreted Article 16 in a similar manner. For Robert Cryer, Hakan Friman, Darryl Robinson, and Elizabeth Wilmshurst:

> [T]he purpose of [Article 16] was to allow the Council, under its primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security, to set aside the demands of justice at a time when it considered the demands of peace to be overridden; if the suspension of legal proceedings against a leader will allow a peace treaty to be concluded, precedence should be given to peace. The suspension of the proceedings would be only temporary.[167]

Some proponents of this approach argue that Article 16 mitigates the inability to offer guarantees of impunity regarding the most serious crimes in peace negotiations[168] by offering additional space for sequencing or timing of justice interventions.[169] Others claim that negotiators require instruments to handle the impact of warrants of arrest. These arguments have been made in the Darfur crisis,[170] where officials argued that action by the ICC is 'counterproductive and will complicate the ongoing efforts [and] will also increase the risk of instability in Sudan, the IGAD region and in the whole continent'.[171] Again, others stress that the possibilities of reaching a peace agreement are curtailed when an indictment targets 'those key leaders who are best able to deliver peace',[172] or that an indictment at the wrong time may polarize competing factions. It is more difficult to argue that Article 16 serves as a mechanism to facilitate complementarity, i.e. to ensure the implementation of domestic decisions to prosecute at the national level or 'to pursue alternative means of justice'.[173]

[166] Avis du Conseil d'Etat du 21 avril 1999 (Belgium), Parliamentary Document 2-239, 1999/2000, 94 at (B)(1)(1.1). For the Conseil d'État, the regime of deferral: Sans doute […] se justifie par le souci des rédacteurs du Statut d'éviter que des accords de paix péniblement élaborés ou en voie d'élaboration puissent être remis en cause par des poursuites devant la Cour pénale internationale.

[167] R Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2014) 170. Similar interpretation by Bergsmo and Pejić, 'Article 16' (n 137), 599, marginal note 10.

[168] P Hayner, 'Managing the Challenges of Integrating Justice Efforts and Peace Processes', Review Conference of the Rome Statute, Kampala 31 May–11 June 2010, Stocktaking on Peace and Justice (30 May 2010), ICC Doc RC/ST/PJ/INF.4, 2 ('Hayner, Managing Challenges').

[169] See, for instance, Report of the UN Secretary General, The Rule of Law and Transitional Justice in Conflict and Post-conflict Societies (3 August 2004) UN Doc S/2004/616, para. 64(k); Remarks by Juan Méndez at Second Expert Public Hearing, Office of the Prosecutor, ICC (18 October 2006); T Murithi, 'Sequencing the Administration of Justice to Enable the Pursuit of Peace', Institute for Justice and Reconciliation Policy Brief 1 (June 2010) 5.

[170] At a briefing to the Security Council, Mr Rodolphe Adada, Joint African Union–United Nations Special Representative for Darfur and head of the African Union–United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur, told the Council:

> The ICC issue has dominated and polarized Sudanese political life. It has weakened the position of those in the Sudan who have been working for compromise and consensus and has encouraged militant sentiment.

UNSC 6112nd Meeting (27 April 2009) UN Doc S/PV.6112, 18. See similarly, Organisation of the Islamic Conference, Press Release, 15 March 2009.

[171] Statement from the Executive Secretary of the IGAD, 3 August 2010 <http://igad.int/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=234:es-statement-on-chamber-of-the-international-criminal-court&catid=61:statements&Itemid=150> accessed 1 September 2013.

[172] African Union, Concept Note for the Preparatory Meeting of Ministers on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (3–6 November 2009) AU Doc No MinICC/Legal/2 (II), para. 13.

[173] AU Concept Note (n 172), para. 13; African Union Assembly Decision, 16th Sess. (n 187), para. 6.

A third strand of opinion considers Article 16 as a safeguard for the international community to address exceptional security threats, i.e. a threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression that requires the Council to declare a temporary halt to the operations of the Court. This approach is more in line with the protection of judicial independence, and reflects some of the discussions on Article 16 in negotiations. Observers recount how, in an unrecorded discussion on Article 16, a leading negotiator described a scenario in which an unyielding prosecutor was ready to proceed with an arrest warrant against a rogue leader from a nuclear power plant who had left instructions to his subordinates to activate a nuclear bomb in case he was indicted by the ICC.[174] Without this 'extreme scenario', some like-minded states that defended 'commitment to an independent and effective International Criminal Court that would not be subjected to the Security Council'[175] would not have been able to agree to Article 16. According to this reading, Article 16 is considered as an emergency clause to facilitate the restoration of security in cases of extreme threat. Admittedly, this approach has not been thoroughly or effectively pursued or discussed in practice. But two potential uses come to mind: the invocation of Article 16 to mitigate the humanitarian crisis arising from the backlash of President Al-Bashir to his indictment,[176] and as a hypothetical offer to Libyan President Muammar Gaddafi in 2011 in order to stop the reported massacres against civilians. In these scenarios, assurance would still be needed that the deferral would decisively and directly contribute to achieving the 'higher goal'.[177]

Finally, the use of Article 16 has been associated with claims of legitimacy in decision-making processes. This argument situates Article 16 in the broader political and democracy-oriented system in which it operates, in particular the conflict over majoritarian rule in the UN system. It is illustrated by the statement of Libyan Ambassador Mubarak, who criticized the lack of action by the Council on the deferral for Al-Bashir:[178]

> I wonder if, at the request of more than two thirds of the membership of the international community, the Security Council does not invoke article 16 of the Rome Statute, when will it do so?

It is further reflected in proposals by the AU to grant the General Assembly powers of deferral,[179] and in the proposal for amendment to Article 16 of the Rome Statute [174] Interview with participant to the Rome Conference, The Hague, 1 September 2009.

[175] J Yañez-Barnuevo, 'El Papel Del Grupo De Estados afines en La Elaboración y el Desarrollo del Estatuto de Roma de la Corte Penal Internacional' in S Corcuera Cabezut and J A Guevara Bermudez (eds), Justicia Penal Internacional (Mexico City: Universidad Iberoamericana 2001) 69.

[176] In March 2009 the Sudanese government expelled 13 international aid agencies operating in Darfur. The government of Sudan indicated that the expulsion was due to violations of conditions and rules for operation of aid agencies. Sudan also indicated that the concern about the expulsion of aid agencies was the excuse to justify intervention by the ICC. UNSC 6096th meeting (20 March 2009) UN Doc S/PV/6096, 4.

[177] Human Rights Watch has documented extensively how the hoped-for end of violence or threat has been elusive even when justice has been postponed. See 'Selling Justice Short: Why Accountability Matters', Human Rights Watch, July 2009.

[178] UNSC 5947th Meeting (n 143), 7.

[179] Proposed Amendment to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Report of the Working Group on the Review Conference, Appendix VI, Official Records of the Assembly of States circulated by South Africa in November 2009, and currently still under consideration by the Working Group on Amendments. This approach sits uneasily with the function of Article 16. The provision was not created to weigh opinion or judge the necessity of action by 'democratic' methods. It was tied to factual criteria, namely the existence of a threat to international peace, and crisis response schemes which require executive action.

3.8.2 Explaining a deferral decision

Although Article 16 is a fundamental norm in the relationship between the Council and the Court, its operationalization has received little institutional attention in the UN system. Existing weaknesses are illustrated by the lack of response of the Council to the request for deferral by the Assembly of the AU with respect to President Al-Bashir. The silence of the Council has been condemned by a number of international organizations.[180] In the case of Kenya, the lack of public debate or record of Council discussions during the closed informal consultations in 2011 and May 2013 had counterproductive effects. It increased tensions and raised the suspicion that the Council does not give due consideration to AU concerns. These shortcomings reflect negatively on the Court. In May 2013 Kenya turned to the Assembly of States Parties to hold an emergency special session in order to address the concerns that were left unsettled by the Council.[181]

3.8.3 Containing deferrals

It is expected that requests for deferrals will continue to be brought forward by affected parties. Although deferrals can be blocked by France and the United Kingdom as permanent members, or through concerted abstention of States Parties sitting in the Council,[182] they remain an option for those affected by the Court's investigations and prosecutions. One of the challenges is to limit their detrimental effects on the Court. Some implications require further attention. For instance, suspending a trial may compete with the rights of the accused to an expeditious trial. It limits the option of victims to participate in proceedings, or might endanger their protection, if states refuse to cooperate with the Court. In cross-border situations, a deferral might adversely affect another State Party. It might also entail additional costs through delays caused. Neither the Council nor the Court nor States Parties currently possess the tools to assess the impact of deferrals or to ensure that the Council may limit its impact to 'acceptable' terms should a deferral be approved in the future.

Parties, (November 2009) ICC-ASP/8/20 Annex II, November 2009 (Eighth Session of the Assembly of States Parties).

[180] Arab League, Council of Ministers, Emergency Session, Resolution on the decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber I to the International Criminal Court against the President of the Republic of Sudan, Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, 4 March 2009, para. 3: 'Expresses regret that the Security Council was not able to invoke Article 16 of the Rome Statute to delay the action taken by the International Criminal Court' (unofficial translation from Arabic by the CICC).

[181] Oral submission of the Permanent Representative of Kenya to the United Nations to the Bureau of the Assembly of States Parties on 17 June 2013, Decisions of the Bureau, 6th Meeting. See also discussion of the Bureau on its 7th Meeting (8 July 2013), and decision of the Bureau to decline the request of Kenya at the 8th Meeting (19 July 2013).

[182] Art 27(2), UN Charter.

3.9 Conclusions

The relationship between the Court and the Council is marked by tensions between law, politics, and judicial diplomacy. The promotion of accountability requires fresh initiatives to address the challenges in the interaction between the two bodies. At present, the Court is predominantly seen and treated as an instrument of the Council. This approach has overshadowed the two other methods of interaction that are inherent in the relationship: institutional autonomy, and the use of collective security for enforcement of international justice. The instrumentalization of the Court has pushed critics to argue for greater separation of 'justice' and 'collective security'. An improvement of the status quo requires a better balancing of interests. Interaction needs to take into account judicial independence and the virtues and necessity of the Council as agent for the Court.

While it may be impossible for States Parties to reach agreement on fundamental divisions in the near future, certain steps can be taken to mitigate criticism of Council action (e.g. selectivity, lack of transparency) to enhance cooperation with the Court (including funding) and to secure follow-up to the decisions of the Council, while building on mutual synergies between the institutions.

The conditions of discourse in the Council are a first port of entry for potential changes in practice. If the ICC is used as an accountability mechanism for maintenance of peace and security, the Council should 'lead by example' and apply greater vigilance in its own action.[183] This applies in particular to referrals. Mechanisms of follow-up[184] must be coherent with the commitment to address the magnitude of victimization arising from the crimes under the jurisdiction of the Court. The declarations of the Council should reflect this commitment and leave no doubt as to the support enjoyed by the Court internationally.

In practical terms, the Council might support ICC action against perpetrators through sanctions and asset freezing.[185] For instance, UN sanction committees might use their power to list individuals that are subject to arrest warrants issued by the Pre-Trial Chambers of the ICC. Listing could be extended to all situations in which the Court is acting, and not only those referred by the Council.

There are also various ways in which interaction between the Council and the Court may be improved after a referral. It has, in particular, been suggested that the Council Working Group on Tribunals could serve as a forum for dialogue on follow-up.[186] This would require greater flexibility by states not parties to allow the Court to participate in informal or formal mechanisms.[187]

[183] Chatham House, SC and the ICC (n 6) 5; IPI, ICC, and Security Council 2013 (n 6) 1 and 6.

[184] Several states supported this idea at the UNSC 6849th Meeting: Argentina, Botswana, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Estonia, Guatemala, Lesotho, Mexico, New Zealand, Peru, Portugal, Slovakia, Slovenia, Switzerland, Uruguay, and New Zealand.

[185] See generally, Stagno, Strengthening the Rule of Law 2012 (n 6); Report of the Court on ICC–UN Cooperation (n 6), paras 49–50.

[186] IPI, ICC, and Security Council 2013 (n 6), 6; Statements of Estonia, France, and New Zealand, Togo 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6).

[187] In early 2013 an invitation to brief the Security Council's Working Group on International Tribunals was extended to the Prosecution. It was abandoned as some Council members considered that the mandate of the Working Group (focusing on ad hoc tribunals) left the ICC out of its scope. See

Most prospects for tangible results are in the areas of cooperation and implementation. This point was expressly made by the President of the Court, who told the Council, > if the ICC is to effectively deal with situations referred by the Council under Chapter VII, it needs to be able to count on the full and continuing cooperation of all UN members, whether they are parties to the Rome Statute or not [and] it would be very helpful if the Security Council could underline this obligation of full cooperation, without which it is very difficult for the ICC to discharge the mandate the Council has given it.[188]

In these areas, the relationship is reversed. The ICC is the agent, and the Council serves a mechanism to support the work of the Court. Many suggestions have been made to improve the status quo. States have affirmed the need for more precise drafting in future referrals to identify obligations regarding cooperation and full protection of ICC staff with respect to immunities and privileges.[189]

There are also ways to mitigate funding dilemmas for the ICC, especially in the area of cooperation between the ICC and the UN. The ICC Registry and the Office of the Prosecutor rely on UN cooperation in the field, including services, communications, travel, evacuation, and logistics.[190] The UN–ICC Relationship Agreement specifies that costs arising from cooperation and any other support rendered by the UN to the Court are fully reimbursable.[191] These costs are substantial for the Court, but relatively small for the United Nations. For example, between 1 July 2012 and 30 June 2013 the Court paid 671,568.00 USD to the UN as reimbursement for services and cooperation provided by the UN mainly from the field in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, CAR, Côte d'Ivoire, Mali, and Kenya.[192] This amount represents approximately 0.4% of the annual budget of the Court (€120 million), and 0.02% annually of the biennial budget of the UN (USD 5,152 million).[193] Reopening dialogue on this reimbursement scheme might be a way to counter discrepancies caused by the lack of funding of Council referrals.

'What is in Blue Briefing: Interactive Dialogue with the ICC Prosecutor', Security Council Report, 6 May 2013 <http://www.whatsinblue.org/2013/05/interactive-dialogue-with-the-icc-prosecutor.php> accessed 30 September 2013.

[188] Statement of President Song, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6), 5.

[189] Statement of Australia, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6), 6.

[190] See, Report of the UN Secretary General on information relevant to the implementation of Art 3 of the Relationship Agreement between the United Nations and the International Criminal Court (4 September 2013) UN Doc A/68/364, para. 3 and Report of the Court on ICC-UN Cooperation (n 6), paras 13–23.

[191] UN General Assembly Resolution 58/318 (13 September 2004), UN Doc A/Res/58/318, para. 3.

[192] Report of the UN Secretary General, Expenses incurred and reimbursements received by the United Nations in connection with assistance provided to the International Criminal Court (5 September 2013), UN Doc A/68/366. The reimbursed services provided by the UN in 2011–12 were slightly higher, 806 955.00 USD. See UN Doc A/67/378, 19 September 2012.

[193] UN Regular Budget 2012–13, fact sheet, February 2012 <http://www.un.org/en/hq/dm/pdfs/oppba/Regular%20Budget.pdf> accessed 15 August 2013.

If future referrals are contemplated, the underlying conditions and controversial provisions must be subject to greater discourse and transparency, e.g. through clearer explanation of votes. More coordination and consultation may be necessary to avoid inherent contradictions and legal concerns from the perspective of the Rome Statute. In some cases, the cost of concessions might be so high that it may not be in the ICC's interests for it to be triggered.

Similar action is necessary in relation to deferrals under Article 16, and their conditions. Transparency of the decision-making in the Council plays a key role in gaining acceptance for decisions.[194] Existing practice has shown that due explanations may be necessary to avoid political backlash, misunderstandings, and accusations of bias, even in cases where Council members are not willing to support a request.

It is a given that decision-making in the Council is 'political' in nature. In this sense, Council action does not differ fundamentally from State referrals, which are mostly triggered by government action. But the collective nature of the UN system provides better opportunities for consultation and coordination that should mitigate concerns of selectivity and negative implications of Council decisions on the ICC. Several constructive recommendations have been made to this effect. For instance, France has proposed the idea of a code of conduct among the permanent members of the Council by which they would agree not to use their veto power in situations where massive crimes have been committed.[195] Other states have suggested indicative checklists to guide the engagement of the Council with the Court on potential Article 13(b) referrals.[196] Interaction could be strengthened through adoption of a protocol,[197] or the identification of general parameters,[198] which would guide Council's actions in cases in which there are strong indications that the crimes under the Rome Statute are being committed and no domestic action is taken. They would signal a greater commitment to a policy of accountability, which is necessary to maintain the authority and integrity of Council decision-making relating to the ICC.

Some positive signals in this direction may be detected in the growing references to the ICC in thematic or country-specific UN resolutions. The ICC and Rome Statute crimes are increasingly used as a frame of reference in relation to peace operations or the protection of civilians. One key aspect lies in the identification and strengthening of positive synergies between both institutions. Interaction between the Court and the Council may be strengthened through debate on thematic issues,[199] interactive [194] See for instance, statement of the United Republic of Tanzania, UNSC 6849th meeting resumption.

[195] Statement of France, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting (n 6) 22–3; Statement of New Zealand, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6), 5.

[196] Statement of Portugal, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting (n 6) 13–14.

[197] Statement of Costa Rica, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6) 2–3.

[198] Statement of Lesotho, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6), 17–18.

[199] Statement of Lithuania, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6), 1, 14.

dialogues, and open sessions,[200] where the President and prosecutor of the ICC may brief the Council.[201]

Pursuing these specific actions will require resolve and political creativity. But they would open up prospects for a new era in the relationship between the Council and the Court, one based on a clearer strategy and greater coherence in the fight against impunity for the most serious crimes under international law.

[200] Statement of Slovenia, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6), 10.

[201] Statement of The Netherlands, 2012 Open Debate on Peace and Justice UNSC 6849th meeting resumption 1 (n 6), 33.

4

The ICC and the AU

Ottilia Anna Maunganidze and Anton du Plessis

4.1 Introduction

The relationship between the ICC and the AU can be characterized as troubled at present. The primary bone of contention relates to accusations by the AU that the ICC is a neo-imperialistic tool that illegitimately targets Africa. The impact of this troubled relationship is primarily political. However, it has also had a significant impact on the practice of the ICC.

This chapter analyses the legal and political background of the relationship between the ICC and the AU, including the origin and foundation of divergent positions, for instance on head of state immunity and cooperation duties. The AU, following the indictment of Sudanese President Omar Hassan Al Bashir, and later Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta of Kenya,[1] has consistently defended the immunity of heads of state as central to state sovereignty. Their primary criticism of the ICC in the indictment of heads of state has been aimed at the Office of the Prosecutor. In respect of cooperation, the AU contends that non-State Parties should not be 'forced' to cooperate, even where a situation has been referred by the UNSC. Further, it has been suggested that all African states should withhold cooperation where the ICC has indicted heads of state.[2]

The chapter, nevertheless, cautions against an oversimplification of 'African' views as homogeneous and highlights the progress made by some African countries in investigating, prosecuting, and adjudicating international crimes. It posits that these efforts, albeit riddled with challenges, are in line with the principle of complementarity that is at the heart of the Rome Statute system. It goes further, however, to suggest that these domestic initiatives go beyond merely complementing the ICC and are in effect an effort to promote international criminal justice in general. This is so because under the Rome Statute the traditional notion of complementarity relates to an invocation of the ICC's jurisdiction when domestic jurisdictions are unwilling or unable

* Ottilia Anna Maunganidze is a researcher on international criminal justice and counter-terrorism in the Transnational Threats and International Crime Division and the Office of the Managing Director of the Institute for Security Studies. LLD Candidate (UNISA), LLM Fundamental Rights Litigation and International Human Rights Law (UNISA), PDIS (Rhodes University), LLB (Rhodes University).

 Anton du Plessis is the Managing Director of the Institute for Security Studies. LLM Criminal Law and Human Rights (UNISA), LLB (UNISA), B Juris (UNISA).

[1] Kenyatta, together with his deputy William Samoei Ruto, was indicted before being elected as President.

[2] AU (Assembly), Decision on the Meeting of African States Parties to the Rome Statute of the ICC, Thirteenth Ordinary Session, 3 July 2009 (Sirte, Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya), Doc Assembly/AU/13(XIII), para. 10.

to prosecute individuals alleged to have committed international crimes.[3] However, these African efforts suggest that nations are working with the ICC towards achieving a common goal of international criminal justice, thereby reducing any possible impunity gaps.[4] This shall be illustrated by instances where efforts have been made to deal with crimes committed in states that are not party to the Rome Statute or by their nationals, and where the UNSC has not referred the situation therein to the ICC.

The chapter also examines the proposal to expand the jurisdiction of the African Court of Justice and Human and Peoples' Rights to deal with serious crimes, including international crimes and the implications thereof.

4.2 The Conflation of Politics and Law: Africa and International Criminal Justice

From the trials at Nuremberg[5] to date, international criminal law has sometimes been accused of 'providing victors in a conflict with an opportunity to demonise their opponents, sanitise their crimes and perpetuate injustice'.[6] Inherent in this accusation is the claim that international criminal law is a political tool of the victors over the vanquished. It suggests an intrinsic uneven landscape. It is this uneven landscape (perceived or otherwise) of international criminal law that the AU argues the ICC perpetuates through its focus on prosecuting situations in Africa while neglecting similar violations of the Rome Statute on other continents.[7] It is worth noting that the criticisms are manifold and relate to, but are not limited to, referrals made by the UNSC, the indictment of sitting heads of states (and the related arguments around immunities of heads of state), and the absence of situations outside of Africa on the ICC's roll. These concerns are captured in statements to the effect that the ICC is a 'hegemonic tool of western powers which is targeting or discriminating against Africans'.[8]

Following the AU's 21st Summit of the Assembly of African Heads of State and Government (AU Summit) in May 2013, the then chairperson of the AU Assembly, [3] Art 17(1) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[4] M du Plessis et al., 'African Efforts to Close the Impunity Gap: Lessons for Complementarity from National and Regional Actions', ISS Africa (2012), 1.

[5] International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. See The London Declaration of 8 August 1945 on the Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis. Annexed to this agreement was the Charter of the International Military Tribunal; B Ferencz, 'The Experience of Nuremberg' in D Shelton (ed.), International Crimes, Peace and Human Rights: The Role of the International Criminal Court (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2009); R Overy, 'The Nuremberg Trials: International Law in the Making' in P Sands (ed.), From Nuremberg to The Hague: The Future of International Criminal Justice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2003).

[6] W Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2004) 1.

[7] C Igwe, 'The ICC's Favourite Customer: Africa and International Criminal Law' (2008) 40 Comparative and International Law Journal of Southern Africa 40, 294. However, other situations were under preliminary examination by the Office of Prosecutor in Afghanistan, Colombia, Chad, Georgia, and Guinea; in this regard see M Ssenyonjo, 'The International Criminal Court Arrest Warrant Decision for President Al Bashir of Sudan' (2010) 59 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 205.

[8] M du Plessis, 'Recent Cases and Developments: South Africa and the International Criminal Court' (2009) 3 South African Journal of Criminal Justice 442, 443.

Ethiopia's Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn, stated that the decision of the AU to lambast the ICC was born from the fact that 'African leaders came to a consensus that the ICC process conducted in Africa has a flaw… [T]he process has degenerated to some kind of race-hunting rather than the fight against impunity.'[9] Some African statesmen have made similar statements in the past and after the 21st AU Summit. However, these statements should be taken as individual concerns and not as the concerns of all Africans.

Criticisms of the ICC as a neo-imperialistic tool that targets Africans emerged following the initiation of investigations into Sudanese President Omar Hassan Al Bashir's alleged role in the commission of international crimes in Darfur.[10] Following the issuance of a warrant for Al Bashir's arrest by the ICC in March 2009,[11] the AU called on the UNSC to defer the ICC's investigation into Al Bashir for a period of 12 months by invoking Article 16 of the Rome Statute.[12] In July 2009 the AU heads of state called on its members not to cooperate with the ICC in effecting the arrest of Al Bashir.[13] For African States Parties to the Rome Statute, this decision placed them in the 'unenviable position of having to choose between their obligations as member states of the AU on the one hand, and their obligations as states party to the Rome Statute, on the other'.[14]

To date, despite the ICC arrest warrant, Al Bashir has been invited to visit, and received by, African States Parties—including Chad, Djibouti, Kenya, and Malawi. It is worth noting that when Al Bashir was received in Kenya in August 2010, the country had already enacted implementing legislation of the Rome Statute that entailed an obligation to cooperate with the ICC and, where relevant, to effect the arrest of known fugitives.[15] Kenya, however, relied on the AU decision not to cooperate with the ICC in respect of Al Bashir as justification. Nevertheless, the Kenyan government's action in hosting Al Bashir resulted in the first ever decision of the ICC on non-cooperation.[16] Further, through an application by Kenyan civil society, a Kenyan High Court issued

[9] S Dersso, 'The International Criminal Court's Africa problem', Al Jazeera, 11 June 2013 <http://www.aljazeera.com/indepth/opinion/2013/06/201369851918549.html> accessed 5 March 2015.

[10] Du Plessis et al. (n 4).

[11] Warrant of Arrest for Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-1, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009.

[12] AU (Assembly), Decision on the Application by the ICC Prosecutor for the Indictment of the President of the Republic of the Sudan, Twelfth Ordinary Session, 1–3 February 2009 (Addis Ababa, Ehtiopia), Doc Assembly/AU/Dec.221(XII), 1 at para. 3. Art 16 ICC Statute empowers the UN Security Council to defer an investigation or prosecution for one year if it is necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. The UN Security Council would need to make a determination that the continued involvement of the ICC is a greater threat to international peace and security than suspending the ICC's work.

[13] AU Assembly Decision (n 2). On the other hand, human rights organizations welcomed the ICC arrest warrant. See also 'ICC: Bashir Warrant Is Warning to Abusive Leaders', Human Rights Watch, 4 March 2009; 'ICC Issues Arrest Warrant for Sudanese President Al Bashir', Amnesty International, 4 March 2009.

[14] D Tladi, 'The African Union and the International Criminal Court: The Battle for the Soul of International Law' (2009) 34 South African Yearbook of International Law 57.

[15] See Kenya's International Crimes Act 2008, which came into operation on 1 January 2009. The others include South Africa and Uganda.

[16] Decision requesting observations from the Republic of Kenya, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09, PTC I, ICC, 25 October 2010, 4.

a domestic arrest warrant for Al Bashir, thereby preventing future visits for fear of arrest.[17]

It should be noted that while some African countries have in the past relied on AU decisions on the ICC to justify non-cooperation, one should not conclude that all African states share a common negative position towards the ICC. As shall be illustrated, many African states continue to cooperate with the ICC on various matters, including requests for assistance, and several have publicly confirmed their support for the Court.

The aforementioned notwithstanding, it should be noted that at the time of writing, 34 African states are party to the Rome Statute and none has withdrawn from the treaty. Further, some African countries have put in place mechanisms to investigate and prosecute allegations of international crimes. Also of significance is the fact that four out of eight of the African situations before the ICC were self-referrals, most recently from Mali;[18] and that over 70 per cent of the requests for cooperation made by the ICC to African states (some of which are not party to the Rome Statute) are met with a positive response.[19]

4.3 African Efforts to Close the Impunity Gap

In Africa there is a great need to promote democracy and good governance, and to strengthen the rule of law, which are all threatened by the existence of impunity and a general lack of criminal justice capacity to respond effectively to international crimes. If the international criminal justice initiative is to succeed, it is imperative to seek means through which to address these issues. Furthermore, it should be noted that in addressing these issues, there should be a buy-in from African governments and civil society. It cannot be denied that without this buy-in the practical implementation of any work aimed at destroying the impunity gap will remain a pipe-dream. This is not to suggest that efforts have not been made across the African continent to end impunity, and indeed some states have recognized the need to address these challenges.

One of the cornerstones of international criminal justice is the principle of complementarity.[20] Complementarity's aim is to ensure that national criminal justice systems become legitimate and credible means through which justice for the commission of international crimes is sought. As stated by the Office of the Prosecutor during the early years of the Court in 2003:

> The [ICC's] strategy of focusing on those who bear the greatest responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court will leave an impunity gap unless national [17] Du Plessis et al. (n 4).

[18] O Maunganidze and A Louw, 'Mali: Implications of Another African Case As Mali Self-Refers to the ICC', ISS Today, 24 July 2012.

[19] F Bensouda, 'ISS Seminar: Setting the Record Straight: the ICC's New Prosecutor Responds to African Concerns, Pretoria', ISS Seminar Media Release, 10 October 2012.

[20] The Preamble to the Rome Statute emphasizes that 'the International Criminal Court established under this Statute shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions'. See also Art 17(1) ICC Statute.

> authorities, the international community and the Court work together to ensure that all appropriate means for bringing other perpetrators to justice are used.[21]

It is clear, therefore, that the prosecutorial strategy has, since the beginning, been to ensure that domestic courts are used as a complementary measure to the ICC to ensure justice.

This principle is important in that it allows countries to retain their independence in dealing with internal matters, but also provides victims with an additional course to take when seeking justice if their national courts cannot do so. It should be noted that complementarity is not a principle limited solely to situation countries before the Court, but rather extends to all countries that have ratified the Rome Statute. It is through a thorough appreciation of this that the international criminal justice system can be strengthened.

In order to give effect to complementarity and ultimately to promote international criminal justice, States Parties to the Rome Statute must adhere to their implementation obligations as outlined in the Statute.[22] This is so because the ICC's jurisdiction is not universal. The jurisdiction of the ICC must be triggered first, either by a State Party referral,[23] the prosecutor initiating independent investigations in a State Party,[24] or through a UNSC referral of a situation in a non-State Party.[25] Thus in the absence of referrals, the onus rests on states.

Without the requisite legislative framework to investigate and prosecute international crimes, states parties may be rendered 'unable' to prosecute, thereby leaving the ICC as the only avenue through which justice for international crimes may be sought. State parties should therefore ensure that they adapt their legal and justice system in order for them to enjoy a fully complementary relationship with the ICC. This means they must criminalize genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, as contained in the Rome Statute. Even in countries that have not ratified the Rome Statute, international crimes can (and should) be prosecuted. Indeed, the ICC in the case The Prosecutor v Saif al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah al-Senussi, in its decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, applied a two-step test to determine whether Libya should have jurisdiction over al-Senussi's case.[26] First, the ICC sought to determine whether at the time of the proceedings in respect of the admissibility challenge there was an ongoing investigation of the same case at national level. Second, if the answer to the first question was in the affirmative, whether the state was [21] Paper on some policy issues before the Office of the Prosecutor, Office of the Prosecutor, September 2003, 3.

[22] See generally W Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court 4th edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011); B Brandon and M du Plessis (eds), The Prosecution of International Crimes: A Practical Guide to Prosecuting ICC Crimes in Commonwealth States (London: Commonwealth Secretariat 2005).

[23] Art 12 ICC Statute: A state accepts jurisdiction by becoming a State Party, or can do so by declaration if it is a non-State Party. See also Arts 13(a) and 14.

[24] Arts 13(c) and 15 ICC Statute. These investigations must be authorized by the Pre-Trial Chamber.

[25] Art 13(b) ICC Statute. The UN Security Council must exercise its Chapter VII powers when making any such referral.

[26] Decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, PTC 1, ICC, 11 October 2013, Section III.

willing and able to genuinely carry out such investigation and prosecution. Despite objections from the Defence, the ICC ruled in favour of the Libyan government, as it was both satisfied that the case they intended to pursue against Al-Senussi was the same as that before the ICC and that there was willingness and ability to genuinely proceed. Al-Senussi's counsel has since appealed.[27]

In addition to criminalizing international crimes, States Parties must be able to arrest and surrender suspects to the ICC, where requested.[28] In addition, States Parties must cooperate with the ICC in relation to an investigation and/or prosecution with which the ICC might be seized. [29]

In order to be able to fully cooperate with the ICC, a State Party is obliged to have a range of powers, facilities, and procedures in place, including the promulgation of laws and regulations. The legal framework for requests for arrest and surrender, and all other forms of cooperation, is set out in Part 9 of the Rome Statute. First, there is a general duty on states to cooperate fully with the ICC in the investigation and prosecution of crimes.[30] Second, there is provision for requests of cooperation from the ICC.[31] Failure to cooperate with the ICC following a request can, amongst other things, lead to a referral of the state to the UNSC.[32] Article 88 obliges states to ensure that national procedures are in place to enable all forms of cooperation contemplated in the Statute. Unlike inter-state cooperation in criminal matters, the Rome Statute prescribes that for States Parties there are no grounds for refusing ICC requests for arrest and surrender.[33] States are therefore obliged, under the relevant arrest and surrender processes provided in their own national laws, to effect arrests and to surrender persons, where an ICC arrest warrant has been issued. It should be borne in mind that the AU has, since its 2009 Decision on the ICC,[34] reiterated its position on non-cooperation in respect of the arrest and surrender heads of state and that Al Bashir has, as a result, remained at large. Despite pronouncements of support by various African countries, none has actually arrested Al Bashir. Further, in the absence of a warrant for the arrest of Kenyatta, several African countries have come out in support of the Kenyan President. Interestingly, the ICC in its decisions has considered the views of African heads of state, whether in agreement or otherwise. In his obiter dicta on the relationship between the ICC and African states, Nigerian Judge Eboe-Osuji noted that the ICC should give more credence to the views of African leaders.[35] This [27] See Appeal on behalf of Abdullah Al-Senussi against Pre-Trial Chamber I's 'Decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi', and Request for Suspensive Effect, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-468-Red, Defence, ICC, 17 October 2013.

[28] While this is a duty for States Parties, non-States Parties can and are encouraged to cooperate with the ICC. In March 2013 the United States transferred Bosco Ntaganda to the ICC after he surrendered himself to their embassy in Rwanda.

[29] The extent of cooperation required of States Parties is evident from the fact that the Office of the Prosecutor has a very wide mandate to 'extend the investigation to cover all facts' and investigate circumstances generally 'in order to discover the truth': Art 54(1)(a) ICC Statute.

[30] Art 86 ICC Statute. [31] Art 87(1)(a) ICC Statute. [32] Art 87(7) ICC Statute.

[33] See Art 89 ICC Statute. Note that Art 97 provides for consultation where there are certain practical difficulties.

[34] AU Assembly Decision (n 2).

[35] Concurring separate opinion of Judge Eboe-Osuji, Order vacating trial date of 5 February 2014, convening a status conference, and addressing other procedure matters, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-886-Anx, TC V(B), ICC, 23 January 2014, para. 4 view, however controversial, cannot be entirely dismissed, as it goes to the heart of the ongoing friction that could have an adverse effect on the work of the ICC.

4.4 Complementarity in Action

There is a broader understanding of complementarity emerging in Africa. This broader understanding somewhat falls within the notion of 'positive complementarity', i.e. that the ICC and states should actively encourage genuine national proceedings where possible, and that national and international networks should be relied upon as part of a system of international cooperation.[36] At the heart of positive complementarity is a strong view that the ICC and domestic jurisdictions share a common responsibility.[37] Thus positive complementarity can be seen as the opposite of 'passive' complementarity in that it 'welcome[s] and encourage[s] efforts by States to investigate and prosecute international crimes and recognize[s] that such national proceedings may be an effective and efficient means of ending impunity'.[38]

Some individual African states have shown their commitment to ending impunity for international crimes despite the impression to the contrary created by the AU's negative position towards the ICC and statements by some statesmen. The obvious illustration of this is the fact that 34 African countries are party to the Rome Statute, at the time of writing eight had already adopted domestic implementing legislation,[39] a further 16 have some form of draft legislation,[40] four have referred situations to the ICC, and most comply with the Court's requests for cooperation.

Across the continent, there are many examples of international criminal justice in practice. For example, in the DRC, South Africa and Uganda there is evidence of (broad) complementarity in practice. It should be noted that there are other countries that are investigating and prosecuting international crimes in Africa and that the three countries covered below are simply used to illustrate African complementarity.

[36] Report on Prosecutorial Strategy, Office of the Prosecutor, 14 September 2006, para. 2. See also Report on the activities performed during the first three years (June 2003–June 2006), Office of the Prosecutor, 12 September 2006, para. 58. See also C Stahn, 'Complementarity: A Tale of Two Notions' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 87.

[37] Stahn (n 36) 101.

[38] W Burke-White, 'Proactive Complementarity: The International Criminal Court and National Courts in the Rome System of Justice', University of Pennsylvania Law School, Public Law and Legal Theory Research Paper No. 07-08; and see also W Burke-White, 'Implementing a Policy of Positive Complementarity in the Rome System of Justice' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 59.

[39] The eight countries that have passed implementation legislation are Burkina Faso, the Central African Republic, the Comoros, Kenya, Mauritius, Senegal, South Africa, and Uganda. There are other countries that do not have implementing legislation but have incorporated some (or all) of the Rome Statute crimes into their penal codes, for example the Democratic Republic of Congo, Malawi, and Lesotho.

[40] The Coalition for the International Criminal Court (CICC) estimates are that 16 of the 34 African States Parties have drafts of domestic ICC legislation that are in various states of completion; see CICC database on Sub-Saharan Africa, available at <http://www.iccnow.org/?mod=region&idureg=1> accessed 11 September 2014.

4.4.1 DRC

The DRC is a monist state, thus international treaties carry the same weight as constitutional law and can be directly applied.[41] The DRC ratified the Rome Statute in March 2002, and theoretically the Rome Statute has been applicable domestically since then. In April 2004 the government of the DRC referred the situation in the eastern provinces of the country, alleging that crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC were being committed.[42] The ICC's Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) launched investigations and as of April 2014, these have resulted in six arrest warrants being issued, half of which were related to the conflicts in Ituri and the other half to the provinces of North and South Kivu. Thus far, the ICC has conducted trials against three of the accused. The first convictions were secured against Thomas Lubanga Dyilo in March 2012, for the recruitment of child soldiers to actively participate in hostilities in Ituri, and Germain Katanga in March 2014, as an accessory to one count of crimes against humanity and four counts of war crimes committed during the attack on the village of Bogoro, Ituri.[43] Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui was acquitted in December 2012 and released from custody, while the charges against Callixte Mbarushimana were not confirmed.[44] The case against Bosco Ntaganda is ongoing, whereas Sylvestre Mudacumura is still at large.[45]

The DRC, in complementing the jurisdiction of the ICC and in an effort to ensure that justice is done not only for those indicted by the ICC but for all perpetrators, adopted a new military code—the Military Penal Code Law 024/2602—that criminalizes war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide, and provides for their investigation and prosecution. Pursuant to this law, the military in the eastern provinces of South and North Kivu have undertaken domestic prosecutions of international crimes and continue to pursue additional cases. In addition, in 2006 the government passed a national law on sexual violence, which clearly defines rape and other forms of sexual and gender-based violence, and provides for expedited judicial proceedings and greater protection for victims.[46]

[41] Arts 153 and 215 of the 2005 Constitution of the Democratic Republic of Congo provide that civilian and military courts may apply ratified treaties, even in the absence of implementing legislation, so long as they are 'consistent with law and custom'.

[42] 'Prosecutor Receives Referral of the Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo', ICC Press Release, 19 April 2004.

[43] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04–01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012; Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014.

[44] Decision on the confirmation of charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011; Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012.

[45] Warrant of arrest, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-2-Anx-tENG, PTC I, ICC, 22 August 2006; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58, Mudacumura, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, PTC II, ICC, 13 July 2012.

[46] DRC Law on Sexual Violence (2006) as contained in Laws 06/018 and 06/019, amendments to the Penal Code. See also D Zongwe, 'The New Sexual Violence Legislation in the Congo: Dressing Indelible Scars on Human Dignity' (2012) 55 African Studies Review 37.

The establishment of mobile gender courts in South Kivu has contributed to the domestic efforts to prosecute international crimes in the DRC. These courts were set up to prosecute rape and other serious crimes and 'have prosecuted hundreds of mostly direct physical perpetrators of sexual violence'.[47] The work of the mobile gender courts has been described as 'a promising indication of what can be achieved with targeted national support when domestic courts are both able and willing to prosecute very grave crimes'.[48] Notably, on 21 February 2011 Lieutenant Colonel Mutuare Kibibi became the most senior commander in the Congolese army to be found guilty of crimes against humanity, for ordering the mass rape of at least 49 women in the town of Fizi on New Year's Day 2011.[49] Eight soldiers under his command were also convicted.

While other international crimes are committed in the DRC, trials conducted to date have focused primarily on sexual and gender-based violence by armed groups and to a lesser extent by civilians. This owes in large part to the fact that the use of sexual violence as a weapon of war has been prevalent in the DRC.[50] However, it is important that the DRC also prosecutes other international crimes.

The DRC government has demonstrated its commitment to international criminal justice both through cooperation with the ICC and instituting proceedings in its domestic courts. This has not been without difficulty.[51] First, the DRC has been embroiled in conflict for over a decade and the areas in which international crimes are being committed are largely out of government control. Second, the prosecution of international crimes in the DRC has been done in the absence of domestic implementing legislation that provides a procedure to enable domestic prosecutions within the civilian justice system. Consequently, the majority of those prosecuted have come from army ranks. Third, amongst other challenges facing the criminal justice system, there is a lack of qualified investigators, lawyers, and judges with the requisite knowledge of international criminal law.

Despite these challenges, the DRC's efforts manifest a working example of complementarity on the continent through the various domestic prosecutions completed or under way.[52] The case of the military tribunals in the DRC highlights the challenges and opportunities for home-grown initiatives aimed at responding to international crimes.

[47] A Cole, 'Making the Perpetrators of Mass Sexual Violence Pay: International Justice for Gender-related Crimes', Openspace, 6 March 2012 <http://www.osisa.org/openspace/global/making-perpetrators-mass-sexual-violence-pay-alison-cole> accessed 11 September 2014.

[48] Ibid., 62–3.

[49] 'Congo Colonel Gets 20 Years after Rape Trial', Fox News, 21 February 2011.

[50] C Brown, 'Rape as a Weapon in the Democratic Republic of Congo' (2012) 22 Torture 24; J Kippenberg et al., 'Soldiers Who Rape, Commanders Who Condone: Sexual Violence and Military Reform in the Democratic Republic of Congo', Human Rights Watch (2009); M Pratt and L Werchick, 'Sexual Terrorism: Rape as a Weapon of War in Eastern Democratic Republic of Congo, Assessment Report, USAID/DCHA (2004) 6–7.

[51] E Witte et al., 'Putting Complementarity into Practice: Domestic Justice for International Crimes in DRC, Uganda, and Kenya', Open Society Foundations (2011).

[52] L Olivier, 'Complementarity in Action', Openspace, 6 March 2012 <http://www.osisa.org/openspace/regional/complementarity-action-louise-olivier> accessed 11 September 2014.

4.4.2 South Africa

South Africa incorporated the Rome Statute into its domestic law by means of the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002 ('South Africa ICC Act'). Prior to the ICC Act, the core international crimes of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide had not been criminalized in South African law. The ICC Act, like the Rome Statute, has limited temporal jurisdiction in that no action may be brought against a person for crimes committed before 1 July 2002.[53] Further, South Africa has implemented the Geneva Conventions and provides for the prosecution of grave breaches in domestic courts.[54]

The ICC Act provides for a structure for national investigation and prosecution of international crimes in line with the principle of complementarity. Section 3 of the ICC Act provides that one of the objectives is to enable 'the National Prosecuting Authority to adjudicate in cases brought against any person accused of having committed a crime in the Republic and beyond the borders of the Republic in certain circumstances'.[55] This provision clearly provides South Africa with extra-territorial jurisdiction. In addition to having jurisdiction over people who are South African and/or commit crimes against South Africans, section 4(3) of the ICC Act provides for the prosecution of individuals that are not South African (nor ordinarily resident in South Africa), who after the commission of the crime are present in the territory of South Africa.[56]

In 2003 South Africa established a Priority Crimes Litigation Unit (PCLU) within the National Prosecution Authority (NPA) tasked with the 'prosecution of crimes contemplated in the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act', amongst other serious offences.[57] A Special Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) who manages and directs any such prosecution heads the PCLU. It is important to note that the PCLU's mandate is extensive, with the unit being responsible for directing investigations and prosecutions relating not only to crimes under the Rome Statute, but also to national and international terrorism, weapons of mass destruction, mercenaries, matters emanating from the post-apartheid Truth and Reconciliation Commission process, and any other priorities as determined by the National DPP. To carry out this broad mandate, the PCLU has just five advocates and one administrator.

The PCLU depends on the cooperation of the South African Police Services (SAPS) when it comes to the investigation of crimes within its mandate. In 2009 a Directorate for Priority Crimes Investigation (DPCI) was established with a mandate to investigate, inter alia, international crimes as contained in the Rome Statute.[58] Within the DPCI, a 26-member unit—the Crimes Against the State (CATS) unit[59]—is responsible [53] Section 5(2) of the South Africa ICC Act.

[54] Implementation of the Geneva Conventions Act 8 of 2010 (South Africa).

[55] Section 3 of the South Africa ICC Act.

[56] Section 4(3)(c) of the South Africa ICC Act.

[57] For more information on the Priority Crimes Litigation Unit, see <http://www.npa.gov.za/UploadedFiles/About%20PCLU%20signedoff.pdf> accessed 12 June 2013.

[58] Section 17C of the Police Service Act 1995 (South Africa) as amended by the Police Service Amendment Act 57 of 2008 (South Africa).

[59] The CATS unit was established in 2005 and pre-dates the establishment of DPCI, but has since been subsumed into the DPCI framework.

for the actual investigation of international crimes. Like the PCLU, the CATS unit is tasked with investigating a range of other serious offences such as acts of terror, offences related to the unlawful use or transfer of firearms and other deadly weapons, organized crime, and acts which may pose a serious threat to the security of the state such as treason and sedition.

The broad mandates of the PCLU and CATS units have important implications for their ability to devote specific attention to Rome Statute crimes. Nevertheless, the PCLU and CATS units have dealt with a number of cases, most of which were brought to their attention by civil society or advocacy groups. Most notably, the PCLU was approached by the Southern African Litigation Centre and Zimbabwe Exiles Forum to open a case in respect of alleged acts of torture committed by Zimbabwean police against anti-government activists in the run-up to the 2008 presidential election.[60]

Further, in 2011 the Media Review Network (MRN) and the Palestinian Solidarity Alliance (PSA) compiled and submitted a lengthy dossier to the PCLU in which they detailed international crimes allegedly committed in the Gaza Strip by Israeli authorities.[61] The dossier implicated, amongst others, the then Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, and sought arrest warrants.[62] The DPCI decided not to investigate further, contending that there was insufficient evidence to proceed.[63] Nevertheless, Livni publicly announced that her planned visit to South Africa would not proceed.

In 2012 the PCLU was called upon to seek a warrant for the arrest of the late Prime Minister of Ethiopia Meles Zenawi, ahead of his visit to South Africa, for alleged crimes against humanity and genocide against the Ogadeni people.[64] A similar request was made by civil society for former British Prime Minister Tony Blair in August 2012 in respect of crimes committed by British soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan.[65] Both requests were declined. The first international crime case that the NPA has decided to proceed with is that in respect of abuses committed in Madagascar in 2009, with a view to prosecuting the country's ousted former President Marc Ravalomanana.

Through the domestication of the Rome Statute and the establishment of specialized units tasked with the investigation and prosecution of international crimes, South Africa is taking steps to meet its complementarity obligations. Moreover—to the extent that the ICC Act and the Geneva Conventions Act provide for universal jurisdiction—South African authorities can investigate and prosecute crimes that fall outside the Rome Statute system's net: namely, those occurring in states that are not ICC members, or by nationals of such states, as in the Ethiopia, Israel–Gaza, and Zimbabwe cases mentioned earlier.

[60] Southern African Litigation Centre and another v National Director of Public Prosecutions and others 2012 (10) BCLR 1089 (GNP). It should be noted that after a refusal to initiate investigations, the NPA and others were taken to court. In May 2012 the North Gauteng High Court ruled that there was an obligation on justice authorities to investigate the alleged crimes against humanity.

[61] MRN and PSA, 'The Gaza Docket and Operation Cast Lead', Joint Press Release <http://www.mediareviewnet.com/2013/01/joint-press-release-10/>.

[62] Ibid. [63] 'South Africa Rejects Livni Arrest Call', Al Jazeera, 19 January 2011,.

[64] M Osman, 'Meles Zenawi Enjoys SA Hospitality while Ogadeni Somalis Await Justice', Jubbaland News, 25 June 2012.

[65] R Davis, 'Call to Arrest Tony Blair during SA Visit Gains Momentum', Daily Maverick, 27 August 2012.

It should be noted that the NPA or the police initiated none of the above South African examples. However, this is not necessarily an indication of a lack of commitment to international justice on the part of the authorities. One sign that the South African authorities are committed to the principles of the Rome Statute is the ongoing efforts to build capacity among the prosecutors and investigators who work on international crimes. Since 2008 the Institute for Security Studies has provided training to the NPA (and more recently, also the CATS unit in the police) on international criminal justice, the Rome Statute, and the ICC Act. This training has been provided within the context of broader programmes that cover other crimes falling within the mandates of these units as well as technical aspects of international cooperation in criminal matters such as mutual legal assistance and extradition.

In addition to the work of the specialized units, the South African government has been compelled to take a position on international criminal justice by civil society in various instances. The first example is the action taken by civil society in South Africa to seek a court order for the arrest of Al Bashir if he attended President Zuma's inauguration in Pretoria.[66] After the press reported in early May 2009 that the South African government had invited Al Bashir to attend Jacob Zuma's inauguration as South Africa's new President on 9 May 2009, civil society responded swiftly. A number of influential civil society organizations issued a media statement on 7 May 2009 which called on South Africa to take heed of its international and domestic obligations (stemming from the ICC Act) and not welcome Al Bashir. Civil society also threatened court action against the South African government were it to renege on its obligations.[67] In the end, Al Bashir did not attend, and the threatened court application was not necessary.

The second example comes from the mobilization by civil society to lobby for the South African government to reconsider its endorsement of the AU's 2009 Decision not to cooperate with the ICC in the arrest and surrender of Al Bashir. On 15 July 2009, 17 South African civil society organizations and many concerned individuals issued a statement in which they called upon President Zuma to honour South Africa's treaty obligations by cooperating with the ICC in relation to the warrant of arrest issued for Al Bashir.[68] The statement included signatures from high-profile South

[66] Du Plessis et al. (n 4).

[67] During this time a Pretoria Magistrate issued a domestic warrant for the arrest of Al Bashir.

[68] The South African-based organizations that endorsed the statement are: Aids Consortium, Centre for Applied Legal Studies (CALS), Centre for Human Rights, Faculty of Law, Pretoria University, Centre for Justice and Crime Prevention Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation (CSVR), Human Rights Institute of South Africa (HURISA), International Centre for Transitional Justice (ICTJ), International Crime in Africa Programme, Institute for Security Studies (ISS), Khulumani Support Group, Legal Resources Centre (LRC), Lawyers for Human Rights (LHR), Open Society Foundation of SA (OSF-SA), Open Society Initiative of Southern Africa (OSISA), Sonke Gender Justice Network, South African History Archive (SAHA), South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC), and Southern African Litigation Centre (SALC). Prominent South Africans who endorsed the statement include: The Most Reverend Desmond Mpilo Tutu, Richard Goldstone, Advocate Dumisa Buhle Ntsebeza SC, Professor Kader Asmal, Professor Hugh Corder, Yasmin Sooka, Professor John Dugard, Jody Kollapen, and Professor Karthy Govender. The statement itself is available at <http://www.legalbrief.co.za/article.php?story=20090715141303542> accessed 11 September 2014.

African personalities including Judge Richard Goldstone and Archbishop Emeritus Desmond Tutu.

The South African government subsequently clarified South Africa's position and reiterated its support for international criminal justice. Through a statement by the Department of International Relations and Cooperation, the South African government publicly stated that it was committed to the Rome Statute and would arrest Al Bashir if he arrived in the country.[69] The statement also disclosed that an arrest warrant had been issued for Al Bashir by a senior magistrate.[70]

This conduct by civil society and the government in South Africa—in support of the arrest warrant issued by the ICC for Al Bashir—is a meaningful example of domestic initiatives taken to complement the work of the ICC. It is worth noting that the civil society process in South Africa provided the impetus for a similar Africa-wide initiative that resulted in 165 civil society organizations from across the continent releasing a statement on 30 July 2009 urging all African States Parties to reaffirm their commitment to the ICC, especially with regard to the arrest of Al Bashir.[71] Several ad hoc statements have been issued since.

4.4.3 Uganda

Uganda has domestic implementing legislation for the Rome Statute, namely The International Criminal Court Act, 2010 ('Uganda ICC Act'). Consequently, Uganda can investigate and prosecute the international crimes enunciated in the Rome Statute. The legislation allows for limited universal jurisdiction,[72] which is indicative of its commitment to dealing with international crimes beyond its borders. It should be borne in mind that Uganda was the first country to refer crimes committed within its borders to the ICC.[73] The government referred the situation in northern Uganda and investigations were initiated in July 2004.[74] Consequently, the ICC has established a field office in Kampala to support its operation in Uganda.

In 2008, further to the Juba Peace Agreement between the Government of Uganda and the LRA, the government established a War Crimes Division to try perpetrators of international crimes. The division, later rebranded as the International Crimes Division (ICD), is a specialized division of the High Court with the jurisdiction to [69] Department of International Relations and Cooperation, 'Notes following the Briefing of Department International Relations and Cooperation's Director-General, Ayanda Ntsaluba', (South Africa 2009) available at <http://www.dfa.gov.za/docs/speeches/2009/ntsa0731.html> accessed 12 June 2013.

[70] Ibid.

[71] For the statement released on 30 July 2009, see <http://www.issafrica.org/pgcontent.php?UID=18893> accessed 11 September 2014. Both these initiatives subsequently contributed to the formation of an African network of civil society concerned with ending impunity that works actively across the continent on international justice issues. One of the products of this network is the web portal for the African Network on International Criminal Justice operated by the ISS. See <http://www.issafrica.org/anicj/> accessed 11 September 2014.

[72] Section 18(d) ICC Act (Uganda).

[73] 'President of Uganda Refers Situation Concerning the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) to the ICC', ICC Press Release, 29 January 2004.

[74] 'Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court opens an investigation into Northern Uganda', ICC Press Release, 29 July 2004. See also Warrant of arrest for Joseph Kony issued on 8 July 2005 as amended on 27 September 2005, Kony, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC II, ICC, 27 September 2005.

try not only cases relating to war crimes, genocide, and crimes against humanity, but also other serious transnational crimes including terrorism, human trafficking, piracy, and any other international and transnational crimes as provided by the Penal Code Act (Uganda), the Geneva Conventions Act, and any other applicable laws.[75] Thus, the mandate of the ICD, like that of the specialized units in South Africa previously outlined, is much broader than just the Rome Statute crimes.

The ICD has a small staff complement with five judges and a registrar, along with a team of 6 prosecutors and five police investigators attached to it. Nevertheless, the designation of officers from the judiciary, prosecution, and police has led to the development of competence and speciality to handle international and transnational crime cases. The ICD has benefited from tailored capacity-building offered by various stakeholders.[76] For example, since March 2011 the ISS has provided the ICD with intensive training workshops on international criminal justice, counter-terrorism, and mechanisms for international cooperation. The judges and the registrar of the ICD have also benefited from exchange programmes or study tours to the ICC and the ICTR. The judiciary and various local and international NGOs have facilitated these different projects aimed at building the capacity of the ICD. Similar training has been provided for prosecutors and selected investigators and magistrates through the office of the DPP.

The ICD began its operations in 2011 with the war crimes case against Thomas Kwoyelo, a former commander of the LRA,[77] who was charged under Uganda's Geneva Conventions Act for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions. Kwoyelo was also charged with 65 counts of war crimes. However, his case was halted after a referral by his defence team to the Constitutional Court.[78] The referral relates to the refusal by the Office of the DPP to facilitate the granting of amnesty to Kwoyelo by the Amnesty Commission under the Amnesty Act 2000 (Uganda). The Constitutional Court ruled that Kwoyelo qualified for amnesty.[79] In addition to the Kwoyelo case, the ICD has been involved in investigations into crimes committed in Northern Uganda and is currently dealing with a matter against a top commander of the Allied Defence Force whose group burnt 80 students to death in 1998.

Uganda is attempting to address international crimes at the domestic level, but the Amnesty Act has hindered prosecution efforts.[80] Part 11 of the Amnesty Act gave a blanket amnesty to all those who renounced the LRA rebellion. According to the head of prosecution at the ICD, Joan Kagezi, many cases were investigated and presented in court only for the accused persons to seek amnesty and subsequently evade justice.[81] It

[75] The ICD is a special division established under the Constitution 1995 (Uganda).

[76] E Keppler et al., Justice for Serious Crimes before National Courts: Uganda's International Crimes Division, Human Rights Watch (2012) 26.

[77] Kwoyelo alias Latoni v Uganda Constitutional Petition. No. 036 of 2011, [2011] UGCC 10.

[78] Ibid.

[79] After the Constitutional Court ruling, the ICD deferred Kwoyelo's release to the DPP of Uganda and the Amnesty Commission. Since then, a legal battle has ensued relating to the process of issuing Kwoyelo with an amnesty certificate. Kwoyelo remains in prison and has still not received his amnesty certificate from the authorities.

[80] E Keppler, Amnesty: 'An Olive Branch' In Justice?, Avocats Sans Frontières (2012).

[81] Presentation by J Kagezi, entitled 'Practical Aspects of Prosecuting and Adjudicating International and Transnational Crimes—The East African Perspective', during the 7th Annual Conference of the Africa Prosecutors' Association (9 October 2012).

is worth noting, however, that Part 11 of the Amnesty Act lapsed in 2011 and amnesty certificates can no longer be issued. This, then, presents important opportunities for Uganda in terms of its future complementarity obligations as well as broader efforts to close the impunity gap in cases where the ICC does not have jurisdiction.

As the ICD pursues these opportunities, the challenges encountered thus far in investigating, prosecuting, and adjudicating international crimes will need to be confronted.[82] These include, first, that because the LRA has since migrated out of Uganda, gathering evidence outside the country has proved challenging especially when cooperation from neighbouring states is not forthcoming. Second, the ICD is under-staffed and under-resourced, which makes its work difficult. Third, similar to South Africa's specialized investigation and prosecution units, the ICD has an expansive mandate that is not limited to international crimes and this requires that all staff develop specialized expertise on a wide range of crimes.

4.5 Expanding the Jurisdiction of the African Court

In 2009 the AU resolved to seek the expansion of the proposed African Court on Justice and Human Rights' mandate to include jurisdiction over specific criminal matters, including international crimes. The AU Commission began a process in February 2010 to amend the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court to include provisions in this regard. The resulting draft Protocol adds criminal jurisdiction over the international crimes of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, as well as several transnational crimes such as terrorism, piracy, and corruption.[83] By June 2013 the African government legal experts, Ministers of Justice, and Attorneys General had considered and adopted the draft Protocol.[84] In June 2014, the AU Assembly adopted the Draft Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights at the 23rd AU Summit in Equatorial Guinea. It is now open to ratification.

It has been argued that vesting the African Court with international criminal jurisdiction is a worthy development to end impunity.[85] In principle, such expanded jurisdiction would be beneficial, but it remains to be seen whether it is likely in practice. It should be noted that the draft, in its current form, still contains some problematic provisions. This is arguably due to the fact that in coming up with the draft Protocol, the AU Commission gave civil society and external legal experts little opportunity to comment. Further, the draft Protocol was never made available on the AU's website, or publicly posted for comment in other media.[86] The AU would have benefited from

[82] Ibid.

[83] AU (Meeting of Government Experts and Ministers of Justice/Attorneys), Draft Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol of the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights, 7–11 and 14–15 May 2012 (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia), Doc Exp/Min/IV/Rev.7.

[84] With the exception of Art 28E relating to the crime of unconstitutional change of government, which presents definitional problems that require more attention. See du Plessis et al. (n 4) for an in-depth discussion. See also M du Plessis, 'Implications of the AU Decision to Give the African Court Jurisdiction over International Crimes', ISS Africa (2012).

[85] D Deya, 'Worth the Wait: Pushing for the African Court to Exercise Jurisdiction for International Crimes', Openspace, 6 March 2012 <http://www.osisa.org/openspace/regional/african-court-worth-wait> accessed 11 September 2014.

[86] African Court Roundtable Report, Institute for Security Studies (24 April 2012) (on file with the authors).

a broader process of consultation relating to jurisdiction, the definition of crimes, immunities, institutional design, the practicalities of administration and enforcement, and the impact on domestic laws and obligations, considering that all of these require careful examination.[87]

According to the AU Commission, the proposed expansion of the African Court is not motivated by the noted anti-ICC sentiment in decisions of the AU Summit since 2009. The process of expanding the African Court's jurisdiction originates in the AU's requirement to deal with three issues. First, the AU alleges that there has been a misuse of the principle of universal jurisdiction by countries. Second, the AU sought to address the challenges brought about by the process of Senegal prosecuting the former President of Chad, Hissène Habré. Last, the need to give effect to Article 25(5) of the African Charter on Democracy, Elections, and Governance that requires that the AU formulate a new international crime to deal with unconstitutional changes of government.[88] However, it cannot be ignored that the impetus to expand the jurisdiction of the African Court came in the aftermath of the ICC arrest warrant for Al Bashir. It is thus likely that the recent tension between the AU and the ICC in this regard (and more recently in relation to the Kenyan situation before the ICC) influenced the process.

Another concern relates to the African Court's extensive jurisdictional reach. The proposed expanded material jurisdiction of the Court means that the criminal chamber would be expected to try the established international crimes, and a host of other crimes. The implications of this expansive jurisdiction on the Court's capacity to fulfil its obligations cannot be overstated. Indeed, the African Court would still be expected to deal with general and human rights cases.

Further, ensuring that justice can be done to the Court's wide jurisdiction will be an expensive exercise. Financial resources are necessary to ensure that the African Court is staffed with the right people with the relevant expertise and technical capacity to handle international criminal trials. By way of example, the ICC's budget—currently for investigating just three crimes, and not the range of offences the African Court is expected to tackle—is more than 14 times that of the African Court without a criminal component; and is just about double the entire budget of the AU.[89]

Finally, given that the African Court would deal with crimes currently under the jurisdiction of the ICC, it is necessary to consider whether there will be a relationship between these two courts. It must be recalled that 34 of the 54 African states are party to the Rome Statute. With this in mind, it is imperative that the relationship between the ICC and the African Court be addressed.[90] First, the issue of which court will have primacy should be dealt with. Given that the draft Protocol makes no reference to the [88] Deya (n 85).

[87] Du Plessis, 'Implications of the AU Decision to Give the African Court Jurisdiction over International Crimes' (n 84)

[89] Du Plessis, 'Implications of the AU Decision to Give the African Court Jurisdiction over International Crimes' (n 84).

[90] Joint Letter to the Justice Ministers and Attorneys General of the African States Parties to the International Criminal Court Regarding the Proposed Expansion of the Jurisdiction of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (3 May 2012) <http://www.hrw.org/news/2012/05/03/joint-letter-justice-ministers-and-attorneys-general-african-states-parties-internat> accessed 3 March 2015.

ICC, and membership to the ICC is reserved to states, countries that are already party to the Rome Statute might need to enact domestic legislation to enable a relationship with the expanded African Court that does not undermine the ICC. By contrast, the Proposed International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Humanity, which similarly would establish a new system for the prosecution of such crimes, envisages a complementary relationship to the ICC's Rome Statute.[91]

The mentioned challenges notwithstanding, it must be noted that pending the establishment of a criminal chamber, there is positive potential for the existing African Court to strengthen or complement the international criminal justice project. Of significance is the evolving work of the African Court (with the support of the African Commission). For example, in 2011 the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights made a unanimous Order for Provisional Measures in respect of the crisis that was unfolding in Libya.[92] The Order, issued on 25 March 2011, demanded that Libya 'immediately refrain from any action that would result in loss of life or violation of physical integrity of persons' and report back to the African Court within 15 days on the 'measures taken to implement this Order'.[93] It was made proprio motu by the Court in the course of its consideration of an application brought urgently against Libya by the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights on 16 March 2011 alleging 'serious and massive violations of human rights guaranteed under the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights'.[94] The Court chose to take up the matter, having made a prima facie determination that it has jurisdiction to hear the case—and it ordered Libya to respond to the application within 60 days.[95]

The African Court's actions in response to the Commission's application were both timely and bold. The African Court appreciated the urgency of the matter and made its order without eliciting the views of the parties to the matter, on the basis of the imminent risk to human life and the difficulty in scheduling an appropriate hearing involving Libya.[96] The Court relied on the information contained in the Commission's application. Specifically, the African Court referred to statements of the AU, the Arab League, and UNSC Resolution 1970[97] in support of its finding that the situation was of extreme gravity and urgency and that such measures were necessary to avoid irreparable harm to persons.

[91] L Sadat, A Comprehensive History of the Proposed International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Humanity, Whitney R. Harris World Law Institute Crimes Against Humanity Initiative (2010).

[92] Order for Provisional Measures, African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights v Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 25 March 2011, App No 004/2011.

[93] Ibid., para. 25 (2)

[94] The African Commission submitted the application pursuant to Art 5(1)(a) of the African Court Protocol. It also submitted the petition in accordance with Rule 118(3), which provides that the Commission may submit a matter to the Court in a situation that in its view constitutes serious and massive human rights violations as provided for under Art 58 of the African Charter.

[95] The Libyan government never responded and there was no follow-through.

[96] J Oder, 'The African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights' Order in Respect of the Situation in Libya: a Watershed in the Regional Protection of Human Rights?' (2011) 11 African Human Rights Law Journal 495.

[97] See UNSC Resolution 1970 (26 February 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1970 in which the situation in Libya was referred to the ICC.

The intervention of the Commission first, and then the African Court, signalled that it is wrong to think of a common African position that homogeneously defines the continent's position on human rights and impunity. The African Court's decision confirmed that Gaddafi's violent actions against his people continued in the face of international condemnation. Further, the African Court's response fits within a deeper understanding of complementarity—that a regional court, cognizant of the role of the ICC in the Libyan context, could act as a complement to the ICC by insisting that Libya stop the ongoing atrocities.

The developments around the African Court and the African Commission should also be viewed within the wider global context of a move towards 'quasi' criminal jurisdiction for regional human rights courts and commissions.[98] Further, and by way of emphasis, the prosecution of former Chadian President Hissène Habré in Senegal under the auspices of the AU and with the support of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) shows some commitment on the part of African states towards promoting international criminal justice.[99]

4.6 Conclusion

Domestic justice is particularly relevant for Africa because of the scale of the atrocities committed on the continent and the need to effectively and efficiently address these. While the ICC provides some form of symbolic justice for the victims of grave crimes, this is limited, and for justice to be figuratively and literally 'brought home', domestic action is essential. Countries like the DRC, South Africa, and Uganda have taken this mantle and it is hoped that more efforts to close the impunity gap will emerge across the African continent.

The chapter notes that there is a vital role for civil society to play in this regard, either by bringing cases to the courts or through other forms of advocacy and activism aimed at ensuring governments promote international criminal justice. Further, civil society can serve as an intermediary on behalf of the victims of grave crimes, and can collaborate with governments to help build capacity in requesting African states, whether in the form of training, legal opinions, or expert legal assistance, to prepare and prosecute cases.

Furthermore, there is a role for the African Court to play—even without the proposed expanded jurisdiction. This too, though not contemplated under the Rome Statute system, can be viewed as a form of positive complementarity in the broadest sense. This broad understanding of complementarity emerging in Africa is key to the success of international criminal justice on the continent and beyond.

In conclusion, the words of Judge Goldstone[100] in his memoir resonate:

[98] A Huneeus, 'International Criminal Law by Other Means: The Quasi-Criminal Jurisdiction of the Human Rights Courts' (2013) 107 American Journal of International Law 1.

[99] 'The case against Hissène Habré, an "African Pinochet"', Human Rights Watch (2013) <http://www.hrw.org/habre-case> accessed 3 December 2013.

[100] Goldstone is the former chief prosecutor of the ICTY and ICTR, and a respected champion of international criminal justice.

> [T]he international community is no longer prepared to allow serious war crimes to be committed without the threat of retribution … If [the trend of wars, war crimes, misery and hardship is to end] then the international community will have to take positive steps to arrest it. One effective deterrent would be an international criminal justice system, sufficiently empowered to cause would-be war criminals to reconsider their ambitions, knowing that they might otherwise be hunted for the rest of their days and eventually be brought to justice.[101]

For Africa, this should not be the remit of the ICC alone. Indeed, there is an important role to be played by domestic justice systems, not least because of the primacy given to them by the Rome Statute. Already, some African states have important experience with domestic efforts. This experience not only aligns itself with the Rome Statute, but significantly with the Constitutive Act of the AU, and the push for 'African solutions to African problems'. Positive developments are welcomed and should be fostered.

[101] R Goldstone, For Humanity: Reflections of a War Crimes Investigator (New Haven: Yale University Press 2000) 126.

5

How Much Money Does the ICC Need?

*Stuart Ford

5.1 Introduction

At a high level, the process by which the ICC is funded is quite similar to how the United Nations is funded.[1] The states who are parties to the Rome Statute collectively make up the ASP.[2] In the analogy with the United Nations budget process, the ASP occupies the same role as the General Assembly: the budget of the Court is set by the ASP[3] and funded by dues paid by the States Parties.[4] The money is collected by the Court and distributed to the various organs according to the budget.[5]

The process of deciding the budget for any given year begins with a proposed budget offered by the Court.[6] A body of independent finance experts created by the ASP called the Committee on Budget and Finance (CBF)[7] then reviews the proposed budget and compiles a report for the ASP that contains recommended changes to the Court's proposed budget. The ASP considers the proposed budget and the CBF report and then decides on the budget for the upcoming year during its annual meeting. The ASP has tended to follow the recommendations in the CBF report, but it is not required to do so.[8] While there is much more that could be said about the budget process, this chapter

* Assistant Professor of Law at the John Marshall Law School in Chicago, Illinois, USA. Editing assistance was provided by Fang Han. This chapter was improved by the comments of those who read earlier versions, including Kip Hale and Jonathan O'Donohue.

[1] Indeed, the distribution of dues is expressly based on the scale of assessments used by the United Nations. Art 117 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('Rome Statute').

[2] Art 112 Rome Statute.

[3] Art 112(2)(d) Rome Statute.

[4] Art 115 Rome Statute. The Rome Statute envisioned the United Nations paying for costs associated with situations that were referred to the Court by the Security Council, see ibid., Art 115(b), but this has not happened yet. The Court can also receive voluntary contributions, see ibid., Art 116, but these have not been a significant source of funding so far.

[5] There is also a contingency fund that exists outside of the regular budget to cover unexpected events, like the opening of a new investigation. See Regulation 6.6 Financial Rules and Regulations of the ICC ICC-ASP/1/3, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties) 284.

[6] In reality, it is a little more complicated than this. Any given year's budget is influenced by decisions made about prior years' budgets, and there are debates between the Court and the ASP that take place over multiple years. For example, the ASP and Court have been engaged for several years in a dialogue about the use of consultants and temporary assistance to handle work that probably should be done by permanent staff members.

[7] The CBF was established by Resolution ICC–ASP/1/Res.4. Their independence was affirmed in Resolution ICC–ASP/2/Res.7. In practice, however, most of the CBF members work for the governments of members of the ASP, so their independence may be more theoretical than actual.

[8] See J O'Donohue, 'Financing the International Criminal Court' (2013) 13 International Criminal Law Review 269, 276. On budget decisions of the ASP, see also J O'Donohue, Chapter 6, in this volume.

does not provide an exhaustive description of it because Jonathan O'Donohue has already done so in a series of articles about the ICC's budgets.[9]

This chapter will focus on the question of whether the ICC is adequately funded. The global financial crisis of 2008 and its continuing fallout have had a noticeable effect on ICC budget discussions in recent years. A number of developed states have pushed to freeze the ICC's budget in response to their ongoing fiscal problems, which would result in a so-called 'zero growth' budget. The Court, some states, and many civil society organizations have opposed a freeze. In recent years, this issue has been the central one affecting the budget process, and it has created tension between the Court, the members of the ASP, and various civil society organizations. At its heart, it is a dispute about how much money the ICC needs and whether the ICC spends the money it has efficiently.

This chapter will look at how much the Court has spent over its lifetime and how that money has been spent on different functions. It will also take a closer look at the constituencies that have tried to affect the budget process and the debates that have surrounded the budget, including calls for a budget freeze. Most importantly, it will try to determine whether the Court's current budget is sufficient for it to accomplish its goals. It does this primarily by comparing the ICC's budget and workload to the budget and workload of another similar court: the ICTY.

The results are somewhat ambiguous. The ICTY does appear to have been more efficient than the ICC, but that conclusion is tempered by the fact that the main difference between the two—the cost of staff—is not directly within the control of the ICC. In addition, there are ways in which the ICC and ICTY are different that may partially explain the remaining difference, like the emphasis on victim participation and the existence of admissibility challenges at the ICC. Nevertheless, it does appear that the ICTY conducted trials more efficiently than the ICC, which suggests that there may still be room for further improvements at the ICC.

5.2 How Much Does the ICC Cost and How is that Money Spent?

Between 2002 and 2013 the ICC spent slightly more than €1 billion.[10] While spending growth was rapid in the early years, there has been relatively little growth in recent years. In fact, once adjusted for inflation, there have been two years (2008 and [9] See ibid.; J O'Donohue, 'The 2005 Budget of the International Criminal Court: Contingency, Insufficient Funding in Key Areas and the Recurring Question of the Independence of the Prosecutor' (2005) 18 Leiden Journal of International Law 591; J O'Donohue, 'Towards a Fully Functional International Criminal Court: The Adoption of the 2004 Budget' (2004) 17 Leiden Journal of International Law 579.

[10] The exact figure, taken from the ICC's budgets, is €942,802,000. Once this number is adjusted to account for inflation, it becomes €1,028,360,000 in 2013 euros. The ASP resolutions that contain the annual budgets appropriations are available from the ICC website at <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/resolutions/Pages/resolutions.aspx> accessed 12 April 2014. The figures were adjusted for inflation using Eurostat's Harmonised Indices of Consumer Prices for the 17 state euro areas, available at <http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/portal/page/portal/eurostat/home/> accessed 12 April 2014. Inflation figures for 2013 were based on the midpoint of the European Central Bank's prediction of 2013 euro-area inflation. See European Central Bank, ECB Staff Macroeconomic Projections for the Euro Area (September 2012) <http://www.ecb.int/pub/pdf/other/ecbstaffprojections201209en.pdf> accessed 12 April 2014.

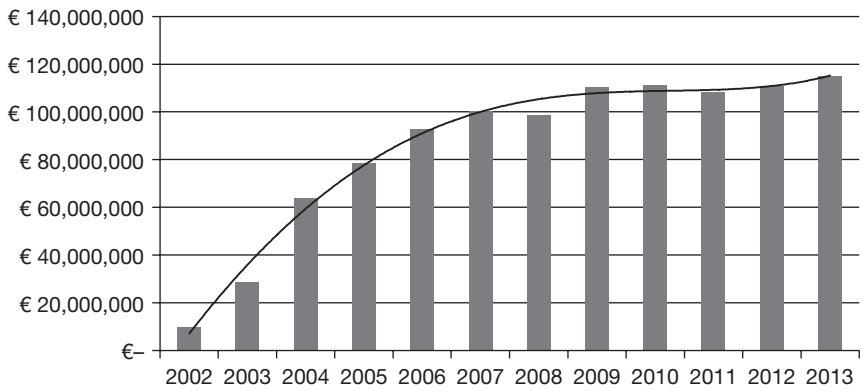

Figure 5.1 ICC's Inflation-Adjusted Spending

2011) when the ICC's budget shrank in real terms. The ICC's inflation-adjusted spending is shown in Figure 5.1.

One thing that is immediately clear is that the ICC's spending trajectory does not look like that of the other international criminal tribunals that have been created in recent decades.[11] At the ICTY, the ICTR, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), and the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL), spending increases sharply in the early years, peaks, and then begins to slowly fall in the later years. This pattern is a result of the temporary and geographically limited nature of those courts. They were created in response to atrocities committed in a particular location at a particular time and do not have jurisdiction over crimes committed in other locations or at other times. As a result, these courts tend to grow quickly, but they eventually hit a peak and then begin to wind down as they complete their investigations and trials.

The ICC, on the other hand, is a permanent court, and there is no reason to believe that spending on the ICC will fall towards zero in the foreseeable future. Indeed, given that its membership continues to grow and atrocities regrettably continue to be committed, it is unlikely that the number of situations[12] under investigation will shrink. As a result, the long-term spending pattern of the ICC is more likely to look like that of other permanent international organizations, like the United Nations, with gradual growth over time.

Figure 5.1 shows that ICC budgets have remained essentially flat since 2009, despite the fact that the Court's caseload has been increasing steadily over the same period. For example, the Court budgeted for nine cases in 2009, 11 in 2010, 13 in 2011, 17 in 2012, [11] Compare, for example, Figure 5.1 with the spending at the ICTY, ICTR, ECCC, and SCSL as shown in S Ford, 'How Leadership in International Criminal Law is Shifting from the United States to Europe and Asia: An Analysis of Spending on and Contributions to International Criminal Courts' (2011) 55 Saint Louis University Law Journal 953.

[12] The Rome Statute distinguishes between situations, cases, and crimes. A situation is a group of connected acts that appear to constitute one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. Art 13 Rome Statute. Situations are usually defined geographically. A case is comprised of one or more crimes alleged to have been committed by one or more accused that are intended to be prosecuted together. A single situation can and often does result in more than one case. Cases can and often do allege the commission of more than one crime.

and 18 in 2013.[13] In other words, the Court's caseload doubled between 2009 and 2013, even though the Court's funding remained basically unchanged.[14] This disparity led the Registry to argue to the ASP that 'the Court has reached the point when the expectations on the type and level of activities and on the level of resources are diverging'.[15] This is a diplomatic way of saying that the Court's budget is insufficient for the level of activities its members expect it to undertake. While the ASP has been continually pushing the ICC to achieve greater efficiencies so as to do more with the same amount of money, the Court has argued that years of focusing on efficiency have captured most of the available savings and that additional cuts would have diminishing or even negative returns. For example, in its most recent proposed budget, the Registry cautioned the ASP that:

> [I]t has become increasingly difficult for the Court to achieve efficiency gains as a result of the current budgetary constraints. It needs to be borne in mind that excessive reductions in resources can themselves create inefficiencies and impair performance.[16]

The issue of whether the ICC's funding is sufficient for its mandate will be addressed in more detail in sections 5.5 and 5.6.

Within the Court, the money is divided among the principal organs: the Presidency and Chambers, the OTP, and the Registry.[17] Together, these three organs regularly receive more than 90% of the ICC's budget. The remaining funds are split between the secretariat of the ASP, the secretariat of the Trust Fund for Victims (Trust Fund), the Independent Oversight Mechanism (IOM), and planning for the ICC's permanent premises.[18] See Figure 5.2.

According to the Court, investigations, analysis, and trials take up slightly more than 50% of the ICC's funding today. The rest is divided between support functions, spending on victims and witnesses, the costs of the Court's interim premises, and interpretation/translation. See Table 5.1.[19] Unfortunately, the Court does not explain how it calculated these figures, and my own analysis of the Court's budget produced different figures.[20] See Table 5.5.

[13] See Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 of the International Criminal Court, ICC–ASP/11/20 (vol II) 14–22 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties) 4, Table 3 ('Proposed Programme Budget for 2013').

[14] See also Table 5.3 infra.

[15] Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 (n 13) 11. Here, it was repeating something the CBF had first said in 2011. Ibid.

[16] Ibid., 18.

[17] The Rome Statute treats the Presidency as a principal organ that is separate from the Chambers. See Art 34 Rome Statute. But for budgeting purposes, the Presidency (Programme 1100) is considered a part of the overall judiciary budget (Major Programme I). See Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 (n 13) para. 22.

[18] The ICC is currently housed in temporary premises and is awaiting construction of a purpose-built permanent facility. This is expected to be ready in 2015 or 2016. Construction of the permanent facility is being funded by a loan from the Netherlands, and the costs of the loan will not appear as part of the Court's budget until it takes possession of the building.

[19] The data for Table 5.1 comes from the Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 (n 13) Table 2, at 13.

[20] There is something odd about the ICC's allocation. The Court appears to allocate the OTP's entire budget to analysis and investigations, even though a main function of the OTP is preparing for and conducting trials. The cost of the OTP's Prosecution Division, for example, should probably be allocated to trials rather than to analysis and investigations. It is not clear how the rest of the figures were calculated.

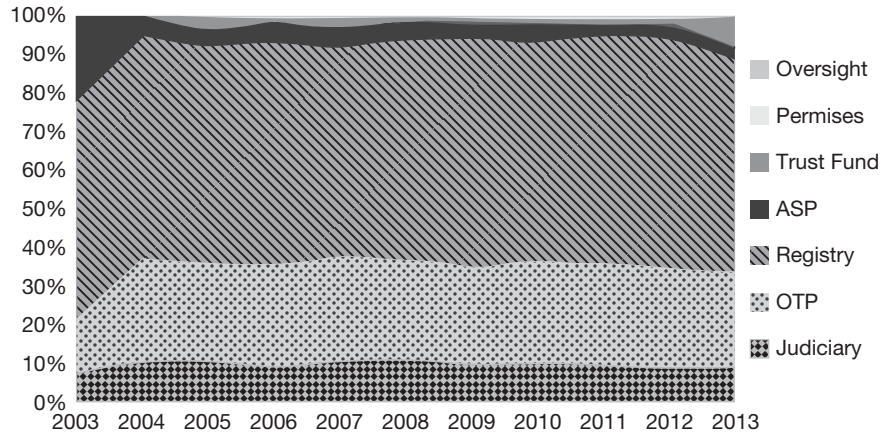

Figure 5.2 Allocation of Funds by Organ of the Court

Table 5.1 Allocation of Funds by Activity (2013)

Activity	Percentage
Trials	28%
Analysis & Investigations	24%
Support	23%
Premises	12%
Victims & Witnesses	8%
Languages	5%

Table 5.2 Staff vs Non-Staff Costs (2012)

Source	Percentage
Staff	71.8%
General operating expenses	11.5%
Legal aid	5.7%
Travel	4.2%
Contractual services	4.0%
Supplies	1.0%
Equipment	1.0%
Training	0.7%

Finally, it is also possible to look at how spending is broken down by the sources of those costs. In 2012 personnel costs[21] were 71.8% of the ICC's overall budget. The next largest expense was general operating expenses at 11.5%, followed by legal aid at 5.7%. See Table 5.2.[22] In other words, the Court is correct when it says that '[d]ue to the nature of the court's operations, its main investments are linked to its human resources'.[23] Staff costs are more than six times as high as the next largest cost, and more than two and a half times as much as all the other costs of the ICC combined.

[21] This includes costs for the judges, professional staff, general staff, temporary assistance, overtime, and consultants.

[22] The data for this table comes from the Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 (n 13), Annex VI, 180.

5.3 The Constituencies

There are three main constituencies that take part in shaping the ICC's budget. First is the Court itself, which prepares a proposed budget for the upcoming year and obviously has an interest in how much money it will be allocated. Of course, there is the possibility of infighting between different organs within the Court over how to allocate the budget, but there is little public evidence that this has happened.[24] The organs of the Court have maintained a largely unified front in their dealings with the other constituencies. To the extent that officers of the Court have criticized the budgeting process, that criticism has been directed at the States Parties rather than other organs of the Court.

For example, the former prosecutor, Luis Moreno Ocampo, criticized Britain, France, and Germany for supporting the referral of the situation in Libya to the ICC by the Security Council while simultaneously calling for a cap on the ICC's budget. In effect, these countries were voting to increase the Court's workload and spending[25] while simultaneously refusing to increase its budget. 'State parties referred Libya to us and now they say they can't pay,' he said.[26] The current prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda, has said that the States Parties should not be 'blinded by short-term apparent savings that result in long-term losses and greater inefficiencies',[27] and suggested that the ASP should increase the Court's budget.[28] The President of the ICC has said that imposing a zero growth budget would be 'profoundly damaging to the Court's ability to deliver fair and expeditious justice'.[29] The Registrar has publicly 'expressed disappointment [23] Reports of the CBF, ICC–ASP/11/20 (vol II) 14–22 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties) Annex III, 258 ('Report of the CBF').

[24] It seems likely that some amount of jockeying for funding occurs behind the scenes between the organs of the Court. During the drafting of the proposed budget the various organs of the Court must decide how much funding to request and (more importantly) how to propose allocating that funding between the organs. This process is probably not quite a zero sum game, but it seems geared to produce tensions between the organs as they negotiate internally over the proposed allocation of relatively scarce resources. At the same time, the organs have an incentive to present a united front to the ASP so that they do not become involved in publicly negotiating against each other for funding, which might result in an overall decrease in the Court's budget.

[25] The Libya referral has resulted in situation-specific spending of more than 8 million euros over the period 2011–13. See Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 (n 13) Table 3, at 13. Undoubtedly there will be additional costs in future years. The ultimate cost of the Security Council's referral of the situation in Libya is likely to be measured in tens of millions of euros.

[26] R Hamilton, 'Member Countries Fight Over International Court's Budget', Reuters, 20 December 2012 <http://newsandinsight.thomsonreuters.com/Legal/News/2011/12_-_December/Member_countries_fight_over_international_court_s_budget/> accessed 29 May 2013.

[27] M Corder, 'ICC Official: Don't Impose Short-sighted Fund Cuts', The Cortez Journal, 14 November 2012 <http://www.cortezjournal.com/article/20121114/API/1211140777/ICC-official:-Don%27t-impose-short-sighted-fund-cuts> accessed 29 May 2013.

[28] M Knigge, 'ICC Prosecutor Lauds Cooperation with the US', Deutsche Welle, 7 February 2013 <http://www.dw.de/icc-prosecutor-lauds-cooperation-with-the-us/a-16583948> accessed 13 April 2014 (stating that 'there is a need for the state parties to look into the resources that the ICC has').

[29] Remarks by Judge Sang-Hyun Song, President of the ICC, during the 10th Session of the Assembly of States Parties (12 December 2011) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP10/Statements/ASP10-ST-Pres-Song-Remarks-ENG.pdf> accessed 18 June 2013.

that the adopted budget [for 2012] did not reflect the needs and work of the Court'.[30] In short, the representatives of the organs of the Court have been consistent in calling for more funding for the Court as a whole without blaming other organs for overspending.

The second obvious constituency is the states who have become parties to the Rome Statute. They act together as the ASP to decide upon and pay for the Court's budget. However, States Parties have not always agreed amongst themselves about how much funding the Court needs.[31] A zero growth policy, where the Court's funding would not change from year to year, has been championed by some of the ICC's largest funders, including Japan, Germany, Britain, France, and Italy.[32] These countries assert that the Court's budget must reflect the 'budgetary constraints' of the members who pay the most.[33] This appears to be a reference to fiscal pressures caused by the slow recovery from the 2008 global financial crisis.[34] At the same time, some African states have indicated that they would be willing to pay more to increase the ICC's budgets so that the Court can initiate investigations outside of Africa.[35] This appears to be motivated by a belief that the ICC has focused unfairly on events that have occurred in Africa.[36] Of course, given that African states pay for a very small percentage of the ICC's budget, any proposal to increase ICC funding would be paid for largely by the states that are currently arguing for a zero growth policy.[37] Thus, proposing additional ICC funding is virtually costless for most African states.

Finally, the third constituency is NGOs. NGOs have no formal role in the budget process, but many NGOs attend the annual meetings of the ASP where they can interact with and lobby the members of the ASP and officials from the Court.[38] In addition, many NGOs have offered written advice to the ASP, usually in the form of position papers that are issued in the run-up to or during the annual meeting. There are some noticeable trends in NGO attitudes towards the budget.

In the ICC's early years, NGOs often raised concerns that the Court was not spending the entire budget allocated to it[39] or that the budget failed to coordinate duplicative

[30] See CICC, Report on the Tenth Session of the Assembly of State Parties to Rome Statue (12–21 December 2011) 14 <http://www.coalitionfortheicc.org/documents/ASP10_report_final.pdf> accessed 13 April 2014 ('Report on the Tenth Session of the Assembly').

[31] See ibid. (noting disagreement among states about how much money the Court needed).

[32] Hamilton (n 26); R Corey-Boulet, 'Concern over ICC Funding', Inter Press Service, 28 September 2011 <http://www.ipsnews.net/2011/09/concern-over-icc-funding/> accessed 17 July 2013.

[33] Hamilton (n 26).

[34] See generally International Monetary Fund, World Economic Outlook (WEO): Coping with High Debt and Sluggish Growth (Washington, D.C.: International Monetary Fund 2012) <http://www.imf.org/external/pubs/ft/weo/2012/02/pdf/text.pdf> accessed 13 April 2014 (noting that recovery from the global financial crisis of 2008 has been slow and that growth is likely to remain low while unemployment is likely to remain high in many advanced economies).

[35] Hamilton (n 26).

[36] See e.g. C Jalloh, 'Regionalizing International Criminal Law?' (2009) 9 International Criminal Law Review 445, 462–5.

[37] See Ford (n 11) 969–71.

[38] More than 150 NGOs attended the Tenth Session in 2011. See Report on the Tenth Session of the Assembly (n 30) 4.

[39] See Amnesty International, ICC: Recommendations for developing an effective budget process (2007) <http://www.iccnow.org/documents/AI_Budget_07apr26_eng.pdf> accessed 30 May 2013.

activities undertaken by different organs of the Court.[40] Those concerns have largely disappeared in recent years, and the main concern among NGOs now is that the budget is insufficient to fulfil the Court's mandate. For example, the International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH) has argued that 'the zero growth principle cannot be established as the governing standard to measure the budget of the Court'.[41] FIDH has two principal concerns, both of which relate to the participation of victims at the Court: (i) that the Victims Participation and Reparations Section is under-staffed and has not been able to process all of the victims' applications to participate; and (ii) that cuts to legal aid for victims will make it hard for victims to obtain representation and communicate effectively with their representatives.[42] Redress has raised similar concerns.[43]

Few individual NGOs make direct statements about the budget, however. Most seem to participate through an umbrella organization called the CICC. The CICC represents the views of more than 2,500 different civil society organizations that have an interest in the Court,[44] and a number of prominent human rights NGOs, including Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, sit on its steering committee.[45] Within the CICC, advocacy about the budget is handled through the Budget and Finance Team, which is composed of members from NGOs that have the most interest in budget issues. For the last several years, the CICC's Budget and Finance Team has consistently opposed efforts to institute a 'zero growth' budget on the grounds that such a budgeting system is inconsistent with the goals and mandates of the Rome Statute.[46] In particular, at various times, it has argued that the budget does not provide sufficient resources for: (i) outreach and public information;[47] (ii) legal aid for victims and accused;[48] (iii) trial preparation within the OTP;[49] (iv) the Trust Fund for Victims;[50] and (v) field offices.[51] To

[40] Human Rights Watch, Human Rights Watch Memorandum to States Members of the Assembly of States Parties (2004) <http://www.iccnow.org/documents/HRW%20Memorandum%20to%20ASP%20members%20090204.pdf> accessed 13 April 2014.

[41] FIDH, Cutting the Weakest Link: Budget Discussions and their Impact on Victims' Rights to Participate in the Proceedings (Position Paper written for the 11th Session of the ASP, Montserrat Carboni, October 2012) 20.

[42] Ibid.

[43] Redress, Hundreds of Victims Prevented from Participating in Crucial Hearings Due to Lack of Resources at the International Criminal Court (15 July 2011) <http://www.redress.org/downloads/StatementVictimParticipation15July2011.pdf> accessed 30 May 2013.

[44] See Coalition for the International Criminal Court, 'About the Coalition' <http://www.iccnow.org/?mod=coalition> accessed 30 May 2013.

[45] See Coalition for the International Criminal Court, 'Steering Committee' <http://www.iccnow.org/?mod=steering> accessed 30 May 2013.

[46] See CICC, Comments and Recommendations on the 2013 Budget to the 11th Session of the Assembly of States Parties (6 November 2012) <http://iccnow.org/documents/CICC_Budget_and_Finance_Team_Paper_ASP11_6_Nov_2012.pdf> accessed 14 April 2014; 'Global Coalition Calls on States to Maintain Financial Commitment to the ICC', Coalition for the International Criminal Court Press Release, 8 July 2011 <http://www.iccnow.org/documents/CICC_PR_Budget_FINAL_08072011_(1).pdf> accessed 14 April 2014; CICC, Comments and Recommendations on the 2011 Budget to the Ninth Session of the Assembly of State Parties (25 November 2010) <http://www.iccnow.org/documents/CICC_Budget_and_Finance_Team_Paper__30Nov2010.pdf> accessed 14 April 2014.

[47] CICC, Comments and Recommendations on the 2013 Budget (n 46) 1. [48] Ibid., 2.

[49] Ibid., 5. [50] Ibid., 7.

[51] CICC, Submission to the Committee on Budget and Finance at its Nineteenth Session on 24 September to 3 October 2012 (20 September 2012) 3 <http://www.iccnow.org/documents/BF_Commentary_on_2013_Budget_FINAL.pdf> accessed 14 April 2014.

the extent that NGO opinion can be discerned from publicly available documents, the majority of NGOs that participate in the process seem to support increasing the ICC's budget. In this sense, the NGO community can be thought of as generally aligned with the Court during the budgeting process, as opposed to some of the Court's largest funders, who are calling for 'zero growth'.[52]

Academics have been a vocal constituency with regard to many aspects of the ICC's work,[53] but there has been relatively little academic work done on the budget. There have been several law review articles that deal principally with the ICC's budget that were written by a legal adviser working for Amnesty International,[54] and several other articles have touched on the ICC's funding,[55] but academics have not generally played a visible role in the budget process.[56] For this reason, I do not classify them as a separate constituency.

There is also an argument that the CBF should be treated as a constituency separate from the ASP. While appointed by the ASP, the members of the CBF are supposed to be independent in their recommendations.[57] However, they are mostly officials of the governments of the States Parties, which probably limits their real independence. In practice, most of the time they seem to represent the views of the ASP.[58] For this reason, I do not treat them as a separate constituency.

5.4 The 2013 Budget Process

The Court's 2013 proposed budget is a defensive document. For example, the Registry spends a lot of time trying to demonstrate that it has done all that it can to rein in costs, and that the increases it is asking for are largely due to things that are out of its control, including increasing legal aid costs for defence counsel and a surprise decision to start hearings in the two Kenya cases in 2013.[59] The OTP, for its part, argues that it has made significant efficiency gains over the years. However, it explicitly notes that it is budgeting for an 'acceptable level of output' rather than a 'maximum possible output' because achieving the maximum output would cost an additional €3.4 million per year.[60] It says

[52] Of course, the interests of the NGO community are not perfectly aligned with the Court, even if one only considers budget issues, and NGOs also criticize the Court on budget matters. For example, CICC has criticized the Court for failing to provide sufficient justification for its budgets even as it generally opposes a zero growth budget. See CICC, Comments and Recommendations to the Tenth Session of the Assembly of State Parties (29 November 2011). See also infra n 107 (NGOs criticizing the Court for allocating insufficient funding to investigations).

[53] For example, a search in Westlaw for academic articles with 'International Criminal Court' in the title returned more than 600 results. The exact search, which was carried out on 15 March 2013, was for TI ('International Criminal Court') in the database JLR (Journals and Law Reviews).

[54] See O'Donohue, 'Financing the International Criminal Court' (n 8); O'Donohue, 'The 2005 Budget of the International Criminal Court' (n 9); O'Donohue, 'Towards a Fully Functional International Criminal Court' (n 9). Mr O'Donohue is also the leader of the CICC's Budget and Finance Team.

[55] See Ford (n 11) 968–71; C Romano, 'The Price of International Justice' (2005) 4 Law & Practice of International Courts and Tribunals 281, 302–3.

[56] They may play a less visible role as advisers to the members of the ASP and various NGOs, but this is hard to quantify.

[57] See supra n 7.

[58] See infra nn 63–4. See also O'Donohue, 'Financing the International Criminal Court' (n 8) 276–7.

[59] Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 (n 13) 62–4. See also ibid., 84.

[60] Ibid., 39.

that previous reductions in the OTP's budget have already led to a slowdown in investigations and prosecutions,[61] and any further reductions would 'greatly impact' the OTP's ability to produce an acceptable level of output.[62] Throughout the proposed budget, one gets the feeling that the Court is desperately trying to convince the ASP that all that could be cut has been cut.

The CBF's response was largely to reiterate that more cuts could be expected. For example, the CBF stressed that 'any proposed increase of the budget for 2013 would need to be compensated by reductions elsewhere, in order to bring the budget into line with the level of the approved budget for 2012'.[63] This effectively told the Court to expect a zero growth budget. The CBF also urged the Court to 'reconsider its budgeting process to ensure that the fiscal context was well understood'.[64] Yet ultimately the ASP approved an increase in the budget of approximately €6.3 million. Why did the CBF and the ASP back down?

The answer may lie in a document the CBF asked the Court to produce—an estimate of the effect of instituting a zero growth budget in 2013.[65] The Court first noted that freezing salaries would violate staff members' rights under the United Nations' common system of salaries. The result would almost certainly be expensive and risky litigation before the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization.[66] With that off the table, the Court considered other options. Keeping the judiciary's budget flat would result in a 25% reduction in staffing of the Chambers with resulting delays and disruptions of judicial proceedings.[67]

The only thing the OTP could do that would save enough money would be to delay one investigation for a year, but the Court noted that this cost would not go away, it would still have to be paid in future years, and the delay would contribute to impunity.[68] The Registry would be able to keep funding flat by eliminating almost all training and by suspending efforts to upgrade the Registry's computer systems, but again the Court noted that this would just push the cost of these expenses into future years.[69] Finally, the Court noted that if it had to also absorb the increasing cost of the rent for its temporary facilities,[70] this would result in the equivalent of 'suspending activities in relation to the situation in Uganda, Darfur (Sudan), and Libya as well as postponing trial hearings in the Kenya cases beyond 2013'.[71]

Finally, the Court stressed that '[w]ere any ongoing proceedings at the Court to be substantially delayed to accommodate budgetary requirements, the Court would… be in violation of fundamental individual rights of persons before the Court'.[72] The Court probably had an incentive to dramatize the effect of freezing its budget, but it appears to have been effective. The ASP increased funding for 2013 by 3.8% in real terms.

[61] Ibid. [62] Ibid.

[63] See Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance (n 23) 201. See also ibid., 226.

[64] Ibid. This is apparently a reference to the fiscal constraints faced by the developed countries that fund the majority of the ICC's budget.

[65] See Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance (n 23) Annex III. [66] Ibid., 258.

[67] Ibid., 260. [68] Ibid., 261. [69] Ibid., 262.

[70] Previously the rent on the Court's temporary facilities had been subsidized by the host nation (the Netherlands), but starting in 2013 the Court now has to pay the rent itself, at a cost of almost €6 million per year.

[71] Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance (n 23) 265. [72] Ibid.

The 2013 budget debate highlights the tension between two different funding philosophies. On the one hand, you have a number of advanced countries who pay a majority of the ICC's budget and are still suffering the after-effects of the 2008 financial crisis. These states have argued that the appropriate funding level for the ICC should be determined by what these states can afford. The Court should then do as much as it can with whatever money it is given. This might be thought of as a 'willingness to pay' budget philosophy. The other philosophy, championed by the Court and most NGOs, has been that the appropriate funding level for the Court should be determined by evaluating the Court's mandate. These groups argue that if an action is required by the Rome Statute, then the ASP has an obligation to provide enough funding for the Court to comply with its mandate.

The increase in funding for 2013 can be seen as a partial victory for the mandate-driven funding philosophy. Ultimately, the members of the ASP were unwilling to significantly limit the Court's ability to comply with its mandate to save €2 million a year. Nevertheless, the Court is still not budgeting for maximum output,[73] so it cannot be viewed as a complete victory for the mandate-driven philosophy. Perhaps it is best viewed as a compromise between the two positions.

5.5 How Efficient is the ICC?

At the same time and parallel to the debate between a mandate-driven versus willingness-to-pay budget, there is also a debate about the efficiency of the Court. So, for example, certain members of the ASP have pushed the Court to 'pay for' any new costs by finding efficiencies elsewhere. These states argue that there is room to increase the Court's workload without increasing its budget by focusing on improving efficiency.[74] This is often used as an alternative to the willingness-to-pay argument as a justification for a zero growth budget. Implicit in this argument is the assumption that the Court is currently operating inefficiently.

On the other hand, those who believe the Court is underfunded either explicitly or implicitly make the claim that the ICC is operating efficiently and that there is little scope for further improvements in efficiency.[75] Any increase in workload must therefore be accompanied by an increase in the budget. Thus debates about the budget are also partly rooted in a debate about the efficiency of the Court. A similar debate has been occurring in the academic literature about whether international criminal trials are too slow, cost too much, and are inefficient.[76] But which side is right?

Supporters of increased funding have pointed out that the Court's workload has increased dramatically in recent years while the budget has been more or less flat since 2009. The 2009 budget was based on the assumption that the ICC would be engaged in judicial proceedings in four situations,[77] and that these situations would result in five [73] See text accompanying nn 52–3.

[74] See, for example, text accompanying n 63.
[75] See text accompanying n 16 and 27.
[76] See Ford (n 11) 954.
[77] See Proposed Programme Budget for 2009 of the ICC, ICC–ASP/7/9, 14–22 November 2008 (Seventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties) 7.

Table 5.3 ICC Workload Comparison

	2009	2013	Change
Situations	4	8	+100%
Ongoing investigations	5	7	+40%
Cases[78]	10	18	+80%
Accused	15	22	+47%
Trials	2	4	+100%
Appeals	0	2	n/a
Budget (2013 euros)	€110M	€115M	+4.3% investigations.[79] The Court assumed that two trials would take place.[80] At the time, the OTP had initiated ten cases against 15 accused. By early 2013 the OTP had eight situations before it, with 14 open cases against a total of 22 accused.[81] Moreover, the Court assumes for budget purposes that it will have 18 cases, seven ongoing investigations, four cases at trial, and two cases on appeal during 2013.[82] These figures are summarized in Table 5.3.

The Court's workload was significantly greater in 2013 than it was in 2009, yet the Court's resources were almost the same. This does not, however, lead automatically to the conclusion that the ICC is underfunded. Whether the Court needs new resources depends on how efficiently the Court was using its resources in 2009. If it was efficiently using them in 2009, then one would expect that significantly increasing the workload would leave the Court dramatically underfunded. On the other hand, if the Court had significant spare capacity in 2009 (i.e. it was operating inefficiently), then increasing the workload would not necessarily leave the Court overburdened. Or the reality may be somewhere in between, where the ICC had some spare capacity in 2009 but not enough to absorb the dramatic increase in workload that has occurred since then, and it is now somewhat underfunded. But how does one determine whether the Court is operating efficiently?

One way is to compare the ICC to another similar court. This chapter will focus on a comparison between the ICC and the ICTY. The ICTY was chosen because it resembles the ICC in many ways. It was a large court that employed hundreds of staff members, was organized similarly to the ICC, had jurisdiction over essentially the same subject matter, conducted a relatively large number of trials, and had a lifecycle that lasted decades.[83] There are differences between the ICC and the ICTY that may affect the comparison,[84] but the ICTY looks enough like the ICC to make a comparison between them potentially useful.

[78] Here I use the ICC's prediction of the number of cases it will have open in 2013 rather than the number that were open at the beginning of 2013.

[79] Ibid., 8. [80] Ibid.

[81] This information was collected from the ICC's website on 18 March 2013, specifically the page on Cases and Situations.

[82] Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 (n 13) Annex III, at 175. See also ibid., Table 3, at 13.

[83] A comparison with the ICTR, the other ad hoc court, would also probably make sense, but will have to wait for another occasion.

[84] See section 5.6 for a discussion of the differences between the two courts.

It does not make sense, however, to compare the current ICC budget to the current ICTY budget because the ICTY is in the process of shutting down. It is no longer conducting investigations, most of the trials are completed, and most of the work that is currently going on is related to appeals. In short, the workload of the ICTY today does not look much like the current ICC workload, which is focused on investigations and trials. A better comparison would be between the ICC as it is now and the ICTY as it was during the middle of its lifecycle when it was actively conducting investigations and trials. The year 2003 was such a year for the ICTY. After a slow first couple of years (much like the ICC), by 2003 the ICTY had hit its stride. It had a large number of open cases, several trials ongoing, and more waiting to start.[85] In addition, the ICTY was about ten years old in 2003, roughly the same age the ICC is today. Thus, they were at a similar stage in their lifecycles. In many ways, the ICTY of 2003 looks quite a bit like the ICC of today. For this reason, this section will compare the ICTY in 2003 to the ICC in 2012.[86]

Three comparisons will be made. First, we will compare how the two different courts allocated their budgets between staff costs and other operating expenses. The second comparison will focus on how the courts allocated their budgets to core activities (investigations, trials, and appeals) versus support functions (human resources, procurement, information technology, etc.). The final comparison will be between the workload and cost of the courts. Together, these comparisons should shed some light on the comparative efficiency of the ICC and ICTY.

The sources of spending were broadly similar across these two tribunals. See Table 5.4.[87] There are some differences, however. The ICC spends a higher percentage of its budget on its personnel and a slightly smaller percentage of its budget on things like travel, supplies, equipment, and contractual services. This is broadly consistent with the ICC's claim that it has already cut all the non-essential spending it can in order to focus on its most important asset—its personnel. In particular, the difference in travel spending is somewhat surprising given that the ICC is much further away from most of its situations than the ICTY was, and thus one would probably have expected the ICC to have a larger travel budget than the ICTY. Table 5.4 represents some evidence in favour of the ICC being slightly more efficient than the ICTY, but it is far from definitive.

Another way to think about the Court's efficiency is to look at how much money is spent on core activities versus support functions. International criminal tribunals are created primarily to try people for committing serious violations of international law.[88] Of course, they also have other objectives, but the investigations, trials, and [85] See text accompanying n 104.

[86] The year 2012 was chosen for the ICC rather than 2013 because complete information about 2013 was not available at the time this chapter was written.

[87] The information on the ICC comes from Table 5.2. The information for the ICTY was derived from UN Secretary General, Budget for the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 for the biennium 2002–3, UN Doc A/56/495 (23 October 2001), Table 3 ('ICTY Budget 2002–3'). The ICTY included defence counsel costs in the contractual services category, but they have been split out in the table. Data on defence costs comes from ibid., para. 43.

[88] S Dana, 'Turning Point for International Justice?' in A Klip and G Sluiter (eds), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, vol. 11 (Antwerp: Intersentia 2007) 962, 972 ('The primary

Table 5.4 Spending by Sources (ICTY vs ICC)

Source	ICTY (2003)	ICC (2012)	% Change
Staff	62.4%	71.8%	+9.4%
General operating expenses	8.3%	11.5%	+3.2%
Legal aid	13.2%	5.7%	–7.5%
Travel	5.2%	4.2%	–1.0%
Contractual services	6.3%	4.0%	–2.3%
Supplies	1.2%	1.0%	–.2%
Equipment	3.1%	1.0%	–2.1%
Training	0%[89]	.7%	+.7%

appeals can be thought of as the Court's core activities. Support functions include spending on things like information technology, human resources management, and procurement. Spending on support functions is necessary because the trials cannot occur without support, but most people would probably agree that a court that spent more of its budget on core activities and less on support services was a more 'efficient' court. So, how much of the ICC's budget was spent on core activities versus support functions? And how does that compare to the ICTY?

Unfortunately, comparing the ICC and ICTY on this basis is quite difficult. The ICC's budgets contain sufficient information to calculate the cost of individual components within the principal organs. The ICTY, on the other hand, does not provide information on how money was allocated between the various components within the principal organs. This makes a comparison difficult, because many of the costs directly associated with the trials, like courtroom management services, are contained within the budget of the Registry. To make an accurate comparison of the cost of the Tribunal's functions, it is necessary to break down the spending by individual components within the principal organs. Fortunately, there are detailed organizational charts for the principal organs that indicate how many personnel were located in each component.[90] The cost of an individual component within one of the principal organs was determined by calculating the percentage of its personnel and attributing that percentage of the organ's budget to the component.[91] This is not an ideal way to determine the cost of the individual components within the principal organs, but it is the only practical way given the available information.

function of the international criminal tribunal is to determine the criminal responsibility and punishment of those individuals found guilty of the crimes under its jurisdiction.'); A Fulford, 'The Reflections of a Trial Judge' (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 215, 216 ('We are first, foremost and last a criminal court: our core business is to process criminal trials.').

[89] It is likely that the ICTY did have a training budget, but that it was not recorded as a separate line item in the budget.

[90] UN Secretary General, Budget for the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 for the biennium 2002–3, UN Doc A/56/495/Add.1 (23 October 2001) 4–7.

[91] Using the number of personnel in the components as a proxy for that component's portion of the organ's budget appears to be a reasonable way to estimate component costs given that personnel costs are such a large part of the ICTY's overall budget. See Table 5.4.

Table 5.5 Spending by Functions (ICTY vs ICC)

Function	ICTY (2003)	ICC (2012)	% Change
Investigation and Analysis	18%	15%	–3%
Trials and Appeals	51%	46%	–5%
Support Functions	31%	39%	+8%

The next step is to attribute the cost of the different components to the functions of the court. While one could break down the data in lots of different ways,[92] costs were categorized as relating to: (i) investigation and analysis; (ii) trials and appeals; or (iii) support functions.[93] So, for example, at the ICC the OTP's Investigation Division was categorized as investigation and analysis, while the Prosecution Division was categorized as trials and appeals. Within the Registry, the Court Management Section was categorized as trials and appeals, while the Common Administrative Services Division was categorized as support. Services related to victims and witnesses were categorized as trial costs. Detention costs were categorized as support costs for both courts, even though the ICTY seemed to consider them a trial cost.[94] To the extent possible, each court's functions were categorized in the same way.[95] The goal was to create, as much as possible, an apples to apples comparison of how money was spent at these two courts. The results can be seen in Table 5.5.

This analysis suggests that the ICC is spending its money less efficiently than the ICTY did in 2003. The ICC spends a greater portion of its budget on support functions and less on investigations, analysis, trials, and appeals.[96] All other things being equal, one would probably conclude that a court that spends a greater percentage of its funds on its core activities is operating more efficiently than a court that spends more of its money on support functions. Moreover, this suggests that the ICC could cut its support spending further. After all, the ICTY was able to operate with nearly 10% less of its budget going to support functions.

A final way to look at the ICC's efficiency is to compare the two courts' workload and cost. Efficiency is often defined as '[t]he ratio of useful work performed to the total energy expended'.[97] This suggests that one way to calculate the efficiency of a court is to measure its workload or output and divide by its cost. This ratio can be calculated for different [92] For example, the Court's own breakdown treats language services and victims and witnesses services as separate categories. See Table 5.1.

[93] Costs that were unique to each court were excluded from the analysis so as to make the comparison, as much as possible, between the types of costs that both courts incurred. So, for example, the costs of the Secretariat of the ASP were excluded from the ICC calculation, while the costs of assistance to the ICTR were excluded from the ICTY calculation.

[94] In the ICTY's organizational chart, the Detention Unit is located within the Judicial Support Division. Nonetheless, it was categorized as a support function.

[95] A spreadsheet showing how these figures (and all the figures in this chapter) were calculated is available upon request from the author.

[96] Indeed, this may partly explain why the ICTY was able to try cases more efficiently than the ICC. See Table 5.6 and the accompanying discussion.

[97] Oxford English Dictionary 2nd edn (Oxford: Clarendon Press 1989).

Table 5.6 Workloads and Costs (ICTY vs ICC)

Activity	ICTY (2003)	ICC (2012)	% Difference
Open Cases	42	17	–60%
Total Accused	74	27	–64%
Pre-trial Proceedings	12	4	–67%
Trials	6	3	–50%
Accused at Trial	9	4	–56%
Cost	€125M	€109M	–13%

courts and the results compared. The court with a higher ratio of work performed to money spent would be the more efficient court.

Cost is easy to calculate. The General Assembly approved a budget of $128,551,900 for the ICTY in 2003.[98] Once adjusted for inflation and converted to euros,[99] this translated into €124,815,000 in 2012. The ICC's budget in 2012 was €108,800,000.[100] This means that the ICTY received more funding in 2003, in real terms, than the ICC did in 2012.

Workloads are harder to compare. The best source for information is each court's annual report to the United Nations General Assembly.[101] By the end of 2012, the ICC had jurisdiction over investigations into eight situations.[102] This had resulted in the initiation of 17 cases by the OTP that covered the alleged crimes of 27 accused. During 2012, three cases involving four accused were being tried at the ICC. At the same time, four cases were in the midst of pre-trial preparations. The Court held confirmation of charges hearings in three cases and heard admissibility challenges in three cases. In contrast, during 2003, the ICTY had 42 open cases against a total of 74 accused.[103] Accused from 13 of those cases made their initial appearances, while 12 cases were in the midst of pre-trial preparations. Six cases were tried during 2003 involving nine accused. The results are presented in Table 5.6.

[98] UN General Assembly, Financing of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, UN Doc A/RES/57/288 (12 February 2003).

[99] The US dollar figure for 2003 was first converted to 2012 US dollars using the Consumer Price Index maintained by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics. It was then converted to 2012 euros using the average euro to dollar exchange rate for 2012 (1$ = .7781€).

[100] Programme budget for 2012, the Working Capital Fund for 2012, scale of assessments for the appointment of expenses of the ICC, financing appropriations for 2012 and the Contingency Fund, ICC-ASP/10/Res.4, 21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) 1 (adopted by consensus).

[101] The ICTY Report is UN Security Council, Report of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, UN Doc A/58/297—S/2003/829 (20 August 2003) ('ICTY Report 2003') and covers the work of the Tribunal in the period August 2002 to July 2003. The ICC Report is UN Secretary General, Report of the International Criminal Court, UN Doc A/67/308 (14 August 2012) and covers the work of the Court during the period August 2011 to July 2012.

[102] It was also conducting preliminary examinations in nine places.

[103] ICTY Report 2003 (n 101) Annex I.

Several things are notable about Table 5.6. First, the ICC has fewer open cases and accused than the ICTY had at a similar stage in its lifecycle. The ICTY had a larger number of cases and accused because it charged many lower-ranking individuals during its early years.[104] The ICC has consciously chosen to focus on a much narrower group of accused.[105] Part of the reason for having a smaller number of cases was a desire to increase efficiency by trying only those most responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. Thus, by opening fewer cases the Court might be operating more efficiently than the ICTY.

On the other hand, the ICTY was holding pre-trial proceedings in three times as many cases, and actually tried twice as many cases, covering more than twice as many accused as the ICC did during a similar time period. Of course, the ICTY had slightly more funding (in real terms) than the ICC, but the difference in funding is too small to explain the dramatic differences in the number of cases in pre-trial proceedings and at trial. By each of these three measures (number of cases in pre-trial preparations, number of accused at trial, and number of trials), the ICTY was able to produce at least twice as much output in 2003 as the ICC did in 2012 for only slightly more money. The simplest way to interpret this data is that the ICTY was significantly more efficient than the ICC.

Ultimately, these comparisons suggest that the ICC is less efficient than the ICTY was in 2003. It spends a greater percentage of its budget on support functions than the ICTY did, and its trial output is roughly half that of the ICTY. There are some factors that point in the other direction. For example, the lower total number of cases and accused represents an attempt to increase efficiency by focusing only on those most responsible for crimes, and the Court spends a smaller percentage of its money on things like travel, contractual services, and equipment than the ICTY did. But on the whole, the distribution of costs between core functions and support services and the trial output of the court seem to be more direct indicators of efficiency. And by these indicators, the ICTY was more efficient than the ICC. As we shall see in section 5.6, however, things may not be that simple.

5.6 Possible Explanations for the Comparative Inefficiency of the ICC

It seems hard to reconcile the conclusion in the previous section with the ICC's claim that it is as efficient as possible and that further attempts to improve efficiency would actually have negative returns.[106] This section will look at possible explanations for the apparent contradiction. One problem might be that the ICTY and ICC are different in some way that makes comparing them misleading. Section 5.5 assumed the ICC and [104] See D Raab, 'Evaluating the ICTY and its Completion Strategy' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 82, 84–8.

[105] See Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–12, OTP, ICC, 1 February 2010, paras 18–21 (noting the OTP will only 'prosecute those who bear the greatest responsibility for the most serious crimes').

[106] See section 5.4.

ICTY are comparable courts. If they are not, then the comparison between them may not tell us anything meaningful about their relative efficiency. There are several ways in which the ICC is different from the ICTY that might invalidate the comparison.

First, the ICTY had jurisdiction only over crimes that took place in the former Yugoslavia. The ICC has eight open situations at the moment and each one is in a different country. Thus one possibility is that the necessity of investigating situations in different locations drives up the cost of the ICC. It sounds plausible, but the data does not support this hypothesis. If this were true, one would expect the result to be higher investigation and analysis costs at the ICC than at the ICTY, but in reality the ICC spends a smaller percentage of its budget on investigations and analysis than the ICTY did.[107]

Another possibility is that the indicators used (number of cases at trial and number of accused at trial) are not appropriate for measuring efficiency. Not all trials or accused are the same. The trial of Slobodan Milošević was obviously very different from the trial of Anto Furundžija. The Milošević trial was one of the most complex cases ever taken to trial. It involved hundreds of witnesses and lasted years. The trial of Furundžija was the simplest trial the ICTY conducted. It lasted only ten days and involved only 14 witnesses. Thus comparing courts simply based on the number of cases or accused at trial is potentially misleading. In the absence of a way of accurately comparing the complexity of individual cases, it is difficult to know whether the comparison of cases and accused tried is useful.[108]

Another difference between the ICC and the ICTY is that the ICC permits victims to participate in the cases.[109] The ICTY did not. One possibility is that victim participation at the ICC increases the cost of trying cases by slowing down the proceedings.[110] This is hard to quantify, but my experience at the ECCC, another court that permits victim participation, was that the participation of the victims and their representatives did slow down the trial. This might be a price we are willing to pay to permit victim participation, but it may skew the comparison with the ICTY.

Another possibility is that there are additional procedural steps at the ICC that had no analogy at the ICTY, which makes a direct comparison between the two courts misleading. For example, much time has been spent at the ICC arguing over whether cases are admissible. This has turned out to be a complex matter that has come up repeatedly. In 2012 the ICC was dealing with admissibility challenges in three cases. There is no direct analogy to the admissibility challenge at the ICTY because the ICTY had primacy over national courts[111] while the ICC's jurisdiction is subject to [107] NGOs have criticized the ICC for failing to allocate sufficient resources to investigations. See B Evans-Pritchard and S Jennings, 'ICC's Funders Seek Greater Efficiency', Institute for War and Peace Reporting (18 June 2013) (noting concerns by NGOs that the prosecutor has insufficient resources to conduct investigations).

[108] The author is working on a solution to this problem and hopes eventually to be able to compare cases of different complexity accurately across courts.

[109] See Art 68 Rome Statute.

[110] See generally C Van den Wyngaert, 'Victims Before International Criminal Courts: Some Views and Concerns of an ICC Trial Judge' (2011) 44 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 475 (describing ways in which the participation of victims affects trials at the ICC).

[111] Art 9(2) Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('The International Tribunal shall have primacy over national courts').

the principle of complementarity.[112] Perhaps this difference accounts for some of the apparent inefficiency of the ICC.

Related to the concern about admissibility challenges is the question of state cooperation. While the ICTY initially had difficulty getting cooperation from some of the states in the former Yugoslavia, the members of the European Union and NATO eventually applied sufficient pressure to ensure cooperation. The ICC has not had equivalent success in getting cooperation from countries like Sudan and Libya, partly because there is no state or bloc of states willing to exert sufficient pressure on those countries to ensure cooperation. In the absence of cooperation it is harder to investigate and to obtain custody over those accused of committing crimes. This may also make the ICC less efficient than the ICTY.

Another possibility is that the ICTY benefited from greater institutional experience and economies of scale. It was by far the largest of the international criminal tribunals that were created in the 1990s and it tried the largest number of accused. This probably resulted in economies of scale that made the average ICTY trial cheaper than it would have been at a tribunal that tried fewer cases. The ICTY also benefited from hard-won institutional experience. For example, incremental changes were made over time to its procedural rules that were designed to streamline the trials. These changes were the result of lessons learned from the early trials. Thus one might expect that as tribunals try more cases their efficiency might slowly improve. At the moment, the ICC has had a relatively small number of trials and probably has not developed the same institutional experience or economies of scale as the ICTY.

This is a non-exhaustive list of the ways in which the ICC might be different enough from the ICTY to affect the comparison of their workloads. Unfortunately, it is hard to quantify most of these potential differences. There is, however, one quantifiable way in which the ICC in 2012 was different from the ICTY in 2013—average staff costs. Even though both courts cost roughly the same amount in real terms, the ICTY had 1,118 posts, while the ICC had only 766 posts. As a result, the ICTY's average cost per post (in 2012 euros) was €47,589, while the ICC's average cost per post was €77,897—64% higher even after taking into account inflation!

This difference does not seem to be the result of a change in the seniority structure of the court staff. If one compares the numbers of staff members at the different salary levels,[113] the average staff seniority was very similar across the two courts.[114] It is not clear why the ICC's per post cost is so much higher than ICTY's per post cost. The numbers suggest that the cost of staff has been growing faster than the rate of inflation over the last 20 years. But a comparison of the UN salary scales[115] from 2003 and 2012[116] indicates that this is not the case for salaries. This suggests that the difference has to do with non-salary costs.

[112] Art 17 Rome Statute.

[113] Data for the ICTY's staff structure was taken from ICTY Budget 2002–3 (n 87) Table 4. Data for the ICC's staff structure was taken from ASP, Programme budget for 2012 (n 100) para. 2.

[114] In both courts, the median staff member was serving in a General Services post, while the average staff member was serving in a Professional Grade 1 or Professional Grade 2 post.

[115] Salary scales at the ICC and ICTY are both based upon the UN's official salary scales.

[116] Available from the website of the United Nations International Civil Service Commission <http://icsc.un.org/secretariat/sad.asp?include=ss> accessed 15 April 2014.

Nevertheless, if one recalculates the cost of the ICC assuming that average staff costs were the same as at the ICTY in 2003 (adjusted for inflation),[117] then the ICC would have cost only €79M in 2012. In this alternate scenario, the ICC would have cost 37% less in 2012 than the ICTY did in 2003. This still leaves the ICC looking slightly less efficient than the ICTY—its outputs are still something like 50% to 60% less than the ICTY—but alleviates a large part of the discrepancy. In short, it appears that the differences in real staff costs account for a large part of the apparent inefficiency of the ICC.

It is not clear, however, that much can be done about this without making some very significant changes at the ICC. The ICC is part of the UN's common system for personnel, which means that staff costs are largely out of its hands. The Court has already warned the ASP that any attempt to deviate from the common system would result in expensive and very risky litigation with its staff members.[118] Moreover, even if the Court were to break away from the UN common system and institute a significant reduction in salaries or benefits, it seems likely that there would be attrition among its personnel, particularly those with the most valuable skills. This could be extremely detrimental for an institution that depends so heavily on its personnel.[119] Finally, decreasing wages is extremely difficult for any organization.[120]

5.7 Conclusion

In recent years the process of funding the ICC has been dominated by a debate about how much money the ICC needs. Many of the ICC's largest contributors, including Japan, Germany, France, Britain, and Italy, have been calling for 'zero growth' budgets as a response to fiscal constraints brought on by the aftermath of the 2008 global financial crisis. These countries make two alternative arguments in favour of this position. First, they argue that they simply cannot afford to pay more. Second, they argue that the ICC is inefficient and that it can do more with the same amount of money if it becomes more efficient.

The Court, on the other hand, has been calling for additional funding. It argues that it is underfunded and that it cannot carry out its mandate without additional funding. In support of this position, it notes that the ICC's workload has increased dramatically since 2009 even though its budget has remained about the same. In effect, it is arguing that the ICC is efficient. NGOs, while calling for more funding and opposing a zero growth budget, have simultaneously highlighted areas where they believe the ICC is operating inefficiently.[121]

[117] This was done by taking overall staff costs at the ICC and reducing them so that the average per post cost was €47,589 (the same as at the ICTY in 2003 once adjusted for inflation). All of the other components of the ICC's budget were left unchanged.

[118] See Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance (n 23) 258.

[119] See ibid., Annex III, at 258.

[120] The existence of downward nominal wage rigidity (the idea that it is difficult to decrease nominal wages) is well established in the economic literature. See C Knoppik and T Beissinger, 'Downward Nominal Wage Rigidity in Europe: An Analysis of European Micro Data from the ECHP 1994–2001' (2009) 36 Empirical Economics 321.

[121] See (nn 52 and 107).

This chapter has attempted to shed light on the question of whether the ICC is efficient by comparing the ICC to the ICTY. The results are somewhat ambiguous. At first glance, the ICC does seem to be less efficient than the ICTY at conducting trials. It conducts significantly fewer trials than the ICTY did for only slightly less money. In addition, a comparison of how the two courts allocated their money between core activities and support activities indicates that the ICC spends almost 10% more of its budget on support functions than the ICTY did. As a result, it spends less on investigations, trials, and appeals than the ICTY.

This finding is tempered by the fact that the largest contributor to the difference in efficiency between the ICC and the ICTY is staff costs. Staff costs, however, are largely out of the hands of the ICC, which is a member of the United Nations common systems for staff. It would be quite difficult for the ICC to leave the common system and could have serious adverse consequences for the Court because it might well result in the departure of the Court's most skilled personnel.

In addition, there are ways in which the ICC is different from the ICTY that might affect the comparison between the two. For example, the ICC permits victims to participate in the process, and the ICC's cases have been marked by a large number of lengthy admissibility challenges, both of which might slow down the process and neither of which was really a factor in the ICTY's cases. As a result, it may not be fair to expect the ICC to be as efficient at conducting trials as the ICTY. Finally, the ICC has tried relatively few cases so far. It is possible, perhaps even likely, that the ICC will become more efficient as more cases are tried. This appears to have been the case at the ICTY.

Ultimately, my conclusions are not definitive because the real differences between the ICTY and ICC make a naive mathematical comparison of the two courts potentially misleading. Having said that, even once the differences are accounted for, it does appear that the ICTY was more efficient than the ICC, which indicates that there is room for further improvement at the ICC. Specifically, the comparison to the ICTY suggests that the ICC may be able to rearrange its spending to devote a larger proportion of its budget to investigations, trials, and appeals and less of its budget to support functions.

6

The ICC and the ASP

*Jonathan O'Donohue

6.1 Introduction

Article 112(1) of the Rome Statute established the ASP (Assembly) to perform a range of administrative oversight, legislative, and other functions which are essential to the effective functioning of the ICC. In its first 12 sessions the Assembly has made significant progress towards implementing these functions, as well as other efforts to support the work of the ICC and the realization of the Rome Statute system. Nevertheless, there are a number of aspects of the Assembly's approaches and decisions which threaten to undermine the work of the ICC, including the independence of the prosecutor and the judges. This chapter examines how, in discharging its functions, the Assembly has both positively and negatively affected the law and practice of the Court.

6.2 Overview of the ASP

The decision of the Rome Statute's drafters to establish the Assembly followed their agreement to establish the ICC outside the United Nations system.[1] The Assembly is required to perform a number of administrative oversight, legislative and other functions. However, with the emphasis at the time on defining the jurisdiction and judicial functions of the ICC, detailed discussions regarding the Assembly and its role did not begin until late in the drafting process.[2] Consequently, the Statute allocates the Assembly numerous functions, but does not comprehensively define the inter-governmental organization. Du Plessis and Grevers observe that 'the [Assembly's] role is defined functionally—by what it does—not conceptually—by what it is'.[3]

The Statute merely defines the Assembly as a body made up of representatives of each State Party with equal voting rights which shall meet once a year in either The Hague or

* Legal Adviser for the International Secretariat of Amnesty International.

[1] See A Marchesi, 'Article 2: Relationship of the Court with the United Nations' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (München/Oxford: C H Beck/Hart 2008) 63, 64–6; A Bos, 'Assembly of States Parties' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, vol. 1 (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 297, 297–302.

[2] S R Rao, 'Article 112' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (München/Oxford: C H Beck/Hart 2008) 1687, 1688: 'the first focussed discussion took place in the relevant Working Group of the Preparatory Committee in its penultimate session in 1998'; see also Bos (n 1) 300.

[3] M du Plessis and C Grevers, 'The Independent Oversight Mechanism argument is not merely about administrative functions, but is situated within a broader debate over the role of the Assembly of States Parties' (ICCForum.com) <http://iccforum.com/oversight> accessed 20 January 2014.

New York, unless special sessions are required.[4] It provides that a Bureau of the Assembly would be elected, including the President of the Assembly, to assist the Assembly 'in the discharge of its responsibilities'.[5] It was also foreseen that the Assembly would establish other subsidiary bodies, as may be necessary.[6] Some provisions and the drafting history demonstrate that the drafters intended the Assembly to respect the judicial independence of the Court.[7] But that is as far as the definition of the Assembly itself goes, except for a list of functions which can be categorized as follows:

- Administrative oversight—providing management oversight to the Presidency, the prosecutor, and the Registrar regarding the administration of the Court;[8]
- Legislative decisions—approving or entering into key framework documents and agreements;[9] and amending the Statute,[10] the Rules of Procedure and Evidence,[11] and the Elements of Crimes;[12]
- Considering and deciding the budget of the Court;[13]
- Electing senior ICC officials—the prosecutor,[14] the deputy prosecutor(s),[15] and the ICC judges,[16] as well as making decisions on removal from office[17] and deciding to alter the number of judges;[18]
- Responding to non-cooperation—considering any question relating to non-cooperation, including referrals of non-cooperation from the ICC pursuant to Article 87(5) and (7);[19]
- Dispute resolution—considering disputes between two or more States Parties relating to the interpretation or application of the Rome Statute.[20]

The Assembly also has a broad discretion to perform any other function consistent with the Statute or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[21]

Twelve years after its establishment, the Assembly is a dynamic inter-governmental organization that is performing most of these functions,[22] as well as other activities to promote and support the Rome Statute system and the work of the ICC.[23] Its sessions not only include the participation of States Parties,[24] but also a number of observer

[4] Art 112(1), (6) and (7) Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('Rome Statute').

[5] Art 112(3) Rome Statute. [6] Art 112(4) Rome Statute.

[7] For example, Art 112(2)(b) Rome Statute deliberately limits management oversight to the 'administration of the Court'; see also Rao (n 2) 1690–1; Bos (n 1) 301.

[8] Art 112(2)(b) Rome Statute. [9] See section 6.5. [10] Arts 121 and 122 Rome Statute.

[11] Art 51(2) Rome Statute. [12] Art 9(2) Rome Statute. [13] Art 112(2)(d) Rome Statute.

[14] Art 42(4) Rome Statute. [15] Ibid.

[16] Art 36(6)(a) Rome Statute. The Assembly may also provide recommendations on the election of the Registrar by the judges in accordance with Art 43(4) Rome Statute.

[17] Art 46(2) Rome Statute. [18] Arts 36(2)(b) and 112(2)(e) Rome Statute.

[19] Art 87(5) and (7) and Art 112(2)(f) Rome Statute. [20] Art 119 Rome Statute.

[21] Art 112(2)(g) Rome Statute.

[22] Of the functions set out in the Rome Statute, the main tasks that the Assembly has yet to deal with are removing senior ICC officials from office; altering the number of judges; and dispute resolution.

[23] See section 6.8.

[24] Participation by States Parties in sessions in New York, where most states have representation, is generally higher than sessions in The Hague.

states, international organizations, and NGOs.[25] At present, its annual sessions have packed agendas.[26] The Bureau, including the President of the Assembly and its Working Groups of States Parties in The Hague and New York, conduct substantial preparations for each session and other inter-sessional tasks throughout the year.[27]

Four subsidiary bodies have been established so far to assist the Assembly's work: a Committee on Budget and Finance (CBF) provides independent expert advice on the ICC's annual budget request and other financial and administrative matters;[28] an Oversight Committee provides strategic oversight of the project to construct the new Permanent Premises of the Court which the ICC is expected to move into in 2015;[29] an Advisory Committee on Nominations of Judges of the ICC assesses candidates in advance of elections;[30] and an Independent Oversight Mechanism (IOM) is mandated to conduct inspections, evaluations, and investigations of the Court to enhance its efficiency and economy.[31] In addition, the Assembly established a temporary Study Group on Governance within the Hague Working Group in 2010 to conduct a structured dialogue between States Parties and the ICC towards strengthening the institutional framework of [25] Rules 93–5 Rules of Procedure of the Assembly of States Parties, ICC–ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties) part II.C. Most NGOs that participate in the Assembly are members of the Coalition for the ICC (CICC). The coordinating and facilitating role of the Coalition has been recognized by the Assembly, see Recognition of the coordinating and facilitating role of the NGO CICC, ICC–ASP/2/Res.8, 11 September 2003 (Second Session of the Assembly of States Parties). During each session, the Coalition and its members issue position papers addressing issues on the agenda of the Assembly, make statements to the general debate, organize side meetings, and lobby States Parties.

[26] Sessions are conducted in accordance with the Rules of Procedure of the ASP provided for in Art 112(9) Rome Statute. They currently include hearing reports on the activities of the ICC and the Trust Fund for Victims; holding a general debate to discuss key issues relating to the ICC and the Rome Statute system; conducting specific discussions on key issues, including complementarity, cooperation, and the impact of the Rome Statute system on victims and affected communities; adopting the budget for the following year; electing vacant positions for senior officials of the ICC, the Board of Directors of the Trust Fund, and subsidiary bodies of the Assembly; considering reports of the ICC, the Bureau, and subsidiary bodies; adopting resolutions on a range of issues relating to the operation of the ICC and the Assembly; and considering proposals for amendments to the Rome Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[27] Report of the Bureau: Evaluation and rationalization of the working methods of the subsidiary bodies of the Bureau, ICC–ASP/12/59, 20 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP) para. 8, 'institutional questions whose discussion benefit from close interaction with the Court, such as the Court's budget, governance, oversight and host-state related issues are designated to The Hague. On the other hand, questions relating to the United Nations or that require the fullest possible representation on the part of States Parties are designated to New York.' Facilitators and focal points are appointed to take forward these discussions.

[28] Establishment of the Committee on Budget and Finance, ICC–ASP/1/Res.4, 3 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties). The Committee is made up of 12 experts of recognized standing and experience in financial matters at the international level. It was established at the first session and currently meets twice a year.

[29] Permanent Premises, ICC–ASP/6/Res.1, 14 December 2007 (Sixth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 5. The Oversight Committee was established in 2007.

[30] Strengthening the ICC and the ASP, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, 21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the ASP) para. 19. Made up of nine eminent persons with established competence and experience in criminal or international law, the Advisory Committee was established in 2012.

[31] Establishment of an IOM, ICC–ASP/8/Res.1, 26 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the Assembly of States Parties). The IOM was established in 2009. However, a decision to make it operational was only taken in 2013, see IOM, ICC–ASP/12/Res.6, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) and section 6.3.2 of this chapter.

the Rome Statute system and enhancing the efficiency and effectiveness of the Court.[32] A permanent Secretariat of the Assembly provides services, and administrative and technical assistance to the Assembly, the Bureau, and the subsidiary bodies.[33]

Many aspects of the work of the Assembly and its bodies support the effective functioning of the ICC, including the development of its law and practice. However, the capacity of the current framework to conduct the Assembly's work effectively and devote sufficient political support to ensure the success of the new system of international justice must be questioned. On average the Assembly meets only eight to ten days each year.[34] It is increasingly evident that this is insufficient to ensure that all issues receive the attention they deserve.[35] While the Bureau seeks to support the Assembly through inter-sessional work, its workload is now considered to be overwhelming and efforts are now being taken to rationalize the working methods of its bodies.[36] Subsidiary bodies are playing an important role, but with the exception of the Committee on Budget and Finance, most of these bodies have only been established recently. In practice, the Committee is overburdened with requests to consider non-budgetary or financial matters that go beyond its expertise.[37]

Political considerations are also having a significant impact on the performance of many aspects of the Assembly's functions which in some instances threaten the effective operation of the ICC and the independence of the prosecutor and the judges. In particular, initiatives by some African states, including some States Parties, through the African Union to undermine cooperation with the ICC's case against the President of Sudan and to amend the Rome Statute to preclude the ICC from prosecuting sitting heads of state, pose significant challenges for the Assembly.[38]

The following sections examine each of the previously mentioned categories of the Assembly's functions, identifying the Assembly's positive and negative impact on the law and practice of the ICC to date and the challenges it faces.

[32] Establishment of a study group on governance, ICC–ASP/9/Res.2, 10 December 2010 (Ninth Session of the Assembly of States Parties). Initially established for a period of one year, the Study Group's mandate continues to be extended. To date, it has considered the following issues: the relationship between the Court and the Assembly; strengthening the institutional framework within the Court; increasing the efficiency of the criminal process; and enhancing the transparency and predictability of the budgetary process, see Report of the Bureau on Study Group on Governance, ICC–ASP/12/37, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties).

[33] Establishment of the Permanent Secretariat of the ASP to the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/2/Res.3, 12 September 2003 (Second Session of the ASP).

[34] Between 1995 and 2002, governments met between four and ten weeks each year to establish the ICC.

[35] For example, plenary discussions on complementarity, which is arguably the most important element of the Rome Statute system and requires continued discussion by the Assembly, were held at the eleventh but not the twelfth session.

[36] Strengthening the ICC and the ASP, ICC–ASP/12/Res.8, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) paras 40–2; Report of the Bureau: Evaluation and rationalization of the working methods of the subsidiary bodies of the Bureau (n 27).

[37] NGOs have criticized this approach and called for the Assembly to establish additional expert subsidiary bodies, see for example CICC, Comments and Recommendations of Coalition Teams to the Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties, 20–8 November 2013, 16.

[38] For further information see Maunganidze and Du Plessis, Chapter 4 this volume.

6.3 Administrative Oversight

The drafting history of Article 112(2)(b) shows that the decision to limit management oversight to the 'administration of the Court' sought to preclude the Assembly from conducting oversight of judicial activities.[39] This is consistent with requirements in the Statute of the independence of both the prosecutor and the judges. However, the extent of the Assembly's administrative oversight is not defined, except that Article 112(4) foresaw that the Assembly would establish an IOM to conduct inspections, evaluations, and investigations of the ICC. In practice, limiting 'management oversight' to the administration of the Court has proved easier said than done, as many aspects of the ICC's administration have judicial implications or reflect prosecutorial discretion or judicial decisions. Problems have arisen regarding the Assembly's oversight of the development and implementation of some policies and strategies. Disputes regarding the scope of the IOM's powers have also resulted in delays in making it operational.

6.3.1 Policy-setting and strategic planning

To date, the Assembly has played a mostly constructive role in supporting transparent policy-setting and strategic planning. For example, it encouraged the ICC's initiative to develop a Strategic Plan in 2005 and engaged in a dialogue with the Court over several years to discuss its further development and implementation.[40] Although some aspects of the Strategic Plan related to judicial activities, the Assembly did not seek to influence them.[41] Instead it focused primarily on identifying gaps in the strategy and recommending they be filled,[42] promoting greater links between the budget and the Strategic Plan and overseeing its implementation.[43] It was also careful to 'welcome' or 'take note' of the Strategic Plan rather than provide it with formal approval—which would have implied political sign-off.[44] The approach, which has been adopted [39] Rao (n 2) 1691; Bos (n 1) 305.

[40] See e.g. Strategic planning process of the Court, ICC–ASP/5/Res.2, 1 December 2006 (Fifth Session of the ASP) para. 2 which invited the ICC to 'further develop' dialogue initiated with the Bureau on the Plan.

[41] Report of the Bureau on the Strategic Planning Process of the Court, ICC–ASP/7/29, 14–22 November 2008 (Seventh Session of the ASP) para. 12, notes '[t]he underlying premise for the work undertaken was that the Strategic Plan and its components form an internal management tool for the Court. As such, the aim of the Working Group was not to embark on a redrafting exercise with regard to the Plan or to engage in "micro management" of the Court. Rather, the aim was to enter into a dialogue with the Court with a view to giving States Parties an opportunity to comment on the activities carried out by the Court and provide input to the Court on these issues, as well as enabling States Parties to stay abreast of developments in the strategic planning process.'

[42] Strategic planning process of the Court (n 40) para. 3 recommended dialogue on the position of victims in the concrete implementation of the Strategic Plan. This led to the development of a separate Strategy in relation to victims, see Report of the Court on the strategy in relation to victims, ICC–ASP/8/45, 18–26 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP).

[43] Report of the Bureau on the Strategic Planning Process of the Court (n 41) paras 1–7.

[44] Strengthening the ICC and the ASP, ICC–ASP/6/Res.2, 14 December 2007 (Sixth Session of the ASP) para. 21, '[w]elcome[d] the efforts of the Court to further develop the Strategic Plan…'. This approach has also been taken in relation to updates to the Strategic Plan, see Strengthening the ICC and the ASP (2013) (n 36) para. 47, '[t]akes note of the Court's Strategic Plan for 2013–2017'.

towards most policies and strategies, falls clearly within the scope of administrative oversight foreseen in Article 112(2)(b) and respects the judicial independence of the ICC. However, the Assembly has not maintained this approach in relation to all policies and strategies. In some cases this has negatively impacted their implementation.

In one notable instance, a dispute emerged between States Parties and the ICC over the Court's obligations to fund family visits of indigent detainees. Consequently, the Assembly contradicted a judicial decision by the Presidency on the matter and took steps to ensure that the ICC's policy, which was in line with the decision, could not be implemented. Some States Parties had objected to the ICC's policy of funding family visits in 2007 when they discovered the practice had been established without prior consultation with the Assembly.[45] States Parties were particularly concerned not to recognize a legal obligation to fund such visits and decided that the legal and policy aspects, as well as the human rights dimension and budgetary impact, should be assessed.[46] While discussions were continuing between the Assembly and the ICC, in March 2009, the Presidency issued a judicial decision in response to a complaint raised by one detainee regarding the number of family visits that the Registry had stated it was willing to fund.[47] The decision found that, in order to give effect to the right to family visits, the ICC has a positive obligation to fund family visits of indigent persons, although it could not be unlimited.[48] Determined not to set a legal precedent that national authorities would be expected to follow,[49] the Assembly issued a resolution at its next session contradicting the Presidency's decision by reaffirming many States Parties' position 'that according to existing law and standards, the right to family visits does not comprise a co-relative legal right to have such visits paid for by the detaining authority or any other authority'.[50] Furthermore, the Assembly went on to establish a special fund for family visits to ensure that they are funded entirely through voluntary donations,[51] even though only one state had committed to make a contribution.[52] The fund has received little financial support and it remains to be seen what will happen if the money runs out.[53]

[45] See ASP to the Rome Statute of the ICC, Official Records: Seventh Session, The Hague, 14–22 November 2008, vol. 1, 12.

[46] Strengthening the ICC and the ASP (2007) (n 44) para. 14.

[47] Decision on 'Mr Mathieu Ngudjolo's Complaint under Regulation 221(1) of the Regulations of the Registry against the Registrar's Decision of 19 November 2008', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-RoR217-02/08-8, Presidency, ICC, 10 March 2009.

[48] Ibid. See also H Abtahi et al., 'The Judicial Review Powers of the Presidency of the International Criminal Court: Safeguards for the Protection of Human Rights' (2013) 12 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals 281, 293–7.

[49] See e.g. ASP, Official Records: Seventh Session (n 45) vol. 1, 12–13.

[50] Family visits for indigent persons, ICC–ASP/8/Res.4, 26 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 2.

[51] Programme budget for 2011, the Working Capital Fund for 2011, scale of assessments for the apportionment of expenses of the ICC, financing appropriations for 2011 and the Contingency Fund, ICC–ASP/9/Res.4, 10 December 2010 (Ninth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) Section X.

[52] Financial Statements for the period 1 January to 31 December 2010, ICC–ASP/10/12, 12–21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties); Germany made a voluntary contribution of €85,000.

[53] Financial Statements for the period 1 January to 31 December 2011, ICC–ASP/11/12, 14–22 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties); Germany made one further contribution of €85,000. Since then no other state has done so.

The time the Assembly is taking to engage with the ICC on some policy and strategy issues, especially where they require additional resources, is also having a negative impact on their implementation. In particular, in August 2011 the ICC circulated to the Assembly Draft Guidelines Governing the Relations between the Court and Intermediaries, which seek to ensure the effectiveness of its work with such actors in the field. The CBF stated that their adoption would 'undoubtedly enhance the security of the Court's proceedings if intermediaries were utilized with prudence and in a way that was clearly understandable by the parties'.[54] However, as of the end of 2013, the Assembly had failed to give substantive consideration to the Guidelines beyond identifying numerous related issues for further discussion.[55] In the meantime, the ICC reports that it has been implementing the Guidelines to some extent within existing resources, but it is not able to fund all aspects of it.[56]

Recent decisions by the Assembly regarding budget requests by the OTP to implement its Strategic Plan for June 2012–15[57] threaten to undermine its implementation and potentially the independence of the prosecutor. The Strategic Plan presents a significant revision of the OTP's working practices, including additional investment in investigations following numerous Court decisions that the Office had failed to meet evidentiary thresholds set out in the Statute.[58] The prosecutor requested an additional €7.47 million for 2014 towards implementing the strategy and indicated that it would ask for a further increase of €12 million phased over the following three years.[59] It also reduced the number of active investigations in 2014 from seven to five.[60] However, the prosecutor's plans to implement the Strategic Plan in 2014 have been affected by the Assembly's decision, acting on the recommendation of the CBF, to approve approximately two-thirds of the OTP's request for additional resources in the year.[61]

[54] Report of the CBF on the work of its 21st session, ICC–ASP/12/15, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 168.

[55] Report of the Bureau on victims and affected communities and the Trust Fund for Victims, including reparations and intermediaries, ICC–ASP/12/38, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 7, 'there may be a need for further discussions on the issue, taking into account any developments in the case law, the duty of overseeing the functions carried out by intermediaries, the possible liability of the Court if an intermediary suffers harm or damage as the Court discharges its mandate and, inter alia, the consequences its use could have for a fair and expeditious trial. Furthermore, after the experience gained in the Lubanga case, the use of intermediaries has become an issue that deserves attention to prevent and/or address, as appropriate, any alleged offence against the administration of justice under article 70 of the Rome Statute.'

[56] Report of the Court on the implementation in 2013 of the revised strategy in relation to victims, ICC–ASP/12/41, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) paras 44–5.

[57] Strategic plan—June 2012–15, OTP, ICC, 1 October 2013 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/policies%20and%20strategies/Documents/OTP-Strategic-Plan-2012-2015.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014.

[58] For example, Pre-Trial Chambers have decided that the Prosecutor had not provided sufficient evidence to confirm charges and proceed to trial in four cases: Callixte Mbarushimana, Bahar Idriss Abu Garda, Henry Kiproni Kosgey, and Mohammed Hussein Ali.

[59] Strategic plan—June 2012–15, OTP (n 57) paras 99–102.

[60] Proposed Programme Budget for 2014 of the ICC, ICC–ASP/12/10, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 137.

[61] Programme budget for 2014, the Working Capital Fund for 2014, scale of assessments for the apportionment of expenses of the ICC, financing appropriations for 2014 and the Contingency Fund, ICC–ASP/12/Res.1, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties); the Assembly reduced the OTP's requested increase for 2014 by approximately €2.5 million.

In response, the OTP has stated that the resources provided are only sufficient to conduct four investigations in 2014.[62] How the Assembly deals with these significant additional resource requests in the next years will inevitably determine whether the OTP's strategy can be implemented.

It would be wrong to argue that the Assembly should not provide input into strategies and policies which contain elements of prosecutorial discretion or judicial decisions or that the Assembly must write a blank cheque to implement new policies and strategies. It clearly has a mandate in Article 112 to both provide management oversight of the administration of the ICC and to decide the ICC's budget. However, the Assembly also has a responsibility in performing these functions to ensure that it does not undermine the ability of the ICC to function effectively or the independence of the Court.

6.3.2 Inspection, evaluation, and investigation

Despite its inclusion in the Rome Statute, the Assembly only took the decision to operationalize the IOM at its twelfth session. The Assembly gave little consideration to the mechanism in its first sessions, until a series of reports in 2004 of sexual exploitation and abuse by United Nations peacekeepers prompted States Parties to recognize that independent investigation mechanisms must be put in place to ensure that any allegations made against the ICC's officials and staff are dealt with effectively.[63] In part due to reluctance from the ICC,[64] it took four years to establish the IOM with a limited Terms of Reference to conduct only investigations into misconduct by ICC-elected officials, ICC staff, and contractors, while further consideration was given to expanding its mandate to include inspection and evaluation functions.[65] However, concerns raised by the OTP that the Terms of Reference infringed its independence would prevent it from becoming operational for a further four years.

The Office of the Prosecutor opposed the Assembly's decision to provide the IOM with proprio motu investigative powers over its staff, on the basis that it was inconsistent with the requirement in Article 42(2) that '[t]he Prosecutor shall have full authority over the management and administration of the Office, including the staff'.[66] It argued that the prosecutor must consent to any investigation of his staff by the IOM.[67] It also expressed concern that there was no requirement that the IOM consult with [62] Presentation by the OTP to the Hague Working Group on 10 April 2014.

[63] See A Khan, 'The real issue concerns delimitation of the Court's independence and the oversight role of the Assembly which can only be decided through a constructive dialogue between the Assembly, Court officials and civil society on the expectations of oversight' (ICCForum.com) <http://iccforum.com/oversight> accessed 4 August 2014.

[64] Report of the Bureau on the IOM, ICC–ASP/7/28, 14–22 November 2008 (Seventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties); the Registrar initially opposed the need for an IOM on the basis that the ICC had mechanisms to address misconduct. However, the Bureau disagreed strongly and underlined that 'it would be insufficient for the Court to only internally deal with misconduct if it is to convincingly address such cases'.

[65] Establishment of an IOM (n 31).

[66] Report of the Bureau on the IOM, ICC–ASP/9/31, 6–10 December 2010 (Ninth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) paras 43–5.

[67] Ibid., para. 46.

the prosecutor before conducting such an investigation and that the system could be abused by opponents of the ICC to interfere in its work.[68] Some academics and one State Party supported the OTP's position.[69] However, while other States Parties recognized the legitimacy of the Office's concerns, they considered these could be addressed through procedural safeguards and wanted to push ahead with making the IOM operational.[70] The latter approach had merit. The Terms of Reference went too far in almost completely excluding the prosecutor's involvement. However, serious allegations against staff of the OTP have to be dealt with effectively and independently. The OTP could not investigate itself independently. Giving the prosecutor the ability to stop the IOM's investigations would have undermined the integrity of the process and opened the prosecutor and the IOM to attack. Better safeguards needed to be found. Efforts continued in the next years to find solutions, particularly in developing an Operational Mandate for the IOM, but, initially, agreement could not be found to take the IOM forward.[71] The Assembly therefore turned its attention to developing the inspection and evaluation functions of the IOM.[72]

The risks posed by the failure to operationalize the IOM became apparent in April 2013 when the ICC reported that a former staff member of the Victim and Witnesses Unit in the Registry had been accused of sexual abuse of protected witnesses in a safe house in Kinshasa.[73] As the IOM was not operational, the ICC could only respond to the disturbing allegations by conducting an internal inquiry.[74] In an effort to uphold the credibility of the inquiry, the Registrar commissioned an ad hoc independent external review panel.[75] But even with this safeguard, the lack of a fully independent investigation was far from desirable.

Fortunately, at the same time, the Bureau's Hague Working Group was increasingly engaged with the ICC on resolving the outstanding issues to operationalize the IOM and was successful in 2013 in reaching a consensus solution which was acceptable to the organs of the Court, including the OTP.[76] According to a new Operational

[68] Ibid., para. 47.

[69] Ibid., paras 52–63; see also comments by J Alvarez, 'The Proposed Independent Oversight Mechanism for the International Criminal Court'; N Cowdery, 'When dealing with alleged misconduct by staff in the Prosecutor's office, the Prosecutor and not the Independent Oversight Mechanism should retain and must exercise authority to investigate and decide'; and H van der Wilt, 'The demand of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court that any investigation by the Independent Oversight Mechanism into alleged misconduct of his staff members requires his prior authorization is not unreasonable or far-fetched' (ICCForum.com) <http://iccforum.com/oversight> accessed 4 August 2014.

[70] Report of the Bureau on the IOM (2010) (n 66) para. 52.

[71] Report of the Bureau on the IOM, ICC–ASP/10/27, 12–21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) paras 13–16.

[72] Ibid., paras 17–19; Report of the Bureau on the IOM, ICC–ASP/11/27, 14–22 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 18.

[73] 'ICC Internally Inquires on Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Former ICC Staff Member', ICC Press Release, 12 April 2013.

[74] Ibid.

[75] 'ICC Commissions an Independent External Review of the Allegations of Sexual Assault', ICC Press Release, 20 June 2013. The Commission reported in December 2013 confirming the results of the ICC's internal inquiry, see 'The External Independent Review Submits its Report on Alleged Sexual Abuses in DRC', ICC Press Release, 20 December 2013.

[76] Report of the Bureau on the Independent Oversight Mechanism, ICC–ASP/12/27, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 12.

Mandate adopted by the Assembly at its twelfth session, the IOM can proceed with an investigation without the prosecutor's consent, but it contains a number of important safeguards to ensure that it does not impede the authority or independence granted to the prosecutor.[77] In particular, the IOM must notify the prosecutor when it receives reports of misconduct that merit investigation.[78] This will be followed by five days of consultation with the prosecutor before the investigation is commenced.[79] The IOM is expressly required to 'use all appropriate diligence to address concerns of heads of organs in order to avoid any negative impact on on-going investigative, prosecutorial and judicial activities resulting from the proposed investigation'.[80] If the prosecutor believes the proposed investigation is outside the IOM's legal mandate, it may seek a determination on the matter by the Presidency of the ICC.[81] Completing the vision of the drafters, the Operational Manual also includes the IOM's inspection and evaluation functions.[82]

The compromise on investigations will not completely satisfy a literalist interpretation of the independence of the prosecutor, but it does address the majority of the OTP's concerns and establishes a series of safeguards that seek to ensure that the IOM does not undermine the work of the Office. Importantly, the prosecutor has endorsed the system.[83] The independence of the IOM is also protected in the compromise, which safeguards the OTP and the credibility of the ICC should such allegations arise. For the IOM to be effective, the Assembly will need to provide it with sufficient resources, including the ability to develop internal expertise in relevant areas of the ICC's work.

Operationalizing the IOM is a positive, although long overdue, step to ensure that the Assembly conducts effective management oversight of the administration of the ICC and that serious allegations against ICC officials and staff are dealt with effectively. The Assembly should be commended for persisting with the initiative and engaging with the OTP to address its concerns.

6.4 Budgetary Decisions

To date, the Assembly has approved 12 annual budgets for the ICC totalling more than €1 billion, including €121.6 million for 2014. On the face of it, this is a significant investment in the new system of international justice. Whether it is sufficient is an important question considered in the previous chapter.[84] The Assembly's budgetary decisions are essential to the effective functioning of the ICC and, as demonstrated by the example in section 2(a) of the 2014 budget of the OTP, have the potential to significantly impact on prosecutorial and judicial activities. The Assembly therefore needs to strike a balance between ensuring that the ICC is allocated the resources it needs to function effectively and independently and ensuring that its annual requests and working practices are scrutinized to ensure efficiency and effectiveness. Unfortunately, [77] IOM (n 31) Annex: Operational mandate of the IOM. [78] Ibid., para. 32.

[79] Ibid., para. 34. [80] Ibid., para. 34. [81] Ibid., para. 35. [82] Ibid.
[83] The Prosecutor's Address to the Twelfth Session of the Assembly, 20 November 2013, stated, '[t]his agreement demonstrates the commendable ability of the Court and the Assembly of States Parties to work in concert to achieve results of mutual benefit'.
[84] See Ford, Chapter 5, this volume.

the Assembly's approach to the budget in recent years has failed to achieve such a balance, which has negatively impacted a number of areas of the ICC's work.[85]

For a number of years culminating at the tenth session, five of the highest contributing states to the ICC budget[86] called for 'zero nominal growth', regardless of increases in the Court's workload or other established needs for more resources.[87] This met with strong opposition in the Assembly and long acrimonious negotiations on the budget dominating its sessions. The compromises reached included arbitrary cuts to the budget that, while never reaching zero nominal growth, went significantly below the budget requested by the Court and the amount recommended by the CBF.[88] Essentially, the Assembly based its decisions on what some states were willing to pay rather than the resource needs of the Court. This has threatened to turn the ICC into a resource- rather than impunity-driven court, which is inconsistent with the object and purpose of the Rome Statute to put an end to impunity.[89] If it continues, the practice will have a devastating impact on the work of the ICC and the independence of the ICC, especially if the prosecutor is forced to continue to choose between situations based on costs.[90] There is also a real risk that some States Parties could seek to influence the ICC's activities work through the budget.

Fortunately, following the tenth session, most calls for 'zero nominal growth' by these five States Parties have been dropped, indicating a change in their strategy in relation to the budget. There have been initiatives by other states to reignite the call, but so far they have been unsuccessful.[91] Instead, the five have supported the Assembly's decisions to adopt the 2013 and 2014 budgets incorporating the full recommendations of the CBF. Those decisions have been reached by the Hague Working Group in advance of the Assembly's session and merely endorsed during the Assembly's sessions. This practice has won a lot of support because it has avoided the undesirable battles during the Assembly's sessions and created space for a number of other important issues like cooperation, complementarity, and victims to be added to the Assembly's agenda. It also bases budgetary decisions on the recommendations of the independent expert body rather than political discussions among states.

However, the current approach is still problematic. In particular, if the Assembly adopts the approach of rubber-stamping the Committee's recommendations as a package each year, with only minor consideration by the Hague Working Group, the Committee will effectively decide the ICC's budget. This is arguably inconsistent with the express requirement in Article 112(2)(d) that the Assembly consider and decide the budget. It also undermines the integrity of the budget process. The [85] For example, the CICC's Budget Finance Team has argued that, as a result of the budgetary culture and practice in recent years, the Court is currently underfunded in key areas of its work, including OTP investigations; outreach and public information activities; victim representation; defence investigations; processing victims' applications for participation and reparation; and the Trust Fund for Victims, see CICC, Submission to the CBF at its Twentieth Session on 2 to 26 April 2013, 12 April 2013.

[86] France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United Kingdom.

[87] See J O'Donohue 'Financing the International Criminal Court' (2013) 13 International Criminal Law Review 269, 279–81.

[88] Ibid. [89] Ibid., 285–9. [90] Ibid.

[91] Canada called for 'zero nominal growth' at the twelfth session but received no support from other States Parties. It indicated that it would continue to call for 'zero nominal growth' in the future.

Committee's recommendations should be given significant weight, but their review by the Assembly, taking into account the views of the ICC, is equally important to ensure that the consequences of implementing them are fully considered before decisions are taken whether to adopt them or not. The manner in which members of the Committee are elected (in most cases uncontested in clean slate elections), the Committee's practice of not making public reports it receives from the ICC,[92] and the Committee's recent practice of meeting in private with some States Parties in The Hague in advance of its sessions,[93] further enforces the need to review its recommendations in a forum which is open to all States Parties.

The Assembly has taken a positive step away from its past practice of imposing arbitrary cuts on the ICC's budget. However, the new approach of simply adopting the Committee's recommendations fails to fully safeguard against the negative impact of some budgetary decisions, as demonstrated by the OTP's indications that it may not be able to conduct all five planned investigations in 2014 due to insufficient resources. A thorough and transparent review of the Committee's recommendations by the Assembly, in consultation with the ICC, is vital.

6.5 Legislative Decisions

Despite the rush to complete its work in July 2002 as the entry into force of the Statute approached much earlier than anticipated, the Preparatory Commission finished drafting a number of the core and other important supplementary texts required by the Rome Statute, including the Rules of Procedure and Evidence,[94] the Elements of Crimes,[95] the Financial Regulations and Rules,[96] and the Agreement on Privileges and Immunities.[97] These were adopted at the Assembly's first session two months later without any substantial review or amendments.[98] The Assembly went on to complete other agreements and texts required by the Rome Statute in its early sessions.[99] The prompt [92] See e.g. the CICC's Budget Finance Team, Comments on the Proposed Programme Budget for 2014 of the ICC and other matters, 5 September 2013.

[93] Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance on the work of its twentieth session, ICC–ASP/12/5/Rev.1, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP) para. 118; see also the CICC's Budget Finance Team, Comments on the Proposed Programme Budget for 2014 of the ICC and other matters (n 92), 'closed and non-transparent meetings with only a limited number of states parties who are represented in The Hague, in advance of the Committee's sessions is not appropriate and risks undermining the perception of the Committee's independence'.

[94] Required by Art 51(1) Rome Statute.

[95] Required by Art 9(1) Rome Statute.

[96] Required by Art 113 Rome Statute.

[97] In accordance with Art 48 Rome Statute.

[98] See ASP to the Rome Statute of the ICC, 'Official Records: First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002'. It also adopted Relevant Criteria for voluntary contributions to the ICC, ICC–ASP/1/Res.11, 3 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP) required by Art 116.

[99] The Negotiated Draft Relationship Agreement between the Court and the United Nations, required by Art 2 Rome Statute, was approved at its third session, see ICC–ASP/3/Res.1, 7 September 2004 (Third Session of the ASP) para.2; the Host State Agreement, required by Art 3 Rome Statute, was adopted at the fifth session, see Strengthening the ICC and the ASP, ICC–ASP/5/Res.3, 1 December 2006 (Fifth Session of the ASP) para. 6; the Assembly set out some initial criteria for the management of the Trust Fund for Victims, required by Art 79(3) Rome Statute, which were supplemented by the Regulations of the Trust Fund adopted at its fourth session, see Establishment of a fund for the benefit of victims of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, and of the families of such victims, ICC–ASP/1/Res.6, 9 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP) Annex, and Regulations of the Trust Fund for Victims, ICC–ASP/4/Res.3, 3 December 2005 (Fourth Session of the ASP); Staff Regulations, required by Art 44(3) Rome Statute, were establishment of this legislative framework enabled the functioning of the ICC in its first decade. With the exception of the amendments relating to the crime of aggression and war crimes adopted at the 2010 Review Conference, there was no significant appetite for further legislative changes until recently.[100] Indeed, while the Rome Statute is commonly viewed as not perfect, a number of States Parties have urged caution in pursuing and considering amendments in order to 'preserve the integrity of the Rome Statute in particular the delicate balance achieved in Rome in 1998'.[101] This approach has merit, particularly in the early history of the ICC and at a time when the ICC is facing numerous political attacks against its work. There is potential for the Rome Statute system to unravel if many of its provisions are reopened. However, new initiatives have emerged since 2012 to amend the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and possibly the Statute to expedite criminal proceedings. Other proposals for amendments have emerged as a result of the escalation of some African states' concerns about the ICC's work.

6.5.1 Amendments at the Review Conference

Much has been written on the decisions of the 2010 Review Conference to adopt amendments to incorporate the crime of aggression, expand the definition of war crimes in non-international armed conflict, and to put off the deletion of transitional provision Article 124.[102] The work of the Review Conference is beyond the scope of this chapter. It should be noted, though, that the Assembly played an important role in filtering down more than ten initial proposals for amendments.[103] Only those amendments which attained consensus or would carry very broad support were taken forward to the Review Conference. It was stressed that it would not be the last opportunity to amend the Rome Statute and that proposals not considered in adopted at the second session, see Staff regulations for the ICC, ICC–ASP/2/Res.2, 12 September 2002 (Second Session on the ASP); Guidelines for the selection and engagement of gratis personnel at the ICC, required by Art 44(4) Rome Statute, were adopted at the fourth session, see Strengthening the ICC and the ASP, ICC–ASP/4/Res.4, 3 December 2005 (Fourth Session of the ASP) para. 33 and Annex II.

[100] Only one amendment to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence was made at the tenth session to Rule 4 tasking the Presidency, instead of the plenary of judges, with assigning judges to divisions, see Amendments to Rule 4 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC–ASP/10/Res.1, 20 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the ASP).

[101] Report of the Working Group on the Review Conference, ICC–ASP/8/20, 18–26 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP) Annex II, 52.

[102] See e.g. R Clark, 'Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court considered at the first Review Conference on the Court, Kampala, 31 May–11 June 2010' (2010) 22 Goettingen Journal of International Law 689; A Zimmerman, 'Amending the Amendment Provisions of the Rome Statute: The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression and the Law of Treaties' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 209; C McDougall, The Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (New York: Cambridge University Press 2013).

[103] See Report of the Working Group on the Review Conference (n 101) 50–70, the Assembly considered and decided not to take forward: two of the three proposals by Belgium to prohibit the use of certain weapons as war crimes; a proposal by Mexico to include threat or use of nuclear weapons as a war crime; a proposal by the Netherlands to include the crime of terrorism; a proposal by Trinidad and Tobago to include the crime of international drug trafficking; a proposal by Norway seeking to enable more States Parties to enforce ICC sentences; and a proposal by AU States Parties to amend Art 16 allowing the General Assembly to defer investigations and prosecutions, if the UN Security Council failed to decide on the issue within six months.

Kampala could be taken up at future sessions of the Assembly.[104] A Working Group of the Assembly on amendments was therefore established to consider proposals not taken forward to Kampala and other proposals to amend the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[105]

Initially, at least, States Parties have been reluctant to push forward proposals that were not considered at the Review Conference, although the AU has recently decided that it will promote again the proposal by AU States Parties to amend Article 16 (see sub-section 6.5.3.2).[106] The Assembly is also tasked by the Review Conference with reviewing its decision to retain Article 124 at its 14th session. This opens the door once more to strike out probably the most disturbing compromise reached in Rome.[107]

The Assembly's approach to the Review Conference proposals prevented the agenda of the first Review Conference from being overburdened and established mechanisms for the Assembly to consider the remaining and new proposals.

6.5.2 Expediting the ICC's proceedings

Although concerns relating to the slow progress of the ICC's cases had been raised in the course of the ICC's first trials,[108] the issue came to the fore following the completion of the first ICC trial of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo in March 2012.[109] Around the same time, the Study Group on Governance decided to focus on expediting the criminal process,[110] and requested the ICC take stock of the lessons learnt in its ten years of operation and to reflect on measures that could be taken to expedite the

[104] Ibid., 53.

[105] Review Conference, ICC–ASP/8/Res.6, 26 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP) para. 4. Although the Assembly can itself consider and adopt amendments, Art 123(2) Rome Statute also provides that a majority of States Parties may convene future review conferences.

[106] Decision on the progress report of the African Commission on the implementation of the decisions on the ICC Doc Assembly/AU/13(XXII), Assembly/AU/Dec.493(XXII), 30–1 January 2014 (Twenty-Second Ordinary Session of the Assembly of the AU), 'African States Parties should… continue to speak with one voice to ensure that the African proposals for amendments to Articles 16 and 27 of the Rome Statute of the ICC are considered by the ASP Working Group on Amendments as well as by the forthcoming sessions of the Assembly of States Parties (ASP) to the Rome Statute.'

[107] Art 124 Resolution RC/Res.4, 10 June 2010 (Eleventh Session of the ASP). Art 124 permits a state on becoming party to the Rome Statute to declare that it does not accept the jurisdiction of the ICC with respect to war crimes for a period of seven years after the Statute enters into force for it. Amnesty International labelled Art 124 the 'licence to kill' provision; see for example Amnesty International, 'International Criminal Court: Making the Right Choices at the Review Conference' (2010) IOR 40/008/2010, 10.

[108] See e.g. War Crimes Research Project, 'Expediting Proceedings at the International Criminal Court' June 2011 <http://www.wcl.american.edu/warcrimes/icc/documents/1106report.pdf> accessed 11 March 2014.

[109] A number of commentators have expressed the view that the period of six years to complete the trial following his surrender to the ICC in 2006 was too long; see for example International Bar Association, 'ICC's Landmark Lubanga Trial: 'Lessons to be Learnt' <http://www.ibanet.org/Article/Detail.aspx?ArticleUid=e7480ace-66aa-4650-8573-2ad0b89be23c> accessed 10 March 2014; S Horton 'Unimaginable Atrocities: Six Questions for Bill Schabas' (Harpers Magazine, 18 May 2012) <http://harpers.org/blog/2012/05/_unimaginable-atrocities_-six-questions-for-william-schabas/> accessed 11 March 2014, '[n]obody should wait six years in jail for their trial to take place'.

[110] Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, ICC–ASP/11/31, 14–22 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP) para. 5.

judicial proceedings and enhance their efficiency.[111] In response, the ICC adopted a roadmap identifying 23 issues related to the Rules that require examination[112] and established a Working Group on Lessons Learnt, which is open to all interested ICC judges, to determine whether amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence are required.[113] At least five judges must support an amendment before it can be taken forward.[114] The initiative has been supported by the Assembly.[115] So far, the Working Group has submitted three proposals which have been reviewed and adopted by the Assembly:

- Rule 132 was amended at the 11th session, providing that some functions of the Trial Chamber, in respect of trial preparation, may be exercised by a Single Judge.[116]
- Rule 68 was amended at the 12th session, expanding the ability of the Trial Chamber in some circumstances to introduce previously recorded audio or video testimony of a witness, or the transcript or other documented evidence of such testimony.[117]
- Rule 100 was amended at the 12th session, tasking the Presidency, pursuant to a recommendation of a Chamber, to authorize hearings in a state other than the host state.[118]

Although the Assembly endorsed the roadmap and commended the Court on the proposals submitted to date,[119] some States Parties are becoming impatient at the relatively slow pace of change. During the 12th session, the Netherlands, Sweden, and the United Kingdom circulated an 'Action Plan for expediting the criminal process of the International Criminal Court' which calls for the work to be accelerated and for the ICC and the Study Group on Governance to focus in 2014 on the 'Pre-Trial and Trial relationship and common issues'.[120] It is likely that this initiative will seek to confront the long pre-trial process and, in particular, the length of time it has taken in the cases so far to proceed to trial following confirmation of charges decisions. It also indicates that States Parties may present concrete proposals for amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and does not exclude amendments to the Statute. It is a bold move which may seek to reopen the carefully crafted compromise reached in Rome between proponents of the different legal systems. How far the initiative advances

[111] Study Group on Governance: Lessons Learnt: First Report of the Court to the Assembly of States Parties, ICC–ASP/11/31/Add.1, 14–22 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP) para. 1.

[112] Ibid., Annex. [113] Ibid, para. 13. [114] Ibid., para. 15.

[115] Strengthening the ICC and the ASP (2011) (n 30) para. 38.

[116] Amendment to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC–ASP/11/Res.2, 21 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP).

[117] Amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC–ASP/12/Res.7, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP) para. 2. The International Bar Association called on Trial Chambers to 'exercise caution in its application of Rule 68' recognizing fundamental fair trial guarantees, see 'IBA ICC Programme briefing note, Rule 68 Amendment Proposal', November 2013.

[118] Amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (n 117) para. 1, previously, the plenary of judges made such decisions.

[119] Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/11/Res.8, 21 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 41.

[120] Details of the proposal are available at <http://www.diplomatmagazine.nl/2013/11/27/4958/> accessed 28 January 2014.

depends on whether there is sufficient dissatisfaction with the current system amongst advocates from all legal traditions to consider changing it.

Although it could be argued that a number of the problems regarding the length of the ICC's proceedings arise from the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and could have been addressed by the Assembly much earlier, the Assembly has been relatively quick to respond to the delays that have arisen in the Court's first cases. The processes that they have prompted and the discussions that the Assembly is now engaged in with the ICC to expedite the process have the potential to positively impact the efficiency of the Court and safeguard the right of the accused to be tried without undue delay. Caution will need to be exercised, however, to ensure that the focus remains on improving the procedures and that the rights of the accused and victims are respected.

6.5.3 Amendments arising from some African states' concerns regarding the ICC's cases

In October 2013, the AU convened an extraordinary session to discuss concerns about the ICC's cases, including the then scheduled start of the ICC's case against Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta.[121] It issued a decision that any serving AU head of state or government or anybody acting or entitled to act in such capacity must not be prosecuted by the ICC and that AU members should propose amendments to the Rome Statute.[122]

6.5.3.1 Amendments to Rule 134 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence

In an effort to address specific concerns raised in the AU Decision that the ICC's cases against the President and Deputy President of Kenya were distracting and preventing them from fulfilling their constitutional duties,[123] Botswana, Liechtenstein, and Jordan took the initiative to propose amendments to Rule 134 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, including to codify elements of a decision of the Appeals Chamber in October 2013 relating to the request of the Deputy President of Kenya to be excused from continuous presence at his trial.[124] That decision found the requirement in Article 63(1) that '[t]he accused shall be present during the trial' not to be an absolute bar to the continuation of trial proceedings in the absence of the accused,[125] and set out six criteria which, if fulfilled, could lead to an accused being excused from being physically present.[126] The proposal also introduced new rules providing [121] At the time the extraordinary session was held, the trial of Uhuru Kenyatta was scheduled to commence on 12 November 2013. That date was subsequently vacated.

[122] Decision on Africa's Relationship with the International Criminal Court, Ext/Assembly/AU/Dec.1, 12 October 2013 (Extraordinary Session on the Assembly of the African Union) para. 10 ('African Union's October 2013 Decision').

[123] Ibid., paras 4–7.

[124] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber V(a) of 18 June 2013 entitled 'Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, AC, ICC, 25 October 2013.

[125] Ibid., para. 1.

[126] Ibid., para. 2

> (i) the absence of the accused can only take place in exceptional circumstances and must not become the rule; (ii) the possibility of alternative measures must have been considered, for the participation at trial through communication technology, such as a video link. It was generally a positive effort to engage with the AU's concerns without interfering in the ICC's cases. However, simply codifying existing jurisprudence, which had established such strict conditions for excusal, was not acceptable to the Kenyan government.

Driven by an apparent determination to offer something to appease the AU's concerns, the Assembly eventually adopted an additional provision, Rule 134 quater, which provides for the excusal from presence at trial of a person who is appearing by summons and mandated to fulfil extraordinary public duties at the highest national level.[127] Such persons can apply for an excusal and, if alternative measures are inadequate, the Chamber shall grant the request 'where it determines that it is in the interests of justice and the rights of the accused are fully ensured'.[128] The fact that Rule 134 quater has been adopted as a separate paragraph and without cross-reference to Rule 134 ter (which largely codifies the Appeals Chamber's Decision) demonstrates that the Assembly intended Rule 134 quater to exist as a distinct provision and to establish a special test for the excusal from presence at trial of a person who performs extraordinary public duties at the highest national level.[129] Although some elements of the Appeals Chamber's test are incorporated into Rule 134 quater, the Rule deviates from the jurisprudence in a number of ways. In particular, it omits the requirement that an accused who is mandated to fulfil extraordinary public duties at the highest national level must have 'exceptional circumstances' to request the excusal. Indeed, the reasons for the request are not mentioned—establishing status is sufficient. It also omits the requirement that '[a]ny absence must be limited to what is strictly necessary and must not become the rule'. Taken together, these omissions imply that requests may be granted based on status rather than reason and possibly for indefinite periods. Indeed, immediately following the Assembly's session, the Deputy President of Kenya applied for a broad excusal from attending his trial based on the new Rule.[130] That application was conditionally granted by the Trial Chamber.[131] The Prosecution applied for leave to appeal the decision on the basis that the Rule is inconsistent with Article 63(1), Article 27(1), and Article 23(1) and according to Article 51(5), in the event of conflict > including, but not limited to, changes to the trial schedule or a short adjournment of the trial; (iii) any absence must be limited to that which is strictly necessary; (iv) the accused must have explicitly waived his or her right to be present at trial; (v) the rights of the accused must be fully ensured in his or her absence, in particular through representation by counsel; and (vi) the decision as to whether the accused may be excused from attending part of his or her trial must be taken on a case-by-case basis, with due regard to the subject matter of the specific hearings that the accused would not attend during the period for which excusal has been requested.

[127] Amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (n 117).

[128] Rule 134 quater (2).

[129] The Trial Chamber found that Rule 134 quater is distinct from Rule 134 ter; see Reasons for the Decision on Excusal from Presence at Trial under Rule 134 quater, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1186, TC V(A), ICC, 18 February 2014, paras 50–2.

[130] Defence request pursuant to Art 63(1) of the Rome Statute and Rule 134 quater of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence to excuse Mr William Samoei Ruto from attendance at trial, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1124, Defence of Mr Ruto, 16 December 2013.

[131] The decision was delivered during a status conference on 15 January 2014. It requires that he must attend a number of hearings during the trial. The Trial Chamber's reasons are set out in: Reasons for the Decision on Excusal from Presence at Trial under Rule 134 quater, Ruto and Sang (n 129).

between the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the Statute must prevail.[132] However, the application for leave was denied.[133]

Debate on whether Rule 134 quater is consistent with the Statute will no doubt continue and the matter may also arise in the future in the ICC's cases. However, independent of the specific legal issue, the Assembly's approach to the amendment still raises significant questions. At the time the Assembly negotiated and adopted the Rule, it was clear that it went beyond the Appeals Chamber's general interpretation of Article 63(1) in its October 2013 Decision and the test it established for determining excusal requests. It is easy to understand how States Parties faced with strong regional concerns, including efforts to call for African states to withdraw from the Rome Statute,[134] have endeavoured to address those concerns and offer some compromise. Rule 134 quater is less problematic than other proposals discussed at the 12th session and does provide the judges with some discretion.[135] However, had the ICC decided that the Rule is inconsistent with Articles 63(1), 27(1), or 23(1), as some, including the prosecutor, have strongly argued, and refused to grant the request, it may have generated an even stronger political backlash from some African states, more efforts to undermine the ICC, and additional pressure for the Assembly to take further measures that undermine the integrity of the Statute and the effectiveness of the Court.

6.5.3.2 Kenyan and AU States Parties' proposals to amend the Rome Statute

On the back of the AU's October 2013 Decision,[136] Kenya submitted five new proposals to amend the Rome Statute shortly before the commencement of the 12th session. As they were not submitted three months in advance of the session, in accordance with Article 121(2), they were not formally considered by the Assembly but may be considered at either a special session of the Assembly[137] or at its 13th session in December 2014. Kenya has proposed to amend:

[132] Prosecution's application for leave to appeal the decision on excusal from presence at trial under Rule 134 quater, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1189, OTP, ICC, 24 February 2014.

[133] Decision on 'Prosecution's application for leave to appeal the decision on excusal from presence at trial under Rule 134 quater', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1246, TC V(A), ICC, 2 April 2014, Judge Olga Herrera Carbuccia dissenting.

[134] See e.g. Amnesty International, 'African States Must Reject Calls to Withdraw from the ICC' (10 October 2013).

[135] For example, one proposal by Kenya during the negotiations stated: '[n]otwithstanding paragraphs 1 to 3 above, an accused person who is a sitting Head of State or Government, or a person entitled to act in such capacity, having received summons to appear and submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court, may appear throughout the trial by Counsel. Such a person, who elects to appear by Counsel, will by notice in writing inform the Trial Chamber.' This and other proposals sought to provide for excusals without a request being made or the Trial Chamber making a determination on the request. Rule 134 quater (2) adopted by the Assembly requires a request and provides that the Trial Chamber shall grant it 'where it determines that it is in the interests of justice and provided that the rights of the accused are fully ensured'.

[136] AU's October 2013 Decision (n 122) para. 10(vi) 'Now decides… that African States Parties propose relevant amendments to the Rome Statute, in accordance with Article 121 of the Statute.'

[137] Art 112(6) Rome Statute requires that special sessions 'shall be convened by the Bureau on its own initiative or at the request of one third of the States Parties'.

- The Preamble to emphasize that the ICC is complementary to regional as well as national criminal courts;[138]
- Article 27 to preclude the ICC from prosecuting sitting heads of state or government;[139]
- Article 63 to reflect that a Trial Chamber may excuse an accused person in exceptional circumstances from being continuously present at their trial;[140]
- Article 70 to clarify that offences against the administration of justice can be committed by ICC officials so that 'either party to the proceedings can approach the Court when such offences are committed';[141]
- Article 112 to operationalize the IOM.[142]

How the Assembly deals with each of these proposals, including whether it convenes a special session, remains to be seen. Notably, the AU has only called on its members to support the proposed amendment to Article 27.[143] Its support for this proposal is unsurprising as it directly addresses the central assertion of its October 2013 Decision that sitting heads of state should have immunity from prosecution before the ICC. However, that political position contradicts the central principle of the Article that official capacity 'shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under the Statute'. This is one of the cornerstones of the Rome Statute and vital to achieving its object and purpose is to ensure that 'the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole must not go unpunished' and 'to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes'.[144] To promote amendments to Article

[138] United Nations, Kenya: proposal for amendments, C.N.1026.2013.TREATIES-XVIII.10 (Depositary Notification), 14 March 2014 <https://treaties.un.org/doc/Publication/CN/2013/CN.1026.2013-Eng.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014. The proposal is to amend the Preamble to state '[e]mphasizing that the International Criminal Court established under this Statute shall be complementary to national and regional criminal jurisdictions' (addition in italics).

[139] Ibid. The proposal is to insert a new paragraph 27(3) which states '[n]otwithstanding paragraph 1 and 2 above, serving Heads of State, their deputies and anybody acting or is entitled to act as such may be exempt from prosecution during their current term of office. Such an exemption may be renewed by the Court under the same conditions.'

[140] Ibid. The proposal is to amend Art 63(2) to state:

> Notwithstanding article 63(1), an accused may be excused from continuous presence in the Court after the Chamber satisfies itself that exceptional circumstances exist, [and] alternative measures have been put in place and considered, including but not limited to changes to the trial schedule or temporary adjournment or attendance through the use of communications technology or through representation of Counsel.
>
> (2) Any such absence shall be considered on a case-by-case basis and be limited to that which is strictly necessary.
>
> (3) The Trial chamber shall only grant the request if it determines that such exceptional circumstances exist and if the rights of the accused are fully ensured in his or her absence, in particular through representation by counsel and that the accused has explicitly waived his right to be present at trial.

[141] Ibid. The proposal is to amend Art 70(1) to state '[t]he Court shall have jurisdiction over the following offences against its administration of justice when committed intentionally by any person' (addition in italics).

[142] Ibid., providing no amendments to the text of the Statute, the proposal only states '[i]t is proposed that IOM be operationalized and empowered to carry out inspection, evaluation and investigations of all the organs of the Court'.

[143] Decision on the progress report of the Commission on the implementation of its decisions on the ICC Doc Assembly/AU/13(XXII) (n 106) para. 12(1).

[144] Preamble.

27, the AU requested a Special Segment at the 12th session to discuss 'Indictment of sitting Heads of State and Government and its consequences on peace and stability and reconciliation', which was approved by the Bureau.[145] The moderator's summary of the Special Segment states that the 'debate seemed to indicate that any substantive change to the Rome Statute was unlikely to materialize in the near future', particularly taking into account that it would require a two-thirds majority of the Assembly to be adopted and seven-eighths of the Assembly would need to ratify the amendment in order for it to enter into force.[146]

In addition, the AU has also called for renewed support for its members' previous proposal to the Review Conference to amend Article 16 to empower the United Nations General Assembly to defer ICC investigations and prosecutions, if the Security Council fails to decide on a request within six months.[147] The proposal, which seeks to expand the potential for political interference in the ICC's investigations and prosecutions, met strong opposition when the Assembly considered it in advance of the Review Conference.[148] This is unlikely to change.

The AU's Decision to promote amendments to Articles 16 and 27, despite the fact that both appear destined to fail, does not mean that they are harmless initiatives. If other States Parties do not reject the efforts convincingly, there is a danger that any future discussions or the outcomes of votes on the proposals could be used to exert political pressure on the prosecutor and the judges, justify non-cooperation, undermine the legitimacy of the ICC to prosecute sitting heads of state, and fuel efforts, including before other courts and bodies, to erode the principle agreed in Rome that no one can be above the law. Indeed, during the Special Segment, some states implied that the prosecutor should use her discretion to achieve the delicate balancing act to achieve the fight against impunity on the one hand, and peace and stability on the other.[149] Such statements risk being interpreted as inappropriate political pressure regarding the ICC's current and future cases relating to heads of state. The proposals may also prompt efforts for further questionable rule changes.[150]

[145] Bureau of the Assembly of States Parties, Agenda and Decisions, Twelfth meeting, 1 November 2013.

[146] Special segment as requested by the AU: 'Indictment of sitting Heads of State and Government and its consequences on peace and stability and reconciliation', Informal summary by the Moderator, ICC–ASP/12/61, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties).

[147] See Report of the Working Group on the Review Conference (n 101) 70.

[148] Ibid., paras 60–1, '[c]oncern was expressed that the proposal broadened the scope for political interference with the activity of the Court.… Doubts were raised as to whether the provision would be compatible with the Charter of the United Nations… [t]he view was expressed that an expansion of that provision would not serve the interest of the Court and could not, therefore, be supported by States Parties.'

[149] Informal summary by the Moderator (n 146) para. 9; the Moderator summarizes the discussion as follows: '[t]here was a discussion regarding the delicate balancing act required to achieve the objectives of the fight against impunity on the one hand, and peace and stability on the other. It was recognized that this constituted a challenge in the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. The appropriate evidential threshold was an issue to be taken into consideration in this context. It was moreover emphasized that deciding whether it was opportune and timely to proceed with an indictment was a difficult question faced by prosecutors before any criminal judicial organ.'

[150] Informal summary by the Moderator (n 146) para. 8: '[o]ne such avenue was the possibility of amending the Rules of Procedure and Evidence in order to ensure the necessary degree of flexibility when dealing with specific circumstances which could not have been foreseen when the Statute was adopted'.

The other Kenyan proposals, which are potentially less controversial, raise broader questions about the Assembly's approach to amendments, including whether it should maintain its generally cautious approach. The proposal to amend Article 63(2) largely seeks to incorporate the Appeals Chamber's Decision on excusals.[151] It raises the question as to whether and in what circumstances the Assembly should amend the Statute to reflect the Court's jurisprudence. This is a complex issue that needs to balance, on the one hand, the need in some circumstances to provide certainty on specific issues and, on the other, to allow the Court the space to further develop its jurisprudence and practice. The proposal also raises broader questions about the relationship between the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and the order of amendments to both. As most aspects of the proposal are already reflected in Rule 134 ter, it is reasonable to ask whether an amendment to the Statute is necessary and, if so, whether, taking into account Article 51(5),[152] the Assembly should have amended the Statute first and then the Rules.

The proposal to amend Article 70 seeks to clarify that ICC officials suspected of offences against the administration of justice are not currently excluded from the jurisdiction of the Court by the Statute. However, a plain reading of Article 70 does not exclude ICC officials and there do not appear to be any barriers that prevent the defence from bringing allegations of such offences to the attention of the Court. The proposal essentially seeks to introduce certainty and preclude alternative interpretations. The necessity of this proposed amendment is therefore questionable. There are many other more ambiguous provisions in the Rome Statute. Indeed, the drafters' use of 'constructive ambiguity' in many parts of the Rome Statute is regularly acknowledged. Some of these issues have been clarified in the drafting of the supplementary texts[153] and some have been deliberately left for the Court to address.[154] Of course, amendments can also possibly be a useful tool. The Assembly needs to consider though, in what circumstances such amendments are appropriate.

Another proposal relates to the amendment of Article 112, which seeks to operationalize the IOM. The exact proposal is not clearly articulated, but it nevertheless raises the question as to whether the IOM and other subsidiary bodies of the Assembly should be incorporated in the Statute. The IOM is of course already expressly recognized in Article 112(4). Moreover, the Assembly operationalized the IOM at its 12th session and it has established three other subsidiary bodies without amendments. These factors raise questions about the necessity of this proposed amendment. However, given the rocky road towards establishing and operationalizing the IOM [151] The proposal does not appear to incorporate Rule 134 quater.

[152] Art 51(5) Rome Statute states, '[i]n the event of a conflict between the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the Statute shall prevail'.

[153] B Taylor III, 'Demystifying the Procedural Framework of the International Criminal Court: A Modest Proposal for Radical Revision' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009).

[154] See L Sadat and R Carden, 'The New International Criminal Court: An Uneasy Revolution' (2000) 88 Georgetown Law Journal 381, 409 n 166; C Kress, 'The Procedural Law of the International Criminal Court in Outline: Anatomy of a Unique Compromise' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 603, 605–6.

and the potential for disputes to recur,[155] it could be argued that there is a basis for the IOM's legal status, authority, capacity, and powers to be contained in the Statute.

The proposal to amend the Preamble to emphasize that the ICC is complementary to regional as well as national criminal courts (such as the proposed expanded mandate of the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights) raises and fails to resolve complex questions regarding the relationship of any future regional criminal courts with the ICC and national justice systems. At present, other international and internationalized criminal courts are dealing with crimes that fall outside the jurisdiction of the ICC. The Assembly will need to consider whether it is necessary to define the relationship of the ICC with future international or regional criminal courts that may have jurisdiction over the same crimes as the ICC. If so, it will need to consider a number of issues, including admissibility, jurisdiction, competing requests, and cooperation.

Given that these proposals have been presented in the context of political efforts by the Kenyan government and the AU to stop the ICC's cases against the President and Deputy President of Kenya, the Assembly would be wise to continue adopting a cautious approach to amendments. The Assembly must continue to preserve the integrity of the Rome Statute by rejecting proposals like those to Articles 16 and 27 that seek to weaken the ICC's efforts to address impunity. To ensure that the Assembly is consistent and that it makes decisions focused on improving the Rome Statute, and that it is not merely responding to politicized demands, the Assembly should consider establishing general principles to guide its approach to amendments in considering the other Kenya proposals. It would be particularly important to establish when the Assembly will adopt amendments that seek to reflect the Court's jurisprudence and clarifications to provisions that are potentially ambiguous. Amendments should only be supported where it is demonstrated that they strengthen the Rome Statute system and the fight against impunity.

6.6 Elections

Electing the highest qualified senior officials to the ICC is among of the Assembly's most important responsibilities. Simply put, the quality of the leadership of the ICC (including the judges, the prosecutor, and deputy prosecutors elected by the Assembly) will decide whether the Court succeeds or fails. In its first 12 sessions, the Assembly conducted elections for 39 judicial vacancies and elected two successive prosecutors and three deputy prosecutors of the ICC.[156] It has also provided recommendations for the election of the Registrar by the plenary of judges.[157]

[155] See section 6.3.2, this chapter.

[156] See the Assembly's elections webpage <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/elections/judges/2013/Pages/2013.aspx> accessed 4 February 2014.

[157] To date this has been limited primarily to recommending criteria to be applied in the election rather than recommendations in relation to candidates, see Recommendation concerning the election of the Registrar of the International Criminal Court ICC–ASP/6/Rec.1 (Sixth Session of the Assembly of States Parties); Recommendation concerning the election of the Registrar of the International Criminal Court, ICC–ASP/11/Rec.1, 21 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties).

6.6.1 Elections of judges

In advance of the election of the first ICC judges in 2003, the Assembly developed an innovative minimum voting requirement system to achieve equitable geographical representation and a fair representation of female and male judges,[158] as well as judges with established competence in criminal law and procedure (list A) and international law (list B).[159] Instead of leaving it to States Parties to incorporate these criteria in their secret ballot choices, States Parties were required to vote for a minimum number of candidates from each region, list A and B, and a minimum number of women in the first four rounds of an election.[160] The requirements would be adjusted according to the overall composition of the elected and serving judges.[161] However, the Assembly initially put off establishing an Advisory Committee on Nominations foreseen in Article 36(4)(c) to review the qualifications of the nominees.[162]

The new system was considered to work relatively successfully in the first election. Seven women were elected, which was a significant improvement on elections for many other international courts,[163] but fell short of gender parity, which is arguably a logical interpretation of 'fair representation'. Judges from all regions were elected; however, the Western Europe and Other Governments group still held seven of the positions, more than other regions.[164] Even greater balance has emerged over time, though. At the time of writing, women hold ten of the 18 judicial positions and states have been required in recent elections to vote for a minimum number of men.[165] All regions hold at least three judicial positions and the number of judges from Western Europe and Other Governments is five. The reasons for this adjustment are not immediately clear and further examination of States Parties' motives is required. However, it is reasonable to assume that minimum voting requirements have contributed by ensuring that the criteria of gender and regional representation are given a high profile during [158] Required by Art 36(8)(a)(ii) and (iii) Rome Statute.

[159] Art 36(5) Rome Statute requires that '[a]t the first election to the Court, at least nine judges shall be elected from list A and at least five from list B. Subsequent elections shall be so organized as to maintain the equivalent proportion on the Court of judges qualified to the two lists.'

[160] Procedure for the election of the judges for the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/1/Res.3, 9 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties) paras 3 and 7.

[161] Ibid., paras 6–7.

[162] Project on International Courts and Tribunals, The International Criminal Court Nomination and Election of Judges: A Discussion paper by Thordis Ingadottir (June 2002) 5, '[a]t the last session of the Preparatory Commission, some delegations expressed skepticism about the establishment and use of an Advisory Committee. Some had doubts regarding the necessity, competence, and composition of such a committee, while others thought time constraints would preclude its establishment for the first elections of the Court.'

[163] 'First 18 judges elected to the International Criminal Court', Coalition for the International Criminal Court Press Release, 7 February 2003, quotes the Programme Director of the Women's Caucus for Gender Justice stating: '[t]his is an unprecedented level of gender diversity in an international judicial institution'.

[164] The first 18 judges were made up of: three Africans; four Latin Americans; seven Western European and other governments; three Asians; and one Eastern European.

[165] Election of judges for the ICC: guide for fourth election, ICC–ASP/10/19, 12–21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties). Since the minimum voting requirements have swung to the advantage of males from 2011, only two women have been nominated compared to 19 males, although it should be noted that both female candidates were subsequently elected.

elections.[166] The minimum voting requirements have also contributed to ensuring that the requirements of Article 36(5) to elect at least nine judges from list A and at least five from list B are met. There are currently ten judges elected to the ICC from list A and five from list B.[167]

The system, however, did not seek to introduce safeguards to ensure that the highest qualified candidates for judges are nominated and elected. On the contrary, despite the positive contribution of minimum voting requirements, they may also encourage regions to nominate only small numbers of candidates in order to benefit from the mandatory votes rather than encouraging more states to put forward their best candidates for the Assembly to choose from. Most States Parties have failed to establish transparent, structured, and independent national processes to identify highly qualified candidates.[168] As a result, most nominations are made in informal processes without consultation with civil society or the candidate being thoroughly vetted nationally to ensure they are the best available.[169] Furthermore, the practice of vote trading in international elections continues to be employed in ICC elections, indicating that many States Parties cannot be trusted to vet nominees and vote for the best candidates on their merits.[170]

In 2011, largely prompted by the CICC's initiative to establish an Independent Panel of International Criminal Court Judicial Elections to evaluate candidates nominated for the election of six judicial vacancies at the tenth session,[171] the Assembly finally established an Advisory Committee on Nominations. The Advisory Committee is an important addition to the framework that will examine the qualifications of nominees and make it more difficult for states to ignore them in deciding their votes. It conducted its first evaluation of candidates for the election of one judicial vacancy at the 12th session.[172] However, it is not a complete solution.[173] The broader and more complex challenge remains to encourage more States Parties to search for and nominate the best candidates for elections in transparent national processes and to stigmatize the practice [166] R MacKenzie et al., A Study of States' Approaches to Elections in Selecting International Judges: Principle, Process and Politics (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 83, 'it is generally considered to be "an advantage" to be a female candidate in an [ICC] election'.

[167] The election of list B candidates who may not necessarily have courtroom experience has been questioned in recent years, see e.g. H Correll 'Foreword' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012).

[168] MacKenzie et al. (n 166) 93.

[169] Ibid., 84 '[i]n the absence of any obligation to declare which procedure is being used, and the option of using national judicial nomination procedures, many different procedures have been used, some of which may barely be said to amount to a "procedure" at all. In most states in the study, the nomination decision was made by just one or two government officials with no broader consultation.'

[170] Ibid., 122–7, 'the interview evidence suggests strongly that most states conclude mutual support arrangements for judicial candidatures on reciprocal political grounds that often do not take into account issues of qualifications'.

[171] See Announcement to the Assembly of State Parties on the Independent Panel on International Criminal Court Judicial Elections, December 2010 <http://www.iccnow.org/documents/Judicial_Panel_Announcement.pdf> accessed 4 February 2014.

[172] Report of the Advisory Committee on Nomination of Judges on the work of its second meeting, ICC–ASP/12/47, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) Annex 1.

[173] During the election of judges at the tenth session, two candidates who were assessed by the Independent Panel to be 'not qualified' received more than 30 votes in several rounds of ballots and one candidate received 51 votes in one round, although none of those identified as 'not qualified' were ultimately elected.

of vote trading. As the first President of the Assembly stated on behalf of the government of Jordan to the general debate at the tenth session: '[t]here is no humiliation quite like a successful election being succeeded by a wholly incompetent courtroom performance, resulting in possible appeals, and even ultimately a possible denial of justice for victims'.[174]

Importantly, at its 11th session, the Assembly decided to continue to review the procedure for the nomination and election of ICC judges.[175] A number of proposals are already being considered to further improve the system.[176]

6.6.2 Elections of the prosecutor and the deputy prosecutors

The Assembly Decision at its first session to make every effort to elect the ICC prosecutor by consensus has presented a number of difficult challenges in electing the first two prosecutors of the ICC.[177] In contrast, elections of deputy prosecutors which follow a clearly defined process whereby the prosecutor nominates three candidates who are presented to the Assembly for a contested election, without efforts to find consensus, have proved less controversial.

The first prosecutor was elected following a predominantly behind the scenes search process, which made it difficult to include all States Parties and for highly qualified candidates to put themselves forward. By the time it came to electing the second prosecutor in 2011, the Bureau endeavoured to establish a new process recognizing the unique importance of the position.[178] It established a Search Committee mandated to 'facilitate the nomination and election, by consensus, of the next Prosecutor'.[179] It was specifically tasked with (i) receiving expressions of interest; (ii) actively identifying and informally approaching individuals who may satisfy the applicable criteria, in particular those contained in Article 42 of the Rome Statute, to see if they would express interest; (iii) reviewing the expressions of interest in light of the relevant criteria; and (iv) producing a shortlist of at least three suitable candidates for consideration by the Bureau.[180] The Committee identified 51 candidates, interviewed eight and presented a shortlist of four to the Assembly less than two months in advance of the tenth session.[181]

[174] Statement by Jordan to the General Debate of the tenth session, 14 December 2011.

[175] Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties (2012) (n 119) para. 23.

[176] See Report to the Bureau on the review of the procedure for the nomination and election of judges, ICC–ASP/12/57, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties).

[177] Procedure for the nomination and election of judges, the Prosecutor and Deputy Prosecutors of the International Criminal Court, ICC–ASP/1/Res.2, 9 September 2002 (Third Session of the Assembly of States parties) para. 29.

[178] Fourteenth ICC–ASP Bureau Meeting, Agenda and Decisions, 5 October 2010, 3 '[t]he Bureau expressed its understanding that a consensus candidate should be found and that the unique nature and importance of the position would warrant a process that was different from the usual manner in which candidatures are presented in international organizations'.

[179] Bureau of the Assembly of States Parties: Search Committee for the position of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court: Terms of Reference, ICC–ASP/9/INF.2, 6–10 December 2010 (Ninth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 5.

[180] Ibid., para. 6.

[181] Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, 'Official Records: Tenth Session, New York, 12–21 December 2011', vol. I, 10–11.

At that point, informal consultations began to establish consensus which led to the formal nomination and election by consensus of Fatou Bensouda.

Despite the consensus within the Assembly and clear support for the new prosecutor,[182] a number of states and some NGOs expressed dissatisfaction with the process.[183] Some of the criticism of the process has merit. First, the Search Committee was composed of only men. Second, it was arguably established too late and presented its shortlist too close to the tenth session. Third, it was unclear what capacity the members were serving in. Although the Search Committee's report states that they served in their personal capacities, not as state representatives,[184] its Terms of Reference expressly states that they are 'representatives' from regional groups.[185] Fourth, the process could arguably have been more transparent. Only the identities of the four shortlisted candidates were made public.[186]

Some States Parties also complained that the process was not consistent with the Rome Statute and that it is the responsibility of States Parties to identify and nominate candidates to be elected in a secret ballot, in accordance with Article 42(4).[187] Indeed, States Parties were urged to respect the Search Committee process and refrain from making nominations.[188] In June 2011 the AU approved the then Deputy Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda as the sole African candidate, which arguably undermined the search process.[189]

A clear tension exists between the competitive secret ballot process set out in Article 42(4) and the subsequent political decision taken by the Assembly to try to elect the prosecutor by consensus. It is easy to understand why the Assembly wants to find a candidate for this most important position who enjoys universal support from States Parties. The election of candidates who enjoy such broad support from States Parties has the potential to positively impact on perceptions of and support for the ICC. Equally, a search process that considers candidates who may otherwise not be nominated by their own governments for political reasons is essential. However, unless the process to find consensus has the full support of States Parties, it can be counter-productive and susceptible to being undermined. An evaluation

[182] Report of the Evaluation of the process on the election of the Prosecutor, ICC–ASP/12/58, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 8 '[a]lthough not sharing the views regarding the work of the Search Committee, all States emphasized that the new Prosecutor is a highly competent person, with high moral character and extensive practical experience; and they extended their full support to her'.

[183] Ibid., paras 11–17; Amnesty International, 'International Criminal Court: Recommendations to the Assembly of States Parties at its tenth session (12 to 21 December 2011)' (December 2011) 4–5.

[184] Report of the Search Committee for the position of Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (25 October 2011) para. 10.

[185] Bureau of the Assembly of States Parties: Search Committee for the position of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (n 179) para. 4.

[186] Report of the Evaluation of the process on the election of the Prosecutor (n 182) para. 11, 'although it was agreed that some level of confidentiality of candidates was required, some argued that the confidentiality should have been lifted as some point earlier in the process'.

[187] Ibid., para. 12.

[188] See for example Twelfth ICC–ASP Bureau Meeting, Agenda and Decisions, 8 September 2011, 1.

[189] Decision on African Candidatures for posts within the international system Doc EX.CL/673(XIX), EX.CL/Dec.664(XIX), 23–8 June 2011 (Nineteenth Ordinary Session of the Executive Council of the African Union).

of the selection process reported in 2013 that States Parties remain divided on how to improve the process and efforts to find a way forward have been put off until the election of the next prosecutor.[190] This is unfortunate as there are potentially a number of areas where progress should be possible. In particular, changes could have been explored to build more trust and support for the work of possible future search mechanisms by developing better safeguards to ensure their independence, transparency, and competency. The timelines of the process could also have been considered to ensure that sufficient time is allocated for the Search Committee to conduct and complete its work and to present its shortlist well in advance of elections so that States Parties still have the opportunity to nominate other candidates, if they wish. Such solutions should be considered well in advance of the commencement of the next election process.

6.7 Responding to Non-Cooperation

Efforts by Sudanese President Omar Al Bashir to continue to travel after the ICC issued an arrest warrant against him in March 2009 resulted in a number of countries, including States Parties to the Rome Statute, hosting him without threat of arrest.[191] His ability to evade justice has been supported by AU decisions that its members should not cooperate for his arrest.[192]

The negative impact of the failure to execute the arrest warrant(s) prompted the Assembly to develop and adopt procedures relating to non-cooperation at its tenth session.[193] They provide for formal and informal diplomatic and political measures to respond to situations of non-cooperation referred to the Assembly by the ICC in accordance with Article 87(5) or (7).[194] They also provide that, exceptionally, the Assembly may act informally without a referral from the ICC where 'there are reasons to believe that a specific and serious incident of non-cooperation in respect of a request for arrest and surrender of a person is about to occur or is currently on-going and urgent action by the Assembly may help bring about cooperation'.[195] The procedures provide that efforts will be led predominantly by the President of the Assembly working together with the Bureau.[196] In the case of referrals from the ICC, mechanisms may [190] Report of the Evaluation of the process on the election of the Prosecutor (n 182) para. 20.

[191] For details of Omar Al Bashir's travel since the arrest warrant was issued see <http://www.arrest-bashir.org/bashir-s-travels/> accessed 9 February 2014.

[192] Decision on the meeting of African States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), Doc. Assembly/AU/13(XIII), Assembly/AU/Dec.245(XIII) Rev.1, 1–3 July 2009 (Thirteenth Ordinary Session of the Assembly of the African Union) para. 10 'the AU Member States shall not cooperate pursuant to the provisions of Article 98 of the Rome Statute of the ICC relating to immunities, for the arrest and surrender of President Omar El Bashir of The Sudan'. A similar decision was issued in July 2011 following the ICC's decision to issue an arrest warrant against Muammar al-Gaddafi, see Decision on the Implementation of the Assembly Decisions on the International Criminal Court, Doc EX.CL/670(XIX), Assembly/AU/Dec.366(XVII), 30 June–1 July 2011 (Seventeenth Ordinary Session of the Assembly of the African Union) para. 6.

[193] Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties (2011) (n 30) Annex.

[194] Ibid., paras 7(a) and 10.

[195] Ibid., para. 7(b)

[196] Ibid., paras 14(a) and (b), 19 and 20.

also be established for the Bureau and States Parties to enter into open dialogue with the state in question.[197] The Assembly could also issue a draft resolution containing concrete recommendations on the matter.[198]

In the two years after the procedures were established, formal responses were implemented following three referrals from the ICC to the Assembly and the United Nations Security Council finding that Malawi and Chad (on two separate occasions) had failed to cooperate with the arrest and surrender of Omar Al Bashir.[199] A fourth referral of non-cooperation was made following Omar Al Bashir's visit to the Democratic Republic of the Congo in February 2014.[200]

The President of the Assembly also responded to these and other incidents, including issuing a press release around Omar Al Bashir's visit to Nigeria in July 2013 and sending a letter calling upon the government to comply fully with its Rome Statute obligations.[201] These efforts have generated mixed results. Malawi, which was at the time in a period of political transition, reacted favourably to diplomatic approaches. With a new President, the government of Malawi declined to host the Sudanese President at the next AU summit scheduled to take place in the country and led to the venue being moved.[202] Nigeria provided explanations to the ICC about its failure to arrest Al Bashir, including that 'Nigeria was considering the necessary steps to be taken in line with its international obligations' when Omar Al Bashir departed suddenly.[203] This convinced the Pre-Trial Chamber not to refer the matter to the Assembly or the Security Council.[204] In contrast, however, Chad has largely rejected diplomatic pressure, insisting that Omar Al Bashir has immunity and that it had a duty arising from AU decisions requiring its members not to cooperate with the Court pursuant to the provisions of Article 98 relating to immunities.[205] The Pre-Trial Chamber has rejected these arguments.[206]

[197] Ibid., para. 14(c) and (d). [198] Ibid., para. 14(f).

[199] Decision Pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-139, PTC I, ICC, 12 December 2011; Decision pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Refusal of the Republic of Chad to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-140, PTC I, ICC, 13 December 2011; Decision on the Non-compliance of the Republic of Chad with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court Regarding the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09, PTC II, ICC, 26 March 2013.

[200] Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-195, PTC II, ICC, 9 April 2014.

[201] Report of the Bureau on non-cooperation, ICC–ASP/12/34, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) paras 11–12.

[202] Report of the Bureau on non-cooperation, ICC–ASP/11/29, 14–22 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties) paras 5, 10, and 16.

[203] Decision on the Cooperation of the Federal Republic of Nigeria Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-159, PTC II, ICC, 5 September 2013, para. 12.

[204] Ibid., para. 13.

[205] Report of the Bureau on non-cooperation, ICC-ASP/11/29 (n 202) para. 6.

[206] Decision pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the refusal of the Republic of Chad to comply with the cooperation requests issued by the Court with respect to the arrest and surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 199) paras 12–14.

The inconsistent outcomes are not surprising. The Assembly is largely limited to exerting diplomatic pressure which will inevitably yield results with some governments but not, at least in the short term, with others. The Assembly's efforts are particularly challenging given conflicting calls by the AU for its members not to cooperate with the ICC in some cases. The positive outcomes to date demonstrate that the procedures are definitely worth pursuing. But more needs to be done to increase pressure on governments who will hold out against the Assembly's measures. Unfortunately, politics within the Assembly threatens to limit further action. For example, as Chad has relied on the AU's decisions to justify its non-cooperation, it is likely that stronger measures, such as issuing a resolution on the matter, would be blocked by some African States Parties.

The ability of the Assembly to respond to non-cooperation by non-States Parties is particularly limited and requires further action by the Security Council in relation to situations it referred to the ICC. Regrettably, to date, the Security Council has only required governments of situations it has referred to cooperate with the ICC and merely urged other non-States Parties to do so.[207] It has done nothing to respond to the ICC's referrals of non-cooperation in the Darfur situation.[208]

The current procedures are a good start and in some cases have already resulted in positive responses from governments that will hopefully ensure they are not repeated. However, as explained, the procedures also have their limitations and the Assembly should continue to build upon them in order to strengthen its advocacy. It is encouraging to note that other initiatives are being considered to approach the problem from different angles, including new efforts to develop arrest strategies.[209] States Parties to the Rome Statute that are also members of the AU have an important responsibility to challenge further calls for non-cooperation. Similarly, States Parties on the Security Council have an important role to make sure that the Council responds effectively to ICC referrals of non-cooperation.

6.8 Other Initiatives to Support the ICC and the Rome Statute System

In addition to the functions mandated to the Assembly in the Rome Statute, in its first 12 years the Assembly has on its own initiative commenced a number of other initiatives aimed at supporting the work of the ICC and the realization of the Rome Statute system. In particular, the Assembly's Decision to include stocktaking of international criminal justice as a key agenda item on the Review Conference, including debates on complementarity, cooperation, the impact of the Rome Statute system on victims and [207] Resolutions 1593 (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/RES/1593(2005) '[d]ecides that the Government of Sudan and all other parties to the conflict in Darfur, shall cooperate fully with and provide any necessary assistance to the Court and the Prosecutor pursuant to this resolution and, while recognizing that States not party to the Rome Statute have no obligation under the Statute, urges all States and concerned regional and other international organizations to cooperate fully'. Resolution 1970 on Libya (26 February 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1970 (2011) contains almost the exact same wording.

[208] Report of the Bureau on non-cooperation, ICC-ASP/11/29 (n 202) para. 11; see also Ruiz, Chapter 3, this volume.

[209] Report of the Bureau on non-cooperation, ICC-ASP/12/34 (n 201) paras 26–7.

affected communities, and peace and justice, has prompted continued discussion on some of these issues in recent Assembly sessions.[210]

6.8.1 Plan of Action for achieving universality and full implementation of the Rome Statute

At its fifth session, the Assembly established a Plan of Action for achieving universality and full implementation of the Rome Statute, asserting that both objectives are 'imperative if we are to end impunity for the perpetrators of the most serious crimes of international concern, contribute to the prevention of such crimes, and guarantee lasting respect for and enforcement of international justice'.[211] Recognizing that, since the adoption of the Rome Statute in 1998, a number of regional inter-governmental organizations, governments, and NGOs have been promoting both goals through advocacy, conferences, and technical and other assistance, the Plan seeks to promote better information sharing among those actors and to encourage more States Parties to join the effort.[212]

Regrettably, seven years later, there is little evidence that the Plan of Action has had a significant positive impact in advancing the ongoing efforts. Most States Parties are not engaged in implementing of the Plan, as demonstrated by the low number of states reporting on their activities each year.[213] Progress continues, but remains slow. Seventeen states have ratified or acceded to the Rome Statute since the adoption of the Plan of Action.[214] But, at an average of just over two per year, universality remains a distant goal. Similarly, at least 34 states have enacted some form of legislation seeking to implement the Rome Statute into national law during this period.[215] Yet, at the end of 2013, 76 of the 122 States Parties had yet to enact legislation implementing both their complementarity and cooperation obligations.[216]

There are two significant flaws in the Plan of Action. First, it relies on States Parties to take action on their own initiative, without establishing effective structures to promote initiatives or coordinate action. The Secretariat of the Assembly is tasked with the vague role of acting as a focal point for information exchange instead of a constructive mandate to promote the implementation of the Plan. Second, insufficient resources have been allocated for its implementation. For example, the Secretariat is [210] Review Conference (n 105) para. 5. See also Review Conference Stocktaking of International Criminal Justice web page <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/reviewconference/stocktaking/Pages/stocktaking.aspx> accessed 23 April 2014.

[211] Plan of Action of the Assembly of States Parties for achieving universality and full implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, ICC–ASP/5/Res.3, Annex I, 1 December 2006 (Fifth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 1.

[212] Ibid., para. 6.

[213] Assembly of State Parties website <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/sessions/plan%20of%20action/Pages/plan%20of%20action.aspx> accessed 11 February 2014, 23 States Parties replied to the Secretariat's questionnaire in 2007; 12 in 2008; 23 in 2009; 18 in 2010; 13 in 2011; 20 in 2012; and 10 in 2013.

[214] Bangladesh, Cape Verde, Chile, Côte d'Ivoire, Czech Republic, Guatemala, Grenada, Japan, Madagascar, Maldives, Moldova, Philippines, Seychelles, St Lucia, Suriname, Tunisia, and Vanuatu.

[215] Based on the Coalition for the ICC '2013 Status of the Rome Statute around the world' and updated information provided by the Coalition in April 2014.

[216] Ibid.

tasked to perform its role within existing resources and has not received any resources to implement the Plan since its adoption.[217] It is therefore largely limited to general tasks like sending annual letters to States Parties asking them to report on their activities. Unless ways are found to invigorate the Plan, it will become obsolete.

6.8.2 Promoting cooperation

To its credit, the Assembly committed early on to take additional steps to promote cooperation, beyond responding to incidents of non-cooperation, recognizing that 'cooperation between the [ICC] and States Parties, international organisations and non-governmental organisations is an essential basis for the effective functioning of the Court'.[218] In particular, it has sought to promote national implementation;[219] cooperation by the United Nations, in accordance with the Relationship Agreement;[220] and regional organizations entering into cooperation agreements.[221]

Significantly, at its fifth session, based on a thorough study conducted by the Bureau's Hague and New York Working Groups,[222] the Assembly adopted 66 recommendations on cooperation which cover a broad range of issues relating to national, regional, and international cooperation and provide a solid basis on which to develop the Assembly's work.[223] However, the large number of recommendations highlights the scope of the work ahead, which has proved difficult to organize.[224] Furthermore, the fact that many States Parties have yet to ratify the Agreement on Privileges and [217] Plan of Action of the Assembly of States Parties for achieving universality and full implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (n 211) para. 7.

[218] Report of the Bureau on cooperation, ICC-ASP/6/21, 30 November–14 December 2007 (Sixth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 1.

[219] See e.g. Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC–ASP/2/Res.7, 12 September 2003 (Second Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 3, 'ratification must be matched by national implementation of the obligations emanating therefrom'.

[220] Report of the Bureau on cooperation, ICC–ASP/6/21 (n 218) paras 60–3 provides an overview of the systems of cooperation that have been established between the ICC and the United Nations, which includes all principal organs of the UN, as well as peacekeeping operations and missions and the Funds and Programmes. At its sixth session, the ICC established, with the Assembly's support, an ICC Liaison Office in New York to enable regular and efficient cooperation and exchange of information, see Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties (2007) (n 44) para. 16.

[221] Ibid., para. 32. So far the European Union entered into an Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the European Union on cooperation and assistance in 2006. The Assembly has specifically encouraged the AU to enter into a cooperation agreement with the ICC and to establish an ICC–AU Liaison Office in Addis Ababa; see Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC–ASP/8/Res.3, 26 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 28. However, following the ICC's arrest warrant against Omar Al Bashir, these initiatives have been blocked by members of the AU; see, in relation to the liaison office, Decision on the Progress Report of the Commission on the implementation of Decision Assembly/AU/Dec.270(XIV) on the second ministerial meeting on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Doc Assembly/AU/10(XV), Assembly/AU/Dec.296(XV), 25–7 July 2010 (Fifteenth Ordinary Session of the Assembly of the African Union) para. 8 '[d]ecides for now to reject the request by ICC to open a liaison officer to the AU in Addis Ababa'.

[222] Report of the Bureau on cooperation, ICC–ASP/6/21 (n 218).

[223] Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties (2007) (n 44) Annex II.

[224] For example, at its fifth session, the Assembly identified 11 broad areas of priorities to be addressed by a new facilitator over a two-year period, Cooperation, ICC–ASP/8/Res.2, 26 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 16.

Immunities,[225] and most have yet to enact comprehensive implementing legislation or to enter into key cooperation agreements with the ICC on interim release,[226] relocation of victims and witnesses, [227] enforcement of sentences,[228] and release of persons on acquittal or non-confirmation of charges,[229] shows that the Assembly has its work cut out. Recently, the Assembly has sought to prioritize its work with mixed impact. For example, in 2011 and 2012 the Hague Working Group focused on the issue of interim release and worked with the ICC on developing a model agreement.[230] But as of April 2014, only one state—Belgium—has entered into an agreement.[231] At the time of writing, no other states are reported to be in negotiations with the Court.[232] Efforts to encourage more states to enter into victim and witness relocation agreements have been more productive.[233]

The recent inclusion of discussions on cooperation to the agenda of the Assembly's sessions provides an important forum to promote cooperation, share experiences, and discuss common challenges.[234] The Bureau is also considering other important issues, including non-essential contacts between States Parties and persons who are the subject of an ICC arrest warrant.[235] However, much of the broad body of work currently rests with one facilitator, who has had to fundraise for initiatives like seminars to promote relocation agreements.[236] It is reasonable to question whether the Assembly is investing sufficiently in its structures and activities to achieve progress at an effective rate.

6.8.3 Promoting complementarity

Following the stocktaking discussion on complementarity at the Review Conference, the Assembly began to focus on exploring further ways in which 'to enhance the capacity of national jurisdictions to investigate and prosecute serious crimes of [225] As of April 2014, 71 of the 122 States Parties to the Rome Statute and 1 non-State Party have ratified the Agreement.

[226] Only Belgium has entered into an agreement to date, see 'Belgium and ICC Sign Agreement on Interim Release of Detainees', ICC Press Release, 10 April 2014.

[227] Report of the Court on cooperation, ICC–ASP/12/35, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 30, 13 as of October 2013.

[228] Ibid., para. 35, eight as of October 2013.

[229] Ibid., para. 40, none as of October 2013, although a model agreement was only distributed by the ICC to states in September 2013.

[230] Report of the Bureau on cooperation, ICC–ASP/10/28, 12–21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 5.

[231] 'Belgium and ICC Sign Agreement on Interim Release of Detainees' (n 226).

[232] Report of the Court on cooperation (n 227) para. 39.

[233] Ibid., para. 30. Two seminars on witness protection organized by the Bureau's Facilitator for Cooperation in Africa are thought to have contributed to three African states entering into relocation agreements with the Court in 2013.

[234] For example, the discussion on cooperation during the twelfth session focused on 'The protection of witnesses: strengthening States' support to the Court', see Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 'Official Records Twelfth Session, The Hague, 20–8 November 2013', vol. I, 11.

[235] Cooperation, ICC–ASP/12/Res.3, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 7.

[236] Report of the Bureau on cooperation, ICC–ASP/12/36, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 5.

international concern'.[237] To date, it has focused on building the capacity of states that are unable to genuinely investigate and prosecute genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. It has yet to tackle the politically complex issue of the Assembly's role in putting political pressure on unwilling states to fulfil their obligations.

Recognizing that the ICC itself has a limited role in capacity building and that there are already many established programmes being conducted by states, the United Nations, other international and regional organizations, as well as civil society to provide such support to states, including rule of law programmes, the Assembly has focused sensibly on engaging with these initiatives rather than seeking to reinvent the wheel. For example, officials of the Assembly and the ICC, as well as States Parties, have actively engaged with the International Centre for Transitional Justice's Greentree initiative to improve coordination between international justice, rule of law, and development actors in situations where capacity-building projects are being delivered.[238] The Assembly has also been a key venue for side meetings on the recent initiative to establish the Justice Rapid Response—a new inter-governmental facility that manages the rapid deployment of criminal justice professionals to situations where crimes have been committed.[239]

The Secretariat of the Assembly has been given the role of facilitating the exchange of information between the Court, States Parties, and other stakeholders aimed at strengthening domestic jurisdictions. This has included setting up a complementarity website to 'provide information on events relating to complementarity, identify the main actors and their relevant activities, and facilitate contact between donors and recipients'.[240] The website is innovative and has the potential to be a useful tool for both states requiring assistance and those ready to provide it. However, with limited resources allocated to the Secretariat to proactively seek information and engage with donors and recipients of technical and other assistance,[241] the website is currently far from fully realizing its aims.[242]

[237] Complementarity, RC/Res.1, 8 June 2010 (Review Conference of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court) para. 8.

[238] See e.g. International Center for Transitional Justice, 'Synthesis report on "supporting complementarity at the national level: from theory to practice" (Greentree III), 25–6 October 2012', 30 November 2012.

[239] <http://www.justicerapidresponse.org/> accessed 17 March 2014.

[240] Report of the Secretariat on complementarity, ICC–ASP/10/2, 12–21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 10.

[241] Complementarity, RC/Res.1 (n 237) para. 9 required the Secretariat to conduct this new mandate 'within existing resources'; some additional resources have, however, been made available through the Office of the President of the Assembly, see Report of the Secretariat on complementarity, ICC–ASP/12/33, 20–8 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties) para. 15 '[s]ince May 2013, the capacity of the Secretariat has benefited from the work of a consultant on complementarity within the office of the President, funded by extra budgetary resources, and it will continue to build on its work in collaboration with the consultant'.

[242] Report of the Secretariat on complementarity, ICC–ASP/12/33 (n 241) para. 16, '[a]s regards its mandate to facilitate the exchange of information, the Secretariat notes that it has received very limited responses to its notes verbales, making it more difficult to prepare an overview of either the needs for technical assistance or the complementarity-related activities of States and other stakeholders'.

6.9 Conclusions

The Assembly has had a positive impact on many aspects of the law and practice of the ICC in its first 12 years. In particular, it has: promoted the development of the Strategic Plan of the ICC and numerous other ICC policies and strategies; established and operationalized, albeit after considerable time and effort, an IOM to enhance the economy and efficiency of the ICC and ensure that any allegations of misconduct against Court officials and staff are dealt with effectively; allocated more than €1 billion to the work of the ICC; protected the integrity of the Rome Statute by taking a careful approach to amendments; prompted efforts to expedite ICC proceedings when delays occurred in the first cases; developed and implemented innovative systems to elect ICC officials; and established mechanisms to respond to non-cooperation. It has also gone beyond the functions expressly listed in the Rome Statute to promote universality, implementation, cooperation, and complementarity, recognizing that they are essential to the success of the ICC and the realization of the Rome Statute.

However, as identified in this chapter, there are a number of aspects of the Assembly's work which have either had, or threaten to have, a negative impact on the effectiveness of the ICC, including in some instances undermining the independence of the prosecutor and the judges. In some cases, the Assembly has frustrated the implementation of policies and strategies. It has failed to establish effective safeguards to ensure that the ICC is allocated sufficient resources to function effectively in all areas and in some years has imposed arbitrary cuts to the Court's budget requests. Poor nomination processes and votes trading threaten efforts to elect the highest qualified candidates for ICC judges. Efforts to learn important lessons for the election of the next ICC Prosecutor have stalled. Most efforts to promote universality, cooperation, and complementarity lack effective structures, resources, and time on the Assembly's agenda to drive them forward. These issues should be addressed as priorities. Where appropriate, the Assembly should consider investing further in its own framework to achieve this, including allocating more time to its sessions, focusing the work of the Bureau, establishing further subsidiary bodies, and expanding the role and capacity of the Secretariat.

At the same time, the Assembly faces serious challenges arising from efforts by some African states, including States Parties, to promote non-cooperation in some cases and seek amendments that threaten the effectiveness of the ICC. The Assembly should be the key forum for all States Parties to engage on these issues and consider the concerns raised, but discussions and any solutions explored must respect the independence of the prosecutor and the judiciary, the importance of the work of the ICC, and the integrity of the Statute.

States Parties have invested significantly in the establishment of the ICC and the Rome Statute system. Their commitment to ending impunity must not waver if international justice is to be fully realized.

PART II

THE RELATIONSHIP TO DOMESTIC JURISDICTIONS

7

Jurisdiction

*Rod Rastan

7.1 Introduction

The jurisdictional regime of the ICC frames the entire process within which the proceedings are conducted—it determines what is possible in terms of legal competence. These facets of the Court's jurisdictional competence to proceed, whether at the stage of opening investigations,[1] in determining whether there is a sufficient basis for prosecution,[2] or reasonable grounds to believe a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court has been committed,[3] may accordingly form the basis of challenge to the jurisdiction of the Court under Article 19 of the Statute.[4] This chapter will briefly examine a number of jurisdictional issues arising from the early practice of the Court related to subject matter, personal, territorial, and temporal jurisdiction.

7.2 Jurisdictional Parameters

One of the key issues that played out during the negotiation of the Rome Statute was on what jurisdictional bases the Court should exercise its jurisdiction, namely which states must have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court in relation to the situation in question. At one end of the spectrum, some delegations argued for a strict state-centric regime whereby the Court would need to secure the consent of all interested states before it exercised any aspect of its jurisdiction. At the other end, other states sought to exclude additional preconditions subsequent to acceptance of the Statute in order to enable the Court to exercise as broad a base of jurisdiction as possible. Germany, in particular, had argued that since all states may exercise universal jurisdiction over genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, the ICC should not

* PhD (London School of Economics), LLM (Nottingham); Legal Advisor, OTP, ICC. The views expressed herein are solely the author's and do not necessarily reflect those of the OTP or the ICC.

[1] Art 53(1)(a) Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute'); Rule 48 Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties) part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE').

[2] Art 53(2)(a) ICC Statute.

[3] Art 58(1)(a) ICC Statute.

[4] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to Art 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, para. 24.

enjoy a lesser right than domestic courts did.[5] Although this proposal generated some sympathy during negotiations, it was ultimately dropped in favour of elaborating an explicit jurisdictional nexus. Significant differences persisted, however, as to the jurisdictional bases upon which such a nexus should rely. Several states, most notably the US, insisted on a regime which would require the consent of both the state of nationality of the accused as well as the state of territory where the offence occurred.[6] This would have effectively excluded the jurisdiction of the Court over nationals of non-Party States without the prior consent of that state. In a proposal that gained widespread support and that would have enabled the Court to exercise jurisdiction in a manner resembling the German proposal, the Republic of Korea proposed that the Court's jurisdiction be linked to fulfilment of one among a disjunctive list of four jurisdictional bases: the state of nationality of the accused (active personality), the state of nationality of the victim (passive personality), the state on the territory of which the crime occurred, or the state with custody over the accused.[7]

The final wording of Article 12 as adopted in Rome reflects an attempt to bridge the majority preference for a broad approach and the narrow view adopted by a minority of states, resulting in the exercise of jurisdiction being based on traditional principles of territoriality and active personality.[8] Thus, where ICC jurisdiction is asserted on the basis of the nationality of the accused, the Court will have jurisdiction regardless of the territory where the crime occurred; where ICC jurisdiction is asserted on the basis of territoriality, the Court will have jurisdiction regardless of whether the state of the nationality of the accused is a State Party or not. These preconditions do not apply to Security Council referrals, since in that instance the source of the obligations on UN Member States to cooperate with the Court will be the Chapter VII resolution itself. As described later, a number of these issues were reopened and revisited in Kampala with respect to the crime of aggression, creating an altogether separate regime that reverts back to the earlier proposals that consent be obtained for the exercise of jurisdiction from both the state of nationality of the accused as well as the state on the territory of which the alleged crime occurred.

In relation to subject matter jurisdiction, the first draft Statute for an ICC, submitted in 1951 by the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction,[9] had neither an [5] Proposal made by Germany at the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 15 June–17 July 1998, UN Doc A/AC.249/1998/DP.2 (1998).

[6] See e.g. Amendments proposed by the United States of America at the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 15 June–17 July 1998, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.70 (1998).

[7] Proposal made by the Republic of Korea at the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 15 June–17 July 1998, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.6 (1998) Art 8.

[8] This proposal was presented as part of the final package submitted by the Bureau; for more detailed discussion see E Wilmshurst, 'Jurisdiction of the Court' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 128.

[9] The committee, composed of the representatives of 17 Member States, was established by the General Assembly under Resolution 489 (V) of 12 December 1950, for the purpose of preparing preliminary draft conventions and proposals relating to the establishment and the statute of an ICC.

enumeration of principles nor offences to be applied, but merely stipulated that '[t]he Court shall apply international law, including international criminal law, and where appropriate, national law' (Article 2).[10] Earlier discussions in the ILC had focused around the necessity to define international crimes in order to avoid the criticisms of the Nuremberg Tribunal regarding ex post facto application of law and had framed debate in the context of the parallel project for the codification of criminal law under a draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind.[11] When discussions were taken up anew in 1989 it was again initially assumed that the Statute would be linked directly to the Code of Crimes,[12] until the ILC decided to separate the two projects in 1992, considering it more favourable to try cases at the ICC under existing international criminal provisions rather than by way of a unique Code. Accordingly, the ILC's 1993 Draft listed crimes in the Statute by reference to relevant conventions (inter alia, the Genocide Convention, the Geneva Conventions, and Additional Protocols), as well as extending jurisdiction to crimes under customary international law and certain crimes under national legislations giving effect to multilateral treaties (including those related to terrorism and drug trafficking).[13] In its final 1994 text and commentary, faced with the uncertain definitions of international crimes under customary law on the one hand and the lack of progress with the draft Code on the other, the ILC moved for an enumeration of crimes in the Statute. Accordingly, Article 20 of the revised draft Statute, and which formed the basis of later negotiations, granted jurisdiction with respect to:

a) the crime of genocide;
b) the crime of aggression;
c) serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in armed conflict;
d) crimes against humanity;
e) crimes, established under or pursuant to the treaty provisions listed in the Annex, which, having regard to the conduct alleged, constitute exceptionally serious crimes of international concern.[14]

During subsequent negotiations by states in the 1995 Ad Hoc Committee, the view was expressed that > a procedural instrument enumerating rather than defining the crimes would not meet the requirements of the principle of legality (nullem crimen sine lege and nulla

[10] Report of the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction on its Session Held from 1 to 31 August 1951, Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, UN Doc A/2136 (1952) 23.

[11] Report by Ricardo J Alfaro, Special Rapporteur, 'Question of International Criminal Jurisdiction', UN Doc A/CN.4/15 (3 March 1950), (1950) YILC, vol. II, 15.

[12] Ninth Report on the Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, UN Doc A/CN.4/435 and Add.1 (8 February and 15 March 1991), (1991) YILC, vol. II (part I) 41.

[13] See Arts 22 and 26 Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, Report of the International Law Commission on its forty-fifth session (3 May–23 July 1993), UN Doc A/48/10, (1993) YILC, vol. II (part II) 106–7, 109–11.

[14] Report of the International Law Commission on its forty-sixth session (2 May–22 July 1994), UN Doc A/49/10, (1994) YILC, vol. II (part II) 38.

poena sine lege) and that the constituent elements of each crime should be specified in order to avoid ambiguity and to ensure full respect for the rights of the accused.[15]

Over the next three years, arguments between exhaustive or illustrative definitions of crimes attempted to balance the competing demands for certainty and predictability under the principle of legality, against the requirement of flexibility in the face of the continuing development of the law.[16] The need to prioritize the already challenging exercise over the definition of the core crimes and the intractable difficulties with respect to other crimes explains the adoption in Rome of the listed crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. The definition and operation of the crime of aggression, although formally included in Article 5, was deferred until finally resolved at the 2010 Review Conference in Kampala, and consideration of other treaty crimes, notably drug trafficking and terrorism, were indefinitely postponed.[17]

With respect to temporal jurisdiction, the 1994 ILC draft Statute only contained a provision on nullum crimen sine lege which was linked to the differentiated scheme described earlier for draft Article 20. The provision merely provided that an accused shall not be held guilty (a) in the case of genocide, aggression, war crimes, and crimes against humanity 'unless the act or omission in question constituted a crime under international law', and (b) in the case of treaty crimes, 'unless the treaty in question was applicable to the conduct of the accused at the time the act or omission occurred'.[18] Debates early on in the Ad Hoc Committee and Preparatory Committee concretized the need for an express provision on non-retroactivity that would establish a definite time bar for the historical exercise of ICC jurisdiction, leading to the adoption in Rome of Article 11 as well as in tandem Article 22 related to nullem crimen sine lege and Article 24 on non-retroactivity.

The opposing views that played out over an opt-in or opt-out regime for the exercise of jurisdiction during the negotiations leading to Rome and Kampala, as well as the distinction between core crimes over which the Court would enjoy inherent jurisdiction versus other crimes to be later added to the Statute, means that the actual exercise of jurisdiction on these bases is subject to a patchwork of conditions which may be summarized as follows:[19]

[15] Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Doc A/50/22 (6 September 1995) 12.

[16] See e.g. Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Doc A/51/22 (13 September 1996) vol. II, para. 55.

[17] See Final Act of the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Resolution E, A/CONF.183/10 (17 July 1998), whereby the Diplomatic Conference 'Recommends that a Review Conference pursuant to article 123 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court consider the crimes of terrorism and drug crimes with a view to arriving at an acceptable definition and their inclusion in the list of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court'. Despite proposals to that effect, the crimes were not tabled for debate during the 2010 Review Conference; see (n 30).

[18] Report of the International Law Commission on its forty-sixth session (n 14) 55–6.

[19] In its 1993 Report, the Working Group of the ILC presented three alternatives for the exercise of ICC jurisdiction based on an 'opting in' regime, whereby the ICC only intervenes with the consent of states concerned; and two variants of an 'opting out' approach, whereby the competence of the Court's jurisdiction would be presumed unless prospectively indicated otherwise by each State Party concerned; Report of the International Law Commission on its forty-fifth session (n 13) 107–8. At its 1994 session the ILC ultimately favoured the opt-in regime, requiring separate state consent for the exercise

i. For States Parties, the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court over the core crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes is 'inherent' or 'automatic' once a state becomes a party to the Statute, meaning no separate consent is required for the Court to exercise its jurisdiction with respect to the alleged commission of such crimes on the territory or by the nationals of States Parties.[20]

ii. Nonetheless, a state may choose to opt out of war crimes for an initial seven-year period on becoming a party to the Statute.[21]

iii. For declarations by non-Party States or referrals by the Security Council, the exercise of jurisdiction operates via an opt-in regime, meaning the declaring state or the Security Council consents to the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the particular situation concerned.[22] Jurisdiction may thereby extend to crimes committed on the territory or by the nationals of a state not party to the Statute, not otherwise subject to ICC jurisdiction.

iv. With respect to the crime of aggression, the exercise of jurisdiction will be consent based, meaning that each State Party must accept the amendment in order to enable the exercise of jurisdiction with respect to the crime of aggression occurring on its territory or by its nationals. For States Parties that have not ratified the amendment, two readings are possible: (a) the Court will have jurisdiction over nationals of a non-ratifying aggressor State Party allegedly committing crimes on the territory of a ratifying State Party unless that State Party has lodged a declaration opting-out;[23] or (b) no exercise of jurisdiction with respect to the nationals of a non-ratifying aggressor State Party is possible according to the limitations to the amendment acceptance procedure under of jurisdiction over each of the listed crimes, with the proviso that jurisdiction would be inherent over the crime of genocide given the express authority for the assertion of ICC jurisdiction on the basis of Art VI of the 1948 Genocide Convention; Report of the International Law Commission on its forty-sixth session (n 14) 41–3. In the later Preparatory Committee it appeared unsatisfactory and undesirable for many states to maintain a hierarchy of regimes given the proposed concentration of the Statute on the most egregious crimes. There was a fear also that failure to extend inherent jurisdiction to war crimes and crimes against humanity ran the risk of undermining the credibility and effectiveness of the Court, by creating an ICC 'á la carte' that would burden the Court with subtle determinations of jurisdictional claims. As a result, the overwhelming majority of states during negotiations leading up to Rome accepted inherent jurisdiction, rendering the opt-in regime of ILC draft Art 22 redundant; Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Doc A/51/22 (13 September 1996) vol. I. paras 117–19. These options re-emerged, nonetheless, in the context of the negotiations over the crime of aggression.

[20] Art 12 ICC Statute.

[21] Art 124 ICC Statute.

[22] See Art 12(3) ICC Statute read in conjunction with Rule 44 ICC RPE; Art 13(b) ICC Statute. In relation to the effects of declaration lodged pursuant to Art 12(3), the Appeals Chamber has observed: 'Unless stipulated in the declaration under article 12 (3) of the Statute, acceptance of jurisdiction is not limited to specific events or a specific "situation" within the meaning of article 13 of the Statute. It may also cover crimes under article 5 of the Statute committed after the declaration has been lodged'; Judgment on jurisdiction and stay of the proceedings, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-321 OA 2, AC, ICC, 12 December 2012, para. 1; see also El Zeidy, Chapter 8, this volume.

[23] See Art 15*bis*(4) ICC Statute, which provides: 'The Court may, in accordance with article 12, exercise jurisdiction over a crime of aggression, arising from an act of aggression committed by a State Party, unless that State Party has previously declared that it does not accept such jurisdiction by lodging a declaration with the Registrar.'

Article 121(5).[24] On either reading, this means that the previous disjunctive basis for jurisdiction based on either territorial or personal jurisdiction derived from State Party adherence to the Statute has been effectively made cumulative. This is most clearly expressed in the condition that the Court cannot exercise its jurisdiction with respect to the crime of aggression committed on the territory or by the nationals of a state not party to the Statute.[25]

v. As with other ICC crimes, the Security Council may opt in to the exercise of ICC jurisdiction over the crime of aggression committed anywhere, including on the territory or by the nationals of a state that has not accepted the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction in that regard (i.e. including with respect to a State Party that has not accepted the amendments and a state not party to the Statute).[26]

The sections that follow examine briefly in turn each of the four facets of the Court's jurisdiction—jurisdiction ratione materiae, ratione personae, ratione loci, and ratione temporis—which the ICC Appeals Chamber has characterized as together denoting the Court's competence to deal with a criminal cause or matter under the Statute.[27] These facets constitute the jurisdictional preconditions contained in Articles 5–12 of the Statute, which provide the basis for the actual exercise of jurisdiction, which may be triggered or stayed pursuant to Articles 13–21. The temporal and subject matter parameters of the Court's jurisdiction may be described as absolute requirements that must always be satisfied, while, excepting the crime of aggression, personal and [24] See Art 121(5) ICC Statute, which provides: 'Any amendment to articles 5, 6, 7 and 8 of this Statute shall enter into force for those States Parties which have accepted the amendment one year after the deposit of their instruments of ratification or acceptance. In respect of a State Party which has not accepted the amendment, the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction regarding a crime covered by the amendment when committed by that State Party's nationals or on its territory.' See discussion in S Barriga and L Grover, 'A Historic Breakthrough on the Crime of Aggression' (2011) 105 American Journal of International Law 517, 532 at fn 38: 'both views coincide in that Article 15 bis is a consent-based regime, though opinions diverge as to whether active consent is required by the alleged aggressor state (that is, ratification) or passive consent only (that is, not to submit an opt-out declaration)'; see also ibid. 531 at fn 35.

[25] Art 15*bis*(5) ICC Statute.

[26] Art 15*ter* ICC Statute. See also Resolution RC/Res.6 'The Crime of Aggression, RC/11, 11 June 2010 (Review Conference of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court) Annex III: Understandings regarding the amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the crime of aggression, para. 2: 'It is understood that the Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression on the basis of a Security Council referral in accordance with article 13, paragraph (b), of the Statute irrespective of whether the State concerned has accepted the Court's jurisdiction in this regard.' It is not clear from the amendments and accompanying resolution whether a non-Party State may nonetheless accept the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the crime of aggression pursuant to Art 12(3). Given that the provisions of Art 12 apply unless disturbed by the amendments, it is reasonable to assume that Art 12(3) and Rule 44 remain applicable with respect to all crimes referred to in Art 5, including the crime of aggression, notwithstanding the language in Art 15*bis*(5) since its essential purpose is to ensure a consent-based regime.

[27] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to Art 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, para. 24.

territorial jurisdiction may be fulfilled in the alternative, meaning that one or the other must be present.

7.3 Subject Matter Jurisdiction

The subject matter jurisdiction of the Court is denoted by the crimes listed in Articles 5–8*bis* of the ICC Statute. The crimes within the Court's jurisdiction are not set in stone and may be modified through amendment of the Statute, as occurred in Kampala with the adoption of three new offences related to the use of poisonous gases and bullets causing excessive suffering present in the international armed conflict provisions of Article 8, which were carried over to those dealing with non-international armed conflict,[28] and the adoption of a definition for the crime of aggression.[29] The consideration of other crimes, including the further extension of existing crimes or the adoption of new crimes, may be placed before the Assembly of States Parties at any time. Several such proposals have already been made.[30]

Although contestation occurs frequently throughout the course of judicial proceedings as to the legal qualification of particular alleged acts or their evidentiary foundation, less frequently does it attach to the question of the Court's jurisdictional competence to deal with a matter within the meaning of Article 19. Such questions may arise more typically at the stage of launching investigations or during earlier preliminary examinations.

The divergence within Pre-Trial Chamber II at the Article 15 stage in the Situation in Kenya on whether the alleged crimes constituted crimes against humanity, thereby granting competence to the Court to address the matter, is well known. In particular, the judges differed as to whether the alleged crimes that occurred in the context of the post-election violence were sufficiently organized, whether an inferable policy to commit such crimes could be attributed to an identifiable state or organization, and whether, in the context of the latter, any such organization had to have certain state-like features.[31] Some disagreement also arose in Pre-Trial Chamber III's treatment of [28] Art 8(2)(e)(xiii)–(xv) ICC Statute. [29] Art 8*bis* ICC Statute.

[30] Under Art 121(1) ICC Statute, proposed amendments are to be submitted to the United Nations Secretary General who shall promptly circulate them to States Parties. See the proposal of the Netherlands to add 'the crime of terrorism' as new Art 5(e) and new Art 5(3) on the conditions for the adoption and exercise of the crime of terrorism (mirrored in the wording of former Art 5(2) concerning aggression), UN Doc C.N.723.2009.TREATIES-5 (Depositary Notification); proposal of Mexico to amend to Art 8(2)(b) to include 'Employing nuclear weapons or threatening to employ nuclear weapons', UN Doc C.N.725.2009.TREATIES-5 (Depositary Notification); proposed amendments 2 and 3 by Belgium on behalf of Argentina, Belgium, Bolivia, Burundi, Cambodia, Cyprus, Ireland, Latvia, Luxembourg, Mauritius, Mexico, Romania, Samoa and Slovenia, to amend Arts 8(2)(b) and 8(2)(e) to include the use of biological and chemical weapons and anti-personnel mines, as well as the use of certain other weapons causing excessive harm, UN Doc C.N.733.2009.TREATIES-5 (Depositary Notification); proposal of Trinidad and Tobago to add 'The Crime of International Drug Trafficking' as new Art 5(e) together with a proposed definition as new Art 5(2) concerning 'crimes involving the illicit trafficking in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances mean any of the following acts, but only when they pose a threat to the peace, order and security of a State or region', UN Doc C.N.737.2009.TREATIES-5 (Depositary Notification).

[31] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, with appended dissenting opinion of Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010 ('Kenya Article 15 Decision').

the Article 15 application with respect to the situation in Côte d'Ivoire, occasioning a partial dissent not on whether the Court had subject matter jurisdiction per se, but over the nature of the Chamber's task in reviewing the allegations presented, namely whether its role was to supervise the correctness of the prosecutor's assertions on subject matter jurisdiction as part of its threshold-setting exercise for the opening investigations, or whether the Chamber could and should go beyond those assertions to enter its own findings in relation to other crimes based on its own perusal of the supporting materials.[32] Less well treated and more frequently arising are decisions taken by the prosecutor during preliminary examinations not to proceed on the basis of subject matter jurisdiction. Unless these follow a referral, they cannot be subjected to judicial review, and as such, will not attract Chamber scrutiny.[33] Nonetheless, the task is similarly one of determining the scope of a statutory mandated competence, pursuant to the factors listed in Article 53(1)(a)–(c)[34] by the 'triggering force' [35] of judicial proceedings, and therefore merits some treatment.

In relation to the Republic of Korea (ROK or South Korea), under preliminary examination proprio motu pursuant to Article 15 of the Statute, for example, the prosecutor decided not to proceed with investigations due to the lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The situation concerned two incidents: the sinking of a South Korean warship, the Cheonan, on 26 March 2010 and the shelling of South Korea's Yeonpyeong Island on 23 November 2010, both allegedly committed by the armed forces of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK or North Korea), not a State Party.[36]

Examining the first incident, the prosecutor entered the straightforward assessment that the sinking of the naval vessel and the drowning of all its personnel did not constitute a war crime, since the attack was against a legitimate military objective,[37]

[32] Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, PTC III, ICC, 15 November 2011 ('Côte d'Ivoire Article 15 Decision'); Judge Fernandez de Gurmendi's separate and partially dissenting opinion to the Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-15, 3 October 2011. For further discussion see R Rastan, 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court' (2012) 23 Criminal Law Forum 1, 24–8.

[33] Art 53(3) ICC Statute provides that where a State Party or the Security Council refers a situation and the Prosecutor decides not to proceed, the referring state or Council may request the Pre-Trial Chamber to review the decision of the Prosecutor. By contrast, with respect to negative decisions taken pursuant to Art 15, there is no scope for judicial review; see Rules 49 and 105 ICC RPE and discussion in H Friman, 'Investigation and Prosecution' in Lee (n 8) 496–8.

[34] Pursuant to Rule 48 ICC RPE, the same factors are applicable when acting under Art 15 ICC Statute.

[35] Decision Requesting the Parties to Submit Information for the Confirmation of Charges Hearing, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-153, PTC II, ICC, 29 June 2011, para. 13.

[36] The Court has jurisdiction over crimes occurring on the territory (including vessels registered thereto) or by the nationals of South Korea since 13 November 2002. Thus the relevant acts would fall within the temporal and territorial jurisdiction of the ICC even though North Korea is not a State Party. See Situation in the Republic of Korea: Art 5 Report, OTP, ICC, June 2014 ('Korea Report').

[37] In relation to whether the incidents had a nexus with an armed conflict, the report noted two possible bases for the existence of an international armed conflict between the ROK and the DPRK: (i) that the two countries are technically still at war since the 1953 Armistice Agreement is only a ceasefire agreement; and (ii) the resort to armed force between the two states itself created an international armed conflict under customary international law; ibid., para. 9.

bearing in mind also the current non-applicability of jus ad bellum rules attached to alleged acts of aggression.[38] Nonetheless, the report also went on to consider whether the attack might fall within the scope of the war crime of treacherously killing or wounding under Article 8(2)(b)(xi), traditionally conceived as the feigned waiving of the white flag to simulate surrender with the concealed intent to kill or injure the adversary.[39] In this regard, the Elements of Crimes require, inter alia, that the perpetrator invited the confidence or belief of one or more persons that they were entitled to, or were obliged to accord, protection under rules of international law applicable in armed conflict; that the perpetrator intended to betray that confidence or belief; and that the perpetrator made use of that confidence or belief in killing or injuring such person or persons.[40] Applied to the facts at hand, for the sinking of the Cheonan to have constituted a war crime, the DPRK must have concluded the armistice decades-old agreement with the intention of attacking by surprise the enemy who was relying on it.[41] Since these requirements are cumulative, the report ultimately dismissed as unreasonable the proposition that the 'DPRK entered into an armistice agreement in 1953—and recommitted itself to this agreement in 1991—with the specific intent to conduct surprise attacks, such as the alleged attack on the Cheonan committed in 2010'.[42]

In relation to the second incident, involving the shelling by the DPRK of Yeonpyeong Island on South Korean territory, resulting in death, injury, or damage to both civilian and military objects and persons, the report determined that there was no reasonable basis to believe that the civilian impact resulted from intentional targeting (Article 8(2)(b)(i) or (ii)) or from excessive incidental death, injury, or damage (Article 8(2)(b)(iv)). Lack of intent to target civilians was based on examination of the factual pattern of the shelling, demonstrating that the majority of the attack was directed towards military objectives which also suffered the majority of the impact, as well as alternative explanations for the civilian impact suffered, including the targeting accuracy of artillery weapons used.[43] In relation to the alleged excessive incidental civilian death, injury, or damage, the report was unable to determine that the anticipated civilian impact was clearly excessive in relation to the anticipated military advantage of the [38] Korea Report (n 36) paras 12 and 82.

[39] The prohibition derives from Art 23(b) of the Regulations annexed to the 1907 Hague Convention (IV) respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land (adopted 18 October 1907, entered into force 26 January 1910). As the International Committee of the Red Cross ('ICRC') notes, state practice is consistent in prohibiting the act of concluding an agreement to suspect combat with the intention of attacking by surprise the enemy relying on that agreement; although this should be distinguished from 'ruses of war' which are not prohibited; see Rule 64 and associated commentary in J Henckaerts and L Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law, Vol. 1: Rules (New York: Cambridge University Press 2009) 219–21; Korea Report (n 36) paras 49–53.

[40] Elements 1, 2, and 4 of Art 8(2)(b)(xi), Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3(part II-B), 9 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties). In this respect, as the ICRC Customary International Humanitarian Law study notes, '[t]he essence of perfidy is thus the invitation to obtain and then breach the adversary's confidence, i.e., an abuse of good faith. This requirement of a specific intent to breach the adversary's confidence sets perfidy apart from an improper use, making perfidy a more serious violation of international humanitarian law. Some military manuals translate this rule as follows: it is prohibited to commit a hostile act under the cover of a legal protection'; Henckaerts and Doswald-Beck (n 39) 223.

[41] Korea Report (n 36) para. 56. [42] Ibid., para. 56. [43] Ibid, para. 20.

attack as required by Article 8(2)(b)(iv), considering the relative proximity of military and civilian objects, the small size and population of the island, and the fact that military targets appeared to be the primary objective of the attack.[44] The result of the assessment was to negate a basis for the opening of investigations.

Clearly, the subject matter threshold for the exercise of ICC jurisdiction will often be the central question at the preliminary examination stage. Do the government crimes allegedly committed in Honduras during the post-coup period of 2009, including allegations of death, torture, imprisonment, rape, deportation, and persecution, constitute crimes against humanity?[45] Does the level of intensity and organization in the violent clashes between the Nigerian security forces and Boko Haram give rise to the level of a non-international armed conflict?[46] Does government repression of street protests in Kiev prior to the ousting of President Viktor Yanukovych amount to crimes against humanity?[47] These assessments could also arise in the context of case-specific investigations or prosecutions. What sets them apart is not their content per se, but their role in determining the scope of the Court's jurisdiction to proceed at all, that is, the Court's competence to open investigations into a situation,[48] as opposed to its ability to pursue particular charges within the confines of a particular case theory.[49] Moreover, whereas during the case-specific stage the prosecutor can deploy the full range of investigative powers at his/her disposal for the determination of the truth, at the preliminary examination stage, including during Article 15 proceedings, the scope for fact-finding and prima facie attribution is far more constrained to open source materials, testimony taken at the seat of the Court and any other information otherwise provided. It is true that this is carried out against the lowest evidentiary threshold in the Statute. Nonetheless, its outcome remains determinative in terms of ICC procedure, namely dismissal of the situation or its progression towards opening full-scale investigations. And while a decision not to proceed based on lack of jurisdiction can be reconsidered based on further submissions (Articles 15(6) and 53(4)) or

[44] Ibid., paras 21–6.

[45] See Report on Preliminary Examination Activities 2013, OTP, ICC, November 2013, paras 71–8, which determines that the limited number of alleged deaths due to excessive force, the limited number of reported acts of torture, rape, and sexual violence, large-scale detentions but of limited duration of up to 24 hours, and the number of alleged serious injuries, do not appear to be linked to an alleged attack against the opposition members of the civilian population nor cumulatively provide a basis for finding a widespread or systematic attack against opposition members of the civilian population involving the multiple commission of prohibited acts pursuant to a state policy within the meaning of Art 7. The report goes on to note the ongoing assessment of more recent allegations which 'may be evidence of an escalating pattern of criminal acts that could alter the characterisation of the earlier post-coup period and provide a basis for considering it as a continuous widespread or systematic attack carried out pursuant to a policy'; ibid., para. 80.

[46] See Situation in Nigeria, Art 5 Report, OTP, ICC, 5 August 2013, which states the OTP is unable to arrive at a positive conclusion on the matter, and the later Report on Preliminary Examination Activities 2013 (n 45) paras 18 and 214 et seq., which does.

[47] See temporal scope of the Art 12(3) declaration lodged by Ukraine on 9 April 2014 with respect to alleged crimes occurring on its territory from 21 November 2013 to 22 February 2014 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/Documents/997/declarationRecognitionJuristiction09-04-2014.pdf> accessed 8 August 2014.

[48] Art 53(1)(a) ICC Statute, Rule 48 ICC RPE.

[49] Arts 58(1)(a), 61(7), or 74 ICC Statute.

at the request of the Pre-Trial Chamber following a review triggered by the referring entity (Article 53(3)(a)), the tools available to conduct the assessment remain the same.

7.4 Personal Jurisdiction

Together with territory, the nationality of the alleged offender provides one of two bases for the assertion of criminal jurisdiction.[50] Since active personality extends to alleged crimes committed anywhere by a State Party national, the nationality of the alleged offender will have important effects on the Court's jurisdiction. It may, for the same reason, form the focus of future litigation, particularly in cases of unclear or contested nationality claims.

Nationality has traditionally been viewed as the vital link between the individual and international law, particularly with regard to individuals abroad,[51] since it is only through the medium of nationality that states may prescribe law for and exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction over their nationals or espouse claims on their behalf and incur liability for their wrongs.[52] In this regard, the competence of a state to designate a person as its national is classically treated as a matter within the reserved domain of domestic jurisdiction.[53] Nonetheless, the effects of that nationality on the international sphere, including any limitations thereto, are regulated by international law.[54] It is thus open to international courts and tribunals to determine how they should receive competing or contested nationality claims in the exercise of their own competence.[55]

[50] Art 12 provides for jurisdictional competence over alleged crimes committed by the national of a State Party (Art 12(2)(a)) or of a non-Party State that has accepted the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court (Art 12(3)). Personal jurisdiction is confined to natural persons (Art 25(1)) who are over the age of 18 years at the time of the alleged conduct (Art 26).

[51] R Jennings and A Watts (eds), Oppenheim's International Law 9th edn (London/New York: Longman 1996) 849, 857.

[52] R Sloane, 'Breaking the Genuine Link: The Contemporary International Legal Regulation of Nationality' (2009) 50 Harvard International Law Journal 1. See generally Jennings and Watts (n 51) 857–9.

[53] Thus, the Permanent Court of International Justice ('PCIJ') held that questions of nationality are in principle within the reserved domain of state jurisdiction and not regulated by international law, although this may be restricted by treaty obligations voluntarily accepted by that state; Nationality Decrees Issued in Tunis and Morocco (French Zone), Advisory Opinion, 1923 PCIJ Series B, No 4, 7 February 1923, at 24, paras 40–1. The PCIJ similarly held 'generally speaking, it is true that a sovereign State has the right to decide what persons shall be regarded as its nationals', while noting this is subject only to the treaty obligations entered into; Acquisition of Polish Nationality, Advisory Opinion, 1923 PCIJ Series B, No 7, 15 September 1923, para. 27.

[54] As the PCIJ observed, it is a settled principle that the effect of domestic laws on the international plane is determined by international law; Certain German interests in Polish Upper Silesia (Germany v Poland) (Merits) Judgment (1926) PCIJ Series A, No 7, 26 May 1926, at 19: '[f]rom the standpoint of International Law and of the Court which is its organ, municipal laws are merely facts which express the will and constitute the activities of States, in the same manner as do legal decisions or administrative measures'.

[55] See e.g. Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, AC, ICTY, 20 February 2001, para. 76, 'the nationality granted by a State on the basis of its domestic laws is not automatically binding on an international tribunal which is itself entrusted with the task of ascertaining the nationality of the victims for the purposes of the application of international humanitarian law'; Iran v United States, 'International law … does not determine who is a national, but rather sets forth the conditions under which that determination must be recognized by other States'; Case No A/18, 5 Iran–U.S. Cl. Trib. Rep. 251, 260 (1984).

Although the ICTY has examined issues related to nationality for the purpose of determining the protected person status of alleged victims in accordance with the Geneva Convention IV,[56] contestation over the nationality of an offender has yet to arise at the international level.[57] Before the ICC to date all of the situations and cases that have been investigated relate to alleged crimes committed on the territory of the relevant state. Nonetheless, other situations under preliminary examinations have considered jurisdiction on the basis of active personality, notably in relation to Iraq where nationals of States Parties, primarily UK service members, are alleged to have committed, inter alia, acts of murder, torture, and inhuman treatment of persons in detention on the territory of Iraq, which is not a Party to the Statute.[58] As this situation demonstrates, although nationality of the offender offers a significant basis to investigate alleged crimes, it also suffers from several obvious limitations as to the overall reach of the Court. In Iraq, thus, it cannot extend to allegations against Iraqi or US nationals.[59] This means that where the ICC jurisdiction is exercised solely on the basis of nationality the Court may not be able to give equal treatment to all parties or actors involved. Some perpetrators of certain nationalities may be subject to the Court's jurisdiction, perhaps exclusively on one side of the conflict, while others may not. This might impede the overall impact of the Court and generate complaints of selectivity and inconsistency within the situation even if legal criteria have been impartially applied. Nevertheless, the import of the Court exercising jurisdiction in relation to situations that may otherwise remain subject to impunity cannot be easily dismissed, particularly where the nationals in question fall within the category of persons who appear to bear the greatest responsibility for serious crimes, i.e. they would fall within the routine scope of prosecutorial strategy.

One possible factual scenario that might arise is where a State Party national commits an alleged crime in the context of an interoperable command and control structure, i.e. in the context of multinational deployments, such as in Iraq. In these circumstances the Court's personal jurisdiction would persist irrespective of whether the State Party national is the commander or the subordinate. If the State Party national is the commander whose subordinates commit crimes, the Court's personal [56] See e.g. Delalić et al. (n 55) paras 56–85; Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999, paras 164–6. The Tribunal, relying on the object and purpose of the nationality requirement in Art 4 of the Geneva Convention IV adopted an approach hinging on substantial relations (i.e. ethnicity/allegiance to a Party to the conflict) rather than formal bonds of nationality (which were otherwise shared between the perpetrator and the victim).

[57] As Fruli notes, the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals exercised jurisdiction over the vanquished enemy party; the ICTY exercised jurisdiction by virtue of the territory of the former Yugoslavia (i.e. irrespective of nationality); and the ICTR with respect to the territory of Rwanda as well as Rwandan nationals committing genocide abroad, although no cases were brought on the basis of active personality; M Fruli, 'Jurisdiction Ratione Personae' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press) 527–32.

[58] OTP's response to communications received concerning Iraq, 9 February 2006; and more recent reopening of the preliminary examination: 'Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, re-opens the preliminary examination of the situation in Iraq', ICC Press Release, 13 May 2014.

[59] By contrast, in Afghanistan and Georgia, because the territorial State is a Party to the Statute, the Court may exercise jurisdiction in respect of alleged ICC crimes committed by any nationals on Afghan or Georgian soil, including by the nationals of non-Party States.

jurisdiction will extend over those acts or omissions of the commander irrespective of whether the physical perpetrators are State Party nationals, since it is the conduct attributed to the State Party national that is the subject of proceedings before the Court. Although the Court will need to pronounce on both the alleged conduct of the commander and the alleged conduct of the non-Party State physical perpetrators,[60] the latter are examined only to the extent necessary to determine the criminal responsibility of the former. Indeed, no criminal jurisdiction is asserted per se over the physical perpetrators and no findings of criminal responsibility attach thereto. In this respect, it is standard practice for courts to pronounce on the involvement of other actors in a criminal enterprise for the purpose of determining the criminal responsibility of a particular accused. There is thus no reason to exclude the responsibility of a State Party national for a crime physically perpetrated by another person, irrespective of whether that other person is a State Party national or a non-Party State national. Similarly, if the State Party national who is the focus of the case is the subordinate physical perpetrator and commits the alleged crime under the command and control of a non-Party State national, personal jurisdiction will persist over the former, even if the Court may need to examine certain factual and legal questions related to the nature of that command. Were it not so, the personal jurisdiction of the Court could be avoided by embedding State Party nationals into units comprised of other nationalities. Although in practice the responsibility imputed to the suspect may give rise to complex factual parameters, including in cases built on co-perpetration or common purpose where the State Party national may sit in a triangular relationship with one or more non-Party State nationals and their non-Party State subordinates, to the extent that the Chamber can disentangle the different forms of participation there is no reason why the Court's personal jurisdiction should not apply as a matter of law.

What of dual national suspects who enjoy the nationality of both a State Party and a non-Party State? Does the Court have to resolve competing nationality claims to determine its own jurisdiction based, for example, on the 'effective nationality' or 'genuine link' test?[61] Issues related to closeness of nexus for the purpose of determining nationality

[60] For example in the case against Saif al-Islam Gaddafi, the Appeals Chamber observed that Mr Gaddafi was not alleged to have committed crimes with his own hand, but that he used the Libyan Security Forces to commit the alleged crimes as an indirect co-perpetrator, with the underlying criminal conduct allegedly carried out by a large number of direct perpetrators in the course of various incidents. As such it held that 'the "conduct" that defines the "case" is both that of the suspect, Mr Gaddafi, and that described in the incidents under investigation which is imputed to the suspect'. It nonetheless distinguished between 'the conduct described in the incidents under investigation which is imputed to the suspect', i.e. that committed by the physical perpetrators, which it described as 'a necessary component of the case' and which 'forms the core of any criminal case' versus 'the conduct of the suspect him or herself that is the basis for the case against him or her'; Judgment on the appeal of Libya against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Gaddafi, Situation in Libya, AC, ICC, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, 21 May 2014, para. 62. Although this was applied in the context of a determination of the admissibility of a case, it would appear to have equal relevance for determinations of jurisdiction.

[61] See Nottebohm Case (Liechtenstein v Guatemala), Judgment of 6 April 1955 [1995] ICJ Reports 4. The principle of effective nationality is also present in a number of earlier international treaties; see e.g. Art 5 of the Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws (1930) 179 LNTS 89: 'Within a third State, a person having more than one nationality shall be treated as if he had only one. Without prejudice to the application of its law in matters of personal status and of any conventions in force, a third State shall, of the nationalities which any such person possesses, recognise exclusively in its territory could conceivably arise where the person whose surrender is sought by the Court falls within the scope of an Article 98 agreement with the requested State Party under one nationality but not the other. Closeness of nexus might possibly also be considered as a relevant factor by the Court in the context of an admissibility challenge brought by more than one state, perhaps with similar credentials as to the genuineness of the national proceedings concerned, where both assert jurisdiction on the basis of the nationality of the offender. In these circumstances, the ICC would be free to determine the effects of different nationality claims brought by a suspect in view of the competence of the Court to proceed with a surrender request or to determine admissibility.[62]

However, as a matter of jurisdiction, there appears no reason why a person should be able to rely on the effective nationality test in order to avoid criminal responsibility. In particular, the test adopted in Nottebohm was applied in the context of inter-state arbitration to govern the abuse by individuals of diplomatic protection claimed from more than one state, not for the application of criminal law.[63] As Sloane observes, Nottebohm properly concerns the general principle of law prohibiting the abuse of rights in the context of diplomatic claims espousal:

> [I]t operates to prevent states or their nationals from manipulating the liberal international legal regulation of nationality as a way to expand their right to bring diplomatic protection claims or, conversely, to render inadmissible the otherwise legitimate diplomatic protection claims of another state.[64]

As such, the ICJ's dicta on the effectiveness of nationality is neither directly nor easily transferable to other areas of adjudication.[65] Indeed in criminal cases, the assertion of a second foreign nationality typically will not bar a domestic court from exercising its criminal jurisdiction over its own nationals. Even though states are not required under international law to give effect to another state's ascription of nationality, the individual will still be a national of that state for the purpose of its own laws.[66] This approach is consistent also with the commentary to draft Article 5 (jurisdiction over nationals) of the 1935 Harvard Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime:

> In case of double or multiple nationality, any State of which the accused is a national is competent under this article. . . . Whether, in case of double or multiple nationality, either the nationality of the country in which he is habitually and principally resident, or the nationality of the country with which in the circumstances he appears to be in fact most closely connected.' As Brownlie observes, although the International Court of Justice refers to both concepts, strictly speaking the general principle of genuine link is distinguishable from that of effective link in that the former relates to the narrower situation of naturalization obtained on the basis of fraud or duress, which is therefore voidable; I Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law 4th edn, (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1990) 397–8, 418.

[62] See supra (n 54) and (n 55).

[63] In Nottebohm, Guatemala further claimed that Lichtenstein had acted fraudulently in granting nationality to Nottebohm, although the International Court of Justice did not directly address this aspect of the claim; Nottebohm (n 61) 26; discussed in Brownlie (n 61).

[64] Sloane (n 52) 29. [65] Ibid.

[66] See e.g. formulation in Art 1 Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws (n 61): 'It is for each State to determine under its own law who are its nationals. This law shall be recognised by other States in so far as it is consistent with international conventions, international custom, and the principles of law generally recognised with regard to nationality'. See generally Jennings and Watts (n 51) 856; Sloane (n 52) 3.

> an accused is a national of the State which is attempting to prosecute and punish is a question to be determined by reference to such principles of international law as govern nationality. If international law permits the State to regard the accused as its national, its competence is not impaired or limited by the fact that he is also a national of another State. [67]

Since the ICC exercises its jurisdiction on the basis of competence delegated to it by States Parties, it would appear to be competent to exercise criminal jurisdiction over any national of a State Party in the same way that the State Party's own domestic courts could. For the purpose of asserting criminal jurisdiction over a dual national suspect, therefore, there appears to be no reason why the Court need consider either the closeness of nexus of each nationality claim or the extra-territorial reach of domestic law over the conduct of each state's nationals abroad. Thus, the fact that an individual has more than one nationality should not shield a person from criminal liability and so deprive the Court of jurisdiction.

Another question is whether nationality must have been obtained when the crime was committed or at the time of prosecution.[68] According to the former, a person becomes liable to prosecution by the state of his nationality at the time of the offence, and this liability is not terminated by subsequent expatriation or naturalization abroad.[69] In relation to nationality at the time of prosecution, state practice varies for prosecutions brought with respect to persons who have obtained the forum state's nationality after the offence was committed. Reliance in such cases is typically reserved for particularly serious offences such as the commission of war crimes, particularly in relation to the Second World War;[70] although at least in the case of war crimes the assertion of criminal jurisdiction irrespective of nationality would in any event be necessary under the repression requirements of the Geneva Convention's grave breaches regime.[71]

[67] 'Harvard Research Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime' (1935) 29 American Journal of International Law (Supp.) 532–3; see discussion in Deen-Racsmany who relies on an approach to dual nationality based on the principle of equality: 'since all states of which the person is a national are equals, they may derive the same rights from this link irrespective of its strength, including the right to exercise jurisdiction over crimes committed by that person'; Z Deen-Racsmany, 'The Nationality of the Offender and the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court' (2001) 95 American Journal of International Law 666, 610.

[68] Art 5 of the Harvard Research Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime reflects the permissive rule that states may choose to exercise of jurisdiction over their own nationals on either ground; see Harvard Research Draft Convention (n 67) 519 et seq.

[69] Ibid., 531. As the commentary continues: 'Were the rule otherwise, a criminal might escape prosecution by change of nationality after committing the crime'; ibid., 532.

[70] See e.g. Section 1, War Crimes Act 1991 (UK) and the subsequent case brought against Anthony Sewoniuk, a Belorussian Nazi collaborator from pre-war Poland (now Damachava, Belarus), who served in the SS, later deserted and joined the Polish army, and became a British national after the war; Judgment, R. v Sawoniuk, Court of Appeal (Criminal Division), 10 February 2000.

[71] Art 49 Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 31 ('Geneva Convention I'); Art 50 Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 85 ('Geneva Convention II'); Art 129 Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of

Two questions therefore arise as to the persistence of the Court's personal jurisdiction where: (i) the suspect, having had the nationality of a State Party at the time of the alleged offence, changes nationality thereafter, thereby losing State Party nationality at the time ICC jurisdiction is asserted (nationality at the time of the offence); and (ii) the suspect does not have State Party nationality at the time of the offence, but does so at the time the ICC seeks to exercise its jurisdiction (nationality at the time of prosecution).

One option could be to examine the manner in which the particular State Party's own domestic legislation prescribes extra-territorial jurisdiction over its own nationals, the argument being that since the ICC exercises its jurisdictional competence by way of delegation, the Court could follow the particular approach taken by the state which would ordinarily assert jurisdiction on this basis. Support might be found in the complementarity regime, which provides that the Court is to have regard to the jurisdiction of states that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime concerned (Article 18(2)), and that any state with jurisdiction may challenge the admissibility of the case (Article 19(2)(b)). Since domestic law, not the ICC Statute, regulates matters of prescriptive jurisdiction, and since the Court will be bound to accept the standing of such states to assert their jurisdiction in the manner so prescribed (irrespective of resolution on the merits), it might be argued that the Court could logically extend its own exercise of jurisdiction on the same basis as the domestic court concerned would. However, such a reading would make the parameters of the ICC's jurisdiction dependent on municipal characterization, which might result in inconsistencies and lacunae. Moreover, while the principles of territory and active personality applied by the Court under Article 12(2)(a)–(b) flow from commonly recognized bases of jurisdiction conferred by States Parties, the Court need neither mirror nor follow the manner in which such jurisdiction is asserted domestically.[72] This is demonstrated by the fact that although all states exercise jurisdiction over crimes occurring on their territory, not all do so for offences committed by their nationals abroad, and if so in only limited circumstances depending on the particular offence. To exercise jurisdiction based on active personality, however, the Court is not required to first ascertain whether the state of nationality of the suspect itself exercises such a base of jurisdiction with respect to the particular conduct alleged before the ICC. States, nonetheless, enjoy broad discretion in the matter of prescriptive jurisdiction,[73] and Prisoners of War (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 137 ('Geneva Convention III'); Art 146 Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 287 ('Geneva Convention IV'). The Harvard Draft Convention includes active personality jurisdiction based on nationality at the time of prosecution in the light of each state's prerogative as to how it chooses to prescribe jurisdiction over its own nationals, as well as to avoid the risk of impunity resulting from persons who may seek to change their nationality so as to benefit from the laws of another state that refuses extradition of its own nationals; Harvard Research Draft Convention (n 67) 532.

[72] State practice also varies, for example, in the extension of nationality jurisdiction with respect to residence or other connections of allegiance owed by aliens, as well as in relation to stateless persons and refugees; Brownlie (n 61) 303; Deen-Racsmany (n 67) 616–22.

[73] As the PCIJ held in the Lotus case, states are presumed to enjoy broad discretion in matters of prescriptive jurisdiction: France v Turkey (Lotus case), PCIJ, Series A. No. 10 (1927) para. 46.

a state can delegate the exercise of such discretionary jurisdiction with respect to its territory and nationals to the ICC by way of a treaty, irrespective of how it chooses to prescribe such jurisdiction domestically, and without the ICC being bound by its municipal characterization or application.

A better approach is to look to the Court's own legal framework. In particular, Article 22 provides that criminal responsibility under the Statute arises where the conduct constitutes, at the time it takes place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court. Thus, the subsequent loss of nationality after the commission of the crime should be irrelevant to the question of whether the individual fell within the personal jurisdiction of the Court at the time the crime occurred. For the same reason, however, this would suggest that the Court cannot exercise personal jurisdiction where the person obtains State Party nationality subsequent to committing the crime.[74] Article 24 further provides that no person shall be criminally responsible under the Statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the Statute. However, this appears to relate to the general temporal threshold stipulated in Article 11(1) and not to the entry into force of the Statute for a particular State Party (Article 11(2)), since an individual committing a crime on the territory of another State Party will still be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court even if the Statute had not yet entered into force for his/her state of nationality.

The treaty-based considerations as to the personal parameters of the Court's jurisdiction under Article 12 are set aside where the Security Council refers a situation. In particular, when acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, the Security Council can place binding obligations (including the acceptance of jurisdiction) on any UN Member State, thereby enabling the exercise of ICC jurisdiction over the national of any UN Member State. The authority of the Security Council to do so derives from the UN Charter, not from the Rome Statute. The Statute, which regulates the competence of the Court, merely provides an enabling legal basis for the ICC to recognize and receive such a referral. Article 13(b) thus serves as a bridging mechanism between the pre-existing competence of the Security Council to take certain measures under Chapter VII of the UN Charter and the competence of the Court to act upon such a referral.[75]

[74] This is without prejudice to the particular facts and possibly complex circumstances that might arise in a concrete case in situations of unclear acquisition, termination or transfer of allegiance. Although not directly transferable see e.g. the approach towards complex facts adopted by the ICTY Appeals Chamber supra (n 56). Art 22 ICC Statute would of course not apply to the exercise of domestic jurisdiction, including in relation to state requests or challenges brought pursuant to Arts 18(2) and 19(2)(b). See contra, Deen-Racsmany (n 67) 615, who argues that nationality either at the time of prosecution or at the time of commission should suffice for the assertion of ICC jurisdiction to avoid the undesirable results, including impunity and abuse, that might flow from individuals manipulating their nationality status to avoid liability.

[75] In this regard, Art 13(b) ICC Statute neither creates nor confers upon the Security Council the power to make a referral: instead, this power is presumed to already exist under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, as is borne out by the practice of the Security Council in creating ad hoc tribunals. Rather, Art 13(b), as with all the other provisions of the Statute, regulates the competence of the Court, and in this respect, the ability of the Court to recognize and act upon a referral from the Security Council. As the provision states, this has the consequence of enabling the ICC to exercise its jurisdiction. Hence the wording 'The Court may exercise its jurisdiction… if: (b) a situation… is referred… by the United Nations Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations', meaning the Court's

A different set of considerations arise in relation to Security Council referrals, not so much as to the interpretive scope of nationality, but as to the limits that may be placed on the exercise of ICC jurisdiction. To date the Security Council has not conferred jurisdiction expressly by reference to personal parameters, designating the exercise of ICC jurisdiction instead by reference to territory—although it could conceivably do so as it did when establishing the jurisdiction of the ICTR on the basis of both territory and active personality.[76] It might appear worryingly selective were the Security Council to extend criminal jurisdiction by dint of nationality only, providing jurisdiction only with respect to certain nationals and not others, where this purposefully failed to encompass all parties to the conflict or was contrary to the factual pattern of allegations before it, bearing in mind the view repeatedly expressed during the drafting history for the need to prevent states or the Security Council pre-determining the focus of future ICC investigations by reference to a particular conduct, suspect, or party. Indeed, the adoption of the term 'situation' which would form the subject of a referral, as opposed to alternatives such as 'case' or 'matter', was chosen to prevent such outcomes.[77] As described earlier, while there might be circumstances where the ICC enjoys partial personal jurisdiction within a situation due to its treaty-based limitations, meaning it can only examine the conduct of State Party nationals on the territory of a non-Party State, the imposition of restrictions on personal parameters by the Security Council as a matter of choice would arguably offend the principle that a referring body cannot limit the jurisdictional parameters of a situation to one side of the conflict or to particular individuals, or for that matter exclude certain nationals.

Although the Security Council has to date not chosen to confer jurisdiction by virtue of active personality, it has controversially sought to limit the personal scope of situations otherwise provided for on the basis of territory. Following earlier Security Council Resolutions 1422 (2002) and 1487 (2003) which had sought, in the abstract, to prevent the ICC from exercising jurisdiction over nationals of non-Party States participating in United Nations peacekeeping operations, the same formulation was carried competence is engaged where the Security Council decides to so act in accordance with the UN Charter. The same logic applies to Art 16, which again merely serves as a bridging provision between an act by the Security Council under its own Charter regime and the recognized consequence of that act for the ICC under the Rome Statute. See also Jacobs, Chapter 12, this volume.

[76] See Art 1 Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex: 'The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute.'

[77] See Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, vol. I (n 19) para. 146: 'Some delegations were uneasy with a regime that allowed any State party to select individual suspects and lodge complaints with the Prosecutor with respect to them, for this could encourage politicization of the complaint procedure. Instead, according to these delegations, States parties should be empowered to refer "situations" to the Prosecutor in a manner similar to the way provided for the Security Council in article 23 (1). Once a situation was referred to the Prosecutor, it was noted, he or she could initiate a case against an individual. It was suggested, however, that in certain circumstances a referral of a situation to the Prosecutor might point to particular individuals as likely targets for investigation.' This scheme is reflected in the formulation of Art 14(1)–(2) ICC Statute.

over into the first referral by the Security Council of a situation to the ICC.[78] In particular, Resolution 1593 (2005), referring the Situation in Darfur, Sudan, includes the following:

> Taking note of the existence of agreements referred to in Article 98-2 of the Rome Statute…
>
> Decides that nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a contributing State outside Sudan which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that contributing State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to operations in Sudan established or authorized by the Council or the African Union, unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by that contributing State.[79]

The impact of the apparent carve out on personal jurisdiction remains contested, including among UN Member States. While the United States has unequivocally expressed its views on its intended scope,[80] other states have voiced disquiet over its retention and legal effects. For example, in the debates on the adoption of Resolution 1593, Brazil abstained from voting due to the inclusion of paragraph 6 and the reference to Article 98, recalling in this regard its earlier objections to Resolutions 1422 and 1487:[81]

> The text just approved contains a preambular paragraph through which the Council takes note of the existence of agreements referred to in article 98-2 of the Rome Statute. My delegation has difficulty in supporting a reference that not only does not favour the fight against impunity but also stresses a provision whose application has been a highly controversial issue. We understand that it would be a contradiction to [78] UNSC Res 1422 (12 July 2002) UN Doc S/RES/1422 was adopted on the eve of the entry into force of the Statute in July 2002, after the US threatened to exercise its veto to block the otherwise routine extensions for all upcoming UN peacekeeping operations, beginning with the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina. A number of states in open discussion before the vote on both resolutions and during parallel proceedings at the ICC Preparatory Commission suggested that the Council may have violated the express terms of Art 16 and inappropriately interfered with the treaty-making process: see UN Doc S/PV.4568 (Resumption 1) + Corr.1 (10 July 2002); UN Doc S/PV.4772 (12 June 2003); PCNICC/2002/L.3 (18 July 2002).

[79] UNSC Res 1593 (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/RES/1593, para. 6. See also UNSC Res 1970 (26 February 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1970, para. 6: 'Decides that nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a State outside the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to operations in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya established or authorized by the Council, unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by the State', referring in its preamble to Art 16, not Art 98(2). See also UNSC Res 1422 (n 78) and UNSC Res 1487 (12 June 2003) UN Doc S/RES/1487, also invoking Art 16 rather than Art 98(2).

[80] UN Doc S/PV.5158 (31 March 2005) 3: 'The United States continues to fundamentally object to the view that the ICC should be able to exercise jurisdiction over the nationals, including government officials, of States not party to the Rome Statute. That strikes at the essence of the nature of sovereignty.… The language providing protection for the United States and other contributing States is precedent-setting, as it clearly acknowledges the concerns of States not party to the Rome Statute and recognizes that persons from those States should not be vulnerable to investigation or prosecution by the ICC, absent consent by those States or a referral by the Security Council. We believe that, in the future, absent consent of the State involved, any investigations or prosecutions of nationals of non-party States should come only pursuant to a decision by the Security Council.'

[81] See UN Doc S/PV.4772 (n 78) 13.

> mention, in the very text of a referral by the Council to the ICC, measures that limit the jurisdictional activity of the Court. In addition, Brazil also was not in a position to support operative paragraph 6, through which the Council recognizes the existence of exclusive jurisdiction, a legal exception that is inconsistent in international law.[82]

Similar sentiments were aired by Argentina:

> We believe that the letter and spirit of the Rome Statute must be respected and that the balance of its provisions must be preserved, taking into account the legitimate concerns of States without weakening in any way the powers of the Court. For that reason, we regret that we had to adopt a text that establishes an exception to the jurisdiction of the Court. It is our hope that this will not become standard practice.[83]

And by the Philippines:

> We also believe that the International Criminal Court (ICC) may be a casualty of resolution 1593 (2005). Operative paragraph 6 of the resolution is killing its credibility—softly, perhaps, but killing it nevertheless. We may ask whether the Security Council has the prerogative to mandate the limitation of the jurisdiction of the ICC under the Rome Statute once the exercise of its jurisdiction has advanced. Operative paragraph 6 subtly subsumed the independence of the ICC into the political and diplomatic vagaries of the Security Council.[84]

The same formulation was repeated in operative paragraph 6 of Security Council Resolution 1970 (2011) referring the Situation in Libya,[85] but was linked this time in its preamble to Article 16 as opposed to Article 98(2), resulting in similar observations.[86]

While a factual basis to contest the issue did not arise in the context of Darfur, the prosecutor has openly questioned the exemption before the Security Council in the Libya context, in particular in relation to allegations concerning the targeting practice of NATO-led sorties, suggesting the operative paragraph 6 of Resolution 1970 was void of legal effect insofar as it affected the exercise of ICC jurisdiction: '[t]he Office does not have jurisdiction to assess the legality of the use of force and evaluate the proper scope of NATO's mandate in relation to UNSC Resolution 1973. The Office does have a mandate, however, to investigate allegations of crimes by all actors.'[87]

[82] UN Doc S/PV.5158 (n 80), records of debates on draft Resolution S/2005/218, at 11.

[83] Ibid., 7–8. [84] Ibid., 6.

[85] See e.g. para. 6 of UNSC Res 1970 (n 79): 'Decides that nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a State outside the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to operations in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya established or authorized by the Council, unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by the State'.

[86] See e.g. UN Doc S/PV.6491 'Peace and security in Africa' (26 February 2011), record of debates on draft Resolution S/2011/95, at 7: 'Brazil is a long-standing supporter of the integrity and universality of the Rome Statute. We oppose the exemption from jurisdiction of nationals of those countries not parties to the Rome Statute. In the face of the gravity of the situation in Libya and the urgent need for the Council to send a strong, unified message, my delegation supported this resolution. However, we express our strong reservation concerning paragraph 6. We reiterate our conviction that initiatives aimed at establishing exemptions of certain categories of individuals from the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court are not helpful to advancing the cause of justice and accountability and will not contribute to strengthening the role of the Court.'

[87] Third Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), OTP, ICC, 16 May 2012, para. 54.

Although the Security Council failed to refer the Situation in Syria to the ICC following the veto exercised by Russia and China, the formulation at paragraph 7 of draft Resolution S/2014/348 mirrored in relevant part Resolutions 1593 and 1970.[88] The wording again triggered disquiet over its apparent incongruity with the Rome Statute and the freedom of the Court to determine its impact, as expressed by Argentina:

> The Security Council does not have the power to declare an amendment to the Statute in order to grant immunity to nationals of States non-parties who commit crimes under the Statute in a situation referred to the Court. That is to say, nothing in the text of paragraph 7 or of any other paragraph of the draft resolution on which we have just voted would have had the power to amend the standard of the Statute with regard to the Court's jurisdiction in a given situation or the fact that if a decision is needed, the Court is ultimately the judge of its own jurisdiction.[89]

The inclusion of such provisions appears problematic for several reasons. For example, to the extent that Resolution 1593 takes cognizance of the fact that Article 98 agreements exist with respect to the deployment of foreign personnel, the legal effects of such agreements are already incorporated into Part 9 of the Statute and take direct effect within the legal regime of the Court as a matter of state cooperation. Thus, the Court cannot proceed with a request that would place a State Party in potential violation of another treaty obligation with respect to a third state's national. The purpose of Article 98 in this regard is not to regulate the exercise of criminal jurisdiction, but to avoid a conflict of laws. Reference to Article 16 in the same resolutions is also superfluous since it has no impact on jurisdictional matters, regulating only possible interruptions of investigations or prosecutions. The resolutions described, however, attempt to fold the provisions of Articles 16 and 98 into the jurisdictional scheme of the Court itself. In particular, in each, the operative paragraph is framed in terms of exclusive criminal jurisdiction, a concept that belongs properly to status of forces agreements (SOFA) or status of mission agreements (SOMA), whereby states may agree bilaterally on the reversion of criminal jurisdiction exclusively to the sending state. It has no place, however, in a Security Council resolution vis-à-vis the powers of the ICC insofar as the Council is neither establishing a SOFA with the ICC nor an agreement with respect to the division of competence. Instead, the formulation is imposed as a jurisdictional exemption from that which would otherwise be applied by an independent international body. Moreover, such jurisdictional carve-outs seek to do that which neither Article 16 nor Article 98 of the Statute permit, for under both provisions the Court's jurisdiction is not nullified, only its exercise is postponed. In the case of Article 16, the Court's acknowledged competence is subject to a time-bound renewal process, failing which the exercise of jurisdiction proceeds. Under Article 98, while [88] UN Doc S/2014/348 (22 May 2014) para. 7: 'Decides that nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a State outside the Syrian Arab Republic which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to operations in the Syrian Arab Republic established or authorized by the Council, unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by the State'.

[89] UN Doc S/PV.7180 'The situation in the Middle East (Syria)' (22 May 2014), record of debates on draft Resolution S/2014/348, at 11.

an agreement under sub-paragraphs 1 or 2 may modify the cooperation obligations of the requested state, it does not deprive the Court of jurisdiction. Indeed the raison d'être for Article 98 is recognition that the Court has and is exercising jurisdiction with respect to a particular sought person.

The Court will have to determine the boundaries of its own competence in the context of any concrete case that is brought before it and so consider the legal effects of any purported restriction to the exercise of its jurisdiction. Clearly, whereas the Security Council can impose Chapter VII obligations on UN Member States requiring them to comply with its decisions in accordance with its functions and powers under the UN Charter, and while such obligations take precedence for UN Member States over any conflicting treaty obligations under international law,[90] the Council cannot so obligate an international organization with separate legal personality.[91] As such, the Security Council cannot seek to effectively amend the operation of the Rome Statute contrary to the terms expressly provided for in the treaty by enshrining jurisdictional exemptions to the exercise of ICC jurisdiction.

On adoption of the Darfur referral, the US notably argued that what the Council was doing was no different from what States Parties had decided in allowing an opt-out from war crimes for seven years pursuant to Article 124 of the Statute, suggesting that what is available to States Parties should also be available to non-Party States, in particular at the Council's request.[92] Notwithstanding views over the inclusion of Article 124, its existence is contained within the treaty itself pursuant to the agreement of negotiating states at the time of its adoption and is therefore binding on the Court. So is Article 16 enabling the Security Council to request a deferral of an ICC investigation or prosecution for a renewable twelve-month period. Amendments of the Statute by the Assembly of States Parties would similarly bind the Court.[93] By contrast, the adoption of a resolution that sought to amend the statutory regime for the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction via Chapter VII of the UN Charter would offend fundamental treaty-making processes, liable to be rendered invalid in any concomitant proceedings before the Court.

The aims of the Security Council might have been better served perhaps if, instead of referring situations to the ICC on the basis of territory accompanied by an opt-out on particular nationalities, it had referred the situation by virtue of active personality [90] Arts 25 and 103 UN Charter.

[91] See R Rastan, 'Testing Cooperation: The ICC and National Authorities' (2008) 2 Leiden Journal of International Law 431, 441–4 and accompanying text in n 6.

[92] United States: 'Protection from the jurisdiction of the Court should not be viewed as unusual. Indeed, under article 124, even parties to the Rome Statute can opt out from the Court's jurisdiction over war crimes for a period of seven full years, and important supporters of the Court have in fact availed themselves of that opportunity to protect their own personnel. If it is appropriate to afford such protection from the jurisdiction of the Court to States that have agreed to the Rome Statute, it cannot be inappropriate to afford protection to those that have never agreed. It is our view that non-party States should be able to opt out of the Court's jurisdiction, as parties to the Statute can, and the Council should be prepared to take action to that effect as appropriate situations arise in the future'; UN Doc S/PV.5158 (n 80) 3.

[93] Arguably, the Security Council could impose Chapter VII obligations on UN Member States to give effect to its decision through the international organizations of which they were a part, including the Assembly of States Parties, but could not directly amend the Statute or alter the Court's jurisdictional regime.

by opting in with respect to certain nationalities only. This might have ostensibly avoided the difficulties described with respect to the Court's jurisdictional regime, even if it would have occasioned the same political and policy concerns as to selectivity—particularly where it purposefully failed to encompass all the parties to the conflict involved or the factual pattern of allegations. However, this route would have triggered its own controversies, not least of which would be its consistency with the strong opposition voiced throughout the negotiations against selective referrals linked to particular conduct, suspects, or parties.[94] It would also have contradicted the more fully developed provisions concerning proceedings initiated by states, whereby a State Party referral concerning 'a situation in which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court appear to have been committed' results in a request to the prosecutor to 'investigate the situation for the purpose of determining whether one or more specific persons should be charged with the commission of such crimes'.[95] Similarly Rule 44, in clarifying the scope of a declaration lodged under Article 12(3) by a non-Party State (i.e. in analogous situations where the Court would otherwise not have jurisdiction), confirms that this 'has as a consequence the acceptance of jurisdiction with respect to the crimes referred to in article 5 of relevance to the situation' (emphasis added). It would be difficult to argue that the Security Council should enjoy a broader right than states to make selective referrals or declarations, particularly where no such distinction is found in the debates during negotiations, and no special considerations, such as the Council's Chapter VII authority under the UN Charter, merit modification of the Court's own powers under the Rome Statute.

7.5 Territorial Jurisdiction

The territorial jurisdiction of the Court is delimited by Article 12 to crimes occurring on the territory of a State Party (Article 12(2)(a)) or a state that has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court on an ad hoc basis (Article 12(3)). It also extends to crimes committed on board a vessel or aircraft which is registered to either of these states.[96] This form of jurisdiction is an alternative to that asserted on the basis of active personality described previously. This territorial limitation is set aside where the Security Council refers a situation pursuant to Article 13(b), which may concern alleged crimes committed on the territory of any UN Member State.

The exercise of criminal jurisdiction within one's own territory is one of the most traditional aspects of state sovereignty.[97] That right includes the ability to exercise

[94] See supra (n 77).

[95] Art 14(1) ICC Statute. The fact that the Statute prevents a referring body from restricting the scope of preliminary examination or investigation does not mean that specific allegations against named individuals or identified incidents cannot be provided. Indeed, States are encouraged to provide such information: 'As far as possible, a referral shall specify the relevant circumstances and be accompanied by such supporting documentation as is available to the State referring the situation' (Art 14(2)). Such information may also be sought by the Prosecutor following a State Party or Security Council referral (Rule 104).

[96] Art 12(2)(a) ICC Statute.

[97] 'Sovereignty in the relations between States signifies independence. Independence in regard to a portion of the globe is the right to exercise therein, to the exclusion of any other State, the functions of a State.' Island of Palmas Case (Netherlands v U.S.), Permanent Court of Arbitration (1928), 2 UN Rep. International Arbitral Awards, 829.

jurisdiction over foreign nationals committing crimes on its territory, subject only to certain restrictions relating to the state or diplomatic immunity with respect to certain foreign nationals on a state's soil in such capacity, or agreements relating to exclusive criminal jurisdiction between a sending state and the host state, such as a SOFA. The application of these same principles is recognized in the Statute, except that they apply not as limitation to the exercise of jurisdiction (Article 27), but as limitation to the obligations that can be placed on States Parties concerning the surrender of foreign nationals to the Court (Article 98).[98] In this respect, the provisions of the Rome Statute whereby jurisdiction may be exercised with respect to the nationals of non-Party States who committed crimes on the territory of States Parties is not novel and represents a generally recognized base for the assertion of criminal jurisdiction pursuant to international cooperation in the suppression of treaty-based crimes such as piracy,[99] terrorism,[100] drug trafficking,[101] torture,[102] war crimes,[103] and genocide.[104] The only difference with the ICC is that States Parties have authorized the Court to substitute itself for their own jurisdiction through delegation.[105] Rather than creating a form of collective extra-territoriality towards that non-obligated third state, amounting to unilateral, interventionist action in violation of Article 34 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties,[106] the Rome Statute enables the exercise of jurisdiction not with respect to an action against a third state, but with respect to the nationals of such third [98] See supra, section 4.

[99] Arts 14–22, Convention on the High Seas (adopted 29 April 1958, entered into force 30 September 1962) 450 UNTS 11; Arts 100–7 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (adopted 10 December 1982, entered into force 16 November 1994) 1833 UNTS 3.

[100] Art 4 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft (signed 16 December 1970, entered into force 14 October 1971) 860 UNTS 105; Art 5 Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation (concluded 23 September 1971, entered into force 26 January 1973) 974 UNTS 178; Art 3 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents (adopted 14 December 1973, entered into force 20 February 1977) 1035 UNTS 167; Art 5 International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages (adopted 17 December 1979, entered into force 3 June 1983) 1316 UNTS 205; Art 3 Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Maritime Navigation (signed 10 March 1988, entered into force 1 March 1992) 1678 UNTS 221; Art 2 Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Fixed Platforms Located on the Continental Shelf (concluded 10 March 1988, entered into force 1 March 1992) 1678 UNTS 304; Art 7 International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism (9 December 1999, entered into force 10 April 2002) 2178 UNTS 197.

[101] Art 36(2)(iv) Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs (adopted 39 March 1961, entered into force 13 December 1964) 520 UNTS 151; Art 4(2)(b) Convention Against the Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs (adopted 20 December 1988, entered into force 11 November 1990) 1582 UNTS 95.

[102] Art 5(2) Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (adopted 10 December 1984, entered into force 26 June 1987) 1465 UNTS 85.

[103] Art 49 Geneva Convention I (n 71); Art 50 Geneva Convention II (n 71); Art 129 Geneva Convention III (n 71); Art 146 Geneva Convention IV (n 71).

[104] Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (adopted 9 December 1948, entered into force 12 January 1951) 78 UNTS 277.

[105] The Nuremberg Tribunal held that the framers of the Nuremburg Charter had done the same, stating 'The Signatory Powers created this Tribunal, defined the law it was to administer, and made regulations for the proper conduct of the Trial. In doing so, they have done together what any one of them might have done singly; for it is not to be doubted that any nation has the right thus to set up special courts to administer law'; Judgment, IMT Nuremberg, 30 September 1946, 22 IMT 447.

[106] The position is classically expressed by D Scheffer, 'The United States and the International Criminal Court' (1999) 93 American Journal of International Law 12; and R Wedgwood, 'The International Criminal Court: An American View' (1999) 10 European Journal of International Law 93.

state, meaning no international obligations are thereby created by the treaty for the third state.[107]

Looking at the practice of the ICC to date, the territorial delimitation of a situation has been the principal way in which the Court's jurisdiction has been exercised. The Situations in the DRC, Uganda, Central African Republic, Darfur, Kenya, Libya, Côte d'Ivoire, and Mali are all territorially defined. This is also in line with the way in which referrals have been characterized, although the Court has exercised some discretion in interpreting the territorial scope of referrals.[108] The cases arising from these situations also relate to acts allegedly committed within the confines of one state. Moreover, to date none of the resultant cases from any of the situations before the Court concern the exercise of jurisdiction over third state nationals from non-Party States committing crimes on the territory of the situation country.[109] Only the situation referred by the Comoros 'with respect to the 31 May 2010 Israeli raid on the Humanitarian Aid Flotilla bound for Gaza strip' relates to alleged crimes occurring on the territory of more than one state. It is also the first State Party referral that triggers the exercise of jurisdiction in relation to the territory of other states, while referring also to crimes committed on its own territory, and the first to do so in relation to flag jurisdiction.[110] Moreover, it is a situation of partial jurisdiction, since of the eight vessels forming part of the flotilla, the Court has only territorial jurisdiction in relation to three ships registered to States Parties, namely the vessels registered in the Comoros, Greece, and Cambodia—although this appears not to have had any substantive impact given that the main allegations concerned the excessive use of force on-board the MV Mavi Marmara, registered in the Comoros.[111] Other than the Comoros, it is only in situations currently or previously under preliminary examination that crimes have allegedly been committed by the nationals of non-Party States on the territory of States Parties, including in South Korea, Afghanistan, and Georgia.

[107] It might be argued that the jurisdiction of international bodies differs from that of national forums because the protections under law of state immunities can be set aside by an international court, thereby depriving a third state of internationally recognized protections that seek to ensure the unimpeded conduct of its foreign relations and non-interference in the performance of official functions by its nationals abroad. However, as described, the Statute enshrines applicable limitations under international law to the surrender of third state nationals based on state or diplomatic immunity or non-surrender agreements, which may lawfully suspend the cooperation obligations of States Parties in a concrete case.

[108] See e.g. the referral by the Government of Uganda in relation to 'Northern and Western Uganda', which the prosecution characterized as the situation in 'Northern Uganda', and the Presidency assigned it to Pre-Trial Chamber II as the situation in 'Uganda'; Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony Issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC II, ICC, 27 September 2005, 1, paras 30–1. By contrast, the Security Council referral of the situation in Darfur was maintained by the Court in relation to only that region of Sudan, doubtless because the ICC does not otherwise posses jurisdiction in relation to the rest of the country.

[109] Even in the situations in Darfur and Libya, although the suspects in the cases concerned are nationals of non-Party States, their nationality corresponds to territory where the crimes occurred, i.e. they are not third state nationals.

[110] Decision Assigning the Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of the Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia to Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of the Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia, ICC-01/13-1, Presidency, ICC, 5 July 2013.

[111] The other vessels were registered to Turkey, Kiribati, Togo, and the US; ibid., Annex 1.

A number of issues related to territory might arise in future proceedings. For example, it may be possible that the Court exercises only partial territorial reach over a particular armed conflict or incidence of violence spanning more than one territory. Violence in state A, where the Court has territorial jurisdiction, might cross the border into state B, where it does not. As a result, an international armed conflict might only be partially captured by the territorial reach of the Court. This might result in disjointed jurisdictional reach, since the personal jurisdiction would remain intact for state A nationals crossing into state B, but would not extend to state B nationals unless they entered state A.

Another variant may concern the territorial reach of the Court with respect to the particular conduct of an individual where his or her contribution is made outside of the territory of the state where the crimes occur, be this from the territory of another State Party or that of a non-Party State. In the Mbarushimana case, for example, the defence sought to argue that the suspect was not amenable to the scope of the situation because his contribution was made on the territory of France not the DRC. Since the DRC had referred the situation with respect to crimes occurring on its own territory, it was argued that those allegedly taking place abroad would fall foul of its territorial reach.[112] The issue was only raised in preliminary form in a defence leave to reply, which was ultimately denied as the Chamber held that these were new legal arguments unrelated to any issues arising from the prosecution's response to the defence's jurisdictional challenge. Even though the Chamber did not rule on the merits, the argument raises a number of interesting questions. As a preliminary matter, it is doubtful whether a contribution to the commission of a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose, as alleged in the case, triggers considerations of territoriality, since all of the mental and material elements of the alleged crimes occurred in the DRC.[113] Assuming, however, in relation to a different factual scenario that territoriality did apply, the question would relate to the locus delicti and the reach of liability for persons engaging in acts in one territory where the effects are caused in the other. International law has long recognized the permissibility of an extra-territorial application of the territorial based on the subjective or objective application of the territorial principle.[114] For the assertion of jurisdiction, it has commonly been accepted that it is

[112] Defence request for leave to reply to the Prosecution's response to the Defence challenge to the jurisdiction of the Court and Defence request to adduce oral testimony, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, PTC I, ICC, ICC-01/04-01/10-323, 1 August 2011, para. 6: 'in so far as the sum total of Mr Mbarushimana's alleged contribution to the criminal common purpose is concerned (i.e. his purported handling of the "deceitful" international media campaign)—all of it was conducted on French territory and not in the DRC. In circumstances such as these, therefore, the Defence will argue that the basic precondition for jurisdiction under Article 12 of the Rome Statute ceases to exist since the referral was not made by the State on the territory of which "the conduct in question" occurred.'

[113] In relation to Art 25(3)(d), the Statute provides that the contribution shall be intentional and shall either: (i) be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or (ii) be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime. Art 30(2) provides that a person has intent where (a) in relation to conduct, that person means to engage in the conduct; or (b) in relation to a consequence, that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.

[114] See e.g. Lotus case (n 73). The objective territoriality principle relates to acts commenced abroad, but completed in the forum state, while the subjective territoriality principle relates to acts initiated in necessary and sufficient that one constituent element of the act or situation has been consummated in the territory of the state that claims jurisdiction.[115] A state can claim jurisdiction, thus, if the offence has been committed, in part or in whole, in its territory, in the sense that a constituent element of the offence occurred in its territory.[116] Accordingly, there appears to be no reason why the Court could not exercise jurisdiction pursuant to a referral from the state where the crime was completed, for example, based on the objective application of the territoriality principle.[117] Moreover, although in the Lotus case mens rea was irrelevant to the assertion of jurisdiction under the objective territorial principle since the crime was one of inadvertence, arguably intention and motive could be taken into account as a further factor where the suspect aimed for the consequence to occur within the territory of another state.[118]

Finally, issues of territorial scope may also arise with respect to disputed territories. For example, the Court has or is currently examining a number of situations where the demarcation of state boundaries is contested, including in relation to Palestine,[119] Georgia,[120] and Ukraine[121]. In these circumstances, because the issue relates to one the forum state, but completed abroad. See also the principle of ubiquity (Ubiquitätsprinzip) under, e.g., Section 9 of the German Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch, StGB). See also C Blakesly, 'Jurisdiction' in C Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law, vol. 2 (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 1999) 48; S Bourgon, 'Jurisdiction Ratione Loci' in Cassese et al. (n 57) 556–7.

[115] C Ryngaert, Jurisdiction in International Law (New York: Oxford University Press 2008) 75–6. See generally C Blakesly, 'Jurisdiction' in C Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law: Multilateral and Bilateral Enforcement Mechanisms, vol. 2, 3rd edn (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 96–108. See also Harvard Research Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime (n 67) 495, which provides: 'a crime is committed "in whole" within the territory when every essential constituent element is consummated within the territory; it is committed "in part within the territory" when any essential constituent element is consummated there. If it is committed either "in whole or in part" within the territory, there is territorial jurisdiction.'

[116] As Akehurst notes, '[t]his is the formulation adopted in the Lotus case, by the Harvard Research Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, by Article 18 of the American Law Institute's Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, by the criminal codes of many countries and by many judicial decisions in common law countries and elsewhere'; M Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction in International Law' (1972–3) 46 British Yearbook of International Law 145, 152–3. The 'constituent elements' approach under the objective territorial principle should be distinguished from the 'effects doctrine' since, whereas the effect caused in the former is a constituent part of the offence, that arising in the latter is a mere consequence or repercussion of conduct completed abroad; Jennings and Watts (n 51) 446–78; Timberlane Lumber Co. v Bank of Maerica, 549 F.2d 597 (1976); Laker Airwarys v Sabena, 731 F.2d 909 (1984); Hartford Fire Insurance v California, 509 US 764,113 Sup.Ct.2891 (1993); F. Hoffman-LaRoche Ltd v Empagran S.A.124 S.Ct.2359 (2004).

[117] See also Bourgon (n 114) 567.

[118] See Akehurst (n 116) 155. The territorial scope of a referred situation with respect to the territory of the DRC itself was also discussed in the Mbarushimana case, namely whether the scope of the situation extended only to the Ituri region or applied to the whole of the DRC, including also events occurring in neighbouring North and South Kivu; see Decision on the 'Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-451, PTC I, ICC, 26 October 2011, para. 26 ('Mbarushimana Decision on Jurisdiction'). For further discussion see Rastan, 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court' (n 32).

[119] Although this is contested bilaterally between Israel and Palestine, the UN position is based on the pre-1967 borders; see e.g. UNGA Res 67/120 (14 January 2013) UN Doc A/RES/67/120.

[120] Although the breakaway region of South Ossetia only declared its independence after the August 2008 armed conflict between Georgia and Russia.

[121] Although the temporal focus of the Art 12(3) declaration lodged with the Court spans the period 21 November 2013–22 February 2014, before the breakaway region of Crimea declared independence and was subsequently annexed by Russia.

of jurisdictional precondition in respect of the territorial boundaries of a State Party pursuant to Article 12(1)–(2), it may be reasonable for the Court to follow the practice of the United Nations, since membership of the Statute is subject to UN rules and procedures on treaty participation by virtue of the Secretary General's role as treaty depository.[122] This may concern contested territorial or maritime delimitation which has been subjected to final arbitral determination or which otherwise remains unresolved;[123] issues related to de facto or de jure control;[124] state succession;[125] or questions as to the scope of territorial application in view of so-called non-metropolitan territories versus the metropolitan territories, where the mother country is distinct from its colonies and overseas territories or dependencies, meaning parts of the territory of a state may, under its domestic law, be subject to a separate legal regime, or in view of non-autonomous or non-independent territories for the conduct of whose foreign relations certain states are internationally responsible.[126]

7.6 Temporal Jurisdiction

The temporal parameters of the Court's jurisdiction apply as a default from the entry into force of the Statute (1 July 2002).[127] Accordingly, while the territorial and personal parameters of the Court's jurisdiction may vary over time, as more states become party to the Statute or states not party become subject to ICC jurisdiction by virtue of Article 12(3) declarations or United Nations Security Council referrals, and while its subject matter jurisdiction may undergo amendment, the temporal delimitation for the entry into force of the Statute is fixed.[128] Article 22 further enshrines the principle that no person shall be criminally responsible under the Statute unless the conduct in question constitutes, at the time it takes place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court (nullum crimen sine lege). Article 24 provides that no one will be held criminally

[122] Art 125 ICC Statute. In respect of non-Party States, although the verification procedure for a state that lodges a declaration under Art 12(3) is not defined in the Statute, the Prosecutor has to date observed that it will follow the same procedure as that which would apply were the state concerned to seek to become a State Party—the premise being that Art 12(3) is available as a mechanism for the acceptance of the exercise of ICC jurisdiction to a state that would otherwise be able to become a State Party: meaning, in reverse, that if the entity concerned could not become a State Party, it cannot, in the alternative, lodge an ad hoc declaration, as the 'state' concerned under each limb of Art 12 must possess the same essential prerequisites. See Situation in Palestine, OTP, ICC, 3 April 2012, para. 6; 'The determination of the Office of the Prosecutor on the communication received in relation to Egypt', ICC Press Release, 8 May 2014.

[123] See e.g. competing communications entered by UK (11 March 2010) and Argentina (19 May 2010) asserting territorial application of the Rome Statute with respect to the Falkland Islands/Islas Malvinas; available at United Nations Treaty Collection online publication of all treaty actions undertaken in relation to the Rome Statute <https://treaties.un.org/pages/ViewDetails.aspx?src=TREATY&mtdsg_no=XVIII-10&chapter=18&lang=en> accessed 9 August 2014.

[124] For example, in the case of United Nations Council for Namibia established in 1967, although South Africa continued at the time to exercise de facto control over the territory, the Council exercised de jure competence, inter alia, to enact any necessary laws and recognitions and became a party to numerous treaties deposited with the Secretary General; Summary of Practice of the Secretary General as Depositary of Multilateral Treaties, ST/LEG/7/Rev.1 (1999) para. 90.

[125] Ibid., paras 288–90. [126] Ibid., para. 263. [127] Art 11 ICC Statute.

[128] This is in the sense that, subject to amendment of the Statute which is theoretically possible, there is nothing in the legal instruments of the ICC which foresees any modification to the date of entry into force of the Statute.

responsible under the Statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the Statute (non-retroactivity).[129]

With respect to individual States Parties, for those states that were part of the initial states whose ratification was necessary to bring the treaty into force, the temporal jurisdiction of the Court with respect to offences committed on their territory or by their nationals will date from the entry into force of the Statute itself, namely 1 July 2002. For those states that acceded to the Statute after its entry into force, the Statute will come into effect with respect to offences committed on their territory or by their nationals according to the timetable contained in Article 126 of the Statute, namely on the first day of the month after the 60th day following the date of the deposit by such state of its instrument of accession. This may be modified by the acceding state if it so chooses by the lodging of a declaration accepting the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court from an earlier period prior to it becoming a State Party (not earlier than 1 July 2002), during which period it would effectively be treated as a non-Party State that has accepted the exercise of ICC jurisdiction.[130]

A State Party may choose to limit the temporal jurisdiction of the Court over war crimes for an initial seven-year period after the entry into force of the Statute with respect to its nationals or its territory. Article 124 only refers to States Parties that are granted this right; as such it appears that it cannot be relied upon by a non-Party State accepting the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court under Article 12(3). This is supported by the wording of Rule 44, which was specifically adopted to clarify that an Article 12(3) declaration cannot limit the material jurisdiction of the Court. The rule reads in relevant part: 'the declaration under article 12, paragraph 3, has as a consequence the acceptance of jurisdiction with respect to the crimes referred to in article 5 of relevance to the situation and the provisions of Part 9, and any rules thereunder concerning States Parties, shall apply'.[131] Article 124 would similarly appear to be unavailable to a state not party to the Statute which is the object of a Security Council referral, since a referral pursuant to Chapter VII of the UN Charter is neither dependent on the separate consent of states, nor can it be made the object of a unilateral opt-out of jurisdiction.

The clearest effect of the timing of such acceptance of the Statute by individual states is its impact on the exercise of ICC jurisdiction. For example, because Afghanistan [129] As Per Saland, Chairman of the Working Group on the General Principles of Criminal Law during the Rome Conference, observes in the context of debates on the question of continuing crimes, the lack of agreement on the choice of a verb to go with the word 'conduct' in Art 24—such as 'committed', 'occurred', 'commenced', or 'completed'—was only resolved by suggesting the removal of any verb, even if stylistically it did not read well in English, thereby enabling the Court to settle the issue; P Saland, 'International Criminal Law Principles', in Lee (n 8) 196–7.

[130] Art 11(2) ICC Statute. See e.g. Art 12(3) declaration lodged by Uganda on becoming a State Party (Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony Issued on 8 July 2005 as amended on 27 September 2005, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC I, ICC, 27 September 2015, para. 39); see also El Zeidy, Chapter 8, this volume.

[131] The provision was adopted to remedy the apparent inconsistency between the wording of Art 12(3), which refers to the acceptance of 'the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the crime in question,' and Art 13 which speaks of a 'situation in which one or more of such crimes appears to have been committed' with reference in the chapeau to 'a crime referred to in article 5'; J Holmes, 'Jurisdiction and Admissibility' in Lee (n 8) 326–7.

acceded to the Statute on 1 May 2003, the Court has no territorial jurisdiction over alleged crimes committed in Afghanistan between 1 July 2002 and 30 April 2003, absent an Article 12(3) declaration to that effect. The same would apply to personal parameters relevant to the nationals of States Parties where the entry into force for that state occurs after July 2002. This could create the odd situation, such as in Iraq, where for certain State Party nationals allegedly committing crimes on the territory of Iraq active personality jurisdiction runs from 1 July 2002 (e.g. UK, Poland, Australia, Denmark), while for other State Party nationals it starts later (e.g. Georgia from 1 December 2003, Japan from 1 October 2007).

In relation to the temporal scope of State Party referrals, while a State Party may choose to circumscribe the timeframe of a particular situation it submits for investigation, it could not definitively limit the temporal jurisdiction of the Court since, subject to the entry into force date for that state as well as Article 124, the Court would enjoy inherent jurisdiction with respect to alleged crimes committed on that state's territory or by its nationals.[132] Thus, the prosecutor could always seek Pre-Trial Chamber authorization under Article 15 to extend the temporal scope of any situation so referred to encompass a broader time period.[133]

Restrictions with respect to the entry into force of the Statute for particular States Parties do not apply where the Security Council refers a situation, although the Council cannot trespass the absolute demarcation of the entry into force of the Statute itself (Article 11). It is worth recalling that the Security Council cannot authorize the ICC to act beyond the powers conferred upon it under the Statute. Unlike the ad hoc Tribunals, the ICC is not a subsidiary organ of the Council in the sense that the principal organ possesses the competence to determine the membership, structure, mandate, and duration of existence of its subsidiary organ.[134] As noted earlier, the ICC, as an international organization with a distinct legal personality, cannot be bound by the decisions of the Security Council which seeks to change the constitutional boundaries of the Court's competence. In particular, the principle of attribution holds that an international organization cannot act beyond the powers attributed to it by its constituent treaty.[135] Thus, the Security Council cannot expand the temporal scope of the Court beyond the provisions of the Rome Statute, since the ICC would then be acting ultra vires its own legislative framework.[136] It is true that the territorial and personal parameters of the Court's jurisdiction can be modified by the Security Council, by enabling the exercise of ICC jurisdiction over persons or territory which would not otherwise be amenable to the Court. But this is expressly provided for within the [132] Art 12(1) ICC Statute. See, however, Art 124.

[133] For the same reasons, an Art 15 communication with respect to a particular set of dates could not constrain the discretionary choices of the Prosecutor to open investigations and to select the parameters thereof.

[134] D Sarooshi, The United Nations and the Development of Collective Security: The Delegation by the UN Security Council of its Chapter VII Powers (New York: Oxford University Press 1999) 130.

[135] H Schermers and N Blokker, International Institutional Law: Unity within Diversity (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2003) 155.

[136] D Sarooshi, 'The Peace and Justice Paradox: The International Criminal Court and the UN Security Council' in D McGoldrick et al., The Permanent International Criminal Court: Legal and Policy Issues (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2004) 95, 106–7. See Rastan, 'Testing Cooperation' (n 91) 441–4.

jurisdictional scheme of the Statute.[137] Specifically, when the Security Council makes a referral, it enables the exercise of existing jurisdictional bases to be extended to the territory and/or nationals of other states; it is not changing the statutory jurisdictional framework itself.

While the Security Council cannot backdate the temporal jurisdiction of the Court to before the entry into force of the Statute, it can delimit it post that date. In particular, when it makes a referral with respect to the territory or nationals of a non-Party State, the Security Council is not required to invest the ICC with temporal jurisdiction from 1 July 2002. But for a Security Council referral in these circumstances, the ICC would have no jurisdiction at all. Thus, subject to Article 11, the Security Council can dictate the temporal scope of the referral, by way of a start and/or end date, and so define the temporal jurisdiction of the Court with respect to the referred situation. The same occurs where a State not Party to the Statute lodges a declaration accepting the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court under Article 12(3), granting the ICC jurisdiction where it would otherwise have none.[138] Nonetheless, given that the Court will often be faced with situations of ongoing violence, the setting of an end date while a conflict is still raging would likely appear arbitrary, even if not legally impermissible; whereas an end date would appear more appropriate in the context of a temporally well-defined set of events that have concluded.

A final general issue that may arise relates to the question of 'continuing crimes', notwithstanding the inviolability of Article 11 as an absolute demarcation. Arising in the context of cases of enforced disappearance where the particular completed act may be said to 'continue' after the time of its initial occurrence until such time as the person's whereabouts are disclosed and the truth about them is discovered, the concept of continuity has enabled human rights bodies to examine unsolved cases of disappearances committed prior to entry into force of relevant conventions because the continuing nature of the crimes extends into the present.[139] This specific scenario is treated explicitly in footnote 24 of the Elements of Crimes in relation to the crime against humanity of enforced disappearance of persons, which specifies: '[t]his crime falls under the jurisdiction of the Court only if the attack referred to in elements 7 and 8 occurs after the entry into force of the Statute'.[140] Untreated, however, in the Statute or Elements is whether the same would apply to other ICC crimes.

[137] Art 13(b) ICC Statute. For the same reason, the Council also cannot alter the subject matter jurisdiction of the Court, since the applicable law before the Court is governed by Art 21 and the statutory amendment procedure, which resides within the exclusive domain of the Assembly of States Parties. See the earlier discussion on personal jurisdiction.

[138] It is worth noting in this regard, that an Art 12(3) declaration should not be equated with a state referral, which can only be made by a State Party. Instead, it serves to satisfy a required precondition for the exercise of ICC jurisdiction under Art 12, which must then be separately triggered into exercise according to Art 13 by either the Prosecutor acting proprio muto or by a State Party referral. While the Security Council may also refer a situation concerning a state that has lodged an Art 12(3) declaration, it would need to rely on such a declaration as the basis to do so.

[139] See e.g. Chapman Blake v Guatemala, Merits, IACHR Series C No 36, IHRL 1419 (IACHR 1998), [1998] IACHR 1 (24 January 1998).

[140] Elements of Crimes (n 40) for Art 7(1)(i).

Arguably, if the offence classically associated with continuing crimes does not permit retroactive application beyond the scope of Article 11, the same logic could reasonably be extended to other offences, bearing in mind also the proscription against retroactive application of the Statute under Article 22. Although not treated yet in the case law of the ICC, in the Nahimana et al. case before the ICTR, the Trial Chamber found that acts of incitement to genocide that occurred in 1993 and continued in time until the commission of the genocide in 1994 fell within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, notwithstanding the temporal start date of ICTR's jurisdiction from 1 January 1994.[141] On appeal this finding was reversed. In particular, the Appeals Chamber clarified that the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide is completed as soon as the discourse in question is uttered or published, even though the effects of incitement may extend in time.[142] The Appeals Chamber also rejected the prosecutor's argument that the articles in the publication Kangura and the broadcasts of Radio télévision libre des mille collines (RTLM) constituted one continuing incitement to commit genocide, and that the Trial Chamber could therefore convict the appellants on the basis of the totality of the articles and broadcasts, including those occurring prior to 1994.[143] It held that even if it could be concluded that the totality of the articles and broadcasts constituted one continuing incitement to commit genocide, the appellants could only be convicted for acts of direct and public incitement to commit genocide carried out in 1994.[144] Such a reading would support the view that also at the ICC, there is no scope of considering acts which pre-date the entry into force of the Statute even if they continue beyond that date.

A slightly different question relates to the scope of the Court to consider crimes that commence before the entry into force of the ICC Statute and which continue thereafter, but where all the requisite elements can be considered as fulfilled within the temporal scope of the Statute. Clearly, as in the example in Nahimana, for acts which represent discrete events that extend over time, such as repeat acts of torture against the same victim, the Court may only examine criminal responsibility with respect to those acts which post-date 1 July 2002.[145] Other crimes, however, may be less straightforward. In Lubanga, for example, both the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Trial Chamber observed that the crime of conscription or enlistment of children under the age of 15 years occurred every day that the children continued to be illegally recruited.[146]

[141] Judgment, Nahimana et al., ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2007, para. 723.

[142] Ibid. [143] Ibid., para. 724.

[144] The Appeals Chamber nonetheless noted that, even if a conviction for incitement could not be based on the 1993 RTLM broadcasts, the Trial Chamber could have considered them as contextual elements of the 1994 broadcasts to explain how the RTLM listeners perceived the 1994 broadcasts and the impact these broadcasts may have had; stating it could similarly have admitted the pre-1994 Kangura articles as potentially relevant and of probative value; ibid., 724–5.

[145] See nonetheless ibid.

[146] Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, para. 248: 'Finally, the Chamber considers that the crime of enlisting and conscripting is an offence of a continuing nature—referred to by some courts as a "continuous crime" and by others as a "permanent crime". The crime of enlisting or conscripting children under the age of fifteen years continues to be committed as long as the children remain in the armed groups or forces and consequently ceases to be committed when these children leave the groups or reach age fifteen'; Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, Trial Chamber I, ICC, 14 March 2012, para. 618: 'These

Although not raised in the context of Article 11, this holding might suggest that the moment of first recruitment may not be as decisive to the crime as is the moment of abduction that triggers an enforced disappearance. This is because whereas the requisite elements of enforced disappearance are cumulative—namely arrest/detention/abduction followed by denial or refusal[147]—the requisite element with respect to child soldiers is singular: conscription or enlistment of children under 15 into an armed group or force.[148] Read in the light of the interpretation in Lubanga, this would mean that the essence of the prohibition is the inclusion of children under 15 within the membership of an armed group or armed force for the duration of such membership. Although the initial act of enlistment or conscription will constitute a discrete event in time, that which is prohibited is not merely the original recruitment of the child, but his or her continued membership in the armed group or force for the duration of such membership while under the age of 15 years. This would render the starting point less decisive since all of the elements of the crime could be said to have occurred within the temporal jurisdiction of the Court, notwithstanding the conduct extended in time from before the activation of the Court's temporal threshold. Strictly speaking, this is less a continuing crime, but more an extension of the idea of repeat acts that have their origin before the entry into force of the Rome Statute. If this logic is accepted, its application to certain other crimes all of whose contextual parameters continue to occur after the temporal threshold of the Court jurisdiction could be explored without offending Articles 11 and 22 of the Statute or footnote 24 of the Elements of Crimes.

Turning to ICC decisions related to temporal jurisdiction, the issue has arisen in connection with the scope of particular situations before the Court. In the two Article 15 proceedings to date, the Pre-Trial Chambers took differing approaches as to whether the Court could authorize the prosecutor to investigate only historic crimes, or also to prospectively grant authorization to investigate ongoing criminal activity. In the Kenya Situation, Pre-Trial Chamber II set the start date at 1 June 2005 (Kenya's date of accession) and established an outer limit at the date of the prosecutor's application (26 November 2009), since this was the last opportunity the prosecutor had to assess the information available prior to its submission for the Chamber's examination.[149] According to the Chamber an Article 15 application could, by definition, only extend to events up to the date of the prosecutor's authorization request. Although this was not controversial in relation to Kenya, where the crimes related to the post-election violence had long subsided, in many contexts the ICC has faced situations of ongoing violence, as borne out by its early practice.[150] By contrast, Pre-Trial offences are continuous in nature. They end only when the child reaches 15 years of age or leaves the force or group.'

[147] Elements of Crimes (n 40) for Art 7(1)(i).

[148] Elements of Crimes (n 40) for Art 8(2)(b)(xxvi) and Art 8(2)(e)(vii).

[149] Kenya Art 15 Decision (n 31) paras 201–7.

[150] As discussed in Rastan, 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court' (n 32) 22, the interpretation of the Pre-Trial Chamber appears to impose an unnecessary restriction on statutory powers otherwise envisaging the investigation of ongoing crimes and would moreover appear impractical. In situations of ongoing violence so opened under Art 15, the prosecution would need to artificially curtail its powers in the middle of its investigations after a certain time limit since it would have had no authority to investigate further without reverting to the Chamber for authorization to continue. Moreover, it could inappropriately draw the Chamber into deciding upon investigative

Chamber III, assigned with the Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, did not see a need to set an end-date to the temporal scope of the authorized situation based on the moment the prosecution submitted its application, which would have been particularly inappropriate in the Côte d'Ivoire context since the Court faced a 'volatile environment' which had the potential to re-escalate.[151] The Chamber held that the prosecutor could investigate ongoing crimes occurring after the date of authorization as long as they were sufficiently linked to the scope of the situation:[152]

> Bearing in mind the volatile environment in Côte d'Ivoire, the Chamber finds it necessary to ensure that any grant of authorisation covers investigations into 'continuing crimes'—those whose commission extends past the date of the application. Thus, crimes that may be committed after the date of the Prosecutor's application will be covered by any authorisation, insofar as the contextual elements of the continuing crimes are the same as for those committed prior to 23 June 2011. They must, at least in a broad sense, involve the same actors and have been committed within the context of either the same attacks (crimes against humanity) or the same conflict (war crimes). Therefore if the authorisation is granted, it will include the investigation of any ongoing and continuing crimes that may be committed after the 23 June 2011 as part of the ongoing situation.[153]

Similar considerations were applied going backwards in order to determine the start date of investigations in Côte d'Ivoire.[154] Following further submissions and having satisfied itself that crimes with sufficient nexus to the previously authorized situation also occurred during this earlier period, the Pre-Trial Chamber III proceeded to supplement its authorization decision to back-date the temporal scope of the situation to alleged crimes occurring since 19 September 2002.[155] The Chamber characterized this entire period, constituting periods of armed conflict, abeyance, and renewed violence, as a single situation, holding:

> [T]he violent events in Côte d'Ivoire in the period between 19 September 2002 and 28 November 2010, although reaching varying levels of intensity at different locations and at different times, are to be treated as a single situation, in which an ongoing crisis involving a prolonged political dispute and power-struggle culminated in the events in relation to which the Chamber earlier authorised an investigation.[156] strategies, since each sequential application would place before the Pre-Trial Chamber options for new or extended investigative leads.

[151] Côte d'Ivoire Art 15 Decision (n 32) para. 179. [152] Ibid., para. 178.

[153] Ibid., paras 178–9.

[154] Specifically, although the Prosecution had sought authorization for a proposed investigative focus on events occurring since 28 November 2010, it had also made general submissions that the events were linked with earlier crimes pre-dating the events of November 2010. The Prosecutor had therefore stated that the Chamber could opt to provide jurisdiction over the entire period since 19 September 2002, based on the date of the original Art 12(3) declaration lodged by the government of Côte d'Ivoire. Some of the victims' representations had also pointed to alleged crimes arising from the earlier period. Request for authorization of an investigation pursuant to Art 15, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-3, OTP, ICC, 23 June 2011, paras 42 and 182.

[155] Decision on the 'Prosecution's provision of further information regarding potentially relevant crimes committed between 2002 and 2010', Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-36, PTC III, 23 February 2012 ('Côte d'Ivoire Second Article 15 Decision').

[156] Ibid., para. 36.

The above findings of Pre-Trial Chamber III relied in large part on the earlier finding of Pre-Trial Chamber I assigned with the Situation in the DRC. In particular, in Mbarushimana Pre-Trial Chamber I and later, the defence questioned whether the case fell within the existing situation in the DRC, since the alleged crimes related to events taking place during 2009 at considerable temporal distance from the original referral by the DRC in 2004. Accordingly, the Chamber examined whether these events were sufficiently linked to the facts that triggered the initial referral—suggesting, by implication, that it might constitute a separate situation.[157] The Pre-Trial Chamber framed its inquiry in relation to its supervisory functions to identify the scope of the situation, inter alia, in the light of the requirement in Article 53(1)(a) to establish whether a crime 'has been or is being committed'.[158] In satisfying itself as to the scope of the DRC referral to cover contemporary events, the Chamber opined that, pursuant to Articles 13 and 14 of the Statute, a State Party in any event may only refer to the prosecutor an entire situation and that:

> [a]ccordingly, a referral cannot limit the Prosecutor to investigate only certain crimes, e.g. crimes committed by certain persons or crimes committed before or after a given date; as long as crimes are committed within the context of the situation of crisis that triggered the jurisdiction of the Court, investigations and prosecutions can be initiated.[159]

As to whether there was a sufficient link between the crimes alleged in the prosecutor's application and the overall scope of the situation, the Chamber stated:

> [F]or the case at hand not to exceed the parameters defining the DRC situation under investigation, the crimes referred to in the Prosecutor's Application must have occurred in the context of the ongoing situation of crisis that triggered the jurisdiction of the Court through the above mentioned referral. In the view of the Chamber, [157] Decision requesting clarification on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-575, PTC I, ICC, 11 October 2010. The Chamber was satisfied that the original referral from the DRC was not limited to past crimes occurring in particular locations, but to crimes that were ongoing throughout the country as a whole ('situation qui se déroule dans mon pays depuis le 1er juillet 2002'); while the Prosecutor in his notification to the Presidency and to States Parties, upon the opening of investigations, also characterized the situation as encompassing the entire territory of the DRC since 1 July 2002; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Callixte Mbarushimana, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, PTC I, ICC, ICC-01/04-01/10-1, 11 October 2010, para. 5.

[158] Decision requesting clarification on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58 (n 157) paras 6–8. Notably, the approach adopted by Pre-Trial Chamber I differed from that of Pre-Trial Chamber II in the Kenya Art 15 Decision (n 31), which held that, in the context of an Art 15 application, the wording of Art 53(1)(a) indicated that the Prosecutor could seek to investigate crimes that have occurred up until the time of the filing of the application, para. 206. For discussion see Rastan 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court' (n 32) 21–3.

[159] Ibid. Similarly, although the government of Uganda defined the scope of its referral as related to the LRA, the Prosecutor clarified with the government of Uganda that the OTP would examine allegations from all parties to the conflict; see letter of Prosecutor dated 17 June 2004 annexed to Decision Assigning the Situation in Uganda to Pre-Trial Chamber II, ICC-02/01, Presidency, ICC, 5 July 2004. Rule 44, dealing with declarations lodged pursuant to Art 12(3), also provides that a declaration 'has as a consequence the acceptance of jurisdiction with respect to the crimes referred to in Article 5 of relevance to the situation…' (emphasis added). See discussion in Rastan, 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court' (n 32).

> it is only within the boundaries of the situation of crisis for which the jurisdiction of the Court was activated that subsequent prosecutions can be initiated. Such a situation can include not only crimes that had already been or were being committed at the time of the referral, but also crimes committed after that time, in so far as they are sufficiently linked to the situation of crisis referred to the Court as ongoing at the time of the referral.[160]

The Chamber further held that it was not necessary to prove that a particular entity or organization concerned was committing crimes at the time of the referral, i.e. in order for it to have contributed to the situation of crisis triggering the same referral. Instead, the critical question was whether the 'crimes committed' were 'sufficiently linked to the situation of crisis which was ongoing at the time of the referral and was the subject of the referral', 'not the particular timing of the events underlying an alleged crime'. For this purpose, the Chamber further held that it was 'irrelevant whether particular individuals or events subsequently charged by the Prosecutor could not have been charged at the time of the original referral for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court'.[161]

This approach towards defining the temporal scope of a situation by virtue of the interconnected parameters of ongoing violence is similar in some respect to that of Pre-Trial Chamber I in the Al Bashir case (Darfur, Sudan), which found a nexus between ongoing crimes occurring over a large territory and over a five-year period characterized by varying levels of intensity.[162] The combined findings in the Mbarishimana case, the Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, and the Al Bashir case, as to the required nexus between situation and cases, particularly concerning the conduct of different parties and incidents of violence that may vary over time, may be summarized as follows. In determining whether a sufficient nexus exists between the jurisdictional scope of a situation and crimes spanning different time periods, locations, and periods of intensity, the factors that a Chamber may consider include:

[160] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Callixte Mbarushimana (n 157) para. 6.

[161] Mbarushimana Decision on Jurisdiction (n 118) paras 41–2. The Chamber also dismissed the argument that since contemporaneous events in the Kivus and the activities of the FDLR did not prompt the referral, there was no causal link to Mr Mbarushimana as an alleged member of the FDLR, observing: '[b]y its very nature, the link required for an event to be encompassed in the scope of a situation can stretch over a number of years; accordingly, it cannot be required that the person targeted by the Prosecutor's investigation be active throughout the duration of the relevant time-frame'; ibid., para. 50.

[162] See e.g. Second Decision on the Prosecutions' Application for a Warrant of Arrest, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-94, PTC I, ICC, 12 July 2010, para. 15 ('Al Bashir Second Article 58 Decision'): '[t]he above-mentioned attack on the said part of the civilian population of Darfur was large in scale, as it affected hundreds of thousands of individuals and took place across large swathes of the territory of the Darfur region… [t]he above-mentioned attack was systematic as it lasted for well over five years and the acts of violence of which it was comprised followed, to a considerable extent, a similar pattern'. These crimes also post-dated in part the date of the Security Council referral; see Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, para. 37 ('Al Bashir Article 58 Decision'), identifying the temporal parameters of the situation, based on Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005), as encompassing crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court occurring 'since July 2002'.

a. whether there is continuity, at least in a broad sense, between the principle actors/groups involved,[163] although this is not a strict requirement as groups may re-form and re-group under different headings or subsequently emerge (see d.);[164] and

b. whether there is a link between the contextual elements of the crimes[165]—i.e. whether the crimes have occurred in the context of the same attacks for crimes against humanity, the same armed conflict for war crimes,[166] or in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against the target group for genocide.[167]

By contrast, the Court need not consider as determinative:

c. restrictions on the investigation of ongoing crimes (i.e. those falling within a. and b.) committed after the date of the referral or Article 15 application;[168]

d. whether specific actors/groups were in existence at the time of the referral or authorization application;[169] and

e. whether the suspect was allegedly committing crimes at the time of the referral or authorization application.[170]

The application of these factors corresponds to the prosecutor's more recent determination that contemporaneous crimes committed in the CAR, involving, inter alia, attacks led by Seleka and anti-Balaka armed groups, constitute a different situation and therefore warrant a separate preliminary examination, distinct from the situation previously referred by the government of the CAR in December 2004.[171] Although the current wave of violence undoubtedly has some antecedents in the earlier conflict that engulfed the country, the decision to treat it as a new situation suggests that the contemporary violence has features distinguishing it from the earlier events in the light of factors such as the level of continuity between the actors or groups involved, and whether the violence is a recurrence that is linked to the earlier armed conflict

[163] Côte d'Ivoire Art 15 Decision (n 32) para. 179.

[164] Mbarushimana Decision on Jurisdiction (n 118) paras 40–2.

[165] Alternatively characterized by Pre-Trial Chamber III as a focus on incidents that 'form part of the same crisis or sequence of events for which an investigation has already been authorized'; Côte d'Ivoire Second Art 15 Decision (n 155) para. 14.

[166] Côte d'Ivoire Art 15 Decision (n 32) para. 179.

[167] Art 6, Elements of Crimes (n 40); Al Bashir Art 58 Decision (n 162) para. 113; Al Bashir Second Art 58 Decision (n 162) para. 8.

[168] Mbarushimana Decision on Jurisdiction (n 118) para. 41; contra, Kenya Art 15 Decision (n 31). See supra (n 132), (n 133), and (n 138) and accompanying text, nonetheless, on delimitations that may apply where end-date temporal parameters have been made express in a referral.

[169] Mbarushimana Decision on Jurisdiction (n 118) para. 42.

[170] Ibid., para. 50. For more detailed discussion of the accompanying case law see Rastan, 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court' (n 32).

[171] See annex to Decision Assigning Situation in the Central African Republic to PTC III, ICC-01/05-1, Situation in the Central African Republic, Presidency, ICC, 19 January 2005, describing the scope of the referral as encompassing 'crimes under the jurisdiction of the Court that may have been committed since 1 July 2002, anywhere on the territory of the Central African Republic'. See also 'Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, on opening a new Preliminary Examination in Central African Republic', ICC Press Release, 7 February 2014.

period or forms part of the same attacks against the civilian population. This distinction appears to have been confirmed by, or perhaps triggered, the second referral by the Government of the CAR of 30 May 2014 requesting the prosecutor to investigate ongoing crimes committed on its territory since 1 August 2012.[172]

7.7 Conclusion

As noted earlier, issues related to jurisdictional parameters are relevant not only for determining the statutory scope of the Court's competence, but also for identifying the nexus between specific alleged acts and the situation that has been referred by a State Party or the Security Council or which has been authorized by the Pre-Trial Chamber, thus shaping the competence of the ICC to exercise its jurisdiction in a particular case. Jurisdiction may raise its head in many and multiple guises, in ways not dissimilar to those treated variously in other areas of public international law and domestic criminal law. It thus offers a rich area for continuing academic inquiry and Court practice.

[172] See Annex to Decision Assigning the Situation in the Central African Republic II to Pre-Trial Chamber II, ICC-01/14-1, Situation in the Central African Republic II, Presidency, ICC, 18 June 2014.

8

Ad Hoc Declarations of Acceptance of Jurisdiction

The Palestinian Situation under Scrutiny

*Mohamed M. El Zeidy

8.1 Introduction

On 3 April 2012 the former Prosecutor of the ICC removed the embargo on a statement which addressed one of the most controversial legal and political issues the Court has faced since the beginning of its operation.[1] This is the issue of the ad hoc declaration lodged by the Palestinian Minister of Justice on 22 January 2009, accepting the jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to Article 12(3) of the Rome Statute (the Statute). The declaration was probably lodged in response to Israel's military operation carried out in Gaza from 27 December 2008 to 18 January 2009, known as 'Operation Cast Lead'.[2]

A few years later and in particular from 13 June 2014 onwards, Israel carried out a number of 'massive' military operations in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip.[3] This caused a 'critical humanitarian situation',[4] which prompted the establishment of an independent international commission of inquiry to 'investigate all violations of international humanitarian law and international human rights law' in these areas.[5]

Public records reveal that on 25 July 2014 the Palestinian Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Gaza complained to the ICC against Israel's military operations.[6]

* Legal Adviser, Pre-Trial Division, ICC; Judge, Senior Public Prosecutor and Public Prosecutor, Egyptian Ministry of Justice (1997–2007); PhD and LLM (Ireland); LLM (Cairo); Licence en Droit and Bachelor of Police Sciences (Cairo). The views expressed in this article are those of the author and do not necessarily reflect those of the ICC.

[1] OTP's decision, Situation in Palestine, 3 April 2012 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/9B651B80-EC43-4945-BF5A-FAFF5F334B92/284387/SituationinPalestine030412ENG.pdf> accessed 9 September 2014 ('Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement').

[2] See Report of the United Nations Fact Finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict—Executive Summary, UN Doc A/HRC/12/48(Advance 1) (23 September 2009) para. 29.

[3] UN Human Rights Council Res S-21/1, 'Ensuring respect for international law in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem', UN Doc A/HRC/RES/S-21/1 (23 July 2014) preamble para. 12.

[4] Ibid., preamble para. 13.

[5] Ibid., para. 13; also 'UN Rights Council Appoints Members of Commission to Investigate Purported Gaza Violations', UN News Centre, 11 August 2014 <http://www.un.org/apps/news/printnews.asp?nid=48459> accessed 15 September 2014.

[6] 'Palestine Filed Complain at ICC: Accuses Israel of War Crimes', Global Research, 26 July 2014 <http://www.globalresearch.ca/palestine-filed-complain-at-icc-accuses-israel-of-war-crimes/5393396> accessed 15 September 2014.

It is probable that the two Palestinian officials lodged a declaration under Article 12(3) of the Statute—similar in nature to the one submitted in January 2009. Within less than two weeks, however, it was reported that the President of the Palestinian Authority instructed the withdrawal of the 'complaint' from the ICC.[7] This is not surprising. The President of the Palestinian Authority seems to have had in mind a different strategy. Apparently, the Palestinian President first thought of resorting to the Security Council to pass a resolution which aimed at ending the long lasting Israeli occupation by the end of 2017[8] before heading towards the ICC. After a failed attempt on 30 December 2014 to secure the 9 affirmative votes required for passing the resolution,[9] the Palestinian Authority resorted once more to the ICC. But this time the Palestinians not only lodged a third declaration under article 12(3) but also acceded to the Rome Statute. The Palestinian Authority submitted the third declaration on 31 December 2014 accepting the jurisdiction of the Court for "crimes committed in the occupied […] territory, including East Jerusalem, since June 13, 2014".[10] This was the exact complaint included in the second declaration which the Palestinian President instructed to withdraw from the ICC. Two days later, on 2 January 2015, the Palestinian Authority also deposited its instrument of accession of the Rome Statute with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.[11] Both actions on the part of Palestine were acknowledged by the representatives of the two international bodies (the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Registrar of ICC) on 6[12] and 7[13] January 2015 respectively.

It is commonly known that the drafters of the Statute opted for a system of 'inherent' or 'automatic' jurisdiction.[14] A state which has ratified or acceded to the Statute becomes automatically subject to the Court's jurisdiction with respect to the crimes set out in Article 5 and defined in Articles 6–8 bis.[15] Yet, in order for the Court to exercise its jurisdiction with respect to these crimes (in response to a State Party referral or a proprio motu initiative on the part of the Prosecutor), the Statute imposes an additional precondition, namely that the crime was committed either on the territory

[7] 'Palestinian Authority withdraws complaint against Israel', Voltaire Network, 7 August 2014 <http://www.voltairenet.org/article185015.html> accessed 15 September 2014; 'Correction: Saleem al-Saqqa pledges to maintain Palestinian complaint to ICC', Voltaire Network, 9 August 2014 <http://www.voltairenet.org/article185038.html> accessed 15 September 2014.

[8] 'UN Security Council action on Palestinian statehood blocked', UN News Centre, <http://www.un.org/apps/news/story.asp?NewsID=49709#> accessed 9 January 2015.

[9] Ibid.

[10] 'Declaration Accepting the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court', 31 December 2014, <http://www.icc-cpi.int> accessed 9 January 2014.

[11] 'Palestine declares acceptance of ICC jurisdiction since 13 June 2014', 5 January 2015, ICC-CPI-20150105-PR1080, <http://www.icc-cpi.int> accessed 9 January 2014.

[12] State of Palestine: Accession, Reference: C.N.13.2015.TREATIES-XVIII.10 (Depositary Notification), 6 January 2015.

[13] See, Registrar's letter of acceptance of the declaration, ICC Ref: 2015/IOR/3496/HvH, 7 January 2015.

[14] Art. 12 (1) Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('Rome Statute').

[15] Arts 5, 6–8 bis, and 12(1) Rome Statute.

of a State Party (territoriality principle)[16] or by a national of a State Party (active personality principle).[17]

An alternative to the mechanism of automatic jurisdiction retained for States Parties is the regime envisaged under Article 12(3) of the Statute. This provision enables a non-State Party to the Statute which has a direct link to the crimes to consent to the Court's exercise of jurisdiction on an ad hoc basis and subject to the same conditions provided for in Article 12(2) concerning such crimes arising from a particular situation.[18] The state is thus not pressured to accede to the Statute.[19] Given that Palestine is not a party to the Statute, it was likely that the Palestinian Authority would avail itself of this option.

Much has been written in the past on the status of Palestine, questioning its eligibility to meet a core requirement under Article 12(3), namely whether it satisfies the requisite elements for 'statehood' under international law[20] and/or whether it qualifies [16] Arguably, the Court should consider the principle of territoriality in its broader form, that is, 'objective' and 'subjective' territoriality. See, e.g., R Rastan, 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court' (2012) 23 Criminal Law Forum 1, 19. For an account of this theory, see C Ryngaert, Jurisdiction in International Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008), pp. 75–6; C Blakesly, 'Jurisdiction' in M C Bassiouni, International Criminal Law, vol. II (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 48; M C Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice (New York: Oceana. Oxford University Press 2007) 359–67.

[17] This requirement is waived in case of a Security Council referral under Art. 13(b) of the Statute in the sense that the Council may refer a situation involving the commission of crimes on the territory of a non-State Party and/or by nationals of a non-State Party to the Statute; according to this scenario the Security Council referral has the effect of not only activating the Court's jurisdiction with respect to State Parties but also providing jurisdiction over non-State Parties. See, e.g., UNSC Res 1593 (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/RES/1593, and UNSC Res 1970 (26 February 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1970 referring the situations in Darfur (Sudan) and Libya respectively to the ICC; see also in this regard Decision on the Prosecution Application under Art. 58(7) of the Statute, ICC, Harun and Ali Kushayb, Situation in Darfur Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/07-1-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 27 April 2007, para. 16; Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, paras 36, 40; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Art. 58 Relating to Abdel Raheem Muhammad Hussein, Hussein, Situation in Darfur Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/12-1-Red, PTC I, ICC, 1 March 2012, para. 7. In the context of the Libya situation see, Decision on the 'Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Art 58 as to Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Al-Senussi', Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-1, PTC I, ICC, 27 June 2011, para. 9.

[18] Art. 12(3) Rome Statute; Rule 44(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of State Parties) part II.A. On the rational for introducing Rule 44 see, J Holmes, 'Jurisdiction and Admissibility' in R Lee et al. (eds), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 325–7.

[19] See M El Zeidy, 'The Legitimacy of Withdrawing State Party Referrals and Ad hoc Declarations under the Statute of the International Criminal Court' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 61. See generally on Art. 12(3), C Stahn, M El Zeidy, and H Olásolo, 'The International Criminal Court's Ad hoc Jurisdiction Revisited' (2005) 99 American Journal of International Law 421; S Freeland, 'How Open Should the Door Be?—Declarations by non-States Parties under Article 12(3) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (2006) 75 Nordic Journal of International Law 211; M Inazumi, 'The Meaning of the State Consent Precondition in Article 12 (2) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Theoretical Analysis of the Source of International Criminal Jurisdiction' (2002) 49 Netherlands International Law Review 159.

[20] M Shaw, 'The Article 12(3) Declaration of the Palestinian Authority, the International Criminal Court and International Law' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 301 (arguing that Palestine is not an independent state under the principles of public international law, in particular given that it does not have an effective government with control 'over the de facto separate administration of

as a 'state' for the purposes of the Statute.[21] To this end, scholars have arrived at different conclusions, either challenging the validity of the declaration lodged by the Palestinian Authority in 2009[22] or arguing in favour of its acceptance by the Court.[23] This chapter will focus on the situation of Palestine from a different perspective. It will analyse the approach of the Prosecutor in treating the declaration lodged in 2009. In this respect, the chapter will argue that, in order to preserve the integrity, impartiality, and judicial mandate of the Court, the Prosecutor should have addressed the 2009 declaration differently and with more caution. The chapter will also address the practical challenges that have arisen and may arise with Article 12(3) declarations lodged by Palestine. The discussion remains relevant and significant for the purpose of treating potential ad hoc declarations of a similar nature lodged by entities with contested statehood. This would be the case, for instance, if Taiwan or the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus lodged declarations under Article 12(3) of the Statute. As such, the present contribution seeks to inform future approaches of the Court.[24]

The chapter will start by scrutinizing the manner in which the former Prosecutor addressed the Palestinian declaration logged in 2009 in his statement of 3 April 2012 (section 8.2). This part aims at revealing the inconsistencies and legal errors in the former Prosecutor's approach in resolving the issue sub judice. In highlighting these inconsistencies and legal errors, the chapter will subsequently offer alternative avenues to deal with problems of this nature, avenues which are embedded in the Statute or the Regulations of the Court (RoC) (section 8.3). Further, the chapter will address the situation of Palestine in light of its new status, and the two subsequent declarations lodged on 25 July 2014 and 31 December 2014 respectively. These later developments raise a number of different challenges: to what extent, if at all, may the Prosecutor rely on the 2009 declaration (first declaration) in order to investigate the recent military operations carried out by Israel and Hamas; who may bind the state in lodging an Article 12(3) declaration; and can an Article 12(3) declaration be withdrawn? Is it permissible to accept an article 12(3) declaration with retroactive effect?

the Gaza Strip', ibid., 306–8); but see, J Quigley, 'The Palestine Declaration to the International Criminal Court: The Statehood Issue' in C Meloni and G Tognoni (eds), Is there a Court for Gaza?: A Test Bench for International Justice (The Hague: T. M. C. Asser Press 2012) 432–5 (arguing that the requirement of effective control is more relaxed so far as 'no competing entity claims title' as was the case with Gaza and the West Bank until 1967. Moreover, the fact that Gaza and the West Bank were later under Israel's control as a belligerent occupant did not entail that Palestinian sovereignty over these parts was affected); also J Quigley, The Statehood of Palestine: International Law in the Middle East Conflict (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010) 208–25.

[21] A Pellet, 'The Palestinian Declaration and the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 981 (arguing in favour of a functional approach to Art. 12(3) of the Statute); Y Shany, 'In Defence of Functional Interpretation of Article 12(3) of the Rome Statute' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 329 (arguing that although the Rome Statute leaves some room for flexibility in interpreting the term 'state' for the purposes of the Palestinian Declaration, the ability of the Palestinian National Authority to delegate jurisdiction is constrained by the Oslo Accords which prevents it from, inter alia, exercising jurisdiction over Israeli nationals), ibid., 336–7, 339–40, 343.

[22] Shaw (n 20).

[23] See, inter alia, W Worster, 'The Exercise of Jurisdiction by the International Criminal Court over Palestine' (2012) 26 American University International Law Review 1153; Pellet (n 20).

[24] I have covered the legal regime governing Art 12(3) declarations, in the main, in other contributions; see El Zeidy, 'The Legitimacy of Withdrawing State Party Referrals and Ad hoc Declarations under the Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 19); Stahn, El Zeidy, and Olásolo (n 19).

8.2 The 2009 Palestinian Declaration: Inconsistencies and Legal Uncertainties

In a statement of 3 April 2012, the former Prosecutor of the ICC presented a two-page document comprising eight paragraphs which expounded his position towards the declaration lodged by the Government of Palestine in 2009. In developing his reasoning, the former Prosecutor stated:

> [. . .]
> 2. In accordance with article 15 of the Rome Statute, the Office of the Prosecutor initiated a preliminary examination in order to determine whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation. The Office ensured a fair process by giving all those concerned the opportunity to present their arguments. The Arab League's Independent Fact Finding Committee on Gaza presented its report during a visit to the Court. The Office provided Palestine with the opportunity to present its views extensively, in both oral and written form. The Office also considered various reports with opposing views. In July 2011, Palestine confirmed to the Office that it had submitted its principal arguments, subject to the submission of additional supporting documentation.
> 3. The first stage in any preliminary examination is to determine whether the preconditions to the exercise of jurisdiction under article 12 of the Rome Statute are met. Only when such criteria are established will the Office proceed to analyse information on alleged crimes as well as other conditions for the exercise of jurisdiction as set out in articles 13 and 53(1).
> 4. The jurisdiction of the Court is not based on the principle of universal jurisdiction: it requires that the United Nations Security Council (article 13(b)) or a 'State' (article 12) provide jurisdiction. Article 12 establishes that a 'State' can confer jurisdiction to the Court by becoming a Party to the Rome Statute (article 12(1)) or by making an ad hoc declaration accepting the Court's jurisdiction (article 12(3)).
> 5. The issue that arises, therefore, is who defines what is a 'State' for the purpose of article 12 of the Statute? In accordance with article 125, the Rome Statute is open to accession by 'all States', and any State seeking to become a Party to the Statute must deposit an instrument of accession with the Secretary-General of the United Nations. In instances where it is controversial or unclear whether an applicant constitutes a 'State', it is the practice of the Secretary-General to follow or seek the General Assembly's directives on the matter. This is reflected in General Assembly resolutions which provide indications of whether an applicant is a 'State'. Thus, competence for determining the term 'State' within the meaning of article 12 rests, in the first instance, with the United Nations Secretary-General who, in case of doubt, will defer to the guidance of the General Assembly. The Assembly of States Parties of the Rome Statute could also in due course decide to address the matter in accordance with article 112(2)(g) of the Statute.
> 6. In interpreting and applying article 12 of the Rome Statute, the Office has assessed that it is for the relevant bodies at the United Nations or the Assembly of States Parties to make the legal determination whether Palestine qualifies as a State for the purpose of acceding to the Rome Statute and thereby enabling the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court under article 12(1). The Rome Statute provides no authority for the Office of the Prosecutor to adopt a method to define the term 'State' under article 12(3) which would be at variance with that established for the purpose of article 12(1).

7. The Office has been informed that Palestine has been recognised as a State in bilateral relations by more than 130 governments and by certain international organisations, including United Nation bodies. However, the current status granted to Palestine by the United Nations General Assembly is that of 'observer', not as a 'Non-member State'. The Office understands that on 23 September 2011, Palestine submitted an application for admission to the United Nations as a Member State in accordance with article 4(2) of the United Nations Charter, but the Security Council has not yet made a recommendation in this regard. While this process has no direct link with the declaration lodged by Palestine, it informs the current legal status of Palestine for the interpretation and application of article 12.
8. The Office could in the future consider allegations of crimes committed in Palestine, should competent organs of the United Nations or eventually the Assembly of States Parties resolve the legal issue relevant to an assessment of article 12 or should the Security Council, in accordance with article 13(b), make a referral providing jurisdiction.[25]

The former Prosecutor's line of reasoning suffers from inconsistencies and a number of legal errors.

As a preliminary observation, in paragraph 2 of this document as well as in other documents released, the former Prosecutor acknowledged that as part of his preliminary examination, and for the sake of ensuring 'a fair process', he had given 'all those concerned the opportunity to present their arguments'.[26] He requested oral as well as written submissions from different sources.[27] He received submissions from Palestine, Israel, the Arab League, and a number of academics.[28] He also conducted meetings with NGOs and the Palestinian Minster of Justice, and welcomed 'further meetings' with Israel on the question of the jurisdiction of the Court.[29] In a response to a letter sent by the Deputy High Commissioner for Human Rights on 14 December 2009 enquiring about the Palestinian declaration, the Prosecutor stated, inter alia, that he was 'analysing the Court's jurisdiction over alleged crimes committed by different parties during the conflict in Gaza in December 2008 and January 2009'.[30]

Public records reveal that all this information related to the jurisdiction of the Court and the different interpretations of Article 12(3) were available to the Prosecutor by early May 2010. Indeed, in his report entitled 'Summary of submissions on whether [25] Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement (n 1).

[26] Ibid., para. 2.
[27] OTP, Situation in Palestine: Summary of submissions on whether the declaration lodged by Palestinian National Authority meets statutory requirements, 3 May 2010 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/553F5F08-2A84-43E9-8197-6211B5636FEA/282852/PALESTINEFINAL201010272.pdf> accessed 15 September 2014.
[28] Ibid. [29] Ibid.
[30] OTP, Letter to Deputy High Commissioner for Human Rights, OTP/INCOM/PSE/OHCHR-1/JCCD-ag, 12 January 2010 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/FF55CC8D-3E63-4D3F-B502-1DB2BC4D45FF/281439/LettertoUNHC1.pdf> accessed 15 September 2014.

the declaration lodged by the Palestinian National Authority meets statutory requirements' issued on 3 May 2010, the Prosecutor summarized, inter alia, the different views presented concerning the possible interpretations of Article 12(3).[31] Based on the available material he could have certainly taken a position on the matter at least in 2010, if not even earlier, upon receipt of the declaration.

Yet, this was not the case. It took the Prosecutor more than three years to realize that 'it was the practice of the Secretary-General to follow or seek the General Assembly's directive' on whether Palestine 'constitutes a "State"' and that a determination as such 'rests, in the first instance, with the…Secretary-General'.[32] One wonders, if the Prosecutor believed that the Court was not the competent organ to interpret the term 'State' for the purpose of Article 12, why then did he encourage submissions and conduct meetings with the parties, the Arab League, and NGOs on the interpretation of Article 12(3)? Even if these submissions or meetings were deemed necessary to guide him in his determination, nothing in these documents refers to the solution arrived at by the Prosecutor. This suggests that the approach adopted by the Prosecutor in closing the matter was not dependent on the submissions. Thus, the process did not really require postponement upon their receipt since they were anyway of no substantial use. A decision could have been delivered much earlier.

It is true that neither the Statute nor the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (the Rules) or the RoC set a particular deadline for the Prosecutor to conduct a preliminary examination with respect to a particular situation. However, this should not be an invitation for an abuse of process. In a rare decision issued by the Court in the context of the situation in the CAR,[33] Pre-Trial Chamber III compared the lapse of time since the start of the preliminary examination with two other situations—Uganda and the DRC. The Chamber observed that the preliminary examinations in these situations were completed within two to six months, while in the CAR situation almost two years had passed since the date of the referral without reaching a decision under Article 53(1).[34] The Chamber questioned the Prosecutor's delay and called for the provision of information regarding the status of his preliminary examination.[35] Despite the Prosecutor's disapproval of the Chamber's move as being devoid of an appropriate legal basis, he nevertheless furnished the Chamber with the required information.[36]

Such a proactive stance on the part of the judiciary[37] was unlikely to take place in the Palestinian context. This is partly so because the Prosecutor was not acting in response

[31] Situation in Palestine: Summary of submissions (n 27).

[32] Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement (n 1) para. 5.

[33] Decision Requesting Information on the Status of the Preliminary Examination of the Situation in the Central African Republic, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-6, PTC III, ICC, 30 November 2006.

[34] Ibid., p. 4. [35] Ibid., p. 5.

[36] Prosecution's Report Pursuant to Pre-Trial Chamber III's 30 November 2006 Decision Requesting Information on the Status of the Preliminary Examination of the Situation in the Central African Republic, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-7, OTP, ICC, 15 December 2006.

[37] Although this decision was also prompted by a request from the Central African Republic to enquire about the delay in deciding within a reasonable time whether or not the Prosecutor intended to initiate an investigation; see Decision Requesting Information on the Status of the Preliminary Examination of the Situation in the Central African Republic (n 33) pp. 2–3.

to either a State Party referral or a Security Council referral which automatically trigger the jurisdiction of the Court.[38] In the case of a referral, the Prosecutor should inform the Presidency[39] which, in turn, is duty bound to assign the relevant situation to a Pre-Trial Chamber. This was not the case in the context of the Palestinian declaration, as the Prosecutor was acting proprio motu. In this case a request for authorization to initiate an investigation was required. In the absence of such a request from the Prosecutor, no Pre-Trial Chamber will be seized of the relevant situation under preliminary examination, save for one scenario referred to in Regulation 46(3) of the RoC.[40] Since the Prosecutor refrained from placing a request for authorization under Article 15(3), it was doubtful that any Pre-Trial Chamber not formally assigned with the situation would question his delay in conducting the preliminary examination and ruling on the matter.

Be that as it may, the Prosecutor's questionable practice casts doubt on the legitimacy of the entire legal process before the Court. Public announcements posted right after his decision to close the matter support this idea. In a press article published on 11 April 2012, the Israeli Foreign Minister was quoted saying that diplomats had worked against the request to open an investigation in relation to operation Cast Lead and that '[not] many understand how much work ha[d] been put into this issue'.[41] If one reads these words in light of the manner in which the Prosecutor responded to a number of legal questions in his statement of 3 April 2012, it becomes apparent that he indeed avoided addressing the matter sub judice.

In paragraph 3 of his statement, the Prosecutor advanced that the first stage in any preliminary examination 'is to determine whether the preconditions to the exercise of jurisdiction under article 12 of the Rome Statute are met. Only when such criteria are established will the Office proceed to analyse information on alleged crimes as well as other conditions for the exercise of jurisdiction set out in articles 13 and 53(1)'.[42]

The biggest flaw in the Prosecutor's line of reasoning is his attempt to dissociate Article 12 from Article 53(1) and treat them as two separate, consecutive steps. By so doing, the Prosecutor tried to avoid making an explicit finding or determination under Article 15(3) or (6), although the Statute obliges him to do so. According to Article 15(2), the Prosecutor 'shall analyse the seriousness of the information received . . . and he or [38] Given that the mere lodgement of a declaration accepting the ad hoc jurisdiction of the Court was not sufficient per se to trigger the jurisdiction of the Court, the former Prosecutor was conducting his preliminary examination under the umbrella of Art. 15, acting on his own initiative in accordance with Art. 15 with a view to moving forward the legal process if need be.

[39] See, e.g., Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Callixte Mbarushimana, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-1, PTC I, ICC, 28 September 2010 (reclassified as public pursuant to Pre-Trial Chamber I's decision ICC-01/04-01/10-7, dated 11 October 2010) para. 5 (noting that the Prosecutor informed the President on 17 June 2004 after having determined that there was a reasonable basis to initiate an investigation under Art. 53(1)).

[40] Said scenario will be discussed in more detail under section 8.3 infra.

[41] 'PLO envoy: Palestine can join ICC', Ma'an News Agency, 10 April 2012 <http://www.maannews.net/eng/ViewDetails.aspx?ID=475280> accessed 15 September 2014.

[42] Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement (n 1) para. 3.

she may seek additional information from [different sources]', which he actually did. The next step the Statute envisages is either that the Prosecutor concludes 'that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation' or 'that the information provided does not constitute a reasonable basis for an investigation'. In reaching this conclusion, Rule 48 of the Rules dictates that '[i]n determining whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation under article 15, paragraph 3, the Prosecutor shall consider the factors set out in article 53, paragraph 1(a) to (c). An integral part of such consideration under article 53(1) [concerns] the question of jurisdiction in its broad sense'.

Article 53(1)(a) stipulates that '[i]n deciding whether to initiate an investigation, the Prosecutor shall consider whether: (a) The information available . . . provides a reasonable basis to believe that a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court has been or is being committed . . .'. In the first decision before the Court authorizing the Prosecutor to commence an investigation into the situation in the Republic of Kenya (the Kenya Authorization Decision), Pre-Trial Chamber II stated that:

> [T]he reference to 'crime within the jurisdiction of the Court' may support an interpretation that the Chamber is only to consider the subject-matter jurisdiction referred to in article 5(1) of the Statute. Adopting such an interpretation, however, would amount to an absurd conclusion, because it excludes an examination of the other jurisdictional requirements, the existence or absence of which would directly impact on the Chamber's determination of whether to authorize the commencement of an investigation. Thus, the Chamber considers that according to a contextual and teleological interpretation, the phrase 'a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court' would mean that an examination of the necessary jurisdictional prerequisites under the Statute must be undertaken. This construction ensures that the Chamber is in a position to properly assess whether the Court is acting within the scope of its legal parameters before ruling on the Prosecutor's Request.[43]

Moreover, relying on the Appeals Chamber's interpretation of the notion of 'jurisdiction',[44] Pre-Trial Chamber II concluded by saying:

> Thus, the Chamber considers that for a crime to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court, it has to satisfy the following conditions: (i) it must fall within the category of crimes referred to in article 5 and defined in articles 6, 7, and 8 of the Statute (jurisdiction ratione materiae); (ii) it must fulfill the temporal requirements specified under article 11 of the Statute (jurisdiction ratione temporis); and (iii) it must meet one of the two alternative requirements embodied in article 12 of the Statute (jurisdiction ratione loci or ratione personae). The latter entails either that the crime occurs on the territory of a State Party to the Statute or a State which has lodged a > declaration by virtue of article 12(3) of the Statute, or be committed by a national of any such State.[45]

[43] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010, paras 36–7 (emphasis added).

[44] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Art 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, paras 21–2.

In the situation in Côte d'Ivoire, Pre-Trial Chamber III followed a similar path when it addressed the various jurisdictional parameters of the situation including the validity of the declaration lodged by the new Government of Côte d'Ivoire within the broader framework of Article 53(1)(a).[46] The Chamber confirmed the validity of the initial declaration lodged by the former regime in 2003 and stated that the two letters submitted to the Court on 14 December 2010 and 3 May 2011, > do not seek to restrict or amend the scope of [said] Declaration but, instead, they specifically confirm the acceptance by the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire of the ICC's jurisdiction as regards crimes allegedly committed in the recent past. The Chamber concludes that the Court has jurisdiction over crimes allegedly committed in Côte d'Ivoire since 19 September 2002, on the basis of the Declaration of acceptance of 18 April 2003 and the letters of December 2010 and May 2011.[47]

It follows that neither the Court's statutory documents nor the jurisprudence of the Court support an interpretation in favour of a mid-way solution in the sense of refraining from making an explicit finding under either Article 15(3) or Article 15(6) on the basis of the criteria set out in Article 53(1). A process of not deciding is not envisaged as the statement of the Prosecutor suggests. Although the Prosecutor's internal policy seems to favour a four-phase analysis for the conduct of preliminary examinations,[48] such policy should not override the obligations imposed by the Statute and the Rules if this would result in inconsistency.[49]

The failure of providing an explicit determination under Article 15(3) or (6) was partly due to the Prosecutor's belief that he was not called upon to define 'what is a "State" for the purpose of article 12 of the Statute'. According to the Prosecutor,

> [i]n instances where it is controversial or unclear whether an applicant constitutes a 'State', it is the practice of the Secretary-General to follow or seek the General Assembly's directives on the matter.... Thus, competence for determining the term 'State' within the meaning of article 12 rests, in the first instance, with the United Nations Secretary-General who, in case of doubt, will defer to the guidance of the General Assembly.[50]

[45] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya (n 37) paras 38–9 (footnotes omitted).

[46] Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire', Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, PTC III, ICC, 15 November 2011, paras 14–15, 21–2, 186–7.

[47] Ibid., paras 14–15 (emphasis added).

[48] See OTP, Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations, November 2013, paras 77–84.

[49] Art. 21(1) Rome Statute. On Art. 21, see Bitti, Chapter 18, this volume; also, G Bitti, 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Treatment of Sources of Law in the Jurisprudence of the ICC' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 281 ff. Notably even if there is an inconsistency between the Statute the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the former prevails; see, Art. 51(5) Rome Statute.

[50] Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement (n 1) para. 5.

Alternatively, the Assembly of States Parties 'could also in due course' decide to resolve the matter pursuant to Article 112(2)(g), the Prosecutor argued. The Prosecutor proceeded by stating that '[i]n interpreting and applying article 12…, it is for the relevant bodies at the United Nations or the Assembly of States Parties to make the legal determination whether Palestine qualifies as a State'.[51]

This reasoning is flawed. One cannot adhere to the Prosecutor's argument that the competence for making such a determination for the purpose of Article 12 lies in the first place within the United Nations. This is so for the simple reason that any international judicial body has the power and even the obligation to apply and interpret the legal instrument governing its operation. This is also a consequence of the principle of compétence de la competence,[52] consistently accepted by general international law. In Nottebohm, the International Court of Justice (ICJ), held that, 'in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, an international tribunal has…the power to interpret…the instruments which govern [its] jurisdiction'.[53] Similarly, in Fisheries Jurisdiction, the ICJ confirmed in a stronger language that 'in accordance with its Statute and its settled jurisprudence, [it] must examine proprio motu the question of its own jurisdiction to consider the Application of the United Kingdom'.[54]

The same approach was more recently adopted in a number of decisions issued by the ICC. In Kony et al., Pre-Trial Chamber II, guided by the jurisprudence of the ICJ regarding the principle of compétence de la compétence, stressed its primary role to interpret the provisions of the Statute. The Chamber stated that 'one of the major consequences entailed by [the principle of compétence de la compétence] is that it is…for the judicial body whose jurisdiction is being debated to have the last say as to the way in which its statutory instruments should be construed'.[55] Having laid down the main principle, the Chamber proceeded by applying it to the issue sub judice, when it stated: 'it is for [the Chamber] to construe and apply the rules on admissibility as well'.[56]

Apart from the foregoing argument, it is clear from the plain text of the second sentence of Article 1 of the Statute that '[t]he jurisdiction and functioning of the Court shall be governed by the provisions of [the] Statute'.[57] In this context, there is interplay [51] Ibid., para. 6 (emphasis added).

[52] For a through overview, see L de Chazournes, 'The Principle of Compétence de la Compétence in International Adjudication and Its Role in an Era of Multiplication of Courts and Tribunals' in M Arsanjani et al. (eds), Looking to the Future: Essays on International Law in Honor of W. Michael Reisman (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2011) 1027 ff.

[53] Judgment of 18 November 1953 (Preliminary Objection), Nottebohm (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala) [1953] ICJ Reports 111, 119.

[54] Judgment of 2 February 1973 (Jurisdiction of the Court), Fisheries Jurisdiction (United Kingdom v. Iceland) [1973] ICJ Reports 3, para. 12 (emphasis added).

[55] Decision on the Admissibility of the Case under Art 19(1) of the Statute, Kony et al., ICC-02/04-01/05-377, PTC II, ICC, 10 March 2009, para. 46. Generally on the principle before the ICC, see Decision on the Confirmation of charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, para. 24; Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 23.

[56] Ibid.

[57] Decision on the Postponement of the Execution of the Request for Surrender of Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi Pursuant to Art 95 of the Rome Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-163, PTC I, ICC, 1 June 2012, para. 29.

between the last sentence of Article 1 and Article 21, which spells out and regulates the applicable law before the Court.[58] According to Article 21(1)(a), the Court shall apply '[i]n the first place [the] Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence'. Other sources of law are mentioned in the same provision but only serve as secondary sources. Thus, the Prosecutor who represents one of the four main organs of the Court is not supposed, in principle, to exercise his/her legal functions outside the legal framework designed by this provision. This provision also makes clear in its second and third paragraphs that the interpretation of the law (which includes the Statute) is an inherent and an integral function of the Court. Even in the absence of such an indication, any judicial body must be endowed with an interpretative function. As the ICJ stated, albeit in a different context, '[n]owhere is any provision to be found forbidding the Court, "the principle judicial organ of the United Nations", to exercise…an interpretative function which falls within the normal exercise of its judicial powers…'.[59]

Thus if the interpretation of a legal provision under the Statute such as Article 12 (which is jurisdictional in nature) or any other provision, like Article 125, falls within the judicial powers of the Court, it is difficult to agree with the Prosecutor that he was not competent to construe an integral part of that provision, namely the term 'State'. Further, it is also striking to say that the 'legal determination' as to whether 'Palestine qualifies as a State for the purpose of acceding to the Rome Statute' is a matter for the 'relevant bodies at the United Nations or the Assembly of States Parties'. If a decision on the matter entails a 'legal determination', as the Prosecutor acknowledges, how, then, can such a determination which lies within the pure competence of a judicial body be delegated to a political body such as the United Nations?

The fact that the interpretation of Article 12 or any other legal provision under the Statute falls within the sole competence of the Court, does not mean per se that the Prosecutor was not entitled to be guided by the practices of other bodies, be it judicial or political, such as the General Assembly. Such guidance will often fall outside the framework of Article 21, unless, for instance, it reaches the level of a principle or rule of international law.[60] Nevertheless, the Prosecutor may seek said guidance (only) in order to assist him/her in making the final legal determination under Article 15(3) or (6).

In Loizidou,[61] the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), in ruling on an alleged breach by Turkey of its obligations under Article 1 of Protocol No. 1, was faced, inter alia, with the issue of the legal status of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) under international law. Despite the objection made by the Turkish Government at the preliminary objection phase against lodging the application, as it [58] O Triffterer, 'Article 1: The Court' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Observers' Notes, Article by Article, 2nd edn (München: C. H. Beck 2008) 60.

[59] Advisory Opinion of 28 May 1948, Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations (Article 4 of the Charter), [1948] ICJ Reports 57, 61; see also more recently Judgment of 31 March 2014 (Merits), Whaling in the Antarctic (Australia v. Japan: New Zealand Intervening), ICJ, para. 82 (noting that the interpretation of the convention under consideration 'is the task of [the] Court').

[60] Art. 21(1)(b) Rome Statute.

[61] Judgment of 23 March 1995, Loizidou v. Turkey (Preliminary Objections) (Application No. 15318/89), ECtHR; Judgment of 18 December 1996, Loizidou v. Turkey (Merits) (Application No. 15318/89), ECtHR.

was deemed a 'political propaganda' which aimed at 'simulating a debate before the Court on the status of the "TRNC"',[62] the Court did not consider 'such motivation to be an abuse of its procedures'.[63] Instead the Court examined whether the matters complained of were capable of falling within the jurisdiction of Turkey even though they occurred outside its territory. The Court concluded they did.[64] On the merits, in order to rule on the alleged responsibility of Turkey, the ECtHR had to decide on the validity of Article 159 of the TRNC Constitution, which in turn involved an imperative pronouncement on the legal status of the TRNC under international law. The ECtHR stated:

> In this context the Court takes note of United Nations Security Council Resolution 541 (1983) declaring the proclamation of the establishment of the 'TRNC' as legally invalid and calling upon all States not to recognise any Cypriot State other than the Republic of Cyprus. A similar call was reiterated by the Security Council in Resolution 550 (adopted on 11 May 1984). In November 1983 the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe also condemned the proclamation of statehood and called upon all States to deny recognition to the 'TRNC'.... A position to similar effect was taken by the European Community and the Commonwealth Heads of Government.... Moreover it is only the Cypriot Government which is recognised internationally as the Government of the Republic of Cyprus in the context of diplomatic and treaty relations and the working of international organisations....
>
> [...]
>
> In the Court's view, the principles underlying the Convention cannot be interpreted and applied in a vacuum. Mindful of the Convention's special character as a human rights treaty, it must also take into account any relevant rules of international law when deciding on disputes concerning its jurisdiction pursuant to Article 49 of the Convention (art. 49). In this respect it is evident from international practice and the various, strongly worded resolutions referred to above... that the international community does not regard the 'TRNC' as a State under international law and that the Republic of Cyprus has remained the sole legitimate Government of Cyprus—itself, bound to respect international standards in the field of the protection of human and minority rights. Against this background the Court cannot attribute legal validity for purposes of the Convention to such provisions as Article 159 of the fundamental law on which the Turkish Government rely.[65]

In the same vein, in the Cyprus case, the ECtHR followed the same approach when it stated:

> The Court, like the Commission, finds that the respondent Government's claim cannot be sustained.... it notes that it is evident from international practice and the condemnatory tone of the resolutions adopted by the United Nations Security Council and the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers that the international community does not recognise the 'TRNC' as a State under international law. The Court

[62] Judgment of 23 March 1995, Loizidou (n 55) para. 42.
[63] Ibid., para. 45. [64] Ibid., para. 64.
[65] Judgment of 18 December 1996, Loizidou (n 55) paras 42–4.

> reiterates the conclusion [that] the Republic of Cyprus has remained the sole legitimate government of Cyprus and on that account their locus standi as the government of a High Contracting Party cannot therefore be in doubt.[66]

It follows that when the ECtHR was faced with a question which required a pronouncement on the legal status of an entity, it did so as part of exercising its judicial powers, rather than deciding that it was not competent to make such a ruling, as the ICC Prosecutor did. In interpreting and applying Article 12, the Prosecutor could have been equally guided by the pronouncements of other political bodies such as the General Assembly or the Security Council or international practice to determine the legal status of Palestine within the international community at the time of making his determination. He could have then taken a decision on the status of Palestine for the purposes of interpreting Article 12 based on the declared stance of the international community.

In paragraph 7 of his statement, the Prosecutor correctly referred to those international organizations and states which have recognized Palestine as a state, as well as to the status provided to Palestine by the General Assembly. He also acknowledged that this 'informs the current legal status of Palestine for the interpretation of and application of article 12'.[67] Nonetheless, he surprisingly concluded that his office 'could in the future consider allegations of crimes committed in Palestine, should [the United Nations or the Assembly of States Parties] resolve the legal issue relevant to an assessment of article 12'.[68] Thus the question remains: if the available information 'informs the current legal status of Palestine', why did he need to wait for a determination by any of the other organs referred to in his statement? This suggests that the Prosecutor had reached an implicit conclusion that Palestine was not a state for the purpose of Articles 12 and 125 of the Statute. Yet, he avoided taking an explicit decision on this matter in accordance with Article 15(6). By so doing, he issued one of the most controversial statements in the history of the Court, which is certain to cast doubt on the legitimacy of the institution.

8.3 Potential Review and Alternative Avenues

The Prosecutor's approach towards the Palestinian declaration reveals the delicacy of the matter and the complexity of the decision-making process in a situation with high political ramifications. This reality begs the question as to what extent may the judiciary, if at all, be involved during the preliminary examination phase and thereafter. This is significant especially when dealing with declarations involving controversial questions. Arguably it would have been appropriate if the Prosecutor at least had made an attempt to engage the judiciary in the course of his preliminary examination. The benefit of this approach, if possible, is to share the burden and decrease [66] Judgment of 10 May 2001, Cyprus v. Turkey (Application No. 25781/94), ECtHR, para. 61.

[67] Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement (n 1) para. 7.
[68] Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement (n 1) para. 8.

potential accusations concerning the politicization of the Prosecutor as well as the Court's credibility.

As argued under section 8.2 of this chapter, judges were unlikely to step in during the process of preliminary examination. This is partly so because the Court's statutory documents do not explicitly[69] allow for Chamber's involvement before the Prosecutor has taken a formal decision[70] under Article 15, save for a few instances to be discussed later in the chapter. This conclusion is in line with the practice of the Court.[71] In the DRC situation, the legal representative of victims requested Pre-Trial Chamber I (PTC I) to review a decision taken by the Prosecutor to suspend the investigation into the situation of the DRC as being 'equivalent to a tacit decision not to prosecute under Article 53(2)(c) of the Statute'.[72] In its ruling on the request, PTC I did not consider that the Prosecutor's decision to suspend the investigation temporarily was sufficient to meet the requirements of Article 53(1)(c) or 2 (c). Instead, the Chamber considered that 'the Prosecutor did not take a decision not to investigate or not to prosecute, under paragraph 1(c) or 2(c) of article 53 . . . [and accordingly] the request made by the legal representative of victims that the Chamber review, pursuant to article 53(3)(b) . . . [was] not appropriate at [that] stage and [had] no legal basis'.[73] A month earlier the same Chamber considered a quite similar request submitted by the Woman's Initiatives for Gender Justice.[74] The Chamber considered that the request was inappropriate because 'investigations in the Situation in the DRC [were] ongoing and the Prosecutor h[ad] not taken any decision not to investigate or prosecute',[75] in order to trigger the supervisory role of the Chamber.

Another statutory reason and perhaps even a practical one for the non-involvement of the judiciary at this stage lies in the fact that no Chamber will be assigned with the situation sub judice if the Prosecutor has not informed the Presidency of his/her intention to submit an authorization request to commence an investigation.[76]

The idea of the Chamber's intervention to supervise prosecutorial discretion is more controversial when it comes to negative decisions taken by the Prosecutor under [69] Arguably, the Chamber may rely on its implied powers of review. For an elaboration on this possibility, see M El Zeidy, 'The Gravity Threshold under the Statute of the International Criminal Court' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 35.

[70] See Arts 15(3) and 53(1) and (3) Rome Statute; Rules 48 and 105(2), (4) Rules of Procedure and Evidence. A review for possible authorization under Art. 15(3) is possible not to mention mandatory for the Prosecutor to begin his/her investigation. However, it is still debatable whether a review of an Article 15(6) decision is possible or not, as will be discussed later in this chapter. But see in the context of a State Party referral under Arts 13(a) and 14(1), Decision Requesting Information on the Status of the Preliminary Examination of the Situation in the Central African Republic (n 33).

[71] Notably the Court's practice on this matter is in relation to proceedings conducted under Art. 53, namely those resulting from a State Party referral, as opposed to proceedings conducted under Art. 15. Yet, the principle approach equally applies to both triggering methods.

[72] Decision on the Requests of the Legal Representatives for Victims VPRS 1 to VPRS 6 regarding 'Prosecutor's Information on further Investigation', Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-399, PTC I, ICC, 26 September 2007, 2.

[73] Ibid., 5.

[74] Decision on the Request Submitted Pursuant to Rule 103(1) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-373, PTC I, ICC, 17 August 2007 (and registered in the record of the case on 20 August 2007).

[75] Ibid., para. 5.

[76] Regulations 45 and 46(2) RoC.

Article 15(6), namely when he/she 'concludes that the information provided does not constitute a reasonable basis for an investigation'.[77] The reason is that there are at least two different interpretations concerning the possibility of review of Article 15(6) decisions. Thus even if one considers that the Prosecutor's statement of 3 April 2012 constituted a formal decision under Article 15(6), one needs to enquire about the scope, if any, of such review.

Article 53(3) regulates the instances in which the relevant Pre-Trial Chamber is entitled to exercise its review powers over the Prosecutor's discretion. The provision permits the Pre-Trial Chamber to review a decision of the Prosecutor not to initiate an investigation into a situation in accordance with Article 53(1). Yet, such review power is subject to some limitations. The supervisory role of the Chamber may be triggered by a request put forward by either the State Party making the referral,[78] or the Security Council if it was the referring body.[79] Alternatively, a proprio motu review is also envisaged by the drafters of the Statute but only when the Prosecutor's decision not to proceed with an investigation is based on the consideration that it 'would not serve the interests of justice'.[80]

The text is silent when it comes to a review of decisions undertaken pursuant to Article 15(6) as opposed to Article 53(1).[81] This lacuna was partly resolved by the introduction of Rule 48 of the Rules, which draws the link between Articles 53 and 15. According to said rule, '[i]n determining whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation under article 15, paragraph 3, the Prosecutor shall consider the factors set out in article 53, paragraph 1 (a)–(c)'.[82] This means a contrario that if one or more of these requirements have not been met, the Prosecutor should determine thereafter that there is no reasonable basis to proceed under Article 15(6). Nevertheless, the fact that Rule 48 unifies the applicable criteria for a determination under Articles 53(1) and 15(3) or (6) does not necessarily mean that decisions taken under both provisions are subject to review under Article 53(3), especially that the latter, as stated, does not refer to Article 15.

Rule 105 of the Rules may provide some guidance in this regard. According to Rule 105(1), '[w]hen the Prosecutor decides not to initiate an investigation under article 53, paragraph 1, he or she shall promptly inform' the referring state or the Security Council as the case may be.[83] Sub-rule 4 comes into play to cover a situation in which the Prosecutor decides not to investigate solely on the basis of the interests of justice as provided under Article 53(1)(c).[84] Thus, on their face these two paragraphs govern

[77] See also, C Stahn, 'Judicial Review of Prosecutorial Discretion: Five Years On' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 272.

[78] Art. 53(3)(a) Rome Statute; Rule 105(1), (3), (4), and (5) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[79] Ibid. [80] Art. 53(3)(b) Rome Statute; Rules 49, 105(2) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[81] In the same vein, G Turone, 'Powers and Duties of the Prosecutor' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 1158.

[82] Rule 48 Rules of Procedure and Evidence; Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya (n 37) paras 20–5.

[83] Rule 105(1) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[84] Rule 105(4) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

proceedings carried out under Article 53(1), and accordingly, go hand in hand with Article 53(3).

A different language appears under Rule 105(2). Sub-rule 2 states that '[w]hen the Prosecutor decides not to submit to the Pre-Trial Chamber a request for authorization of an investigation, rule 49 shall apply'.[85] Sub-rule 1 of the latter provision stipulates that '[w]here a decision under article 15, paragraph 6, is taken, the Prosecutor shall promptly ensure that notice is provided' to those who provided the information.[86] Sub-rule 2 proceeds by stating that such notice 'shall also advise of the possibility of submitting further information regarding the same situation in the light of new facts and evidence'.[87] Nowhere in this provision is the slightest reference made to a review of a decision taken by the Prosecutor under Article 15(6). It follows that the drafters of the Rules seem to have intended to distinguish between proceedings undertaken pursuant to Article 53(1) and those carried out in accordance with Article 15.

This conclusion finds support in the drafting history of the Rules. According to one commentator, France proposed a possibility of a proprio motu review by the Pre-Trial Chamber for negative decisions taken by the Prosecutor on the basis of the interests of justice.[88] Nonetheless, this proposal was vigorously opposed by some delegations on the ground that 'the discretion vested in the Prosecutor according to article 15 must not be compromised and that it would be inconsistent with the Statute to provide for such a direct control of the Prosecutor'.[89] Further, with the introduction of Rule 105(2), it becomes 'difficult to argue that the Prosecutor's decision not to seek authorization under article 15 could be subject to a review by the Pre-Trial Chamber under article 53',[90] the same commentator added.

Despite this more plausible interpretation, Pre-Trial Chamber II seems to have favoured a different approach. In the Kenya Authorization Decision, the Chamber stated:

> Unlike sub-paragraphs (a) and (b), which require an affirmative finding, sub-paragraph (c) does not require the Prosecutor to establish that an investigation is actually in the interests of justice. Indeed, the Prosecutor does not have to present reasons or supporting material in this respect. Thus, the Chamber considers that a review of this requirement is unwarranted in the present decision, taking into consideration that the Prosecutor has not determined that an investigation 'would not serve the interests of justice', which would prevent him from proceeding with a request for authorization of an investigation. Instead, such a review may take place in accordance with article 53(3)(b) of the Statute if the Prosecutor decided not to proceed with such a request on the basis of this sole factor. It is only when the Prosecutor decides that an investigation

[85] Rule 105(2) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.
[86] Rule 49(1) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.
[87] Rule 49(2) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.
[88] H Friman, 'Investigation and Prosecution' in R Lee et al. (eds), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (New York: Transnational Publishers 2001) 497.
[89] Ibid.
[90] Ibid., 498. But see, G Bitti, 'Article 53—Ouverture d'une enquête' in J Fernandez and X Pacreau (eds), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale, Commentaire Article par Article (Paris: A. Pedone 2012) 1178–81.

> would not be in the interests of justice that he or she is under the obligation to notify the Chamber of the reasons for such a decision, thereby triggering the review power of the Chamber.[91]

The exact approach was followed by Pre-Trial Chamber III in its decision authorizing an investigation into the situation in Côte d'Ivoire.[92] By so doing the two Chambers opted for a different interpretation which seems to rely on the fact that Rule 105(4) does not explicitly exclude a situation covered under sub-rule 2 from the possibility of review under Article 53(3)(b). Yet, the two Chambers failed to explain how they have arrived at their common conclusion. Until the Appeals Chamber decides on the matter, this interpretation will remain controversial.

Having said this, it is clear that even if one considers that the statement of 3 April 2012 constitutes a formal decision under Article 15(6), judges would have never been able to review it given that it was not a decision adopted under the umbrella of the interest of justice. Rather the decision was taken, if at all, within the scope of Article 53(1)(b) which relates to jurisdiction.

Despite this conclusion, there remain still a few options, apart from the traditional route of judicial review, which require an initiative on the part of the Prosecutor to involve the Pre-Trial Chambers in the course of the preliminary examination (i.e. before deciding on the matter).

To start with the Statute, one could consider Article 119(1) which stipulates that '[a]ny dispute concerning the judicial functions of the Court shall be settled by the decision of the Court'.[93]

So far there is only a handful of decisions which touch upon the interpretation of Article 119(1). Yet these decisions were confined to resolving judicial disputes between the Pre-Trial Chambers and the relevant State. The application of the provision was also triggered proprio motu by the relevant Pre-Trial Chamber as opposed to the Prosecutor. In Al Bashir, Pre-Trial Chamber I disagreed with Malawi's failure to arrest the suspect due to the immunity procedural barrier invoked by the Government and stated that the latter 'did not respect the sole authority of [the] Court to decide whether immunities [were] applicable', in accordance with Article 119(1).[94] The exact approach

[91] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya (n 43) para. 63 (footnotes omitted).

[92] Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire' (n 46) para. 207.

[93] Art. 119(1) Rome Statute. Also one may argue that the Prosecutor could have invoked Art. 19(3) to seize the Chamber. However, elsewhere I argued that Art. 19(3) is not applicable during the early stages of proceedings and in particular until a case phase has been reached. I still believe that this should be the correct way to go and in line with the Court's practice relating to the interpretation of Art. 19; see M El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law: Origin, Development and Practice (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2008) 265–6; see also in the same vein, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Art 58, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx2, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006, para. 20 (where the Chamber made an explicit pronouncement that Art. 19(3) determination concerns 'cases').

[94] Corrigendum to the Decision Pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-139-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 13 December 2011, para. 11.

was followed by the same Chamber in relation to Chad.[95] More than two years later Pre-Trial Chamber II found a violation on the part of the DRC for the same reason.[96] However, nowhere in these decisions did any of these Chambers provide an interpretation regarding the scope of application of Article 119(1) beyond what was specified in their pronouncement quoted earlier. Thus some further analysis is warranted.

The key element in Article 119(1) is the existence or absence of a 'dispute'. In the Land and Maritime Boundary, the ICJ relying on previous jurisprudence of the Permanent Court of International Justice defined a 'dispute' as 'a disagreement on a point of law or fact, a conflict of legal views'.[97] In more recent jurisprudence, the ICJ construed the term 'dispute', albeit in a different context (i.e. interpretation of Article 60 of the ICJ Statute), as 'a difference of opinion or views between the parties'.[98] Certainly, the said 'dispute' should, in principle, arise between at least two parties to the proceedings or an organ of the Court and one or more parties.

In the Palestinian situation, the dispute which could have engaged the judiciary was one between the Prosecutor and Palestine or Israel or both. Arguably at this early stage (preliminary examination), the Prosecutor could have brought to the attention of the Pre-Trial Division information to show that there existed a dispute as to the 'judicial functions of the Court'.[99] It would have been sufficient to prove that there was a disagreement or differing views regarding a point of law, namely the exercise of jurisdiction before the Court or the interpretation and application of a jurisdictional provision under the Statute (i.e. Article 12). The scope of the 'judicial functions' referred to in Article 119(1) as argued by one of the founding fathers of the Statute includes questions of jurisdiction together with the pre-conditions.[100] Thus the Prosecutor could have seized the judiciary with the question under consideration by [95] Decision pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the refusal of the Republic of Chad to comply with the cooperation requests issued by the Court with respect to the arrest and surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-140-tENG, PTC I, ICC, 13 December 2011, para. 10.

[96] Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-195, PTC II, ICC, 9 April 2014, para. 16.

[97] Judgment of 11 June 1998 (Preliminary Objections), Land and Maritime Boundary between Cameroon and Nigeria (Cameroon v. Nigeria: Equatorial Guinea intervening) [1998] ICJ Reports 275, 314, para. 87; Advisory Opinion of 26 April 1988, Applicability of the Obligation to Arbitrate under Section 21 of the United Nations Headquarters Agreement of 26 June 1947, [1998] ICJ Reports 12, 27, para. 35

[98] Order of 18 July 2011 (Request for the Indication of Provisional Measures), Request for Interpretation of the Judgment of 15 June 1962 in the Case Concerning the Temple of Preah Vihear (Cambodia v. Thailand), [2011] ICJ Reports 537, para. 22; Judgment of 11 November 2013, Request for Interpretation of the Judgment of 15 June 1962 in the Case Concerning the Temple of Preah Vihear (Cambodia v. Thailand), ICJ, para. 33.

[99] See also, Judgment of 11 November 2013 (Cambodia v. Thailand) (n 98) para. 33 (noting that 'it is not required that a dispute…"should have manifested itself in a formal way;…it should be sufficient if the two Governments have in fact shown themselves as holding opposite views"'); also, Judgment of 10 December 1985, Application for Revision and Interpretation of the Judgment of 24 February 1982 in the Case Concerning the Continental Shelf (Tunisia v. Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) [1985] ICJ Reports 192, 217–18, para. 46.

[100] R Clark, 'Article 119: Settlement of Disputes' in Triffterer (ed.) (n 58) 1729. It follows that the argument put forward by the Prosecutor in his statement of 3 April 2012 that 'interpreting and applying article 12…[was] for…the Assembly of States Parties', pursuant to Art. 112(g), was misleading as being inconsistent with the Statute. See Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement (n 1) paras 5 and 6; also Art. 112(g) Rome Statute ('Perform any other function consistent with this Statute or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence'). Since Art. 119(1) covers situations which involve resolving issues related to the judicial functions of the Court, then relying on Art. 112(g) would be inconsistent with the Statute, i.e. Art. 119(1).

way of an application to be lodged with the Pre-Trial Division in order to assist him in deciding on the matter.

The Prosecutor could have also followed a slightly different path, based on Regulation 46(3) of the RoC. According to this provision, '[a]ny matter, request or information not arising out of a situation assigned to a Pre-Trial Chamber … shall be directed by the President of the Pre-Trial Division to a Pre-Trial Chamber according to a roster established by the President of that Division'.[101] Although sub-regulation 3 does not specify the exact scope and nature of the 'matter' or 'request', certainly these terms refer to issues of a juridical nature. This conclusion may be inferred from the language used in sub-regulation 2 which stipulates that '[t]he Pre-Trial Chamber shall be responsible for any matter, request or information arising out of the situation assigned to it'. The reference to a 'matter' or 'request arising out of the situation' makes clear that these terms entail legal problems. This construction is confirmed by two decisions issued by Pre-Trial Chamber II in response to filings received by the Chamber involving questions of law.[102] In the Kenya situation, Pre-Trial Chamber II noted that:

> [W]henever a document is linked to a situation of which a Pre-Trial Chamber is seized of, it is the duty of the Registry to transmit this document without undue delay to the Chamber assigned with the situation, … If the document is not linked to a situation of which a Pre-Trial Chamber is seized of, the Registry has to transmit it without undue delay to the President of the Pre-Trial Division in accordance with regulation 46(3) of the Regulations.[103]

Thus it would have been also possible to engage one of the Pre-Trial Chambers in resolving the issues arising out of the interpretation of Article 12 even though there was no Chamber assigned with the situation of Palestine. In this context, it is the relevant Pre-Trial Chamber or the President of the Pre-Trial Division as opposed to the Presidency who is entitled to order the Registry to open a situation record for the purpose of regulation 46(3) proceedings.[104]

[101] Regulation 46(3) RoC; see also Decision assigning the 'Request for review of the Prosecution's decision of 23 April 2014 not to open a Preliminary Examination concerning alleged crimes committed in the Arab Republic of Egypt, and the Registrar's Decision of 25 April 2014' to Pre-Trial Chamber II, Request under Regulation 46(3) of the Regulations of the Court, ICC-RoC46(3)-01/14-1, President of the Pre-Trial Division, ICC, 10 September 2014 (notified on 11 September 2014).

[102] Decision on a Request for Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-43, PTC II, ICC, 11 February 2011, para. 14; Second Decision on Application by Nine Persons to be Questioned by the Office of the Prosecutor, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-39, PTC II, ICC, 31 January 2011, para. 2, fn. 2 ('Albeit not applicable in this context, the Chamber, for possible future purposes, draws the Registrar's attention to regulation 46(3) of the Regulations of the Court and the existing roster in case she deems that a matter, request or information does not arise out of a situation assigned to a Pre-Trial Chamber'); see also, Judgment on the Appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision giving notice to the parties and participants that the legal characterisation of the facts may be subject to change in accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009, para. 69 (noting that the Regulations of the Court could cover legal matters i.e. 'matters of practice and procedure').

[103] Decision on a Request for Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Republic of Kenya (n 102) para. 14; more recently, see Decision on the 'Request for review of the Prosecutor's decision of 23 April 2014 not to open a Preliminary Examination concerning alleged crimes committed in the Arab Republic of Egypt, and the Registrar's Decision of 25 April 2014', Request under Regulation 46(3) of the Regulations of the Court, ICC-RoC46(3)-01/14-3, PTC II, ICC, 12 September 2014.

[104] Regulation 20(1) of the Regulations of the Registry, ICC-BD/03-03-13, last sentence: 'The Registry shall open a situation record … as ordered by a Chamber or the President of a Division'.

8.4 Palestine's New Status and its Effect on the First and Second Declaration

As mentioned in the introduction, Israel initiated a number of 'massive' military operations in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip, known as 'Operation Protective Edge'. This operation led to the establishment of an independent international commission of inquiry to 'investigate all violations of international humanitarian law and international human rights law' in these areas.[105] With the Prosecutor's controversial statement of 3 April 2012, arguing that he was not in a position to decide and, by implication, rule on the validity of the first declaration lodged back then, he left a number of issues unresolved. One of these issues is the extent of the validity of the first declaration lodged by the Palestinian authorities in January 2009 in relation to the most recent events, and therefore, whether there was a need for lodging the subsequent declarations of 25 July and 31 December 2014.

With the adoption of General Assembly Resolution 67/19 of 29 November 2012,[106] Palestine has been accorded the status of a non-member observer state in the United Nations.[107] The effect of this elevation is, inter alia, that Palestine may become a party to multilateral treaties which are open to 'any State' ('all States' formula)[108] such as the Rome Statute,[109] and may equally accept the ad hoc jurisdiction of the ICC under article 12(3). Thus the problem which the Prosecutor invoked in April 2012 no longer exists. The question remains whether or not the Prosecutor may rely on the old declaration in order to investigate the recent military operations carried out by Israel and Hamas (Operation Protective Edge) or any previous operation such as Operation Cast Lead, regardless of the second and third declarations. This question might appear nowadays irrelevant given that Palestine have acceded to the Rome Statute on 2 January 2015 and lodged two consecutive declarations on 25 July and 31 December 2014. However, this question remains relevant because the subsequent unilateral acts undertaken by the Palestinian Authority are still restricted in terms of temporal jurisdiction and subject matter jurisdiction. Palestine deposited its instrument of accession on 2 January 2015, and thus, according to article 126(2) of the Rome Statute, the Statute entered into force for that State on 1 April 2015. This means that the Court may exercise its jurisdiction only over events which take place as of that date, unless Palestine accepts the jurisdiction of the Court with retroactive effect by way of submitting a declaration under article 12(3) setting out the temporal scope of such acceptance of jurisdiction. This is what Palestine has done by lodging the second and third declarations on 25 July and 31 December 2014. But even after submitting these two declarations, and regardless of the question of their validity, the temporal jurisdiction of the Court remains restricted because these declarations, unlike the first declaration, are confined to the [105] UN Human Rights Council Res S-21/1 (n 3) para. 13.

[106] UNGA Res 67/19 (29 November 2012) UN Doc A/RES/67/19.

[107] Ibid., para. 2.

[108] 'Issues related to General Assembly resolution 67/19 on the status of Palestine in the United Nations', Memorandum submitted by P O'Brien, 21 December 2012, para. 15; see also on the 'all States' formula, Summary of Practice of the Secretary-General As Depositary of Multilateral Treaties, UN Doc ST/LEG/7/Rev.1, paras 81–2 ('Summary of Practice').

[109] Art. 125 Rome Statute.

period related to Operation Protective Edge. Accordingly if the Prosecutor were able to rely on the first declaration, she might even decide to investigate events related to both sides of the conflict as early as 1 July 2002. These issues will be examined in more details in the following paragraphs.

Certainly, if the Palestinian accession to the Rome Statute was done separately without lodging any supplementary ad hoc declarations, this would have eliminated or avoided to a certain extent some of the controversial questions accompanying the delegation-based theory of jurisdiction on which Article 12(3) is premised.[110] But this is no more the case and the Court has to address any controversial question surrounding said declarations in its jurisprudence if the situation arises.

Regarding the initial (first) declaration, there are at least two different ways of treating it. In several parts of his statement of 3 April 2012, the Prosecutor argued vigorously that he was not in a position to decide on the question before having received an answer from the United Nations competent organs or the ASP.[111] Thus if the Prosecutor insisted that he was not the one to decide at the time, until the issue of Palestine's status was resolved, do we really need a new declaration now? The question of the status of Palestine has in the meantime been resolved for the purposes of the Rome Statute and the current Prosecutor can now take a formal decision on what her predecessor has left open with respect to the first declaration.

Differently, if one considers the statement of 3 April 2012 as a formal decision under Article 15(6), then there is merit in expecting at least a new letter validating the old declaration or a new declaration. A post validation letter could be similar in essence to the two letters submitted by the new Government of Côte d'Ivoire in 2010 and 2011.[112] In such a case, the letter would renew the intention to accept the jurisdiction of the Court on an ad hoc basis in relation to the duration and scope of the initial declaration, or even going beyond that. If one observes that the Prosecutor removed Palestine from the list of states under preliminary examination right after the issuance of his statement, there is even more room to argue that, in effect, he took a formal decision and therefore it is the accurate procedural avenue to receive a new declaration, as the initial one would be considered invalid. The invalidity of the declaration not only results from the Prosecutor's previous ruling, but also from the fact that General Assembly Resolution 67/19 does not seem to have changed the status of Palestine retroactively (i.e. it only produces its effect ex nunc and not ex tunc).[113] The current Prosecutor's recent statement on the matter strengthens this line of argument.

[110] For a useful discussion on these controversial questions and potential solutions, see K Ambos, 'Palestine, UN Non-Member Observer Status and ICC Jurisdiction' (EJIL: Talk, 4 May 2014) <http://www.ejiltalk.org/author/kambos/> accessed 15 September 2014; E Kontorovich, 'Israel/Palestine—The ICC's Uncharted Territory' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 979; Y Ronen, 'Israel, Palestine and the ICC—Territory Uncharted but not Unknown' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 7.

[111] Prosecutor's 3 April 2012 statement (n 1) paras 3, 5, and 6.

[112] Although in the context of Côte d'Ivoire, the Court did not consider that the initial declaration of 18 April 2003 was invalid; Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire' (n 46) paras 14–15.

[113] UNGA Res 67/19 (n 100); also A Zimmermann, 'Palestine and the International Criminal Court Quo Vadis?' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 303, 308; Ambos (n 110).

In her press statement issued on 2 September 2014, the present Prosecutor tried to correct what her predecessor had done by confirming that the 3 April 2012 statement was a formal decision based on 'lack of jurisdiction', as Palestine at the time was not entitled to accede to the Rome Statute, and accordingly, could not lodge an Article 12(3) declaration.[114] This clearly reveals that the current Prosecutor has confirmed the invalidity of the old declaration given that Palestine, in her opinion, was not entitled to accept the ad hoc jurisdiction of the Court from the outset. This is so despite some arguments that could be made to the contrary.[115] By so doing, the Prosecutor has closed the door on relying on the old (first) declaration. The only available avenue left for Palestine was either to accede to the Statute or to lodge a new declaration or do both as they actually did. Since the first declaration is deemed invalid, it is therefore worth considering the validity and legal effects of the second and third declarations.

The available public information reveals that on 25 July 2014, the Palestinian Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Gaza complained to the ICC against Israel's military operations, apparently by way of lodging a second declaration under Article 12(3).[116] This second declaration was allegedly withdrawn a few days later.[117] A few months later, the President of the State of Palestine lodged with the ICC Registrar the third declaration accepting the jurisdiction of the Court in relation to the same events set out in the second declaration and setting the starting date as of 13 June 2014 – the start of the Operation Protective Edge. This third declaration has so far not been withdrawn. These developments shift the focus to the validity of these declarations, and to what extent, if at all, these declarations may be withdrawn.

The issue at stake is no longer whether the status of Palestine enables it to accede to the Rome Statute or lodge an Article 12(3) declaration, given that this question has been answered in the affirmative. Rather the question is who is entitled to lodge a declaration under article 12(3) on behalf of the State of Palestine or any other State in order to ensure the validity of said declaration ? In particular, were the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General in their capacity legally entitled to lodge the second declaration? What about the third declaration? What are the legal effects of these declarations? This question of validity has gone unnoticed in literature, especially in response to the first declaration, which was also submitted by the Minister of Justice. The bulk of contributions focused on the validity of the initial declaration from the standpoint of the statehood of Palestine. But none has questioned the capacity of the Palestinian Minister of Justice from the standpoint of international law to lodge the first declaration. The same holds true in relation to the second declaration of [114] Statement of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda: 'The Public Deserves to Know the Truth about the ICC's Jurisdiction over Palestine', 2 September 2014 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/EN_Menus/icc/Pages/default.aspx> accessed 15 September 2014.

[115] The fact that the Prosecutor referred to the summary practice of the Secretary General without relying on a precedent such as that of Cook Islands, which was included in the 'all States' formula after its membership in the World Health Organization, raises some doubts as to the validity of his decision. Palestine was equally a member of the UNESCO and other international organizations and yet the Prosecutor selectively deviated without any convincing legal justification. See, Summary of Practice (n 108) paras 85–6.

[116] 'Palestine Filed Complain at ICC: Accuses Israel of War Crimes' (n 6).

[117] 'Palestinian Authority withdraws complaint against Israel' and 'Correction: Saleem al-Saqqa pledges to maintain Palestinian complaint to ICC' (n 7).

25 July 2014. The situation appears different with respect to the third declaration given that it was signed by the President of the State of Palestine.

The capacity of the Palestinian Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Gaza to bind the Palestinian Authority seems to be restricted from the standpoint of international law. It is common under general international law that there is a certain category of state officials entitled by virtue of their positions and functions to represent their state in international relations. Their capacity to bind the state is undisputed and of a customary nature. This category has been commonly referred to by the ICJ on different occasions.

In ruling on a request for the indication of provisional measures in the Genocide case, the ICJ spoke of Heads of States among those falling within this limited category. Responding to an argument concerning the legitimacy of the President of Bosnia and Herzegovina and his capacity to bind the state, the ICJ stated that the Court 'has been seised of the case on the authority of a Head of State, treated as such in the United Nations; [and that] the power of a Head of State to act on behalf of the State in its international relations is universally recognized'.[118] In its Judgment of 11 July 1996 regarding the preliminary objections, the Court reiterated its finding when it stated that, '[a]ccording to international law, there is no doubt that every Head of State is presumed to be able to act on behalf of the State in its international relations'.[119]

A few years later, the ICJ spoke in broader terms about those state officials who, due to the nature of their functions, are empowered to bind their states in international relations. In Yerodia, the ICJ, albeit in the context of immunities, declared that the power to act on behalf of the state is mainly granted to a Head of State, Prime Minister, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Court stated that 'a Minister for Foreign Affairs, responsible for the conduct of his or her State's relations with all other States, occupies a position such that, like the Head of State or the Head of Government, he or she is recognized under international law as representative of the State solely by virtue of his or her office'.[120] Thus the Court has made it clear that these state officials by virtue of their functions are traditionally empowered to act on behalf of the state without any further requirement. As the Court has stated in the same judgment, the acts of a Minister of Foreign Affairs 'may bind the State represented, and there is a presumption, that a Minister for Foreign Affairs, simply by virtue of that office, has full powers to act on behalf of the State'.[121] This is more the case when it comes to the Head of State or the Prime Minister, where there is certainly a presumption that they have 'full powers' to bind their relevant state. This makes it clear that there is no apparent problem of validity concerning the third declaration as it was signed by the President of the State of Palestine who enjoys full powers to bind his State.

[118] Order of 8 April 1993 (Provisional Measures), Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro) [1993] ICJ Reports 3, para. 13.

[119] Judgment of 11 July 1996 (Preliminary Objections) Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro) [1996] ICJ Reports 595, para. 44.

[120] Judgment of 14 February 2002, Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium) [2002] ICJ Reports 3, para. 53.

[121] Ibid.

The practice of the ICJ, the main judicial body responsible, inter alia, for addressing questions of international law, is less clear on the question of whether there is also a customary rule supporting a finding that a Minister of Justice or an Attorney General by virtue of their positions are presumed to have 'full powers' to bind their state.

In the Armed Activities case (Congo), the ICJ reiterated that such a customary rule exists with respect to the category of state officials mentioned above (Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers of Foreign Affairs).[122] It added that this customary rule concerning this category of state officials 'finds expression in Article 7, paragraph 2, of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties'.[123]

Turning to the question concerning the capacity of the Rwandan Minister of Justice to bind her state, the ICJ noted that:

> [W]ith increasing frequency in modern international relations other persons representing a State in specific fields may be authorized by that State to bind it by their statements in respect of matters falling within their purview. This may be true, for example, of holders of technical ministerial portfolios exercising powers in their field of competence in the area of foreign relations, and even of certain officials. In this case, the Court notes first that Ms Mukabagwiza spoke before the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in her capacity as Minister of Justice of Rwanda and that she indicated inter alia that she was making her statement "on behalf of the Rwandan people". The Court further notes that the questions relating to the protection of human rights which were the subject of that statement fall within the purview of a Minister of Justice. It is the Court's view that the possibility cannot be ruled out in principle that a Minister of Justice may, under certain circumstances, bind the State he or she represents by his or her statements (emphasis added).[124]

The relevant part of this judgment clearly suggests that the ICJ intended to broaden the category of state officials who may bind their states under certain circumstances. This category may include a Minister of Justice and 'other persons representing a State in specific fields'. Yet, it is not clear from the language employed by the Court whether it meant that this category of state officials which includes the Minister of Justice is also presumed to have 'full powers'. This ambiguity is strengthened if one reads the relevant part of the judgment which states that 'other persons representing a State in specific fields may be authorized by that State to bind it'.[125] Arguably this language suggests that a 'Minister of Justice' or 'holders of technical ministerial portfolios' may not be presumed to have 'full powers' by virtue of their positions as is the case with the limited category referred to in article 7(2)(a) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.[126] Rather, in order to recognize the binding nature of their acts on the international plane, further confirmation concerning the existence of such 'full power' is required. This is regulated by the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

[122] Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (New Application : 2002) (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda), Jurisdiction and Admissibility, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2006, para. 46.
[123] Ibid. [124] Ibid., paras 47–48. [125] Ibid., para. 47.
[126] Art. 7(2)(a) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (signed 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331 ('VCLT').

Article 7(1) stipulates that:

> […] A person is considered as representing a State for the purpose of adopting or authenticating the text of a treaty or for the purpose of expressing the consent of the State to be bound by a treaty if: (a) he produces appropriate full powers; or (b) it appears from the practice of the State… concerned or from other circumstances that [the] intention was to consider that person as representing the State for such purposes and to dispense with full powers.[127]

The notion of 'full powers' has been defined in Article 2 of the Convention as 'a document emanating from the competent authority of a State designating a person or persons to represent the State for negotiating, adopting or authenticating the text of a treaty, for expressing the consent of the State to be bound by a treaty, or for accomplishing any other act with respect to a treaty'.[128] The question of acting on behalf of a state by way of lodging an ad hoc declaration of acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court does not fall within the scenarios of 'negotiating, adopting or authenticating the text of a treaty'. Rather it is clear that such a unilateral act of a state's representative may fit within 'any other act with respect to a treaty'. This addition was intended by the drafters to cover situations where 'full powers' go beyond the conclusion of a treaty.[129] Thus the question remains whether the Palestinian Minister of Justice or the Attorney General possess 'full powers' or the circumstances in which they lodged the declaration reveal that it was the intention to empower them to represent Palestine.

Public sources reveal that the Interim President of Palestine has requested the Prosecutor to 'nullify the complaint filed on July 25, 2014' by the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General.[130] In an interview conducted with the Palestinian Foreign Minister on 19 August 2014, the latter was also quoted saying that the Minister of Justice 'filed this lawsuit in his own name without consulting his government, without taking permission or authorization from this government, and without consulting the Authority president, who is the President of Palestine'.[131] This information, if it does not negate the fact that the two state officials lacked the necessary 'full powers' to bind Palestine before the Court, at least casts doubt on whether they possessed such powers. As such, it was for the Prosecutor or the Registrar to verify the matter with the Palestinian Authority. In the absence of such verification, the Court should not act upon this declaration or any other declaration lodged by any person allegedly representing his/her state apart from [127] VCLT, Art. 7 . See generally on Art. 7, P Gautier, '1969 Convention: Article 2, Use of Terms' in O Corten and P Klein (eds), The Vienna Conventions on the Law of Treaties: A Commentary, vol. I (Oxford: Oxford University Press 11) 33 ff.

[128] Art. 2(1) VCLT (n 132). See generally, P Kovacs 'Article 7: Full Powers' in Corten and Klein (eds) (n 127) 125 ff (emphasis added).

[129] 1966 Yearbook of the International Law Commission, vol. II, 189.

[130] 'Palestinian Authority withdraws complaint against Israel' (n 7).

[131] 'Palestinian foreign minister interviewed on lawsuit lodged with ICC' Al Arabya TV, 19 August 2014; see also 'Report: Palestinian Authority preventing ICC from investigating Israel, Hamas for war crimes', The Jerusalem Post, 12 September 2014 <http://www.jpost.com/Arab-Israeli-Conflict/Report-Palestinian-Authority-preventing-ICC-from-investigating-Israel-Hamas-for-war-crimes-375166> accessed 15 September 2014.

the limited category referred to in Article 7(2) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and referred to in the jurisprudence of the ICJ.

This brings me to the question of withdrawal of this declaration. It is clear that in the absence of 'full powers' to represent Palestine, the declaration submitted by the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General becomes invalid, and accordingly, the question of withdrawal of the second declaration becomes moot. However, this is not the case with respect to the third declaration. There might still be a possibility to request its withdrawal due to the enormous political pressure imposed by Israel and the United States on the Palestinian Authority. This has taken the form of threats of cutting around 400 million dollars annual aid provided by the United States.[132] Israel has also frozen the 'transfer of NIS 500 million in tax revenue'[133] to the Palestinian Authority. Thus the question of withdrawal of ad hoc declarations merits some analysis.

The ICJ was often faced with a similar question regarding the effects that the withdrawal or expiry of a declaration may have on the jurisdiction of the Court. The leading authority on the issue is the Nottebohm case delivered by the Court in 1953. In that case the ICJ faced the issue of whether the expiry of the declaration by which Guatemala accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court had the effect of depriving the Court of its jurisdiction to adjudicate on the claim. In this context, the ICJ responded by stating:

> There can be no doubt that an Application filed after the expiry of this period would not have the effect of legally seising the Court. But neither in its Declaration nor in any other way did Guatemala then indicate that the time-limit provided for in its Declaration meant that the expiry of the period would deprive the Court of jurisdiction to deal with cases of which it has been previously seised … Once the Court has been regularly seised, the Court must exercise its powers … After that, the expiry of the period fixed for one of the Declarations on which the Application was founded is an event which is unrelated to the exercise of the powers conferred on the Court by the Statute, which the Court must exercise whenever it has been regularly seised … An extrinsic fact such as the subsequent lapse of the Declaration, by reason of the expiry of the period or by denunciation, cannot deprive the Court of the jurisdiction already established …[134]

Four years later, the ICJ reiterated the same rule in in the Case Concerning Right of Passage Over Indian Territory, when the Court stated that '[i]t is a rule of law generally accepted, as well as one acted upon in the past by the Court, that, once the Court has been validly seised of a dispute, unilateral action by the respondent State in terminating its Declaration, in whole or in part, cannot divest the Court of jurisdiction'.[135] This became a common practice of the ICJ in subsequent cases addressing the withdrawal [132] 'Hamas urges Palestinian leadership to seek ICC justice', Middle East Crisis, 25 August 2014 <http://www.ksat.com/content/pns/ksat/news/2014/08/23/mideast-crisis.html> accessed 15 September 2014.

[133] 'US: Palestine not a state, does not qualify for ICC membership', The Jerusalem Post, 9 January 2015, at http://www.jpost.com/landedpages/printarticle.aspx?id=387031.

[134] Nottebohm (n 53) 121–3.

[135] Judgment of 26 November 1957 (Preliminary Objection), Case Concerning Right of Passage over Indian Territory (Portugal v. India) [1957] ICJ Reports 125, 142.

or termination of declarations.[136] The same rule may equally apply to the ICC, and the Court should not act differently in a purported withdrawal.

However, one needs to distinguish between a withdrawal requested after a referral was made by a State Party or a Security Council and one requested after lodging an Article 12(3) declaration. As to the former, the legal effect of a referral is to engage the jurisdiction of the Court, and thus, any request to suspend the proceedings at any stage on the basis of alleged withdrawal should be denied as having no bearing on the jurisdiction of the Court.[137]

This might not be the case with declarations lodged under Article 12(3). The mere lodging of an ad hoc declaration under Article 12(3) of the Rome Statute is not in itself sufficient to trigger the jurisdiction of the Court. A declaration is generally limited to extending the temporal, personal, and territorial jurisdictional parameters of the Court. As a matter of fact, an Article 12(3) declaration is deemed one of the preconditions to the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction, and should be clearly distinguished from the Court's triggering method, mirrored in Articles 13, 14, and 15. Consequently, the Prosecutor is not obliged to begin any preliminary activity as a direct consequence of the lodging of a declaration of acceptance, unless there is an explicit request to that effect,[138] or if he/she decides to proceed on the basis of his/her proprio motu powers.

Once the jurisdiction of the Court has been activated or triggered it is not logical to speak of withdrawal, since, even if it were accepted as a legitimate unilateral act, it would not affect current proceedings of relevance to the situation. This conclusion finds support not only in the ICJ jurisprudence referred to here, but also in a number of cases before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR). In the Constitutional Court case, the IACHR argued that the Court asserted jurisdiction to consider the case a week before Peru's alleged withdrawal of its recognition of the Court's contentious jurisdiction. Citing the Commission's brief, the decision stated that such 'purported withdrawal have [sic] no effect whatever on the Court's exercise of jurisdiction … A unilateral action by a State cannot divest an international court of jurisdiction it has already asserted'.[139] The Court followed the exact approach in the Ivcher Bronstein case.[140] However, this may not be the case in the absence of any request to activate the jurisdiction of the Court or if the Prosecutor has remained inactive. In this respect, there may be some room for considering the possibility of accepting Palestine's withdrawal of its ad hoc acceptance of the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court during this interim stage.

[136] Judgment of 26 November 1984 (Jurisdiction of the Court and Admissibility of the Application) Military and Paramilitary Activities In and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) [1984] ICJ Reports 392, para. 54.

[137] With respect to withdrawal from the Statute which might be another possibility, the answer is much simpler as this scenario is already envisaged and addressed under article 127 of the Rome Statute. In this regard, a request for withdrawal does not deprive the Court from proceeding with its investigations, prosecutions or trials if they have started prior to that request. See Art. 127(2) Rome Statute.

[138] Stahn, El Zeidy, and Olasolo (n 19) 423–4.

[139] Constitutional Court Case, Competence, Judgment of 24 September 1999, Inter-Am Ct. H.R. (Series C), No. 55 (1999), para. 24.

[140] Ivcher Bronstein Case, Competence, Judgment of 24 September 1999, Inter-Am Ct. H.R. (Series C) No. 54 (1999), para. 24.

Also of relevance to the discussion is whether Palestine may accept the retroactive exercise of jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 12(3) after the adoption of General Assembly Resolution 67/19. The principle arguments underlying this latter question have been sufficiently addressed in scholarly writings,[141] and settled in the practice of the Court. It has been accepted practice before the ICC that a non-State Party or even a State Party may lodge an Article 12(3) declaration with retroactive effect. In this respect, it should be empathized that retroactivity does not entail a possibility for the exercise of jurisdiction of the Court beyond the temporal limitation imposed by Article 11, namely 1 July 2002.[142] In the situation in Côte d'Ivoire, Pre-Trial Chamber III agreed to exercise jurisdiction in relation to crimes allegedly committed in the country since 19 September 2002, although the Government lodged its declaration dated 18 April 2003 on 1 October 2003.[143] Similarly, in the Uganda situation, Pre-Trial Chamber II adhered to the idea that Uganda might accept the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction for crimes which had taken place prior to the entry into force of the Statute for that state. In the warrant of arrest issued against the leader and Commander-in-Chief of the LRA, Joseph Kony, Pre-Trial Chamber II noted the 'Declaration on Temporal Jurisdiction', in which the Ugandan Government 'accepted the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction for crimes committed following the entry into force of the Statute on the 1st day of July 2002'.[144] The Appeals Chamber confirmed the retroactive effect of an Article 12(3) declaration.[145] It also confirmed the possibility of accepting the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction at the time of the lodging of the declaration for future events.[146] Yet, in the context of Palestine the question is trickier and might call for deviating, to a certain extent, from this principle rule. As stated earlier, it has been argued that the General Assembly Resolution 67/19 produces its effect ex nunc. Thus, the fact that Palestine was not entitled to lodge a declaration of acceptance of jurisdiction of the Court prior to the adoption of this resolution makes it equally the case that it should not be able to accept the exercise of jurisdiction of the [141] K Heller, 'Yes, Palestine Could Accept the ICC's Jurisdiction Retroactively' (Opinio Juris, 29 November 2012) <http://opiniojuris.org/2012/11/29/yes-palestine-could-accept-the-iccs-jurisdiction-retroactively/> accessed 15 September 2014; A Zimmermann (n 112); Ambos (n 104); and more generally El Zeidy, 'The Legitimacy of Withdrawing State Party Referrals and Ad hoc Declarations under the Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 19) 70.

[142] The general rule is that the Court may exercise jurisdiction only in respect of crimes committed after the Statute's entry into force in relation to that state (Art. 11(1)). The invocation of Art. 12(3) is the exception in order to extend the jurisdiction of the Court to cover events from the Statute's entry into force (Art. 11(2)).

[143] Corrigendum to 'Decision Pursuant to Article 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire' (n 46) para. 15.

[144] Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony Issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC II, ICC, 27 September 2005, para. 32.

[145] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Laurent Koudou Gbagbo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I on jurisdiction and stay of proceedings, Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-321, AC, ICC, 12 December 2012, para. 83 (noting that 'the Statute also serves the purpose of deterring the commission of crimes in the future, and not only of addressing crimes committed in the past'). See also, Decision on the 'Corrigendum of the challenge to the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court on the basis of articles 12(3), 19(2), 21(3), 55 and 59 of the Rome Statute filed by the Defence for President Gbagbo (ICC- 02/11-01/11-129)', Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-212, PTC I, ICC, 15 August 2012, para. 61.

[146] Ibid.

Court in relation to crimes committed prior to that date.[147] However, Palestine may still accept the jurisdiction of the Court retroactively up until 29 November 2012, the date of adoption of General Assembly Resolution 67/19. Indeed, the Palestinian Authority seems to have realized the potential legal problems which might arise if it had lodged an article 12(3) declaration that goes back to 1 July 2002 as in the case of the first declaration. Instead, the Palestinian Authority has chosen a much neater avenue when it decided to restrict its third declaration to events which do not predate Operation Protective Edge (13 June 2014). By doing so, Palestine not only confined the scope of investigations to events which took place as of 13 June 2014 onwards, but also it made it more difficult, if not impossible, for the Court to reject the retroactive application of its jurisdiction for the date specified in the third declaration based on its settled jurisprudence. This does not deny the fact that any interested party may still contest the third declaration in terms of its validity or scope of application by way of a jurisdictional challenge under article 19(2) of the Statute.

8.5 Conclusion

The practice of the Prosecutor in addressing the first declaration of Palestine is alarming. It may trigger a trend of renouncing responsibility, at a time when the international community is critically assessing and scrutinizing the work of the institution after more than a decade from the start of its operation. True, the situation of Palestine is a sensitive matter and carries with it some highly political questions. Yet this reality should not compromise the main feature of the ICC as being an international institution with a purely judicial mandate. Arguably Palestine was the first real test for the Court to assess its legitimacy, and certainly it is not the last situation with difficult political ramifications. Taiwan and the TRNC may also pose quite similar difficulties if one day they approach the Court under Article 12(3). The Court, in turn, cannot continue denying responsibility for resolving questions of a purely judicial nature (jurisdictional questions) by dumping them on other organs of the United Nations or on the ASP.

There is always room to seek guidance from other bodies such as the relevant organs of the United Nations. But seeking guidance does not mean that political organs are entitled to decide on legal matters which fall within the pure mandate of the Court. The Prosecutor could have resolved the controversy surrounding the Palestinian question still by being guided by the position of the international community towards Palestine at the time. He could have also compared the situation of Palestine to the similar situation of the Cook Islands, which was included in the 'all States' formula after having been admitted to the membership of the World Health Organization.[148] Alternatively, he could have shared the responsibility by way of seizing the judiciary through the various available procedural avenues discussed in this study.

[147] But see contra, A Wills, 'Old Crimes, New States and the Temporal Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 407, 428–30.

[148] See (n 114). Equally Palestine was admitted to the UNESCO.

The questions surrounding the second and third declarations are relatively less controversial, as they do not pose the same political problem. However, the question of who may bind his/her State is of no less importance. If not resolved from the outset, it could lead to political friction and uncertainties vis-à-vis other States. This is apparent, for example, in the context of Egypt, where a group of lawyers representing, inter alia, the Freedom of Justice Party claimed the right to bind the state by way of accepting the ad hoc jurisdiction of the Court over the events which followed the ousting from power of former President Mohamed Morsi.[149] The official Government actually exercising 'effective control' over the Egyptian territory denied the acceptance of jurisdiction of the Court.[150] The Prosecutor stood up to her responsibilities and resolved the legal controversy in-house. Had the Prosecutor refrained from resolving the legal dispute concerning who may lodge an Article 12(3) declaration, it would have certainly created a situation of uncertainty. It would have also led to negative legal and political implications.

It is not clear, however, whether the Prosecutor is going to respond to the second Palestinian declaration, if at all, given that thus far there is no press statement issued by the Prosecutor or the Registrar indicating that the Court is examining the said declaration.[151] In the absence of said information, it is difficult to predict whether and to what extent the Prosecutor will rule on questions related to the validity of the second declaration or the possibility of its withdrawal. This might be the case especially after the Palestinian Authority acceded to the Rome Statute and lodged its third declaration on 31 December 2014. Thus if questions concerning the scope, retroactivity, validity or possibility of withdrawal of a declaration were to be ever addressed, this is likely to take place in the course of proceedings related to the third declaration.

If Palestine has decided to yield to the political pressure exerted by greater powers and requested withdrawal, this does not mean per se that the Court will lack jurisdiction to consider allegations against Israel and Palestine. It only means that the Court will not be in a position to consider retroactively the events related to Operation Protective Edge as the Statute enters into force for Palestine as a result of its accession only on 1 April 2015.

The experience of Palestine before the Court as a whole should make us rethink of more productive ways to respond to potential future declarations lodged by entities with controversial status under international law.

[149] 'Communication seeking to accept the ICC's jurisdiction over Egypt is dismissed', ICC Press Release, 1 May 2014.

[150] Ibid. See, Pre-Trial Chamber II, "Decision on the 'Request for review of the Prosecutor's decision of 23 April 2014 not to open a Preliminary Examination concerning alleged crimes committed in the Arab Republic of Egypt, and the Registrar's Decision of 25 April 2014'", 12 September 2014, ICC-RoC46(3)-01/14-3; also for a request for leave to appeal and reconsideration of this decision, ICC-RoC46(3)-01/14-5.

[151] But see 'Report: Palestinian Authority preventing ICC from investigating Israel, Hamas for war crimes' (n 131).

9

Self-Referrals as an Indication of the Inability of States to Cope with Non-State Actors

*Harmen van der Wilt

9.1 Introduction

On 13 July 2012 Mali's Minister of Justice referred the situation in the Republic of Mali for further investigation to the prosecutor of the ICC, asserting that grave and massive violations of human rights and of international humanitarian law had been committed, especially in the northern parts of the territory. It was noted that Mali's domestic jurisdiction was not capable of prosecuting and judging the culprits.[1]

Mali's initiative is the fourth example of a somewhat curious phenomenon, dubbed as 'self-referrals', in which states invoke Article 14 of the Rome Statute of the ICC in order to refer the prosecution and trial of perpetrators of international crimes to the Court. Uganda's President Museveni initially set the trend in motion by referring the situation concerning the LRA to the ICC.[2] The DRC soon followed suit.[3] The CAR also took the opportunity to release itself from a highly complicated task, a task which exceeded its capacities.[4] It took the Prosecutor some time to decide whether he should comply with the latter request, but two years later he announced the opening of an investigation, which resulted in the arrest and subsequent surrender to the Court of Jean-Pierre Bemba.[5]

While the Prosecutor has welcomed the initiatives of African governments as a golden opportunity to engage in fruitful cooperation with willing authorities, the

* Professor of International Criminal Law University of Amsterdam. The author is much obliged to his Master students, Miss Inez Braber and Mr Ben Stanford, whose excellent theses inspired him to write this piece.

[1] République du Mali, Renvoi de la situation au Mali, No 0076/MJ-SG (13 July 2012) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/A245A47F-BFD1-45B6-891C-3BCB5B173F57/0/ReferralLetterMali130712.pdf> accessed 15 July 2013 ('Lettre de Renvoi de la situation au Mali').

[2] 'President of Uganda refers situation concerning the Lord's resistance Army to the ICC', ICC Press Release, 29 January 2004. The Prosecutor subsequently decided to open an investigation: 'Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court opens an investigation into Northern Uganda', ICC Press Release, 29 July 2004. For a seminal analysis of the conflict and the demarches of the Ugandan government, see M El Zeidy, 'The Ugandan Government Triggers the First Test of the Complementarity Principle: An Assessment of the First State's Party Referral to the ICC' (2005) 5 International Criminal Law Review 83.

[3] 'Prosecutor receives referral of the situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo', ICC Press Release, 19 April 2004, resulting in the first investigation: 'The Office of the International Criminal Court opens its first investigation', ICC Press Release, 23 June 2004.

[4] 'Prosecutor receives referral concerning Central African Republic', ICC Press Release, 7 January 2005.

[5] 'Prosecutor opens an investigation in the Central African Republic', ICC Press Release, 22 May 2007; Warrant of Arrest for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1, PTC III, ICC, 23 May 2008.

practice of 'self-referrals' has not been spared its share of sharp criticism.[6] Some authors hold that 'self-referrals' are a 'creative interpretation' of Article 14, because the drafters of the Rome Statute never seriously contemplated them.[7] Others have questioned the compatibility of self-referrals with the legal architecture of the Rome Statute, arguing that an auto-referral does not preclude the Court from addressing the admissibility of a case and pointing out that such referrals are not easy to reconcile with a state's positive obligations regarding the prosecution and trial of international crimes.[8] Such objections of a legal nature are often supplemented by grave concerns that the practice of self-referrals is conducive to political manipulation. Governments will try to entice the Court to focus its attention on their political foes, while themselves staying aloof of any international scrutiny.[9] In a refreshing rebuttal of the mainstream criticism, Darryl Robinson has taken stock of the arguments.[10] He carefully demonstrates that, contrary to most assertions, the referral of a situation by a state on whose territory international crimes were committed was anticipated and discussed during the drafting procedure. Robinson adds that, while the concern about 'selective externalization' is compelling, political manoeuvring by states is nothing new. Self-referrals may aggravate the risk of political manipulation, but this should only make the Court more vigilant in ensuring that it is not used as a tool to serve the interests of states.

I will not involve myself in all these sophisticated legal arguments, but rather aim to ponder the phenomenon of self-referrals against the backdrop of a confusing and rapidly changing world order, characterized by dwindling state authority. This chapter starts from the premise that self-referrals reflect convoluted situations in which state-sponsored groups and non-state actors contend for power and resources, usually to the detriment of the civilian population. In other words: they defy the state-centred paradigm of international criminal justice.[11] What all self-referrals have in common is [6] The first commentators on 'self-referrals' were rather mild in their judgments, but pointed at possible political repercussions, see C Kress, '"Self-Referrals" and "Waivers of Complementarity": Some Considerations in Law and Practice' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 944; and P Gaeta, 'Is the Practice of "Self-Referrals" a Sound Start for the ICC?' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 949.

[7] The most pronounced advocate of this point of view is W Schabas, 'Prosecutorial Discretion v. Judicial Activism at the International Criminal Court' (2009) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 751; W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 309. Similar objections have been voiced by M Arsanjani and M Reisman, 'Law-in-Action of the International Criminal Court' (2005) 99 American Journal of International Law 385, 389–90: '[B]efore and during the Rome negotiations, no one assumed that governments would want to invite the future court to investigate and prosecute crimes that occurred in their territory.' See also A Müller and I Stegmiller, 'Self-Referrals on Trial: From Panacea to Patient' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1267, 1269.

[8] See in particular J Kleffner, 'Auto-Referrals and the Complementary Nature of the ICC' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 41.

[9] Schabas argues that 'self-referral, far from being an expedient to provide a fledgling institution with some cases, is actually a trap. If a State refers a situation against itself, that is, against its rebels, it is doing so with a result in mind'; W Schabas, '"Complementarity in Practice": Some Uncomplimentary Thoughts' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 5, 22.

[10] D Robinson, 'The Controversy over Territorial State Referrals and Reflections on ICL Discourse' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 355.

[11] For a similar point of view, see P Akhavan, 'Self-Referrals before the International Criminal Court: Are States the Villains or the Victims of Atrocities?' (2010) 21 Criminal Law Forum 103.

that governments contend that they are unable to conduct fair and effective criminal proceedings against non-state actors over whom they do not wield control and that they therefore seek the assistance of the ICC. The main objective of this chapter is to investigate how the ICC has reacted to these claims of 'inability'. I will demonstrate that the ICC has largely side-stepped the issue by holding that a state's inactivity renders a situation admissible and precludes any assessment of its '(un)willingness' or '(in)ability'. Only recently—in a decision on Libya's challenge to the Court's jurisdiction, claiming that it was able to dispense criminal justice—the ICC shed more light on 'inability' and its parameters.

In my opinion, a thorough discussion of the concept of 'inability' is crucial because it may expose the embarrassing conclusion that international criminal justice is ill-equipped to cope with fragile states and powerful non-state actors. After all, if a state is considered 'unable', the next logical question is whether the ICC is likely to perform the function more successfully. We may have serious reasons to doubt this, not only because the ICC is highly dependent on the cooperation of states—the prospects thereof being dire in the case of failed states—but also in view of the fact that the ICC lacks the proper legal tools to prosecute and try non-state actors. In order to buttress this final point, I will show that the ICC has no jurisdiction over terrorism and has—outside the scope of armed conflict—very limited options for charging non-state actors who engage in heinous crimes. The disconcerting conclusion may well be that the odium of 'inability' applies not only to states.

This chapter is structured as follows. Section 9.2 starts by scrutinizing past self-referrals in order to discern what motivated the states in question to seize the Court. Section 9.3 investigates the reaction of the ICC to claims by the referring states that they were incapable of enforcing criminal law in respect of non-state adversaries. In section 9.4 the focus shifts to the ICC's possibilities to offer relief. I will demonstrate that terrorism is outside the jurisdictional scope of the ICC, leaving the Court virtually powerless to address international crimes committed by non-state actors, beyond the realm of armed conflict. In section 9.5 I will reflect on the state-centred focus of international criminal justice, which explains the scepticism towards self-referrals and which may be in need of amendment in view of the proliferation of non-state actors, many of whom are responsible for international crimes. Section 9.6 concludes the chapter by noting some final observations.

9.2 Self-Referrals: Genuine 'Inability' or Insidious Attempt to Frame One's Enemies?

When studying the language of self-referrals, one observes that they all share an air of helplessness. In view of protracted civil strife or other political and social tensions, the official authorities claim that they are not able to take legal action against perpetrators of international crimes.[12] In its letter of jurisdiction, the government of Uganda

[12] See Müller and Stegmiller (n 7) 1280, who correctly criticized the ICC's practice of issuing only press releases in which the original declarations are paraphrased, hampering a more thorough comparison of the texts. The authors suggest that the Court put the full texts on the website. Apparently, the ICC has avowed that it 'had been unable to arrest . . . persons who may bear the greatest responsibility for the crimes within the referred situation', adding that 'the ICC is the most appropriate and effective forum for the investigation and prosecution of those bearing the greatest responsibility'; and that the government of Uganda 'has not conducted and does not intend to conduct national proceedings in relation to the persons most responsible'.[13]

Even more explicit and general in the acknowledgement of its own limited capacity to engage in criminal law enforcement, the DRC admitted in its letter of referral that 'les autorités compétentes ne sont malheureusement pas en mesure de mener des enquêtes sur les crimes mentionnés ci-dessus ni d'engager les poursuites nécessaires sans la participation de la Cour Pénale Internationale'.[14]

In a similar exhibition of modesty the Cour de Cassation of the CAR expressed its opinion that, 'the national justice system was unable to carry out the complex proceedings necessary to investigate and prosecute the alleged crimes'.[15]

Finally, Mali's government echoed its colleagues by proclaiming the honour of deferring the gravest crimes to the OTP 'dans la mesure où les juridictions maliennes sont dans l'impossibilité de poursuivre ou juger les auteurs'.[16]

These claims of inability need not surprise us, as they often, at least partially, reflect reality and are facilitated by the admissibility regime itself, as will be demonstrated in the next section. What is perhaps slightly more puzzling is that two governments have attempted to reconcile this humble attitude with efforts to steer the attention of the ICC's prosecutor exclusively in the direction of crimes committed by rebel enemies. In the case of Uganda, President Museveni clarified that a key issue of the investigation should be 'locating and arresting the [LRA] leadership', adding that he intended to exclude the leadership of the LRA from a proposed amnesty, in order to ensure that those bearing the greatest responsibility for the crimes committed in northern Uganda were brought to justice. No mention was made of any crimes committed by the official Ugandan People's Defence Forces (UPDF).[17] Mali's Minister of Justice was perhaps less explicit, but nonetheless clear, when he addressed the letter of self-referral to the OTP, stating that:

> Il s'agit de violations graves et massives des droits de l'Homme et du Droit International Humanitaire commisses notamment dans la partie Nord du territoire: les executions sommaires des soldats de l'armée malienne, les viols des femmes et jeunes filles, les massacres des populations civiles, l'enrôlement d'enfants soldats, les tortures, les pillages generalises des biens appartenant aussi bien à l' Etat qu'aux particuliers, les disparitions forces, la destruction des Symboles de l'Etat, des Edifices, des Hôpitaux, des taken this advice to heart—see, for example, the availability of Mali's original letter on the website of the ICC.

[13] Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony Issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC II, 27 September 2005, para. 37.

[14] Lettre de M. Joseph Kabila, ICC-01/04-01/06-39-AnxB1, 3 March 2004, reclassified as public pursuant to Decision ICC-01/04-01/06-46.

[15] ICC Press Release 7 January 2005 (n 4).

[16] Lettre de Renvoi de la situation au Mali (n 1).

[17] ICC Press Release 29 January 2004 (n 2).

> Tribunaux , des Mairies, des Ecoles, du Siège d'ONG et d'Organisme Internationaux d'aide, la Destruction des Eglises, des Mausolées et des Mosquées.[18]

The emphasized parts suggest that the enemy had targeted assets of the state including human resources, property, and state symbols, yet the letter is silent on any atrocities that may have been committed by the governmental forces.

How did the ICC prosecutor react to these one-sided accusations? In the case of Uganda, Prosecutor Ocampo had made it clear to President Museveni that the ICC would interpret the referral as concerning all crimes under the Rome Statute committed in northern Uganda, obviously alluding to the possibility that atrocities committed by government forces would be investigated too.[19] However, Ocampo has been criticized for not living up to this firm position, as indictments were only issued against members of the rebel LRA.[20] The prosecutor tried to counter the criticism by invoking the gravity principle, noting that:

> The criteria for selection of the first case was gravity. We analysed the gravity of all crimes in Northern Uganda committed by the LRA and Ugandan forces. Crimes committed by the LRA were much more numerous and of much higher gravity than alleged crimes committed by the UPDF. We therefore started with an investigation of the LRA.[21]

In spite of promises made by President Museveni, to date none of the representatives of the official authorities has been brought to justice.

While such demarches may be expected, they give cause for great concern, as self-referrals are not only a formal triggering mechanism, but may also serve as an important source of information. Any attempt to influence the prosecutorial policy should bolster the OTP in its resolve to maintain its independence and seek information from all sources. Although political realities will undoubtedly determine the degree to which the prosecutor will be under the sway of states, his or her independence towards the state making a self-referral can at least be buttressed by legal arguments. A self-referral entails a transfer of criminal proceedings and marks a significant change in the sovereign authority of a state to define its legal position vis-à-vis power contenders. As long as a sitting government is 'in charge' of criminal law enforcement, it has the legitimate power to disqualify any violent challenge of its authority as 'criminal' or an act of 'terrorism'. Of course, states that are committed to the rule of law will investigate and, if necessary, prosecute violations of human rights committed by their own agents. Nonetheless, they have an advantage over any contender that challenges their position by violent means. By referring a situation to the ICC, governments forfeit, at least partially, this definitional advantage over their adversaries.

[18] Lettre de Renvoi de la situation au Mali (n 1) (emphasis added).

[19] Decision to Convene a Status Conference on the Investigation in the Situation in Uganda in Relation to the Application of Art 53, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-68, PTC II, ICC, 2 December 2005.

[20] See, for instance, Amnesty International, 'Uganda: First Ever Arrest Warrants by International Criminal Court—a First Step towards Addressing Impunity' (14 October 2005).

[21] 'Statement by the Chief Prosecutor on the Uganda Arrest Warrants', ICC Press Release, 14 October 2005, 2.3.

States that refer a situation to the Court and acknowledge that they are not capable of dealing with the conflict themselves, yet insist that they should have a say in the choice of accused, try to have their cake and eat it too.[22] They attempt to occupy the moral high ground, whereas the very act of surrendering their adjudicative prerogatives suggests that they have left that lofty place. A strong awareness of this inconsistency will assist the Court in asserting its independence towards the state of referral and remind the Court that it is expected to judge the criminal nature of the conduct, irrespective of the status of the perpetrator. In short, while I share the concern of those who consider self-referrals as a potential instrument to steer the policy of the OTP, it is rather easy to reject any claim by 'self-referring' states that they have a voice in the selection of cases. Arguably more difficult is the assessment of the plea of 'inability'. Section 9.3 will consider this issue.

9.3 Puzzled Trial Chambers Struggling with the Concepts of 'Inactivity' and 'Inability'

The arguments advanced by states that have engaged in self-referrals allude to the second prong of the complementarity principle which renders priority to domestic jurisdictions and only allows the ICC to intervene when the former prove to be 'unwilling' or 'unable' to genuinely carry out investigations or prosecutions (see Preamble, Article 1, in conjunction with Article 17 Rome Statute). In an attempt to further define 'inability', Article 17, section 3 of the Rome Statute requires the Court to consider 'whether, due to a total or substantial collapse or unavailability of its national system, the state is unable to obtain the accused or the necessary evidence and testimony or otherwise unable to start proceedings'.

The threshold is rather high, as the provision requires the legal and factual incapacities to be caused by the demise of the legal and political infrastructure. Apparently, the definition does not cover incidental failures to obtain custody over the suspect or evidence. Moreover, the replacement of the initial adjective 'partial' with 'substantial' [collapse] made the criteria more rigid.[23]

In the Lubanga case, Pre-Trial Chamber I addressed the admissibility of the case which the DRC submitted to the Court.[24] Referring to the letter of the DRC's President, Pre-Trial Chamber I confirmed Congo's negative assessment of its own capabilities, opining that:

[22] In this respect an interesting article of Mohamed El Zeidy deserves to be mentioned. El Zeidy carefully investigates whether State Parties are allowed to withdraw previously made referrals and concludes that they have no control over the termination of the proceedings before the ICC. This conclusion suggests a partial surrender of sovereignty in the realm of criminal law enforcement. M El Zeidy, 'The Legitimacy of withdrawing State Party Referrals and ad hoc Declarations under the Statute of the International Criminal Court' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 55.

[23] On this issue and its background, see M El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law: Origin, Development and Practice (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2008) 224–6.

[24] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Art 58, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-520-Anx2, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006.

> In the Chamber's view…it appears that the DRC was indeed unable to undertake the investigation and prosecution of the crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court committed in the situation in the territory of DRC since 1 July 2002. In the Chamber's view, this is why the self-referral of the DRC appears consistent with the ultimate purpose of the complementarity regime, according to which the court by no means replaces national criminal jurisdictions, but it is complementary to them.[25]

The Pre-Trial Chamber seems to deduce the admissibility of the case directly from the fact that the DRC had proved to be unable to start criminal proceedings against Mr Lubanga. However, the Chamber observed some progress, finding that:

> [T]he DRC national judicial system has undergone certain changes, particularly in the region of Ituri where a Tribunal de Grande Instance has been re-opened in Bunia. This has resulted inter alia in the issuance of two warrants of arrest by the competent DRC authorities for Thomas Lubanga Dyilo in March 2005 for several crimes, some possibly within the jurisdiction of the Court, committed in connection with military attacks from May 2003 onwards and during the so-called Ndoki incident in February 2005. Moreover as a result of the DRC proceedings against Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, he has been held in the Centre Pénitentiaire et de Reéducation de Kinshasa since 19 March 2005. Therefore, in the Chamber's view, the Prosecution's general statement that the DRC national judicial system continues to be unable in the sense of article 17(1) (a) to (c) and (3) of the Statute does not wholly correspond to the reality any longer.[26]

It appears that these improvements did not prompt the Court to change its mind and leave the prosecution and trial of Mr Lubanga to the authorities of the DRC. The Chamber applied a rigid test, and considered whether the national proceedings encompassed the conduct that constituted the basis for the ICC prosecutor's charges, to wit the conscription, enlistment, and use of child soldiers. Denying that this was the case, the Chamber concluded that the DRC had remained 'inactive' in respect of the specific case before the Court, adding that, 'in the absence of any acting State, the Chamber need not make any analysis of unwillingness or inability'.[27] This final sentence is slightly spurious, as shortly beforehand, the Chamber concurred with the DRC that the latter was unable to pursue criminal proceedings.

The decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga has been censured for conflating 'inactivity' and 'inability'.[28] This is on the basis that the assessment of 'unwillingness' and 'inability' presupposes activities that can sustain such a judgment. As long as a state does not move at all, issues of admissibility do not arise. This is borne out by a literal interpretation of the text of Article 17 of the Rome Statute that requires a current investigation or prosecution, an investigation that has ended in a decision to drop the case or a previous trial of the person for conduct which is the subject of the complaint. In other words, the Pre-Trial Chamber correctly held that a case is by definition admissible if a state does nothing at all, but that opinion is difficult to reconcile with its earlier finding that 'inactivity' connotes 'inability'.

[25] Ibid., para. 35. [26] Ibid., para. 36. [27] Ibid., para. 40.
[28] Cf. El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity (n 23) 228–32.

In the Katanga case, the Appeals Chamber corrected the inconsistencies which surfaced in Lubanga.[29] The Trial Chamber had introduced, perhaps somewhat artificially, a second form of unwillingness which came to the fore in the aim to see the persons brought to justice, but not before national courts. It is possible that the Pre-Trial Chamber harboured the conviction that the complementarity principle should be literally interpreted, entailing an obligation for domestic jurisdictions to investigate and prosecute and that each and every default on this obligation would automatically imply unwillingness. The Appeals Chamber managed to circumvent the question of whether the Pre-Trial Chamber's interpretation of 'unwillingness' was correct or not. The Appeals Chamber concurred with the prosecutor's submission, holding that 'the question of unwillingness or inability of a State having jurisdiction over the case becomes relevant only where, due to ongoing or past investigations or prosecutions in that State, the case appears to be inadmissible'.[30] The Chamber drew the logical conclusion that inaction of the state rendered an inquiry into these difficult and sensitive issues redundant, concluding:

> Therefore, in considering whether a case is inadmissible under article 17 (1) (a) and (b) of the Statute, the initial questions to ask are (1) whether there are ongoing investigations or prosecutions, or (2) whether there have been investigations in the past, and the State having jurisdiction has decided not to prosecute the person concerned. It is only when the answers to these questions are in the affirmative that one has to look to the second halves of sub-paragraph (a) and (b) and to examine the question of unwillingness and inability. To do otherwise would be to put the cart before the horse. It follows that in case of inaction, the question of unwillingness or inability does not arise; inaction on the part of a State having jurisdiction … renders a case admissible before the Court, subject to article 17 (1) (d) of the Statute.[31]

The Appeals Chamber fully subscribed to the opinion of scholars evidenced by an acknowledgement in a footnote of the judgment. Meanwhile, the Appeals Chamber sanctioned the practice of self-referrals, thereby indirectly distancing itself from the opinion of the Trial Chamber, indicating that:

> [T]here may be merit in the argument that the sovereign decision of a State to relinquish jurisdiction in favour of the Court may well be seen as complying with the 'duty to exercise its criminal jurisdiction', as envisaged in the sixth paragraph of the Preamble.[32]

The approach of the Appeals Chamber in Katanga has the obvious merit that it is consistent with the object and purpose of the Rome Statute.[33] But the drawback of this interpretation is that it pre-empts a serious scrutiny of any claims of 'inability'. If a state proposes to refer the situation to the ICC and remains inactive, the Court can suffice

[29] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497, AC, ICC, 25 September 2009.

[30] Ibid., para. 75. [31] Ibid., para. 78. [32] Ibid., para. 85.

[33] For an exhaustive analysis of the two-pronged admissibility test, see D Robinson, 'The Mysterious Mysteriousness of Complementarity' (2010) 21 Criminal Law Forum 67.

to accept the offer, without having to inquire whether the state has good reasons to outsource its primary obligation. Perhaps this was at the back of the Trial Chamber's mind when it decided to dedicate an obiter dictum to the issues of 'unwillingness' and 'inability' in the Bemba case.[34] As briefly mentioned previously, the Cour de Cassation itself indicated that the prosecution and trial of Mr Bemba would exceed the powers and resources of the CAR. Defence counsel challenged this 'inability', suggesting that the self-referral was inspired by political motives. After the Trial Chamber had concluded that the courts had dismissed the charges, without deciding 'not to prosecute Mr Bemba', it reiterated the findings of the Appeals Chamber in Katanga that it was not required to examine unwillingness and inability.[35] Nonetheless and 'for the sake of completeness', the Trial Chamber added some considerations on both the concepts of 'unwillingness' and 'inability'. In respect of 'inability', the Chamber first emphasized that, while the opinions of the judges of national courts might be of relevance, it was the state's (unwillingness or) inability that counted. The Trial Chamber noted the continued operations of the rebel faction Mouvement de libération du Congo and the consequent instability of the region as factors affecting the quality of the judicial system. It observed that the complex case would inevitably last for several months and would require extensive protective measures for witnesses which would be extremely difficult or impossible for the CAR authorities to implement. In view of all these considerations, the Trial Chamber concluded that:

> Given the relative complexity and extent of the prosecution case against the accused for crimes alleged committed in 2002–2003, the Chamber accepts that the prosecuting authorities and the national courts in the CAR would be unable to handle the case against this accused nationally.[36]

It is remarkable that the Trial Chamber in Bemba concentrates its inquiry of the CAR's ability to genuinely prosecute perpetrators of international crimes on the question of whether it has the powers to do so in the specific case, rather than engaging in a more general assessment of the quality of the legal system. That seems a sensible way to proceed. After all, the pertinent issue is whether the state has the capacity to accomplish the particular trial in question.

In the Al-Senussi case the Pre-Trial Camber followed a similar approach.[37] It emphasized that its analysis was limited to the determination of whether Libya genuinely was unwilling or unable to carry out proceedings against Mr Al-Senussi for the case that was before the Court, adding that its performance had to be assessed in the light of the relevant law and proceedings applicable to domestic proceedings in Libya.[38] In other words, the criminal law system served as a normative framework, indicating both the limitations and possibilities of the proceedings against Mr Al-Senussi. Defence counsel pointed at the precarious security situation in Libya, including the [34] Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, TC III, ICC, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, 24 June 2010.

[35] Ibid., para. 243. [36] Ibid., para. 246.
[37] Decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, PTC I, ICC, 11 October 2013.
[38] Ibid., paras 202–3.

authorities' defective control over detention facilities and the state's incapacity to provide sufficient protection for witnesses and victims involved in the case against Mr Al-Senussi. Moreover, the Defence asserted that a local lawyer capable of representing Mr Al-Senussi in the domestic proceedings was yet to be appointed.[39]

In addressing the issue of security concerns and whether the deficiencies of the legal system prejudiced the proceedings against Mr Al-Senussi, the Pre-Trial Chamber took a very practical approach. It observed that the fact that Mr Al-Senussi was already in custody of the Libyan authorities indicated that these problems seemingly had not affected the ability to obtain the accused.[40] Further, the Pre-Trial Chamber found that while the gathering of evidence might suffer from absence of effective protection programmes for witnesses and a lack of control over detention facilities, barring access to potential witnesses, these issues were not relevant in the case at hand. The Chamber held that:

> [A]t least some of the evidence and testimony that (sic) necessary to carry out the proceedings against Mr Al Senussi…has therefore already been collected, and there is no indication that collection of evidence and testimony has ceased or will cease because of unaddressed security concerns for witnesses against Mr Al-Senussi or due to the absence of governmental control over certain detention facilities.[41]

In response to the Defence claim that Al-Senussi would lack legal representation, the Chamber observed that this would potentially become a fatal obstacle to the progress of the case, but contrasted Al-Senussi's situation to the one facing Mr Gaddafi. In the latter case, Mr Gaddafi was not under the control of the Libyan authorities and attempts to secure legal representation had repeatedly failed, whereas Mr Al-Senussi was imprisoned in Tripoli, local lawyers of his tribe had indicated their willingness to represent him, and the delay in their appointment was caused by security problems which could be overcome.[42] In conclusion, the Pre-Trial Chamber did not find Libya 'unable' to prosecute the crimes, as there was not a total or substantial collapse or unavailability of the national system.

A consideration of the case law indicates that gradually the parameters of 'inability' are taking shape. Whereas the decision of the Appeals Chamber in Katanga appeared to cut off any further discussion on 'unwillingness' and 'inability' in the context of self-referrals, the Trial Chamber in Bemba detected some space to pay attention to these issues. Moreover, a further elucidation could be expected where Trial Chambers are required to assess the reverse situation, to wit, states positively asserting their right and power to conduct national proceedings and challenging the admissibility of the situation before the ICC, as was demonstrated in the Al-Senussi case. Two aspects in these recent developments are worth emphasizing. First of all, Trial Chambers tend to focus their attention on the capacity of the national state to proceed with the particular case under scrutiny rather than satisfying themselves through a global assessment of the political and legal infrastructure. This approach works both ways. On the one hand, the formal availability of an 'at first sight' functioning court and police system does not imply that a state has the real power and resources to accomplish proceedings against a mighty adversary who is suspected of international crimes, as was the situation in the Bemba case. On the other hand, the security problems and lack of control faced by a state in transition after civil armed conflict will not trigger the verdict of 'inability' if they are of a temporal nature and do not affect the state's capacity to obtain essential evidence and custody over the accused. Second, Trial Chambers show some understanding and sensitivity for the predicament of 'fragile' states recovering from civil strife, when they pay attention to unstable security situations and insufficient territorial control as indicators of 'inability'. These factors may in particular hamper any efforts of criminal law enforcement against non-state actors challenging the state's power monopoly. Whether the ICC is capable of assisting states to overcome such precarious situations is the topic of the next section.

[39] Ibid., para. 230. [40] Ibid., para. 294. [41] Ibid., para. 298.
[42] Ibid., paras 307–8 referring to Decision on the admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-344-Red, PTC I, ICC, 31 May 2013, para. 213.

9.4 The ICC and Non-State 'Terrorists'

If a case is held admissible, either as a consequence of the state's inaction or after the ICC's finding that the state is unwilling or unable, the Court must then decide whether it will pursue the criminal proceedings itself.[43] In view of the fact that governments in particular encounter problems of law enforcement in respect of rebels, allegedly engaging in international crimes, the question arises whether the ICC has sufficient tools to prosecute and try non-state actors. As the proposed targets of ICC investigations have frequently been disqualified as terrorists,[44] it is necessary first to investigate whether the ICC has jurisdiction over this crime.

The political enemies of the African governments that have referred the situation to the ICC are subject to its jurisdiction if they have committed one of the core crimes—genocide, war crimes, or crimes against humanity. In the Statutes of both the ICTR (Article 4(d)) and the SCSL (Article 3(d)) 'acts of terrorism' explicitly feature as a war crime. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY has previously concluded that terrorization of the civilian population, committed during an armed conflict, has crystallized into a war crime under customary international law.[45] The Appeals Chamber confirmed the ruling of the Trial Chamber that terrorization of [43] It is important to emphasize that a state, by refraining from taking action, can never force the Court to exercise jurisdiction, as this decision belongs to the exclusive competence of the Court itself; compare Art 13 of the Rome Statute which provides that the Court may exercise its jurisdiction. See also Akhavan (n 11) 112.

[44] 'African Union urges the UN Security Council to Declare Joseph Kony's Lord's Resistance Army a Terrorist Organization', The New Times, 30 June 2012 <http://www.newtimes.co.rw/news/views/article_print.php?150398&a=5542&icon=Print> accessed 10 March 2014; D Leger, 'U.S. labels Mali rebel group a terrorist organization', USA Today, 21 March 2013 <http://www.usatoday.com/story/news/nation/2013/03/21/terror-group-mali/2005799> accessed 22 July 2013.

[45] Judgment, Galić, IT-98-29-A, AC, ICTY, 30 November 2006, paras 91–8 ('Galić Appeals Judgment'). The Trial Chamber, while recognizing that the ICTY had jurisdiction over terror as a war crime under Art 3 of its Statute, left the question of the customary international law nature of the crime of terror in abeyance, Judgment and Opinion, Galić, IT-98-29-T, TC I, ICTY, 5 December 2003, para. 138 ('Galić Trial Judgment').

the civilian population constituted a serious infringement of a rule of international humanitarian law, to wit Article 51(2) of the First Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions (Additional Protocol I) that prohibits 'acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population'.[46] The Trial Chamber clarified that the relevant provisions in the Additional Protocols purported to extend the protection of civilians from terror, as Article 33 of Geneva Convention IV had only a limited scope, protecting a subset of civilians in the hands of the Occupied Power.[47] Consequently, Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II address all persons—belligerents, civilians, and organized groups alike—and implore them to renounce terrorism in the territory of the party to a conflict.[48] Whether the violation of these essential rules of international humanitarian law also entailed criminal responsibility could, in the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, be inferred from 'state practice indicating an intention to criminalise the prohibition, including statements by government officials and international organisations, as well as punishment of violations by national courts and military tribunals'.[49] After a comprehensive analysis of these instruments and decisions, the Appeals Chamber concluded that customary international law indeed imposed individual criminal liability for violations of the prohibition of terror against the civilian population.

These findings of the ICTY, important as they may be, are of no avail for the assessment of the jurisdiction ratione materiae of the ICC, because Article 8 of the Rome Statute does not include terror as a war crime. Assaults by rebel-armed groups on civilians arguably could be classified as 'intentionally directing attacks against the civilian population as such or against individual civilians not taking direct part in hostilities', which qualifies as a war crime both in international armed conflicts (Article 8(2)(b)(i) of the Rome Statute) and in non-international armed conflicts (Article 8(2)(e)(i) of the Rome Statute). However, the conspicuous and aggravating mental element of special intent to intimidate the civilian population is lacking in these definitions. The closest offence to terrorism in the Rome Statute is the war crime of hostage-taking, which requires an intention 'to compel a State, an international organization, a natural or legal person or a group of persons to act or refrain from acting as an explicit or implicit condition for the safety or the release of such person or persons'.[50] This is [46] Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I) (adopted 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 3. Art 13(2) of Additional Protocol II reads exactly the same; Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II) (adopted 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 609.

[47] Galić Trial Judgment (n 45) para. 120.

[48] Compare also A Cassese, 'The Multifaceted Criminal Notion of Terrorism in International Law' (2006) 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice 944.

[49] Galić Appeals Judgment (n 45) para. 92.

[50] Art 8(2)(c)(iii) Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3(part II-B) 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties), as amended 31 May–11 June 2010 (Review Conference of the Rome Statute of the ICC, Kampala).

strongly reminiscent of one of the mens rea elements of terrorism as a crime under customary international law, as defined by the Special Tribunal for Lebanon.[51]

Beyond the realm of armed conflict the prospects of the ICC exercising jurisdiction over terrorism are even worse. The Special Tribunal for Lebanon has acknowledged that terrorism is a crime under customary international law, but the Tribunal explicitly excluded the application of that customary norm during armed conflict.[52] These findings create the rather peculiar situation of two separate regimes—one of the war crime of terror during armed conflict and one of terrorism in peacetime. Both are apparently crimes under customary international law, but none is subject to the jurisdiction of the ICC.[53] Indeed, during the conference preceding the drafting of the Rome Statute, terrorism in peacetime, as a separate crime under the jurisdiction of the ICC, was purposively left out.[54] The only possibility of the ICC seizing jurisdiction over an act(s) of terrorism would be if those acts were to qualify as a crime against humanity. In the wake of 9/11, several distinguished lawyers and politicians defended this position, pointing at the magnitude and extreme gravity of the attack.[55] However, this was obviously an exceptional case, in which the demanding requirements of the concept were met once only. In the Kenya Decision, a Pre-Trial Chamber of the ICC explored the limits of crimes against humanity, shedding in particular some light on the requirements of organizations that would be capable of committing crimes against humanity.[56] Rejecting the position that only state-like organizations might qualify, the majority advanced the capacity of groups to perform acts which infringe human rights as a point of reference. It was stated that considerations that would help the Court assess the issue included:

> i) whether the group is under a responsible command, or has an established hierarchy; ii) whether the group possesses, in fact, the means to carry out a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population; iii) whether the group exercises

[51] Compare the Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law: Terrorism, Conspiracy, Homicide, Perpetration, Cumulative Charging, Ayyash et al., STL-11-01/1, AC, STL, 16 February 2011, para. 85, in which the Appeals Chamber of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon advanced an authoritative definition of terrorism under customary international law. See also Art 1(1) Council Framework Decision 2002/475/JHA of 13 June 2002 on Combatting Terrorism [2002] OJ L164:

> Each member state shall take the necessary measures to ensure that the intentional acts referred to below in points (a) to (i), as defined as offences under national law, which given their nature or context, may seriously damage a country or an international organisation where committed with the aim of:
> – Seriously intimidating a population, or > – Unduly compelling a Government or international organisation to perform or abstain from performing any act; …

See also J Van den Vijver, 'Prosecuting Terrorism in International Tribunals' (2010) 24 Emory International Law Review 541.

[52] Decision on the Applicable Law, Ayyash et al. (n 51) paras 107–8.

[53] For a critical assessment of this 'under inclusive approach' of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon, see M Gillett and M Schuster, 'Fast-Track Justice: The Special Tribunal for Lebanon Defines Terrorism' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1011–14.

[54] For an excellent analysis of the negotiations, see Van den Vijver (n 51) 534–41.

[55] See A Cassese, 'Terrorism is Also Disrupting Some Crucial Legal Categories of International Law' (2001) 12 European Journal of International Law 993, 994–5.

[56] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010, paras 115–28.

control over part of the territory of a State; iv) whether the group has criminal activities against the civilian population as a primary purpose; v) whether the group articulates, explicitly or implicitly, an intention to attack a civilian population; vi) whether the group is part of a larger group, which fulfils some or all of the aforementioned criteria.[57]

This somewhat more lenient interpretation of one of the crucial elements of crimes against humanity opens the door for broadening the scope of jurisdiction in respect of rebel-armed groups which engage in terrorist offences. However, in view of the other requirements of the element of 'organization' and the prerequisite that the attack should be 'widespread or systematic', virtually excluding an incidental and improvised terrorist assault, the threshold is still rather high. Moreover, the decision has been sharply censured for its departure from customary international law.[58]

9.5 Self-Referrals and the State-Centred Paradigm of International Criminal Justice

The previous section has demonstrated that the denunciation of rebel groups as 'terrorists' does not assist the ICC in its endeavours to dispense fair and effective justice over non-state actors. On the contrary, it serves to highlight the fact that the ICC does not have jurisdiction over terrorism in armed conflict or in peacetime.

This jurisdictional gap is symptomatic of a wider and more profound problem—namely, that the ICC is notoriously inapt to prosecute and try non-state actors. In case of armed conflict, which is traditionally governed by the international humanitarian law regime of reciprocal rights and obligations of the belligerents, the Court has sufficient means at its disposal to administer justice in respect of all parties to the conflict. However, the determination of the existence of an armed conflict as a condition for the application of international humanitarian law requires findings of violence of considerable duration and intensity.[59] Moreover, the Trial Chamber of the ICTY in Čelebići has explicitly sought to distinguish an armed conflict from cases of civil unrest or terrorist activities, emphasizing 'the protracted extent of the armed violence and the extent of organisation of the parties involved' as key considerations.[60] Beyond the pale of armed conflict, the ICC has virtually no powers to move against non-state perpetrators of international crimes.

[57] Ibid., para. 93.

[58] See Dissenting Opinion of Judge Hans-Peter Kaul to Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya (n 56); C Kress, 'On the Outer Limits of Crimes against Humanity: The Concept of Organization within the Policy Requirement: Some Reflections on the March 2010 ICC Kenya Decision' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 855.

[59] Compare Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, AC, ICTY, 2 October 1995, para. 70: 'An armed conflict exists whenever there is a resort to armed forces between States or protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a State.'

[60] Judgment, Delalić, IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 16 November 1998, para. 184.

Those scholars, like Schabas, who believe that international crimes are by definition committed by states, or that at least the ICC should focus exclusively on state-crimes, may find no difficulty with this predicament. They argue that the ICC owes its very existence to the fact that states forsake their primary duty to prosecute very serious crimes, precisely because they are involved in those crimes.[61] Schabas puts forward the extreme view that the ICC should not bother with 'non-state actors' and terrorism. He points out that, 'international atrocities, and crimes against humanity in particular, were created so that such acts could be punished elsewhere, and therefore so that impunity could be addressed effectively'.[62] He then seeks to contrast the official crooks with their anti-poles:

> We do not, by and large, have the same problems of impunity with respect to 'non-state actors'. Most states are both willing and able to prosecute the terrorist groups, rebels, mafias, motorcycle gangs, and serial killers who operate within their own borders. At best, international law is mainly of assistance here in the area of mutual legal assistance. For example, there is little real utility in defining 'terrorism' as an international crime, because as a general rule the states where the crimes are committed are willing and able to prosecute.[63]

Schabas' suspicion of the 'self-referral' practice derives directly from this position. He postulates an antagonistic relationship between the Court and states under scrutiny, which is no doubt caused by the former's intention to reveal the latter's darkest secrets. And next he presents any change in this relationship as clear evidence of the state's attempts to conceal its own sins and turn the attention of the Court to the crimes of its adversary. The gist of Schabas' discourse is of course that this foul reversal was never contemplated by the drafters of the Rome Statute, stating that:

> Implicit in self-referral is the idea that the Court operates in a benign and cooperative relationship with States. Rather than focus on crimes of State, which was surely the vision when the Court was being established, it has turned its attention to rebel groups. Not only is such a Court not particularly threatening to States, they will call upon its services in pursuit of their own political agendas, as the Uganda situation indicates.[64]

Although not all writers subscribe to the logically coherent, albeit rather extreme conclusions of Schabas, the opinion that states are the principal villains and targets of international criminal justice is pretty pervasive.[65] I must admit that I have adhered

[61] W Schabas, Unimaginable Atrocities; Justice, Politics, and Rights at the War Crimes Tribunals (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011) 44: '[C]rime is internationalized primarily because of impunity before the national jurisdiction, that is, because national justice fail to prosecute. The reason why they fail is, as a general rule, because the government itself is complicit.'

[62] Ibid., 150. [63] Ibid., 150 (emphasis added).

[64] Schabas, 'Complementarity in Practice' (n 9) 33 (emphasis added).

[65] Compare M Bassiouni, Crimes Against Humanity in International Criminal Law 2nd revised edn (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 243–6; A Cassese, International Criminal Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 11: 'Strikingly, most of the offences that [international criminal law] proscribes and for the perpetration of which it endeavours to punish the individuals that allegedly committed them, are also regarded by international law as wrongful acts by states to the extent that they are large-scale and systematic: they are international delinquencies entailing the "aggravated responsibility" of the state on whose behalf the perpetrators may have acted. This holds true not only for to that point of view for a long time myself, but I increasingly tend to wonder whether this position is not obsolete. The commission of international crimes is no longer the prerogative of the state, if it ever was.[66] The future may witness scores of atrocities which cannot be attributed to repressive and strong states, but which are rather the effect of the withering away of weak states. On the African continent in particular, social tissues crumble and nation-states, confronted with insurmountable problems of overpopulation, disease, climate change, environmental degradation, soaring crime rates, and internecine warfare, fall apart.[67] The institutional voids are occupied by rebel groups, warlords, and other power contenders, competing for scarce resources and creating problems for the population along the way.

These are highly complex socio-political issues and it would be preposterous to suggest that the ICC could provide structural solutions. But it may not be too far-fetched to assume that the Court may assist governments in agony by initiating prosecutions in high-profile cases, for example, against members of Mali's Ansar al Dine. The pertinent question is whether the international community is prepared to take the claim of 'inability' seriously. It is my impression that this is yet to be done sufficiently. The harsh contention that self-referrals are contrary to the duty of the state to prosecute international crimes itself suggests that appeals to the Court's assistance are insincere and conceal darker motives. Nor am I particularly impressed by Schabas' rash conclusion that the ICC prosecutor's reliance on the confirmation of the CAR's Cour de cassation that the judicial system of the country is incapable of prosecution, proves that the courts are functional.[68] After all, the mere existence of a court system does not imply that the judicial authorities are—legally and practically—capable of coping with large-scale atrocities.

In my view, the choice between the options is rather clear. One may agree with Schabas that atrocities committed by non-state actors are none of the Court's business, as the ICC is historically and principally predestined to tackle states only. It would, in my view, imply an institutionalized bias and a callous disregard of current misery, but the choice is defensible in view of the ICC's limited resources and the consideration that structural violence should be remedied by other means. However, if one decides to take that road, it would be more realistic and straightforward to amend genocide and crimes against humanity, but also for systematic torture, large-scale terrorism and massive war crimes.' For a slightly different, arguably more nuanced view, see R Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure (New York: Cambridge University Press 2007) 5: '[T]he subject matter of international criminal law, as we use it, deals with the liability of individuals, irrespective of whether or not they are agents of a State.'

[66] For a similar point of view, see G Werle and B Burghardt, 'Do Crimes Against Humanity Require the Participation of a State or a "State-like" Organization?' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1167: 'Large-scale violence today is no longer perpetrated only by states or other territorially organized entities. Militias and paramilitary units, terrorist groups and criminal networks have also emerged as important actors in the international arena, along with political parties and private security firms. It has long been clear that this new array of non-state actors is challenging traditional state-centred international law.'

[67] Compare the disconcerting article by R Kaplan, 'The Coming Anarchy: How Scarcity, Crime, Overpopulation, Tribalism, and Disease Are Rapidly Destroying the Social Fabric of our Planet', The Atlantic Monthly, February 1994.

[68] Schabas, 'Complementarity in Practice' (n 9) 18.

the Rome Statute and abolish the 'inability'-prong of the admissibility test altogether. Alternatively, one might reason that the Court has an important part in ending the impunity of the perpetrators of the most serious crimes, irrespective of whether they are committed by state organs or non-state actors. But in that case one must be prepared to go the whole way. This choice entails a serious and careful assessment of a self-referral, including an investigation into the remaining powers of the state to proceed with the situation itself and a preliminary estimation of who bears the greatest responsibility, in view of prosecutorial priorities. Moreover, it presupposes that the Court has the tools to move against non-state actors. It has been one of the objectives of this chapter to prove that these tools are defective—at least outside the scope of armed conflicts.

9.6 Some Final Reflections

This chapter has sought to discuss the practice of self-referrals against the background of fragile states who are confronted by powerful contenders and are subsequently enmeshed in protracted civil strife. I have argued that self-referrals should not be rejected forthwith, but should be taken seriously, as the call for help may be sincere and may reflect the waning of state power, incapable of reining in non-state actors that constitute new menaces to human rights. Of course the single self-referral does not relieve the ICC from its obligation to investigate the crimes committed by all parties to the conflict, but I consider this duty to be self-evident, because the self-referral itself entails a renunciation of the state's prerogative to monopolize the definition of criminal conduct. Nor do I suggest that governments are less guilty—they often share a significant portion of the blame for letting things get out of hand; I merely contend that self-referrals may indicate that non-state actors bear the greatest responsibility for the most serious crimes.

The insight that states no longer have the dubious privilege of being the only massive human rights violators is gradually gaining currency. As Akhavan has eloquently put it: 'An important aspect of "self-referrals" relates to the mutuality of interests between the Court and States Parties because of the unprecedented capacity of non-State actors to commit large-scale atrocities, combined with the manifest historical failure of inter-State human rights mechanisms', adding that 'In the contemporary world…an effective and realistic policy cannot disregard the unprecedented incidence of fragile or failed States besieged by powerful insurgencies of criminal organisations.'[69]

And the ICC has approved the practice of self-referrals, lending a sympathetic ear to the claims of states that they are unable to initiate criminal proceedings themselves, because they are simply no longer in 'full control'. However, the paradigm of the state as the major perpetrator of international crimes still prevails in legal scholarship. This probably accounts for the widespread suspicion against self-referrals, a theory that I attempted to illustrate earlier, but it has wider repercussions, because the state-centred paradigm permeates the Rome Statute as well. And that is in my view precisely the reason the ICC is ill-equipped to prosecute and try non-state actors.

[69] Akhavan (n 11) 104.

Political scientists appear to confirm that the representation of the state as sole perpetrator of international crimes is outdated. In his groundbreaking study The Better Angels of Our Nature, Steven Pinker advances the consolidation of the state, committed to the rule of law, as an important—and arguably one of the main—factor(s) in the reduction of violence.[70] This book offers a powerful challenge to the conventional wisdom that attributes endemic violence mainly to strong repressive states, an opinion that is fuelled by the twentieth century's experiences. Pinker draws attention to the upsurge of so-called anocracies, 'a form of rule that is neither fully democratic nor fully autocratic'.[71] These weak and unstable administrations try to survive by selling out 'patronage jobs to their clansmen, who then extort bribes for police protection, favourable verdicts in court, or access to the endless permits needed to get anything done'.[72]

These 'arrangements' breed violence, as Pinker observes, quoting, with approval, his colleague Mueller, who in The Remnants of War notes:

> that most armed conflict in the world today no longer consists of campaigns for territory by professional armies. It consists instead of plunder, intimidation, revenge, and rape by gangs of unemployable young men serving as warlords or local politicians, much like the dregs rounded up by medieval barons for their private wars.[73]

Such analyses are revealing and should be taken to heart, both by legal scholars and international criminal tribunals. They may prompt a different view on the practice of self-referrals and may invite a reconsideration of substantive parts of the Rome Statute. Any discussions on the extension of the Court's jurisdiction to the crime of terrorism are beyond the scope of this chapter, but the message is that these debates should continue if international criminal justice wishes to keep pace with political and social developments.

[70] S Pinker, The Better Angels of Our Nature: The Decline of Violence in History and Its Causes (New York: Viking Penguin 2011) especially chapters 2–7.

[71] Ibid., 310. [72] Ibid.

[73] See J Mueller, The Remnants of War (Ithaca: Cornell University Press 2004), who sketches the scene as follows: 'Many of these wars have been labelled "new war", "ethnic conflict", or, most grandly, "clashes of civilizations". But in fact, most, though not all, are more nearly opportunistic predation by packs, often remarkably small ones, of criminals, bandits, and thugs. They engage in armed conflict either as mercenaries hired by desperate governments or as independent or semi-independent warlords or brigand bands. The damage perpetrated by these entrepreneurs of violence, who commonly apply ethnic, nationalist, civilizational, or religious rhetoric, can be extensive, particularly to the citizens who are their chief prey, but it is scarcely differentiable from crime'; ibid., 1.

10

Admissibility Challenges before the ICC

From Quasi-Primacy to Qualified Deference?

*Carsten Stahn

> Magic mirror on the wall, who is the fairest one of all?
> You . . . are fair; it is true.
> But [someone else] is even fairer than you
>
> From: Grimm's Fairy Tale, The Story of Snow White and the Seven Dwarves
> (trsl. Margaret Hunt)

10.1 Introduction

The principle of complementarity[1] is one the cornerstones of the Rome Statute ('the Statute') of the ICC. Admissibility determinations under Article 19 of the Statute have been subject to extensive contestation in the ICC context.[2] Traditionally, they have been primarily viewed as instruments for the settlement of disputes over conflicts of jurisdiction. While open to states and defendants[3], they were largely conceived as a safeguard for the protection of domestic sovereignty interests. This formal vision stands in contrast to the broader systemic function of complementarity in the Rome system of justice[4] and the environment in which the Court has come to exercise

* Professor of International Criminal Justice, Leiden University; Programme Director, Grotius Centre for International Legal Studies (The Hague).

[1] See generally C Stahn and M El Zeidy (eds), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2011); S Nouwen, Complementarity in the Line of Fire: The Catalysing Effect of the International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2013).

[2] E.g. M Newton, 'The Complementarity Conundrum: Are We Watching Evolution or Evisceration?' (2010) 8 Santa Clara Journal of International Law 115; T Hansen, 'A Critical Review of the ICC's Recent Practice Concerning Admissibility Challenges and Complementarity' (2012) 13 Melbourne Journal of International Law 217–34; C Jalloh, 'Kenya v. the ICC Prosecutor' (2012) 53 Harvard International law Journal 227–43; F Mégret and M Samson, 'Holding the Line on Complementarity in Libya: The Case for Tolerating Flawed Domestic Trials' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 571–89; M C Pitts, 'Being Able to Prosecute Saif Al-Isalam Gaddafi: Applying Article 17 (3) of the Rome Statute to Libya' (2013) 27 Emory International Law Review 1291–339; A Bishop, 'Failure of Complementarity: The Future of the International Criminal Court Following the Libyan Admissibility Challenge' (2013) 22 Minnesota Journal of International Law 388.

[3] See Art 17(2).

[4] Paragraph 11 of the preamble of the Rome Statute contains a commitment 'to guarantee lasting respect for and the enforcement of international justice'. See generally C Stahn, 'Taking Complementarity Seriously: On the Sense and Sensibility of "Classical", "Positive" and "Negative" Complementarity' in Stahn and El Zeidy (eds) (n 1) 233–81. For a critique of 'burden-sharing, see P McAuliffe, 'From Watchdog to Workhorse: Explaining the Emergence of the ICC's Burden-Sharing Policy as an Example of Creeping Cosmopolitanism' (2014) 13 Chinese Journal of International Law 259–96.

jurisdiction. Much of the activity of the Court has focused on situations or countries that are engaged in conflict or post-conflict transitions. In this context, the very essence of sovereignty and the state itself is in flux. This has raised particular challenges for complementarity. In some instances, the Court has been viewed as a legitimate substitute of domestic jurisdiction (e.g. Katanga, Gbabgo). In other cases, it has been perceived as a competing forum (Libya), or even as an obstacle to domestic justice efforts (Kenya).[5]

The Appeals Chamber of the ICC has adopted a rather technical and cautious approach towards complementarity. It has interpreted admissibility as a 'two prong-test', based on the distinction between inaction and domestic action.[6] It has further developed an 'incident'-specific definition of the 'same conduct'/'same case' test which sets a high threshold for inadmissibility.[7] Through this jurisprudence, the Court has translated many of the complexities and underlying dilemmas of ICC engagement into formal questions of law and procedure. The interpretation of Article 17 has been a port of entry for admissibility challenges and clarification of core concepts, while the concept of 'interests of justice' under Article 53 has largely remained a dead letter in practice.[8] In the absence of alternatives, admissibility proceedings under Article 19 have become a channel to adjudicate different types of disputes: (i) disputes over the merits of ICC engagement with domestic consent (e.g. based on self-referrals), and (ii) state challenges to ICC intervention, grounded in transitional justice claims or more categorical objections to the exercise of ICC jurisdiction.

In particular, the methodology of admissibility assessments has come under criticism. It has become standard practice to assess the relevance of domestic action in admissibility proceedings, by virtue of a comparison of national measures with the 'case' before the ICC, at the time of the admissibility challenge. The Appeals Chamber introduced the image of the 'mirror' in order to explain its approach. It stated, [5] On Kenya, see C Sriram and S Brown, 'Kenya in the Shadow of the ICC: Complementarity, Gravity and Impact' (2012) 12 International Criminal Law Review 219–44.

[6] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07 OA 8, AC, ICC, 25 September 2009, para. 78 ('Katanga Appeals Judgment') ('[I]n considering whether a case is inadmissible under article 17 (1) (a) and (b) of the Statute, the initial questions to ask are (1) whether there are ongoing investigations or prosecutions, or (2) whether there have been investigations in the past, and the State having jurisdiction has decided not to prosecute the person concerned. It is only when the answers to these questions are in the affirmative that one has to look to the second halves of sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) and to examine the question of unwillingness and inability').

[7] Judgment on the appeal of Libya against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11 OA 4, AC, ICC, 21 May 2014, paras 71–3 ('Gaddafi Appeals Judgment'); Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October entitled 'Decision on the admissibility of the case against Addullah Al-Senussi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11 OA 6, AC, ICC, 24 July ('Al-Senussi Appeals Judgment'), para. 119.

[8] See OTP, 'Policy Paper on Interests of Justice', September 2007 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/library/organs/otp/ICC-OTP-InterestsOfJustice.pdf> accessed 3 October 2014; C Stahn, 'Judicial Review of Prosecutorial Discretion: 5 Years On' in C Stahn and G Sluiter, The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden/Boston: Brill 2009) 247–79.

> [W]hat is required is a judicial assessment of whether the case that the State is investigating sufficiently mirrors the one that the Prosecutor is investigating.[9]

This practice has been subject to challenge, from both states concerned and members of the Bench. In particular, Judge Uŝacka has continuously expressed concerns against an overly strict interpretation of the requirement of similarity between ICC proceedings and state action. She argued that > if this test is to be applied in order to compare a case before the Court with a domestic case, the Court will come to wrong and even absurd results, potentially undermining the principle of complementarity and threatening the integrity of the Court.[10]

Requiring states to 'copy' ICC practice is a 'double-edged' sword. It encourages short-term justice response at the domestic level, and is likely to create artificial outcomes that lack sustainability. This contribution argues that it is time to turn the 'mirror' around and to reflect critically about the effects of this practice, as suggested by the crux of Grimm's Snow White tale.

There is a discrepancy between the formal nature and constraints of admissibility procedures and the ongoing dynamics in situation countries. Complementarity is not static, but dynamic. In particular, the role of time and the space for 'parallel engagement' of the ICC and domestic jurisdictions has not received sufficient attention in the negotiations of the complementarity regime and existing jurisprudence.

This contribution seeks to re-think the status quo. It examines the existing legal framework and jurisprudence. It then investigates current dilemmas, in particular the required threshold for admissibility challenges, the accommodation of the 'time factor' in situations under scrutiny, and the role of the Court after a finding of inadmissibility. It argues that it is unhelpful to construe admissibility proceedings in an 'all-or nothing' fashion, i.e. as a binary and definitive choice of the proper forum of jurisdiction. It pleads for a more 'elastic' and 'sustainable' vision which allows for deference of cases, based on context-sensitive approaches and ongoing interaction between the Court and domestic jurisdictions.[11] It suggests giving greater attention to the concept of 'qualified deference', initially coined by Mark Drumbl in connection with the relationship between international criminal justice and transitional justice.[12] It proposes some practical ways to operationalize this concept in ICC admissibility practice in [9] Gadafi Appeals Judgment (n 7) para. 73; in the same vein Al-Senussi Appeals Judgment (n 7) para. 119.

[10] Gaddafi Appeals Judgment (n 7), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Uŝacka, para. 48.

[11] On the nexus between complementarity and development, see UNDP, 'Complementarity and Transitional Justice: Synthesis of Key Emerging Issues for Development', 16 November 2012 <http://www.undp.org/content/dam/undp/library/Democratic%20Governance/Access%20to%20Justice%20and%20Rule%20of%20Law/Discussion%20Paper%20%E2%80%93%20Complementarity%20and%20Transitional%20Justice%20%E2%80%93%202012%20_%20EN.pdf> accessed 3 October 2014.

[12] See M Drumbl, Atrocity, Punishment and International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007) 193–4; id., 'Policy through Complementarity: The Atrocity Trial as Justice' in Stahn and El Zeidy (n 1) 222–31, at 222 ('[t]he ICC should accord national accountability mechanisms, broadly categorized, qualified deference in situations of potential jurisdictional overlap and competition. The deference is qualified, and hence rebuttable, which means that the international criminal law institution could assume jurisdiction in certain circumstances').

order to mitigate existing tensions ('time management' of parallel proceedings, monitoring of deference, and 'conditional admissibility').

10.2 The Status Quo

Admissibility challenges have a particular status in ICC procedure. They are 'proceedings sui generis'.[13] They are formally part of the criminal process (i.e. pre-trial or trial), but involve aspects of inter-state litigation and systemic considerations relating to the objectives of the Court, including the appropriate balance between its role as a 'watchdog' and its function as 'gentle incentivizer' of domestic proceedings.[14] Article 19 challenges have been a testing ground for different conceptions of complementarity. Investigating and prosecuting international crimes is the 'overarching common goal of the Court and the States'.[15] The Court has adopted a strongly ICC-centric vision in its existing case law. It is still in the process of identifying a proper balance between its own role and authority as a judicial body, consensual burden-sharing, and deference to domestic jurisdiction. Core definitions, principles (e.g. burden of proof), and tests are emerging in decisions and becoming 'routine vocabulary' in case law. But many underlying problems remain unresolved or in need of further specification.

In the Katanga case, it has become evident that Defence challenges are likely to remain unsuccessful in cases of self-referrals, which are often based on a tacit agreement between the prosecution and the referring state on the forum of jurisdiction.[16] The Kenyan cases have triggered considerable debate on the 'same conduct' test,[17] and the question to what extent existing interpretations of Article 17 make it unreasonably difficult for states to meet the requirements of the complementarity test.[18] The ICC has been criticized for turning complementarity in effect into primacy of ICC jurisdiction,[19] in light of its approach towards Article 17 and its legalistic justification of ICC authority

[13] See Gaddafi Appeals Judgment (n 7), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Usacka, para. 61.

[14] On the multi-faceted nature of the ICC, see F Jessberger and J Geneuss, 'The Many Faces of the International Criminal Court' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1081–94.

[15] Gaddafi Appeals Judgment (n 7), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Uŝacka, para. 57.

[16] See G Bitti and M El Zeidy, 'The Katanga Trial Chamber Decision: Selected Issues' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 319, at 329.

[17] See generally R Rastan, 'What is a "Case" for the Purpose of the Rome Statute?' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 435; D Robinson, 'The Mysterious Mysteriousness of Complementarity' (2010) 21 Criminal Law Forum 67.

[18] See Judgment on the appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11 OA, AC, ICC, 30 August 2011 ('Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali Appeals Judgment'); Judgment on the appeal of the Republic of Kenya against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 30 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Article 19(2)(b) of the Statute', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11 OA, ICC, AC, 30 August 2011 ('Ruto, Kosgey and Sang Appeals Judgment').

[19] See the critique by K J Heller, 'A Sentence-Based Theory of Complementarity' (2012) 53 Harvard International Law Journal 202–49; W Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court 4th edn (2011) at 193 and Pitts (n 2) at 1339 ('an approach more akin to the concurrent jurisdiction that was granted to the ICTR and ICTY, rather than the complementary jurisdiction that the Rome Statute drafters intended'). On complementarity and primacy, see M El Zeidy, 'From Primacy to Complementarity and Backwards: (Re)-Visiting Rule 11 bis of the ad hoc Tribunals' (2008) 57 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 403–15.

and intervention. The Libyan cases have partially reversed this trend. The Appeals Chamber clarified, inter alia, that 'there is no requirement in the Statute for a crime to be prosecuted as an international crime domestically'.[20] This jurisprudence leaves some space to enable the exercise of domestic jurisdiction. It further distinguished circumstances relating to the Gaddafi and the Al-Senussi cases, and upheld the first successful admissibility challenge in the history of the ICC, namely the inadmissibility decision in the Al-Senussi case, dated 11 October 2013.[21] The Appeals Chamber specified that challenges relating to the fairness of proceedings and violation of due process rights of defendants in domestic proceedings do not per se constitute grounds for a finding of unwillingness.[22] But many ambiguities remain.

10.2.1 Article 19 challenges in review

Existing challenges under Article 19(2) can be divided into two major categories: challenges by defendants and challenges by states. Both categories of challenges were originally drafted from the perspective of an antagonistic vision of ICC jurisdiction and domestic jurisdiction. This is clear from the title and wording of Article 19. They are conceived as challenges 'to' the jurisdiction of the Court. Article 19(2)(a) speaks of 'challenges to the admissibility of a case'.[23] The inherent assumption was that defendants would challenge admissibility to protect themselves from the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICC. Similarly, it was assumed that states would use Article 19 to prioritize domestic jurisdiction over ICC action. This is reflected in Article 19(2)(b), which ties the ground of challenge to domestic investigations or prosecutions.[24]

This bipolar vision has become subject to closer scrutiny. In ICC practice, the defence has intervened on different grounds in admissibility proceedings. In some cases, defendants left it opaque whether they would prefer to be tried domestically. In other cases, they had a pronounced interest in being tried before the ICC, in light of standards of fairness in ICC procedure and potential lower sentencing (Gaddafi, Al-Senussi). The wording of the Statute remains vague in this respect. The drafters did not necessarily contemplate circumstances in which a defendant would have an interest in challenging the 'inadmissibility' of a case, following a successful state challenge.

Similarly, states have voiced conflicting priorities. While Kenya and Libya fall into the classical category of challenges that seek to uphold domestic jurisdiction, states such as the DRC, Côte d'Ivoire, or the CAR have failed to support defence challenges and argued in favour of the exercise of ICC jurisdiction. The fact that a state would support the exercise of ICC jurisdiction, or even encourage it through a voluntary decision to give priority to the ICC, does not fit into this traditional scheme.

[20] See Al-Senussi Appeals Judgment (n 7) para. 119.

[21] Decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11, PTC I, ICC, 11 October 2013 (Al-Senussi Admissibility Decision'); Al Senussi Appeals Judgment (n 7).

[22] Al-Senussi Appeals Judgment (n 7) paras 230 and 231.

[23] See Art 19(2)(a).

[24] See wording in Art 19 (2) (b) ('on the ground that it is investigating or prosecuting the case or has investigated or prosecuted').

Admissibility proceedings have brought out novel nuances in the interaction between the ICC and domestic jurisdiction. The Katanga case marked the first instance in which admissibility was challenged under Article 19. In its challenge, the defence argued that the ICC should defer to domestic jurisdiction since Katanga was subject to international crime allegations in the DRC, including a wider range of crimes (genocide, war crimes, crimes against humanity). The defence noted that 'the "same conduct" test as developed and applied by the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber' is a 'wrong test', since it 'amounts to primacy'[25] and 'could negatively impact on the purposeful design of the Statute—which was meant to encourage domestic proceedings'.[26] It proposed an alternative methodology, namely a 'comparative gravity-test', geared at 'comparing the gravity of the (intended) scope of investigations at the national level and the (intended) scope of investigations by the ICC Prosecutor'.[27] According to this test, the admissibility threshold would only be met if 'the scope of investigations by the ICC prosecutor would significantly exceed in gravity the scope of national investigations'.[28] The Appeals Chamber discarded this reasoning, based on the wording of Article 17, and confirmed the 'same conduct test'. It held that 'in case of inaction, the question of unwillingness or inability does not arise; inaction on the part of a State having jurisdiction (that is, the fact that a State is not investigating or prosecuting, or has not done so) renders a case admissible before the Court'.[29] It added that 'there may be merit in the argument that the sovereign decision of a state to relinquish its jurisdiction in favor of the Court may well be seen as complying with the "duty to exercise [its] criminal jurisdiction" as envisaged in the […] Preamble'.[30] This justification opened up a new conceptual space for burden-sharing and a potential 'sharing of labor' between the ICC and domestic jurisdictions, as suggested in the 2003 OTP expert paper on complementarity[31] and a 'positive' conception of complementarity.[32]

This conception was reaffirmed in other contexts. In Bemba, the Defence challenged admissibility on the ground that domestic authorities in the CAR had allegedly taken a decision not to prosecute Bemba, which would require deference to domestic jurisdiction. It argued that domestic decisions entailed findings on the merits of the case which would bar ICC admissibility, since the state had 'decided not to prosecute the person concerned' within the meaning of Article 17(l)(b) of the Statute.[33] The CAR

[25] Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case by the Defence of Germain Katanga, pursuant to Art 19 (2) (a) of the Statute, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07, 11 March 2009, para. 39.

[26] Ibid., para. 43. [27] Ibid., para. 46. [28] Ibid., para. 46.

[29] Katanga Appeals Judgment (n 6) paras 2, 75–8. [30] Ibid., para. 85.

[31] OTP, Informal Expert Paper, 'The Principle of Complementarity in Practice' (2003) paras 7–15 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/20BB4494-70F9-4698-8E30-907F631453ED/281984/complementarity.pdf> accessed 3 October 2014.

[32] On 'positive complementarity', see Stahn (n 4); W Burke White, 'Proactive Complementarity: The International Criminal Court and National Courts in the Rome System of International Justice' (2008) 49 Harvard International Law Journal 53–108; C Stahn, 'Complementarity: A Tale of Two Notions' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 87–113.

[33] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Trial Chamber III of 24 June 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08OA3, ICC, AC, 19 October 2010, para. 48 (Bemba Appeals Judgment)

authorities, which had referred the situation to the Court by way of a self-referral,[34] contested this allegation and 'clearly expressed' the 'wish to see Mr Bemba held accountable for the serious human rights violations committed on the territory of the CAR'.[35] The Appeals Chamber conceded that a Trial Chamber 'should accept prima facie the validity and effect of the decisions of domestic courts, unless presented with compelling evidence indicating otherwise' when it determines the status of domestic judicial proceedings.[36] But it rejected the appeal, noting that domestic proceedings did not amount 'to a decision not to prosecute within the meaning of article 17 (l) (b) of the Statute'.[37] It recalled that 'a "decision not to prosecute" in terms of article 17 (1) (b) of the Statute does not cover decisions of a State to close judicial proceedings against a suspect because of his or her surrender to the ICC'.[38]

In Laurent Gbabgo, the Defence invited the Chamber 'to interpret "conduct" in a flexible manner, focusing on the general conduct of the suspect in relation to the context in which the crimes were committed rather than the conduct related to the direct commission of the crimes'.[39] It argued that 'national proceedings for economic crimes constitute the same case as that under prosecution before the Court'.[40] It submitted that 'the short-sighted view of complementarity' adopted by the Court 'fails to take account of the wider goals of international criminal justice, in particular the need for national jurisdictions to build capacity to try such crimes domestically in order to involve the affected communities as part of the overall process of reconciliation and peace building'.[41] The state concerned (Côte d'Ivoire) backed ICC admissibility, in line with its encouragement of ICC action through its declaration of acceptance of jurisdiction under Article 12 (3). It stated 'that, in view of the initiation of proceedings before the Court against Mr Gbagbo, national authorities chose to refrain from opening an investigation into, or proceedings against Mr Gbagbo for violent crimes'.[42]

Thus, in all three cases, state authorities sided with the ICC, rather than the defence, since they had an interest in seeing the case being tried internationally. They refrained from challenging ICC action, since they had triggered ICC involvement by consent, i.e. a self-referral (DRC, CAR) or a declaration under Article 12(3) (Côte d'Ivoire).[43]

[34] On self-referrals, see C Kress, 'Self-Referrals and Waivers of Complementarity: Some Considerations in Law and Policy' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 944–8; P Gaeta, 'Is the Practice of 'Self-Referrals' a Sound Start for the ICC?' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 949–52; M El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (Leiden/Boston: Brill, 2008) 211–36; D Robinson, 'The Controversy over Territorial State Referrals and Reflections on ICL Discourse' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 355–84.

[35] Bemba Appeals Judgment (n 33) para. 57 ('there was no decision not to prosecute Mr Bemba in the CAR').

[36] Ibid., para. 66. [37] Ibid., para. 68.

[38] Ibid., para. 74, referring to Katanga Appeals Judgment (n 6) para. 83.

[39] Decision on the 'Requête relative à la recevabilité de l'affaire en vertu des Articles 19 et 17 du Statut', Laurent Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11, PTC I, ICC, 11 June 2013, para. 11.

[40] Ibid., para. 8. [41] Ibid., para. 12 [42] Ibid., para. 32.

[43] Note that Côte d'Ivoire challenged admissibility in relation to Simone Gbabgo. See Requête de la République de Côte d'Ivoire sur la recevabilité de l'affaire Le Procureur c. Simone Gbagbo, et demande de sursis à exécution en vertu des articles 17, 19 et 95 du Statut du Rome, Simone Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/12-11-Red, 30 September 2013.

The coin flipped in those situations in which the ICC engagement lacked consent of domestic authorities, i.e. in the context of Security Council referrals (Libya) or proprio motu action of the prosecutor against a defiant government (Kenya). Sudan could have challenged ICC action against leading suspects (e.g. Omar Al-Bashir, Ahmad Haroun), although it is not a State Party.[44] But it deliberately chose not to engage at all in a judicial manner with the ICC.[45] It therefore refrained from making a challenge under Article 19. The first official state challenge was brought by Kenya on 31 March 2011. Kenya sought to prioritize domestic justice options, following the issuance of summonses to appear for key Kenyan suspects in relation to the post-electoral violence.[46] The second challenge was made by Libya on 1 May 2012.[47] The Libyan government also preferred domestic justice for the trial of members of the former Gaddafi regime. The interests of the defence differed across the situations. While Kenyan defendants joined the 'government' line, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi opposed the government challenge and expressly requested surrender to the Court.[48] The Gaddafi defence supported ICC admissibility, arguing that '[j]ustice will not be served by domestic proceedings', since they are 'so ineliminably tainted by violations of domestic law that either the defendant would have to be released, or, the proceedings will go down in history as a manipulated spectacle of victor's revenge'. [49] The Al-Senussi defence appealed the 11 October 2013 inadmissibility decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber, arguing that the case that 'should be tried at the ICC in accordance with the principle of complementarity', since Libya is not able to 'carry out genuine proceedings or willing to bring Mr Al-Senussi to justice in an impartial and independent manner, having regard to the recognised standards of due process under international law'.[50] Defence motions were visibly driven by fairness concerns and fears relating to the application of the death penalty in Libyan proceedings.[51]

In its jurisprudence, the ICC set high bars for admissibility challenges under Article 19(2)(b). In its challenge, Kenya questioned whether the admissibility test requires that the same persons be investigated by the national jurisdiction. It argued that the ICC should exercise discretion in the application of the principle of complementarity

[44] Art 19 (2)(c).

[45] See Sudan Tribune, 'Sudan Rules Out Plans to Challenge ICC Jurisdiction over Darfur', 18 March 2007 <http://www.sudantribune.com/spip.php?article20845> accessed 3 October 2014.

[46] Application on behalf of the Government of The Republic of Kenya pursuant to Art 19 of the ICC Statute, Ruto, Kosgey, Sang, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-26, 31 March 2011.

[47] Application on behalf of the Government of Libya pursuant to Art 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-130, 1 May 2012.

[48] Defence Response on behalf of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi to 'Application on behalf of the Government of Libya relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-356, 14 June 2013, para. 11.

[49] Public Redacted Version of the 'Response to the Libyan Government's further submissions on issues related to admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-281-Red2, 18 February 2013, para. 11.

[50] See Prosecutor v Saif Al-Islam Gadaffi and Abdullah Al-Senussi, Document in Support of Appeal on behalf of Abdullah Al-Senussi against Pre-Trial Chamber I's 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi', ICC-01/11-01/11-474, 4 November 2013, para. 3.

[51] For a discussion, see C Stahn, 'Libya, the ICC and Complementarity: A Test for Shared Responsibility (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 325–51.

to allow proceedings to progress, since there is a presumption in favour of national jurisdictions. The Pre-Trial Chamber rejected the challenge within eight weeks. The Appeals Chamber upheld the decision. It grounded the 'same conduct' test in the Statute.[52] It noted that a 'case is only inadmissible before the Court if the same suspects are being investigated by Kenya for substantially the same conduct'.[53] It specified that a challenge under Article 19(2)(b) requires concrete investigative 'steps directed at ascertaining whether … suspects are responsible for that conduct, for instance by interviewing witnesses or suspects, collecting documentary evidence, or carrying out forensic analyses'.[54] The mere 'preparedness to take such steps' or 'the investigation of other suspects' would not be sufficient.[55]

This requirement is compatible with the wording of Article 19(2)(b) ('is investigating'), the structure of Article 17(1), and the nexus of Article 19 to the concept of the 'case'. It strengthens the authority of the ICC to assert or maintain jurisdiction in cases of parallel domestic efforts. But it has been criticized on several grounds. One objection relates to the threshold for domestic action, and the tension between the 'prong test' and the 'unwillingness'/'inability' limb of the complementarity test under Article 17(2) and (3). The existing test provides significant emphasis on inaction under Article 17(2). It blurs the boundaries to unwillingness or inability under Article 17(2) and (3) 'by requiring a state to prove e.g. the existence of a full-fledged investigation or prosecution of a case in order to establish that there is no situation of inactivity'.[56]

The second difficulty of the test is that it is based on an 'either/or' logic which makes it difficult to accommodate interaction between the Court and domestic jurisdictions or 'positive complementarity' approaches in the context of admissibility challenges. The Court formally separated the treatment of requests for ICC cooperation with domestic jurisdictions under Article 93(10) from admissibility challenges. It held that 'a determination on the inadmissibility of a case pursuant to article 17 of the Statute does not [necessarily] depend on granting or denying a request for assistance under article 93(10) of the Statute'.[57] It then formulated strict conditions for dealing with a request under Article93 (10), arguing that:

> the requesting State Party (Kenya) must have, at least, either conducted an investigation, or be doing so with respect to 'conduct which constitutes a crime within the [52] See Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali Appeals Judgment (n 18) paras 40, 41–3, 62; Ruto, Kosgey and Sang Appeals Judgment (n 18) para. 40. The same person/same conduct test may be derived from Arts 17(1)(c) and 20(3) which refer to 'the same conduct' in relation to the same person. The link between Art 17(1)(c) and the principle of ne bis in idem implies that a case must relate to the same person and the same conduct. A similar inference can be drawn from Art 90(1), which deals with the choice of forum allocation with respect to competing requests for extradition and surrender, and explicitly sets out the same person/same conduct test, relating it back to the tests for admissibility. Ruto, Kosgey and Sang Appeals Judgment (n 18), fn. 81.

[53] Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali Appeals Judgment (n 18) paras 40, 41, and 42.

[54] Ibid., para. 41. [55] Ibid.

[56] Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali Appeals Judgment (n 18), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita U§acka, ICC-01/09-01/11-336, 20 September 2011, para. 27.

[57] Decision on the Application by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Art 19(2)(b) of the Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation on Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-101, PTC II, ICC, 30 May 2011, para. 34 ('This conclusion finds support in the fact that a State may exercise its national jurisdiction by way of investigating or prosecuting, irrespective of and independent from any investigative activities of the Prosecutor').

> jurisdiction of the Court or which constitutes a serious crime under the national law of the requesting State'. This entails that the requesting State Party must show that it is at a minimum investigating or has already investigated one or more of the crimes referred to in article 5 and defined in articles 6–8 of the Statute. Alternatively, the State Party must demonstrate that it is either doing or has done so with respect to conduct constituting 'a serious crime under the national law'.[58]

As a result, a domestic state is unlikely to receive cooperation from the Court, unless it has started investigations relating to the 'same case'. Read in conjunction with the jurisprudence on the 'same conduct' test, this approach leaves limited space to take into account emerging justice efforts under domestic jurisdiction. As highlighted by Judge Usacka, this jurisprudence makes it difficult for states to start 'taking investigative steps or prosecuting a case' 'during admissibility proceedings', and virtually impossible for the Pre-Trial Chamber 'to adapt the admissibility proceedings to . . . changing circumstances'.[59] It might thus be under-inclusive in relation to its accommodation of interests of state in transition.[60] It provides, in particular, limited weight to the idea that 'the overall goal of the Statute to combat impunity can also be achieved by the Court through means of active cooperation with the domestic authorities'.[61]

In the Libyan cases, the ICC upheld these principles. Libya expanded on the arguments and challenges presented by the Kenyan government. It argued that the 'same conduct' test should be defined, 'taking into account that "the state is to be accorded a margin of appreciation as to the contours of the case to be investigated, and the ongoing exercise of the national authorities' prosecutorial discretion as to the focus and formulation of the case" '.[62] It submitted that 'a domestic prosecutor may legitimately hold genuine differences of opinion with the ICC prosecutor regarding the appropriate contours of a particular case and the overall interests of justice'.[63] It claimed that 'domestic authorities should not be unduly restrained in pursuing a national accountability agenda by being compelled to conduct an investigation and prosecution that mirrors precisely the factual substance of the investigation being conducted from time to time by the [OTP]'.[64] Libya argued that the notion of 'conduct' should be interpreted as referring to 'criminal transaction', implying that a case should be inadmissible where 'domestic proceedings relate to similar and/or related incidents

[58] Decision on the Request for Assistance Submitted on Behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Art 93(10) of the Statute and Rule 194 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09, PTC II, ICC, 29 June 2011, para. 33.

[59] Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali Appeals Judgment (n 18), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Usacka, para. 28.

[60] Gaddafi Appeals Judgment (n 7), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Usacka, para. 55. In the Kenyan proceedings, the Court failed to address the question as to whether the investigative functions of the Truth, Justice, and Reconciliation Commission would be a bar to admissibility.

[61] Ibid., para. 65 (adding that '[t]he Court, together with other international organisations and other States, is in an ideal position to actively assist domestic authorities in conducting such proceedings, be it by the sharing of materials and information collected or of knowledge and expertise').

[62] Al-Senussi Admissibility Decision (n 21) para. 33.

[63] Ibid., para. 33.

[64] Ibid., para. 33.

which arise out of substantially the same course of conduct as that being investigated by the Court'.[65]

The Pre-Trial Chamber rejected this line of reasoning. It held that

> [t]he principle of complementarity expresses a preference for national investigations and prosecutions but does not relieve a State, in general, from substantiating all requirements set forth by the law when seeking to successfully challenge the admissibility of a case.[66]

Drawing on previous jurisprudence, the Chamber set out a list of principles that may be said to form the core of existing ICC law on admissibility challenges:

i. a determination of admissibility is case-specific, the constituent elements of a case before the Court being the 'person' and the alleged 'conduct'; accordingly, for the Chamber to be satisfied that the domestic investigation covers the same 'case' as that before the Court, it must be demonstrated that: (a) the person subject to the domestic proceedings is the same person against whom the proceedings before the Court are being conducted; and (b) the conduct that is subject to the national investigation is substantially the same conduct that is alleged in the proceedings before the Court';
ii. the expression 'the case is being investigated' must be understood as requiring the taking of 'concrete and progressive investigative steps' to ascertain whether the person is responsible for the conduct alleged against him before the Court;
iii. the determination of what is 'substantially the same conduct as alleged in the proceedings before the Court' will vary according to the concrete facts and circumstances of the case and, therefore, requires a case-by-case analysis;
iv. the assessment of the subject matter of the domestic proceedings must focus on the alleged conduct and not on its legal characterisation;
v. a decision on the admissibility of the case must be based on the circumstances prevailing at the time of its issuance and 'for [a state] to discharge its burden of proof that currently there is not a situation of "inaction" at the national level, it needs to substantiate that an investigation is in progress at this moment';
vi. the state must provide the Court with evidence of a sufficient degree of specificity and probative value that demonstrates that it is indeed investigating the case;
vii. evidence 'is not only "evidence on the merits of the national case that may have been collected as part of the purported investigation to prove the alleged Crimes" but extends to "all material capable of proving that an investigation is ongoing", including, for example, "directions, orders and decisions issued by authorities in charge of the investigation as well as internal reports, updates, notifications or submissions contained in the file arising from the [domestic] investigation of the case" '.[67]

[65] Ibid., para. 35.
[66] Ibid., para. 27; see also Decision on the admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, PTC I, ICC, 31 May 2013, ICC-Ol/ll-Ol/ll-344-Red, para. 52.
[67] Al-Senussi Admissibility Decision (n 21) para. 66.

The Appeals Chamber upheld the existing matrix. It validated existing approaches, and, in particular, the idea that domestic action must 'mirror' ICC practice.[68]

10.2.2 Legal methodology in review

These principles reflect an inherent tension between ICC-centricity and contextualization. Through its reference to 'case-by-case' analysis in relation to 'same conduct', ICC jurisprudence seeks to take context into account in admissibility assessments. But the methodology adopted by the Court leaves de facto very little space for contextualization. States are judged across a set of uniform considerations that are based on a textual reading of the Statute. Both the timing and the necessity of action at the domestic level are predominantly driven by the investigative and prosecutorial choices of the ICC. This logic provides an incentive to reflect ICC standards in domestic action, which is in line with the idea of complementarity as a catalyst for compliance and the strengthening of accountability on a global scale.[69] But it poses challenges in relation to differentiation of conditions, and potential discrepancies between a Hague-driven and a domestic or local vision of justice.

The 'mirroring' test carries the risk that states implement international standards primarily to satisfy international audiences: the ICC, international donors, NGOs, etc.[70] This is likely to produce artificial results. If states strengthen domestic systems primarily for the sake of adjudicating specific cases domestically, reform efforts are geared towards ICC priorities rather than long-term domestic interests. This may ultimately run counter to the objective of the Rome Statute, which is to create a sustainable 'system of justice' with genuine domestic investigations and prosecutions.

A predominantly Hague-centred vision of complementarity also comes with certain potential 'costs'. It may 'undermine reasonable national efforts to prosecute by going against the logic of the burden-sharing goals of complementarity', or 'hinder the growth of effective national jurisdictions willing and able to prosecute the crimes, especially in Africa'.[71]

The current application of the admissibility regime of the ICC is not only an articulation of interpretive authority but also a manifestation of the exercise of 'productive power'.[72] Court action creates a social reality through its framing and choice of cases. Domestic states must adjust to this reality, and 'model' their own action after ICC proceedings, in order to be able to challenge admissibility successfully. Existing [68] See (n 9).

[69] See J K Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008) 318–31.

[70] On 'donor's justice', see S Kendall, 'Donor's Justice: Recasting International Criminal Accountability' (2011) 24 Leiden Journal of International Law 585.

[71] C Jalloh, 'International Decision: Situation in the Republic of Kenya: No. ICC-01/09-02/11-274-Judgment on Kenya's Appeal of Decision Denying Admissibility' (2012) 106 American Journal of International Law 118, at 120.

[72] According to Foucault, power produces reality and generates subjectivity. On Foucault and 'productive power' in international law see L M Hammer, 'A Foucauldian Approach to International Law; Descriptive Thoughts for Normative Issues (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2007) 20–1.

interpretations may be convincingly grounded in the law.[73] But they have some disturbing side effects. They foster a bifurcation between advanced and less developed states. States with a functioning and efficient legal system may be able to meet the threshold set by the ICC. Less developed states, or states with a temporary dysfunctional judicial system, may lack the necessary resources and human capital to challenge ICC action, in order to give room to domestic processes.[74]

Existing case law reflects a 'strange balance' between prerogatives of the ICC and deference to domestic jurisdiction. Controversies over the existence and scope of domestic investigations and prosecutions have become the main 'battlefield' of admissibility findings. In this context, jurisprudence has considerably constrained the space of domestic autonomy. By contrast, conditions of inability and unwillingness under Article 17(2) and (3) have been interpreted with greater flexibility and space for deference to domestic action. This vision of complementarity facilitates quick action by the ICC. But it pays limited attention to systemic integration between international and domestic justice, and broader challenges of sustainability.

10.2.2.1 Article 17(1)—Too few prospects for deference?

The existing interpretation of Article 17(1) provides hardly any space for an integrated understanding of complementarity, i.e. interaction between international and domestic justice. Since the very start, admissibility depends on the advancement of the prosecutor's case.

The Statute contains an early opportunity for states to request deference to domestic proceedings under Article 18, within a period of one month after the notification by the prosecutor that the ICC intends to open an investigation into the relevant situation. At this stage of proceedings, the Statute expressly encourages 'a dialogue between the state and the prosecutor to ensure that there is no overlap in their respective areas of interest'.[75] This is reflected in Article 18(5).[76] But this provision has largely remained dead letter, since states supported the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICC, or lacked the means to seek deferral based on their own investigation and prosecutions. Under Article 18, it remains unclear how and by what criteria domestic action should be compared to prosecutorial action.[77] Moreover, the very invocation of Article 18

[73] See D Robinson, 'Three Theories of Complementarity: Charge, Sentence or Process' (2012) Harvard International Law Journal 165, 175–82.

[74] See also the critique by J Spilman, 'Complementarity or Competition: The Effect of the ICC's Admissibility Decision in Kenya on Complementarity and the Article 17(1) Inquiry' (2013) Richmond Journal of Global Law & Business Online <http://rjglb.richmond.edu/index.php/complementarity-or-competition-the-effect-of-the-iccs-admissibility-decision-in-kenya-on-complementarity-and-the-article-171-inquiry/> accessed 3 October 2014.

[75] See J T Holmes, 'Complementarity: National Courts versus the ICC' in A Cassese, P Gaeta, and J R W D Jones (ed.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, Vol. 1 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002), at 681.

[76] It allows the Prosecutor to request periodic updates from states.

[77] See also Ruto, Kosgey and Sang Appeals Judgment (n 18) para. 39 (speaking of the 'relative vagueness of the contours of the likely cases in article 18').

bears certain risks for a state in relation to a future challenge. Article 18(7) limits the prospects of a subsequent challenge under Article 19 to 'grounds of additional significant facts or significant change of circumstances'.[78]

After the 'Article 18 stage', the space for dialogue is more limited. Domestic action is assessed against ICC action, which creates an environment of 'competition'. States must meet ICC conditions to bring a successful challenge. The Appeals Chamber has introduced requirements for the 'sameness' of the 'case'. But the object of comparison has long remained unclear. The Statute contains a paradox in relation to the 'post-Article 18 stage'. Admissibility is formally tied to the notion of 'case'. The prosecutor is deemed to take admissibility into account under Article 53 when deciding whether to move from preliminary examination to investigation. But at this stage, no 'case' exists formally. The prosecutor and the Pre-Trial Chamber still 'operate within the parameters of an entire "situation", rather than in relation to a specific "case" '[79] and it is thus more proper to speak of admissibility in relation to the 'situation'.[80] The Pre-Trial Chamber has solved this dilemma by tying admissibility to a hypothetical assessment 'of one or more potential cases within the context of a situation'.[81] It specified that:

> admissibility at the situation phase should be assessed against certain criteria defining a 'potential case' such as: (i) the groups of persons involved that are likely to be the focus of an investigation for the purpose of shaping the future case(s); and (ii) the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court allegedly committed during the incidents that are likely to be the focus of an investigation for the purpose of shaping the future case(s).[82]

This 'incident'-specific definition[83] reduces the likelihood of overlap between ICC action and domestic activities, and the prospects of deference to parallel domestic activities at this stage. The Chamber further acknowledged that 'the Prosecutor's selection of the incidents or groups of persons that are likely to shape his future case(s) is preliminary in nature and is not binding for future admissibility assessments'.[84] In light of this remaining uncertainty, states have to challenge a 'moving target' when they seek to call into question admissibility.

In the context of admissibility challenges under Article 19, the adequacy of an 'incident'-related interpretation of the 'same conduct' test has been subject to considerable dispute. Different versions of the test have been formulated. The prosecutor has traditionally defended a 'pure' version of the 'same conduct' test, based on a literal

[78] See Art 18(7).

[79] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010, para. 44 ('Kenya Authorization Decision').

[80] Ibid., para. 45 ('accordingly, an assessment of admissibility during the article 53(1) stage should in principle be related to a "situation" ').

[81] Ibid., para. 48. [82] Ibid., para. 50.

[83] In the Gaddafi Appeal Judgment (n 7) para. 62, the Appeals Chamber defined 'incident' as 'referring to a historical event, defined in time and place, in the course of which crimes within the jurisdiction of the court are allegedly committed by one or more direct perpetrators'.

[84] Kenya Authorization Decision (n 79) para. 50.

and systematic reading of the Statute.[85] This position has been blurred by the Appeals Chamber in the Kenyan decisions. The Appeals Chamber mysteriously added the word 'substantially' to the test, arguing that the domestic case must target the same person for 'substantially the same conduct'.[86] The Chamber failed to explain the origin, meaning, and legal basis of this differentiation. The formulation bears resemblance to Article 35(2)(b) of the ECHR, which specifies that the 'Court shall not deal with any application submitted under Article 34 that…is substantially the same as a matter that has already been examined by the Court or has already been submitted to another procedure of international investigation or settlement and contains no relevant new information'.[87] This reasoning has triggered a vivid debate in the Libyan cases, as to whether 'conduct' refers to specific factual incidents or broader events, and which degree of symmetry is required between the two cases to declare a case inadmissible.

The prosecutor claimed that the addition of the word 'substantially' was not meant to modify the 'sameness' requirement per se, but rather described the 'nature of the test', i.e. the need for comparison,[88] based on the 'identity, symmetry or equivalence' of national proceedings to the ICC case.[89] The prosecution insisted that 'conduct' must always be understood as 'incident-specific'.[90] Libya defended a broader understanding of the 'same conduct' test, claiming that conduct relates essentially to the time, space, and subject matter of the accused's alleged action. It argued that the domestic process must not necessarily mirror precisely what the ICC would do in the same circumstances. It submitted that an incident-specific interpretation of a 'case' would run counter to the object and purpose of the Rome Statute, since it undermines state discretion. It argued that the Statute only requires a state to investigate or prosecute 'similar and/or related incidents arising out of substantially the same course of conduct as well as other serious allegations of crimes'.[91] It suggested that conduct relates to a 'criminal transaction', i.e. 'a number of acts or omissions whether occurring as one event or a number of events, at the same or different locations and being part of a common scheme, strategy or plan'.[92] The notion of 'incident' would merely serve as an indication as to whether the domestic criminal process addresses the 'same conduct'.

ICC jurisprudence has diverged on this point. The Pre-Trial Chamber has adopted a flexible reading ('broad mirror' approach) that is closer to Libya's position. It argued that domestic coverage of some or all incidents may constitute a relevant indicator [85] For a full statement, see Prosecution's Response to 'Application on behalf of the Government of Libya relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute', Gadaffi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11, 2 May 2013, paras 33 et seq. ('OTP Response').

[86] Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali Appeals Judgment (n 18) paras 40, 41–3, 62; Ruto, Kosgey and Sang Appeals Judgment (n 18) para. 40.

[87] Emphasis added.

[88] See OTP Response (n 85) para. 32 ('Any other interpretation would render the decision internally inconsistent and manifestly unreasonable').

[89] Ibid., para. 58. [90] Ibid., para. 28.

[91] Application on behalf of the Government of Libya relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Art 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-307-Conf-Exp, 2 April 2013, para. 60, as well as paras 72, 78, and 89.

[92] Ibid., para. 73.

that the case is indeed the same.[93] But it rejected a firmly incident-based reading of conduct, noting that '[w]hat is . . . required at every phase of the proceedings before the Court is that the alleged criminal conduct be sufficiently described with reference to precise temporal, geographic and material parameters', but 'not that such conduct be invariably composed of one or more "incidents" of a pre-determined breadth'.[94]

The Appeals Chamber deviated from the Pre-Trial Chamber on this point on appeal. It defended a 'strict mirror' approach, stressing the key role of incidents in the determination of the 'sameness' of conduct, 'alongside the conduct of the suspect under investigation'.[95] It argued that it is 'hard to envisage a situation in which the Prosecutor and a State can be said to be investigating the same case in circumstances in which they are not investigating any of the same underlying incidents'.[96]

It related the formulation 'substantially the same' to the degree of overlap with the domestic case, and defended a case-by-case assessment. The explanation remained vague, and is likely to trigger further dispute in future cases.[97] The Appeals Chamber stated:

> The real issue is, therefore, the degree of overlap required as between the incidents being investigated by the Prosecutor and those being investigated by a State—with the focus being upon whether the conduct is substantially the same . . . If there is a large overlap between the incidents under investigation, it may be clear that the State is investigating substantially the same conduct; if the overlap is smaller, depending upon the precise facts, it may be that the State is still investigating substantially the same conduct or that it is investigating only a very small part of the Prosecutor's case. For example, the incidents that it is investigating may, in fact, form the crux of the Prosecutor's case and/or represent the most serious aspects of the case. Alternatively, they may be very minor when compared with the case as a whole.[98]

This jurisprudence is marked by frictions. The Appeals Chamber derives the 'strict mirror' approach from statutory interpretation. But the parameters applied, i.e. 'substantial' sameness, and the incident-based interpretation of 'same conduct' are in essence jurisprudential creations. The case-by-case approach appears to suggest some flexibility in assessment. But the space for deference is in reality thin. The method of comparison promoted by the Appeals Chamber makes it difficult for states to challenge admissibility. It pays little attention to whether and how broader goals of international justice are achieved, since it largely excludes goals and context from the assessment.[99]

[93] Al-Senussi Admissibility Decision (n 21) para. 77.
[94] Ibid., para. 75.
[95] Al-Senussi Appeals Judgment (n 7) para. 73.
[96] Ibid., para. 72.
[97] See Gadaffi Appeals Judgment (n 7), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Uŝacka, para. 51 ('in my opinion, article 17 (1) (a) of the Statute, applied in accordance with the principle of complementarity, does not require domestic authorities to investigate '(substantially) the same' conduct as the conduct that forms the basis of the 'case before the Court').
[98] Al-Senussi Appeals Judgment (n 7) para. 72.
[99] For a broader focus, see Gaddafi Appeals Judgment (n 7), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Uŝacka, para. 58 ('While there should be a nexus between the conduct being investigated and prosecuted domestically and that before the Court, this "conduct" and any crimes investigated or prosecuted in relation thereto do not need to cover all of the same material and mental elements of the crimes before the Court and also do not need to include the same acts attributed to an individual under suspicion').

This might lead to awkward results. For instance, in some cases it might make sense to assess the genuineness of domestic investigations relating to incidents that the Court has not itself investigated, in order to make a proper choice on the appropriate forum. Such considerations are difficult to reconcile with the hard requirements set by the Appeals Chamber. Moreover, the 'sameness' test as a whole embraces a specific reading of complementarity. It supports the vision of ICC investigations and prosecutions as a 'role model' for domestic cases. Promoting 'preference' for national proceedings, and encouraging domestic investigations and prosecutions, becomes a secondary consideration.[100]

10.2.2.2 Article 17(2) and (3): too much space for deference?

This approach contrasts with more flexible jurisprudence on conditions of inability and unwillingness, and in particular the role of due process considerations in admissibility assessments which was at the heart of the dispute in the Libyan cases. In this context, there is a strong shift towards the other extreme, namely great latitude towards domestic processes.

The prosecutor pleaded for a relaxed application of admissibility standards. The prosecution submitted that:

> while Article 17 sets out benchmarks to enable the Court to identify cases that cannot be genuinely heard before national courts, the Statute's complementarity provisions should not become a tool for overly harsh structural assessments of the judicial machinery in developing countries or in countries in the midst of a post-conflict democratic transition which, as Libya notes, will not possess a sophisticated or developed judicial system.[101]

It claimed that fairness towards defendants should only be taken into account 'where the national investigation or proceedings lack fundamental procedural rights and guarantees to such a degree that the national efforts can no longer be held to be consistent with the object and purpose of the Statute and Article 21(3)'.[102]

This understanding was challenged by the defence. The Appeals Chamber adopted a narrow reading of the protection of 'due process' considerations under Article 17(2)(c), which leaves considerable leeway for the toleration of 'flawed' domestic trials.

It held:

> the concept of proceedings 'being conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice' should generally be understood as referring to proceedings which will lead to a suspect evading justice, in the sense of not appropriately being tried genuinely to establish his or her criminal responsibility, in the equivalent of sham proceedings that are concerned with that person's protection.[103]

[100] See OTP Response (n 85) para. 46 ('the Statute does not seek to guarantee a right of national prosecution at all costs. Rather, it recognizes only a preference for genuine national proceedings where they relate to the specific case before the Court').

[101] Al-Senussi Admissibility Decision (n 21) para. 186.

[102] Ibid., para. 188.

[103] Al-Senussi Appeals Judgment, (n 7) para. 218.

It confined admissibility of ICC cases and non-deference to domestic jurisdiction to circumstances > where violations of the rights of the suspect are so egregious that the proceedings can no longer be regarded as being capable of providing any genuine form of justice to the suspect so that they should be deemed, in those circumstances, to be 'inconsistent with an intent to bring the person to justice'.[104]

The Chamber provided some examples. It engaged with minimum standards, with an implicit focus on proceedings resulting in the death penalty. It noted that proceedings which 'are, in reality, little more than a predetermined prelude to an execution' and therefore contrary 'to even the most basic understanding of justice' would be insufficient to render a case inadmissible.[105] It then added that there may be no deference to domestic jurisdiction 'when the violations of the rights of the suspect are so egregious that it is clear that the international community would not accept that the accused was being brought to any genuine form of justice' since in 'such circumstances, it is even arguable that a State is not genuinely investigating or prosecuting at all'.[106]

This reasoning differs from the framework of the ad hoc tribunals which set more stringent conditions for the deferral of cases to domestic jurisdictions under Rule bis.[107] Appeals Chamber jurisprudence grants significant discretion to domestic systems as to the 'justice process' and limits ICC scrutiny to 'travesty of justice'.[108] This approach stands in marked contrast to the ICC-centric approach under Article 17(1). It may be criticized on several grounds. The 'thin' interpretation of due process protection might be under-inclusive, since it reduces inadmissibility to cases that are already covered under Article 17(1). If lack of fairness is only relevant in cases which demonstrate a lack of genuine investigation and prosecution (as implied by the Appeals Chamber), then Article 17(2)(c) becomes virtually redundant in relation to fairness. This stands in contrast to the chapeau of Article 17(2) which mandates the Court expressly to 'have regard to the principles of due process recognized by international law'.[109] As in the context of Article 17(1), the Chamber failed to explore the possibility of adopting a dialogue-based understanding of complementarity which would promote continued interaction with domestic jurisdictions in deference of cases. Although Rule 11 bis deferrals differ formally from ICC admissibility decisions, the Chamber could have drawn inspiration from some features of this practice in order to monitor domestic proceedings after deference. But it failed to seize the opportunity (see further 10.4).

[104] Ibid., para. 230. [105] Ibid. [106] Ibid.

[107] See Rule 11 bis B ('The Referral Bench may order such referral proprio motu or at the request of the Prosecutor, after having given to the Prosecutor and, where applicable, the accused, the opportunity to be heard and after being satisfied that the accused will receive a fair trial and that the death penalty will not be imposed or carried out). Emphasis added.

[108] In support of this approach, see Mégret and Samson (n 2), at 586; see also K J Heller, 'The Shadow Side of Complementarity: The Effect of Article 17 of the Rome Statute on National Due Process' (2006) 17 Criminal Law Forum 255–80. For a critique, see E Frey, 'Between Show Trials and Sham Prosecutions: The Rome Statute's Potential Effect on Domestic Due Process Protections' (2012) 23 Criminal Law Forum 35–62.

[109] See Art 17(2).

10.3 Dilemmas

In existing jurisprudence, the ICC has given significant attention to the application of the 'black letter' law of the Statute and grounded interpretations in the foundational texts. This approach has a certain appeal and might be plausible at this stage of the Court's existence. But it has also silenced certain problems that have emerged in practice and may have been less clear when the complementarity regime was drafted, namely: (i) dilemmas of timing, and (ii) approaches towards 'qualified deference'.

10.3.1 Timing dilemmas

Issues of timing have been contemplated in the admissibility system. But some dimensions have not been fully thought through. Two fundamental challenges have emerged in practice that require further consideration: the interplay between requirements and timelines for challenges, and 'ex post review', based on subsequent developments.

10.3.1.1 The 'race for time' dilemma

The timing dimensions of Article 19 challenges have been mostly approached from the angle of judicial effectiveness,[110] as seen through the lens of the Court. This is reflected in Article 18(7) and Article 19. Article 19(4) states that

> The admissibility of a case or the jurisdiction of the Court may be challenged only once by any person or State referred to in paragraph 2. The challenge shall take place prior to or at the commencement of the trial.

Any deviation from this rule is subject to judicial discretion, and additional limitations. This is clarified by the last sentence:

> In exceptional circumstances, the Court may grant leave for a challenge to be brought more than once or at a time later than the commencement of the trial. Challenges to the admissibility of a case, at the commencement of a trial, or subsequently with the leave of the Court, may be based only on article 17, paragraph 1 (c), i.e. ne bis in idem.

The rationale is obvious. The express intent to limit the number of challenges and to concentrate them on the period before the commencement of the trial is designed to preserve the Court's judicial resources and mitigate the implications of a finding of inadmissibility.[111] There is thus a certain predetermination to protect the interests of the Court. But the implications of this reasoning for domestic proceedings, and challenges of societies in transition, have not received much attention—partly because [110] Note that the accused is not obliged to make the challenge at the 'earliest opportunity' under Art 19(5).

[111] For a study of the early Katanga Trial Chamber decision, see D Jacobs, 'The Importance of Being Earnest: The Timeliness of the Challenge to Admissibility in Katanga' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 331–42.

it was less evident that the Court would intervene actively in situations of ongoing conflict.

The existing system encourages states to 'make a challenge at the earliest opportunity', and this is made clear by Article 19(5). This incentive stands in tension with the jurisprudence on Article 17(1) which requires the state to carry out investigations or prosecutions that 'mirror' the ICC case. If the ICC case is the benchmark, domestic actors are typically placed at a disadvantage[112] since the ICC prosecution is in the 'pool position', steering the scope, focus, and pace of proceedings. Due to the high threshold adopted for challenges under Article 19, a state might be best advised to postpone the challenge until the latest possible moment, in order to enhance the scope of investigations or prosecutions and the quality of evidence. This result contrasts with the original logic of Article 19.

If a state postpones a challenge beyond the confirmation of charges, it might have to conduct a 'quick' investigation or trial, with a decision on the merits of the case, in order to benefit from ne bis in idem. None of the two implications is necessarily in line with the idea of fostering sustainable domestic justice after conflict, which should be a goal of complementarity.

10.3.1.2 The review dilemma

A second critical aspect of the current admissibility regime relates to the time frame of review. The situations in which the ICC acts are highly dynamic. The ICC system has not yet developed an adequate methodology to accommodate this tension. The Appeals Chamber made it clear in its jurisprudence that admissibility challenges are decided, based 'on the facts as they exist at the time of the proceedings concerning the admissibility challenge',[113] i.e. the time of the proceedings on the admissibility challenge before the Pre-Trial Chamber. It specified this principle in Katanga. It noted:

> Generally speaking, the admissibility of a case must be determined on the basis of the facts as they exist at the time of the proceedings concerning the admissibility challenge. This is because the admissibility of a case under article 17(l)(a), (b) and (c) of the Statute depends primarily on the investigative and prosecutorial activities of States having jurisdiction.[114]

It then conceded in the same paragraph that '[t]hese activities may change over time',[115] but failed to draw conclusions from this. In subsequent proceedings, it systematically decided not to consider evidence postdating the appealed decision.[116] An [112] See also Gaddafi Appeals Judgment (n 7), Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Uŝacka, para. 56 ('applying this strict approach raises a concern about timing, as the proceedings before the Court might have progressed further than the domestic proceedings or vice versa. Therefore, the "case before the Court" may already have many more concrete elements than a "case" which is still under investigation domestically').

[113] Katanga Appeals Judgment (n 6) para. 56. [114] Ibid., para. 56.

[115] Ibid., para. 56, adding that 'a case that was originally admissible may be rendered inadmissible by a change of circumstances on the concerned States and vice versa'.

[116] See Gaddafi Appeals Judgment (n 7) para. 44 ('the correct avenue would rather be for it to make an application under article 19 (4) of the Statute').

admissibility challenge therefore reflects only a snapshot of reality, based on the circumstances at the time of the challenge. Subsequent developments remain largely out of purview in light of the limited option for a state to bring a second challenge (Article 19(4)).

The selective focus of scrutiny poses a problem, since ex post review of admissibility decisions is subject to tied conditions. Two 'post-admissibility' scenarios must be distinguished.

The first is a situation where a case that has been ruled as admissible is affected by a change of circumstances that might render it inadmissible. In such circumstances, there might be an interest for deference to domestic jurisdiction in order to safeguard the resources of the Court. The Statute seeks to resolve such admissibility conflicts through judicial discretion and time bars. A first option is Article 19(3). If a case that has been deemed admissible becomes inadmissible due to a change of facts and circumstances, the prosecutor might seek 'a ruling from the Court regarding a question of…admissibility' under Article 19(3).[117] But typically, such an inadmissibility claim might not coincide with the prosecutor's interest in pursuing the case. A second option is a proprio motu determination by a Chamber. Article 19(1) allows a Chamber to take such a change in circumstance into account by virtue of its proprio motu powers.[118] The wording ('may') implies that it is not obliged to do so.[119] Deactivation of ICC activity through subsequent action by states (e.g. a second challenge[120]) is subject to the already mentioned time limits. A state depends on the Court's grant of 'leave' if it seeks to invoke a change of circumstances by way of an additional challenge. After commencement of the trial, the Statute allows for parallel proceedings. Any conflict over jurisdiction is then governed by a 'race for judgment', i.e. ne bis in idem. Where a defendant has been surrendered to the Court, it will be difficult for the domestic jurisdiction to 'try' the person (unless trials in absentia are allowed domestically). This framework of 'post-admissibility' developments is thus largely dependent on the progress of the ICC case and the interests of the Court.

Second, subsequent events might render a case admissible after it has been found to be inadmissible. A typical example is the Al-Senussi case, where circumstances on the ground changed after the successful admissibility challenge.[121] The Statute does not provide much guidance on the legal regime relating to such developments. The prosecutor has the power to seek a reactivation of Court activities, after a successful admissibility challenge, by way of a 'request for review'. This option is regulated in Article 19(10). This provision allows the prosecutor to 'submit a request for a review of the [117] See also Kleffner (n 69) at 193. [118] Kleffner (n 69), at 192–3.

[119] Consideration of jurisdiction is mandatory ('shall'). See Art 19(1).

[120] For a second challenge, Hall suggests to 'adopt a standard similar to that in Article 84 para. 1 (e) for revisions of convictions or sentences which would require that the challenge be based on newly discovered information, that the failure to discover that information was not the fault of the State making the new challenge and that the information be sufficiently import ant so that the decision on the ruling in admissibility would have been different'. See C K Hall in Triffterer, Art 19, para. 22.

[121] See K J Heller, 'It's Time to Reconsider the Al-Senussi Case (But How?)', Opinio Juris <http://opiniojuris.org/2014/09/02/time-reconsider-al-senussi-case/> accessed 3 October 2014.

decision when he or she is fully satisfied that new facts have arisen which negate the basis on which the case had previously been found inadmissible under article 17'.[122] Article 19(10) is lex specialis to the general power to seek a ruling on admissibility under Article 19(3).[123] The framing of the provision suggests that the prosecutor is not obliged to react to all subsequent changes. A request for review is optional ('may') and tied to a partly 'subjective' test' ('is fully satisfied'). This power of the prosecutor is not tied to specific temporal limitations. But it is subject to a high threshold, namely proof of new facts and circumstances. Facts must have arisen or become known after the decision on inadmissibility, and the new evidence must invalidate the basis of inadmissibility.

It is controversial whether a defendant might initiate a review in cases where the prosecutor fails to do so. An incentive might arise in contexts where a defendant prefers to be prosecuted by the ICC than by a domestic court. The wording of Article 19(2)(a) speaks against such an interpretation. It allows 'challenges to the admissibility of the case'. The request for reactivation of ICC admissibility following a change of circumstances is technically a 'challenge to inadmissibility'. According to a creative reading, the term 'admissibility' might be said to cover challenges to admissibility and inadmissibility.[124] But such an interpretation seems to go against the express distinction between 'challenges to admissibility' and 'requests for review' (Article 19(10)). It also conflicts with the division of authority and the role of parties in ICC proceedings. The prosecutor is the driving force behind the case. Article 61(7) makes it clear that a Chamber cannot force the prosecution to investigate or prosecute a case.[125] Chambers have continuously refrained from asserting such a power. It would thus be strange to award the Defence the authority to challenge 'inadmissibility' and reactivate the case in situations where the prosecution does not do so, and there is some logic in limiting this right to the prosecutor. It would also be contradictory to require that the prosecutor has to invoke 'new facts and circumstances' while the defence could simply rely on Article 19(2)(a).

10.3.2 Deference and monitoring

The problems relating to ex post review are related to a broader structural deficit of the existing complementarity regime: the lack of mechanisms and procedures to deal with deferral to domestic jurisdiction.

[122] See Art 19(10).

[123] See also C K Hall, Art 19 in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (München/Oxford/Baden-Baden: C H Beck/Hart/Nomos, 2008), at 665, mn 36 ('In the absence of paragraph 10, the Prosecutor would have been able to seek a new ruling on the "question of…admissibility" pursuant to paragraph 3').

[124] See Heller (n 121).

[125] See Art 61(7)(c), granting the Chamber the power to 'request the Prosecutor to consider: (i) Providing further evidence or conducting further investigation with respect to a particular charge; or (ii) Amending a charge because the evidence submitted appears to establish a different crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'.

10.3.2.1 The rudimentary ICC framework on deferral of cases

The Statute is based on a binary 'either/or' logic. Once an admissibility challenge has been successful, the Court maintains jurisdiction, but must defer to domestic proceedings. The procedural consequences are not spelled out in much detail. The 'case' is in limbo. Case-related proceedings at the ICC cannot yet formally come to an end, since the prosecutor retains the right to make a request for review under Article 19(10). But certain procedural decisions such as the arrest warrant or requests for cooperation with the ICC might require adjustment in light of the change of the proper forum for proceedings.

A drastic example is Pre-Trial Chamber I's follow-up decision to the confirmation of Libya's successful admissibility challenge.[126] After dismissal of the defence appeal, the Chamber held that:

> without prejudice to the Prosecutor's right to submit a request for review of the Admissibility Decision under the conditions of article 19 (1) of the Statute, the proceedings against Mr Al-Senussi before this Court are concluded, the warrants of arrest against him no longer in effect, and the outstanding requests for cooperation in relation to the case transmitted by the Registrar to a number of States must be withdrawn.[127]

It rather confusingly closed the 'case', noting that 'proceedings against Abdullah Al-Senussi before the Court have come to an end'.[128]

This decision reveals one of the significant weaknesses of the ICC system, namely the absence of a framework to refer cases back to domestic jurisdiction.[129] Rule 11 bis D contains specific instructions relating to referral of cases from the ICTY and the ICTR to domestic jurisdictions. It states:

i. the accused, if in the custody of the Tribunal, shall be handed over to the authorities of the state concerned;
ii. the Referral Bench may order that protective measures for certain witnesses or victims remain in force;
iii. the prosecutor shall provide to the authorities of the state concerned all of the information relating to the case which the prosecutor considers appropriate and, in particular, the material supporting the indictment;
iv. the prosecutor may send observers to monitor the proceedings in the national courts on her behalf.[130]

Rule 11 bis F even encompasses a right to revoke the referral of the case during domestic proceedings, which is grounded in the 'primacy' of the ad hoc tribunals. It states:

> At any time after an order has been issued pursuant to this Rule and before the accused is found guilty or acquitted by a national court, the Referral Bench may,

[126] Decision following the declaration of inadmissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi before the Court, Gadaffi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/011-01/011, PTC I, ICC, 7 August 2014.
[127] Ibid., para. 6. [128] Ibid., p. 5. [129] See also Kleffner (n 69), at 193.
[130] Rule 11 bis D.

> at the request of the Prosecutor and upon having given to the State authorities concerned the opportunity to be heard, revoke the order and make a formal request for deferral within the terms of Rule 10.[131]

The ICC statutory framework is much more rudimentary, and does not contain a targeted provision on the treatment of deferrals. Guidance must be sought in general provisions. Article 68(1) allows the ordering of protective measures for witnesses and victims. Article 93(10) contains a discretionary norm on ICC cooperation and assistance to states, which might facilitate domestic proceedings. But this 'reverse' form of cooperation and assistance is subject to strict conditions. The Statute fails to clarify the conditions and legal consequences of post-(in)admissibility review under Article 93(10).[132] Moreover, monitoring powers and modalities, which have played a key role in 11 bis proceedings at the ad hoc tribunals,[133] are only addressed in a cursory fashion in the ICC Statute.

10.3.2.2 Post-(in)admissibility monitoring

Monitoring of subsequent domestic criminal proceedings is crucial to deal with changing circumstances in situations and to exercise continued scrutiny over domestic proceedings. It has taken on various forms in international criminal practice, ranging from reporting and trial monitoring to actual verification of standards and fair trial requirements. In the context of Rule 11 bis cases, judges have ordered the prosecutor to monitor national proceedings in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda.[134] In some cases, monitoring has been outsourced to external actors, such as the OSCE or the African Commission of Human and Peoples' Rights, which have been charged with extensive monitoring powers. In other cases, the Referral Bench has relied on monitoring under judicial scrutiny (i.e. appointment of a monitor by the Registrar) in order to facilitate its decision-making process on the fairness of domestic proceedings.[135]

The ICC regime is rather underdeveloped in comparison with other international courts and tribunals. Its bare essence is reflected in two provisions: Article 18(5) and Article 19(11).

[131] Rule 11 bis F.

[132] Rule 62 specifies the procedure applicable to proceedings under Art 19 (10).

[133] On 'monitoring' under Rule 11 bis, see O Bekou, 'Rule 11 Bis: An Examination of the Process of Referrals to National Courts in ICTY Jurisprudence' (2009) 33 Fordham International Law Journal 723, 786–9.

[134] E.g. Decision on Rule 11 bis Referral, Stanković, Case No. IT-96-23/2-AR11bis.2, AC, ICTY, 15 November 2005, para. 56 ('The Appeals Chamber acknowledges that Rule 11 bis (D)(iv) and (F) of the Rules confer a substantial amount of discretion on the Prosecutor to send monitors on her behalf and to determine how best to go about that monitoring. However, that discretion cannot derogate from the Referral Bench's inherent authority under this Rule. Just because the Prosecutor may send observers to monitor the proceedings in the national courts on her behalf does not mean that the Referral Bench lacks the authority to instruct the Prosecutor that she must send observers on the Tribunal's behalf. The former does not preclude the latter').

[135] Bekou (n 133) 786–9.

Article 18(5) addresses monitoring after deference of proceedings under Article 18. It states:

> When the Prosecutor has deferred an investigation in accordance with paragraph 2, the Prosecutor may request that the State concerned periodically inform the Prosecutor of the progress of its investigations and any subsequent prosecutions. States Parties shall respond to such requests without undue delay.[136]

Article 19(11) establishes similar 'monitoring' powers in relation to admissibility proceedings. It states:

> If the Prosecutor, having regard to the matters referred to in article 17, defers an investigation, the Prosecutor may request that the relevant State make available to the Prosecutor information on the proceedings. That information shall, at the request of the State concerned, be confidential.[137]

These two specific provisions are complemented by Article 53(4), which provides the prosecutor with the general authority to evaluate national proceedings. It clarifies that the prosecutor 'may, at any time, reconsider a decision whether to initiate an investigation or prosecution based on new facts and information'.[138]

In the Al-Senussi case, Libya sought to mitigate the risks of deference to domestic jurisdiction by reference to continuing monitoring powers of the Court after a successful admissibility challenge. It argued that 'any residual or obdurate concerns…regarding Libya's domestic proceedings…ought to form the centrepiece of a monitoring and technical assistance program',[139] grounded in 'positive complementarity'. It suggested that monitoring of domestic proceedings in Libya would facilitate the exercise of review powers under Article 19(10) by the prosecutor[140] and facilitate continued ICC assessment of conditions of unwillingness under Article 17(2) and inability under Article 17(3).[141] But this proposal was contested by the defence, and not taken up by the Chamber.

The existing ICC system, as it is reflected in the Statute, has several weaknesses. The first downside is that it relies entirely on monitoring by the prosecutor, instead of embracing broader mechanisms of monitoring that have been devised by other international courts of tribunals, including monitoring under judicial scrutiny. The focus on the role of the OTP is in line with its function as 'master of the case'. But it has inherent limitations that constrain the purpose and functioning of monitoring schemes. Monitoring under the authority of the prosecutor is 'party-driven' and potentially 'confrontational' rather than cooperation-oriented. It is primarily geared towards prosecutorial decision-making processes and guided by prosecutorial interests, which may conflict with defence interests or state interests. This orientation facilitates vigilance, but is not necessarily suited to strengthening domestic investigations [136] Art 18(5). [137] Art 19(11). [138] Art 53(4).

[139] Libyan Government's consolidated Reply to the Responses by the Prosecution, Defence and OPCV to the Libyan Government's Application relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Art 19 of the ICC Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11, 14 August 2013, para. 173.

[140] Ibid., para. 173. [141] Ibid., para. 183.

and prosecutions through cooperation and assistance. In addition to capacity concerns, there are limits in relation to verification of compliance with standards. As a party to proceedings, the prosecutor is ill-equipped to set standards or offer advice on their compliance. Such a role might force the OTP to take a legal position on issues that could later be invoked against it. This conflict has been recognized by the Court as one of the impediments to a more 'proactive' approach on complementarity, based on 'reverse cooperation' under Article 93(10). The Court noted that > any form of cooperation from the Court to a national authority for the strengthening of their judicial/legal capacity would not amount to a safeguard from the Chamber finding a case admissible within the scope of article 17 of the Rome Statute.[142]

The second weakness of the existing framework is its limited scope. Monitoring under an existing statutory provision relies entirely on submission of information by the state, as opposed to broader sources of information. Deeper issues of verification, on-site control, and further ongoing cooperation are left aside. This gap may be explained by reservations of states towards prosecutorial interference in internal affairs and domestic proceedings. But it is an impediment to complex and deeper forms of monitoring that involve trial inspection or technical assistance. This restrictive regime loses its appeal in cases where a state voluntarily accepts monitoring as part of an ongoing admissibility assessment, as evidenced by Libya's submissions. There is a need to rethink the status quo.

10.4 Improving 'Qualified Deference'

It is artificial to treat admissibility challenges as a binary 'either/or' choice, according to which 'a declaration of admissibility or inadmissibility in accordance with this provision is the end of the matter'.[143] This approach is appealing from a narrow legal perspective, since it blends out politics and longer-term complementarity considerations. But it disregards the fact that the choice of the proper legal forum is more than an abstract dispute over competencies. It is inherently connected to the framing of domestic justice policies that go beyond the individual 'case'. There is an urgent need to critically reflect the 'mirror' imagery, and to (re-)connect ICC practice more closely to longer-term visions of complementarity.

Complementarity is dynamic, while accountability may require coordination between the ICC and domestic authority. One way to address existing tensions is to provide greater attention to the idea of 'qualified deference' to domestic jurisdictions in complementarity assessments, and the conditions under which it might be operationalized. Qualifying 'deference' may provide a means to strike a more adequate balance between the strict application of the 'same conduct' test, and the more generous granting of deference under Article 17(2) and (3) (see 10.2.2). It may help mitigate some of the existing concerns relating to (i) the high threshold of ICC jurisprudence, [142] See Report of the Court on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/10/23, 11 November 2011, para. 6.

[143] See also Kleffner (n 69), at 190.

(ii) the management of 'timing' issues under the admissibility regime, in particular in relation to transitional societies, and (iii) the promotion of a deeper (rather than a thin) vision of complementarity, based on continued monitoring, mutual cooperation, and the development of sustainable domestic justice responses.

The appeal of the concept lies in the fact that it might facilitate a more dialogue and process-based understanding of complementarity, which is better geared at context, while maintaining checks and balances through ongoing ICC scrutiny or control. The idea of qualifying deference has mainly gained ground in the practice of other courts and tribunals after the adoption of the Rome Statute. It is not directly specified in the Statute, but in line with the role of the Court as 'back-up' for domestic jurisdictions and the statutory mandate to encourage domestic investigation and prosecution.[144]

There are three different ways in which the concept can be applied to reconcile conflicting positions. They differ in their degree of vigilance and approach to admissibility:

i. One solution is to award the state reasonable time to investigate and build the case after the notice of an admissibility challenge, and prior to a final decision on admissibility.[145] This option would grant the state a window of opportunity to meet ICC standards. Pending the admissibility decision, the ICC case and domestic proceedings co-exist. When deciding on the challenge, the Chamber would be able to take into account facts and circumstances at the time of the decision.

ii. A second way is to allow deference to domestic jurisdiction, but to combine the deferral with continued judicial monitoring after a decision under Article 19. This approach does not alter the decision on admissibility per se, but would improve the follow-up.

iii. Finally, the ICC could make greater use of conditions in admissibility proceedings. In some circumstances, it may be feasible to tie deferral to monitoring of specific conditions that must be satisfied in order to maintain domestic jurisdiction ('conditional admissibility'). This approach is suitable in cases in which doubts remain in relation to the feasibility of final deference to a domestic jurisdiction. Deference would be conditional, while monitoring and supervision would be used to facilitate a final judicial decision on deference.

All three approaches may be grounded in mandates and powers provided under the Statute.[146]

[144] See preamble Rome Statute, paras 4, 6, and 11; Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.4, Complementarity, 27 November 2013, para. 1.

[145] See Jalloh (n 2), at 242.

[146] They do not seek to abrogate the application of the 'same conduct' test. Rather, they seek to adjust its application more closely to the context in which the ICC operates.

10.4.1 Time-management of admissibility: managing parallel proceedings

At present, states face a 'race against time' in admissibility proceedings. These concerns may be addressed by a reconsideration of time management, i.e. additional flexibility to adjust their case after the filing of an admissibility challenge, and prior to the decision on admissibility. During this period, the ICC case remains admissible, but there are parallel proceedings. Legally, the prosecutor is bound to suspend the investigation under Article 19(7),[147] but ICC action is not barred entirely. The Chamber can authorize necessary investigative steps, as 'referred to in article 18, paragraph 6'.[148] The state would be required to meet 'the same conduct' test, but would have an opportunity to adjust its investigations or prosecutions after the filing of the admissibility challenge. Additional monitoring structures could be put in place in order to verify whether state action is geared towards the 'same case'. The admissibility decision would take into account the developments in the time period granted.

10.4.2 Monitoring of deference

The second approach seeks to minimize the risks associated with deference, i.e. to ensure that a case does not fall off the 'radar screen' after an admissibility challenge. Deference to domestic jurisdiction is not made conditional per se. Rather, the challenges connected with a deferral are mitigated through a strengthening of monitoring structures, based on continued judicial supervision.

This approach has merits in situations in which the case is ruled inadmissible by the Chamber, but requires further scrutiny in light of the remaining risks. In such circumstances, it is undesirable to terminate the 'case' at the ICC altogether with the decision on admissibility. The decision on admissibility would not end the 'case' at the Court, but merely suspend it. This is in line with the function of admissibility proceedings which are designed to inform the choice of the forum, rather than terminate ICC proceedings as such. Continued judicial scrutiny can be used in this period, i.e. after a decision on admissibility, but before the formal 'ending' of the ICC case, to verify circumstances through monitoring. Ultimately, this approach has two advantages: (i) It might make it easier to justify the exercise of domestic jurisdiction, while mitigating its risks. It would, in particular, maintain some leverage of the ICC over domestic proceedings and limit the risks of shielding suspects or sham proceedings at the domestic realm, after a successful challenge.[149] It would further (ii) strengthen the weak 'monitoring' scheme of the Statute, and address some of the shortcomings of prosecutorial monitoring (which may encounter objections from the defence[150] or suspicion from recalcitrant states).

[147] See Art 19(7). [148] See Arts 19(7) and 18(6).

[149] See also Jalloh (n 71), at 124 (noting that in Kenya, 'the government voluntarily offered to provide periodic investigative reports to the chamber and simultaneously requested the transfer of material evidence in the prosecutor's possession for use in its domestic investigations').

[150] Defence Response on behalf of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi to 'Application on behalf of the Government of Libya relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11, 14 June 2013, para. 186 ('Even if effective monitoring

Technically, continuing judicial authority might be justified on the basis of Article 19(1) ('The Court, may, on its own motion, determine the admissibility of a case in accordance with article 17'), and the function of the chamber as 'guardian of admissibility'. The power of judges to examine admissibility does not end with a successful challenge under Article 19(2), but continues until the 'case' ends. This is made clear by Article 19(10) which mandates the Chamber to carry out a 'review of the decision'. The term 'review' clearly implies that the relevant Chamber makes a decision on the original case in the 'post-admissibility' stage.

Critics might argue that the continued exercise of proprio motu powers under Article 19(1) at this stage conflicts with the role of the prosecutor. After all, the prosecutor is charged with continuing 'monitoring' responsibilities under Articles 53(4), and 19(10) and (11). But this argument is ultimately not convincing. Several reasons speak against this reading. This objection overstretches the function of Article 19(10). The fact that the prosecutor has the power to trigger a request for review and to monitor does not mean that the Chamber is barred from taking action. Article 19(10) is not necessarily intended to block Chamber action. 'Monitoring' initiated through Chamber action differs from the limited 'monitoring scheme' under Article 19(11). It is not confined to traditional channels of state reporting, but may encompass wider and more effective forms of scrutiny, such as monitoring by independent experts, NGOs, etc., as in the context of Rule 11 bis. Judicial scrutiny does not necessarily stand in contradiction to the powers of the prosecutor; it might complement or strengthen the exercise of prosecutorial authority under Article 19(10) and (11), as acknowledged in the Al-Senussi case.[151]

10.4.3 Conditional admissibility: supervising deference

A third option to strengthen 'qualified deference' is the use of conditions in admissibility decisions. In many contexts, the ICC is required to render admissibility decisions under uncertain conditions, i.e. in situations where facts and circumstances change in a short period of time. In current decisions, these doubts and uncertainties are often masked and clouded behind legal reasoning, since admissibility is treated as a 'yes or no' choice. This makes ICC practice vulnerable to criticism. It would be were possible at the investigation or trial stage, it is not clear how the two parties whose interests are opposed to those of the defence—i.e. the two prosecuting authorities—are in a position to be the guardians of defence rights') ('Defence Response Al-Senussi Challenge').

[151] 'The Office of the Prosecutor has some capacity to examine national proceedings and we do some of that from the seat of the Court in The Hague, but of course the OTP may not be in a position to permanently monitor proceedings in court every day, and the situation may be compared perhaps with the Yugoslavia and Rwanda tribunals in their 11 bis proceedings, whereas your Honours know the Court had requested the Prosecutor to enter into arrangements with other organisations…So the issue we would believe would be also open for this Court to consider, with submissions from the parties and participants, to consider, should that eventuality arise, who would be most appropriately placed to monitor'. See Application on behalf of the Government of Libya relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11, 2 April 2013, para. 203 ('Al-Senussi Admissibility Challenge').

preferable to recognize uncertainties, and devise techniques that allow them to be managed in a responsible way.

In the Al-Senussi Admissibility challenge, Libya invoked the possibility of using conditions in a decision on deference by the Pre-Trial Chamber[152] in order to alleviate temporal constraints or clarify the circumstances under which deference is acceptable. This technique has several benefits. It might (i) take into account the 'fluid' nature of complementarity, and (ii) mitigate risks through the specification of targets, timelines for action, or substantive standards. Judges could, for instance, set certain temporal limits to deference, or make its final allocation dependent on the attainment of certain substantive benchmarks. Instead of making a final ruling on admissibility, judges could grant deference under certain conditions, in case of doubt.[153] The final decision on inadmissibility would only be made when and if the conditions were met. This differentiation might help the Court to adjust its practices to be more closely linked to context.[154]

Neither Article 17 nor Article 19 refers to conditions,[155] and this option is thus more difficult to justify in legal terms. 'Conditional admissibility' could be introduced by statutory amendment of Articles 17 and 19, or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[156] But such a change might not necessarily be required. The power to tie admissibility to conditions may be inherent in the complementarity regime. The Court is the ultimate arbiter over complementarity, and it is mandated to rule on deference. Article 19(1) and (10) does not identify expressly under which condition a decision to refer a case back to a national criminal jurisdiction can be revoked.[157] The Court can clarify this point through judicial interpretation and practice. A legal justification for the use of conditions may in particular be derived from an a majore ad minus argument. If a Chamber is entitled to make a final finding on inadmissibility, based on the criteria of Article 17, it must have the power to rule on the steps leading to that result. This logic is particularly compelling in light of the nature of the decision on deference. Technically, deference would constitute an interim decision on inadmissibility, which becomes final when conditions are met. The use of conditions is a means by which the Chamber would be assisted in reaching its final assessment.[158]

[152] Al-Senussi Admissibility Challenge (n 149) para. 199 ('the Libyan Government invites the Court to declare the case inadmissible subject to the fulfilment of express conditions or other ongoing obligations . . . allowing the Libyan Government time to complete its domestic proceedings relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi subject to monitoring and the acceptance of assistance or the fulfilment of other express initiatives and obligations').

[153] See also Jalloh (n 2), at 242 (suggesting 'deferral, perhaps on condition that the ICC Prosecutor monitors the trials and reports back to the Pre-Trial Chamber every six months').

[154] The implementation of 'conditional admissibility' would require cooperation and monitoring. Cooperation can be sought under Arts 54, 86, 87, 88, and 93.

[155] See also Al-Senussi Admissibility Challenge (n 151) para. 201.

[156] Kleffner calls for the elaboration of an express procedural mechanism to refer cases back to national jurisdictions'. Kleffner (n 69), at 194.

[157] Ibid.

[158] For such an argument in the ICTY context, see 'Decision on Rule 11 bis Referral', Stanković, IT-96-23/2-AR11bis, ICTY, AC, 11 September 2005, para. 50 ('whatever information the Referral Bench reasonably feels it needs, and whatever orders it reasonably finds necessary, are within the Referral Bench's authority so long as they assist the Bench in determining whether the proceedings following the transfer will be fair').

It is evident that such an approach must be applied with caution. As rightly argued by the defence in Al-Senussi, deference cannot serve as 'short cut' to justify domestic jurisdiction in circumstances where Article 17 does not allow for it.[159] Conditional deference can only be used to guide final decision-making in cases where the exercise of domestic jurisdiction might be legitimately defended on the basis of Article 17. But such an approach is not precluded by the existing structure of Article 17 or a presumption in favour of admissibility. While Article 17(1) indeed contains an initial presumption in favour of ICC admissibility (the 'Court shall determine that a case is inadmissible where…'), this presumption ceases once 'the case is being investigated or prosecuted' by a state which has jurisdiction over it. In case of state action, the use of conditions would thus not conflict with a presumption relating to admissibility.

10.5 Conclusions

ICC admissibility jurisprudence has been faithful to the text of the Statute and the structure of Article 17. There is growing objection to the 'same conduct' test, and its interpretation by the Appeals Chamber. Most criticism has focused on the under-inclusiveness of ICC admissibility approaches. States facing admissibility challenges perceive ICC admissibility as a 'straitjacket', which carries the risk of judging domestic investigations and prosecution by a 'one-size-fits-all' formula. In particular, the 'incident'-specific interpretation remains subject to contestation, since it is not directly grounded in statutory text. The defence has criticized the limited weight given to due process considerations.

Some critics have suggested abolishing the 'same conduct' test altogether.[160] This would require a radical departure from the framing of admissibility structures, which might be unrealistic and encounter objection. Rather than abandoning the structure as a whole, it might be more feasible to develop the concept of 'qualified deference'. This concept mitigates some of the critical side effects of the 'mirror' image used in jurisprudence. It might address risks in relation to both the under-inclusiveness and over-inclusiveness of ICC procedures. Three techniques might allow the Court to give sufficient space to domestic investigations and prosecutions, while retaining checks and balances inherent in the complementarity regime: (i) flexibility towards domestic jurisdictions to investigate and build the case after the filing of an admissibility challenge; (ii) greater monitoring after deference; and (iii) consideration of conditions to admissibility. Individual fragments of these approaches have been invoked in the Al-Senussi case. They can be pursued individually or collectively.

Greater attention to these techniques would not absolve the ICC from criticisms—some tensions are inherent in the mandate of the Court. But they might [159] Defence Response Al-Senussi Challenge (n 150) para. 183 (arguing that where national proceedings are 'inadequate', the ICC should not 'allow those proceedings to continue…until an undefined point at which their manifest inadequacy requires them to be declared inadmissible').

[160] Heller (n 19), at 129. For a critique, see C Stahn, 'One Step Forward, Two Steps Back? Second Thoughts on a "Sentence-Based" Theory of Complementarity', (2012) 53 Harvard International Law Journal 183–96.

adjust the application of the complementarity regime better to context and transformative processes in transitional societies. Ultimately, they might shift the focus from mimicry-based and short-term approaches to complementarity to the overarching goal of the Statute, namely to strengthen domestic investigation and prosecution,[161] and to 'guarantee lasting respect for and enforcement of international justice'.[162]

[161] See preamble, para. 4. [162] See preamble, para. 11 (emphasis added).

11

The ICC and its Relationship to Non-States Parties

*Robert Cryer

11.1 Introduction

In some ways, the level of ratification of the Rome Statute[1] is a triumph. In spite of pessimistic predictions about the likelihood of the Rome Statute entering into force quickly (or at all),[2] it took the (in international law terms) breakneck period of five years to achieve the necessary 60 ratifications to create the ICC. By way of contrast, it took roughly double that time for the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights to come into force. There are 123 States Parties to the Rome Statute, representing almost two-thirds of the states in the world. That said, in a more cosmopolitan sense, this represents somewhat less than half of humanity, and a significant number of states, including three of the five permanent members of the Security Council (China, Russia, and the United States), are non-parties to the Statute. As a result, many States have no obligation to help the Court. As our most hopeless of undergraduates could tell us, Article 34 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT) provides that '[a] treaty does not create either obligations or rights for a third State without its consent'.[3] This, undoubtedly customary,[4] principle really reflects a foundational principle of international law and the continuing role of consent in the still significantly decentralized international world.[5] Indeed the ICC itself has made its fidelity to the principle clear, repeatedly opining that 'only States Parties to the Statute are under

* Professor of International and Criminal Law Birmingham Law School.

[1] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[2] See W Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court 3rd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007) xi.

[3] See generally E David, 'Article 34' in O Corten and P Klein (eds), The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011) 887. For a masterful survey of the area see D Bederman, 'Third Party Rights and Obligations in Treaties' in D Hollis (ed.), The Oxford Guide to Treaties (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 328.

[4] E.g. Anglo-Iranian Oil Company Case (Preliminary Objections) [1952] ICJ Rep 93, 109. Lord McNair, The Law of Treaties 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1961) Chapter XVI; M Villiger, Commentary on the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 472.

[5] See e.g. Villiger (n 4) 467; A Aust, The Modern Law of Treaties 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007) pp. 256–7. For a thoughtful evaluation of a possible shift see B Kingsbury and M Donaldson, 'From Bilateralism to Publicness in International Law' in U Fastenrath et al. (eds), From Bilateralism to Community Interest: Essays in Honour of Judge Bruno Simma (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011) 79. For support of the traditional approach see B Roth, Sovereign Equality and Moral Disagreement: Promises of a Pluralistic International Legal Order (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011).

an obligation to cooperate with the Court. Given that the Statute is a treaty governed by the Rules set out in the VCLT, it is only with the State's consent that the Statute can impose obligations on a non-State Party.'[6]

Still, in spite of the fact that the US has vociferously asserted that the Rome Statute violates the pacta tertiis principle,[7] there is nothing inherently unlawful about a treaty effecting the interests (rather than legal rights) of third parties, which it is fair to say the ICC does.[8] Indeed, given the objective legal personality of the ICC, it could be said that there is a lawful obligation on states to accept that personality even though they are not parties to the Statute.[9]

In a previous contribution,[10] I sketched out aspects of the legal regime that is set up by the Rome Statute and other relevant documents (in particular the UN Charter) for non-States Parties. It is not the intention of this chapter to repeat that discussion in full here; however, the chapter will begin with a recap (and at times expansion) of that regime, and some of the themes were developed there. From there it will move on to some of the legal issues that have attained both academic and practical importance since that last contribution (which was published in 2008). It will then discuss developments in the relationship between the ICC and non-States Parties in concrete situations that have come (or not come) before the Court in that period, and its relationship with certain powerful states (in particular the US). It does not claim to be comprehensive;[11] after all, to cover everything would take at least a book-length treatment (of which this chapter forms only one part).

[6] Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Potential Travel to the State of Kuwait, ICC 02/05-01/09, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-192, PTC II, ICC, 24 March 2014 ('Kuwait Decision'), para. 12. The language is from Decision of the Request of the Defence of Abdullah Al-Senussi to Make a Finding on Non-cooperation by the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and Refer the Matter to the Security Council, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-420, PTC I, ICC, 28 August 2013, para. 12. Similar language also appears in Decision Regarding the Visit of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir to the Federal Republic of Ethiopia, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-199, PTC II, ICC, 29 April 2014, para. 12 and Decision Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Potential Travel to the United States of America, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-162, PTC II, ICC, 18 September 2013 ('USA Decision'), para. 10.

[7] D Scheffer, 'The United States and the International Criminal Court' (1999) 93 American Journal of International Law 12; M Morris, 'High Crimes and Misconceptions: The ICC and Non Party States' (2000) 64 Law and Contemporary Problems 131. For (accurate) rejoinders see F Mégrét, 'Epilogue to an Endless Debate: The International Criminal Court's Third Party Jurisdiction and the Looming Revolution of International Law' (2001) 1 European Journal of International Law 241; D Akande, 'The Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court over Nationals of Non-Parties: Legal Basis and Limits' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 618.

[8] G Danilenko, 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court and Third States' (1999–2000) 21 Michigan Journal of International Law 445, 448; Aust (n 5) 257 also gives the useful example of the EU and the effect it may have on competition outside the EU. Although see also R O'Keefe, 'The US and the ICC: The Force and Farce of the Legal Arguments' (2011) 24 Cambridge Review of International Affairs 335.

[9] See (albeit not directly on the ICC) D Akande, 'International Organisations' in M Evans (ed.), International Law 4th edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2014) 248, 254–5.

[10] R Cryer, 'The International Criminal Court and its Relationship to Third States' in G Sluiter and C Stahn (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (The Hague: Brill 2008) 115.

[11] Inter alia, the relationship of the ICC to the UN will not be discussed in depth.

11.2 The Rome Statute and Third Parties: The Law

For its part, the Rome Statute contains a number of provisions that deal with the rights of third parties.[12] Owing, partly, to the influence of states at Rome who had no intention of joining, the Rome Statute is mostly very solicitous of the rights of third states. To turn to the importance of this, however, it should first be mentioned why it probably had to. This is because, in my view rightly, the Statute's drafters rejected the idea floated by the US[13] that the Rome Statute should only deal with situations where both the territorial and nationality states had ratified it. Rejecting, on the other hand, universal jurisdiction,[14] the drafters settled on Article 12 of the Statute, which reads as follows:

> 2. In the case of article 13, paragraph (a) or (c), the Court may exercise its jurisdiction if one or more of the following States are Parties to this Statute or have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court in accordance with paragraph 3:
>   (a) The State on the territory of which the conduct in question occurred or, if the crime was committed on board a vessel or aircraft, the State of registration of that vessel or aircraft;
>   (b) The State of which the person accused of the crime is a national.
> 3. If the acceptance of a State which is not a Party to this Statute is required under paragraph 2, that State may, by declaration lodged with the Registrar, accept the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the crime in question. The accepting State shall cooperate with the Court without any delay or exception in accordance with Part 9.[15]

Hence, and in spite of an interesting argument relating to Article 12(3) of the Statute by (the US lead negotiator) David Scheffer, outside a referral by the Security Council of a situation to the ICC under Chapter VII of the UN Charter as envisioned in Article 13(b) of the Rome Statute, there are two situations in which the ICC can exercise its jurisdiction in a manner that could affect the interests, and perhaps rights, of third (non-Party) States.[16] The first of these is exercising jurisdiction over crimes committed on their territories by nationals of States Party to the Rome Statute. This does not

[12] See generally G Danilenko, 'ICC Statute and Third States' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 1871; B B Jia, 'The International Criminal Court and Third States' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Oxford Companion to International Criminal Justice (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2009) 160.

[13] See E Wilmshurst, 'Jurisdiction of the Court' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute (The Hague: Kluwer 1999) 127, 137.

[14] See O Bekou and R Cryer, 'The International Criminal Court and Universal Jurisdiction: A Close Encounter?'(2007) 56 International & Comparative Law Quarterly 49.

[15] See generally S Williams and W Schabas, 'Article 12' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Article by Article 2nd edn (Oxford: Hart 2008) 547.

[16] Scheffer's argument is that as Art 12(3)'s reference to States not Party implies that nationality non-States Parties' consent is required for the ICC to have jurisdiction (D Scheffer, 'The International Criminal Court' in W Schabas and N Bernaz (eds), Routledge Handbook on International Criminal Law (London: Routledge 2011) 67, 73–4. However, this is inconsistent with the travaux of the article, which reveal that it is a remnant of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute, where state opt-in for each crime was to be the norm (ibid., 558–9). Nor is it consistent with the trend of the subsequent practice of the Court.

seem to have raised the ire of non-States Parties to any great extent. The same cannot be said of the other possibility, that of the ICC asserting jurisdiction over nationals of non-States Parties committing crimes on the territories of States Parties. This underpins the basis of the US objections mentioned earlier and, to some extent, other states.[17] Legally they are, for the most part, unconvincing, but they remain a political obstacle for the Court.

In part because of these considerations, the Rome Statute provides for considerable protections for third states. So, for example, under Article 18 of the Statute,[18] the Prosecutor, when seeking to initiate an investigation, is obliged to 'notify all States parties and those States which . . . would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crimes concerned'. The notable 'and' shows that this obligation extends to non-States Parties to the Statute. Furthermore, any such non-State Party may make a complementarity challenge to the admissibility of cases before the Court (Article 18(2)). The fact that such a state must do so by the procedure provided for in the Statute and Rules and Procedure and Evidence does not infringe their rights, as those documents are providing for a gratuitous right to that state, in the sense that it was not legally required to. Hence the conditions fall under the (customary) Article 36(2) of the VCLT, which provides that:

> A State exercising a right in accordance with paragraph 1 . . . [which provides for treaties granting rights to third parties where the parties intend to,[19] and the assumption of their consent to the granting of that right] . . . shall comply with the conditions for its exercise provided for in the treaty or established in conformity with the treaty.[20]

Therefore, by exercising the right (if not before), the state must be taken as having consented to the right in accordance with paragraph 1, and comply with the conditions under which that right may be exercised.[21]

Leaving aside the fact that the Rome Statute does not (and could not) impose any obligation on non-States Parties to cooperate with the Court (although they may do so—and the Court is entitled to ask them to do so—Articles 15(2) and 87(5)),[22] the Rome Statute contains other provisions to further protect third parties. For example, there are protections for information provided in confidence (Article 87(5)) and a mechanism to determine priorities between requests for extradition and surrender (Article 90).[23] By far the most important though, and the one that has caused the most consternation, is immunities. It is, to this author, reasonably clear that state (functional) immunity does not attach [17] See e.g. U Ramanathan, 'India and the ICC' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 627; H Abtahi, 'The Islamic Republic of Iran and the ICC' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 635; B B Jia, 'China and the International Criminal Court: Current Situation' (2006) 10 Singapore Yearbook of International Law 87; for a useful contextual analysis of the Chinese position see D Zhu, 'China, the International Criminal Court and International Adjudication' (2014) 62 Netherlands International Law Review 43.

[18] See generally D Ntanda Nsereko, 'Article 18' in Triffterer (n 15) 627.

[19] Which is clearly the case here.

[20] See generally Villiger (n 4) 481 ff. On its customary status see ibid., 488; (and more sceptically) P D'Argent, 'Article 36' in Corten and Klein (n 3) 929, 930–1.

[21] See D'Argent (n 20) 939–40.

[22] And there is evidence that they have done so, see infra.

[23] See generally Jia (n 12) 164–5.

to international crimes to be prosecuted by the ICC.[24] In spite of some views to the contrary,[25] under general international law personal immunities remain applicable in relation to domestic courts (including with respect to cooperation obligations with the ICC) even with respect to international crimes.[26] Hence, although Article 27 of the Rome Statute removes immunities, including personal immunities, when a person is before the ICC itself,[27] Article 98 provides that:

1. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity.
2. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of the sending State for the giving of consent for the surrender.[28]

Hence, seemingly, whilst Parties to the Rome Statute may be taken to have waived such immunities, absent Security Council action non-States Parties' immunities remain.[29] Article 98(2) controversially extends this to treaty-based agreements not to surrender (a provision that has been used (and abused) by the US),[30] but the main bone of contention has been personal immunities of high-ranking state officials, as we will see in the section on the practice of the ICC on point.

11.2.1 Theme

Having briefly discussed the legal regime, here we are looking also to the relationship of the ICC to non-States Parties. This requires us to look beyond the provisions of the Statute, into what Mahnoush Arsanjani and Michael Resiman have called the 'Law in [24] Although there are differences on precisely why; see e.g. D Akande and S Shah, 'Immunities of State Officials, International Crimes, and Foreign Domestic Courts' (2010) 21 European Journal of International Law 815; A Orakhelashvili, 'Immunities of State Officials, International Crimes, and Foreign Domestic Courts: A Reply to Dapo Akande and Sangeeta Shah' (2011) 22 European Journal of International Law 849; D Akande and S Shah, 'Immunities of State Officials, International Crimes, and Foreign Domestic Courts: A Rejoinder to Alexander Orakhelashvili' (2011) 22 European Journal of International Law 857. For a careful view see e.g. J Crawford, Brownlie's Principles of Public International Law 8th edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 500–1. For opposition see B B Jia, 'The Immunity of State Officials for International Crimes Revisited' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1303.

[25] Canvassed (sympathetically), for example, in Y Naqvi, Impediments to Exercising Jurisdiction Over International Crimes (The Hague: T. M. C. Asser Press 2010) 262–86.

[26] See R Cryer, H Friman, D Robinson and E Wilmshurst, An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure 3rd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2014) chapter 21.

[27] Whether this can be done in relation to non-parties is far from uncontroversial, see e.g. D Akande, 'International Law Immunities and the International Criminal Court' (2004) 98 American Journal of International 407; Cryer et al. (n 26) 556–61.

[28] See generally C Kreß and K Prost, 'Article 98' in Triffterer (n 15) 1601.

[29] On such action see infra.

[30] See D Scheffer, 'Article 98(2) of the Rome Statute: America's Original Intent' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 333.

Action' of the ICC.[31] Here, building upon earlier work,[32] there is an underlying theme that animates this chapter. This is diplomacy. The ICC, although a judicial institution, exists in a political world, and therefore, whether it (or anyone else) likes the fact, it has to engage in some forms of diplomatic activity. There are various reasons for this. One, for example, is the attempt to gain more States Parties to the Statute, thus increasing its bailiwick both jurisdictionally and for the hugely important issue of obtaining cooperation, both from States Parties and non-States Parties. This latter aspect may not seem to be the most exciting aspect of the Court's practice, and it has to a considerable extent been passed over in the commentary on the Court. However, it is key to the success of the Court that it obtain cooperation.[33] Without it, cases cannot be effectively progressed, either by the prosecution or defence.

That said, unfortunately to some extent, against the background of a weak enforcement regime for States Parties (as the difficulties the ICC is having with respect to witness protection shows[34]), cooperation is all too negotiable even with States Parties, while with non-States Parties there is (outside of specific decisions of the Security Council on point) no obligation whatsoever to comply with orders of the ICC, hence any cooperation is all too often a matter of goodwill. That goodwill has to be, one way or the other, earned by the ICC, and, like all forms of diplomacy, involves compromise.

It would be impossible to look properly at the UN and run together the Security Council and General Assembly, but all too often when discussing the ICC, the various actors in the Court, the judges, Prosecutor, and Registry, are rather lumped together. Even when it comes to the interpretation of the Statute, it is crucial to remember that the judges are not the only interpreters of the Statute; the Prosecutor also has a role here, and a very important one. This is with respect to whether to initiate an investigation when he has either had a matter referred to him by States Parties or the Security Council under Article 12, or by virtue of the proprio motu powers provided for in Article 15 of the Statute.[35]

Indeed, given the political fallout that has accompanied prosecutorial choices so far (in particular, the criticisms of the prosecutor for focusing (rightly or wrongly) on Africa),[36] in terms of the perceived legitimacy of the Court, the Prosecutor's role may be considered the most important one. Deciding which situations to investigate and which not to, is an exercise in judgement. Hence, in spite of the fact that Luis Moreno-Ocampo, the first prosecutor of the ICC, repeatedly asserted that he acted solely on the law, and would not take into account political considerations, this was not broadly believed. And rightly so; the decision on situation selection is one that cannot be taken [31] M Arsanjani and M Resiman, 'The Law-in-Action of the International Criminal Court' (2005) 99 American Journal of International Law 385.

[32] Cryer (n 10).

[33] D Bosco, Rough Justice: The International Criminal Court in a World of Power Politics (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2014) is a useful investigation of the ICC's work here.

[34] See R Cryer, 'Witness Tampering and International Criminal Tribunals' (2014) 27 Leiden Journal of International Law 191.

[35] See W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 314 ff.

[36] On which see e.g. K Ambos, 'Expanding the Focus of the African Criminal Court' in W Schabas et al. (eds), The Ashgate Research Companion to International Criminal Law (Aldershot: Ashgate 2013) 499.

on solely legal grounds, and the practice of the prosecutor has been criticized on this basis. In an earlier contribution, this author looked into the decision of the prosecutor not to investigate the Iraq situation with this in mind. It is the purpose of parts of this chapter to look at some of the more recent aspects of the practice of the Court, to re-emphasize that the Court and its constituent organs have a necessary diplomatic side. This involves both Parties to the Rome Statute, non-Party States, and indeed other actors, including the Security Council.

11.3 The Practice of the Court with Respect to Third Parties

This section will investigate various aspects of the practice of the ICC. It will evaluate the evolution of the law relating to third parties, with particular focus on situations in which the Security Council has become involved. This raises complex issues of the nature of the underlying legal basis of the obligations on individuals and states in such circumstances, especially, in the former instance, aggression, and in the latter, immunities. Turning then to the practical political functioning of the Court, it will investigate the practice of the various organs of the Court situations in which the ICC has been asserting jurisdiction over non-States Parties. It will not discuss the practice of the ICC where a successful declaration has been made under Article 12(3) of the Statute, as such declarants are, for our purposes today, to be analogized to parties to the Statute.

To further the discussion this chapter will then look at the developing relationship between the ICC and one of the most important states in the contemporary world, the United States. In a linked manner, it will also look to the situation of Palestine, a county that has attempted to issue an Article 12(3) declaration, as it raises important issues relating to various States Parties and non-States Parties. That section will finish with a discussion of situations relating to third parties where the Security Council has not chosen to refer the situation to the ICC, to some extent to show the centrality of the role of the Security Council when it comes to non-States Parties, and the continued role of politics in international criminal law.

11.3.1 The nature of obligations for non-Party States and their nationals after a Security Council referral

Security Council referrals of situations in non-Party States have raised the issue of the basis of obligation for both non-Party States and individuals. When it comes to States Parties and their nationals (or for crimes on the territory of a State Party), the basis of obligation on the state is quite clearly its ratification of the Statute, and the basis of obligation on the individual can be either the Statute itself, or customary international law.[37] As Milanovic accurately observes, however, where there is an Article 12(3) declaration or Security Council referral,[38] owing to the nulllum crimen

[37] See M Milanovic, 'Is the Rome Statute Binding on Individuals (and Why We Should Care)' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 25, 27 ff.

[38] The issues in relation to individuals are the same in both situations, so for simplicity's sake we will concentrate on the latter situation here.

sine lege principle, the former explanation of the binding nature of the direct criminal norms in those circumstances must be customary law; hence the ICC needs to read the Statute down to conform to customary law.[39] This is at one level important for the jurisdiction of the current jurisdiction of the Court, as in both instances of Security Council referrals the referral was, in part, retrospective. In terms of practical effects, however, this should not cause too many problems for the Court. This is because the Rome Statute reflects either pre-existing customary international law,[40] or customary law crystallized in the Rome negotiations along the lines envisioned in the North Sea Continental Shelf cases.[41] One example of this may be the (criminalization of the) prohibition of the use of child soldiers. Even on the narrower view of pre-existing custom, Judge Robertson in the Norman case took the view that the crime's customary status crystallized at Rome.[42]

The Rome 'fix', however, does not travel as well to Kampala, where the parties to the Rome Statute drafted, for the purposes of that Statute, the crime of aggression.[43] There is practice from the post-War era[44] which is sufficient to ground a customary crime of aggression.[45] But customary law was not really the basis of the compromise in Kampala,[46] and it is at the very least arguable that the definition in the Kampala amendments departs from customary international law.[47] It is (probably) true that, owing to the jurisdictional regime that accompanies the Kampala amendments, both the aggressor and victim states must have ratified the amendments for the ICC to have treaty-based jurisdiction over aggression.[48] However, this does not answer the question of the basis of the criminal prohibition on individuals in the event of a Security Council referral,[49] and the relationship of such referrals with the nullum crimen sine lege principle.[50]

[39] Milanovic (n 37) 50.

[40] For reasoning to this effect for the vast majority of crimes see R Cryer, Prosecuting International Crimes: Selectivity and the International Criminal Law Regime (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2005) chapter 5.

[41] North Sea Continental Shelf Cases (Federal Republic of Germany/Denmark; Federal Republic of Germany/Netherlands) [1969] ICJ Rep 9, 39–41.

[42] See Dissenting Opinion of Justice Robertson in Decision on Preliminary Motion Based on Lack of Jurisdiction (Child Recruitment), Norman, SCSL-14-14-AR72(E), AC, SCSL, 31 May 2004. See M Happold, 'International Humanitarian Law, War Criminality and Child Recruitment: The Special Court for Sierra Leone's Decision in Sam Hinga Norman' (2005) 18 Leiden Journal of International Law 283.

[43] For discussion see C Kreß and L von Holtzendorff, 'The Kampala Compromise on the Crime of Aggression' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1179. For the travaux see S Barriga and C Kreß, The Travaux Préparatoires of the Crime of Aggression (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2012).

[44] See K Sellars, Crimes against Peace in International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2012).

[45] R v Jones [2006] UKHL 16; see also R Cryer, 'Aggression at the Court of Appeal' (2005) 10 Journal of Conflict and Security Law 209.

[46] See Cryer et al. (n 26) 311–16.

[47] M Milanovic, 'Aggression and Legality: Custom in Kampala' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 165, p. 184.

[48] Art 15*bis* see Cryer et al. (26) 323–5.

[49] The Council is able to vest the ICC with jurisdiction over non-States Parties (or States Parties that have not ratified the amendments by Art 15*ter*, see ibid., 325–6.

[50] See Milanovic (n 47).

Leila Nadya Sadat has argued that the Rome negotiations represented a 'constitutional moment' with respect to the sources of international law, such that the asserted international community has developed to the extent to which it may have adopted a legislative function.[51] There are considerable reasons to be sceptical of this.[52] Beyond this, it is a further stretch, especially given the nature of the negotiations, and the linkage of jurisdiction and substance that characterized the Kampala negotiations, to assert that it was a similar 'constitutional moment' that Sadat asserts occurred in Rome. On the other hand, most of the critiques of the Kampala definition are that it is narrower, rather than broader, than customary international law,[53] so perhaps customary law can come to the rescue here, too.[54] Where (and if) it may be broader, owing to the nullum crimen principle, the ICC may have to engage in the difficult task of determining what the customary definition of aggression is. This will not be simple or uncontroversial, but the material is available from which such a definition may be derived. Furthermore, given the time frame before the ICC may operationalize its jurisdiction over aggression (not until at least 2017, and probably some time after that),[55] there may be some room for the ICC to argue that the Kampala definition has come to reflect customary law.

Turning to the basis of obligations on states, and the extent of such obligations, in the event of a Security Council referral, this is an issue which has caused far more controversy than the similar issue relating to individuals. It has arisen with particular force with respect to the question of obligations to cooperate and the applicability of immunities, in particular those of high-ranking state officials (especially, owing to the indictment of Omar Al-Bashir, Heads of State) of non-States Parties.[56] Sudan is not a Party to the Rome Statute, but in 2005 the Security Council referred the situation in Darfur to the ICC in Resolution 1593.[57] Operative paragraph 2 of that resolution required Sudan (although not other non-Party States) to 'fully cooperate' with the ICC.[58] As the ICC has noted, this means that other non-Parties, in spite of the Security Council referral, are not obliged to cooperate with the Court (although they [51] L Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law: Justice for the New Millennium (New York: Transnational 2002), 79, 103.

[52] For critique see R Cryer, 'International Criminal Law vs State Sovereignty: Another Round?' (2005) 16 European Journal of International Law 979, 984–5.

[53] K Heller, 'Retreat from Nuremberg: The Leadership Requirement in the Crime of Aggression' (2007) 18 European Journal of International Law 477.

[54] As Milanovic accepts in (n 47) 185.

[55] Art 15*bis*, para. 3.

[56] For States Parties, ratification of the Rome Statute has been taken as a waiver of such immunities. On the Al-Bashir indictment see A Cayley, 'The Prosecutor's Strategy in Seeking the Arrest of Sudanese President Al Bashir on Charges of Genocide' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 829; C Gosnell, 'The Request for an Arrest Warrant in Al Bashir: Idealistic Posturing or Calculated Plan?' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 841.

[57] On the referral see R Cryer, 'Sudan, Resolution 1593 and International Criminal Justice' (2006) 19 Leiden Journal of International Law 195.

[58] G Sluiter, 'Obtaining Co-operation from Sudan—Where is the Law?' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 871, 877–8 queries the nature of this obligation, but as he notes, the ICC has taken it to mean that Part 9 of the Rome Statute is applicable. See further D Akande, 'The Effect of Security Council Resolutions and Domestic Proceedings on State Obligations to Cooperate with the ICC' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 299. The cognate paragraph of Resolution 1970 that referred the situation in Libya is similarly framed.

are 'urged' to do so).[59] Were the Council to require cooperation by non-States Parties, the basis of the obligation is the relevant Security Council Resolution (and the UN Charter) rather than the Rome Statute per se.[60]

Soon after the passage of Security Council Resolution 1593, differing views were expressed about whether Sudan's obligations under that resolution meant that President Al-Bashir's immunities as Head of State were abrogated, such that Article 98(1) notwithstanding, other States (Parties to the Rome Statute or not) could arrest and transfer him to the Court. Paula Gaeta took the view that in spite of Resolution 1593, and the fact that the ICC, as an international court, could lawfully try Al-Bashir, his immunity before domestic jurisdictions was retained, and thus Article 98(1) remains applicable.[61] This follows, for Gaeta, from the fact that the ICC has to abide by its Statute, and has not obtained a waiver of immunity from Sudan, which, Resolution 1593 notwithstanding, remains a non-State Party to the Statute.[62] In addition, unlike the resolutions setting up the ICTY and ICTR (827 and 955 respectively), non-States Parties to the Rome Statute are not required to cooperate with the Court, but are merely urged to do so; hence for Gaeta, Article 103 of the UN Charter does not 'bite' so as to give those states a defence that trumps immunity.[63] Dapo Akande has responded to this, arguing that Resolution 1593 renders Sudan functionally a party to the Rome Statute; therefore, it can be taken as having given up its immunities, owing to the applicability of Article 27 to national authorities involved in cooperation as well as before the ICC.[64] This is because the Court must function in accordance with its Statute, and that includes Article 27, and any other interpretation would render Article 27 practically redundant.[65]

The result Akande has argued for has prevailed in the jurisprudence of the Court (although African states have not, in spite of his visits, arrested Al-Bashir, and the African Union has insisted on the continued applicability of Article 98),[66] albeit not generally on the basis of his reasoning. In the early decisions on non-cooperation by states (Malawi and Chad) the relevant ICC Pre-Trial Chamber determined that those states had violated their obligations to arrest Al-Bashir.[67] It did so on the basis that in [59] E.g. Kuwait Decision (n 6) para. 9 [60] USA Decision (n 6) para. 10.

[61] P Gaeta, 'Does President Al Bashir Enjoy Immunity from Arrest?' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 315.

[62] Ibid., 327–30. [63] Ibid., 330–1.

[64] D Akande, 'The Legal Nature of Security Council Referrals to the ICC and its Impact on Al-Bashir's Immunities' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 333. Tladi criticizes this on the basis that it does not explain why the Security Council thought it necessary to include a duty to cooperate on Sudan in Resolution 1593 (D Tladi, 'The ICC Decisions on Chad and Malawi: On Cooperation, Immunities and Article 98' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 199, 212); however, this probably imputes too much subtlety to a negotiated text coming from a political body like the Security Council.

[65] Ibid., 340–2.

[66] See C Stahn, 'Libya, The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: A Test for "Shared Responsibility" ' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 325, 331; Tladi (n 64) 201–4.

[67] Decision Pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-139, PTC I, ICC, 12 December 2011 ('Malawi Decision'); Décision Rendue en Application de l'Article 87-7 du Statut de Rome Concernant le Refus de la République du Tchad d'Accéder aux Demandes de Cooperation dé Livrées par la Cour Concernant l'Arrestation et la Remise d'Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-140, 13 December 2011.

the Chamber's view, Heads of State have no immunity before international courts.[68] They argued that owing to proceedings after the Second World War, prosecutions of Heads of State such as Slobodan Milošević and Charles Taylor, alongside the broad ratification of the Rome Statute, meant that custom had developed to the extent that there is no immunity in these circumstances,[69] and this includes cooperation.[70] With respect, the reasoning is rather thin, and the 'precedents' cited are not directly on point, as they are not about cooperation by domestic authorities, but about the question of immunity as a defence when someone is already before the relevant Court.[71] This is not to say that the Chamber was wrong in its result, but its 'working out' was flawed.

When the Court returned to the issue in 2014, in the context of the DRC's failure to arrest Al-Bashir, it changed tack somewhat.[72] Dropping the customary international law argument, the Chamber opined that:

> the DRC claims that by issuing the 26 February 2014 Decision the Court placed the DRC in a situation where it was called upon to act inconsistently with its international obligations arising from the decision of the African Union 'to respect the immunities that come with [Omar Al Bashir's] position of Head of State'…The Chamber does not consider that such inconsistency arises in the present case. This is so because by issuing Resolution 1593(2005) the SC decided that the 'Government of Sudan […] shall cooperate fully with and provide any necessary assistance to the Court and the Prosecutor pursuant to this resolution.' Since immunities attached to Omar Al Bashir are a procedural bar from prosecution before the Court, the cooperation envisaged in said resolution was meant to eliminate any impediment to the proceedings before the Court, including the lifting of immunities. Any other interpretation would render the SC decision requiring that Sudan 'cooperate fully' and 'provide any necessary assistance to the Court' senseless. Accordingly, the 'cooperation of that third State [Sudan] for the waiver of the immunity', as required under the last sentence of article 98(1) of the Statute, was already ensured by the language used in paragraph 2 of SC Resolution 1593(2005). By virtue of said paragraph, the SC implicitly waived the immunities granted to Omar Al Bashir under international law and attached to his position as a Head of State. Consequently, there also exists no impediment at the horizontal level between the DRC and Sudan as regards the execution of the 2009 and 2010 Requests.[73]

Turning to the DRC's asserted obligations to invoke Article 98(1) as a member of the AU, the Chamber responded that owing to Article 103 of the UN Charter, the implicit waiver contained in Resolution 1593 trumped any obligations the DRC had by virtue of its membership with the AU.[74] Whether this is considered convincing depends on whether it is thought that the nature of Resolution 1593 renders, pace Akande, Sudan essentially a party to the Rome Statute or whether it is necessary for the ICC

[68] Malawi Decision (n 67) para. 36. [69] Ibid., paras 37–43. [70] Ibid., para. 44.
[71] Tladi (n 64) 206.
[72] Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/056-01/09-195, PTC II, ICC, 9 April 2014.
[73] Ibid., paras 28–9. [74] Ibid., para. 31.

to ask Sudan to waive Al-Bashir's immunity. General principles, such as the duty not to evade treaty obligations[75] (here under the UN Charter) and the principle ex injuria jus non oritur,[76] militate in favour of the absence of immunity here. Analogously it could also be argued that Sudan is estopped from claiming immunity by the principle ex delicto non oritur actio.[77] The ICC has not, to date, adopted such an approach, although its assertive jurisprudence here is consistent with that of a Court which, in this circumstance, has compulsory, rather than optional, jurisdiction.[78]

11.3.2 Practical aspects of situations referred by the Security Council

The majority of the ICC's practice with respect to non-States Parties has related to the situations referred to it by the Security Council; hence these are the situations upon which we will concentrate. It must be noted, though, that the Security Council has, for the most part, referred the situations, then left the ICC to its own devices, leaving it high and dry when states are unwilling to cooperate.

11.3.2.1 Sudan

The early stages of the story of the relationship between the ICC and Sudan after the referral have been traced elsewhere.[79] Suffice it to say here that, in spite of sending the situation, the Security Council has proved unwilling to take firm action in the face of the Sudanese contempt for the Court. To all intents and purposes the ICC suffers from an absence of enforcement powers, especially in relation to non-States Parties to the Rome Statute.[80] However, where the Security Council has sent a situation to the Court, the Security Council is the relevant body that is meant to take action. As a result, the prosecutors, in their reports to the Council, have become increasingly strident in their statements, in an attempt to encourage (or perhaps shame) the Council into taking more forceful action. The early practice of the Council in responding to Sudanese non-cooperation was not promising, although the prosecutor was also rather coy about referring to that failure to help on behalf of the government of Sudan.[81] This began to change by the turn of the decade: in the Prosecutor's Eleventh Report in 2010 the Prosecutor noted the Mechanism established under Security Council 1591 for targeting sanctions, including asset freezing, against individuals 'who (…) commit violations of international humanitarian or human rights law or other atrocities'. Commenting, perhaps a little pointedly, that the Council had previously invoked that process in relation to ICTY indictees, the prosecutor asserted that:

[75] See B Cheng, General Principles of Law as Applied by International Courts and Tribunals (London: Stevens 1953) 123: 'International law prohibits the evasion of a treaty obligation under the guise of an alleged exercise of a right.'

[76] Ibid., 187. [77] Ibid., 155–8.

[78] On this see H Lauterpacht, The Development of International Law by the International Court of Justice (London: Stevens 1958) chapter 6.

[79] R Cryer, 'Darfur: Complementarity as the Drafters Intended?' in C Stahn and M El-Zeidy (eds), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 1091.

[80] See e.g. Schabas (35) 982–5. [81] See Sluiter (n 58) 872–3.

> [t]he failure to arrest Ahmad Harun and Ali Kushayb sends a signal that impunity will not only be tolerated, it will be encouraged. . . . The means to act are entirely within the UNSC's remit. The Prosecution would however urge the UNSC to focus first on individual measures in relation to Kushayb and Harun, in particular the identification and freezing of their assets. . . . the Council can take important measures, to ensure that Ahmad Harun and Ali Kushayb, both charged with crimes of sexual violence as war crimes and crimes against humanity, are subject to individual measures that will isolate them, ultimately ensure their arrest and surrender, and send the message to the victims in Darfur that the UN Security Council is protecting them.[82]

The request fell on deaf ears in the Council.

Perhaps emboldened by this, alongside the failure of the Council to respond to two notifications to the Security Council of failures to arrest him abroad in 2010,[83] in 2011 Al-Bashir visited Djibouti and was not arrested. This led to the Pre-Trial Chamber deciding to inform the Assembly of States Parties and the Security Council of Djibouti's failure to enforce the arrest warrant.[84] Again, this failed to elicit any response from the Council. This was taken up by the prosecutor in the Fifteenth Report to the Council. Where the prosecutor noted that the role of the Council could not be 'overstated', and that '[w]henever the Council, and the international community at large, have failed to integrate the peace and justice requirements, the government of the Sudan has rejected cooperation'.[85] On the basis of the fact that the government of Sudan had failed in its obligations to cooperate with the Court, the Prosecutor asserted that the obligation to ensure compliance with the arrest warrants fell on 'the collective community of States' and the Security Council.[86] The Council, yet again, did not step up to the proverbial plate.

Therefore, in its Seventeenth Report, the Prosecutor noted the importance of the Security Council and the ASP to the Rome Statute to deal with the issue of Sudanese non-cooperation 'in a concerted and united fashion', and called upon the Security Council to ensure Sudanese compliance with the ICC's arrest warrants.[87] Yet again, the Council's response could be characterized by rolling tumbleweed.

This proved too much for the prosecutor, who, after Al-Bashir's visits to Ethiopia and Saudi Arabia, and the 13 November Pre-Trial Chamber decisions on non-cooperation [82] Eleventh Report of the Prosecutor to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR Resolution 1593 (2005), 17 June 2010, paras 64–6 and 94.

[83] Decision informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's presence in the territory of the Republic of Kenya, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-107, PTC I, ICC, 27 August 2010; Decision informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute about Omar Al-Bashir's recent visit to the Republic of Chad, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-109, PTC I, ICC, 27 August 2010.

[84] Decision Informing the United Nations Security Council and the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute About Omar Al-Bashir's Recent Visit to Djibouti, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-129, PTC I, ICC, 12 May 2011.

[85] Fifteenth Report of the Prosecutor to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR Resolution 1593 (2005), 5 June 2012, para. 51.

[86] Ibid., para. 57.

[87] Seventeenth Report of the Prosecutor to the Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR Resolution 1593 (2005), 5 June 2013, paras 46 and 50.

with arrest warrants by (States Parties) the CAR and Chad, in her Eighteenth Report dropped, to a large extent, the diplomatic idiom with the Council. In the report she recalled the eight communications from the Court to the Council about Sudanese non-cooperation which had gone without response or action by the Council.[88] She continued:

> The Council's silence and inaction contributes to the Sudan's continued determination to ignore the Council. As the Pre-Trial Chamber has further stated, '[w]hen the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, refers a situation to the Court as constituting a threat to international peace and security, it is expected that the Council would respond by way of taking such measures which are considered appropriate, if there is an apparent failure on the part of the relevant State Party to the Statute to cooperate in fulfilling the Court's mandate entrusted to it by the Council. Otherwise, if there is no follow up action on the part of the Security Council, any referral by the Council to the ICC under Chapter VII would never achieve its ultimate goal, namely, to put an end to impunity. Accordingly, any such referral would become futile.'… Without stronger action by the Security Council and State Parties, the situation in the Sudan is unlikely to improve and the alleged perpetrators of serious crimes against the civilian population will not be brought to justice.[89]

Sadly, the Council, in spite of referring the situation to the ICC, has proved entirely unwilling to follow up that referral with action designed to deal with Sudanese contumacy. As the prosecutor has said, this sends a message that the Security Council is unwilling to ensure that its actions with respect to non-States Parties are followed up. Given that the ASP, or the ICC itself, has no enforcement powers, this renders the Court incapable of functioning effectively with respect to non-States Parties who need to be 'encouraged' (coerced) into cooperation.[90] Without the support of the Security Council, there is little the ICC can do. It is in the position of a First World War Officer who has gone 'over the top' only to find no one has followed, and who is therefore trapped in No Man's Land.

11.3.2.2 Libya

Unfortunately, the Sudanese situation is not unique. In February 2011 the Security Council, in Resolution 1970, decided to send the situation in Libya to the ICC.[91] In many ways, the resolution followed the precedent of Resolution 1593, refusing funding, granting immunity from the ICC's jurisdiction to peacekeepers, and imposing a duty to cooperate on Libya, but not other non-Party States. Unfortunately, in spite of the very quick (too quick for some)[92] action of the prosecutor in bringing arrest

[88] Eighteenth Report of the Prosecutor to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR Resolution 1593 (2005), 11 December 2013, paras 53–4.

[89] Ibid., paras 55 and 58.

[90] As the Court had said on various occasions, 'the ICC has no enforcement mechanism and thus relies on the States' cooperation, without which it cannot fulfil its mandate and contribute to ending impunity', see USA Decision (n 6) para. 12.

[91] See generally Stahn (n 66).

[92] See Bosco (n 33) 167–71, who notes that the Prosecutor here rather went against the wishes of the US and others.

warrants against, amongst others, Colonel Gaddafi, his son Saif, and his notorious head of security Abdullah Al-Senussi, there was little practical follow-up by the Council to support the prosecutor.

The closing of proceedings against Colonel Gaddafi in November 2011 after his death left proceedings against Saif Gaddafi and Al-Senussi. Libya has brought complementarity challenges in relation to both. It must be said that it is difficult to reconcile the decisions in relation to them. In relation to Gaddafi, the relevant Pre-Trial Chamber decided that, owing to the fact that such investigative steps that Libya had taken did not relate to the same case in the ICC's interpretation of that concept, and Gaddafi remained in Zintan, thus beyond the reach of the new authorities in Tripoli, who were unable to provide him with legal representation, his case was not barred by the principle of complementarity.[93] These findings were upheld, Judge Ušacka dissenting, by the Appeals Chamber in May 2014.[94] This was on the basis that the Chambers could not, on the basis of the evidence presented to them, determine the contours of the Libyan investigation,[95] and given this, it was unnecessary to determine willingness and ability.[96]

With regard to Al-Senussi, however, who is in the hands of the Tripoli authorities, the Pre-Trial Chamber determined that the Libyan authorities, in spite of the fact that owing to their security situation they could not provide him with counsel, were able to invoke complementarity to render the case inadmissible.[97] As Kevin Heller has said, the two cases are irreconcilable on point.[98] There are those who have suggested that the fact that Al-Senussi may have information that would be highly embarrassing to some of the ICC's biggest backers relating to links they had with the Gaddafi regime (the UK in particular) and the US may have affected the Chamber's willingness to countenance trial before the ICC itself.[99] Such claims must, of course, remain speculative, but the thin nature of the reasoning in the case on point does not help remove such suspicions that diplomatic concerns may trump legal ones.

It is also the case that even where the ICC has determined the case to be admissible (i.e. Saif Gaddafi), Libya has refused to transfer the defendant; indeed it has gone as far as to detain ICC staff who were sent to visit him to take instructions.[100] Perhaps [93] Gaddafi Decision on the Admissibility of the Case Against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01-344-Red, PTC I, ICC, 31 May 2013. See F Mégrét and M Samson, 'Holding the Line on Complementarity in Libya: The Case for Tolerating Flawed Domestic Trials' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 571.

[94] Gaddafi Judgment on the Appeal of Libya against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the admissibility of the case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01-547-Red, AC, ICC, 21 May 2014.

[95] Ibid., para. 86.

[96] Ibid., para. 213. Given the transitional nature of the Libyan situation, and her interpretation of the complementarity test, Judge Ušacka would have remitted the matter back to the Pre-Trial Chamber for rehearing.

[97] Gaddafi Decision on the admissibility of the case against Abdullah Al-Senussi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-466-Red, PTC I, ICC, 11 October 2013.

[98] K Heller, 'The PTC I's Inconsistent Approach to Complementarity and the Right to Counsel' (Opinio Juris, 12 October 2013) <http://opiniojuris.org/2013/10/12/ptc-inconsistent-approach-right-counsel/> accessed 11 September 2014.

[99] R Fisk, 'Is the Hague Making a Mockery of Justice so that the CIA and MI6 Can Save Face?', The Independent, 31 October 2013.

[100] Fourth Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), 7 November 2011, para. 9.

surprisingly, the prosecutor's reports have remained decidedly diplomatic about Libyan intransigence and abuse of ICC staff.[101] Indeed, the ICC apologised to Libya for the actions of those officials.[102] In spite of the continued failure of the Libyan authorities to transfer Gaddafi to the Court, the prosecutor has only gone so far as to say that when meeting Libyan officials, '[t]he Office took the opportunity of the January [2014] meeting to call on the Libyan representatives of the Government's obligation to immediately surrender Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi to the Court, and does so again here'.[103] Some suspect that the soft-pedalling has to do with the release of the ICC officials, although it may also be to do with the fact that the aggressive tone adopted (including before the Security Council) by the prosecutor in relation to Sudan has not borne fruit. Equally, the Security Council has been similarly silent in relation to Libyan obfuscation and failure to respond to ICC orders here. Given this, Libya has continued to proceed on its own course, ignoring the orders of the Court at will. The ICC is, again, left alone without enforcement authority with respect to a non-State Party, as the body that could take action, the Security Council, has chosen not to do so.

11.3.3 The ICC and P-1(?): the United States

As is well known, the United States was heavily involved in the run-up to, and negotiations of, the Rome Statute.[104] However, it was unhappy with the outcome of the negotiations, and voted against the Statute at the end of the Rome Conference. Its opposition was framed in legal terms, but these were, in reality, a reframing of political objections into legal form.[105] It has been suggested that the main issue was the role of the Security Council,[106] but this really was epiphenomenal. The real sticking point was the possibility that the ICC could exercise jurisdiction over US nationals;[107] the role of the Security Council was really raised as a means to an end for ensuring exemption for US nationals. Although the US signed the Rome Statute at the last moment

[101] See e.g. Fifth Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), 8 May 2012, paras 10–11.

[102] L Harding and J Borger, 'Libya Frees International Criminal Court Team Accused of Spying', The Guardian, 2 July 2013.

[103] Seventh Report of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court to the UN Security Council Pursuant to UNSCR 1970 (2011), 8 May 2014, para. 13

[104] See e.g. M Scharf, 'Getting Serious About an International Criminal Court' (1994) 6 Pace International Law Review 103; D Scheffer, 'The International Criminal Court: A Negotiator's Perspective' (2001) 167 Military Law Review 1; D Scheffer, All the Missing Souls (Princeton: Princeton University Press 2012) chapter 8. A more critical view can be found in M C Bassiouni, 'Negotiating the Treaty of Rome on the Establishment of the International Criminal Court' (1999) 32 Cornell International Law Review 443. A useful early set of essays is S Sewell and C Kaysen, The United States and the International Criminal Court (New York: Rowman and Littlefield 2000).

[105] D Forsythe, 'The United States and International Criminal Justice' (2002) 24 Human Rights Quarterly 974; J Ralph, Defending the Society of States: Why the US Opposes the International Criminal Court and its Vision of World Society (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2007).

[106] W Schabas, 'United States Hostility to the International Criminal Court: It's All About the Security Council' (2004) 15 European Journal of International Law 701.

[107] See e.g. B Broomhall, International Criminal Justice and the International Criminal Court: Between Sovereignty and the Rule of Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2003) 163–4.

(31 December 2000), this was to ensure its role in influencing the later PREPCOM rather than as a true commitment to the ICC.[108]

Even the signature was too much for the Bush administration, who withdrew from the PREPCOM and, in 2002, on the occasion of the 60th ratification of the Statute being received, (in)famously notified the Secretary General (the depository of the Rome Statute) that it did not intend to ratify the Statute and therefore had no obligations (including not to defeat its object and purpose).[109] It then took various measures, inter alia, in the Security Council, but also purportedly in pursuance of a policy of creating rights under Article 98(2) through bilateral treaties.[110] US hostility was hardly assuaged when one of the ICC's most vociferous critics, John Bolton,[111] came into the State department. However, in part owing to the good offices of France and the UK, the US was persuaded not to veto the referral of the situation in Darfur to the ICC in 2005.[112] US concerns were considerably assuaged, however, by the fact that the early practice of the ICC (in particular, the prosecutor) had been careful not to threaten US interests.[113] This led Court officials also not to 'quibble' too much about the (questionably legal) limitations in Resolution 1593 (in particular, about funding and exemption of non-Party peacekeepers), and to treat anything relating to the US with considerable discretion. Such activities led the US to quietly pass material to the prosecutor to assist with investigations.[114]

The diplomatic role of the Court (in particular, the prosecutor) was clear to those who were watching. Such a role is key with non-Party States if cooperation is to be forthcoming. Whether it is worth the price (not investigating situations where great power interests are at issue) is another question.[115] Nonetheless, it is beyond doubt that the ICC, whilst not always agreeing with US views, has discreetly sought them out as part of a (not always well-implemented) policy to engage the US and ensure its continued (admittedly somewhat limited) support during the second Bush administration (which notably did not include Bolton).[116]

With the change of administration to that of Barack Obama, and the introduction of officials more sympathetic to the ICC, relations with the Court improved further, in part owing to the continued silence of the prosecutor with respect to the Middle East and Afghanistan (where non-State Party nationals (especially US ones) had been accused of international crimes).[117] Such discretion fed into the decision of the US to actively support the referral of the situation in Libya to the ICC in Resolution 1970 (2010), representing an extraordinary step, and voting for such a referral has considerably limited the US's ability to criticize the Court, although the US has used its support to leverage its efforts to influence the prosecutor over the referral.[118] In addition, [108] Broomhall (n 107) 168–72. [109] Ibid., 178–81.

[110] On these see D McGoldrick, 'Political and Legal Responses to the International Criminal Court' in D McGoldrick et al. (eds), The Permanent International Criminal Court: Legal and Policy Issues (Oxford: Hart 2004) 389.

[111] See e.g. J Bolton, 'Risks and Weaknesses of the International Criminal Court from an American Perspective' (2000–1) 41 Virginia Journal of International Law 186.

[112] Bosco (n 33) 109–11. [113] Ibid., 112. [114] Ibid., 113–15.

[115] We will return to this, inter alia, in the context of Palestine.

[116] Bosco (n 33) 142–4 and 147.

[117] On contacts between the US and ICC on point see ibid., 161–2. On Afghanistan see ibid., 165.

[118] Ibid., 169–71.

the new prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda, has been fairly clear that she will continue the (unexpressed) policy of not threatening US interests.[119] This has, of course, not played as well in all constituencies, and has allowed critics of the Court (some of whom, it has to be said, are hardly impartial) to portray the Court as a tool of imperialist powers.[120]

An interesting issue here is that the prosecutor has actively sought to engage the US at a diplomatic level, whilst, at least seemingly, not doing the same with Russia and China. The reasons for this must remain speculative, but good candidates must include the fact that they are very unlikely to become parties to the Rome Statute, or cooperate with the Court in any meaningful fashion. There are limits to what diplomacy can do, and perhaps to engage to the extent to which those states could be induced to change their mind would be a compromise too far. That said, others could say the same about the role the ICC has adopted (and the compromises it has made) with respect to the US.

11.3.4 A Prosecutor's headache: Palestine

It is difficult to imagine a more controversial situation that could come across a prosecutor's desk than that in the Middle East, in particular Israel/Palestine. That conflict has caused considerable vexation for a number of domestic jurisdictions, Belgium and the UK to name but two.[121] Therefore, it is unlikely that the prosecutor particularly welcomed being dragged into the controversy in January 2009, when the Palestinian Authority submitted what is asserted to be an Article 12(3) acceptance of the ICC's jurisdiction, with specific reference to the Gaza Strip and Israel's deeply controversial 'Operation Cast Lead'.[122] Not only was this, naturally (given the tensions in the area), deeply controversial as a matter in itself, but it also raised the issue of Palestinian statehood.[123]

This is because, owing to the contested status of Palestine at the time, it was not clear whether or not Palestine was entitled to make such a declaration. Article 12(3) refers to states; therefore, whether or not he decided to open an investigation or not, to accept the declaration would have required the prosecutor to accept the statehood of Palestine. This would have had huge political effects, and the US had made it clear that it was hostile to such a move.[124] That said, to reject the declaration would reduce the legitimacy of the Court in the eyes of many states who supported Palestinian statehood. Either decision would have caused considerable political fallout. Not least it

[119] Ibid., 174–5.

[120] K Roth, 'Africa: The Attacks on the International Criminal Court' (2014) LXI(2) New York Review of Books 32, 34.

[121] See S Ratner, 'Belgium's War Crimes Statute: A Post-Mortem' (2003) 97 American Journal of International Law 888; S Williams, 'Arresting Developments? Restricting the Enforcement of the UK's Universal Jurisdiction Provisions' (2012) 75 Modern Law Review 368.

[122] For an early discussion see Y Ronen, 'ICC Jurisdiction over Acts Committed in the Gaza Strip: Article 12(3) of the ICC Statute and Non-State Entities' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 3.

[123] On which, see e.g. J Crawford, The Creation of States 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2006) 434–48.

[124] Bosco (n 33) 161–2.

would involve the Prosecutor asserting authority to determine statehood,[125] something that tends to be restricted to States; the UN, for example, does not claim such competence for itself. It is true that luminaries such as Alain Pellet have suggested that the Prosecutor (and the ICC) could take a narrower, functional approach to the Rome Statute and avoid the abstract question of Palestinian statehood, looking instead to whether the conditions in the Rome Statute for an Article 12(3) declaration were met.[126] However, even if this did not require statehood in the abstract (which it probably does), it might be questioned whether Palestine would reach this lower level even if such an approach were to be taken.[127] Either way, it would be naive to ignore the fact that an acceptance of the declaration by the Prosecutor would politically not be taken in such a nuanced fashion.

Authoritative voices have spoken both in favour of accepting and of rejecting the declaration, and in truth, the legal arguments were quite finely balanced.[128] The Prosecutor was being asked to determine the status of Schrödinger's cat, and would be damned if he went one way and damned if he went the other. Therefore, for a long time he simply did nothing. It took over three years, until April 2012, for the Prosecutor to issue the Solomonic judgment that it was for the political organs of the UN or the ICC's ASP to make the judgment on whether Palestine was a state, and therefore, as it stood, the prosecutor could not take the matter further.[129] This has been criticized as stymieing Palestinian attempts to engage with international law and being a pusillanimous deferral to the competence of the Security Council.[130] It is also possible, as a matter of law, that the Rome Statute does not permit 'reference out' of such issues.[131] Equally, the Prosecutor had been handed a political hot potato, so it is unsurprising that the outcome was satisfactory to few. The issue has also not gone away yet, since in November 2012, by General Assembly Resolution 67/19, Palestine was accepted as a 'non-member observer State'.[132] This probably cements Palestine's claim to statehood (at the very least it is recognition of that status by all states voting for the resolution). As such, Palestine is now entitled to make an Article 12(3) declaration.[133]

It is not hard to have some sympathy for the Prosecutor here, in that the ICC is unlikely to emerge from any engagement with the Israel/Palestine conflict unscathed, or perhaps even intact; the political fallout would be too large. What is interesting about the politics of this situation is that the prime movers (Palestine, Israel, and the US) are [125] Ronen (n 122) 22.

[126] A Pellet, 'The Palestinian Declaration and the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 981.

[127] Y Shany, 'In Defence of a Functional Approach to the Interpretation of Article 12(3) of the Rome Statute' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 329 (although Shany's piece is prior to Pellet's).

[128] See Pellet (in favour), and M Shaw, 'The Article 12(3) Declaration of the Palestinian Authority, the International Criminal Court and International Law' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 301 (against).

[129] Situation in Palestine, OTP, 2 April 2012.

[130] M Kearney and J Reynolds, 'Palestine and the Politics of International Criminal Justice' in Schabas (n 36) 407, especially 426–9.

[131] A Zimmermann, 'Palestine and the International Criminal Court Quo Vadis? Reach and Limits of Declarations under Article 12(3)' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 303, 305–6.

[132] The vote was 138-9-41. [133] Zimmermann (n 131) passim.

all non-Parties to the Rome Statute. As it stands, in spite of the fact that Palestine acceded to 20 human rights and humanitarian law treaties (including the 1949 Geneva Conventions),[134] it agreed not to invoke the ICC's jurisdiction over Palestinian territory during the US brokered talks. These came to an inconclusive close at the end of April 2014. Two days before this, the PLO central council included the Rome Statute as one of the treaties Palestine would seek to accede to in the future.[135] It filed its instrument of accession to the Rome Statute on 2 January 2015. The situation remains a Sword of Damocles for the Prosecutor, though.

11.3.5 Situations in other non-Party States

Insofar as when it comes to triggering the jurisdiction of the ICC over non-Party States this is the prerogative of the Security Council, it is subject to the vagaries of the politics of that body. Nowhere is this more obvious than in relation to the conflict in Syria. This conflict has been ongoing for over three years, and there have been in the vicinity of a quarter of a million deaths. There have also been credible allegations of the use of chemical weapons and threats of external military intervention by the US, the UK, and France, amongst others. Following years of calls from various NGOs,[136] and following intensive negotiations with the United States, who sought to ensure that any referring resolution excluded the Golan Heights, France, supported by 64 other countries (including the UK and the US), submitted a draft resolution to a Security Council vote in May 2014. With saddening inevitability, it was vetoed by Syria's two P5 allies, Russia and China.[137]

The Secretary-General's Representative was correct when he told the members of the Council prior to the vote that

> [f]or more than three years, this Council has been unable to agree on measures that could bring an end to this extraordinarily brutal war. It has been deeply damaging not only to millions of Syrian civilians, but also the entire region. If members of the Council continue to be unable to agree on a measure that could provide some accountability for the ongoing crimes, the credibility of this body and of the entire Organization will continue to suffer.[138]

However, in spite of Russia and China's rhetoric in favour of the inspiration behind the resolution, and the importance of P5 unity,[139] it was clear that geopolitical interests

[134] Unlike its attempted ratification in 1989, which did not lead to it being listed as a State Party, the ICRC now includes it as a State Party.

[135] For a negative view of this see E Kontorovich, 'Israel/Palestine—The ICC's Uncharted Territory' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 979; for a rebuttal see Y Ronen, 'Israel, Palestine and the ICC—Territory Uncharted but Not Unknown' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 7.

[136] See e.g. Amnesty International, 'UN Must Refer Syria to International Criminal Court', News Release, 26 April 2011.

[137] UNSC Draft Res (22 May 2014) UN Doc S/2014/348. See also UNSC Meeting 7180, UN Doc S/PV/7180.

[138] Ibid., UN Doc (S/PV/7180), 2 (Mr Eliasson).

[139] Ibid., 12 (Mr Churkin (Russia)) and 13–14 (Mr Wang Min (China)).

had intervened yet again in international criminal justice, further affecting its legitimacy and giving ammunition to its critics.

11.4 Conclusion

Whether states like it or not, the ICC is now a firmly established piece of international architecture. When it comes to non-Parties to the Rome Statute, they can no longer—if they ever could—simply ignore it. In large part that is owing to the (perhaps surprising) role that has been played by the Security Council. Few would have anticipated that in 1998 it would have taken such an active stance. Whether it will continue to do so, however, is a matter of conjecture, and the failure of the Council to refer the desperate situation in Syria to the Court, alongside the decidedly 'Cold War' tone of the discussions (not that such idioms were ever totally absent),[140] shows that the Court still lives in a world in which power politics is rife. Even where the Council has seen fit to refer situations, such as Sudan and Libya, geopolitics has not been far away, and the Council is not above using the Court for its own purposes, and then leaving it to its own devices when it needs support to fulfil its mandate. In the absence of some coercive powers being granted to the Court, or support by the Council, when it comes to non-States Parties it is reliant solely on goodwill, and that is often in short supply.

[140] See N White and R Cryer, 'The Security Council and the International Criminal Court: An Uneasy Relationship?' in M C Bassiouni et al. (eds), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court: Essays in Memory of Igor Blishchenko (The Hague: Brill 2008) 455, especially 476 ff.

12

The Frog that Wanted to Be an Ox

The ICC's Approach to Immunities and Cooperation

*Dov Jacobs

Self-conceit may lead to self-destruction

From Aesop's Fable The Frog and the Ox

12.1 Introduction

International law is often seen as being in flux between two logics that challenge each other. One focuses on the sovereignty of states, while the other focuses on human rights. While this view of the international legal order is to a certain extent simplistic in the way it pitches against each other in a rather Manichean way two world views, this dichotomy between human rights and sovereignty can be useful if only to explain and understand the narratives at play at the international level from a discursive point of view. Indeed, this dichotomy shapes our comprehension of the dynamics of international law and taints any discussion about its evolution.

These two logics coexist in the international legal order in ways that are far from smooth. The issue of immunity is a typical example of where these two logics clash. On the one hand, there is the traditional respect for the foreign immunity of Heads of State. On the other hand, there is the increasingly common idea that the respect of the rights of victims of gross human rights violations should trump any claim to sovereign immunity, in order to promote the 'fight against impunity'. This battle of logics has been fought in a number of judicial fora over the past decades, whether at the domestic level, as illustrated by the Pinochet cases,[1] or at the international level, most notably at the ICJ, which rendered two major judgments on the issue over ten years.[2]

Another battleground for this issue has been international criminal tribunals which have been set up since the beginning of the 1990s to prosecute those responsible for

* Grotius Centre for International Legal Studies, Leiden University. The author would like to thank Carsten Stahn, Joe Powderly, and Yannick Radi, as well as a number of people who I am sure prefer to remain anonymous, but who will recognise themselves for valuable insights into this discussion. All errors, of course, remain my own.

[1] On this, see N Roht-Arriaza, 'The Multiple Prosecutions of Augusto Pinochet' in E Lutz and C Reiger (eds), Prosecuting Heads of State (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 77–94.

[2] Arrest Warrant of 1 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v Belgium), Judgment of 14 February 2002, [2002] ICJ Reports 3 ('Arrest Warrant case'); Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v Italy: Greece intervening), Judgment of 3 February 2012, [2012] ICJ Reports 99.

international crimes in a number of situations.[3] These tribunals have also on occasion been led to discuss the issue of immunity from prosecution in the context of international crimes.[4]

This chapter focuses on one narrow aspect of this general discussion on immunities and international criminal law: whether, in the context of the ICC, immunities can be an obstacle to the cooperation of states with the Court, notably in terms of arrest and surrender of suspects. In this sense, it should be noted that this chapter is at the intersection of two mostly separate questions, namely that of immunities and that of state cooperation with the ICC, and it is mainly this intersection that will be explored here, rather than the whole body of law applicable to these two areas.[5]

It should also be noted that this chapter will focus on the more problematic case of where the person being prosecuted is a national of a non-State Party. This choice is made because the situation where two States Parties are involved is quite uncontroversial. Indeed, it is generally accepted that when a state joins the ICC, it accepts that its nationals will be subject to prosecution by the Court, irrespective of official capacity as provided for in Article 27 of the Rome Statute. As a result, there seems to be agreement that a State Party could not oppose any immunity to the arrest and surrender of one of its nationals under Article 98.[6]

With this in mind, after briefly mapping the different interactions between cooperation and immunity (section 12.2), this chapter will address the preliminary question of whether the ICC can in fact exercise jurisdiction against a national of a non-State Party that might benefit from immunity under international law (section 12.3), before actually moving to the heart of the discussion and considering duties to cooperate with the ICC in such a scenario (section 12.4).

12.2 Mapping the Interaction between Immunities and Cooperation in the Rome Statute

12.2.1 The applicable law

The most relevant articles for the purposes of our discussions are Articles 27 and 98 of the Rome Statute.[7]

Article 27 relates to the 'irrelevance of official capacity' and provides that:

[3] W Burke-White, 'A Community of Courts: Toward a System of International Criminal Law Enforcement' (2002–3) 24 Michigan Journal of International Law 1.

[4] M Kelly, Nowhere to Hide: Defeat of the Sovereign Immunity Defense for Crimes of Genocide and the Trials of Slobodan Milošević and Saddam Hussein (New York: Peter Lang Publishing Inc. 2005).

[5] On the general question of the relationship of the ICC to non-States Parties, see Cryer, Chapter 11, this volume.

[6] For a comprehensive discussion of this issue see, D Akande, 'International Law Immunities and the International Criminal Court' (2004) 98 American Journal of International 407, 422–6. See also W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 1040.

[7] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('ICC Statute').

1. This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.
2. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person.

It should be noted that the two paragraphs of Article 27, although conceptually linked, touch upon two very different questions. The first paragraph refers to the fundamental issue of whether there can even be criminal responsibility for a person acting in an official capacity. The second paragraph relates more specifically to the question of whether, even if theoretical criminal responsibility attaches to a person acting in his/her official capacity, immunities might be an obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction against that person.

The distinction between these two ideas has one major consequence: it means that recognizing the first, while a prerequisite for recognizing the second, does not necessarily and logically entail the second. Indeed, it should be noted that there is no conceptual obstacle to recognizing that a person may have criminal responsibility in relation to conduct performed in an official capacity, but to say that some procedural bars, such as immunities, can prevent certain courts from actually exercising jurisdiction to determine the scope of that criminal responsibility.

This claim needs to be qualified depending on whether we are talking about functional or personal immunity, the former being more problematic than the latter. Indeed, functional immunity, when read traditionally, does entail to some degree an absolute bar from prosecution for acts performed in an official capacity, even after the person leaves office. This means that functional immunity can be deemed to be more than a procedural bar to the exercise of jurisdiction and in fact, constitutes the actual removal of criminal responsibility from the person being targeted. As both are covered by the ICC Statute, however, no issue in that respect need arise in the practice of the Court.

Moving on to the second relevant provision for the purposes of our discussion, Article 98(1) provides that:

> The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity.

The main point to be noted about this provision is that it does not list the possible obligations under international law in relation to immunity that might be an obstacle to a cooperation request. In other words, such obligations, if they exist, need to be found outside the Statute by studying the content of customary international law; for example, or specific treaty provisions that might be in place between the requesting state and the state of origin of the person whose arrest and surrender is being sought. As a consequence, this requires the Court to enter into a discussion of general international law that can sometimes be problematic and complex, as will be seen in the following developments.

A second point relates to the procedure to be followed. First, the wording of Article 98 makes the obligation of verifying possible conflicting international law obligations relating to immunities incumbent on the Court itself. It is for the Court, before issuing the request for cooperation, to establish whether an obstacle may exist to a request for cooperation, and it is for the Court to try to obtain the waiver of immunity from the third state.

Second, in light of this and other provisions of the Statute, it is doubtful whether the Court can issue general requests for cooperation not targeted towards a specific state in a specific circumstance.[8] Indeed, no provision of the Statute provides for a general and automatic duty to cooperate as a consequence of the issuance of an arrest warrant. Moreover, the Rome Statute lays down the conditions for a request for cooperation in the following way: 'The Court may transmit a request for the arrest and surrender of a person, together with the material supporting the request outlined in article 91, to any State on the territory of which that person may be found and shall request the cooperation of that State in the arrest and surrender of such a person.'[9] The wording of this provision, in its plain reading, implies that a request for cooperation has to be addressed to the state on the territory of which the person may be found. This reading of the Statute is in line with the wording of the Statute in relation to immunities under Article 98. Indeed, unless the judges consider that there is generally no immunity under international law for prosecution before the ICC,[10] how can the Court satisfy its obligation to verify if immunities apply in a particular situation before proceeding with a request to surrender, if it sends out a general request for cooperation to all States Parties to the ICC?

12.2.2 Methodological mapping of the interaction between immunities and cooperation

With the applicable law in mind, it is now necessary to consider how it applies where questions of immunity arise in relation to cooperation requests when it concerns a national of a non-State Party.

It should be recalled that there are three ways in which this situation may arise. First, and this is the most often discussed case, is when the UNSC refers a situation to the Court in application of Article 13(b) of the Rome Statute. Indeed, according to the Statute, in case of a Security Council referral, neither of the alternative preconditions for the exercise of jurisdiction (territoriality and nationality) is applicable.[11] Second, even in the case of a proprio motu decision to open an investigation by the prosecutor[12]

[8] D Jacobs, 'Is Chad Really under an Obligation to Arrest Bashir?' (Spreading the Jam, 21 July 2010) <http://dovjacobs.com/2010/07/21/is-chad-really-under-an-obligation-to-arrest-bashir/> accessed 25 August 2014.

[9] Art 89(1) ICC Statute (emphasis added).

[10] See infra, section 12.3.

[11] Art 12(2) ICC Statute.

[12] Art 13(c) ICC Statute.

or a referral by a State Party,[13] nationals of a non-State Party might be involved if the crimes were committed on the territory of a State Party. Finally, as a sub-category of the previous one, there is the particular case of states that have not joined the Rome Statute, but have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court by lodging a 12(3) declaration.[14] It now remains to be seen if these situations imply a different legal analysis.

Before entering into this casuistic analysis, it is useful to give a general idea of how this issue is approached. Indeed, a survey of both the literature and the case law shows that there are different ways of answering the question, which rely on different possible relevant criteria which can be distinguished, even if they might sometimes partially overlap. As will be discussed in more detail in the remainder of the chapter, the four main criteria are the following.

The first criterion relates to the quality of the states involved. This means that a different answer might be given to the question, depending on whether the requested state is a State Party to the Rome Statute or not, based on the application of the traditional principle of international law that a treaty can only bind the states that have signed and ratified it.

The second criterion relates to the manner in which the ICC has acquired jurisdiction. According to this approach, a distinction can be drawn between state referrals and proprio motu investigations on the one hand, and UNSC referrals on the other. The latter would be considered differently because of the Chapter VII authority that backs them up.

The third criterion, related to the previous two, is more generally the source of the obligation to cooperate. According to this criterion, it might make a difference to determine whether the duty to cooperate arises solely from the Rome Statute, or from an outside source, be it the Charter of the United Nations (UN Charter), customary international law, or human rights/international criminal law treaties, such as the Genocide Convention.

Finally, the fourth criterion relates to the actual content of international law in relation to official capacity. According to this criterion, the obligations to cooperate would depend on what general international law, and more particularly customary international law, has to say on the continuing relevance of immunities in the context of the prosecution of international crimes, both domestically and before international criminal tribunals.

It should be noted that giving preference to a particular criterion has the consequence that the answer to our question will be more or less unitary. For example, if the starting point is the general discussion of international law on head of state immunities, then this might apply across the board to all states, irrespective of their quality of State Party to the Rome Statute. The same holds true if an obligation to cooperate is read into a UNSC Resolution, applicable to all countries. On the other hand, if the starting point is more specifically the Rome Statute itself, then this might lead to differentiated answers depending on whether the state is a party to the treaty or not.

[13] Art 13(a) ICC Statute.

[14] More on this, see El Zeidy, Chapter 8, this volume.

With this methodological map in mind, the remainder of the chapter will address two related but separate questions: whether the ICC can in fact exercise jurisdiction over a national of a non-State Party (section 12.3) and whether this eventually entails a duty to cooperate in the arrest and surrender of that person (section 12.4).

12.3 Preliminary Question: Can the ICC Actually Exercise Jurisdiction in the First Place?

This question is important. Indeed, while there is no necessary link between the absence of recognition of official capacity under Article 27 and the recognition of official capacity under Article 98, in the sense that a person can see his official capacity denied before the Court while still benefiting from immunity from arrest and surrender by a state, the reverse is obviously not true. If the ICC is going to ask a state to arrest and surrender a national of a non-State Party, it must first be determined that the Court will actually be able to exercise jurisdiction against that individual.

An additional reason this preliminary issue is important is that, in practice, as will be seen later, a number of decisions have confused the two questions, in that discussing the jurisdictional question is in fact already paving the way for discussing the cooperation question.

There are three possible approaches to answering this question: reference to customary international law (section 12.3.1), reference to Security Council powers under Chapter VII of the UN Charter (section 12.3.2), and a textual analysis of Article 27 as simply binding on judges (section 12.3.3).

12.3.1 Reference to customary international law

As mentioned previously, the first possible justification is to go to customary international law and determine whether there might be a rule removing immunities from prosecution before an international tribunal. Establishing this would allow the Court to exercise jurisdiction against a national of a non-State Party because the latter, even if not bound by the Rome Statute, would still be bound by the customary law norm that Article 27 would merely be repeating.[15]

This issue was dealt with by the ICC in relation to the execution of the arrest warrant against President Omar Al-Bashir of Sudan in the context of his visits to a certain number of States Parties to the ICC.

In a December 2011 decision, a Pre-Trial Chamber decided to approach this question through the perspective of general international law, assessing 'whether, under international law, either former or sitting Heads of States enjoy immunity in respect of proceedings before international courts'[16]. In order to determine this, the Pre-Trial

[15] P Gaeta, 'Does President Al Bashir Enjoy Immunity From Arrest?' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 315, 324–5.

[16] Corrigendum to Decision Pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-139-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 12 December 2011, para. 22 ('Malawi Decision').

Chamber considered a certain number of examples, dating back to the First World War, where it was claimed that the official position of an individual cannot remove his criminal responsibility or provide him with immunity from prosecution. The problem with these examples is that they in fact confuse two distinct questions: (i) whether immunities can be a bar to the Court exercising jurisdiction; and (ii) whether official capacity can remove a person's criminal responsibility. As discussed previously,[17] Article 27 of the Rome Statute covers and distinguishes both issues, the criminal responsibility issue being dealt with under Article 27(1) and the jurisdictional issue being dealt with under Article 27(2). In the current case, there is no debate about the fact that criminal responsibility might attach to an individual irrespective of his or her official capacity. Only the jurisdictional question is at stake here. As a consequence, most of the examples put forward by the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Malawi Decision are in fact irrelevant to the ongoing debate, as they principally relate to the defence of official capacity.[18]

As a result, the only example that remains relevant in the Pre-Trial Chamber's argumentation is that of the Arrest Warrant case at the ICJ. In that case, the ICJ, while reaffirming that personal immunities remained in operation in the context of domestic prosecutions, famously claimed that:

> Fourthly, an incumbent or former Minister for Foreign Affairs may be subject to criminal proceedings before certain international criminal courts, where they have jurisdiction. Examples include the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, established pursuant to Security Council Resolutions under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, and the future International Criminal Court created by the 1998 Rome Convention. The latter's Statute expressly provides, in article 27, paragraph 2, that 'immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person'.[19]

This single paragraph of the judgment has produced a lot of discussion. A number of commentators consider that this paragraph provides a general normative assessment on the fact that immunities cannot be invoked before international tribunals.[20]

However, 'the view that international law immunities may never be pleaded in proceedings instituted before international courts and tribunals oversimplifies the matter'[21] and there are a number of reasons to qualify this claim.

[17] Supra, section 12.2.1.

[18] D Jacobs, 'A Sad Homage to Antonio Cassese: The ICC's Confused Pronouncements on State Compliance and Head of State Immunity' (Spreading the Jam, 15 December 2011) <http://dovjacobs.com/2011/12/15/a-sad-hommage-to-antonio-cassese-the-iccs-confused-pronouncements-on-state-compliance-and-head-of-state-immunity/> accessed 25 August 2014.

[19] Arrest Warrant case (n 2) para. 61.

[20] See e.g Amnesty International, 'Bringing Power to Justice: Absence of Immunity for Heads of State before the International Criminal Court' (2010) 24; Gaeta, 'Does President Al Bashir Enjoy Immunity From Arrest?' (n 15) 322; W Schabas, 'The Special Tribunal for Lebanon: Is a "Tribunal of an International Character" Equivalent to an "International Criminal Court"?' (2008) 21 Leiden Journal of International Law 513, 513–14.

[21] Akande, 'International Law Immunities and the International Criminal Court' (n 6) 416.

First, it should be recalled that this paragraph of the judgment is entirely obiter. Indeed, the issue was not relevant to resolving the legal question that was before the ICJ at the time, and it is essentially there as part of the judges' attempt to show that they were not advocating total impunity for alleged perpetrators of international crimes by recognizing their procedural immunity from prosecution.[22]

Second, the ICJ makes no attempt to distinguish between the different legal bases for the various examples of international courts that it gives. However, it makes a difference how the tribunal is created. If it is created by a UNSC Resolution under Chapter VII of the UN Charter (as in the case of the ICTY and ICTR), one could reasonably make the argument that the removal of immunities included in the Statute might be binding on all states. On the other hand, if the tribunal is created by treaty (such as the SCSL and the ICC), one cannot just assume that the rules on the relative effect of treaties are not operational simply because we are dealing with international crimes and that a non-Party State would not be able to invoke immunities. As a result of this, before claiming that immunities are inoperative before a specific international tribunal, it must first be established '1) that the instruments creating those tribunals expressly or implicitly remove the relevant immunity and 2) that the state of the official concerned is bound by the instrument removing the immunity'[23]. In other words, and coming back to the statement made by the ICJ, it can reasonably be claimed that rather than making a normative assessment on the content of international law on the issue, the judges were merely providing factual examples where international courts have removed immunities as a bar for exercising jurisdiction. This interpretation in fact finds support in the careful phrasing of the first sentence of the discussed paragraph, which mentions 'certain international criminal courts, where they have jurisdiction'. This language is certainly not indicative of an intention to make a broad normative claim on the customary law framework applicable to immunities before international criminal courts generally.

Finally, it should be noted that the ICJ gives no indication of what would constitute an 'international criminal court' before which immunities could not be invoked as a general rule. Surely, two states which individually could not prosecute a foreign head of state should not be able to circumvent this simply by signing a treaty setting up an 'international criminal court'.[24] One would therefore arguably need something else to make a court truly international for the purposes of applying this alleged customary law removal of immunities. The SCSL attempted to answer this question. In the Taylor case, the Appeals Chamber reasoned in the following way:

> It is to be observed that in carrying out its duties under its responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Security Council acts on behalf of the members of the United Nations. The Agreement between the United Nations and Sierra Leone is thus an agreement between all members of the United Nations and Sierra Leone. This fact makes the Agreement an expression of the will of the [22] Arrest Warrant case (n 2) para. 60.

[23] Akande, 'International Law Immunities and the International Criminal Court' (n 6) 418.
[24] Ibid., 417–18.

> international community. The Special Court established in such circumstances is truly international.[25]

This reasoning does not seem to rest on a particularly strong legal basis. Indeed, it is difficult to understand how the political support of the UNSC, without a concrete legal action as a consequence (such as the use of Chapter VII powers to create a tribunal), could have an effect on the legal nature of the SCSL. Moreover, 'this approach to the impact of the Council's involvement is inconsistent with the law of international organisations, and the recognition that such organisations, in particular the United Nations, have separate legal personalities'.[26] In general, it therefore seems difficult to determine what a 'truly international tribunal' might be, to the extent that its founding treaty would bind states not party to it.

In sum, if, despite the uncertain legal reasoning surrounding it, the argument relating to the content of customary international law is accepted, this would mean that, irrespective of the way the case was acquired, the ICC would indeed have jurisdiction over nationals of non-States Parties.

On the other hand, should this argument be rejected, the standard position would be that, in principle, Article 27 would not apply to non-State Party nationals. It would appear that the more recent case law of the ICC has moved in that direction and away from the Malawi Decision discussed previously. Indeed, in an April 2014 Decision relating to the visit of Al-Bashir to the DRC, a Pre-Trial Chamber has considered the following:

> Given that the Statute is a multilateral treaty governed by the rules set out in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, the Statute cannot impose obligations on third States without their consent. Thus, the exception to the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction provided in article 27(2) of the Statute should, in principle, be confined to those States Parties who have accepted it.[27]

It remains to be seen whether referrals made by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the UN Charter fall within the same logic.

12.3.2 Removal of immunity through UNSC referral

The second way in which the immunity of a non-State Party national might be removed is related to the specific circumstance of a Security Council referral, which was discussed in the April 2014 DRC Decision.

The uncertain minefield of unclear and unconvincing legal precedent referred to in the Malawi Decision probably explains why the DRC Decision did not venture into [25] Judgment, Taylor, SCSL-03-01-A, AC, SCSL, 26 September 2013, paras 38–9.

[26] S Williams, Hybrid and Internationalised Criminal Tribunals: Selected Jurisdictional Issues (Oxford: Hart 2012) 276.

[27] Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al-Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/056-01/09-195, PTC II, ICC, 9 April 2014, para. 26 ('DRC Decision').

such territory. As mentioned previously, without even discussing the previous Malawi Decision,[28] it simply found that Article 27(2) could not apply to a non-State Party.[29]

As a result of this finding, the Chamber had to identify a reason for which in this particular case immunities would not apply, despite Sudan not being a State Party to the ICC. At this point, the reasoning of the Chamber is not entirely clear. Indeed, for some reason the judges seem to shift the discussion to Article 98(1) of the Statute[30] and go on to claim that the fact that the situation was referred to the Court acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter means that 'since immunities attached to Omar Al-Bashir are a procedural bar from prosecution before the Court, the cooperation envisaged in [the UNSC] Resolution was meant to eliminate any impediment to the proceedings before the Court, including the lifting of immunities'[31]. The Chamber then concludes that 'the SC implicitly waived the immunities granted to Omar Al-Bashir under international law and attached to his position as a Head of State'.[32] While the reference to Article 98(1) is slightly confusing, because the Chamber was still discussing the application of Article 27(2) of the Statute, it is reasonable to assume that the Pre-Trial Chamber is claiming that the UNSC, acting under Chapter VII, has removed Al-Bashir's immunity as a bar to the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court.

The reasoning of the Chamber is not entirely convincing. First, it raises the question of whether the UNSC can implicitly remove the immunity of a head of state that would normally be recognized under the normal application of international law.[33]

Second, and more importantly, doubts can be raised on the whole UNSC referral mechanism and, as a result, on all possible legal consequences that might flow from it. Indeed, those who argue for the power of the Security Council to remove immunity rely on the fact that states are bound by UNSC Resolutions under Chapter VII. However, this oversimplifies things, because it puts to the side the fact that these circumstances only arise because a situation has been referred to the ICC, not in application of the UN Charter, but in application of the Rome Statute. The question therefore remains whether states which could not independently, and arguably together, remove obstacles to the exercise of jurisdiction, such as immunities, can 'outsource' a power they do not have to an outside organ. Indeed, technically, the UNSC is not bound by the Rome Statute and it is not in the power of a group of states to grant the UNSC, in a separate legal instrument from the UN Charter, a power that it does not have under the UN Charter. As a result, the way that the way of ICC obtained the situations of Libya and Darfur, Sudan is ultimately the Rome Statute itself, which cannot simply import the coercive powers of the UNSC in its internal framework and then claim to make it apply to all states. Consequently, from a legal perspective, states cannot any

[28] Which has led to criticism of this unexplained change of heart at the ICC: P Gaeta, 'The ICC Changes its Mind on the Immunity from Arrest of President Al Bashir, But It Is Wrong Again' (Opinio Juris, 23 April 2014) <http://opiniojuris.org/2014/04/23/guest-post-icc-changes-mind-immunity-arrest-president-al-bashir-wrong/> accessed 25 August 2014.

[29] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 26.

[30] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 27.

[31] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 29.

[32] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 29.

[33] A de Hoogh and A Knottnerus, 'ICC Issues New Decision on Al-Bashir's Immunities—But Gets the Law Wrong… Again' (EJIL Talk!, 18 April 2014) <http://www.ejiltalk.org/icc-issues-new-decision-on-al-bashirs-immunities-%E2%80%92-but-gets-the-law-wrong-again/#more-10712> accessed 25 August 2014.

more bypass immunities under international law by referring to the UNSC in the Rome Statute than if they had granted the Queen of England, the head of FIFA, or myself the power to refer a situation to the Court.

It should be pointed out that these challenges can equally be raised in relation to the argument that takes the effect of a Security Council Resolution to the next level, by claiming that it essentially makes the state concerned akin to a party to the Rome Statute, making Article 27(2) binding on it, as well as all provisions on cooperation.[34]

In sum, even UNSC involvement, despite the vast powers afforded to it under the UN Charter, does not entirely remove the question of the relative effect of treaties and its non-application to states not party to the Rome Statute.[35]

However, if the solution of the DRC Decision is adopted, then it appears that there would be a distinction to be made in relation to the exercise of jurisdiction depending on whether the situation is referred by the UNSC or not. It remains to be seen whether there is an argument to be made for a unitary application of Article 27, irrespective of whether the state is a party to the Statute and of how the situation was acquired by the Court.

12.3.3 The case for just applying Article 27(2) of the Rome Statute

At the end of the day, the simplest way of dealing with this question is to consider that Article 27 of the Rome Statute does not distinguish between nationals of States Parties and nationals of non-States Parties. Moreover, judges are tasked with applying the Statute.[36] As a result of this, judges would simply be statutorily bound to take into account Article 27(2) of the Statute and ignore any immunity that might be an obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction.

This approach is consistent with current practice of the Court. Indeed, Chambers are reluctant to go beyond the literal meaning of the text of the Rome Statute and refer to others sources of law for the purposes of interpretation.[37] More specifically in relation to immunities, this is essentially what Pre-Trial Chamber I did, in an arguably somewhat careless way, in its March 2009 Decision on the issuance of an arrest

[34] D Akande, 'The Legal Nature of Security Council Referrals to the ICC and its Impact on Al-Bashir's Immunities' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 333.

[35] For a different reading of the UNSC referral mechanism, see Rastan, Chapter 7, this volume, text corresponding to footnote 75. Rastan claims that the Rome Statute does not in fact give any power to the UNSC to refer a case as such, because this power is already in the possession of the UNSC. The Rome Statute only provides the tools for the ICC to function in case of such referral. While this solution is elegant and arguably less problematic from a legal point of view, it still faces a number of difficulties. First, this is not how the Rome Statute is drafted. Indeed, it seems to grant a 'power' to refer a situation in the same terms as it does for states. Second, even if one accepts this reading of the Statute, one can wonder if the power of the UNSC to create an ad hoc tribunal really implies that it can refer any case or situation to any international criminal tribunal that might be created as a separate international organization. These institutions exist outside the UN Charter framework and there is no automatic reason to believe that they can just be 'used' by the UNSC in application of their Chapter VII powers. Finally, things are not as clear-cut as presented by Rastan, to the extent that if the Rome Statute is merely acknowledging the power of the UNSC, then it should not be able to question the scope of the referral in terms, for example, of personal scope. The fact is that the Rome Statute does claim to grant a limited power of referral to the UNSC and that it can evaluate its use.

[36] Art 21 ICC Statute.

[37] See Powderly, Chapter 19, this volume.

warrant against Al-Bashir. It considered the content of the text of Article 27,[38] before considering that no further source of law needed to be referred to in application of Article 21 of the Statute.[39] In other words, Article 27 is clear and the judges are bound to apply it.[40]

This reasoning has been criticized because it allegedly fails to take into account the treaty nature of Article 27, which cannot therefore as such be extended to non-States Parties without further discussion of customary international law.[41] I believe this challenge ignores both the actual phrasing of Article 27 and the function of ICC judges. First, it should be noted that Article 27 is not technically addressed to states. It states what constitutes an obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction, and in this sense, one could say that the debate has been wrongly framed as an issue of whether Sudan is 'bound' by Article 27 or not. That is not in fact the question. Which leads to the misunderstanding on the role of judges. They should be considered as the 'domestic' judges of the Rome Statute framework and have no discretion to ignore the content of this Statute, in our case the clear language of Article 27. It is another issue altogether to ask whether, by applying Article 27(2), the bench would in fact lead the ICC, as an international organization, to commit an internationally wrongful act against Sudan as a non-State Party. This may very well be the case, but it is certainly not the judges' function to address the problem. Just as a national judge might in the application of domestic legislation lead to a violation of its state's international obligations, an ICC judge might be compelled to do the same in application of the Rome Statute. Should this happen, the forum to solve this is however not an ICC chamber, but at the purely international level in the triggering by the non-State Party of the international responsibility of the ICC as an international organization.

In sum, this approach would mean that the ICC could exercise jurisdiction against non-State Party nationals, irrespective of the way in which the case has been brought before the Court, be it a Security Council referral, a state referral, or through the exercise of proprio motu powers by the prosecutor.

12.4 Is There an Obligation to Cooperate with the ICC?

Assuming that, for one or more reasons addressed previously, the Court can exercise jurisdiction in relation to officials of non-States Parties, it must now be determined whether there is an obligation for states to cooperate with the Court in arresting and surrendering such officials to the ICC.

[38] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, para. 43.

[39] Ibid., para. 44.

[40] The judges also referred to the general object and purpose of the Statute to fight impunity, which in itself is not conclusive as an argument, and to the fact that the situation had been referred to the ICC by the UNSC, which is not a convincing argument without further explanation (see infra, section 12.3.2).

[41] Gaeta, 'Does President Al Bashir Enjoy Immunity From Arrest?' (n 15) 323.

12.4.1 An obligation to cooperate as a consequence of the application of Article 27?

Before going into some discussion of the possible basis for removing immunities under Article 98(1), a small methodological point needs to be made. Having established that for some reason (customary law, UNSC referral) Article 27 of the Rome Statute applies to a non-State Party, it might seem easy and evident to deduce that such irrelevance of official capacity under Article 27 automatically removes all immunity-type obstacles under Article 98. The most obvious example of this logic can be found in the DRC Decision, where the Court seamlessly moves from a discussion of Article 27(2) to conclude that '[c]onsequently, there also exists no impediment at the horizontal level between the DRC and Sudan as regards the execution of the 2009 and 2010 Requests'.[42]

This reasoning is, however, not self-evident. Indeed, even if one follows the Chambers in removing immunity as a bar to prosecution before the Court, this only concerns the relationship between the ICC and the third state. Article 98, on the other hand, has a completely different scope of application and concerns the relationship between the requested state and the third state. In this sense, while the ICC might very well have jurisdiction over nationals of a non-State Party who would normally benefit from immunity under international law, this does not mean that Article 98 might not prevent the arrest and surrender of that person. If not, there would in fact be no point in the drafters including Article 98 in the Statute at all.[43] As a result, it cannot be that the application of Article 27 automatically removes any immunity that might be claimed in the context of Article 98 and additional justifications need to be put forward.

To be clear, it is not argued here that the reasoning underlying the application of Article 27 to nationals of non-States Parties cannot be of some benefit to argue for the removal of immunity under Article 98. What is argued is that the applicability of Article 27 does not necessarily or logically imply the removal of immunity claims under Article 98.

12.4.2 Finding an independent basis for the removal of immunity under Article 98

It follows from the previous point that there needs to be an additional step in the reasoning in order to justify removal of immunity under Article 98. In that respect, it needs to be seen whether the reasons that can be invoked to apply Article 27 to nationals of non-States Parties can also be referred to in relation to Article 98.

12.4.2.1 Removal of immunity under customary international law

As concerns the customary international law argument, it has to be determined whether there exists a rule that removes immunities as an obstacle to the arrest of a person for the purposes of surrender to an international criminal tribunal.

[42] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 29 (emphasis added).

[43] For a somewhat different view on this, see J Iverson, 'The Continuing Functions of Article 98 of the Rome Statute' (2012) 4 Goettingen Journal of International Law 131.

This is what the Pre-Trial Chamber attempted to do, somewhat carelessly, in the Malawi Decision. In effect, the Pre-Trial Chamber relies on the same reasoning that would justify the application of Article 27 to conclude that:

> The Chamber considers that the international community's commitment to rejecting immunity in circumstances where international courts seek arrest for international crimes has reached a critical mass. If it ever was appropriate to say so, it is certainly no longer appropriate to say that customary international law immunity applies in the present context.[44]

By reasoning in this way, the Chamber essentially continues to confuse the different scopes of application of Article 27 and Article 98, the former relating to the relationship between the Court and states and the second relating to the horizontal relationship between states. Moreover, the Pre-Trial Chamber adopts a somewhat unconvincing approach to customary law, which has led some to consider that:

> [t]here has already been significant criticism on how in international criminal justice customary international law sometimes tends to fall out of the sky and comes into existence by just a few strikes on the word processing software. . . . There is no serious analysis of state practice and opinio iuris, it is simply the law as the Chamber wants it to be [making it ...] one of the most poorly drafted and reasoned decisions in the ICC's history.[45]

A somewhat more elegant solution, if one accepts the reasoning of the Chamber in relation to the removal of immunities under customary law for the purposes of the application of Article 27, would be to consider not that customary international law creates a different exception for the arrest and surrender of a person in order for him or her to be prosecuted before an international court, but that the principle of effectivity implies that such a consequence should be drawn from the first exception. As explained previously, this is somewhat of a methodological shortcut, but in this case, it would certainly have been more convincing than the reasoning that the Chamber adopted.

Whichever justification one adopts, it should be noted that, as a consequence of the reliance on customary law, the duty to cooperate in the arrest and surrender of a person to be prosecuted by the Court would rest on all states, not just States Parties to the Rome Statute, even arguably, when no immunity question arises. Indeed, all states are bound by customary international law. This consequence illustrates once again the shortcomings of the reasoning of the Chamber, as it is doubtful that the drafters of the Rome Statute had such a legal consequence in mind when drafting the cooperation provisions.

[44] Malawi Decision (n 16) para. 42.

[45] G Sluiter, 'ICC's Decision on Malawi's Failure to Arrest Al Bashir Damages the Authority of the Court and Relations with the African Union' (ilawyerBlog, 6 March 2012) <http://www.mediafire.com/view/38a6hs1xaa3hoec/iLawyer-2012-Sluiter-ICC's_Decision_on_Malawi's_Failure_to_Arrest_Al_Bashir_Damages_the_Authority_of_the_Court_and_Relations_with_the_AU.pdf> accessed 25 August 2015.

12.4.2.2 Removal of immunity by the UNSC

As concerns the UNSC argument, it would have to be argued that not only has the UNSC removed any obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court over a national of a non-State Party, but also any obstacle in relation to the arrest and surrender of that person by another state. As mentioned previously, this is exactly the conclusion that the Pre-Trial Chamber reached in the DRC Decision.[46]

In relation to that argument, the same challenges can be put forward as previously. For one, can the UNSC implicitly remove an immunity which is recognized by general international law? Such a removal, if allowed, would at least need to be explicit in order to be operative. In the DRC Decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber considered that 'any other interpretation would render the SC Decision requiring that Sudan "cooperate fully" and "provide any necessary assistance to the Court" senseless'.[47] However, the judges do not explain why this would indeed be the case. The Court could very well exercise jurisdiction against other Sudanese nationals not benefiting from immunities involved in alleged crimes committed in Darfur. As pointed out by Gaeta, 'extradition treaties are not deprived of sense simply because, as the ICJ has clarified, a state may not even circulate internationally an arrest warrant against a foreign sitting head of state or government, or ministers for foreign affairs'.[48]

Second, it is even debatable whether the UNSC can in fact remove such immunity, even explicitly, in the context of the ICC. As discussed previously, the ICC situation is very different from the creation of an ad hoc tribunal, for example, where everything takes place within the internal legal framework of the UN. The Rome Statute, on the other hand, is a separate legal instrument, a multilateral treaty, that does not flow from the UN Charter. It follows that, in the context of the ICC, one still needs to establish whether the drafters of the Rome Statute were legally enabled to bypass immunities under international law by importing within the Rome Statute the powers of the UNSC under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, which is doubtful.

Should these concerns be set aside, the decision should be defended from at least one of the criticisms that has been levelled against it. Commentators have considered that the decision misunderstands the legal situation, because it discusses the question of Sudan's duty to cooperate, which is not what Article 98 is about,[49] as well as the factual situation, because the UNSC Resolution only 'urges', rather than compels, states to cooperate with the Court.[50] However, these commentators are missing the point of the reasoning. What the Chamber is saying, albeit not necessarily in a crystal-clear way, is that because Sudan has a duty to cooperate, it has a duty to cooperate in conformity with the Rome Statute, which includes Article 27. As a consequence, immunities would not any more be an issue under Article 98(1) in the context of a request for cooperation than if the third state was indeed a State Party to the Rome Statute, which is generally accepted. In this sense, if one accepts the premises of the reasoning of the [46] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 29. [47] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 29.

[48] Gaeta, 'The ICC Changes its Mind on the Immunity from Arrest of President Al Bashir, But It Is Wrong Again' (n 28).
[49] Ibid. [50] De Hoogh and Knottnerus (n 33).

Chamber, its conclusion (i) can indeed flow from the duty to cooperate of Sudan, and (ii) need not be concerned with what the UNSC urges other states to do, because the request for cooperation will have its source in the Rome Statute.

12.4.2.3 The literal interpretation approach and its consequences on cooperation and immunities

It remains to be seen how the situation would be resolved if Article 27 were simply applied as a binding provision by the judges, without any reference to any other outside source of international law, be it customary law or a UNSC Resolution. Two comments need to be made in relation to this.

First, it does not exclude per se the two previous legal arguments to be applied in such a case. Indeed, even if the source of the removal of immunity for the purposes of exercising jurisdiction is neither customary law nor a UNSC Resolution, it does not follow necessarily that the removal of immunity under Article 98 cannot flow from these sources. In this sense, the legal difficulties of these legal solutions still stand and need to be taken into account.

However, second, we believe that our preferred solution for the application of Article 27 has the added benefit of clarifying and somewhat simplifying the discussion on immunities under Article 98, by completely disconnecting the two issues. Once we unburden the conversation from elaborate and ultimately unconvincing legal developments on the customary law rules relating to immunities before international tribunals or the implicit powers of the UNSC, we are left with a very traditional question of international law: what is the status of immunities in international law for the prosecution of international crimes in inter-state relations? This question, so familiar for most international scholars, has so far been lost in the convoluted legal constructions surrounding the application of Article 98.

It is beyond the scope of this chapter to actually answer this question. It requires a careful discussion of both international law and domestic law sources relating to the prosecution of foreign nationals before the domestic courts of other states. What is important to note is that such a discussion is so far lacking, despite its importance, in the ICC case law. It is foreseeable that this will have to take place in the future, given that the Malawi Decision reasoning has been quasi-universally rejected, and that even if one accepts the DRC reasoning, it does not solve the situation where there is no UNSC Resolution. For example, with Palestine having joined the ICC and lodged a 12(3) declaration to cover events that place in Gaza during the summer 2014 military operations, and with the OTP having opened a preliminary examination in these events, we might be faced with a concrete case of arrest warrants being issued against citizens from a non-State Party (Israel) and the question of whether states would have an obligation to cooperate in their arrest and surrender in the absence of a UNSC Resolution.

12.4.3 The special case of the Genocide Convention

A related point that has been put forward is that, in the specific case of genocide charges, the duty of Sudan to cooperate with the ICC would flow not so much from the Rome Statute, but from the Genocide Convention.[51] In a nutshell, this reasoning unfolds in three steps. First, the ICC is to be considered an 'international penal tribunal' set up to prosecute genocide as per Article VI of the Genocide Convention. Second, State Parties to the Genocide Convention must be deemed to have accepted the jurisdiction of that Court in respect of genocide when the situation is referred by the UNSC, as a result of the binding nature of UNSC Resolutions adopted under Chapter VII. Third, and as a consequence, such states must cooperate with the ICC in application of the interpretation of the duty to cooperate read into the Genocide Convention by the ICJ in the Genocide case, where it found that:

> [I]t is certain that once such a court has been established, Article VI obliges the Contracting Parties 'which shall have accepted its jurisdiction' to co-operate with it, which implies that they will arrest persons accused of genocide who are in their territory—even if the crime of which they are accused was committed outside it—and, failing prosecution of them in the parties' own courts, that they will hand them over for trial by the competent international tribunal.[52]

Three comments can be made in relation to this approach.

First, one can question whether the ICC falls within the ambit of the 'international penal tribunal' envisioned in Article VI of the Genocide Convention. Of course, on the face of it, this does seem to be the case, as the ICC has jurisdiction over the crime of genocide as defined by the Convention. Nonetheless, one can wonder whether an explicit reference to the Genocide Convention and Article VI would not be necessary to validate this. This is particularly relevant because the ICC also has jurisdiction over other crimes, such as war crimes and crimes against humanity. This could lead to quite interesting practical difficulties. Indeed, the reasoning put forward means that the obligation to cooperate with the ICC would be entirely contingent on the charging policy of the prosecutor. Should he decide to charge the same incidents as crimes against humanity rather than genocide, the duty to cooperate of a particular state would disappear. Moreover, what would happen if the genocide charges were dropped after the confirmation of charges process, for example? Would that mean that the cooperation of the state would be in violation of Article 98, at least in hindsight, and the continued detention of the person for other charges be illegal? In order to avoid that, one could imagine that if the ICC were to request cooperation of a state which is not a party to the Rome Statute on the basis of the Genocide Convention, only charges of genocide could be brought, because there is no obligation for the state to cooperate with the Court in relation to other crimes. All these unanswered questions highlight, beyond the apparent elegance of the proposed solution, the difficulty of trying to fit [51] For an overview of opinions on this issue, see the online debate which brought together leading experts on the issue (D Akande, P Gaeta, W Schabas, M Mutua, and G Sluiter) available at <http://icc-forum.com/darfur> accessed 25 August 2014. See also Akande, 'The Legal Nature of Security Council Referrals to the ICC and its Impact on Al-Bashir's Immunities' (n 34); and M Gillet, 'The Call of Justice: Obligations under the Genocide Convention to Cooperate with the International Criminal Court' (2012) 23 Criminal Law Forum 63.

[52] Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia and Montenegro), Judgment of 26 February 2007 [2007] ICJ Rep 43 para. 443 ('Genocide case').

together two legal instruments (the Genocide Convention and the Rome Statute) drafted 50 years apart, with no attempt made by the drafters to lay down in precise legal terms their institutional relationship.

Second, even if one were to accept that the ICC does indeed correspond to the tribunal provided for in Article VI of the Genocide Convention, the question remains, what constitutes acceptance of the jurisdiction of such a tribunal? It should be recalled that in the Genocide case, the ICJ primarily relied on the Dayton Peace Agreement to establish that Serbia had recognized a duty to cooperate with the ICTY.[53] Incidentally, the Tribunal said that Serbia's membership of the UN after 2000 could provide a further basis for the obligation to cooperate,[54] but without explaining exactly how. Gillet provides such an explanation by saying that a UNSC Resolution, either creating the ICTY or referring a situation to the ICC, constitutes a collective acceptance of jurisdiction of the ICC from all members of the UN, through the operation of Articles 25 and 103 of the UN Charter.[55] Gillet concludes that 'no UN Member State is able to deny that the ICC has jurisdiction over the Darfur situation'.[56] This conclusion can, however, be challenged. Indeed, this is not the same situation as the creation of a Chapter VII ad hoc tribunal, where the source of the acceptance of jurisdiction comes from the powers granted to the UNSC by the UN Charter itself. In the case of the ICC, the Court has jurisdiction because of the Rome Statute and its Article 13(b). In other words, the only reason the UNSC can 'accept jurisdiction' of the ICC is because the ICC allows it to do so under its own constitutive document, not because the UN Charter allows it. As a result, we are faced once again with the question of the legality of the UNSC referral system. Could states, who alone or together could not force a third state to accept the jurisdiction of a tribunal established pursuant to Article VI of the Genocide Convention, bypass this obstacle by importing in the Statute of the tribunal the powers of the UNSC under the UN Charter to compel all states to cooperate? This is doubtful in my opinion.

Third, it should be mentioned that the fact that the Genocide Convention implicitly creates a duty to cooperate with an international tribunal is in itself questionable. As mentioned previously, this obligation was only implicitly read into the Genocide Convention by the ICJ. However, it should also be noted that in the case of Serbia, an explicit acceptance of a duty to cooperate was found in the Dayton Agreement,[57] so there was in fact no need for the Court to enter into a general discussion on whether such an obligation stems from the Convention or not, in the same way that it considered that the Convention implicitly also prohibited states from actually committing genocide.[58] Generally, I believe that one should be wary of reading into conventions what they do not actually say[59] through a form of teleological interpretation that is so disconnected from the actual text that it is in fact no longer an interpretative process, but a rewriting of the treaty by the judges to fit what they think should have been included in the first place. Therefore, while on a certain level one must accept that the ICJ has indeed recognized such a duty to cooperate, it is interesting to note that the [53] Ibid., para. 447. [54] Ibid. [55] Gillet (n 51) 76. [56] Ibid.

[57] Genocide case (n 52) para. 447. [58] Genocide case (n 52) para. 166.
[59] D Jacobs, 'Bashir and Genocide in Sudan: Second Time Lucky for the OTP' (Spreading the Jam, 13 July 2010) <http://dovjacobs.com/2010/07/13/bashir-and-genocide-in-sudan-second-time-lucky-for-the-otp/> accessed 25 August 2014.

finding was not warranted by the facts of the case, nor necessarily sound from a methodological perspective.

12.4.4 How to analyse possible conflicting obligations of states under international law

One last point that needs to be discussed is how the Court should be expected to analyse possible conflicting obligations of states under international law. Indeed, the analysis of relevant international law norms that might come into play to determine the existence of immunities under Article 98(1) might not always provide a single answer. There might be cases where a norm of international law would recognize immunities, while another norm might remove them.

This issue arose once again in the case of Al-Bashir, where the AU has issued resolutions calling for AU states not to cooperate with the ICC in relation to the arrest and surrender of the suspect.[60] To the extent that these resolutions can be considered binding on AU states,[61] the Court had to determine, even if it found that there existed reasons to remove Al-Bashir's immunity through the use of customary international law or the powers of the UNSC, that the requested state was still not barred from arresting Al-Bashir due to those resolutions. The Malawi Decision and the DRC Decision deal with this issue in different ways.

As regards the Malawi Decision, the Chamber, while taking note of the various AU Resolutions, links its relevancy to the substance of the discussion on immunities under Article 98(1): 'Therefore, the Chamber's analysis, contained below, as to how Article 98(1) of the Statute relates to the present circumstances will also address the legal viability of the African Union position relied upon by the Republic of Malawi.'[62] While the Chamber does not return to the issue later on in the decision, one can consider that because it found that no immunities could be claimed under Article 98(1), the AU Resolutions, which relied on Article 98, were therefore not legally viable and as a consequence were irrelevant. This reasoning cannot, however, be upheld. Indeed, the ICC does not sit as a court of legality of AU Resolutions; it is neither its function nor its mandate. Irrespective of what the ICC has to say about the legal reasoning underpinning the adoption of such a resolution, the fact is that it remains in force as a binding international law obligation for AU states, and that is all that the Court is required to determine in order not to move forward with a request for cooperation under Article 98.

The DRC Decision takes a different approach and does not enter into a discussion of the legality of the AU Resolution as such. The Chamber acknowledges that there might be a conflict between the AU Resolution and the UNSC Resolution referring [60] See Malawi Decision (n 16) fn 12 for a list of such resolutions.

[61] For a discussion on this, see M Du Plessis and C Gevers, 'The Obligations of African Union States to Implement ICC Arrest Warrants' (EJIL Talk!, 4 February 2011) <http://www.ejiltalk.org/the-obligation-of-african-union-states-to-implement-icc-arrest-warrants/> accessed 25 August 2014.

[62] Malawi Decision (n 16) para. 15.

the situation to the Court.[63] The judges then move on to trying to resolve this conflict by reference to the UN Charter. Noting that Article 25 of the Charter requires states to comply with UNSC Resolutions[64] and that, furthermore, Article 103 provides that UN Charter obligations should prevail over conflicting obligations under international law,[65] the Chamber concludes that '[c]onsidering that the SC, acting under Chapter VII, has implicitly lifted the immunities of Omar Al-Bashir by virtue of Resolution 1593(2005), the DRC cannot invoke any other decision, including that of the African Union, providing for any obligation to the contrary'.[66] This reasoning is equally unsatisfactory.

For one, the reference to the UN Charter is only valid from the internal point of view of the UN. The fact that the internal rules of the organization provide for a superiority of UN obligations over other international obligations does not mean that this superiority carries outside the UN legal framework into general international law. In other words, it is not because the conflict might be solved in one direction from the UN Charter perspective that it means that it is solved in the same way from the perspective of the AU, in our case. In order for the Pre-Trial Chamber to somewhat more convincingly make this argument, it would have had to find a rule outside of the UN Charter that would grant priority to Charter obligations over other conventional obligations. In that respect, such a rule does in fact seem to exist. Indeed, Article 30(1) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT) provides that, '[s]ubject to Article 103 of the Charter of the United Nations, the rights and obligations of States parties to successive treaties relating to the same subject-matter shall be determined in accordance with the following paragraphs'. In other words, the VCLT makes Article 103 of the UN Charter a general rule of the law of treaties to solve possible conflicts of application between successive treaties. However, Article 30(1) does not solve everything and a number of questions would have to be resolved.[67] First, does Article 103 relate to UNSC Resolutions, rather than obligations that stem directly from the text of the UN Charter? Second, even if it does, can one say that the UN Charter and the AU Charter have the same 'subject matter'? Indeed, Article 30(1) of the VCLT only applies in this circumstance. Finally, priority of UN Charter obligations does not mean that the other obligation disappears, or that the state that would be compelled to give priority to the Charter obligations would still not face responsibility under international law for not respecting the other obligation.[68] As a result of this, even if it had an obligation to prioritize Charter obligations, a state would still be acting 'inconsistently with its obligations under international law', as provided by Article 98(1) of the Rome Statute, thus triggering its application.

[63] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 30.
[64] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 30.
[65] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 31.
[66] DRC Decision (n 27) para. 31.
[67] On this see generally, A Orakhelashvili, 'Article 30' in O Corten and P Klein (eds), The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. A Commentary, vol. 1 (Oxford–New York: Oxford University Press 2011) 780–5; J-P Cot et al., La Charte de Nations Unies. Commentaire article par article 3rd edn (Paris: Economica 2005) 2133–47.
[68] 'On the whole, Article 30 resembles Article 103 of the UN Charter in that the latter, while establishing a priority in case of conflict with other treaties, takes no stand on the invalidity, if any, of a conflicting treaty', M Villiger, Commentary on the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 404.

Second, and more importantly, it is not for the ICC to resolve the possible tension under international law between two conflicting obligations. As mentioned previously, the ICC's evaluation does not change the fact that the AU Resolutions are still in force and still binding on AU states and that, as a consequence, enforcing the cooperation request would lead that state to violate an existing international law obligation relating to immunities.

It therefore appears that both in the Malawi Decision and the DRC Decision, the ICC has gone beyond its function. It mistakenly thought that it was the ICJ and passed judgment on the legality or relevance of international law instruments that it has no mandate to analyse. ICC Chambers, in the application of Article 98(1) of the Statute, are solely required to determine the existence of an international law obligation relating to immunities and draw a simple conclusion in that respect: the issuance or non-issuance of the cooperation request.

12.5 Conclusion

It appears from the preceding developments that while one can certainly argue that immunities are not an obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court against nationals of non-States Parties, it does not automatically entail that such immunities have no effect on the arrest and surrender of such nationals, even by States Parties to the Rome Statute.

The chapter has highlighted a number of possible legal avenues to circumvent this obstacle, which include reference to customary international law, analysis of the powers of the UNSC, and involvement of the Genocide Convention. It turns out that all these solutions have a number of flaws that are difficult to overcome. Moreover, they avoid the question that is at the heart of the discussion, and a traditional question of international law: whether immunities are still relevant legal instruments in relations between states.

More broadly, these discussions highlight two particular frustrations of certain communities of international law, one relating specifically to immunities and the other more generally to the ICC's place in the international arena.

In relation to immunities, the more or less convincing attempts to interpret various legal sources (customary law, UNSC Resolutions) as removing immunities illustrate the tension between the world as some human rights advocates would like it to be, and the world that actually exists. Despite the fact that immunities are still very much relevant in international relations today, as shown by decisions of the ICJ, there are some who would like to wish them away when it comes to human rights violations or international crimes. While there is obviously nothing wrong with this agenda from a moral perspective, it cannot simply become law with the waving of a wand.

In relation to the ICC, the decisions discussed illustrate the frustration of the Court as an essentially powerless institution, which depends on the whim of states. It is a treaty body, constrained by the law of treaties and by the fact that a vast number of states in the world have not joined it. It is a Court with grand ambitions, without the means to make them a reality. This explains the attempt to ground the ICC's ambitions in other, more universal tools, such as the UN Charter or customary international law.

But the fact remains that the ICC cannot hope, in the current state of its development and the current framework of international law, to be more than it is. While it might be frustrated with the situation, it must accept it to a certain extent, lest this toothless ambition create too many expectations that cannot be fulfilled.

These frustrations, if unchecked, could eventually affect the ICC itself, which could become burdened rather than helped by the ambitions and expectations put into it by those who defend it. Ultimately, its fate could mirror that of the frog who aspired to become as big as the ox in Aesop's fable: 'So the Frog took a deep breath and blew as hard as he could. Just as he was going to ask the frogs if he was now as big as the ox, he burst. The frogs never forgot the lesson: self-conceit may lead to self-destruction.'[69]

[69] S Barchers, Fifty Fabulous Fables (Portsmouth: Teacher Ideas Press 1997) 18.

PART III

PROSECUTORIAL POLICY AND PRACTICE

13

Putting Complementarity in its Place

*Paul Seils

13.1 Introduction

The ICC was ushered into history, buoyed on the waves of optimism and enthusiasm. Unsurprisingly, these feelings have receded with time and experience. On the one hand, it is human nature to expect too much and to criticize too readily when unrealistic expectations are not duly met. On the other hand, reasonable expectations that go unmet lead to justifiable disappointment.

Some of the ICC's perceived setbacks are simply a result of expecting a little too much from the Court and from the States Parties; some of them are self-inflicted and can be avoided with appropriate leadership, vision, and discipline in all organs of the Court; and some of them are based on wilful misunderstandings, such as the alleged persecution of the African continent.

One area where the ICC has been less effective than might have been hoped is in promoting national prosecutions.[1] This chapter will argue that there are two reasons for that. In the first place, the Court has been used largely as a tactical instrument aimed at affecting ongoing crimes or in dealing with shorter-term interests from self-referring states. The likelihood of it having an impact on approaches to national prosecutions in such circumstances is very limited. Second, even where the Court is able to act strategically with a view to promoting national action, the nature of what it can do and how it should do it is sometimes misunderstood or misapplied.

This chapter focuses on a number of recalibrations that can help to reframe expectations. To do this, we have to understand afresh the role of national prosecutions, not as a by-product, or as a gap-filler, but as the primary aim of the system created in 1998.

Before turning to the specifics of what the Office of the Prosecutor in particular might do differently in terms of policy, the discussion will be situated in the context of what we seek to gain from national prosecutions, and what kind of conditions need to obtain for them to be as meaningful as possible. In the absence of such considerations, a discussion about how the ICC might better promote them seems to be taking place in a darkened room.

* Vice-President and General Counsel, International Center for Transitional Justice.

[1] On dilemmas, see D Robinson, 'Inescapable Dyads: Why the ICC Cannot Win' (2015) 28 Leiden Journal of International Law 323. On complementarity, see also M El Zeidy, The Principle of Complementarity in International Criminal Law (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2008) and van der Wilt, Chapter 9; Stahn, Chapter 10; and Bekou, Chapter 48, this volume. See also P Seils, 'Making Prosecutions Work: Maximising the Limited Role of the Prosecutor' in C Stahn and M El Zeidy (eds), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011).

13.2 Meaningful National Prosecutions

Large-scale crimes committed in the context of repression or armed conflict indicate either the rupture or destruction of the social contract.[2] The objectives of criminal prosecutions in such exceptional circumstances are likely to be different from the objectives of criminal prosecution in normal circumstances.[3] In normal times criminal justice may have a variety of objectives: incapacitation, specific and general deterrence, retribution, restoration, rehabilitation, denunciation, positive deterrence/persuasion. Whatever combination of these goals is to be pursued, one underlying aim is to maintain confidence in the system of criminal justice as an efficacious means of protecting the fundamental rights and freedom of citizens. By contrast, the underlying aim of criminal justice in the context of rupture or destruction of the social contract is to restore confidence in a broken system.

National prosecutions in the aftermath of atrocity may have degrees of meaningfulness: at their most meaningful they will help to restore that sense of confidence in the justice system and in the idea of a rights-respecting society[4] generally, while vindicating the rights of individually wronged victims. The less national prosecution initiatives achieve this goal, the less meaningful they become. This does not mean that, absent a coherent prosecutorial strategy, the occasional trial is bereft of value. It will mean something to the individual victims and perhaps to the perpetrator unlucky enough to be the prey in a random clutch at justice.

In broad terms, meaningful national prosecutions refer to a coherent attempt to prosecute serious crimes arising from circumstances of conflict or repression whereby a critical mass of those considered to be the most responsible are subject to criminal proceedings. These proceedings must be based on a transparent process aimed not only at securing convictions, but also at demonstrating that the justice system is able to work fairly and efficiently in protecting the fundamental rights of citizens.

This definition raises a number of complex issues whose resolution will depend on contingent circumstances. Who might be considered the most responsible and what constitutes a critical mass cannot be ascertained in the abstract. The identification of those 'most responsible'[5] may depend on the role played by paramilitary or military

[2] For a more detailed statement of this position see P Seils, 'Restoring Civic Trust through Transitional Justice' in J Almqvist and C Esposito (eds), The Role of Courts in Transitional Justice (New York: Routledge 2013).

[3] G O'Donnell et al. (eds), Transitions from Authoritarian Rule: Comparative Perspectives (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press 1986); and N Kritz (ed.), Transitional Justice: How Emerging Democracies Reckon with Former Regimes (Washington: USIP 1995); P de Grieff, 'Theorizing Transitional Justice' in M Williams et al. (eds), Transitional Justice (New York: New York University Press 2012).

[4] The discussion of any causal link between accountability measures and the achievement of democracy is beyond the scope of this chapter. Such a link has, however, been claimed, see K Sikkink, The Justice Cascade: How Human Rights Prosecutions are Changing World Politics (New York: W.W. Norton & Company 2011).

[5] The decision to prosecute those deemed 'most responsible' is a policy matter. International law norms have not been established thus far to the effect that the underlying obligations of conduct requiring criminal investigation of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide would be discharged by prosecution of a group of persons selected under such a criterion. It is also far from clear that such a norm would be desirable: see the discussion in S Kemp, 'Alternative Justice Mechanisms, Compliance commanders in the planning and execution of acts within a criminal enterprise; it may encompass key social and political actors who sustained and supported parties in their criminal acts, either with the intention of doing so or in the knowledge of the intentions of those whom they supported.[6]

How many people should be prosecuted will depend not only on resources, but also on a commitment to go beyond the token.[7] Such gestures carried out in good faith can contribute to a renewed confidence and should not be dismissed out of hand, but national processes should be aiming for something more significant. This is true not only because of the effect it would have on public confidence in institutions, but also because of the expectation arising from pre-existing national and international obligations to apply the criminal law and the right to a remedy.[8]

There is a predictable counter-argument to this idealized notion of prosecutions at their most meaningful. It can be said that this is to hope for too much in circumstances of widespread criminality and weak justice systems. The alternative is to argue that we must simply do what we can, accepting that while far from perfect, it is still better than nothing.

The 'something is better than nothing' argument is always tempting to accept. Why would it not be better to make sure at least one senior officer responsible for crimes against humanity is prosecuted, even if all the rest go free? (There will still be those who argue that 'nothing' is not the alternative, but other social responses are both available and preferable. This is to ignore the legal requirement in international law that serious crimes require a criminal law response.[9] It also misunderstands the relationship between various responses, mistaking them as merely substitutes rather than a process bringing inherent and autonomous values.)

The idealized notion of meaningful prosecutions mentioned here should not be understood as proposing that the best be the enemy of the good. Rather, it is an invitation to think beyond the minimal, to understand better the context, challenges, and opportunities that states and societies face in dealing with a legacy of widespread human rights violations and international crimes. It is an invitation to think critically about issues of timing, selection, prioritization, and scale and to not pretend that these are the same kinds of decisions that are made in everyday circumstances by and Fragmentation of International Law' in L van den Herik and C Stahn (eds), Fragmentation and Diversification of International Criminal Law (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2012), 268 et seq.

[6] See the useful collection of essays, M Bergsmo (ed.), Criteria for Prioritizing and Selecting Core International Crimes Cases 2nd edn (Oslo: Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher), at <www.fichl.org/fileadmin/fichl/documents/FICHL_4_Second_Edition_web.pdf>. See also Seils on selection and prioritization in Colombia at <http://ictj.org/es/publication/propuesta-de-criterios-de-selección-y-priorización-para-la-ley-de-justicia-y-paz-en> accessed 26 June 2014. The approach to the subjective element and modes of liability will also vary in national systems. See E van Sliedregt, Criminal Responsibility in International Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012); M Badar, The Concept of Mens Rea in International Criminal Law (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2013).

[7] The obligations of conduct of course require prosecution only where there is sufficient evidence. Further considerations of prosecutorial discretion will also be relevant depending on the laws and practices of the jurisdiction in question.

[8] H van der Wilt and S Lyngdorff, 'Procedural Obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights: Useful Guidelines for the Assessment of "Unwillingness" ' and "Inability" in the Context of the Complementarity Principle' (2009) 9 International Criminal Law Review 39.

[9] Kemp (n 5).

prosecutors the world over. These are exceptional challenges in times of fundamental importance for reshaping the relationship of trust between citizens and the institutions that protect and guarantee their rights.

13.2.1 Policy objectives in criminal justice

International justice advocates sometimes rely rather uncritically on the idea of deterrence as the objective of criminal punishment. It is refreshing, therefore, that the Trial Chamber in the Katanga Decision notes deterrence and expression of social disapproval as two important objectives.[10] There is of course a significant degree of scepticism about the ideas of deterrence in general and there needs to be much greater analysis of its relevance in the context of the international crimes of concern to the ICC.[11] For the sake of brevity it is submitted that in the context of post-repression and post-conflict national prosecutions, the most significant policy objective of criminal justice should be understood in terms of the affirmation of social values, close to the notion of expression of social disapproval mentioned by the Trial Chamber in Katanga.[12] Various versions of the objective of punishment approximate towards this idea. They do not deny the possibility of other objectives but seek to avoid unnecessary reductivism. The basic notion is that criminal justice forms part of a broader context, a deliberative discourse, between citizens and their institutions. Criminal justice is not the only means by which to secure compliance with social and legal norms, nor necessarily the principal one, but it is an important one. The social disapproval expressed in solemn judgment by the Court and the punishment imposed contribute to a wider network of influences that requires adherence to accepted social and legal norms. In this sense the idea of persuasion rather than deterrence is suggested as a better description of the effect of punishment.[13]

This fundamentally expressivist approach best captures the role criminal justice can play in helping to restore confidence in the system as a whole. It is modest both in the sense that it recognizes that justice plays one part among many other social and political dynamics and in the way that it does not make extravagant claims for deterrence.[14]

[10] See Décision Relative à la Peine (Art 76 du Statut), Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3484, TC II, ICC, 23 May 2014, para. 38: 'Elle considère que la peine a donc deux fonctions importantes: le châtiment d'une part, c'est-à-dire l'expression de la réprobation sociale qui entoure l'acte criminel et son auteur et qui est aussi une manière de reconnaitre le préjudice et les souffrances causées aux victimes; la dissuasion d'autre part, dont l'objectif est de détourner de leur projet d'éventuels candidats à la perpétration de crimes similaires.'

[11] P Roberts, 'For Criminology in International Criminal Justice' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 315, and J Alvarez, 'Crimes of State/Crimes of Hate: Lessons from Rwanda' (1999) 24 Yale Journal of International Law 365; M Drumbl, Atrocity, Punishment and International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007); J Braithwaite, Restorative Justice and Responsive Regulation (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002).

[12] See e.g. A Duff, Trials and Punishments (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1986), 233–62; P De Greiff, 'Deliberative Democracy and Punishment' (2002) 5 Buffalo Criminal Law Review 373.

[13] See De Greiff (n 12).

[14] For example, some scholars argue that the important thing about deterrence is the certainty of punishment more than its severity. See D Nagin and G Pogarsky, 'Integrating Celerity, Impulsivity, and Extralegal Sanction Threats into a Model of General Deterrence: Theory and Evidence' (2001) 39 Criminology 865. For a general survey of literature on deterrence see V Wright, 'Deterrence in Criminal Justice.

What is it that the ICC can do to promote meaningful national prosecutions? At its best the ICC will contribute to making national authorities do more to meet their established obligations to investigate and prosecute serious crimes so that those efforts do indeed help to contribute to restored confidence in national institutions. Where ICC action or threat of action leads to ad hoc or piecemeal approaches that appear designed to keep the Court at bay, rather than a bona fide attempt to restore confidence in the system, the Court may well have played a role but it will be for a less meaningful outcome.

13.2.2 Referrals and the limits on national efforts

The ICC currently has eight investigations ongoing. Two arise from UN Security Council referrals, four from self-referrals, and two from propio motu investigations. One of these (Ivory Coast) arises from Article 12(3) declarations and in that sense bears similarities to a self-referral in that the prosecutor was effectively invited to act.

Security Council referrals are the closest the Rome Statute[15] allows to imposing a primacy regime, but in fact there is still an opportunity for national authorities to demonstrate willingness and an ability to act genuinely. In the Darfur referral the OTP took two months to open the investigation having sought detailed information to assess the Special Courts set up by the Sudan authorities.[16] The same was clearly not done in Libya.[17]

In the case of self-referrals, states by definition are intimating that they do not intend to act and in effect are ceding jurisdiction to the ICC. There is a common misuse of the term complementarity: it is sometimes said that we should seek to promote complementarity when we actually mean promote national prosecutions. Complementarity means the opposite—the ICC acting in place of national prosecutions. In this sense, nothing promotes complementarity quite like a referral.

While UNSC and state referrals indicate the presumption or reality that the ICC will act in place of national authorities, the role of the Court in catalysing national efforts is not necessarily closed. However, referrals combined with the policy position of the Court that only a handful of cases will be dealt with by the Court creates a very self-limiting environment in terms of the ICC promoting national prosecutions.

It is obvious that the place where the Court can exercise the greatest influence on national prosecutions is under preliminary examinations. However, preliminary examination is very much the poor relation in both resource and policy terms. The elements that attract the greatest interest of criticism and comment of the ICC relate to the proceedings it is carrying out. This is natural enough in terms of what makes news

Evaluating Certainty vs. Severity of Punishment, Sentencing Project (2012)' <http://www.sentencingproject.org/doc/deterrence%20briefing%20.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014.

[15] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[16] The UNSC referral was received on 31 March 2005 and the decision to initiate an investigation was made on 1 June, two months later.

[17] The UNSC referral was made on 26 February 2011. The decision to initiate an investigation was made on 3 March 2011, five days later.

and what can be commented upon, but it is looking at the wrong part of the equation in terms of promoting national action.

The ICC has been full of surprises. It is said that self-referrals were not anticipated during the negotiations but they have been the biggest source of business for the Court. It was anticipated there would be no Security Council referrals but not only have there been two, but one saw a unanimous Council vote. We have only now seen a referral by State (Comoros) in the way that the drafters primarily expected one to occur.

These referrals (self-referrals by the UNSC) are rightly seen as partly tactical and partly instrumentalizing the Court. Some referrals are made in better faith than others. Whatever the motivation behind them, we can see that they have generated investigations where the focus of attention has been much less on what the Court can do to promote national prosecutions than on what the Court is doing itself on prosecutions. In order to assess what the ICC can really do well to promote national prosecutions, we have to learn that the short answer is that it will have very little to do with what it does in its own courtrooms. When complementarity is in action, it means that national prosecutions are not working. If we want national prosecutions to work, the focus has to be on what the ICC can do better to leverage those outcomes, but also on what all other key parties can best do.[18]

13.2.3 Conditions for national prosecutions

The struggle against impunity that developed in the last three decades of the twentieth century reflects the experience that very few people responsible for serious violations and crimes were being held accountable for their actions before criminal courts. We categorize the reason for this into a lack of political willingness or capacity. On the other hand, the struggle against impunity over the last 40 years has made considerable headway. The creation of the ICTY and ICTR is seen by many as the beginning of the proof of this tendency, and the arrival of the ICC as its crowning moment.

In an international sense all of that may be true, but the struggle for justice at the national level had been fought long and hard, and perhaps with most success in Latin America, although with at least one notable experience from Ethiopia also worth serious analysis.[19]

[18] This of course reflects the ICC's first Prosecutor's remarks in his inaugural address that having no cases would be a sign of success. The fact that many people criticized this absolutely correct understanding of the complementarity principle indicates that many still had a journey to go in internalizing the concept.

[19] See F Tiba, 'The Mengistu Genocide Trial in Ethiopia' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 513; The Ethiopian Red Terror Documentation and Research Center at <http://ertdrc.com/index/cms/34> accessed 11 September 2014, and Ethiopia: Report of the Office of the Special Prosecutor, USIP (1994) <http://www.usip.org/sites/default/files/Ethiopia-Report.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014. The circumstances in Ethiopia were significantly different from those experienced in Latin America. Unlike almost any other situation in Africa the incoming government had a profound resolve to see criminal justice as part of the core response to the Red Terror. While it was like Argentina in the sense of government commitment, it had neither the resources nor NGO support. The initial planning suggested trials would take one year. In the end, the Mengistu trial itself took 12 years and the entire proceedings of the Office took 17 years. Over 1,600 people were prosecuted. While there were many procedural and resource challenges, the experience stands alone as an attempt to use the normal criminal procedures to prosecute those responsible for serious crimes. The focus on Latin American examples is not intended

It is beyond the scope of this chapter to rehearse the developments in Argentina, Chile, Peru, Uruguay, Guatemala,[20] and to some extent in Colombia that demonstrate the significant inroads against impunity that have been made. A good deal of this has to do with the important influence of the IACHR in its jurisprudence on the duty to ensure respect for protected rights and to provide an effective remedy.[21] Significantly, the cases that gave rise to that jurisprudence depended on victims and civil society groups making the petitions in the first place.

The routes in each country have varied considerably, as have the results, but it is reasonable to say that in a regional sense the experience from Latin America is instructive in terms of understanding what kinds of conditions appear to make criminal justice more likely at the national level.

A number of generalizations can be made. Broadly speaking, all of the countries in the region that have seen some kind of attempt to bring the most responsible to justice have been dealing with the aftermath of an ideological conflict or repressive government. Second, there has been a critical mass of sufficiently educated activists to articulate the demand for justice and there is a sufficiently strong point of reference or solidarity that makes this sector able to survive the resistance of the forces of impunity. Third, that demand for justice takes place and has significant resonance in the social and political discourse of the country. In that sense, the demand for justice is rooted in a social context. Fourth, those engaged in the pursuit of justice have the logistical and economic means to coordinate and communicate.

The points made relate largely to the actions and capacity of civil society. In this sense, civil society means something significantly broader than human rights organizations. It refers to social movements, churches, professional bodies' organizations, trade unions, as well as victim groups. In some countries the national institutions played a willing part sooner rather than later. But, however broad civil society is and however active national institutions are, they depended massively on the indefatigable efforts of victims, survivors, and other activists.

to minimize the possible relevance of the Ethiopian example, but is premised on the sense that reliance on the Ethiopian will to prosecute was genuinely exceptional. No country has replicated the number or longevity of that effort.

[20] For a general review of Latin America's experiences see N Roht-Arriaza (ed.), 'Digest of Latin American Jurisprudence on International Crimes, Due Process of Law Foundation, Washington D.C. (2010)' <http://www.dplf.org/en/resources/digest-latin-american-jurisprudence-international-crimes-vol-i>, accessed 26 May 2014; Almqvist and Esposito (n 2). For reviews of Argentina's experience, see e.g. P Parenti, 'The Prosecution of International Crimes in Argentina' (2010) 10 International Criminal Law Review 491; L Mallinder, 'The Ongoing Quest for Truth and Justice: Enacting and Annulling Argentina's Amnesty Laws', Working Paper Series Beyond Legalism: Amnesties, Transitions and Conflict Transformation, Institute of Criminology and Criminal Justice, Queens University Belfast (2009), 17; P Engstrom and G Pereira, 'From Amnesty to Accountability: The Ebb and Flow in Search for Justice in Argentina' in F Lessa and L Payne (eds), Amnesty in the Age of Human Rights Accountability. Comparative and International Perspectives (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2012) 108.

[21] See Velazquez Rodriguez v Honduras (Judgment), Inter-American Court of Human Rights Series C No. 4 (29 July 1988); Barrios Altos v Peru (Judgment), Inter-American Court of Human Rights Series C No. 15 (14 March 2001); Almonacid v Chile (Judgment), Inter-American Court of Human Rights Series C No. 15 (26 September 2006). Note the IACHR developments were essentially following the lines established in the first cases before the Human Rights Committee under the Optional Protocol to

For the most part, the idea of national prosecutions taking place and making a difference to society's perception of itself as rights-respecting is likely to require a coalescence of many factors. A good number of those factors are more or less directly linked to questions of social and economic development. The idea of restoring trust in the justice system implies that the system existed to some substantial degree before. It conveys at least a sense of structure and institutionality, even if those structures and institutions were abusive in the past. The idea of restoring trust in justice and the rule of law speaks to a certain level of expectation about social and political accountability.

In cases where the elements outlined are not sufficiently present, we are presented with some very hard questions about exactly what we expect of national criminal proceedings: Are they worth pursuing at all? If so, when? And if not now, what should be done in the meantime? Expecting the ICC to catalyse national prosecutions where these elements are significantly absent is perhaps to expect too much.

13.2.4 The role of civil society

The reconstruction of the social contract cannot be left to politicians and technocrats alone. Criminal justice plays a key part in reconstruction of the contract. It has been tempting to think that since the creation of the ICC we can focus on the technical aspects that drive criminal prosecutions—better planning, mapping, and selection, better training, better software and databases.[22] All of these may be important, but, even if successfully implemented, may well be insufficient. If we are to be honest about the lasting value of criminal justice in many of the societies we are concerned with, we must recognize that the institutions themselves, even if minded to, are unlikely to be able to get the job done on their own. In many cases the institutions will need significant assistance doing what should be done. But that is how institutionality and accountability develop.

The danger that needs to be avoided in current discourse about promoting national prosecutions is focusing on the technical to the exclusion of the social and the political. The pursuit of meaningful prosecutions needs civil society in its broadest sense to be empowered and encouraged to play an active role in demanding justice and holding institutions and perpetrators to account.

Prosecution initiatives that are seen as responding to international pressure more than a genuinely rooted demand in the social and political discourse of the country will in all likelihood not give rise to meaningful prosecutions in the sense set out at the beginning of this chapter.

Of course, if the sustainability and meaningfulness of the process depends on the development of the civil society, several more difficult questions arise. To what extent is it legitimate to create demand for justice? Should serious efforts wait until that demand exists and is a genuine part of the socio-political discourse?

the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (signed 16 December 1966, entered into force 23 March 1976) 999 UNTS 171.

[22] For an overview of what types of differential approaches are needed in the prosecution of serious crimes (e.g. system crimes, organized crimes), see P Seils and M Wierda (principal authors), 'Rule-of-Law Tools for Post-Conflict States. Prosecution Initiatives', Office of the United Nations High Commissioner

As regards the supply–demand conundrum, there are ethical and practical issues at play, but we know from experience that in many cases individuals and communities that have suffered have little or no awareness of their rights or of the duties of government. Providing information is an essential part of creating fair market conditions, even in the supply and demand for the vindication of human rights. It is not only appropriate, but an essential part of the development of a renewed social contract that citizens understand their rights and their relationship with government anew. Some will argue this is no more than supply-side justice initiatives. It is, however, hard to see why making such information available would be unacceptable.

As regards how long one should wait, no general rule can be made. Recent examples of pushing the justice agenda perhaps prematurely have been seen in Syria. It is hard to see that the basic conditions for meaningful conditions exist there.[23] In the DRC the development of civil society in these areas is a massive challenge. It is also true that in countries where the poverty is so pronounced, investment in one area can quickly turn when a new issue becomes the subject of interest. Assistance providers should avoid the tendency to cherry-pick programmes with high short-term success rates, leaving the difficult but necessary programmes frequently marginalized or untouched.[24]

It is not suggested that civil society has to reach some notional level of excellence before national prosecution initiatives can take place. Rather, it is important to recognize that unless the desire for justice is rooted in some significant way in the agenda of a critical mass of civil society, the prospects of meaningful processes are reduced.

13.2.5 Transitions, timing, and the interests of justice

The issue of timing has also come up in the Libyan situation where the Government has argued that, in part, because it is a country in transition, some consideration should be given to the reality of its circumstances.

The Appeals Chamber's findings are interesting in this regard.[25] One has to remember that in the case of Libya, a decision to open the investigation was made within for Human Rights (2005) <http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Publications/RuleoflawProsecutionsen.pdf> accessed 11 September.

[23] See P Seils, 'Towards a Transitional Justice Strategy for Syria', ICTJ (2013) <http://ictj.org/publication/towards-transitional-justice-strategy-syria>, accessed 24 June 2014.

[24] See P Collier, The Bottom Billion (New York: Oxford University Press 2008) 184, offering a criticism of aid agencies that applies equally here.

[25] See Judgment on the appeal of Libya against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 31 May 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-547-Red, AC, ICC, 21 May 2014, para. 165: 'The Appeals Chamber accepts that there may be national legislation in existence or other impediments to a State being able to either disclose to the Court the progress of its investigations, or to take all the necessary steps to investigate. In this case, Libya has asserted, inter alia, that it is a State in transition; it also asserts that it was prevented from disclosing to the Court evidence as to the investigations it was undertaking as a result of article 59 of its Code of Criminal Procedure, which it submits required it to maintain information as to investigations confidential; and it asserts that the appointment of a new Prosecutor-General was significant, therefore justifying more time. While accepting the reality that these situations can arise, the Appeals Chamber nevertheless considers that a State cannot expect that such issues will automatically affect admissibility proceedings; on the contrary, such issues should in principle be raised with the Prosecutor directly (prior to instigating admissibility proceedings), with a view to advising her as to the five days of the referral by the UN Security Council. Thereafter, there was a material change in circumstances with the overthrow of the Gaddafi regime. The incoming revolutionary government clearly intended to prosecute, but needed time to overcome the logistical and legal hurdles that it claimed existed.

The Chamber suggests that rather than making the conditions on the ground part of an admissibility challenge, it would have been better for Libya to discuss the issue with the prosecutor before challenging admissibility and for the prosecutor to determine whether it was appropriate in the circumstances to proceed at that time.

It is not entirely clear from the Chamber's Decision what steps it anticipated the prosecutor might take. If a discussion had been entered into between Libya and the prosecutor and the prosecutor had been persuaded that Libya was entitled to more time to develop its proceedings, what power under the Rome Statute would she invoke if she were to consider it 'sensible' not to proceed at that time?

It would appear that the only avenue open to her, having begun the proceedings, would be to seek to stop them under the interests of justice provisions in Article 53. In the instant case, the prosecutor had already determined there was a sufficient legal and factual basis to proceed and that the case was admissible. It would appear, therefore, that when the Chamber suggests an 'appropriateness' test, it could only be in terms of the interests of justice.

This opens up a new area of inquiry in the interests of justice debate. It is not an issue of peace versus justice (or at least not necessarily), but it seems to indicate that where there is a prima facie commitment to investigate and prosecute, the OTP should be open to consideration of arguments that allow a state with jurisdiction to develop the relevant means to carry out effective prosecutions.

13.2.6 The role of the international community

In recent years, and especially since the Kampala Review Conference in June 2010, there have been a number of initiatives that sought to make national prosecutions more of a reality. These included various research exercises and publications by the Open Society Justice Initiative,[26] a toolkit published by the European Union,[27] and the 'Greentree Process'—a series of high-level meetings over three years convened by steps the State is taking, any impediments to those steps and allowing her to reach sensible decisions as to whether or not, in the circumstances, it is appropriate for her, at that time, to pursue a case, pending the progress of investigations by the State. It is, in principle, not the place for such issues to be raised with a Chamber in the context of admissibility proceedings.'

[26] See e.g. its study on DRC, Uganda, and Kenya: E Witte, 'Putting Complementarity into Practice: Domestic Justice for International Crimes in DRC, Uganda, and Kenya', Open Society Foundations (2011) <http://www.opensocietyfoundations.org/sites/default/files/putting-complementarity-into-practice-20110120.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014.

[27] Joint Staff Working Document on Advancing the Principle of Complementarity, High Representative of the European Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy (2013) <http://www.eidhr.eu/files/dmfile/ICCToolkit.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014.

the International Center for Transitional Justice with the ICC focal points on complementarity, Denmark and South Africa, and with Sweden.[28]

One common theme in all of these efforts, and in particular in the Greentree meetings, was to try to find a way in which international development actors could play a more direct role in supporting national prosecution efforts. There is still a great deal of work to be done in this regard. At the end of that process many important commitments were made, but there was still something of a communication gap between justice actors on the international stage and development actors. This is not to say development actors are not doing more than they have in the past to support national justice efforts.[29] They almost certainly are. But there is a need for greater dialogue and frankness about the challenges both groups face.

As has been suggested, efforts made with national prosecutions that do not at the same time empower and encourage civil society in a broad sense to play an active role are likely to be of limited value in the longer term. Development actors have a key role in both articulating this idea and helping to make it a reality.

Similarly, development actors have in some sense a broader vision than justice actors. They are less likely to be persuaded that justice must be done now, regardless of the political and social risks, and thus can provide an important contribution to the debate. The ICC requires that there be no unjustified delay in bringing prosecutions, but how is the idea of justified delay to be best understood in a fragile society? Should time be given to develop civil society and justice institutions so that meaningful national prosecutions have a greater chance of happening, or should the ICC proceed with a handful of cases regardless of the impact on social and political stability or the opportunity costs for that society in trying to create genuinely accountable institutions?

National prosecution efforts have to harness the energy of civil society and be cognizant of the challenges. International development actors can contribute to both, but greater progress can be made in targeted assistance to civil society actors on the justice front. This can go from basic awareness trainings to funding embedded mentors in organizations to assist in sophisticated strategic litigation initiatives.

This section has sought to illustrate that making national prosecutions a meaningful reality depends significantly on civil society and international actors besides the ICC. The tactical use of the ICC so far has limited the role it can play in promoting national prosecutions. The following section considers what approaches and adjustments to the way the OTP works might help the office maximize its limited role in promoting national prosecutions.

[28] Three reports from 2010, 2011, and 2012 can be found respectively at <http://www.ictj.org/sites/default/files/ICTJ-Global-Complementarity-Greentree-2010-English.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014 <http://www.ictj.org/sites/default/files/ICTJ-Global-Greentree-Two-Synthesis-Report-2011.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014, and <http://www.ictj.org/sites/default/files/ICTJ-Report-Greentree-III-Synthesis-ENG-2012.pdf> accessed 11 September 2014.

[29] World Development Report. Conflict, Security, and Development, The World Bank (2011).

13.3 The Role of the Office of the Prosecutor in Catalysing National Proceedings

13.3.1 A review of the original position

The early days of the OTP were characterized by a well-intentioned commitment to transparency, evidenced by a series of significant policy papers. The first of these was an outline of a general policy approach.[30] It noted that it was likely that the Court would only ever be able to handle a small number of cases in any given situation; that it would focus (generally) on what it considered to be the persons most responsible for relevant crimes; and that it would seek to find ways to contribute meaningfully to ensure that those not addressed by the Court would be brought to justice at the national level.

In that paper, the OTP was not only aware of its very limited reach, but was also making clear the policy consequences that followed. It may have been the wisest option at the time, but does it remain so, or should a different approach be taken?

A new approach is suggested here. Having opened an investigation the OTP should say that it will bring as many cases as it feels necessary in the absence of action by the state. In this way the OTP might do more to promote action instead of serving notice from the beginning of its limited engagement. One difficulty of the approach taken so far is that national authorities may feel (indeed might have been given reason to believe) that they need only prosecute a small handful of cases to stave off possible ICC action. This entirely undermines the kind of impact the principle of complementarity was intended to have. Looking around the states where investigations have been opened by the ICC there is precious little indication of serious attempts to investigate other crimes at the national level. It is not possible to say that the reason so little has happened in terms of national prosecutions is as a result of the basic policy position to date, but it is possible to say that the position has not had a significant impact on catalysing national proceedings.

For example, there are many reasons for the failure of the DRC justice system to take serious and systematic steps to prosecute those most responsible for crimes, but for over a decade its parliament has failed to pass a bill implementing the Rome Statute, thus making more real the possibility of systematic national prosecutions. Aware that the OTP's gaze was apparently never going to extend beyond a handful of cases, the OTP's leverage on parliament has been minimal.

In Kenya the national authorities were given ample notice that the OTP would investigate if nothing was done at the local level. Given the focus of investigations on the most responsible, this was understood to mean that initial investigations had to go to the very top as a way of rendering the ICC case inadmissible.

As things turned out, the Kenyan authorities were not willing to adopt such an approach (or any approach at all, in fact). At one point the state argued that it was under no obligation to go after the most responsible in the first place and was pursuing a 'bottom up' strategy, although it was not possible to detect any genuine proof of that.[31]

[30] Paper on some policy issues before the OTP, September 2013.

A different outcome might have been possible if the understanding of what the Court might do was cast more broadly. Essentially that message has to be that the Office is not necessarily focusing on five or six perpetrators. Rather it is saying that it will act in respect of any case that it considers of sufficient gravity that has not been addressed by the national authorities.

In Kenya—as in any other state—this might have had three effects. First, it would afford a certain degree of latitude to national authorities to exercise some discretion in the sequencing or timing of specific prosecutions; second, it would give national authorities the encouragement to devise a genuine process aimed at mapping, selecting, and prioritizing cases that were part of a genuine strategy aimed at helping to restore trust in the national justice system; and third, a comprehensive strategy would more persuasively meet a state's international obligations to provide an effective remedy to the victims of serious crimes.

It may be argued that such an approach would simply invite stalling tactics, but this need not be so. It would be a matter for the prosecutor to assess whether the strategy was reasonable in the circumstances. The role of the Office would be to catalyse a genuine systemic response, not simply promote a few prosecutions aimed at keeping it at bay.

Advocates of justice often invoke the Sword of Damocles as a threat hanging over the head of perpetrators, but it is not an adequate image for the ICC and the idea of complementarity. What the ICC has to promote is serious and systemic national prosecutions, not token and symbolic ones. To have the desired impact, its threat is not to prosecute the occasional individual that states cannot or will not deal with: its threat has to be that it will step in wherever the state has failed to develop a sufficiently serious attempt to address the scale of crimes that have been committed.

13.3.1.1 Making the most of preliminary examination

It has been gratifying to see the OTP move away from an earlier position that considered an idea of 'situational gravity' prior to the opening of an investigation to an assessment of potential cases.[32]

In its earliest days the OTP indicated that since it was not possible to know what specific cases would be brought at the point of opening an investigation, the Office

[31] Application on Behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Art 19 of the ICC Statute, Ruto et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-19, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2011, para. 34: 'The investigations against low level perpetrators are the foundation for extending investigations to senior leaders associated with the ODM and PNU for the most serious incidents (as explained below [footnote omitted]). Many international courts have used a "bottom up" approach in investigating the most serious violations, it being very difficult to start an investigation at the highest levels without a sound knowledge of the underlying crimes.'

[32] For a more detailed treatment of this issue see Seils (n 1) 992–7. The approach suggested was significantly adopted by the Pre-Trial Chamber in the decision authorizing the opening of an investigation.

would not consider the gravity of a given case at that point but would rather assess whether the situation as a whole was of sufficient gravity to justify investigation.

There were two problems with this approach. The first was that the statute appeared to require a different test. Article 53(1) asks whether a case is or would be admissible. It does not ask whether the situation as a whole is of sufficient gravity. It talks only about the admissibility and gravity of a case. The second problem was that by stating it was not possible to know enough about specific cases at the point of opening an investigation, the Office was both ignoring part of its own experience and imposing on itself an unhelpful glass ceiling.

It has been understood from 2005 that the concept of a case embraces suspects, incidents, and conduct.[33] Since the test for opening an investigation talks partly about determining whether there is a reasonable basis to believe that a crime within the jurisdiction of the court has been committed, the OTP for some time appeared to indicate that this was the only issue it was really concerned with at this point. Having established that there was a reasonable basis to believe that such crimes had been committed, it was not at that point concerned with establishing who may have been responsible in terms of potential suspects, or indeed specifying conduct. The focus was very much on alleged incidents.

Such an approach, therefore, answered only one part of the issues raised by Article 53(1). Besides this determination, the Office was also required to establish that the case is or would be admissible. In order to answer that question the Office would need to have a sufficiently clear sense not only of the alleged incidents of potential interest, but also of the potential accused and their related conduct.

Of course, in situations where there was no indication of any incidents having been investigated at the national level, the OTP would have been able to determine admissibility simply on the basis of national inactivity.[34] On the other hand, even in the face of that inactivity, they would have been entitled to go further, developing information to establish what might constitute a potential case before the ICC.

Positive as the shift to consideration of potential cases has been, there may be more room to develop the practice as a means of catalysing national activity. This would require a limited rethinking of the OTP's approach to developing hypotheses for investigation.

13.3.1.2 Efficient hypotheses and opportunities during preliminary examination

In complex investigations the development of hypotheses can be one of the most important and difficult arts. Complex investigations require the development of evidence that will show connections between selected suspects, incidents, and conduct. The initial hypothesis is developed on the assessment of relatively untested

[33] Decision concerning Pre-Trial Chamber I's Decision of 10 February 2006 and the Incorporation of Documents into the Record of the Case against Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-8-US-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 24 February 2006. See also R Rastan, 'What Is a "Case" for the Purpose of the Rome Statute?' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 435.

[34] See D Robinson, 'The Mysterious Mysteriousness of Complementarity' (2010) 21 Criminal Law Forum 67.

information, and each subsequent hypothesis is arrived at by evaluating the information gathered, and determining whether the hypothesis has been proved, needs revision, or has been disproved.

There is debate about at what point in an investigation it makes most sense to develop detailed hypotheses. Doing it too soon can mean a premature exclusion of important leads; doing it too late can lead to inefficient use of resources, wasted time, and demotivation of staff. It is impossible in the abstract to state what the best course of action is. It will always depend on the quality of the information available in any given case and the skill and experience of the investigation team and its leader.

It would be a mistake to fetishize the moment of hypothesis formulation into something more than it needs to be. What is clear, however, is that there is no inherent harm in talking about the process of preliminary examination as an opportunity for the formulation of preliminary or initial hypotheses. The value of the hypothesis at the preliminary examination stage will of course be limited, but it may serve a number of purposes.

By clarifying that the OTP is entitled at this stage of proceedings to collect sufficient information to ascertain not only that incidents constituting crimes were committed, but also on who may have been responsible as a result of their actions in connection with the incident, allows the Office to reimagine the scope and reach of its inquiries while still not straying into the field of investigation. The difference between preliminary examination and investigation might be usefully distinguished at this stage as the difference between the development of initial hypotheses and the testing of those.

Such an approach makes three significant differences:

i. It provides a workable distinction between preliminary examination and investigation. One of the reasons the OTP initially felt disinclined to go beyond a situational assessment to case assessment was due to a fear that the Pre-Trial Chamber would consider they had undertaken unauthorized investigative activity. The formulation of initial hypotheses in preliminary examination would clearly still be limited to untested information but as long as the process does not involve putting the information developed to any testing through interviews with witnesses, it can be legitimately argued that no investigation is yet being conducted. The moment information is tested through any interrogatory process it can be said that the process has moved into an investigative domain (subject to Rule 48 of the RPE).

ii. The development of initial hypotheses allows for greater focus when investigations begin. If from the outset the process of preliminary examination was seen as the development of potential cases through formulating initial hypotheses, once an investigation was opened the OTP would be potentially in a stronger position to allocate resources and identify areas of particular interest. While the initial hypothesis is just that, it would still be an advance on analysis that seeks only to establish that crimes within the jurisdiction of the court were committed.

iii. Third and most importantly, in light of the preceding discussion, if states are aware that the process of preliminary examination is aimed at developing initial hypotheses in relation to a potentially broad number of cases in any given situation, the OTP can transmit a more powerful message to national authorities that it is not engaged in a token prosecution of a few high-level perpetrators but that it has analysed information and is in a position to investigate many more cases. Whether it would make sense for the OTP to share any of the details of the preliminary analysis would depend on the circumstances, but in general the national authorities will be as able to develop the same kind of analysis as the OTP. States will be in possession of the information or will be able to be helped by advisers, perhaps from outside the country, to get the information.[35]

13.4 Technical Analysis of National Proceedings

The OTP's rigorous and accurate analysis of national proceedings is an essential element of the complementarity principle. States must be sure that if their processes are not genuine, the ICC will detect it and act on it. This is how it can catalyse not just token responses but systemic responses. The situation of States Parties' forces active in Iraq provides one example.

13.4.1 UK forces in Iraq

Regarding allegations against UK forces in Iraq, on 9 February 2006 the prosecutor issued a letter indicating the following:

i. That there was a reasonable basis to believe unlawful killing and serious abuse of prisoners had occurred while in custody or under the control of UK forces.
ii. That the incidents in question seemed to relate to less than 20 alleged victims.
iii. That these numbers fell short of the required gravity threshold.
iv. That in any event all the incidents appeared to be the subject of national investigations.

In February 2006 this may have been true, but in the years that followed information about the number of incidents of alleged killings and mistreatment increased. In addition, the information on the quality of national proceedings indicated ever more reasons for doubting the genuineness of significant aspects of the proceedings.

The High Court Decision issued by Lord Justice Scott Baker on 2 October 2009 relates to allegations arising from the military operation known as Danny Boy.[36] It was alleged that members of the British Army had killed or mistreated prisoners taken on [35] What is required at this stage to develop initial hypotheses is information about alleged incidents and alleged perpetrators. That information will come either from direct complaints made by victims or their relatives and friends, or through some form of data collection processes, often by local NGOs. In this sense the information is almost always well known and available. The degree of expertise needed to develop an effective mapping process of such information will depend on the context, but to the extent that it is needed, it is probably best for the OTP to keep the relationship at arm's length and allow whatever technical help is thought necessary to be provided by others.

[36] R (Al-Sweady) v The Secretary of State for Defence [2009] EWHC 2387 (Admin) [Judgment].

14 May 2004. Iraqi nationals claimed that of 20 bodies recovered from the battlefield by the British forces, not all were dead and that at least 1 was murdered in custody. Others, they claimed, were tortured or mistreated.

The judgment of the Court upon a judicial review application paints a damning picture of all aspects of the system put in place by the national authorities to investigate the matters in question.[37] The Secretary of State for Defence is criticized in plain terms for his role in failing to ensure adequate systems leading to the failure to disclose vital information on a serial basis. The Government's lawyers are deemed to have manifestly failed in their duty as officers of the Court in meeting their duties of disclosure.[38] More damning still is the Court's assessment of the senior official of the Royal Military Police in charge of the initial investigation into the alleged incidents. In short, the Court found him to be entirely unreliable as a witness and urged any future court taking testimony from him to treat it with the greatest caution. Significantly, the Court found that the officer in question, Colonel Dudley Giles, had lied about the initial proceedings and concluded that the investigations carried out had been anything but proficient or thorough.[39]

An objective reader of the judgment cannot but come to the view that not only was the initial investigation manifestly below the reasonable standards to be expected in relation to the obligations of conduct in this regard,[40] but the actions of the Secretary of State and the government's solicitors limited the prospects of any further information about the incident ever coming to light.[41]

Perhaps the most notorious case arising from the allegations against UK forces relates to that of Mr Baha Moussa and another eight persons detained by British forces. Mr Moussa died as a result of injuries sustained while in custody. The autopsy indicated over 93 injuries to his body. A military investigation led to the trial of six soldiers. One was convicted and five were acquitted. The guilty man was sentenced to one year in jail in respect of failing to discharge his duties, not in respect of murder or manslaughter.[42]

In 2008 a public inquiry was ordered which heard from 250 witnesses and led to the army admitting that human rights had been breached. A second inquiry was established under Sir William Gage in 2010. After years of struggle by relatives of alleged victims, a judicial inquiry reported in September 2011 that serious abuse had occurred by British soldiers in respect of Mr Moussa and several other prisoners. It found that there were systemic failures throughout the army system, and that the commanding officer should clearly have known what was happening to Mr Moussa long before he died.

[37] Ibid., paras 63–5.
[38] Ibid., paras 30–44.
[39] Ibid., paras 45–60.
[40] See van der Wilt and Lyngdorff (n 8).
[41] As a result of the High Court decision a public inquiry has been established. It allegedly has cost over £20 million and heard testimony over 160 days. What is less clear is whether new criminal prosecutions are likely to be initiated and the degree to which earlier decisions make new proceedings legally or practically impossible.
[42] R v Payne, Mendonca and Others [2006]; see also 'UK Soldiers Cleared of Iraq Abuse', BBC News, 14 February 2007.

Another judgment arising from the Baha Moussa incident from the Court of Appeal on 22 November 2011 notes the mechanisms established to carry out investigations into alleged systemic abuse of Iraqi prisoners failed to meet the required standards of impartiality.[43] The specific appeal related to the creation by the UK Government of an Iraqi Historical Allegations Team (IHAT) announced in Parliament on 1 March 2010. The Court of Appeal concluded that the mechanisms in question, since it required investigations to be carried out by a party that could have been culpable for acts of omission in respect of the treatment of prisoners, could not satisfy the test of perceived impartiality.

As a result of the 2008 inquiry into the Baha Moussa case, and the High Court Decision in the Al Sweady/Danny Boy case in 2009, it has been public knowledge that serious incidents occurred regarding allegations of at least two murders and serious abuse of multiple detainees. It has been at least arguable that the military justice system charged with investigating the incidents was not conducting genuine inquiries into the meaning of Article 17 of the Rome Statute. As a result of flawed investigations and multiple subsequent inquiries, the UK government set up a process to carry out investigations which the Court of Appeal found to lack the necessary impartiality for the job.[44]

Looking at the example of Iraq, a number of questions arise for the OTP. In the case of Abu Garda, the Court has determined that an alleged attack on ten AU peacekeepers met the threshold of sufficient gravity, notwithstanding that the attack was not conducted on a large scale or as part of a policy.[45] In the light of that case, is the OTP minded to review its initial determination of February 2006, that the cases of abuse of detainees in Iraq do not meet the gravity threshold as it then indicated? In particular, does the OTP take the view that alleged serious abuse and killing of detainees by a belligerent occupying force would meets its criterion of 'impact' in terms of its gravity assessment?

In addition, public information since at least 2011 has indicated that as many as 140 individuals from Iraq have suffered alleged serious mistreatment. Even if the two cases of Al Sweady et al. and Baha Moussa et al. do not, for some reason, meet the gravity threshold, would they in combination with the other 140 cases meet the gravity threshold?

Lawyers for the Iraqi prisoners brought information to the OTP in January 2014 asking for an investigation to be opened. The OTP indicated that it was proceeding with a preliminary examination of the matter. It is reasonable to ask why, in the light of information publicly available since at least October 2009, the Office did not take a more proactive approach in seeking further information on the conduct of national proceedings.[46]

[43] R (oao) Moussa and The Secretary of State and another [2011] EWCA Civ 1344.

[44] Ibid., paras 34–49.

[45] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, PTC I, ICC, 8 February 2010, para. 34.

[46] In fact, the author had publicly raised the issue of a new examination being necessary in the Iraq situation in 2011. See Seils (n 1) 995–6.

13.4.2 Colombia

The OTP has concluded that it is satisfied that the state has investigated alleged violations by the Armed Revolutionary Forces of Colombia, better known as FARC. It notes that convictions exist in relation to some 218 cases, although almost all of these are convictions in absentia. The Office has indicated on several occasions that the only issue of concern now is the sentence imposed on the convicted men when they are apprehended.[47]

It is not obvious from the reports issued by the Office that it has been able to inquire into the quality of the proceedings that gave rise to the convictions, and whether or not they can be relied upon as proceedings that met international standards of due process or whether they were in some sense fundamentally unsound.

As a matter of law it is not an easy issue to determine how much relevance the Office should place on the quality of national proceedings from a human rights point of view. Article 17 is not constructed with due process guarantees at the forefront. It is constructed with a view to ensuring that proceedings do not shield the guilty. It is not clear that the Court is either required to or in a good position to ascertain the quality of national proceedings from a human rights point of view. However, it seems relatively uncontroversial that to insist upon an appropriately serious sentence being imposed in respect of proceedings that have not been analysed for their integrity or seriousness raises some doubts about the contribution the Office is making to the struggle against impunity at the national level.

Perhaps more significant than the FARC cases are those allegations relating to extra-judicial executions carried out by the military. The OTP said in November 2012 that it would be focusing on these cases as a priority[48] and that it hoped to see cases involving the most responsible being brought. The same message was transmitted to the Colombian authorities in September 2008.[49] While several hundreds of cases have been brought and convictions with heavy sentences imposed, almost no cases have been brought in respect of those who could reasonably be considered either as among the most responsible as perpetrators, indirect co-perpetrators, or having command responsibility. Six years on since the initial warnings were given to the Colombian authorities on a very specific basis, it is unclear what explains the OTP's continued patience on this matter.

One final issue of interest is the question of punishment. The OTP has intervened in Colombia to argue that a sentence that could be regarded as grossly inadequate would be taken as an indication that the proceedings were not genuine.[50] The OTP wrote directly to the Constitutional Court which was at that point deliberating on a challenge to a constitutional amendment. There may be some who see this as a positive step by the Office—an example of what many people continue to refer to as positive complementarity.

[47] See Situation in Colombia, Interim Report, OTP (2012), para. 1601.
[48] Ibid., paras 8–10 and especially para. 196.
[49] The author was involved in transmitting the message.
[50] See D Sánchez, 'Una "Carta Bomba"', Semana, 17 August 2013.

The OTP has had the Colombian situation under analysis since 2004 but has never opened an investigation. To write directly to the Constitutional Court during its deliberations when the Office was neither a party to the proceedings nor where an investigation had been opened is an extraordinary intervention. One could have no objection to the Office entering into discussions or making its views known to its normal counterparts in the Colombian Government, but a direct communication to the Constitutional Court might be deemed questionable.

Leaving aside the doubts of a procedural nature, the substantive issue is also important. To what extent does the issue of punishment figure as a criterion of genuineness? Of course, an entire chapter could be devoted to the issue and only a few brief points can be made here.

The OTP notes in its letter to the Court that the question raises novel matters but argues that a reading of Article 17(2)(a) and 17(2)(c) provides a basis to argue that the OTP can have regard to the nature of punishment to determine the issue of admissibility.

The argument under Article 17(2)(a) requires that the provision in the statute that refers to proceedings designed to shield the accused from criminal responsibility is given a broader meaning than the ordinary words imply. The determination of criminal responsibility is normally understood as the finding of guilt or innocence. The question of punishment is normally considered a separate issue. That an inadequate sentence could be understood as a proceeding designed to shield the accused from criminal responsibility seems to extend the meaning of that phrase unnaturally.

There is a clear difference between conviction and punishment. The practice of expunging criminal records after a period of time is an indication that the record of a finding of guilt—i.e. the determination of criminal responsibility—is seen as something intrinsically valuable and important, separate from punishment. It is an inappropriate extension of meaning to suggest the determination of guilt also addresses the issue of appropriate punishment.

Article 17(2)(c) provides that in order to determine unwillingness it would have to be shown that proceedings were not being conducted independently or impartially and that they were being conducted, in the circumstances, in a manner inconsistent with an attempt to bring the person to justice.

This is a complex provision, but two things are immediately noticeable. The first is that the Article focuses on the quality of proceedings—that is, the specific investigation and/or trial that would be under scrutiny. Second, the provision requires that two tests are met—insufficient independence or impartiality first, and second, that the proceedings were not conducted with an intent to bring the accused to justice.

In the Colombian context, the discussion centres on an amendment to the Constitution known as the Legal Framework for Peace. It concerns the legal changes deemed necessary to facilitate the agreement of FARC and the state to end the current conflict. If the peace process were successful, in accordance with the proposed amendment a law would then be passed to provide for the criminal prosecution of relevant groups. This mirrors what happened under Law 975 which dealt predominantly with demobilized paramilitaries and Law 1424 which addressed the rank and file not included under Law 975. Justice officials from prosecutors to judges would be required to apply that law, as they have applied Law 975 and Law 1424. If the prosecutors and judges act as Congress intends and apply the law without favouring one side or the other in the proceedings, it is not easy to see how the 'proceedings' will be viewed as lacking in independence. They may well be applying a law that provides sentences with which the OTP disagrees, but that is a separate issue from acting with a lack of independence or impartiality. In short, the drafting of Article 17(2) does not appear to give the OTP the entry point it desires to question the legislation that might be drafted.

It should be understood that if a state drafts a law that precludes proceedings themselves, such as an amnesty law, then the ICC will of course be able to instigate proceedings. It is much less clear, however, on what basis a case would be admissible before the ICC simply on the basis of the penalties provided under national law. As indicated, the consideration of proceedings is specific: on its face, it does not invite scrutiny of legislation. The first question that must be asked is whether the officials in question are acting with a lack of independence or impartiality in those proceedings. Applying the law as it is drafted is not an indication of a lack of independence or a lack of impartiality. Given the foregoing, it is not necessary to ask what is meant to by the phrase 'with the intent to bring to justice', but this concept does raise wider policy concerns regarding the peace process as a whole. It might be argued that a more reflective view was called for in the context of the current negotiations. It is notable, for example, that in the recent case of El Mozote before the IACHR, a separate opinion by Judge Garcia-Sayan noted that all previous Inter-American jurisprudence on the issue of amnesties had not been concerned with the challenges presented by the simultaneous pursuit of peace and justice.

> In this context, it is necessary to devise ways to process those accused of committing serious crimes such as the ones mentioned, in the understanding that a negotiated peace process attempts to ensure that the combatants choose peace and submit to justice. Thus, for example, in the difficult exercise of weighing and the complex search for this equilibrium, routes towards alternative or suspended sentences could be designed and implemented; but, without losing sight of the fact that this may vary substantially according to both the degree of responsibility for serious crimes and the extent to which responsibility is acknowledged and information is provided about what happened. This may give rise to important differences between the 'perpetrators' and those who performed functions of high command and gave the orders.[51]

A similar point could be made in the case of Colombia: the pursuit of peace necessarily renders a degree of complexity to questions of punishment that would not normally be present. The jurisprudence that has emerged on these issues, and is cited by the OTP, was not concerned with the question of the pursuits of justice and peace.

It should be noted that promoting better analysis of these issues is not to argue against the idea that it is in the interests of justice to prosecute the most serious criminals of the FARC. Neither does it suggest that the treatment for one actor in the conflict should apply to all. The only justification for providing a lesser sentence for FARC members would be that it was necessary to secure a peace deal and the demobilization and reintegration of FARC into Colombian society. These forces have remained beyond the reach of the state for 50 years, so an agreement that it submits its members to the criminal justice system seems necessary. It is submitted that the same cannot be said, however, of members of the Colombian military accused of killing civilians. There is no justificatory argument that requires a deal on sentencing to be struck with parties who, far from being beyond the law, are state employees tasked as its ultimate guarantors.

[51] Concurring Opinion of Judge Diego Garcia-Sayán, The Massacres of El Mozote and Nearby Places v El Salvador (Judgment), Inter-American Court of Human Rights Series C No. 252 (25 October 2012), para. 30.

Finally, it is worth noting that Article 80 of the Rome Statute was drafted to ensure that states could apply the national penalties they saw fit, regardless of the provisions on sentencing in the Statute.[52] It was drafted with a view to giving comfort to states who had and wanted to keep the possibility of applying the death penalty, but it recognizes the rights of states to establish their penalties as they see fit. It is far from clear that the provisions of Article 17(2)(a) and (c) entitle the OTP of the Court to bring national penalties under their purview to determine willingness.

13.5 Steps for the OTP

In order to make better use of its powers to catalyse national prosecutions, the OTP should consider the following three steps:

i. It should change the position set out in its first policy paper in which it indicated that it will be likely only to ever focus on a very few cases in any given situation. Instead it should create a sense of creative ambiguity by stating that it will keep situations under investigation until it is satisfied that the state with jurisdiction has taken reasonable steps to address cases that might justify further action by the Court.

ii. The Office should develop or make more explicit the way in which it seeks to use the phase of preliminary examination. It should be used to identify potential cases for prosecution in a preliminary fashion, and not to assess a misplaced notion of 'situational gravity'. The division between what constitutes preliminary examination and what constitutes investigation should be understood as a division between the information assessed in the development of preliminary hypotheses and the work undertaken to test, evaluate, and develop new hypotheses in the course of investigation. This would have a considerable impact on the way states watching preliminary examination would measure their own responses.

[52] See R Fife, 'Article 80 Non-Prejudice to National Application of Penalties and National Laws' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 1443.

iii. The OTP should take a more assertive stand on the analysis of national proceedings, demonstrating that it will carry out its role without fear or favour, with the appropriate levels of skill and supported by adequate resources.

13.6 Conclusions

The previous section provided specific conclusions regarding OTP actions and policy. More broadly this chapter has sought to argue three things. First, that there is a limited amount the ICC and the OTP in particular can do in promoting national prosecutions; second, that it may be appropriate to revisit some earlier policy positions and practices and to amend these with a view to doing more with its limited capacity to promote national prosecutions; and third, to highlight the fact that most of the heavy lifting on national prosecutions will be done by civil society in the countries involved and by international assistance to them and national institutions. Those efforts should be directed not simply at doing what the ICC would otherwise step in and do, but at the creation of suitably robust processes capable of making a difference to the way citizens see their national justice system.

The need for joined-up discussions and awareness between civil societies, international donors and supporters, and the ICC remains as important as ever. The objective is for the ICC to contribute not only to occasional prosecutions but to restored justice systems capable of protecting human rights and worth trusting. This requires both technical amendments to policy and practice as well as a refreshed understanding of the kind of role it can play along with the other parties essential to this noble goal.

14

Investigative Management, Strategies, and Techniques of the ICC's OTP

Susana SáCouto and Katherine Cleary Thompson

14.1 Introduction

The ICC has issued warrants of arrest or summonses to appear against more than 30 individuals charged with committing genocide, crimes against humanity, and/or war crimes. A number of these individuals have appeared before the Court—either voluntarily or following apprehension and transfer to ICC custody—for purposes of participating in a hearing before a Pre-Trial Chamber to determine whether the prosecution's charges should be confirmed and the case sent to trial.[1] Specifically, pursuant to Article 61 of the Rome Statute, the confirmation of charges process requires that the Pre-Trial Chamber determine whether the prosecution has presented 'sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe' that the individual is responsible for the charges contained in the warrant of arrest or summons to appear.[2] While the Pre-Trial Chambers have confirmed charges against the majority of individuals appearing before the Court thus far, they have declined to confirm the charges against several suspects, meaning that the prosecution has failed to convince the Court that there are 'substantial grounds to believe' the charges against a significant number of the individuals who have appeared before it.[3] In addition, in

* Many of the findings and recommendations contained in this chapter were first published by the War Crimes Research Office ('WCRO') in an October 2012 report entitled 'Investigative Management, Strategies, and Techniques of the International Criminal Court's Office of the Prosecutor'. The full report, which is the 16th report issued as part of the WCRO's ICC Legal Analysis and Education Project, is available at <http://www.wcl.american.edu/warcrimes/icc/documents/ICCReport16.pdf> accessed 29 May 2013.

 Susana SáCouto is the Director of the WCRO. Katherine Cleary Thompson is the organization's Assistant Director. The authors would like to thank Washington College of Law ('WCL') graduate Adrian Odya-Weis for her research assistance and the following WCL JD students for their contributions: Alli Assiter, Samit D'Cunha, Brian Johns, Amber Lee, Carter Parét, and Christopher Tansey. Thanks also to former WCRO Staff Assistant Brady Williamson.

[1] Many individuals remain at large or are currently being held by the authorities of a state. Two warrants of arrest have been terminated after a determination by the Pre-Trial Chamber that the accused was deceased. See Decision to Terminate the Proceedings against Raska Lukwiya, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-248, PTC II, ICC, 11 July 2007; Decision to Terminate the Case against Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Gaddafi et al., Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-28, PTC I, ICC, 22 November 2011.

[2] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('Rome Statute').

[3] See Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, PTC I, ICC, 8 February 2010 (declining to confirm the charges against Mr Abu Garda); Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011 (declining to confirm the charges against Mr Mbarushimana); Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, one case, the Pre-Trial Chamber issued a decision adjourning the proceedings to allow the prosecutor 'to consider providing further evidence or conducting further investigation with respect to all charges' after determining that the evidence submitted at the initial confirmation hearing was insufficient.[4] Even in those cases that have survived the confirmation hearing, the Pre-Trial Chamber has occasionally dropped charges due to a lack of evidence[5] and the Prosecutor has withdrawn charges altogether in at least two cases after determining that there was insufficient evidence to establish a conviction.[6] Finally, of the cases in which a Trial Chamber has rendered a judgment to date, one resulted in acquittal due to insufficient evidence,[7] while the others resulted in a conviction on a limited set of charges.[8] Significantly, in one of the cases resulting in conviction, the Chamber determined that the evidence provided by '[a] series' of prosecution witnesses could not 'safely be relied on' as a result of the fact that the OTP inappropriately delegated its 'investigative responsibilities' to intermediaries.[9]

We recognize that the challenges of conducting international criminal investigations are legion, given investigators' restricted access to evidence, either due to the ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012 (confirming the charges against Mssrs Ruto and Sang, but declining to confirm the charges against Mr Kosgey); Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012 (confirming the charges against Mssrs Muthaura and Kenyatta, but declining to confirm the charges against Mr Ali).

[4] Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-432, PTC I, ICC, 3 June 2013, 22.

[5] For instance, in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case, while the Pre-Trial Chamber confirmed charges of rape and sexual slavery as war crimes and crimes against humanity, it declined to confirm the charge of outrages upon personal dignity as a war crime, which was based in part on the allegation that a woman 'was stripped and forced to parade half naked in front' of combatants belonging to the militia led by the accused. Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, para. 366. Similarly, in the Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali case, while the Pre-Trial Chamber confirmed the charge of rape as a crime against humanity in relation to events occurring in two locales, in its decision issuing a summons to appear, the Chamber had significantly narrowed the 'geographic scope' of the alleged rape charges because, as summarized by the Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, the prosecution failed to 'provide evidence of…the individual criminal responsibility of [the three accused] for gender-based crimes committed in other locations'. Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, 'Gender Report Card on the International Criminal Court' (2011) 126.

[6] See Decision on the withdrawal of charges against Mr Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-696, TC V, ICC, 18 March 2013, para. 7. The prosecution based its decision to withdraw the charges against Mr Muthaura on, inter alia, the fact that there were 'post-confirmation developments with respect to a critical witness against Mr Muthaura, who recanted a significant part of his incriminating evidence after the confirmation decision was issued, and who admitted accepting bribes from persons allegedly holding themselves out as representatives of both accused'. Prosecution notification of withdrawal of the charges against Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-687, OTP, ICC, 11 March 2013, para. 7. See also Notice of withdrawal of the charges against Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11, OTP, ICC, 5 December 2014.

[7] See Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012 ('Ngudjolo Judgment').

[8] See infra (n 54) and accompanying text.

[9] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, paras 482–3 ('Lubanga Judgment'): Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Art 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TCII, ICC, 7 March 2014.

passage of time and/or uncooperative governments; international institutions' lack of enforcement powers; cultural and linguistic barriers to interviewing witnesses; persistent security concerns; the overwhelming scale of the crimes under investigation; and the fact that those working in international institutions hail from different legal traditions and thus are likely to have different views on appropriate investigative policies and practices.[10] We also appreciate that, despite these challenges, the OTP has achieved substantial successes in a short period of time, as evidenced most strikingly by the recent conviction of its first accused and the issuance of warrants and summonses involving a wide range of charges for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide against multiple suspects across eight situations.[11] Finally, we acknowledge that, in its Draft Strategic Plan for 2013–15, the OTP explained that '[d]uring its initial years, [the Office] tested different approaches by relying on the diverse experience of staff members who came from different professional backgrounds', and that it is currently 'review[ing] and improv[ing] its practices and standards based on its experiences' and 'analysing the Court's decisions in relation to [the OTP's] investigative practices to determine whether further changes to its investigative strategies and [standards] are required'.[12] In support of that effort, this chapter examines some of the potentially problematic aspects of the Office's investigative practices that have been identified by the judges of the Court and outside observers to date and offers recommendations that we hope will contribute to improving the OTP's investigative practices, thereby helping to build a stronger OTP.

In terms of methodology, we wish to highlight from the outset that, although we did conduct interviews with former and current ICC personnel and other experts, we have chosen to limit our analysis primarily to facts and findings that are supported by the public record.[13] We would also like to point out that, while we have included references to the stated policies and practices of the OTP and the Office's response to criticisms highlighted in this report to the extent such information is publicly available, [10] See e.g. H Fujiwara and S Parmentier, 'Investigations' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 573–5; M Bergsmo and M Keegan, 'Case Preparation for the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia' in Manual on Human Rights Monitoring: An Introduction for Human Rights Field Officers (Oslo: Norwegian Institute of Human Rights 2008) 6–9; M Keegan, 'The Preparation of Cases for the ICTY' (1997) 7 Transnational Law and Contemporary Problems 119, 120–5; S Brammertz, 'International Criminal Tribunals and Conducting International Investigations, Presentation Delivered at the Max Planck Institute' (July 2009) 7.

[11] In the context of the ICC, the Court's operations are divided into two broad categories: 'situations' and 'cases'. According to Pre-Trial Chamber I, 'situations' are 'generally defined in terms of temporal, territorial and in some cases personal parameters' and 'entail the proceedings envisaged in the Statute to determine whether a particular situation should give rise to a criminal investigation as well as the investigation as such'. Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-tEN-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 17 January 2006, para. 65. In other words, the 'situation' refers to the operations of the ICC designed to determine whether crimes have been committed within a given country that should be investigated by the Prosecutor. By contrast, 'cases' are defined as 'specific incidents during which one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court seem to have been committed by one or more identified suspects' and entail 'proceedings that take place after the issuance of a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear'. Ibid.

[12] International Criminal Court, Office of the Prosecutor, Draft Strategic Plan: 2013–15, 3 April 2013 (on file with authors).

[13] This is consistent with the approach adopted by the WCRO in all of the reports written as part of the ICC Legal Analysis and Education Project.

the fact is that information regarding the investigative process of any prosecution's office is understandably sensitive and, thus, public information available from the OTP on this subject is limited.

14.2 Organization and Administration of the OTP

14.2.1 Issues relating to the organization and administration of the OTP

As set forth in the Regulations of the OTP, the OTP is comprised of three divisions: the Prosecution Division;[14] the Investigation Division;[15] and the Jurisdiction, Complementarity, and Cooperation Division (JCCD).[16] The Prosecution Division is led by the deputy prosecutor,[17] while both the Investigations Division and the JCCD are led by a Head of Division.[18] In addition, the Office has an Executive Committee (Ex Com), 'composed of the Prosecutor and the Heads of the three Divisions of the Office',[19] which 'shall provide advice to the Prosecutor, be responsible for the development and adoption of the strategies, policies and budget of the Office, provide strategic guidance on all the activities of the Office and coordinate them'.[20] Finally, each division has a 'coordinator'. The Investigations Coordinator is responsible for ensuring that 'OTP investigations are conducted in compliance with the OTP Operational [M]anual and Ex Com instructions and provid[ing] advice on how to improve the quality of the investigations',[21] whereas the Prosecution Coordinator 'oversees the [14] Regulation 5 Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor, ICC-BD/05-01-09, 23 April 2009 ('ICC Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor'). The Prosecution Division is responsible for: '(a) the provision of legal advice on issues likely to arise during investigations and which may impact on future litigation; (b) the preparation of litigation strategies within the context of the trial team for the consideration and approval of [the Executive Committee] and their subsequent implementation before the Chambers of the Court; (c) the conduct of prosecutions including litigation before the Chambers of the Court; and (d) coordination and cooperation with the Registry, when required, on trial related issues'. Ibid., Regulation 9.

[15] The Investigations Division is responsible for the following: '(a) the preparation of the necessary security plans and protection policies for each case to ensure the safety and well-being of victims, witnesses, Office staff, and persons at risk on account of their interaction with the Court, in adherence with good practices and in cooperation and coordination with the Registry, when required, on matters relating to protection and support; (b) the provision of investigative expertise and support; (c) the preparation and coordination of field deployment of Office staff; and (d) the provision of factual crime analysis and the analysis of information and evidence, in support of preliminary examinations and evaluations, investigations and prosecutions'. Ibid., Regulation 8.

[16] JCCD is responsible for the following: '(a) the preliminary examination and evaluation of information pursuant to articles 15 and 53, paragraph 1 [of the Rome Statute] and rules 48 and 104 and the preparation of reports and recommendations to assist the Prosecutor in determining whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation; (b) the provision of analysis and legal advice to [the Executive Committee] on issues of jurisdiction and admissibility at all stages of investigations and proceedings; (c) the provision of legal advice to [the Executive Committee] on cooperation, the coordination and transmission of requests for cooperation made by the Office under Part 9 of the Statute, the negotiation of agreements and arrangements pursuant to article 54, paragraph 3 [of the Rome Statute]; and (d) the coordination of cooperation and information-sharing networks'. Ibid., Regulation 7.

[17] See ICC website, Structure of the Court: Office of the Prosecutor <http://www.icc-cpi.int/Menus/ICC/Structure+of+the+Court/Office+of+the+Prosecutor/> accessed 29 May 2013.

[18] Ibid. [19] Regulation 4(1) ICC Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor (n 14).

[20] Ibid., Regulation 4(2).

[21] ICC, Vacancy Announcement No. 1150EE-PO, 31 January 2012 <https://jobs.icc-cpi.int/sap/bc/webdynpro/sap/hrrcf_a_posting_apply?PARAM=cG9zdF9pbnN0X2d1aWQ9RTEzMTYyMTcxOEYy substantive legal work and joint teams, and reviews and approves all pleadings before filing'.[22] The JCCD Coordinator 'assists with the management of the Division and coordinates with the Investigations and Prosecution Coordinators'.[23] Since the creation of the position of Divisional Coordinators, the Coordinators have also been included in Ex Com consultations.[24]

Regulation 32 of the Regulations of the OTP provides that a 'joint team', composed of staff from each of the three divisions within the OTP, 'shall be formed upon a decision to proceed with an investigation in a situation, for the purpose of conducting the investigation'.[25] Regulation 32 further specifies that '[e]ach joint team shall regularly report its progress and activities to the Ex Com in order to receive strategic guidance'.[26]

The respective roles of the joint teams and the Ex Com were further explained in testimony provided by the lead investigator in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case, who testified at the request of the Trial Chamber regarding the 'conditions under which the investigation' in that case took place,[27] as well as her experiences as an OTP investigator generally.[28] Specifically, the investigator, who testified under a pseudonym, stated:

> The joint team is a concept in which the OTP conducts its investigations. It means that investigators, prosecutors and cooperation staff, we all work together from the very beginning of an investigation. The leadership of the joint team is comprised of the investigation team leader, a senior trial lawyer and an international cooperation adviser . . . Decisions in the joint team are taken jointly.[29]

The Katanga and Ngudjolo investigator went on to suggest that the leadership of the joint team is deeply involved in shaping the course of the investigations:

> The decisions on whom to interview [during the course of an investigation], they need to be discussed with the leadership of the joint team. So, of course, the whole joint team and its members meet regularly to discuss the way forward and potential sources and in the course of that discussion there can be disagreements and differences in view but, ultimately, it is the joint team that decides whom to interview and which sources to exploit.[30]

NDRGMUI2MDcwMDFCNzgzQjQ4QUEmY2FuZF90eXBlPUVYVA%3D%3D&sap-client=100&sap-language=EN> accessed 29 May 2013.

[22] G Townsend, 'Structure and Management' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 290. In the organizational chart of the OTP, the post of Prosecution Coordinator is situated within the Prosecution Division of the Office. See e.g. ICC, Proposed Programme Budget for 2012 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/10/10, 21 July 2011, 25.

[23] Email between the authors of the report and Olivia Swaak-Goldman, Head of the International Relations Task Force of the OTP's JCCD (11 October 2012).

[24] Ibid. [25] Regulation 32(1)–(2) ICC Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor (n 14).

[26] Ibid., Regulation 32(4).

[27] Transcript, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-81-Red-ENG, TC II, ICC, 25 November 2009, 5:9–5:10.

[28] See generally ibid.

[29] Ibid., 7:4–7:9. See also ibid. 29:17–29:19 ('We need to coordinate with each other when activities happen. It is—what is important to understand, that all decisions are made jointly with the three parts of the joint team').

[30] Ibid., 30:21–30:25.

Finally, she explained that, where there is disagreement among the members of the joint team, 'the decision will go to … senior management',[31] namely the Ex Com.[32]

This 'joint team' model stands in contrast to the organizational approach used at the ICTY, where teams have been headed by a single senior attorney, who is ultimately accountable to the chief prosecutor but who has broad autonomy to make decisions regarding the direction of the investigation and the case more generally.[33]

14.2.2 Recommendations relating to the organization and administration of the OTP

With regard to the structure of 'joint teams', it is not altogether clear that the tripartite decision-making structure is an improvement on the ICTY model, under which a single Senior Trial Attorney had the authority, inter alia, to provide 'direction and focus to the investigation'.[34] As Gregory Townsend has observed, the ICC's 'joint team concept perpetuates "a division between the Divisions"', as opposed to 'unifying the authority in a lead prosecutor assigned to a case (as do other tribunals)'.[35] This division may turn out to be 'natural and unproblematic', but only 'to the extent there is adequate coordination in practice and the guidance from the senior lawyers is followed'.[36] Otherwise, in the words of one OTP staff member interviewed by Townsend, the perpetuation of the division 'can produce bad results'.[37] Indeed, other OTP staff members interviewed by Townsend outright criticized the joint team concept on the grounds that it 'divides authority, requires consensus throughout, and can subject all decisions to a difficult interpersonal dynamic, likening it to a three-headed dragon'.[38] Furthermore, the need for three leaders to reach consensus on all or almost all decisions is likely to result in inefficiencies in the conduct of the investigation. More generally, it has been observed that '[m]anagement is … one of the most underdeveloped areas of the OTP, with poor results obtained in internal surveys',[39] suggesting that the current leadership structure is not being well received by the staff.

[31] Ibid., 30:10–30:11.

[32] Ibid., 31:1–31:8. Note, however, that the investigator also testified that she could not remember any 'substantive [disagreement] within [her] joint team that would have been taken up to the [E]xecutive [C]ommittee' over the course of the investigation. Ibid., 44:1–44:7.

[33] See e.g. Townsend (n 22) 237 (explaining the role of Senior Trial Attorneys at the ICTY and noting that, as of 2001, '[a] Senior Trial Attorney was assigned to a case once an investigation had been approved', giving 'direction and focus to the investigation'); Bergsmo and Keegan (n 10) 6 ('[At the ICTY,] [t]he senior lawyer on the team is the lawyer who works most closely with the case from the beginning of the investigation through the trial. That lawyer is responsible for the daily legal supervision during the entire case preparation process and normally drafts the indictment, drawing on the other lawyer(s) in the team. The leader of the team will normally be responsible, in consultation with the team legal adviser, for the preparation of a statement of facts or similar summary of the evidence which accompanies the draft indictment through the internal OTP review process and the submission to the confirming judge'). Note that, in several instances in this report, we compare the practices of the ICC OTP to those of the ICTY OTP, without mentioning the practice of other international criminal bodies. This is not to imply that the ICTY is the only other institution worth examining, but rather a product of the fact that public information regarding the investigative processes of all international criminal bodies is scarce, and the ICTY is the one institution about which we were able to find relevant information in the public record.

[34] Townsend (n 22) 237. [35] Ibid., 292. [36] Ibid. [37] Ibid.

[38] Ibid. (citing '[s]tatements of anonymous ICC OTP [Investigation Division] and [Prosecution Division] Staff Members').

[39] Ibid., 293.

We understand that, pursuant to the current OTP Operational Manual, which is not public, the representative of each division in the joint team takes lead responsibility on issues within his or her respective sphere of competence. According to Olivia Swaak-Goldman, Head of the International Relations Task Force of the OTP's JCCD, this development means 'that the leadership of the joint team should be thought of primarily as a coordination process to ensure all relevant expertise from each division is brought to bear on an issue, rather than a forum for creating gridlock or inefficiencies'.[40] Swaak-Goldman also explained that the 'creation of Divisional Coordinators who provide standardised guidance on operational issues to all joint teams further facilitates the process of harmonisation across the OTP'.[41] Nevertheless, because it may not always be clear which decisions fall within a division's sphere of competence, we recommend that day-to-day decisions be placed in the hands of a single member of the team, most likely a single trial attorney, who would be ultimately accountable to the prosecutor. Importantly, the Ex Com would continue to play a role in providing 'strategic guidance' to the joint teams,[42] and would also maintain its role in approving the joint teams' initial case hypotheses and the plans developed pursuant to those hypotheses, as well as any adjustments to the hypotheses and related plans over time. In addition, the Divisional Coordinators would continue to supervise the work of the joint teams, ensuring that issues within each division's area of expertise are being appropriately handled by the team. However, having a single leader at the team level would obviate the need for agreement on issues that may be seen to fall within more than one division's competence, thereby likely reducing inefficiency and avoiding the 'difficult interpersonal dynamic' at the decision-making level described.

14.3 Size and Composition of Investigation Teams

14.3.1 Issues relating to the size and composition of investigation teams

In the Lubanga case, the lead investigator, Bernard Lavigne, provided testimony relating to both the size and the composition of the first team to undertake an investigation in the DRC. Mr Lavigne testified that he had at most 12 people working under him and that he had always deemed this number to be 'insufficient'.[43] Notably, however, the first DRC investigation team was not unusually small. Indeed, in the OTP's proposed 2012 budget, the Office requested just 44 professional staff members for the 'Investigations Teams' section of the Investigations Division, which would need to be dispersed among the eight situations in which the Court was active at the time.[44]

[40] Email between the authors of the report and Olivia Swaak-Goldman, Head of the International Relations Task Force of the OTP's JCCD (11 October 2012).

[41] Ibid. [42] Regulation 32 ICC Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor (n 14).

[43] Transcript, Lubanga, Sintuation in the Democractic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-Rule68Deposition-Red2-ENG WT, TC I, ICC, 16 November 2010, 16 ('Lubanga, 16 November 2010 Transcript').

[44] See Proposed Programme Budget for 2012 of the International Criminal Court (n 22) 47. As a general matter, the proposed budget does not break down how many investigators would be assigned to each situation, but it does indicate that in 2011, the Libya investigative team consisted of ten professional-level staff members and one general services assistant, and that the team would maintain the same composition

Observers have stated that the ICC's first prosecutor purposefully adopted a 'small team' approach to investigations[45] as part of his stated strategy of carrying out 'short investigations'[46] with the aim of 'present[ing] expeditious and focused cases'.[47] This strategy has been defended on the ground that, as a practical matter, the resources of the OTP are finite and, in the words of the former Director of the JCCD, the Office 'need[s] a good selection and cannot investigate hundreds of similar incidents'.[48] The policy also reflects a conscious departure from the practice of the ad hoc ICTY and ICTR, which have been criticized for moving too slowly and, in some instances, bringing unnecessarily complex cases.[49] However, it appears that the policy of conducting expedited investigations with a limited number of investigators has led to certain problems.[50] For instance, according to a 2008 article published by the Institute for War and Peace Reporting, former ICC investigators working in Uganda, the DRC, and Sudan complained that, '[b]ecause they arrive in the country already focused on gathering evidence of a particular set of crimes, committed in specific locations and on specific dates … other atrocities are often overlooked'.[51] Furthermore, '[e]ven when in 2012. Ibid., 45. Specifically, in 2011 the Libya team consisted of one team leader (P-4), two investigators (P-3), five associate investigators (P-2), two assistant investigators (P-1), and one information management assistant (GS-OL). Ibid.

[45] A de Waal and J Flint, 'Case Closed: A Prosecutor without Borders', World Affairs, Spring 2009. See also International Federation for Human Rights ('FIDH'), 'The Office of the Prosecutor of the ICC—9 Years On', December 2011, 21 ('Pursuant to the policy of focused investigations, the Prosecutor decided at the outset that he would only need small investigation teams.'); M Wierda and A Triolo, 'Resources' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 143 ('The ICC OTP [has] pursued a policy of targeted investigations through small teams, which meant that fewer resources went into investigations than at other tribunals.'); P Kambale, 'The ICC and Lubanga: Missed Opportunities', Possible Futures, 16 March 2012 (discussing Moreno Ocampo's 'vision of light-touch investigations' in the Ituri region of the DRC, which involved a small team of investigators carrying out 'a short and focused investigation').

[46] International Criminal Court, Office of the Prosecutor, Prosecutorial Strategy: 2009–12, February 2010, para. 20. See also International Criminal Court, Office of the Prosecutor, 'Report on the Activities Performed During the First Three Years (June 2003–June 2006)', 12 September 2006, 15–16 (reporting that, in Uganda, a 'small team of investigators in a short time was able to focus its efforts on collecting the information necessary to link the crimes under investigation to those most responsible').

[47] See Report on the Activities Performed During the First Three Years (June 2003–June 2006) (n 46) 8. See also International Criminal Court, Office of the Prosecutor, Report on Prosecutorial Strategy, 14 September 2006, 5 ('The second principle guiding the Prosecutorial Strategy is that of focused investigations and prosecutions').

[48] K Glassborow, 'ICC Investigative Strategy Under Fire', Institute for War and Peace Reporting, 27 October 2008.

[49] See e.g. FIDH, 'The Office of the Prosecutor of the ICC—9 Years On' (n 45) 10 (explaining that Moreno Ocampo 'wanted to avoid long proceedings like those of the [ICTY and ICTR], which had sought to conduct exhaustive investigations in order to demonstrate the guilt of the accused'); Glassborow (n 48) (quoting the former Director of the Jurisdiction, Complementarity, and Compliance Division of the OTP as saying that the 'the ICC ha[d] learned lessons from cases at the international war crimes tribunals that came before it, like the trial of former Serbian president Slobodan Milošević at the [ICTY]', noting that it took the ICTY 'six years to prepare three separate indictments against Milošević, covering crimes committed in Bosnia, Croatia and Kosovo over the course of almost a decade' and that the 'accused died four years into the trial, before a judgement could be passed').

[50] See Wierda and Triolo (n 45) 144 (noting that the strategy of pursuing targeted investigations through small teams has been defended, in part, on grounds of 'cost-effectiveness', but that the strategy 'has also had its critics, who believe that this approach has been detrimental to both the scope and quality of investigations in ICC cases').

[51] Glassborow (n 48). See also E Baylis, 'Outsourcing Investigations', Legal Studies Research Paper Series, Working Paper No. 2010–20 (September 2009) 133 ('The [ICC OTP] investigators focus from investigators stumble across evidence of other crimes not on their initial list', they 'lack the time to investigate these properly, meaning that the alleged perpetrators are less likely to be charged'.[52] Thus, for example, investigators working on the first DRC investigation stated that, 'given more time and control in their investigation, they could have produced evidence to ground war crimes charges against [Thomas] Lubanga for killings and rapes, in addition to the child soldiers charge'.[53] It should be noted here that, according to a filing submitted by the prosecution in the Lubanga case, the OTP did initially plan to continue investigating Mr Lubanga in an effort to potentially add charges to the case after the arrest of the accused, but, as of June 2006, 'the ability of the [OTP] to investigate in the DRC, and in particular in the area of Ituri, [was] significantly limited by the security conditions in the region and the impact of the upcoming election period on these conditions'.[54] Nevertheless, the statements by the investigators suggest that investigations were being curtailed for reasons other than security concerns alone. Hence, while security issues and the overwhelming scale of atrocities may curtail the OTP's ability to investigate in certain circumstances, the question remains whether the OTP could be conducting more extensive investigations where possible. For instance, in the Ruto and Sang case, participating victims claimed that the OTP failed to conduct sufficient investigations into the eyewitness accounts of the victims of the post-election violence in Kenya and did not perform adequate on-site investigations, leading to a disconnect between the prosecution's case and the victims' experiences.[55] In particular, 126 of the victims who were authorized to participate in the confirmation proceedings in that case informed the Pre-Trial Chamber that they had never been interviewed by the OTP, nor were they aware of anyone else living in their locality who had been interviewed, and none was aware that the OTP had conducted on-site investigations in their localities.[56]

The 'small team' approach may also have negative effects on staff retention, as investigators hired by the OTP may begin to feel overstretched. Indeed, in a September 2008 letter from Human Rights Watch to the OTP's Ex Com concerning the Office's 'management practices',[57] the NGO observed that '[m]any experienced investigators [had] left the OTP since 2005', due in part to 'burn out' resulting from the fact that there were 'simply not enough of them to handle the rigorous demands for conducting investigations'.[58] Obviously, it is important for the OTP to retain qualified investigators the beginning on a predetermined set of incidents and suspects in a particular time frame, rather than exploring the situation comprehensively').

[52] Glassborow (n 48). See also Kambale (n 45) ('The investigative teams assigned to the Ituri situation were too undersized and too short-term to generate [a] good analysis of the intricately entangled criminal activities in this bloody part of Congo').

[53] Baylis (n 51) 136. Note that in other cases brought by the OTP to date, the charges have been much broader.

[54] Prosecutor's Information on Further Investigation, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-170, OTP, ICC, 28 June 2006, paras 2 and 7, fn 18.

[55] Request by the Victims' Representative for Authorization to Make a Further Written Submission on the Views and Concerns of the Victims, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-367, Victims' Representative, 9 November 2011, paras 9–10.

[56] Ibid., para. 10.

[57] Human Rights Watch, Letter to the Executive Committee of the Office of the Prosecutor (15 September 2008) 1.

[58] Ibid. See also Human Rights Watch, 'Courting History: The Landmark International Criminal Court's First Years' (July 2008) 48 (reiterating the same message regarding 'burn out' on the part of ICC investigators).

over time, not only to ensure the continuity of particular investigations, but also to add to the level of experience of the investigative staff and build up the institutional knowledge of the Office.[59] Finally, unduly restricting the size of the investigative team may force the OTP into the position of over-reliance on secondary source information.[60]

In terms of the composition of the first investigative team in the DRC, lead investigator Lavigne observed that, in his opinion, his team should have been comprised strictly of people who had 'a police background', but that '[i]t was decided…that people with more varied backgrounds should also be recruited', including 'former members of [NGOs] who could provide better open-mindedness to enable the other team members not to limit themselves to their police backgrounds'.[61] According to Mr Lavigne, this approach 'may have had a negative impact on the quality of the work'.[62] On the other hand, experience at the ICTY has demonstrated that '[i]nvestigating serious violations of international humanitarian law requires a multi-disciplinary approach, and requires operational teams of specialists who bring together a range of skills and capabilities'.[63]

14.3.2 Recommendations relating to the size and composition of investigation teams

As discussed in the previous section, while the first prosecutor's 'small team' approach to investigations has its benefits, there are many potential drawbacks to minimizing the size of investigative teams. Thus, although the make-up of any given investigation team will depend on the nature and demands of a particular investigation, the OTP may want to reconsider its 'small team' approach and recruit more investigators.[64] Additional investigators could be used to increase the size of each investigative team, and/or to increase the number of teams per situation. Notably, by contrast to the small teams at the ICC to date, investigative teams at the ICTY consisted of up to 20 members,[65] and there were up to ten separate teams operational at [59] See e.g. Townsend (n 22) 317 ('All international prosecutors' offices have faced human resources challenges. In terms of management, having quality staff working in unison is critical for these offices to function effectively. Recruiting and retaining highly skilled staff should be a priority') (emphasis added).

[60] For a discussion of problems arising out of the prosecution's over-reliance on secondary sources, see WCRO (n *) 73–8.

[61] Lubanga, 16 November 2010 Transcript (n 43) 16–17. Subsequently, Mr Lavigne explained that his team was comprised of investigators from various NGOs, including Amnesty International in Africa and the Belgium chapter of Lawyers Without Borders, the ICTY, and the United Nations Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo (MONUC), among others. See Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-Rule68Deposition-Red2-ENG, TC I, ICC, 17 November 2010, 42. The team also included a Congolese national that acted as a country expert and adviser to the other OTP investigation team members. Lubanga, 16 November 2010 Transcript (n 43) 18.

[62] Lubanga, 16 November 2010 Transcript (n 43) 16–17.

[63] ICTY and United Nations Interregional Crime and Justice Research Institute ('UNICRI'), ICTY Manual on Developed Practices (2009) 12.

[64] Several outside observers of the Court have made a similar recommendation. See e.g. Human Rights Watch, 'Courting History' (n 58) 48 (noting that 'it may be necessary to deploy more investigators at the outset to ensure that investigations are sufficiently comprehensive'); FIDH, 'The ICC, 2002–12: 10 years, 10 Recommendations for an Efficient and Independent International Criminal Court', 15 June 2012, 3 ('[T]he policy of limiting the size of the investigation teams should be revised to recruit professional investigators').

[65] Bergsmo and Keegan (n 10) 6.

a given time,[66] even though the geographic jurisdiction of the Tribunal was limited to the territories of the former Yugoslavia.[67]

Of course, expanding the number of investigators at the ICC will require greater resources. Importantly, as demonstrated by Table 14.1, which is based on budget estimates submitted by the OTP for the years 2007 through 2013, the number of professional staff[68] members employed in the 'Investigation Teams' sub-division of the OTP has decreased since 2007, despite the increase in the number of situations in which the Court is active.

Table 14.1 Budget Estimates OTP 2007-2013

Proposed Budget Fiscal Year	Number of Situations at the Time of the Budget Proposal	Number of Professional Staff Requested for Investigation Teams
2007	4[69]	52[70]
2008	4[71]	41[72]
2009	4[73]	44[74]
2010	4[75]	45[76]
2011	5[77]	46[78]
2012	6[79]	44[80]
2013	7[81]	46[82]

[66] See e.g. ICTY, Sixth Annual Report of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, A/54/187, S/1999/846 (31 July 1999) para. 126 ('Ten investigation teams, including a team established in 1998 dedicated to looking into the events in Kosovo, are responsible for conducting criminal investigations and gathering evidence in the former Yugoslavia in order to bring indictments against those responsible for violations of international humanitarian law').

[67] See Art 1 Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (adopted 25 May 1993, as amended 7 July 2009) ('The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991 in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute').

[68] Professional staff refers to employees classified as 'P-1' and above. See e.g. International Criminal Court, Proposed Programme Budget for 2007 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/5/9, 22 August 2006, 55.

[69] Uganda (29 January 2004), DRC (19 April 2004), Darfur (31 March 2005), CAR (7 January 2005).

[70] Proposed Programme Budget for 2007 of the ICC (n 68) 55.

[71] See (n 69).

[72] ICC, Proposed Programme Budget for 2008 of the ICC, ICC-ASP/6/8, 25 July 2007, n 43.

[73] See (n 69).

[74] ICC, Proposed Programme Budget for 2009 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/7/9, 29 July 2008, 46.

[75] See (n 69).

[76] ICC, Proposed Programme Budget for 2010 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/8/10, 30 July 2009, 48.

[77] Uganda (29 January 2004), DRC (19 April 2004), Darfur (31 March 2005), CAR (7 January 2005), Kenya (31 March 2010).

[78] ICC, Proposed Programme Budget for 2011 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/9/10, 2 August 2010, 49.

[79] Uganda (29 January 2004), DRC (19 April 2004), Darfur (31 March 2005), CAR (7 January 2005), Kenya (31 March 2010), Libya (26 February 2011).

[80] Proposed Programme Budget for 2012 of the International Criminal Court (n 22) 47.

[81] Uganda (29 January 2004), DRC (19 April 2004), Darfur (31 March 2005), CAR (7 January 2005), Kenya (31 March 2010), Libya (26 February 2011), Côte d'Ivoire (3 October 2011).

[82] ICC, Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/11/10, 16 August 2012, 55.

Table 14.1 also demonstrates that the OTP has largely resisted requesting resources from the ASP[83] for additional staff members for the Investigation Teams. Indeed, this seems to have been a point of pride for the Office, which has insisted that its 'lean and flexible joint investigation and trial teams' enable the Office 'to perform more investigations and prosecutions simultaneously, with the same number of staff'.[84] Given a number of States Parties' desire for a 'zero-growth' budget,[85] this approach has no doubt been welcomed by the ASP. However, critics have charged that it may lead to a situation in which the OTP is able to do less and less in each situation 'to square demand with limited resources' where 'just the opposite is required'.[86] Hence, assuming that the OTP maintains or even expands the number of investigations it is performing in the future, it will likely need to seek greater resources for its investigative teams. The United Nations Security Council's practice of referring situations to the Court without providing resources to support the Court's work in those situations makes increased funding even more critical.[87]

In terms of the composition of the investigation teams, it seems that, Mr Lavigne's complaints notwithstanding, the ICC has taken the right approach in recruiting members of the investigation team from varied backgrounds, instead of relying strictly on those with experience in law enforcement. Indeed, as stated earlier, experience at the ICTY has demonstrated that it is best to employ a multi-disciplinary approach when investigating serious international crimes.[88] Thus, the ICTY Manual on Developed Practices states that, 'in addition to investigators with a traditional police background, [83] The ASP to the Rome Statute 'consider[s] and decide[s] the budget for the Court'. Art 112(2)(d) Rome Statute.

[84] ICC, Second Status Report on the Court's Investigations into Efficiency Measures, ICC-ASP/8/30, 4 November 2009, 2.

[85] See e.g. R Corey-Boulet, 'Concern Over ICC Funding', Inter Press Service, 28 September 2011 (noting that, '[e]ven before the [Court's 2012 budget] proposal was submitted', 'key donors were issuing calls for zero growth in the court's budget'); B Evans-Pritchard, 'Mali Case Throws Spotlight on ICC Budget Constraints', Institute for War and Peace Reporting, 6 August 2012 ('For the past two years, the signatory states that decide the budget have adopted a policy of zero growth for the court, insisting that it free up funds by making cuts in "non-core" areas').

[86] Townsend (n 22) 293. See also R Hamilton, 'Closing ICC Investigations: A Second Bite at the Cherry for Complementarity?', Human Rights Programme Research Working Paper Series (May 2012) 2 ('[A] core challenge facing the [C]ourt's second prosecutor…will be to align the OTP's workload with its resources'); Human Rights Watch, 'Unfinished Business: Closing Gaps in the Selection of ICC Cases' (15 September 2011) 1 ('As Moreno-Ocampo prepares to leave office and hand over to a new prosecutor, states parties must confront the challenge of equipping the ICC to meet heightened expectations. As the court is asked to take on more situations, there is a risk that the ICC and its prosecutor will increasingly "hollow out" the court's approach to its situations under investigation. That is, the ICC may take on more situations, but do less and less in each situation to square demand with limited resources—especially in difficult economic times').

[87] See United Nations Security Council Resolution 1593, S/RES/1593 (2005) para. 7 ('[The Security Council] [r]ecognizes that none of the expenses incurred in connection with the referral [of the situation in Darfur] including expenses related to investigations or prosecutions in connection with that referral, shall be borne by the United Nations and that such costs shall be borne by the parties to the Rome Statute and those States that wish to contribute Voluntarily'); United Nations Security Council Resolution 1970, S/RES/1970 (2011) para. 8 ('[The Security Council] [r]ecognizes that none of the expenses incurred in connection with the referral [of the situation in Libya], including expenses related to investigations or prosecutions in connection with that referral, shall be borne by the United Nations and that such costs shall be borne by the parties to the Rome Statute and those States that wish to contribute voluntarily').

[88] See (n 63) et seq. and accompanying text.

teams require the services of military, criminal and political analysts, historians, demographers, forensic specialists and linguists', noting that '[a]ll groups of investigators can learn from each other'.[89] Of course, there are different ways of implementing a multidisciplinary approach. For instance, the investigative teams proper might be composed primarily of those with police backgrounds, who are then advised by experts in matters relating to politics, culture, linguistics, etc., or the investigators themselves may be drawn from a variety of backgrounds. The most important point in terms of composition seems to be that the OTP must prioritize the recruitment and retention of experienced investigators, including those with specific experience investigating international crimes and those experienced in questioning difficult witnesses. As Human Rights Watch has observed:

> By 'experienced' investigator, we mean an individual who not only has knowledge of the country situation under investigation but who also has a background in conducting investigations in different contexts (such as working in a national police force). Experienced investigators generally have better developed instincts, which can improve both the quality and efficiency of investigations overall. For instance, experienced investigators can more quickly identify and pursue leads linking crimes committed on the ground to senior officials who ordered them. Further, experienced investigators can help to mentor junior investigations staff, which can help strengthen the office's investigations over the longer term.[90]

Indeed, the importance of qualified, experienced investigators cannot be overstated. As the ICTY observed in its first annual report to the United Nations, 'the success of the Tribunal as a whole depends very much on the calibre of the investigative staff of the Office of the Prosecutor'.[91] While '[h]aving experienced and well-qualified prosecutors is important', the report continues, 'they can present cases to the Tribunal only based on the evidence gathered by the investigative staff', meaning that, '[i]f the prosecution evidence is not thorough and complete, or is insufficiently prepared, then the risk of prosecution failure is high'.[92]

Another option relating to the composition of investigation teams that may improve investigations is to hire nationals of the country being investigated and/or persons willing to be permanently located in the situation country or a neighbouring country for the duration of the investigation. Presently, members of the investigation team are all based in The Hague,[93] and thus are required to undertake repeated, short-term missions to the situation country to perform investigations. For instance, in the ten months following the opening of the investigation in Uganda in July 2004, OTP investigators conducted over 50 missions in the field.[94] Similarly, between July 2004 and September 2006, members of the OTP investigating the situation in Sudan conducted 'more than' 50 missions to 15 different countries, including three to Sudan.[95] According to Mr Lavigne, the lead

[89] ICTY and UNICRI, ICTY Manual on Developed Practices (n 63) 12.
[90] Human Rights Watch, 'Courting History' (n 58) 48.
[91] ICTY, First Annual Report of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia, A/49/342, S/1994/1007 (28 July 1994) para. 144.
[92] Ibid. [93] Human Rights Watch, 'Courting History' (n 58) 54.
[94] Report on the Activities Performed During the First Three Years (June 2003–June 2006) (n 46) 15.
[95] Ibid., 3, 19.

investigator on the first DRC investigation, investigators working on his team only spent on average of ten days in the field, on a rotating basis, which made it difficult to interview witnesses.[96] Research conducted by Human Rights Watch into the investigative practices of the OTP supports this claim. According to the organization:

> The opportunities for Hague-based investigators to interact and develop strong contacts with witnesses are limited in number and timeframe. The sometimes precarious security situation in each of the countries under investigation and the resulting restrictions on travel and movement mean that these opportunities may be limited further. Moreover, even when key witnesses agree to a specified time to meet with investigators, circumstances may change, rendering them unavailable by the time that the Hague-based members of the investigative teams travel to the field. Additional field missions may be required, adding to the already-rigorous travel schedule of investigative team members. This can lead to delays in investigations overall.[97]

Again, this state of affairs may be improved if at least a portion of the OTP's investigative team were located in the situation country on a permanent or semi-permanent basis. Of course, this may not always be possible due to security concerns and will have to be evaluated on a case-by-case basis. In addition, the Office will need to be cautious about potential bias, be it real or perceived, when engaging local actors as part of its investigation team.

14.4 Evaluating the Sufficiency of Evidence

14.4.1 Issues relating to evaluating the sufficiency of evidence

As set forth in the Introduction to this chapter, the Pre-Trial Chambers of the ICC have declined to confirm charges brought against nearly one-third, or approximately 28.6%, of the individuals who have undergone the confirmation process at the Court, leading to the dismissal of the cases against those individuals.[98] Notably, this is a substantially higher rate of dismissal than the acquittal rate seen at other international criminal bodies following a full trial,[99] even though the burden of proof at [96] Lubanga Judgment (n 9) para. 165; Lubanga, 16 November 2010 Transcript (n 43) 75.

[97] Human Rights Watch, 'Courting History' (n 58) 55–6.

[98] See (n 3) and accompanying text. Note that, '[w]here the Pre-Trial Chamber declines to confirm a charge, the Prosecutor shall not be precluded from subsequently requesting its confirmation if the request is supported by additional evidence'. Art 61(8) Rome Statute. However, to date, the OTP has not attempted to obtain confirmation of any of the charges dismissed by the PTC pursuant to this provision. This figure does not include the confirmation proceedings against Laurent Gbagbo, whose confirmation proceedings have been adjourned at the time of writing pending further investigation. See (n 4).

[99] For instance, in 2013, the ICTY had acquitted 18 individuals and convicted 69 individuals, while cases against 13 accused had been transferred to national jurisdictions and cases against 36 accused had been terminated either because the accused died or because the indictment has been withdrawn. See ICTY website, Key Figures <http://www.icty.org/sections/TheCases/KeyFigures> accessed 5 June 2013. This amounts to a 13% acquittal rate. At the ICTR 12 people had been acquitted and 46 had been convicted, while cases against four accused had been transferred to national jurisdictions and cases against four others had been terminated due to the death of the accused or a withdrawal of the indictment. See ICTR website, Status of Cases <http://www.unictr.org/Cases/tabid/204/Default.aspx> accessed 5 June 2013. This amounts to an acquittal rate of 18%. Neither the Special Court for Sierra Leone nor the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia have acquitted a single accused.

trial—beyond a reasonable doubt—is higher than the burden at the confirmation stage. One possible explanation for this is that the Pre-Trial Chambers have been too strict in evaluating whether the OTP has presented sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe the charges. Indeed, in the Mbarushimana case, one of the three judges on the Pre-Trial Chamber dissented from the decision, declining to confirm any of the charges against the accused, saying that the majority's findings were 'based on an incorrect application of the standard of "substantial grounds to believe" '.[100] Note, however, that the Appeals Chamber upheld the Mbarushimana majority's approach to evaluating the evidence at the confirmation stage of proceedings.[101] Another possible explanation is that the Office has simply moved too quickly in bringing its case before the judges, relying on the fact that it need only establish 'reasonable grounds to believe' to secure an arrest warrant or summons to appear[102] and 'substantial grounds to believe' to move the case to trial following a confirmation hearing.[103] On the one hand, proceeding in this fashion has some obvious benefits. As the Open Society Justice Initiative's Alison Cole explains:

> [I]t may be argued that the prosecutor must move swiftly and submit evidence to the judges as soon as each threshold is met at each successive stage in the legal proceedings. Under such an approach, the investigations continue through to the commencement of trial, with the prosecution only required to obtain the de minimis evidence required to prove each standard of proof, namely 'reasonable grounds to believe' for an arrest warrant, 'substantial grounds to believe' for confirmation of the charges, and 'beyond reasonable doubt' for trial. This approach to evidence collection has had the benefit of saving resources in the face of increased budgetary cuts. Additionally, there is the benefit of not delaying proceedings as a result of matters which can encumber an international court based outside the country where the alleged crimes took place, where violent conflict often continues during investigations.[104]
>
> Furthermore, once a suspect is in custody, moving forward with the confirmation proceedings before the investigation is complete may be necessary to comply with the Rome Statute's mandate that the confirmation hearing be held 'within a reasonable time after the person's surrender or voluntary appearance before the Court'[105] and [100] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Sanji Mmasenono Monageng, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 3) para. 2.

[101] See Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 16 December 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-514, AC, ICC, 30 May 2012. The Prosecution had challenged the majority's approach by appealing two issues relating to its evaluation of the evidence, namely: 'a. "Whether the correct standard of proof in the context of Article 61 allows the Chamber to deny confirmation of charges supported by the Prosecution evidence, by resolving inferences, credibility doubts and perceived inconsistencies against the Prosecution and thereby preventing it from presenting its case at trial"; and b. "whether a proper interpretation of the scope and nature of a confirmation hearing, as defined by Article 61, allows the Pre-Trial Chamber to evaluate the credibility and consistency of witness interviews, summaries and statements without the opportunity to examine the witnesses that would be possible at trial" '; ibid., para. 16. The Appeals Chamber dismissed both grounds of appeal. See ibid., paras 37–49.

[102] Art 58(1) Rome Statute.

[103] Ibid., Art 61(5).

[104] A Cole, 'Moreno-Ocampo's End of Term Report from ICC Judges: Could Do Better', The Guardian, 6 June 2012.

[105] Art 61(1) Rome Statute.

with the accused right to 'be tried without undue delay.'[106] In addition, as discussed above, there is considerable pressure on the OTP—from within the Court, from situation countries, and from the broader international community—to produce results quickly. Finally, the Office may impose a level of pressure on itself to move forward rapidly in line with its stated principle of 'maximiz[ing] the impact of the activities of the Office' in a way that promotes the Court's goals of ending impunity and preventing future crimes,[107] particularly in situations of ongoing conflict.

However, as evidenced by the decisions of the Court refusing to confirm either all or some of the charges against a number of suspects, the judges of various Pre-Trial Chambers are not satisfied with the sufficiency of the evidence being put forward by the prosecution at the confirmation stage. In fact, in a number of cases, judges have not only declined to confirm the charges set forth by the prosecution, but have openly expressed dissatisfaction with the prosecution's approach to the gathering of evidence in the case. For instance, in the Abu Garda case, in which the Pre-Trial Chamber unanimously declined to confirm any of the charges based on the lack of evidence,[108] Judge Cuno Tarfusser found it necessary to include a Separate Opinion in which he wrote that the 'lacunae and shortcomings exposed by the mere factual assessment of the evidence' presented by the prosecution were 'so basic and fundamental' that the Chamber should have completely refrained from analysing the 'legal issues pertaining to the merits of the case'.[109] On a more general level, in the two cases brought to date arising from the Kenya situation, Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, who dissented from the decision of the majority in each case confirming the charges against two of the three suspects, dedicated a portion of his dissent to 'clarify[ing] and summaris[ing] [his] views and expectations with regard to' the OTP's approach to investigations.[110] Specifically, Judge Kaul highlighted the fact that Article 54(1) of the Rome Statute requires that the prosecutor, '[i]n order to establish the truth … investigate incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally',[111] and suggested that any investigation that 'de facto is aiming, in a first phase, (only) at gathering enough evidence to reach the "sufficiency standard" required at the confirmation stage'[112] would fail to meet the Article 54(1) requirement. Moreover, such a limited investigation would, in Kaul's opinion, 'probably' lead 'to problems and difficulties not only for an effective and successful prosecution but also for the work of the Chamber concerned and for the Court in general'.[113] Indeed, Judge Kaul expressed his view 'that such an approach, [106] Ibid., Art 67(1)(c).

[107] Prosecutorial Strategy: 2009–12 (n 46) para. 23.

[108] See generally Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda (n 3).

[109] Separate Opinion of Judge Tuno Carfusser, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda (n 3) para. 3.

[110] Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 3) para. 43; Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 3) para. 48.

[111] Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 110) para. 44 (quoting Art 54(1)(a) Rome Statute); Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 110) para. 49 (quoting Art 54(1)(a) Rome Statute).

[112] Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 110) para. 47; Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 110) para. 52.

[113] Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 110) para. 47; Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 110) para. 52.

as tempting as it might be for the Prosecutor, would be risky, if not irresponsible: if after the confirmation of the charges it turns out [to be] impossible to gather further evidence to attain the decisive threshold of "beyond reasonable doubt", the case in question may become very difficult or may eventually collapse at trial, then with many serious consequences, including for the entire Court and the victims who have placed great hopes in this institution'.[114] Thus, Judge Kaul concluded that it is the 'duty of the Prosecutor to conduct any investigation ab initio as effectively as possible with the unequivocal aim to assemble as expeditiously as possible relevant and convincing evidence which will enable ultimately the Trial Chamber to consider whether criminal responsibility is proven "beyond reasonable doubt" '.[115]

Most recently, in Mbarushimana, the majority of the Pre-Trial Chamber criticized the OTP for including vague charges against the accused without evidence to back up those charges, suggesting that the OTP was hoping to continue investigating after the charges were confirmed.[116] Specifically, the Chamber expressed 'concern' at what it characterized as an 'attempt on the part of the Prosecution to keep the parameters of its case as broad and general as possible, without providing any reasons as to why [certain charges were not pleaded with greater specificity] and without providing any evidence to support the existence of broader charges, seemingly in order to allow it to incorporate new evidence relating to other factual allegations at a later date without following the procedure [governing amendments to the charges]'.[117] It went on to stress that the 'Prosecution must know the scope of its case, as well as the material facts underlying the charges that it seeks to prove, and must be in possession of evidence necessary to prove those charges to the requisite level in advance of the confirmation hearing'.[118] This finding was supported by the Appeals Chamber in its decision upholding the Pre-Trial Chamber's Decision declining to confirm the charges, in which the Appeals Chamber held that 'the investigation should largely be completed at the stage of the confirmation of charges hearing'.[119] The majority of the Mbarushimana Pre-Trial Chamber also determined that, with regard to those allegations that were pleaded with sufficient specificity, the prosecution failed to supply

[114] Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 110) para. 47; Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 110) para. 52.

[115] Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 110) para. 48; Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 110) para. 53.

[116] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 3) paras 81–2, 110. As noted, one of the three Judges on the Pre-Trial Chamber dissented from the decision declining to confirm any of the charges against the accused, saying that the majority's findings were based on an incorrect application of the standard of 'substantial grounds to believe'. Dissenting Opinion of Judge Sanji Mmasenono Monageng, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 3) para. 2.

[117] Ibid., para. 82. See also ibid., para. 110 ('[T]he Chamber wishes to highlight that the charges and the statements of facts in the DCC have been articulated in such vague terms that the Chamber had serious difficulties in determining, or could not determine at all, the factual ambit of a number of the charges'). Art 61(9) Rome Statute provides as follows: 'After the charges are confirmed and before the trial has begun, the Prosecutor may, with the permission of the Pre-Trial Chamber and after notice to the accused, amend the charges. If the Prosecutor seeks to add additional charges or to substitute more serious charges, a hearing under this article to confirm those charges must be held. After commencement of the trial, the Prosecutor may, with the permission of the Trial Chamber, withdraw the charges.'

[118] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 3) para. 82 (emphasis added).

[119] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 16 December 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Mbarushimana (n 101) para. 44.

adequate evidence in support of the charges, noting that in a number of instances, the prosecution either provided no evidence to support particular elements of the charged crime,[120] or relied on a single witness who was unable to provide relevant details[121] or anonymous hearsay statements not substantiated by other evidence.[122]

14.4.2 Recommendations relating to evaluating the sufficiency of evidence

The decisions discussed in the previous section suggest that, at least in some cases, the prosecution may need to postpone moving forward with a case until more thorough investigations have been conducted. Under some circumstances, this may necessitate seeking a postponement of the confirmation hearings, which the prosecution is authorized to do under the ICC's Rules of Procedure and Evidence,[123] subject to the requirement mentioned earlier that the confirmation hearing be held within a 'reasonable time' after the arrest or appearance of a suspect.[124] Absent extraordinary circumstances,[125] however, a better solution would be for the ICC prosecutor to adopt a policy similar to that applied by the prosecutor of the ICTY, which has held that '[i]deally a case should be ready for trial before an indictment is issued', meaning 'it should be the object of the Prosecutor's investigation to gather all necessary evidence before any charges are brought'.[126] While the prosecution is obviously not required to present all [120] See e.g. Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 3) para. 134 ('The Prosecution does not specifically allege that the acts relied on to support the charge of mutilation were carried out [REDACTED] was still alive and no evidence is provided to support the view that he was mutilated before, as opposed to after, he was killed. Accordingly, the Chamber is not satisfied that there is sufficient evidence establishing substantial grounds to believe that the crime of mutilation under either article 8(2)(c)(1)–2 or 8(2)(e)(xi)–1 of the Statute was committed by FDLR soldiers in Busurungi and surrounding villages in March 2009'); ibid., para. 135 ('No evidence was provided to the Chamber in relation to an attack against the civilian population in Busurungi on or about 28 April 2009'); ibid., paras 204–5 (noting that, although the prosecution alleged that the war crime of torture was committed in the village of Malembe in August 2009, 'no evidence of torture being committed during the attack on Malembe was provided to the Chamber').

[121] For instance, although the prosecution charged Mbarushimana with the war crime of attacking civilians in the village of Busurungi in late January 2009, the only evidence provided to support that the attack took place was the statement of one witness, who 'mentioned an attack on Busurungi around January or February 2009, but … did not provide any further details in relation to this attack'; ibid., paras 130–1. See also ibid., paras 204–6 (noting that the only evidence put forward by the Prosecution in support of the charge that the war crime of rape was committed in the village of Malembe in August 2009 was a statement from a single witness who 'mention[ed] that sexual violence might have been perpetrated in Malembe, without giving any further concrete information') (emphasis in original).

[122] See ibid., para. 117 (rejecting the prosecution's allegations that the accused bore responsibility for war crimes committed in the villages of Malembe and Busheke in late January 2009 because, '[i]n both cases the Prosecution relied only on a single UN or Human Rights Watch Report' to support the allegations, without providing 'any other evidence in order for the Chamber to ascertain the truthfulness and/or authenticity of those allegations', and in both cases the reports were themselves based on information from anonymous sources). For more on the Mbarushimana Pre-Trial Chamber's treatment of anonymous hearsay evidence, see WCRO, 'Investigative Management, Strategies, and Techniques of the International Criminal Court's Office of the Prosecutor' (n *) 75–6.

[123] Rule 121(7) Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002).

[124] Art 61(1) Rome Statute.

[125] Such circumstances may include the possibility of losing a unique opportunity to apprehend the suspect, which may cause the Prosecution to seek an arrest warrant before completing its investigation.

[126] ICTY and UNICRI, ICTY Manual on Developed Practices (n 63) 35.

of its evidence at the early stages of proceedings against a suspect, this approach would avoid unnecessary delays in holding the confirmation proceedings and ensure that the OTP is able to satisfy the Pre-Trial Chamber judges that it has met the standards required for the case to move to trial. At the same time, while conducting the investigation in stages may have the 'benefit of saving resources' in the short term,[127] in the long term it will be far more efficient if the Office initiates only those cases that it believes, from the start of the process, will lead to successful convictions. Completing an investigation against a suspect prior to seeking a warrant of arrest or summons to appear will also encourage compliance with Article 54(1)(a) of the Rome Statute, which, as discussed, requires that the prosecution 'investigate incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally'.[128] Indeed, even absent the requirement in Article 54(1)(a) that the prosecutor investigate both sides of a matter, it is simply a matter of best practice that the prosecutor be aware of any weaknesses in the case before moving forward. Lastly, despite the pressure on the OTP to move expeditiously in addressing the most serious crimes of concern to the international community, the credibility of the Office—and of the Court—will be greatly improved if the prosecution is seen to be limiting its cases to those supported by the necessary evidence. Thus, while Moreno Ocampo had promised early in his term that the ICC would deliver swift justice,[129] a focus on securing convictions, rather than on moving rapidly, would likely have had longer-term benefits for the Court.[130]

Of course, the ICC Appeals Chamber has held that the prosecution need not fully complete its investigation prior to the start of the confirmation proceedings in a case,[131] and we are not suggesting that the prosecution should be precluded from using evidence obtained after the charges have been confirmed. In fact, we recognize that certain witnesses—particularly insider witnesses—often need to be cultivated and may be more likely to come forward with information that is useful to the prosecution after perceiving that the case is progressing in court. However, as a policy matter, the prosecution should aim to complete as much of its investigation as possible before bringing a case before the Court. Interestingly, this is the stated policy of the OTP, as expressed in its 2006 and 2009 reports on prosecutorial strategy.[132] Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber presiding over the Kenyatta case noted that 'at least 24

[127] See (n 104) and accompanying text. [128] Art 54(1)(a) Rome Statute.

[129] J Bravin, 'Justice Delayed for Global Court, Ugandan Rebels Prove Tough Test; African Politics, Tactical Fights, Hamper Chief Prosecutor; No Trial Date in Sight: Who Will Arrest Mr Kony?', Wall Street Journal, 8 June 2006. See also (n 46) et seq. and accompanying text (discussing the first Prosecutor's stated strategy of carrying out 'short investigations' with the aim of 'present[ing] expeditious and focused cases').

[130] Cf. De Waal and Flint (n 45) (observing that Moreno Ocampo 'had set trial dates before his case was ready' because he was 'preoccupied with the wrong court—that of public opinion').

[131] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Appeal against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I Entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81 (2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006, para. 54. Specifically, the Appeals Chamber held that, 'ideally, it would be desirable for the investigation to be complete by the time of the confirmation hearing', but that 'this is not a requirement of the Statute'; ibid.

[132] See Prosecutorial Strategy: 2009–12 (n 46) para. 21 (explaining that the policy of the Office is to 'submit to the Chambers a request for an arrest warrant or summons to appear, based on the evidence collected, when the Office is nearly trial-ready, thus contributing to efficient Court proceedings').

of the prosecution's 31 fact witnesses were interviewed for the first time after the Confirmation Hearing' and 'a large quantity of documentary evidence appears to have been collected post[-]confirmation and to have been disclosed at a late stage'.[133] More broadly, the prosecution's inability to confirm any of the charges against four of the 15 suspects appearing before the Court suggests that its stated policy of completing as much of its investigation as possible prior to confirmation is not being implemented as a practical matter.

Another measure that may help to expose potential weaknesses in the prosecution's case and ensure that all necessary investigative steps have been undertaken before the OTP seeks an arrest warrant or summons to appear would be to implement a rigorous and formal 'peer review' process within the OTP similar to that used at the ICTY. Specifically, at least in the early years of its operation, the ICTY's OTP had a practice of internally reviewing draft indictments, before the case was ever presented to a judge, and even before the indictment was shared with the chief and deputy chief prosecutors,[134] for the purpose of 'eliminating factually or legally deficient charges'.[135] All staff members working in the OTP—including lawyers, investigators, and analysts[136]—would be invited to participate in the review, which looked at the draft indictment and any supporting material.[137] According to one description of the process written by two former legal advisers to the ICTY OTP, '[a]s many as 20–25 lawyers, who ha[d] been provided with and reviewed the relevant material, [could] participate in such reviews, which tend[ed] to be very thorough and [could] sometimes last several days'.[138] Following the assessment, those participating in the review would draft a full report of their conclusions, which sometimes included both a majority and a minority opinion.[139] Significantly, '[i]n most cases', a 'number of changes [were] made in the draft indictment following the review',[140] suggesting that the review process was critical to uncovering important weaknesses in the majority of instances before the case was filed. Furthermore, according to Richard Goldstone, the first Chief Prosecutor of the ICTY, the fact that this review was carried out before the indictment was presented to the chief and deputy chief prosecutors meant that the heads of the office could 'themselves review the indictment with fresh minds and without having become involved during the earlier processes'.[141] We understand

[133] Decision on defence application pursuant to Art 64(4) and related requests, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-728, TC V, ICC, 26 April 2013, para. 122.

[134] Email between the authors of the report and Richard Goldstone, former Chief Prosecutor of the ICTY (5 September 2012).

[135] Bergsmo and Keegan (n 10) 11. See also J-R Ruez, 'The ICTY Investigations' in I Delpla et al. (eds), Investigating Srebrenica: Institutions, Facts, Responsibilities (New York/Oxford: Berghahn Books 2012) 35 (in which the lead ICTY investigator of the Srebrenica massacre explains that the Prosecutor's office would hold an 'indictment review meeting' in order to 'determine which indictments should be brought before the court', noting that 'the least charges against individuals [were] relentlessly debated' at these meetings, as the Prosecutor had 'no intention of embarking on trials that [were] lost before they beg[a]n').

[136] Email between the authors of the report and Richard Goldstone, former Chief Prosecutor of the ICTY (5 September 2012).

[137] Bergsmo and Keegan (n 10) 11.

[138] Ibid.

[139] Email between the authors of the report and Richard Goldstone, former Chief Prosecutor of the ICTY (5 September 2012).

[140] Bergsmo and Keegan (n 10) 11.

[141] Email between the authors of the report and Richard Goldstone, former Chief Prosecutor of the ICTY (5 September 2012).

that the ICC OTP has, since its first case, 'instituted a practice of internal peer review that involves colleagues from other teams as well as the Legal Advisory Section in critically evaluating the evidence and/or the presentation of arguments at critical phases of the proceedings, such as before the confirmation of charges proceeding or the opening of trial'.[142] However, it is not clear that this process occurs routinely or on a mandatory basis, and, in any event, the process does not appear to take place until the confirmation of charges proceedings. Thus, we recommend that the OTP adopt a policy of routinely conducting rigorous reviews with colleagues from other teams much earlier in the process, ideally before an arrest warrant request is made.

Finally, the OTP's evaluation of the sufficiency of its evidence in a given case may be strengthened if, where possible, investigators were to interview the suspect(s) in the case during the investigation. Indeed, the Trial Chamber presiding over the Katanga and Ngudjolo case stated in its judgment acquitting Mr Ngudjolo based on an insufficiency of evidence that 'it would have been expedient … for a statement to be taken from the Accused during the investigation stage', explaining that Mr Ngudjolo 'opted to testify as a witness under oath at the end of the trial, when he was in possession of all the testimony received during the proceedings' and that the 'uniqueness of his testimony at the ultimate stage of the hearing failed to provide the Chamber with the opportunity to collate his testimony with prior testimonies, which would have proven invaluable'.[143] While nothing in the Rome Statute or Rules of Procedure and Evidence requires the prosecution to interview suspects, the Rome Statute does contemplate the possibility of such questioning and provides a number of rights to the suspect in the event he or she is interviewed by the OTP.[144] Of course, neither the prosecution nor the Chamber has the power to compel any individual, including the target of a case, to speak with the prosecutor, so this will only be an option where the suspect voluntarily agrees to submit to questioning by the OTP. Furthermore, there may be instances where the OTP simply cannot access the suspect or where other strategic considerations render such an investigation undesirable.

[142] Email between the authors of the report and Olivia Swaak-Goldman, Head of the International Relations Task Force of the OTP's JCCD (11 October 2012).

[143] Ngudjolo Judgment (n 7) para. 120.

[144] See Art 55(2) Rome Statute ('Where there are grounds to believe that a person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court and that person is about to be questioned either by the Prosecutor, or by national authorities pursuant to a request made under Part 9, that person shall also have the following rights of which he or she shall be informed prior to being questioned: (a) To be informed, prior to being questioned, that there are grounds to believe that he or she has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; (b) To remain silent, without such silence being a consideration in the determination of guilt or innocence; (c) To have legal assistance of the person's choosing, or, if the person does not have legal assistance, to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by the person in any such case if the person does not have sufficient means to pay for it; and (d) To be questioned in the presence of counsel unless the person has voluntarily waived his or her right to counsel'). Note that the ICTY Prosecutor chose to interview the suspects '[d]uring some investigations'. ICTY website, About the ICTY: Office of the Prosecutor: Investigations <http://www.icty.org/sid/97> accessed 29 May 2013. Unfortunately, the factors that the ICTY OTP considered in determining whether to conduct such interviews do not appear to be publicly available.

14.5 Conclusion

As set forth in the Introduction, the purpose of this chapter has been to examine some of the potentially problematic aspects of the manner in which the OTP has managed and carried out its investigations to date and offer recommendations that may improve the investigative process going forward. While we recognize that investigating international crimes is enormously challenging, and that the ICC's OTP has achieved a great deal in its first decade of operation, we hope that the recommendations contained in this chapter will contribute to an even stronger Office going forward.

15

The Selection of Situations and Cases by the OTP of the ICC

Fabricio Guariglia and Emeric Rogier

15.1 Introductory Remarks

The selection of situations and cases for investigation and prosecution in the context of international crimes is a thorny issue that has haunted all criminal jurisdictions to date: how to select from hundreds of instances of brutal victimization, each of them demanding restoration and accountability in equal terms; how to determine who, within a huge spectrum of individuals involved in those crimes, from foot soldier to general, from municipal leader to prime minister, should be singled out for prosecution. In the reign of radical evil,[1] is there truly room for pragmatic considerations and for attempts to maximize, in a utilitarian calculus, the positive impact of a confined number of investigations and prosecutions? Or rather, should a Kantian approach prevail, and thus all efforts be exhausted to ensure that every single instance of victimization and every single perpetrator is adequately dealt with? These questions are not new. Yet, they are still debated, over and over again, each time a new effort aimed at ensuring accountability, be it national or international, starts taking shape.

The manner in which any jurisdiction approaches this complex matter can have serious consequences and adversely affect its legitimacy and legacy. The selectivity of the post Second World War prosecutions at Nuremberg and Tokyo is frequently stressed in negative terms, including the well-known allegations of victor's justice and complete impunity of the Allies.[2] In the case of the Tokyo International Military Tribunal, the criticism of the Tribunal's selectivity was first formulated in the scathing dissents of some of its very own judges.[3]

* Fabricio Guariglia is Prosecutions Coordinator in the OTP, ICC.

 Emeric Rogier is Head of the Situation Analysis Section in the OTP, ICC. The views expressed herein are solely the authors' and do not necessarily reflect those of the OTP. This chapter draws in part on F Guariglia, 'The Selection of Cases by the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court' in C Stahn and G Sluiter, The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff, 2009), 209–217.

[1] Carlos Santiago Nino refers to the Kantian concept of 'radical evil' (offences against human dignity so widespread, persistent, and organized that normal moral assessment seems inappropriate) in the context of massive human rights violations. See C Nino, Radical Evil on Trial (New Haven, London: Yale University Press 1996) Introduction, vii.

[2] For a more balanced discussion of this aspect of the Nuremberg legacy, see M Kelly and T McCormack, 'Contributions of the Nuremberg Trial to the Subsequent Development of International law' in D Blumenthal and T McCormack (eds), The Legacy of Nuremberg: Civilising Influence or Institutionalised Vengeance? (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 101.

[3] See R Cryer, Prosecuting International Crimes (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2005) 43–8.

One could contend that in the case of the International Military Tribunals of Nuremberg and Tokyo the critical discussion surrounding the selection of the cases that were ultimately brought to justice was inextricably linked to the particular genesis of those Tribunals and its consequences in terms of their legitimacy. However, the vexing questions of if and how selectivity should take place can also affect jurisdictions that are far less problematic in terms of legitimacy, such as the UN-established ad hoc Tribunals. The ICTY—where a rich discussion took place as to the types of cases on which the Tribunal should focus its limited resources (the so-called big fish versus small fish debate, triggered by the arguably low level of first perpetrators to be indicted, such as Dusko Tadić or Drazen Erdemović)—provides a clear example.[4] The underlying philosophical question has been: should prosecutions before international tribunals focus on those at the top of the decision-making process, or should they also include individuals situated in lower positions, and even executioners?

The rationale behind the affirmative answer to the first limb of the question would be that cases brought against those individuals located at the superior echelons present a higher 'aggregate value'. Those at the top of the system are the ones that 'control the anonymous will of its components';[5] accordingly, who pulls the trigger is not that important, since executioners are merely replaceable parts. In addition, it has been stated that the prosecution of those in leadership positions will normally provide a 'broader narrative', and tell 'a broader story' about the crimes and their context than the prosecution of a low-level perpetrator.[6] Hence, the argument could be properly made that 'minor offences' and 'minor roles' should not be prosecuted, or at least not by international jurisdictions, and should be left for national authorities instead. From this viewpoint, the criticism of the ICTY's initial prosecutions would appear to be correct.

However, a number of arguments can be and have been offered in reply. First, it can be argued that within the universe of international crimes there is no such thing as 'minor crimes' and 'minor roles'. A single event in the Milošević Kosovo indictment, the massacre of Racak, involved the execution of over 40 civilians—an incident that would be viewed by all jurisdictions in the world as extremely grave. Erdemović, a perpetrator located at the lowest echelons of the chain of command, killed around 200 people under his own admission.[7] Under this competing logic, any jurisdiction dealing with crimes of this scale should refrain from getting entangled in superficial numeric calculations and overly simplistic divisions of roles, when reality shows that gravity is widespread and that all individuals involved play important roles that enable the commission of the crimes. In addition, the perpetration of low-level perpetrators can 'bring home' the 'daily aspect of the abstract narrative of ethnic cleansing', explaining how ordinary people participated in killing and brutalizing their fellow human beings,[8] thus making visible in a powerful way the macro-criminality of genocide, war crimes, or crimes against humanity, which otherwise may end up being [4] See P Akhavan, 'Justice in The Hague, Peace in the Former Yugoslavia?' (1998) 20 Human Rights Quarterly 777.

[5] In the words used by the Argentine Court of Appeals for the Federal District of Buenos Aires in the Juntas trial judgment, applying a theory of co-perpetration by means to hold the commanders criminally responsible; reprinted in (1988) 8 Human Rights Law Journal 415–17.

[6] Akhavan (n 4) 778–9.

[7] Judgment, Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, AC, ICTY, 7 October 1997.

[8] Akhavan (n 4) 780.

perceived by the general public as something akin to a natural catastrophe, a non-human event.[9] It may be precisely in cases involving low and mid-level perpetrators that criminal prosecutions are particularly adequate to enable the transformation of a cog in a wheel back into a human being.[10]

The proposition that will be defended here is that any justice system that wishes to adequately deal with international crimes should first be aware of its limitations and avoid unrealistic expectations. The beneficial effects of criminal prosecutions for gross violations of international humanitarian law and human rights law—which include providing 'great occasions for social deliberation and for collective examination of the moral values underlying public institutions',[11] and perforating the dominant narratives created by the groups involved in the crimes and shattering the accompanying 'states of denial' by which societies refuse to accept even the very existence of the crimes[12]—can be otherwise jeopardized. Pretending that no choices will be made, i.e. that no case will be prioritized while others are deferred or even sidelined, is not only dishonest, but also inefficient: such a position merely masks the unavoidable and 'unofficial' selection processes, thereby effectively precluding the formulation of transparent criteria and the scrutiny of the manner in which those criteria are applied in practice. As one commentator puts it, the question is not 'whether selective prosecution should occur, as it is essentially impossible that it does not, but when selective prosecution is unacceptable'.[13]

But the ICC's particular features imply that selectivity is not confined to the selection of cases, understood as confined episodes of victimization, for investigation and prosecution, but before that, to the selection of entire situations—a term that has been understood as denoting the 'situation of crisis' during which crimes under the jurisdiction of the Court are committed.[14] This poses additional and unique challenges to the Court, and to the OTP in particular, which will be discussed in the next section.

[9] For a discussion of the need—and the limitations—of the criminal justice system to translate this macro-criminality into tangible instances of human conduct, see H Jäger, 'Betrachtungen zum Eichmann-Prozeß' (1962) 45 Monatsschrift für Kriminologie und Strafrechtsreform 73–83.

[10] H Arendt, Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil (New York: Penguin 1992) 289. A valid question, however, is whether in the case of low-level perpetrators at least some of the same goals cannot be achieved through mechanisms other than the criminal process; see for instance the community reconciliation in Timor-Leste, and the reintegration of perpetrators of past wrongs into their communities, which successfully involved 1,371 perpetrators (for a report, go to <http://www.ictj.org/static/Timor.CAVR.English/09-Community-Reconciliation.pdf> accessed 10 August 2014).

[11] Nino (n 1) 131.

[12] The term is taken from the homonymous book by Stanley Cohen. As Cohen explains, within the elementary forms of denial there are those which operate as collective defence mechanisms developed to cope with guilt, including the creation of myths and the adoption of unspoken arrangements for concerted or strategic ignorance. See S Cohen, States of Denial: Knowing about Atrocities and Suffering (Maiden, MA: Blackwell Publishers 2001) Chapter 1, 'The elementary forms of denial'.

[13] Cryer (n 3) 192, noting that even in those systems where the principle of mandatory prosecution (Legalitätsprinzip) prevails, there is recognition that processing all cases is simply not possible.

[14] On the definition and scope of the term 'situation' see R Rastan, 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court (2012) 23 Criminal Law Forum 1.

15.2 The Selection of Situations by the OTP

The ICC, contrary to the ad hoc tribunals, is a permanent court, which aspires to universality. As such, it has to select situations where to exercise jurisdiction. In ten years, the number of States Parties has increased from 60 to 123, i.e. the territorial jurisdiction of the ICC has expanded by 100%. It means that two states out of three are States Parties. A number of important states in terms of population and international weight are missing, but the 'playing field' is wide and difficult enough for a selection inevitably to occur—and for this selection inevitably to raise criticisms. It is the OTP that operates this selection, to a large extent, and it is the driving force behind the process, which is inherently controversial; and because of its nature, the organ in charge of it inevitably focuses criticisms. For instance, ten years after the beginning of its practical life, the ICC and the OTP are criticized for having opened investigations in Africa only, which does not fit well with the universal vocation of the Court.[15]

The fact that these criticisms emerged in a certain political context and some of them were put forward by the very same persons targeted by the ICC prosecutions does not mean they should be treated lightly. These criticisms go to the heart of the legitimacy of the institution.

The paragraphs that follow will seek to explain how the selection process functions in practice—the so-called preliminary examinations—and why the outcome so far has been what it is, and will outline some prospects for the future.[16]

15.2.1 The process

The OTP is in charge of selecting situations but is not a free rider. The Statute has set clear criteria governing the process, and once these criteria are met, the duty of the Prosecutor is to proceed. S/he has limited discretion not do so, and is subject to scrutiny. If s/he assesses that the criteria are met to investigate on his/her own volition, s/he has first to seek authorization and his/her decision will be reviewed.[17] If s/he decides not to act upon a referral, her/his decision may also be subject to review, which is mandatory if the decision not to investigate is reached on the basis of the 'interests of justice' (Article 53(1)(c) and (3)(b)).

There is a wide variety of situations; each is unique and may be brought to the prosecutor's attention through any of the so-called triggering mechanisms. Regardless of the channel though which the situation reaches the OTP, the same principles and criteria are applied.

[15] See Schabas, Chapter 16, this volume.

[16] The process and criteria governing preliminary examinations are explained in detail in the November 2013 OTP Policy Paper on preliminary examinations <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/policies%20and%20strategies/Pages/draft%20policy%20paper%20on%20preliminary%20examinations.aspx> accessed 10 August 2014.

[17] On the scope of the Prosecutor's proprio motu powers, see F Guariglia, 'Proprio Motu Powers of the Prosecutor to Commence Investigations' in A Zidar and O Bekou (eds), Contemporary Challenges for the International Criminal Court (London: British Institute of International and Comparative Law 2014) 93 et seq.

As will be discussed in more detail in the following section, the OTP is guided in this process by the principles of independence, impartiality, objectivity, and non-discrimination. The Office is well aware that a politicized decision to proceed or not to proceed would be inconsistent with the law, would adversely impact on the legitimacy of the institution, and ultimately would be a recipe for failure. Cases brought for political reasons are bound to fail. Still, the Office may be subject to pressures from multiple sides: for instance, NGOs which consider that a situation is ripe for investigation, and concerned states which consider that it is not, unless an investigation is seen as a convenient means to marginalize opponents or troublemakers. Some states may attempt to lobby against the opening of a preliminary examination, or the opening of an investigation; others may attempt to lobby against the closure of a preliminary examination. However, in all cases, and regardless of the pressures, the Office has to make an independent and objective assessment of the Rome Statute criteria: jurisdiction, admissibility, and interests of justice.

15.2.2 Outcome

In a little over a decade, the Office has opened 22 preliminary examinations. Contrary to the belief that preliminary examinations never end, 12 were actually completed, with eight leading to an investigation and four to a decision not to proceed; ten are ongoing. The controversial fact is that this process has led to opening investigations in African countries only. How can this reality for which the ICC has been so criticized, and often disingenuously, be explained? Let us look at the facts.

First, let us discuss the eight preliminary examinations that led to the opening of an investigation.

It is acknowledged that most of the situations were referred by states themselves or by the UNSC, but this does not suffice to explain why a positive decision was reached. The OTP has to make its own evaluation, and in the referrals mentioned here it reached a positive decision on the basis of its own assessment. The questions are therefore: Was it wrong in some instances? Was there any decision made without the requisite reasonable basis? The answers to these questions are negative. Ultimately, Chambers of the Court have concurred with the OTP assessment that a situation had to be opened, with the Kenya and Côte d'Ivoire situations being clear examples of this.

The OTP could perhaps be criticized for taking its decisions too late or too quickly, but the decisions made were in any event consistent with the OTP's duties under the Statute.

Second, what can be said about the decisions not to proceed, such as with Iraq, Korea, Palestine, or Venezuela? The fact that all of those situations were outside Africa could be portrayed as reflective of a biased policy decision by the former prosecutor to focus on African countries and avoid getting involved in politically complex situations. This, however, would be a groundless and speculative assumption. In each of those four situations, there were clear legal grounds to reach the conclusion that one or more of the Article 53(1) criteria were not met: preconditions for jurisdiction were initially not met in the Palestinian case because Palestine was not recognized as a state in the UN at the time;[18]

[18] See the OTP decision, Situation in Palestine, 3 April 2012 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/9B651B80-EC43-4945-BF5A-FAFF5F334B92/284387/SituationinPalestine030412ENG.pdf> accessed 10 August 2014. On 16 January 2015, the Prosecutor opened a preliminary examination. See OTP Press Release, ICC-OTP-20150116-PR1083, 16 January 2015. For analysis, see Chapter 8 (El Zeidy) in this volume.

subject matter jurisdiction was not met in Korea[19] and Venezuela;[20] and gravity was not met in Iraq.[21] In any case, the decisions could be revisited on the basis of new facts or evidence, which is actually happening. For instance, the Office has received new communications and information on alleged crimes committed by UK forces in Iraq, and has subsequently reopened a preliminary examination into this situation and the situation in Palestine.[22]

Third, what about the ongoing preliminary examinations? At the time of writing this chapter there are ten ongoing preliminary examinations involving three different continents. In 2014 the Office opened a new preliminary examination in Ukraine[23] and also one in CAR, since a new situation has occurred which warranted this step being taken.[24]

The geographic variety of situations under preliminary examination is illustrative of the fact that the ICC–OTP is actually not focusing on Africa, even though this may not be sufficient to persuade sceptical minds. Paradoxically, the OTP was also criticized for examining certain situations for too long, as if it was dragging its feet to open an investigation. This requires some explanation.

A preliminary examination can indeed take time. This is due to a number of factors:

- Establishing subject-matter jurisdiction, i.e. the effective commission of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court in the situation in question, requires some time. This can be especially challenging when potential information providers are not forthcoming due to security, disclosure, or political concerns. The powers of the Office at the preliminary examination stage are also limited. The Office is therefore dependent on information provided to it. It can and should seek to verify information, and can request additional information but cannot collect directly from victims or witnesses in the field. Additionally, some situations are extremely complex, involving [19] See the OTP's Situation in the Republic of Korea: Art 5 Report, June 2014 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/comm%20and%20ref/pe-cdnp/korea/Pages/article-5-report.aspx> accessed 10 August 2014.

[20] See the OTP's response to communications received concerning Venezuela, 9 February 2006 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/comm%20and%20ref/pe-cdnp/venezuela/Pages/otp%20letter%20to%20senders%20reply%20on%20venezuela.aspx> accessed 10 August 2014.

[21] See the OTP's response to communications received concerning Iraq, 9 February 2006 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/comm%20and%20ref/pe-ongoing/iraq/Pages/otp%20letter%20to%20senders%20reply%20on%20iraq.aspx> accessed 10 August 2014.

[22] See the Prosecutor's statement, 'Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, Fatou Bensouda, reopens the preliminary examination of the situation in Iraq', 13 May 2014 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/reports%20and%20statements/statement/Pages/otp-statement-iraq-13-05-2014.aspx> accessed 10 August 2014. On Palestine, see above (n 18).

[23] See the OTP's statement of April 2014 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/comm%20and%20ref/pe-ongoing/ukraine/Pages/ukraine.aspx> accessed 10 August 2014.

[24] See Statement of the Prosecutor of the ICC, Fatou Bensouda, on opening a new preliminary examination in Central African Republic, 7 February 2014 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/reports%20and%20statements/statement/Pages/otp-statement-07-02-2014.aspx> accessed 10 August 2010.

multiple crimes, multiple sub-situations, and waves of violence (e.g. Nigeria, Honduras).

- Assessing complementarity can also take time. The complementarity assessment must factor in differing views and analysis, including those put forward by states and NGOs. The OTP approach has been to promote complementarity on the basis of a proper assessment of what is really taking place at the national level. For this, OTP will collate and analyse the different views expressed—for instance, it will request from NGOs examples of cases allegedly not genuinely prosecuted, and from states, examples of cases where the national authorities are purportedly doing a proper job. It is acknowledged that in some cases states may fulfil their investigative or prosecutorial duties primarily to keep the ICC at bay, or, at the other end of the spectrum, to prepare a dossier for the ICC. One could call this negative complementarity. The role of the Office is to scrutinize these processes, reach proper conclusions, and press the relevant domestic authorities to conduct a genuine investigation or prosecution.
- If the policy is not to open an investigation when there are reasonable prospects that the state(s) vested with jurisdiction will perform adequate investigations and/or prosecutions, then it is only natural that in appropriate instances, the Office may decide to give states the time that they need. This is a positive development, to the extent that it bolsters justice delivered within the same situation, reduces the impunity gap, and allows for a process of national justice. If, for instance, the Kenyan authorities had availed themselves of the opportunity offered by the OTP to commence their own investigations and proceedings,[25] there would not have been a need for an exercise of propio motu powers by the OTP in the situation.

Therefore, there are proper reasons to explain why, if the selection of situations has so far led to opening investigations in Africa only, this is not the product of a deliberate choice by the OTP. Some will nonetheless argue that it was the OTP's presumed sponsors, the states, or, worse even, the UNSC that seized the ICC. Hence, this section of the chapter will conclude with some observations on triggering mechanisms.

15.2.3 Observations on triggering mechanisms

Does the specific triggering mechanism make a difference in terms of opening an investigation? In other words, is a situation that has been referred to the ICC more likely to be investigated than a situation brought to the prosecutor's attention through Article 15 communications?

Some clarifications are required here: first, it would be wrong to argue that communications never lead to anything or are not followed through, or that the Office received more than 10,000 communications in the last decade (this is correct) and not a single one led to an investigation. True, the Office continues to receive a large number of communications that are manifestly outside ICC, and those are dismissed. It is also true that in the ordinary course of events, a single communication will not be enough to trigger an investigation because it will fail to constitute a reasonable basis as such. However, all relevant communications contribute to the Office's overall information in relation to, and understanding of, a given situation. Furthermore, the OTP has used twice in the past its proprio motu powers on the basis of, inter alia, Article 15 communications received (Kenya and Côte d'Ivoire). Even in the case of referrals, the OTP usually seeks additional information before making a decision, and therefore a determination of reasonable basis usually includes Article 15 communications. So communications are considered and used, especially when they allege and document the commission of crimes actually falling within the ICC jurisdiction.

[25] See notably Agreed Minutes of Meeting of 3 July 2009 between the ICC Prosecutor and the Delegation of the Kenyan Government <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/comm%20and%20ref/pe-cpi/kenya/Pages/agreed%20minutes%20of%20meeting%20of%203%20july%202009%20between%20the%20icc%20prosecutor%20and%20the%20dele.aspx> accessed 10 August 2014.

Irrespective of the triggering mechanism, the test remains the same: a reasonable basis to proceed (Article 53(1)). However, in the case of a referral, there is an expectation that the OTP will proceed unless contrary criteria are met. This is due to practical reasons: a situation is usually not referred without reasons underlying the referral as well as supporting material being provided. Further, cooperation is in principle forthcoming, which helps to expedite the process. Of course, referrals can be opportunistic, and/or driven by political expediency rather than a strong sense of justice. But this does not detract from the fact that every referral is an opportunity to do justice. Further, the Prosecutor is referred a situation, and not specific individuals or specific crimes, and will decide independently which cases to pursue. Thus, the Prosecutor and her Office cannot be easily instrumentalized.

However, it is recognized that despite the prosecutor's ability to resist instrumentalization, the fact that referrals by states or the UNSC may be politically motivated can impact on the credibility of the OTP and the Court: when the OTP does not receive a referral from the UNSC that would seem warranted, it is not blamed for this, but that fact is seen as evidence of its dependence on great powers. When the OTP does receive and accept a self-referral from a politically motivated state, it may be seen as colluding with this state and consenting to manipulation. The use of self-referrals, a mechanism that, although perfectly compatible with the Statute, was not really expected when it was drafted,[26] has also fuelled the debate about the political utilization of the ICC.

Finally, it may happen, in the future, that the Prosecutor decides not to act upon a referral, and this decision may also be portrayed as a political one. It is important to note, however, that in such a case the decision not to proceed can be subject to review upon request from the referring state or even proprio motu if the conclusion is that an investigation would not serve the interests of justice. This enables the Pre-Trial Chamber to assess whether the decision was consistent with the Statute (Article 53(3)).

Once the OTP decides to open an investigation, the focus shifts to the cases that should be brought forward for prosecution. As already advanced, here again, selectivity is unavoidable. The question then becomes what criteria and procedures guide OTP in this task, and this will be discussed in the next section.

[26] For a discussion, see D Robinson, 'The Controversy over Territorial State Referrals and Reflections on ICL Discourse' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 355.

15.3 The Selection of Cases by the OTP

15.3.1 Governing principles

If, as discussed, the question of which cases should be singled out for prosecution and under which criteria is always a central one, in the ICC it becomes particularly critical due to the global nature of the Court (which implies the existence of multiple situations, each containing hundreds or even thousands of potential individual cases) and its necessarily finite resources. The OTP has developed the following guiding principles for the purposes of selecting cases for prosecution:[27]

- Independence: In accordance with its duties under Article 42(1), the OTP acts independently, and members of the Office 'shall not seek or act on instructions from any external source'. However, the duty of independence goes beyond simply not seeking or acting on instructions. It also means that the selection process is not influenced by the presumed wishes of any external source, the importance of the cooperation of any particular party, or the quality of cooperation provided. The selection process is conducted exclusively on the available information and evidence and in accordance with the Statute criteria and the policies of the Office.[28]
- Impartiality: The concept of impartiality is most frequently applied with respect to judges, but it is also a relevant principle in the context of case selection by the OTP. In situations involving multiple groups with potential responsibilities, the OTP conducts its selection analysis in a non-partisan manner, applying the same methodology and standards for all groups. In the view of the OTP, impartiality or even-handedness does not mean 'equivalence of blame' or that all groups must be prosecuted regardless of the evidence. It means that the Office will apply the same methods, the same criteria, and the same thresholds for all groups in determining whether the level of criminality meets the thresholds warranting investigation or prosecution. Thus, impartiality may in fact require different outcomes for different groups, if some groups did not commit crimes or their crimes do not meet the thresholds to warrant prosecution before the Court. The relevant consideration is that OTP strives to follow a coherent rule, whereby like cases are treated alike.[29]
- Objectivity: The OTP will investigate and consider incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally, in order to establish the truth (Article 54(1)(b)). This [27] The following section closely follows a draft paper on selection criteria which the OTP distributed in July 2006 in the course of a meeting with NGO representatives, as well as the more recent November 2013 Policy Paper on preliminary examinations, referred to in (n 16). While the latter effectively subsumes the prohibition of adverse discrimination into 'impartiality' (see para. 28 and n 15), the criterion is left in this article for case selection, since it seems to be anchored in existing international case law (see the ICTY Appeals Chamber Delalić ruling quoted at n 30).

[28] The word 'information' refers to selection processes for the opening of an investigation under Art 53(1) of the Rome Statute. The word 'evidence' is used to refer to cases addressed under Art 53(2).

[29] To use a measure for legitimacy at the international level proposed by Thomas Franck, quoted by Cryer (n 3) 196.

means, for example, that an initial hypothesis that a particular person or group warranted prosecution may be rejected after investigation. The policy of the OTP is to apply this principle during the pre-investigation phase of situation selection as well as in the course of an investigation; thus the OTP will consider any factors either supporting or undermining a reasonable basis to proceed with investigation.

- Non-discrimination: The principle of non-discrimination flows from, and is subsumed by, the principles of impartiality and objectivity. It is nonetheless worth highlighting that the selection process of the OTP does not draw any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender, age, race, colour, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth, or other status (Article 21(3)). Under a leading case in international criminal law (the so-called Čelebići case), the ICTY Appeals Chamber stated that the prosecution's discretion to determine whom to prosecute must remain undisturbed, except where it can be demonstrated that there are unlawful or improper motives for prosecution, including discriminatory ones.[30]

15.3.2 When to move forward?

Gravity is an overarching consideration as a critical admissibility factor which must be analysed before any decision to investigate or to prosecute is made. Although any crime falling within the jurisdiction of the Court is a serious matter, the Statute (Articles 53(1)(b) and (2)(b), and 17(1)(d)) clearly foresees and requires an additional consideration of 'gravity'. Thus, even where subject matter jurisdiction is satisfied, it must still be determined whether the case is of sufficient gravity 'to justify further action by the Court'.[31] The gravity requirement is also reflected in Article 8(1), which is not part of the definition of war crimes, but rather an indication that the Court should focus in particular on war crimes 'when committed as part of a plan or policy or as part of a large scale commission of such crimes'.[32]

The OTP has expressly declined to open an investigation on the basis of individual communications due to lack of gravity (Iraq report, noting that the conduct attributed to nationals of the relevant State Party included no more than 20 victims counted)[33]

[30] Judgment, Delalić et al. (Čelebići case), IT-96-21-A, AC, ICTY, 20 February 2001, para. 611.

[31] Whereas Art 53(1) refers to admissibility of 'the case', it appears that the article is simply following the wording of Art 17. At the stage of initiating an investigation, there is not yet a 'case'. Hence, in the view of the OTP, it is necessary to consider the situation in a generalized manner, taking into account the likely set of cases that would arise from investigation of the situation.

[32] Given that Art 8(1) uses the term 'in particular', the Office has concluded that there is scope to consider other war crimes in exceptional circumstances; for example, where an isolated war crime results in a large number of victims or some other great impact.

[33] Update on Communications Received by the Prosecutor, 10 February 2006 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/reports%20and%20statements/statement/Pages/update%20on%20communications%20received%20by%20the%20prosecutor.aspx> accessed 10 August 2014; Annex 1: Iraq Response <http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/F596D08D-D810-43A2-99BB-B899B9C5BCD2/277422/OTP_letter_to_senders_re_Iraq_9_February_2006.pdf> accessed 10 August 2014.

and has made it clear that it intends to intervene only in relation to situations and cases that meet a certain threshold of gravity, consistent with the letter and the spirit of the Statute. Factors that the OTP will consider when analysing gravity include the scale of the crimes, the nature of the crimes, and the manner of their commission. In this context, 'scale' means more than just numbers, and may include consideration of temporal or geographical intensity. As to the nature of the crimes, the OTP recognizes that all crimes under the Statute are very serious. Nonetheless, in practice it has highlighted some crimes of particular concern, thus far including killing, rape, and child conscription. The OTP also considers other particularly aggravating aspects in the manner of commission of the crimes. This may include particular cruelty, crimes against particularly defenceless victims, crimes involving discrimination on grounds referred to in Article 21(3), or abuse of de jure or de facto power (e.g. the responsibility to protect).[34] The OTP considers as relevant factors whether the crimes deliberately targeted civilians, vulnerable groups, or persons involved in a humanitarian assistance or peacekeeping mission, as well as crimes intended to obstruct justice (particularly those targeting ICC witnesses or staff) and crimes committed with intent to spread terror.[35] Recently, the OTP has adopted a new Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes (June 2014), which emphasizes the gravity of sexual and gender-based crimes, and includes a commitment to pay particular attention to the commission of these crimes and to undertake effective investigations and prosecutions in relation to them.[36] Finally, the OTP has clarified that the geographic location of the crimes is not a factor that it will take into account.

These are simply factors to be considered; none is a fixed requirement. The OTP's position is that no fixed weight should be assigned to the criteria, but rather a judgment will have to be reached on the facts and circumstances of each situation.

Where the available information provides a reasonable basis to believe that one or more crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court have been committed, the next step is to consider admissibility. There are two aspects to admissibility: gravity and complementarity. The Statute does not stipulate any mandatory sequence in the consideration of gravity and complementarity, but the prosecutor must be satisfied as to admissibility on both counts (gravity and complementarity) before proceeding further.

15.3.3 Who must be prosecuted?

Whereas the assessment of gravity during the situation selection phase is necessarily general, at the case selection phase one must look at the gravity of a particular 'case' in question.[37] Since a case comprises both crimes and perpetrators, the 'gravity of the [34] Similar aggravating factors are provided for in Rule 145 for the purposes of determining the appropriate sentence; Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE'). For a wider discussion on gravity and the relevance of sentencing factors, see American University, War Crimes Research Office, The Gravity Threshold of the International Criminal Court, March 2008, 39–42.

[35] Rule 145(2) ICC RPE; Art 8(2)(b)(iii), Art 70 Rome Statute.

[36] Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes, OTP, ICC, June 2014 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/otp/OTP-Policy-Paper-on-Sexual-and-Gender-Based-Crimes-June-2014.pdf> accessed 10 August 2014.

[37] On the notion of 'case', see R Rastan, 'What is a "Case" for the Purpose of the Rome Statute?' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 435.

case' includes both the gravity of the crimes and the extent of responsibility of the perpetrator. With respect to the gravity of the crimes, the OTP considers the same factors as discussed previously.

With respect to the extent of individual responsibility, the OTP first developed its 'most responsible persons' policy, whereby first and foremost those situated at the highest echelons of responsibility will be the ones singled out for prosecution, such as those persons holding leadership positions.[38] However, the OTP also considered moving down the chain, for instance, if required for the successful prosecution of persons situated at the highest positions.[39] Who belongs to the category of 'most responsible persons' is a question that is dealt with through thorough analysis of all available evidence, and not one that can be properly answered ex ante. In this sense, it must be stressed that the selection of cases is an evidence-driven process, also governed by the principle of objectivity.

In its June 2012–15 Strategic Plan, however, the Office announced that it was rethinking this approach, considering limitations in investigative possibilities and/or lack of cooperation. It left open the possibility of building up prosecutions starting with cases against mid and high-level perpetrators before reaching those 'most responsible'. It also stated that it would 'consider prosecuting lower level perpetrators where their conduct has been particularly grave and has acquired extensive notoriety'.[40]

Finally, it must be clarified that while the original policy of the OTP was to focus on the persons most responsible, the view of the OTP is that the legal threshold of admissibility is not as stringent as the policy threshold of 'persons most responsible'. Otherwise, the admissibility threshold would become a permanent legal barrier providing permanent ex ante impunity to entire classes of perpetrators, and enabling perpetrators to bring legal challenges demanding evidence showing that they are not only guilty but the most guilty.[41]

15.3.4 What crimes to prosecute?

In an effort to foster expeditious trials, OTP will bring compact charges, focusing on a confined universe of incidents. The charges chosen will constitute, whenever possible, a representative sample of the most prominent forms of victimization in the field. However, because the OTP often works in ongoing conflicts, it will frequently be necessary to take into account security of witnesses and ICC staff, protection of victims, and access to available evidence. For example, if interviewing witnesses from [38] Paper on some policy issues before the Office of the Prosecutor, OTP, ICC, September 2003, 6–7.

[39] Ibid., 7.

[40] Strategic Plan June 2012–15, OTP, ICC, 11 October 2013, para. 22 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/office%20of%20the%20prosecutor/policies%20and%20strategies/Documents/OTP-Strategic-Plan-2012-2015.pdf> accessed 10 August 2014. On the concept of 'notorious perpetrators' see F Guariglia, '"Those Most Responsible" versus International Sex Crimes: Competing Prosecution Themes?' in M Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Prosecution of International Sex Crimes (Beijing: Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 50 et seq.

[41] For a wider discussion, see War Crimes Research Office (n 34) 25–57, including an analysis of Pre-Trial Chamber I's stringent approach to the gravity threshold provided for in Art 17(1)(d).

one incident site would put those witnesses at risk, whereas witnesses from another site involving a comparable incident can be interviewed without such risk, the OTP may prefer the latter.

If necessary in the particular circumstances of the case, the OTP may follow a sequential approach, investigating specific cases within a situation one after another rather than all at once. At the same time, the OTP's new Strategic Plan (2012–15) has abandoned the notion of 'focused investigation' and embraced 'the principle of in-depth, open-ended investigations while maintaining focus to avoid over-expanding the investigations at the expense of efficiency'.[42]

15.3.5 Briefly: when not to prosecute?

The initial factors that must be determined under Article 53(2) concern the legal or factual basis to seek a warrant or a summons, and the admissibility of the case. If the OTP has satisfied itself that those factors are met, it is still necessary to assess the 'interests of justice', within the terms of Article 53(2)(c). The OTP has made public a policy paper clarifying its approach to this concept,[43] which emphasizes four guiding principles: (i) that the exercise of discretion under Article 53(1)(c) and (2)(c) is exceptional in nature and that there is a presumption in favour of investigation and prosecution if all legal factors described in Article 53 are met; (ii) that the criteria for the exercise of such discretion will be guided by the object and purpose of the Statute (the prevention of serious crimes of concern to the international community through ending impunity); (iii) that there is a difference between interests of justice and interests of peace, and that the latter falls within the mandate of institutions other than the OTP; and (iv) finally, that OTP is under a duty to notify the Pre-Trial Chamber of any decision not to investigate or prosecute in the interests of justice.[44] To date, no such decision has been made in any of the existing situations.

15.3.6 Judicial review of the exercise of prosecutorial discretion

Whereas the fact that under specific circumstances the OTP's exercise of discretion is subject to judicial review has never been the subject of any controversy, the trigger and scope of such review have been debated.[45] Two important decisions from Pre-Trial Chamber I have provided clarity as to the manner in which the judicial review mechanism enshrined in Article 53(2) should be interpreted: the Chamber rejected invitations to interpret affirmative decisions from the OTP pertaining to the persons being prosecuted and the selected charges related to crimes within the DRC situation

[42] OTP Strategic Plan June 2012–15 (n 40) para. 23 [43] September 2007.

[44] See Policy Paper on the Interests of Justice, OTP, ICC, September 2007 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/library/organs/otp/ICC-OTP-InterestsOfJustice.pdf> accessed 10 August 2014.

[45] See, for instance, the exchange between the OTP and Pre-Trial Chamber II in December 2005–early January 2006, in particular Decision to Convene a Status Conference on the Investigation in the Situation in Uganda in Relation to the Application of Art 53, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-68, PTC II, ICC, 2 December 2005; and OTP Submission Providing Information on Status of the Investigation in Anticipation of the Status Conference to be Held on 13 January 2006, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-76, OTC, ICC, 11 January 2006.

as tacit decisions not to investigate or not to prosecute other persons or other crimes. The Chamber noted that no negative decision under Article 53(2) had been made in the DRC situation, and that, on the contrary, the OTP was prosecuting a person at that time and further investigations in the DRC situation were ongoing.[46] In short, the Chamber refused to engage in an exercise of 'judicial creation' of a non-existent Article 53(2)(c) Decision, triggered by third-party disagreement with the prosecutorial choices made by the OTP.

So as long as OTP is prosecuting in a situation under investigation, and no negative decision has been reached under Article 53(2) (for instance, deciding not to charge a co-perpetrator due to his or her ill-health, and claiming that the 'interests of justice' support this decision), the review foreseen in Article 53(3) is not triggered. Mere disagreements as to where the prosecutor is focusing her investigative and prosecutorial efforts fall squarely outside the scope of judicial review under the Statute. In the event of a prosecutor exercising discretion on the basis of manifestly impermissible criteria or otherwise infringing his or her duties under the Statute, other control mechanisms may come into play: a prosecution motivated on discriminatory grounds may be terminated by the judges as an abuse of process, for instance. Similarly, the ASP may conclude that an egregious and deliberate failure to investigate or prosecute serious conduct clearly falling within the jurisdiction of the Court with no apparent or arguable justification evidences the existence of grounds for removal under Article 46.

15.4 Conclusions

The selection of situations or, to put it in different terms, the decision to open an investigation in a given situation, is a complex one, which covers multiple factors under the Statute. The decision can be subject to criticism, and portrayed as a political one, even if the facts fail to support the accusation. Unfounded attacks can be fuelled by multiple biases and also by basic ignorance of the Court's legal framework and the Office's policies and procedures. The best thing the Office can do in such circumstances is to scrupulously apply the Rome Statute and be transparent in its decision-making process. The publication of the OTP paper on preliminary examination, and the commitment to publish reports to explain the reasons to open or not to open an investigation in the situations concerned follow this logic and seek to enhance the transparency of the process.

Similarly, it is clear that when we speak of selection of cases within the universe of international crimes we are referring to extremely complex choices. The OTP is and will continue to be faced with a number of dilemmas and must make difficult, and at times probably unpopular but also unavoidable, decisions. The question of who must be prosecuted internationally is inherently controversial, and any determination is bound to cause at least a degree of disappointment. However, it should be clear that the ICC as a whole can only offer a measure of justice, and that there must be adequate responses developed by the international community to deal with those perpetrators and crimes that the ICC cannot tackle.[47] This is a natural consequence of the ICC as a Court of last resort, but also a distinctive feature of the emerging system of international criminal justice, which requires that national authorities, the international community, and the Court work together in pursuing the common goal of putting an end to impunity for the most serious crimes.

[46] See Decision on the requests of the Legal Representative for Victims VPRS 1 to VPRS 6 regarding 'Prosecutor's Information on Further Investigation', Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-399, PTC I, ICC, 26 September 2007, at 5; and Decision on the Request Submitted Pursuant to Rule 103(1) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-373, PTC I, ICC, 17 August 2007, para. 5. Pre-Trial Chamber I noted that no negative decision under Art 53(2) had been made in the DRC situation and that, on the contrary, the Office was prosecuting a person at that time and further investigations into the DRC situation were ongoing.

[47] Paper on some policy issues before the OTP (n 38) 3.

16

Selecting Situations and Cases

William A. Schabas OC MRIA*

16.1 Introduction

In domestic legal systems, there is a presumption that all serious crimes against the person will be investigated and prosecuted, subject to limited exceptions and special rules, such as immunities of diplomats and officials of foreign states and the exclusion of minors and the insane. In some countries, upon receiving information about a possible offence, the prosecutorial authorities are under a legal obligation to proceed. Depending upon the legal culture and traditions, there may be a degree of discretion in identifying the charges. Some countries permit the prosecutor to, in effect, negotiate a reduction in the crimes in the indictment in exchange for the cooperation of the accused person and, in some cases, a guilty plea.

The international system of criminal prosecution distinguishes itself from national justice mechanisms by its extreme selectivity. Although it has sometimes been argued in the academic literature, not very convincingly, that Article 15 of the Rome Statute[1] imposes an obligation upon the prosecutor to proceed with a preliminary investigation upon the receipt of sufficient information about a crime within the subject-matter jurisdiction,[2] in practice the ICC is brought to bear in only a fraction of possible cases. More than a decade of practice indicates that when it undertakes to deal with a 'situation' the Court only actually takes cases against a small handful of alleged perpetrators. Sometimes they may be presented as the central or leading personalities in a conflict, as was the case with Joseph Kony and his associates in Uganda. But this is not always the case, and often relatively secondary personalities within the overall situation may find themselves targeted by the Court. It does not make sense to claim there is a legal obligation to prosecute but that it can be satisfied if only a few suspects are brought to book.

Responsibility for the selection of situations and of cases at the ICC lies primarily with the prosecutor. The Statute provides little guidance beyond the indication that jurisdiction must exist and the case or potential case should be admissible. The legal framework is completed with somewhat more detailed but still very vague provisions in the Regulations of the OTP. The real problem is rarely one of incompatibility with

* Professor of International Law, Middlesex University, London; Professor of International Criminal Law and Human Rights, Leiden University; Emeritus Professor of Human Rights Law, National University of Ireland Galway.

[1] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[2] M Bergsmo and J Pejic, 'Article 15' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 581–93, at 589; M Bergsmo and P Kruger, 'Article 53' in ibid., 1065–76, at 1068.

the Statute and the Regulations. It is that there are scores of situations and tens of thousands of cases that appear to fulfil the requirements but that are never addressed. It is difficult to account for their absence from the list of situations before the Court.

16.2 Distinguishing Situations and Cases

Selection is involved with respect both to 'situations' and to 'cases'. There are important distinctions between the two concepts, both of which feature in the Statute itself. The Rome Statute uses the term 'situation' in the context of 'referral'. According to Article 13, the Court may exercise its jurisdiction over a 'situation' for which the Court has jurisdiction and in which crimes contemplated by the Statute appear to have been committed to the extent it has been 'referred' to the prosecutor by a State Party or by the Security Council. With respect to referral of situations by a State Party, the Statute specifies, in Article 14, that the purpose of referral is to request the prosecutor to investigate the situation for the purpose of determining whether one or more specific persons should be charged with the commission of such crimes.

There have been two referrals of 'situations' by the Security Council, the first of 'the situation in Darfur since 1 July 2002'[3] and the second of 'the situation in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya since 15 February 2011'.[4] There have been five referrals of 'situations' by States Parties: 'the situation concerning the Lord's Resistance Army' by Uganda, in December 2003;[5] 'the situation of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court allegedly committed anywhere in the territory of the DRC since the entry into force of the Rome Statute, on 1 July 2002' by the DRC;[6] 'the situation of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed anywhere on the territory of the Central African Republic since 1 July 2002' by the CAR;[7] 'la situation au Mali depuis le mois de janvier 2012' by Mali;[8] and the '31 May 2010 Israeli raid on the Humanitarian Aid Flotilla bound for Gaza Strip' by Comoros.[9]

The prosecutor is empowered to proceed with an investigation if a situation has been referred to the Court by the Security Council or by a State Party, in accordance with Articles 13 and 14 of the Statute. The prosecutor may also proceed with an

[3] UNSC Res 1593 (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/RES/1593, operative para. 1.

[4] UNSC Res 1970 (26 February 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1970, operative para. 1.

[5] 'President of Uganda Refers Situation Concerning the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) to the ICC', ICC Press Release, 29 January 2004. The Prosecutor subsequently formulated the referral as 'the situation concerning Northern Uganda': 'Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court Opens an Investigation into Northern Uganda', ICC Press Release, 29 July 2004. He informed the government of Uganda of his conclusion that 'the scope of the referral encompasses all crimes committed in Northern Uganda in the context of the ongoing conflict involving the LRA' and proceeded on that basis: Warrant of Arrest for Vincent Otti, Otti, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-54, PTC II, ICC, 8 July 2005, para. 31. See also the statement of the Prosecutor of 14 October 2005 where he noted that Uganda had accepted the position taken by the OTP on the scope of the referral.

[6] 'Prosecutor Receives Referral of the Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo', ICC Press Release, 19 April 2004.

[7] 'Prosecutor Receives Referral Concerning Central African Republic', ICC Press Release, 7 January 2005.

[8] Letter from Malick Coulibaly, Minister of Justice and Garde des Sceaux, Republic of Mali, 13 July 2012.

[9] This was subsequently reformulated as 'the Situation on Registered Vessels of the Union of the Comoros, the Hellenic Republic and the Kingdom of Cambodia' by the Presidency when it assigned the matter to Pre-Trial Chamber I.

investigation in the absence of such referral but only to the extent that this is authorized by the Pre-Trial Chamber, in accordance with Article 15(3). The Statute indicates that the Pre-Trial Chamber determines whether or not 'the case appears to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court', suggesting that the prosecutor requests authorization to investigate a 'case' rather than a 'situation'. Nevertheless, practice at the Court indicates that the request by the prosecutor and the authorization by the Court concern a 'situation'.[10] The prosecutor has made two such requests. In the first, he sought authorization of an investigation into 'the situation in the Republic of Kenya in relation to the post-election violence of 2007–2008'.[11] The Pre-Trial Chamber authorized an investigation into 'the situation [on the territory of] the Republic of Kenya in relation to crimes against humanity within the jurisdiction of the Court committed between 1 June 2005 and 26 November 2009'.[12] In the second, the prosecutor requested authorization of an investigation with respect to 'the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire in relation to post-election violence in the period following 28 November 2010'.[13] The Pre-Trial Chamber authorized an investigation in 'Côte d'Ivoire with respect to crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed since 28 November 2010', adding that the authorization extended to 'continuing crimes that may be committed in the future insofar as they are part of the context of the ongoing situation in Côte d'Ivoire'.[14] The Rules of Procedure and Evidence also indicate that the prosecutor's request under Article 15 concerns a 'situation'.[15]

Within the 'situation' there may be one or more 'cases'. A situation cannot exist without any cases (although there should be 'potential cases'), but the opposite does not seem possible. A 'case' must always be part of a 'situation'. The Court has explained that prosecutions proceed in stages that 'begin with a "situation" and end with a concrete "case", where one or more suspects have been identified for the purpose of prosecution'.[16] The many references to a 'case' in the Statute confirm that at this stage of the proceedings there is one or more identifiable suspect or defendant. The line between a 'situation' and a 'case' does not have precise boundaries, however, to the extent that there is no sense defining a 'situation' in the absence of some indication that there are 'potential cases' involving the individual accused.[17] The 'potential case' starts to become a 'case' in the course of an investigation. The process is completed with the issuance of an arrest warrant or a summons to appear. Nevertheless, once defined by the arrest warrant or the summons to appear, the description of the 'case' continues to evolve. The prosecutor may modify its scope in preparation for the confirmation hearing, the Pre-Trial Chamber may redefine the 'case' in its decision following the

[10] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010 ('Kenya authorization decision'), paras 40–8.

[11] Ibid., para. 2. [12] Ibid., paras 201–11.

[13] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14, PTC III, ICC, 3 October 2011 ('Côte d'Ivoire authorization decision'), para. 2.

[14] Ibid., para. 212.

[15] Rule 49(2) of the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, part II.A ('ICC RPE').

[16] Kenya authorization decision (n 10) para. 41. [17] Ibid., para. 50.

confirmation hearing, and the Trial Chamber may make further changes including modification of the charges pursuant to Regulation 55.

Although the Statute does not make any such distinction, it does not seem unreasonable to think of situations within situations. As a general rule, the situations before the Court concern conflicts between armed groups or formations such as political parties. These groups and parties may be seen to constitute, in a sense, distinct 'situations'. For example, in 2005 the prosecutor obtained arrest warrants within the situation in Uganda against five leaders of the rebel LRA. At a status conference the following year, the prosecutor told the Court that his Office did not intend to seek further warrants for past crimes with respect to the LRA, but he confirmed that inquiries and analysis were ongoing regarding other groups, notably the UPDF.[18] But in the report on performance submitted to the ASP the following year, the prosecutor said that the investigation in Uganda was completed.[19]

16.3 Selection of Situations

Perhaps the most distinctive difference between the ICC and its predecessor international criminal tribunal is in the selection of situations. The Court is the first international criminal tribunals with the power to select its situations, at least in the broad sense of a geographic region with a temporal scope. By contrast with the ICC, at all of the previous international criminal tribunals neither the prosecutor nor the judges played any real role in the selection of situations.

The initial proposal for an ICC, comprised within Article 227 of the Treaty of Versailles, set out both the situation and the case. It was to try 'William II of Hohenzollern, formerly German Emperor, for a supreme offence against international morality and the sanctity of treaties'. The tribunal was never actually established, but had it been created, the prosecutor and the judges would have been left with little discretion. The 'situation' might have been described as 'responsibility for World War I'. It was identified and defined by the parties to the Treaty of Versailles. In effect, the provision was dictated to vanquished Germany by the victorious delegates at the Paris Peace Conference.

The International Military Tribunal, established pursuant to the London Agreement, was the first such institution to actually operate. A treaty negotiated by the four occupying powers, although later ratified by several other states, the London Agreement defined the situation as 'the major war criminals of the European Axis', regardless of the geographic location of the crimes.[20] The temporal scope of the jurisdiction was not specified, although the definition of crimes against humanity recognized the possibility of punishing acts perpetrated 'before or during the war'.[21] There seemed to have [18] OTP Submission Providing Information on Status of the Investigation in Anticipation of the Status Conference to be Held on 13 January 2006, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-76, PTC II, ICC, 11 January 2006, paras 6–7.

[19] Report on programme performance of the ICC for the year 2006, ICC-ASP/6/3, 30 May 2007, 20.

[20] Art 1 of the Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis, and Establishing the Charter of the International Military Tribunal (IMT) (adopted and entered into force 8 August 1945) 82 UNTS 279.

[21] Ibid., Art 6(c).

been no need to specify the war to which the Charter referred. The provisions of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East were very similar. The situation was defined as 'the major war criminals in the Far East'[22] and 'Far Eastern war criminals'.[23]

These rather vague and somewhat ambiguous provisions did not appear to concern those who created the two Tribunals, probably because they were confident that they firmly controlled the prosecutors who were assigned to identify the cases within each of the two 'situations'. In practice, the IMT was directed at Nazi perpetrators alone, despite the fact that there was much evidence that some of the crimes over which the Tribunal exercised jurisdiction had also been perpetrated by those who established the institution. War crimes and other atrocities perpetrated by the victors, ranging from the Katyń massacre, the sinking of merchant ships by submarines without warning, and the dreadful bombings of cities in Germany and Japan, including the nuclear destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and the more quotidian breaches of international law associated with brutal armed combat such as murdering prisoners or the issuance of orders not to take them, were not addressed as part of post-war accountability and they remain largely unpunished to this day.[24] At the Tokyo Tribunal the Indian judge, Radhabinod Pal, openly challenged the one-sided nature of the proceedings in his lengthy dissenting opinion.[25]

When the ad hoc tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda were set up in the early 1990s, there was considerable praise for them as an improvement upon the Nuremberg and Tokyo tribunals in terms of their independence from political authorities. While this may be true with respect to the independence of the prosecutors, there was no real difference in terms of selection of the situation. In 1945 it was the major victorious powers, whereas in 1993 and 1994 it was the Security Council; in other words, more or less the same small group of states. At the ICTY, the situation was defined as 'serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991',[26] while at the Rwanda tribunal it was 'genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994'.[27] In some respects, the 'situations' at the ad hoc tribunals were defined more precisely than they had been in 1945, perhaps because those who established them understood that they might less easily control the decisions made by the prosecutors given their enhanced level of independence. Both statutes provided that the prosecutors 'shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other source'.[28]

[22] Ibid., Art 1. [23] Ibid., Art 5.

[24] For an exception, see Kononov v Latvia App no. 36376/04 (ECtHR Grand Chamber, 17 May 2010).

[25] N Boister and R Cryer (eds), Documents on the Tokyo International Military Tribunal (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 811–930.

[26] Art 1 Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute').

[27] Art 1 Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute').

[28] Art 16(2) ICTY Statute; Art 15(2) ICTR Statute.

The initial draft statutes of the ICC prepared by the ILC did not allow the prosecutor any discretion in the selection of situations.[29] The jurisdiction of the Court was to be triggered by referral of a State Party or the Security Council. Not only did the prosecutor have no authority to initiate prosecutions in the absence of a request or referral by a State Party or the Security Council, but also the prosecutor had no discretion to refuse to proceed when such requests or referrals were properly formulated. One of the most radical changes to the draft of the ILC that appears in the final version of the Rome Statute is the recognition of discretion in the prosecutor with respect to the selection of situations. This manifests itself in two ways: the prosecutor may select situations acting proprio motu and in the absence of referral by a State Party or the Security Council; or the prosecutor may refuse to proceed with situations that are referred by a State Party or the Security Council. In both circumstances, the prosecutor's decision is subject to a degree of judicial review by a Pre-Trial Chamber.

In the course of the first decade of judicial activity by the ICC, the prosecutor has exercised discretion to proceed proprio motu with respect to two situations. In both, the Pre-Trial Chamber granted the prosecutor's request for authorization to proceed. All of the other active situations before the Court have resulted from referrals by States Parties or by the Security Council. Because the prosecutor proceeded in these situations without objection or contestation by those who referred them, there has been no judicial review of prosecutorial discretion. Nevertheless, the formal decision by the prosecutor in each of these referred situations is an important and distinct procedural step.[30] It constitutes the exercise of the prosecutor's discretion in the selection of situations.

It should therefore be evident that the crucial decision with respect to the selection of situations lies with the prosecutor. Without her agreement it is almost impossible for a prosecution to proceed, even if this is formally requested by a State Party or the Security Council. Article 53 of the Statute provides for a form of judicial review should the prosecutor exercise discretion not to proceed. Although there are no decisions based upon this provision, it seems reasonable to presume that the Pre-Trial Chamber would apply an approach similar to that adopted when it has authorized the prosecutor to proceed pursuant to Article 15 because the criteria are essentially the same. The two decisions applying Article 15 manifest a very cautious and minimalist approach to the Pre-Trial Chamber.[31] Judges have shown a great reluctance to intervene in the exercise of discretion by the prosecutor in the selection of situations.

It may seem surprising that given this extraordinary power of the prosecutor, in sharp contrast with the path taken at all of the preceding international criminal tribunals, the Rome Statute and its subsidiary instruments provide virtually no guidance

[29] Report of the ILC on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May–22 July 1994, UN Doc A/CN.4/SER.A/1994/Add.l (Part 2) in (1994) 2 Yearbook of the International Law Commission 15, 15–73.

[30] A Alamuddin, 'The Role of the Security Council in Stopping and Starting Cases at the International Criminal Court: Problems of Principle and Practice' in A Zidar and O Bekou (eds), Contemporary Challenges for the International Criminal Court (London: British Institute of International and Comparative Law 2014) 103–30, 119.

[31] Kenya authorization decision (n 10) paras 17–18; Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire (ICC-02/11), Côte d'Ivoire authorization decision (n 13).

to the prosecutor as to how she is to exercise this discretion. Of course, the Statute sets out the conditions for jurisdiction and admissibility, and these must be observed by the prosecutor in selecting situations. The prosecutor considers these factors as part of the 'preliminary examination' that precedes a decision to proceed with a situation. Nevertheless, neither the Statute nor the Rules of Procedure and Evidence offer any direction about the criteria to be applied other than those relevant to jurisdiction and admissibility.

Before the first prosecutor of the Court took office, lawyers in the OTP prepared draft Regulations that attempted to codify the process by which 'situations' would be selected. These draft regulations naively approached the matter of selection of situations in a manner that suggested the prosecutor would proceed with everything that was admissible. There was to be a complex procedure, involving 'evaluation teams' and a 'draft investigation plan', leading to a decision by the prosecutor. Nevertheless, nothing indicated the grounds on which the prosecutor would make the determination. There was an intriguing reference to his or her 'inherent powers'. But the prosecutor did not adopt the draft. Years later, a new and much streamlined version of the Regulations was proclaimed, setting out the following procedure, applicable to 'situations' that result from Security Council or State Party referral (Article 53(1)) or from the initiative of the prosecutor acting proprio motu (Article 15(3)):

> Regulation 29. Initiation of an investigation or prosecution
> 1. In acting under article 15, paragraph 3, or article 53, paragraph 1, the Office shall produce an internal report analysing the seriousness of the information and considering the factors set out in article 53, paragraph 1 (a) to (c), namely issues of jurisdiction, admissibility (including gravity), as well as the interests of justice, pursuant to rules 48 and 104. The report shall be accompanied by a recommendation on whether there is a reasonable basis to initiate an investigation.
> 2. In order to assess the gravity of the crimes allegedly committed in the situation the Office shall consider various factors including their scale, nature, manner of commission, and impact.
> 3. Based on the report, the Prosecutor shall determine whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation.[32]

This text of Regulation 29 really does nothing more than refer back to the criteria for jurisdiction and admissibility. In addition, reference is made to the 'interests of justice', a ground on which the prosecutor may base a decision not to proceed in the case of Security Council or State Party referral.

Finally, some indications about criteria for the selection of situations may be gleaned from statements about policy issued by the OTP. In 2006 the OTP circulated a draft paper entitled 'Criteria for selection of situations and cases'. There was some recognition that choices would have to be made because of the available resources. The document said the policy of the Office was 'to respond to serious situations, while maximising the use of its available resources. The Office works in a cycle, reallocating resources upon completion of an investigation of a situation to commence an investigation of the next situation deemed to be the most appropriate for investigation'. There was no discussion about how the situation 'deemed to be the most appropriate for investigation' was to be identified. Very little distinction was made between principles applicable to the selection of situations and those for the selection of cases. Although the prioritization of the resources issue was considered only with respect to situations rather than cases, its relevance in both contexts seems obvious. Aside from the reference to available resources, the 2006 paper appeared to be premised largely on the postulate that all eligible situations would be acted upon. To the extent that the document acknowledged a role for prosecutorial discretion, this was mainly in the application of the 'gravity' criterion and, to a lesser extent, complementarity.

[32] Regulation 29 of the Regulations of the OTP, ICC-BD/05-01-09, 23 April 2009.

In November 2013 the prosecutor released a 'Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations'. The paradigm had changed because the OTP was no longer speaking of the 'selection' of situations as well as of cases. Possibly this was prompted by a desire to downplay the role of discretion in the selection of situations. The 2013 document largely reprised the statements from 2006, although it did not include the text about prioritization of resources. Nowhere does the 2013 document suggest that the prosecutor makes a selection from among the eligible situations.

Regulation 29 combined with the Statute is adequate to frame the actions of the prosecutor to the extent that there is a presumption that all situations where the criteria of jurisdiction and admissibility are met will be taken up by the prosecutor. But this does not seem to be the case. Although the prosecutor has indicated that consideration is being given to a number of situations in various parts of the world, those that have actually been selected have been confined to the continent of Africa. This has subjected the Court to much criticism, and it has been at a loss to explain why the only situations on the planet that meet the criteria in Regulation 29 are confined to such a limited geographic region.

Those who defend the African orientation of the work of the Court often point to the fact that it was African states themselves that referred several of the situations. This explanation does not take into account the fact that the prosecutor is not at all bound to proceed on the basis of referrals. Yet in practice, the prosecutor has shown great deference to referrals from States Parties and the Security Council. The legal requirement that the prosecutor agree that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation in the case of such referrals is applied in a rather automatic and perfunctory manner. The result is that States Parties and the Security Council have tended to set the priorities of the Court. Given that the prosecutor must consent to such referrals, she has for all practical purposes accepted this state of affairs. Invoking the referrals by States Parties as an explanation for the selection of situations confined to the African continent is therefore not an adequate explanation.

The prosecutor addressed the issue of selection of situations in February 2006 in a statement concerning communications he had received with respect to the conduct of foreign troops in Iraq. 'While, in a general sense, any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court is "grave", the Statute requires an additional threshold of gravity even where the subject-matter jurisdiction is satisfied', he wrote. In this respect, the prosecutor said that a 'key consideration is the number of victims of particularly serious crimes, such as wilful killing or rape'. He added that a situation involving four to 12 victims of wilful killing and a limited number of victims of inhuman treatment was not sufficiently serious, offering by way of comparison situations involving displacement of more than five million people and situations featuring hundreds or thousands of serious crimes.[33] These remarks were put into some perspective only a few weeks later when the prosecutor began proceedings in the case that would constitute the first trial before the Court. It involved a small number of victims of child soldier recruitment, without any allegation of wilful killing or rape. Still later, when confidential American diplomatic communications entered the public sphere, it was reported that the prosecutor had much earlier assured officials of the United States that he would not pursue complaints about the invasion of Iraq.[34]

When the Pre-Trial Chambers deliberated on the two requests by the prosecutor for authorization to proceed with an investigation, they addressed themselves to issues associated with the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Both Pre-Trial Chambers invoked the bugbear of 'politicization'.[35] The prevailing view, it seems, is that the purpose of the judicial review of the prosecutor's application for authorization to proceed with an investigation is to avoid, reduce, or minimize 'politicization'. However, the examination by the Pre-Trial Chambers was confined to the formal criteria of jurisdiction and admissibility. It did not address politicization, nor is it at all clear how it could have done so even if the Chambers had the inclination. In particular, it would require evidence that there was a total absence of other eligible situations or else an indication that if they were present, they were not as serious as those for which the prosecutor was seeking authorization. There was no defendant at the authorization hearing, and the prosecutor certainly was not going to produce the evidence of politicization.

The independent prosecutor of the ICC was meant to be an improvement on the 'politicized' selectivity of the earlier institutions, where 'situations' were designated by the major military and political powers. But selectivity has not disappeared, and the decisions about selection are still being made. These decisions are often portrayed as the result of the application of objective criteria. But although it is not too difficult to explain with objective criteria the justification with respect to situations where the prosecutor chooses to act, the same cannot be said for the situations that are not selected. On a few occasions, notably situations in Iraq, Venezuela, and Palestine, the prosecutor has attempted to justify a decision to remain inactive. With respect to others, the prosecutor has said the matter is under 'preliminary examination'. Some situations appear to linger in the purgatory of preliminary examination for many years. Such determinations by the prosecutor are only acceptable to the extent that the reasoning and the explanations are convincing. But this is not always the case.

[33] L Moreno-Ocampo, Letter concerning communication on the situation in Iraq, The Hague, 9 February 2006.

[34] D Bosco, Rough Justice: The International Criminal Court in a World of Power Politics (New York: Oxford University Press 2014) 88.

[35] Kenya authorization decision (n 10) paras 17–18; Judge Fernandez de Gurmendi's separate and partially dissenting opinion to the Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-15, PTC III, ICC, 3 October 2011, para. 16.

An example of an unconvincing attempt at explanation can be seen in the prosecutor's reluctance to proceed with the situation in Palestine. In 2009 the Palestinian Authority formulated a declaration attributing jurisdiction to the Court over the territory of Palestine, in accordance with Article 12(3) of the Rome Statute. A preliminary issue was whether Palestine could be considered a 'state' within the scope of Article 12(3). The prosecutor undertook a lengthy consultation with stakeholders and experts only to declare, after more than three years, that it was actually not for the prosecutor to make such a determination. He said this was a matter for either the General Assembly of the United Nations or the ASP. The ASP did not appear to agree and the matter was not taken up at its next meeting. In November 2012 the General Assembly recognized Palestine as a non-member observer state.[36] Operative paragraph 1 of the resolution '[r]eaffirms the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to independence in their State of Palestine on the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967'. Since the adoption of the resolution, the prosecutor has taken the view that a new declaration is required and, furthermore, that Palestine can only give jurisdiction to the Court for the period subsequent to the resolution. However, in adopting the resolution the General Assembly did not create the state of Palestine. It only confirmed its status as a state whose existence it 'reaffirmed'. The General Assembly Resolution is a relevant fact that can assist the prosecutor in deciding whether Palestine is a state and from what point in time. However, the prosecutor was wrong to say he did not have the authority to make such a determination. The validity of the declaration under Article 12(3) is a legal question, it is a jurisdictional fact, and it falls to the prosecutor in the first place to decide whether the situation in Palestine can be triggered. Subsequently, whether or not jurisdiction has been given to the Court by a state may be examined by the Pre-Trial Chamber in proceedings under Article 15(3), and it may eventually be contested by an accused person at the appropriate stage in the trial.

Although reasonable people can disagree on many of the issues surrounding Palestine's declaration recognizing the jurisdiction of the Court, the treatment by the prosecutor leaves the distinct impression that there is a lack of enthusiasm about investigating violations of the Statute on the territory of Palestine. The prosecutor will have to present a much more rigorous legal analysis if she expects to make a compelling case that only objective factors are involved.

Ultimately, such decisions taken by the prosecutor are fraught with an element of subjectivity. The prosecutor and her advisers are influenced by their own personal views of the world, and of the issues, wars, conflicts, and crises that are important to them, for reasons that they themselves may or may not entirely understand or be in a position to explain. After all, they are only human, like all the rest of us. But they are unlike the members of the Security Council, who at least represent governments that are in one way or another accountable to their own people. The process by which the Security Council identifies situations, be it for ad hoc prosecution or referral to the ICC, is in some sense more transparent than the rather opaque determinations by the prosecutor. When these important decisions about the priorities of such a large institution are left to a single individual who acts on the basis of a vague legal framework and uncertain parameters, the institution remains vulnerable to charges of political selectivity.

[36] Status of Palestine in the United Nations, UNGA Res 67/19 (4 December 2012) UN Doc A/RES/67/19.

The reluctance to acknowledge that political determinations influence the prosecutor's own selection of situations can be seen in the process of identifying candidates for the job. In the 2012 election of the prosecutor, the search committee of the ASP prepared a short list of four candidates all of whom had remarkably similar profiles.[37] The four had spent years working on prosecutorial teams at various ad hoc criminal tribunals as well as, in some cases, at the Court itself. They were experienced professionals with proven abilities in the management of complex international trials. The Search Committee largely based its conclusions on Article 42(3) of the Rome Statute, where it is stated that the prosecutor should have 'extensive practical experience in the trial or prosecution of criminal cases'. The short list might well have been different, however, if the job description had recognized the importance of political judgment in the selection of situations. It is of interest to note that three of the greatest international prosecutors, Robert Jackson, Richard Goldstone, and Louise Arbour, would not qualify under the strict application of this provision followed by the Search Committee.

The better course of action may be to admit the political dimension involved in the selection of situations by the prosecutor, and perhaps even to embrace it. Then, of course, the validity of the process depends upon how prosecutorial choices are greeted within the global 'community'. The prosecutor might enhance the credibility of her choices by open consultations with a group of advisers, a comité des sages. But even such a body, were it to be truly representative of various forces and interests in the world, would have trouble reaching consensus. It is difficult to reach unanimity with respect to the difficult decisions in hard cases. For example, a decision to proceed in Palestine will be warmly welcomed in certain parts of the world, including Africa, where it will be understood as a welcome departure from the inordinate focus on that continent. However, in other parts of the planet it will provoke anger and opposition.

16.4 Selecting Cases

Once the situation has been selected, the task of the prosecutor in identifying cases for prosecution is more familiar in the sense that the process is rather similar to that of the earlier international criminal tribunals. At Nuremberg, for example, the situation was defined by the four-power London conference, but the prosecutors were left with considerable latitude in the choice of whom to prosecute and for what. They received limited guidance from the Charter of the IMT. The accused were to be 'major war criminals' who had 'act[ed] in the interests of the European Axis countries'. Selection of the accused was made by the Committee for the Investigation and Prosecution of Major War Criminals composed of the four chief prosecutors, each appointed by one of the member governments, in accordance with Article 14 of the Charter. There were some disagreements within the Committee regarding both the identity of the accused and the crimes with which they were charged. For example, when Gustav Krupp was found to be non compos mentis and therefore unfit to stand trial, the British did not agree that he should be replaced by his son, and the judges, who had to approve the amendment, concurred.[38] Both the British and the American prosecutors were opposed to charging the accused with responsibility for the Katyń forest massacre, but they eventually backed down when the Soviets insisted.[39] There was never any suggestion that the prosecutors were to act with independence of their governments. There is much evidence that they received instructions on various matters from their capitals on the issues that arose. Robert Jackson's deputy, William J Donovan, had been head of the principal United States intelligence agency and was placed on the prosecutorial team in order to ensure that the indictments did not include leading Nazis to whom the Americans had promised immunity.[40] The Soviets had a 'Special Government Commission for Directing the Nuremberg Trials', chaired by Andrey Vyshinsky, which gave instructions to their prosecutor on matters such as the handling of Katyń.[41]

[37] Report of the Search Committee for the Position of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/10/INF.2, 1 December 2011.

The guarantee of prosecutorial independence in the statutes of the ad hoc tribunals was praised as a significant improvement over Nuremberg. The first operational Prosecutor of the ICTY, Richard Goldstone, has reported how the United Nations Secretary-General admonished him for failing to consult before seeking indictments of Bosnian Serb leaders Radovan Karadzić and Ratko Mladić.[42] Nevertheless, there has been a huge amount of 'political' contact by the prosecutors of the ad hoc tribunals,[43] something that would be unthinkable for their counterparts at the national level. Although there is formal recognition of prosecutorial independence in the statutes of the ad hoc tribunals, the substantive features that should ensure this are not very well entrenched. For example, the relatively short length of the term of the prosecutors does not contribute in a positive sense to independence. Nor are the grounds and mechanisms for dismissal adequately codified.

As the work of the ad hoc tribunals evolved over time, there were evident changes in the selection of cases. Lower-level offenders had predominated in the early years of the ICTY. This may have been simply because of available opportunities, although the OTP claimed that it was strategic. The theory was that a pyramid would be constructed, starting with low-end perpetrators and building upon that until trials could take place of those at the top.[44] When the Security Council imposed a completion [38] (1948) 2 IMT 20–21. On the Alfried Krupp trial, see case no. 58, Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, United Nations War Crimes Commission Vol. X (London 1949).

[39] S Alderman, 'Negotiating on War Crimes' in R Dennett and J Johnson, Negotiating with the Russians (New York: World Peace Foundation 1951) 49–100, 96–7.

[40] K von Lingen, Allen Dulles, the OSS, and Nazi War Criminals: The Dynamics of Selective Prosecution (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2013); M Salter, Nazi War Crimes, US Intelligence and Selective Prosecution at Nuremberg: Controversies Regarding the Role of the Office of Strategic Services (Abingdon: Routledge-Cavendish 2007).

[41] For some of the documents, see A Cienciala et al. (eds), Katyn, A Crime without Punishment (New Haven: Yale University Press 2007) 326–9.

[42] R Goldstone, For Humanity, Reflections of a War Crimes Investigator (New Haven: Yale University Press 2000) 102–3.

[43] In addition to Goldstone's memoir, see C Del Ponte, Madam Prosecutor (New York: Other Press 2008).

[44] See e.g. H Stuart and M Simons, The Prosecutor and the Judge (Amsterdam: Pallas Publications 2010) 53.

strategy on the Tribunal, the Plenary of judges amended the Rules of Procedure and Evidence so as to impose the requirement, as a condition of issuance of an indictment, that it 'concentrates on one or more of the most senior leaders suspected of being most responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal'.[45]

Ethnicity was central to the prosecutions at both the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals. There were regular complaints, from various quarters, that in this respect the prosecutors were not balanced in the selection of cases. For example, the prosecutor of the ICTR was regularly accused of neglecting Tutsi perpetrators of crimes against humanity following the genocide late in the year 1994.[46] By contrast, at the ICTY, defendants were identified with each of the various ethnic groups in the conflict. But this did not really resolve the debate, because each group complained that it had been unfairly targeted for prosecution, and that too few of the 'other' group were accused. When unexpectedly the prosecutor of the Yugoslavia Tribunal found she had jurisdiction over NATO bombing activities she took the unusual step of publishing a report indicating why she had decided not to proceed with charges.[47]

Other factors relevant to the selection of cases at the ad hoc tribunals included the crimes that could be charged. In 1999 a judge of the Tribunal refused to confirm a genocide charge against an accused who had murdered the Prime Minister and several Belgian soldiers; he would only authorize counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The prosecutor, Louise Arbour, chose to withdraw the case. It seemed she considered that prosecuting charges other than genocide was a distraction from the Tribunal's mission. Her application to withdraw said 'the judicial proceedings instituted by the prosecutor should be within the framework of a global policy aimed at shedding light on the events that occurred in Rwanda in 1994 and highlighting the complete landscape of the criminal acts perpetrated at the time, and that such objective would not be achieved through the prosecution of a single count indictment the factual elements of which relate solely to the murders of the former Prime Minister and ten UNAMIR Belgian soldiers'.[48]

At the ICC, the prosecutor has very broad discretion in the selection of cases for prosecution once the situation has been triggered. The formal requirements of jurisdiction and admissibility apply, as they do for the situation. Beyond that, the prosecutor has a very free hand. In contrast with the selection of situations, where there is a claim that all situations that meet the tests in the Statute will be investigated, there is no pretence that all cases will be prosecuted. As the OTP stated in a draft document issued in 2006, '[i]t is not possible to prosecute all perpetrators or all crimes, which typically would number in the thousands. The investigation process must produce a limited number of particularly serious cases for presentation before the Court.'[49]

[45] Rule 28(A) ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence, UN Doc IT/32/Rev. 30, 6 April 2004.

[46] Kenneth Roth to Hassan Jallow, 14 August 2009. See also 'Rwanda: Tribunal Risks Supporting "Victor's Justice": Tribunal Should Vigorously Pursue Crimes of Rwandan Patriotic Front', Human Rights Watch, 1 June 2009.

[47] A Colangelo, 'Manipulating International Criminal Procedure: The Decision of the ICTY Office of the Independent Prosecutor not to Investigate NATO Bombing in the former Yugoslavia' (2003) 97 *Northwestern University Law Revi*ew 1393.

[48] Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion to Withdraw the Indictment, Ntuyahaga, ICTR-98-40-T, TC I, ICTR, 18 March 1999.

[49] OTP, Draft Criteria for selection of situations and cases, June 2006, 9.

A Pre-trial Chamber refused one of the first arrest warrant applicants on the grounds that the alleged perpetrator was not a 'senior leader' and that as a result the case would be inadmissible because it was not of 'sufficient gravity', a term employed in Article 17 of the Statute.[50] The Appeals Chamber disagreed, overturning the Pre-Trial Chamber. 'The predictable exclusion of many perpetrators on the grounds proposed by the Pre-Trial Chamber could severely hamper the preventive, or deterrent, role of the Court which is a cornerstone of the creation of the International Criminal Court, by announcing that any perpetrators other than those at the very top are automatically excluded from the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court,' it said.[51] Judge Giorgos Pikis, who sat on the Appeals Chamber and who penned a separate opinion, wrote later that the gravity threshold would only apply to a case where 'the criminality of the accused must be wholly peripheral to the commission of the offence bordering the de minimis rule'.[52]

The selection of cases is addressed in specific provisions of the Regulations of the OTP.

> Regulation 33. Selection of cases within a situation
>
> The Office shall review the information analysed during preliminary examination and evaluation and shall collect the necessary information and evidence in order to identify the most serious crimes committed within the situation. In selecting potential cases within the situation, the Office shall consider the factors set out in article 53, paragraph 1 (a) to (c) in order to assess issues of jurisdiction, admissibility (including gravity), as well as the interests of justice.

The Regulations provide immense detail about many features of prosecutorial activity. The utterly laconic Regulation 33 is quite striking in this respect. It provides no explanation as to how the prosecutor is to separate those that proceed from those that do not from the cases that meet the requirements of the Statute. One explanation might be that the prosecutor actually seeks arrest warrants for every single case that fulfils the criteria of jurisdiction and admissibility within a situation. But this is so far from reality as to deserve no serious consideration. Moreover, there have been many declarations by the prosecutor that indicate a process of selection of cases from among a larger group of 'potential cases'. For example, in a policy paper issued in 2003, the OTP said it 'should focus its investigative and prosecutorial efforts and resources on those who bear the greatest responsibility, such as the leaders of the State or organization allegedly responsible for those crimes'.[53] In reports to the Security Council on the conduct of proceedings pursuant to referrals by that body, the prosecutor has confirmed the focus on persons 'who appear to bear the greatest criminal responsibility'

[50] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Art 58, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx2, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006.

[51] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Appeal against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I Entitled "Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58"', Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-169, AC, ICC, 13 July 2006, para. 74.

[52] G Pikis, The Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2010) 59.

[53] Paper on Some Policy Issues before the Office of the Prosecutor, September 2003, 7.

for crimes committed in the situation.[54] How this is to be determined is not, however, addressed in the Regulations or in any other normative instrument.

Indications about criteria for selecting cases within a situation have also been provided by statements and documents issued by the OTP. A book chapter authored by a senior official in the Office, based on such policy papers, signals four 'governing principles' that figure in the selection of cases: independence, impartiality, objectivity, and non-discrimination. It emphasizes the role of the gravity criterion. More generally, it seems to avoid a formulaic approach, recognizing that there is a considerable degree of subjectivity involved in the choices. After discussing the various factors to be considered, it says that 'none of them are rigid requirements'.[55]

In the 2013 Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations, the OTP confronted the issue of selectivity with respect to the different parties to a conflict. This is an issue that has haunted international criminal justice since Nuremberg. According to the Policy Paper, the principle of impartiality in selection decisions 'does not mean an "equivalence of blame" between different persons and groups within a situation, or that the Office must necessarily prosecute all sides, in order to balance-off perceptions of bias'. Rather, the OTP is required 'to focus its efforts objectively on those most responsible for the most serious crimes within the situation in a consistent manner, irrespective of the States or parties involved or the person(s) or group(s) concerned'.[56]

To the extent that 'gravity' has become very much the focus of discretionary determinations, it is of interest to consider the origins of this notion within the Rome Statute system. It seems that in about 2005 an apple fell on the prosecutor's head, rather like Isaac Newton when he discovered the law of gravity. Before then, little serious attention was paid to the issue of gravity. This can be seen not only in the travaux préparatoires of the Statute but also in early academic commentary. For example, the authoritative two-volume commentary on the Rome Statute, edited by Antonio Cassese, Paola Gaeta, and John Jones, is essentially silent on the issue of 'gravity' in its consideration of admissibility. The word 'gravity' does not even appear in the index to the commentary, either on its own or as a sub-category under the rubric of 'admissibility', in striking contrast with the word 'complementarity', which consumes the best part of a page in the index.[57] The chapters in the commentary on admissibility consider the issue of gravity as if it was synonymous with complementarity.[58] The discussion of 'gravity' in the first edition of the commentary edited by Otto Triffterer consists of two terse and uninformative paragraphs.[59] The subject is entirely absent in the consideration of admissibility in the commentary by Eric David.[60] Many other [54] See also UNSC Meeting 6528, UN Doc S/PV.6528, 4.

[55] F Guariglia, 'The Selection of Cases by the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 209–17.

[56] Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations, Office of the Prosecutor, November 2013, para. 66.

[57] A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 1946.

[58] Ibid., 667–731; also G Turone, 'Powers and Duties of the Prosecutor' in ibid., 1137–80, at 1153–4.

[59] S Williams, 'Article 17' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Baden Baden: Nomos 1999) 383–94, at 393; M Bergsmo and P Kruger, 'Article 53' in ibid., 701–14, 708–9.

[60] É David, La cour pénale internationale (2005) 313 Receuil des cours 325, at 248–51.

academic commentators, including the undersigned,[61] in early writings on the Court treated the issue of admissibility as if it was synonymous with complementarity, completely overlooking the issue of gravity. Of course, gravity has since taken on considerable importance and this is reflected in more recent scholarly writing.[62] Gravity provides the prosecutor with a seemingly objective but ultimately an extraordinarily subjective standard.

16.5 Conclusion

The Rome Statute distinguishes between situations and cases. However, there is a certain degree of blurring because situations are in fact a collection of cases, or potential cases. Furthermore, the central criteria invoked by the prosecutor in identifying both situations and cases are very much the same. They consist of jurisdiction and admissibility, with a modest nod towards the very nebulous notion of 'interests of justice'. The various policy statements emanating from the OTP tend to suggest a quite different vision of the two notions, however. The prosecutor treats the selection of situations as if it is a primarily objective determination. Once the criteria are fulfilled, the prosecutor claims that she will proceed more or less automatically. There is no suggestion in any policy statements that discretion is involved. Yet the impression that the official policy does not correspond to the reality is widespread.

By contrast, when the selection of cases is involved there is no reluctance to admit the importance of discretion. The prosecutor would be the first to concede that as a general rule she will proceed with only a small number of cases within a given situation. There is an interesting issue here that has not yet led to any litigation or dispute. It concerns the number of prosecutions that are required for the Prosecutor to fulfil the situation in an adequate manner. In the case of situations that result from referrals by the Security Council or a State Party, it is not inconceivable that one or the other might complain to the Pre-Trial Chamber not about the prosecutor's inactivity, but rather about the sufficiency of her activity.

Further attention needs to be given to the inconsistency in the prosecutor's position, whereby selection of a situation is more or less mandatory once the objective criteria are met yet selection of cases is not. Nothing in the Statute suggests why this should be the case. If the principle of accountability for serious crimes requires prosecutorial activity in all situations that meet the objective criteria, then why does it not also insist upon the uncompromising prosecution of all potential suspects, rather than a selection of a few candidates alleged to be among 'the most responsible'? How can prosecution of a situation be mandatory under the Statute and yet only a handful of [61] W Schabas, Introduction to the International Criminal Court (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2001); W Schabas, Introduction to the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2004).

[62] E.g. M De Guzman, 'The International Criminal Court's Gravity Jurisprudence at Ten' (2013) 12 Washington University Global Studies Review 474; R Murphy, 'Gravity Issues and the International Criminal Court' (2006) 17 Criminal Law Forum 294; M El Zeidy, 'The Gravity Threshold Under the Statute of the International Criminal Court' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 35; S Williams and W Schabas, 'Article 17' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 605–26.

trials be satisfactory to address the matter? The flaw in the analysis of the OTP is that in reality, a great deal of discretion is involved in the selection both of situations and of cases. There cannot be a strict obligation for the former yet broad latitude for the latter. However, it is easier and more palatable to explain why a small number of suspects in Kenya, Uganda, or Côte d'Ivoire are being prosecuted than to justify why a small number of countries in Central Africa are the object of the Court's energies. There is a great reluctance to admit that the identification of situations also involves an inevitable degree of subjectivity and discretion.

Paul Seils, who worked for several years as a senior adviser to the prosecutor of the ICC, has written that 'the matter of selection cannot be regarded as a science, but nor is it so unattached to principle to be nothing more than artistic intuition: if anything it might be considered a craft, based on guiding principles but sufficiently flexible to address the infinite variety of factual scenarios that will present themselves'.[63] This is about as candid a description as can be found from someone who has worked on the inside of the Court. Surely many practitioners at the OTP have convinced themselves that the determinations they make are both objective and fair, and there is no doubt that they are acting in good faith. But on the outside, the process of selection looks less like a craft and a bit too much like sleight of hand.

[63] P Seils, 'The Selection and Prioritization of Cases by the Office of the Prosecutor of the ICC' in M Bergsmo (ed.), Criteria for Prioritizing and Selecting Core International Crimes Cases (Oslo: Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2010) 69–78, at 73.

17

Accountability of International Prosecutors

*Jenia Iontcheva Turner

17.1 Introduction

The dilemma of holding prosecutors accountable while ensuring their independence was at the centre of the debates surrounding the establishment of the ICC.[1] The drafters of the Rome Statute for the ICC understood that the Court would be handling cases with significant political implications and yet working with limited resources and no independent enforcement capacity. To enhance prosecutors' ability to operate successfully in this environment, the drafters enshrined prosecutorial independence into the Statute and gave prosecutors significant discretion over charging and investigation decisions. At the same time, drafters worried that ICC prosecutors were not sufficiently accountable to anyone. This led to the decision to give judges and the Assembly of States Parties (ASP) limited authority to oversee prosecutorial actions.

The concern about accountability initially focused on prosecutors' decisions about which situations to investigate, which persons to indict, and what charges to bring. But as the ICC began proceedings in its first case, Prosecutor v Lubanga (Lubanga), it soon confronted prosecutorial errors and misconduct relating to procedural matters—e.g., the duties to disclose potentially exculpatory evidence, to follow court orders, and to comply with human rights law in the gathering of evidence.[2] The Trial Chamber attempted to fashion a response. But its reaction was at times too drastic and threatened to derail the proceedings in Lubanga. The Court's predicament revived debates about the trade-offs between prosecutorial accountability and other legitimate goals

* Professor of Law, SMU Dedman School of Law. Several portions of this chapter draw on my previous work in 'Policing International Prosecutors' (2013) 45 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 175. I am grateful to the Marla and Michael Boone Faculty Research Fund for its financial support.

[1] See M Bergsmo and F Harhoff, 'Article 42' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (Oxford/München: Hart/Beck 2008) 972; J Wouters et al., 'The International Criminal Court's Office of the Prosecutor: Navigating Between Independence and Accountability?' in J Doria et al. (eds), The Legal Regime of the ICC: Essays in Honour of Prof. I. P. Blishchenko (Leiden: Brill 2009) 345, 349–51. These debates reflect a difference in civil-law and common-law approaches to prosecutorial accountability. Whereas common-law countries tend to emphasize the importance of democratic accountability for prosecutors, civil-law countries place a greater value on political independence and emphasize instead bureaucratic forms of accountability for prosecutors. See e.g. M Tonry, 'Prosecutors and Politics in a Comparative Perspective' (2012) 41 Crime and Justice 1; R Wright and M Miller, 'The Worldwide Accountability Deficit for Prosecutors' (2010) 67 Washington and Lee Law Review 1587, 1590.

[2] See Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1401, TC I, ICC, 13 June 2008, para. 95.

of the international criminal justice system. Over time, judges came to acknowledge that sweeping remedies, while protecting the defendant's right to a fair trial, may disproportionately harm other important public values, including deterrence, retribution, and the establishment of an accurate historical record.[3]

As prosecutorial failings surfaced, some also called for stronger non-judicial mechanisms to police the process. The ASP created its own subsidiary body, the Independent Oversight Mechanism (IOM), to investigate misconduct among prosecutors. But the Assembly's intervention was seen by many as compromising the principle of prosecutorial independence and creating the risk that politics would influence disciplinary decisions. The Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) insisted that the Statute entrusted it—and not the Assembly—with the primary responsibility to police misconduct among its members.[4]

This debate highlights the need for a more comprehensive evaluation of existing and proposed mechanisms of ensuring prosecutorial accountability at the ICC. These include internal bureaucratic controls within the OTP, judicial intervention, and disciplinary measures by the ASP, the IOM, and national or international bar associations. Internal controls are critical and should be developed further, but they are not a sufficient response to the problem of misconduct. External mechanisms remain an important backstop, which can also promote the development of stronger and more effective internal oversight.

Among the several external mechanisms, judges remain best situated to police prosecutorial misconduct, at least in the near future. But judicial remedies are not a perfect solution—they are often too blunt and may provide a windfall to defendants at the expense of legitimate interests of international criminal justice. Judges also do not have the resources to investigate every alleged ethical violation or misconduct by prosecutors. In the long term, the ICC must develop a broad disciplinary framework that makes greater use of non-judicial mechanisms of accountability, such as the ASP, the IOM, and perhaps an international professional association such as the International Association of Prosecutors. These organizations offer distinct types of accountability—along political, administrative, and professional dimensions—which could serve as an important complement to judicial remedies and sanctions.

Prosecutorial conduct can also be influenced more subtly through informal sanctions by fellow prosecutors, defence attorneys, and judges. Because the ICC is a diverse community with fewer shared norms and fewer repeat interactions between the lawyers and judges, the effect of informal sanctions by professional peers is likely to be somewhat less meaningful at the international than at the national or local level. For several reasons, however, it is nonetheless important to discuss informal sanctions. They are imposed quickly and efficiently, without the need for an extensive investigation into the circumstances surrounding the misconduct. They are also less likely to frustrate the ability of the ICC to continue proceedings in the case affected by the misconduct. Over time, as the ICC legal community becomes more established, they are also likely to be a more potent and useful complement to formal sanctions.[5]

In addition to punishing misconduct after it occurs, the ICC must strengthen its preventive programmes in this area. As a critical step in that direction, the OTP has recently adopted a Code of Conduct for its members.[6] The Office has also committed to developing more regular training programmes concerning professional conduct and instituting more rigorous internal oversight for line prosecutors.[7] To the extent that the Office falls behind in this task, ICC judges can provide encouragement, both formally and informally. Two recent decisions in Prosecutor v Kenyatta (Kenyatta), one calling on the OTP to adopt a Code of Conduct and another urging the Office to change its methods of reviewing documents for disclosure, suggest that judges are willing to take on this important responsibility.[8]

[3] See section 17.4. [4] See section 17.6.1. [5] See section 17.6.3.

Within the first ten years of the Court's existence, judges have taken firm measures in policing procedural violations by prosecutors. They have affirmed the Court's commitment to the rule of law and fair trials, while remaining sensitive to competing interests of international criminal justice. The ICC must do more to develop non-judicial mechanisms to police prosecutorial misconduct, and the debate surrounding the establishment of the IOM suggests that such mechanisms must be structured in a way that preserves the independence and effectiveness of ICC prosecutors. As judicial and non-judicial mechanisms of accountability develop, it is also important to establish guidelines to coordinate among them.

17.2 Balancing Accountability and Effectiveness

The Rome Statute proclaims that the ICC's central mission is 'to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of [international crimes] and thus to contribute to the prevention of such crimes'.[9] Retribution and deterrence are therefore central goals of the Court. But like other international criminal courts, the ICC also strives to achieve broader goals, such as producing an accurate record of the events it adjudicates.[10] The Court also pursues expressive and didactic goals, aiming to model a commitment to human rights and the rule of law for national jurisdictions to follow.[11]

International prosecutors play an essential role in helping the ICC accomplish these goals. They select the cases and charges that they believe would best advance

[6] See section 17.6.4. [7] Ibid. [8] Ibid.

[9] Preamble of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[10] E.g. Sentencing Judgment, Nikolić, IT-02-60/1-S, TC I, ICTY, 2 December 2003, para. 60; Sentencing Judgment, Obrenović, IT-02-60/2-S, TC I, ICTY, 10 December 2003, para. 19; Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure Pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006, paras 50–2; see also L Douglas, The Memory of Judgment: Making Law and History in the Trials of the Holocaust (New Haven and London: Yale University Press 2005) 257–61; S Ford, 'A Social Psychology Model of the Perceived Legitimacy of International Criminal Courts: Implications for the Success of Transitional Justice Mechanisms' (2012) 45 Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law 405, 472–5.

[11] E.g. M Damaška, Keynote Address at the Concluding Conference of the International Criminal Procedure Expert Framework: General Rules and Principles of International Criminal Procedure (27 October 2011) (on file with author); M DeGuzman, 'Choosing to Prosecute: Expressive Selection at the International Criminal Court' (2012) 33 Michigan Journal of International Law 265, 312–17; T Meron, 'Procedural Evolution at the ICTY' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 520, 524; J Ohlin, 'A Meta-Theory of International Criminal Procedure: Vindicating the Rule of Law' (2009) 14 UCLA Journal of International Law and Foreign Affairs 77, 82–3, 103.

the Court's objectives, and they conduct the investigations necessary to support the cases in court. Because of their considerable discretion in the process, international prosecutors are considered 'the driving force of all international criminal tribunals'.[12]

While ICC prosecutors have ample legal discretion to select cases and charges, they remain constrained by the intensely political environment in which they operate. The crimes within the Court's jurisdiction typically concern powerful political or military actors who are likely to resist investigations. Domestic authorities are (by definition under the Statute's admissibility requirements) unwilling or unable to prosecute the cases that are presented to the Court. Yet because ICC prosecutors have no independent law enforcement capacity, they depend heavily on these same domestic authorities for investigations. At the same time, ICC prosecutors operate with limited resources drawn from member state contributions, and they 'must, as a matter of necessity, be extremely selective in deciding which cases to investigate'.[13] This challenging environment demands not merely legal acumen, but also a great deal of diplomatic savvy on the part of international prosecutors.[14]

Understanding this political background, the framers of the ICC inscribed the value of prosecutorial independence into the Statute. Article 42 provides that the 'Office of the prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Court' and that its members 'shall not seek or act on instructions from any external source'.[15] The drafters of the ICC Statute viewed these guarantees of prosecutorial independence as an essential precondition for the Court's ability to accomplish its various goals. Freedom from political interference would allow prosecutors to pursue cases impartially, based above all on legal merit, and would thus ensure the long-term political legitimacy of the Court.[16]

At the same time, ICC framers understood that prosecutorial discretion must be controlled at least to some degree in order to prevent abuse and injustice.[17] In domestic systems, prosecutors are held accountable through a variety of external mechanisms, including the democratic process, professional discipline boards, civil service disciplinary frameworks, and judicial supervision.[18] Several of these mechanisms are either unavailable or only minimally available at the international level. ICC prosecutors are not embedded in a broader democratic political system, they are not members of an international bar association (sometimes not even a national bar association[19]), and they are not part of a civil service hierarchy that extends beyond the Court. The drafters of the ICC Statute therefore had to experiment with new models of prosecutorial accountability and to rely more heavily on judicial supervision than might be [12] L Côté, 'Independence and Impartiality' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 319, 321.

[13] L Arbour, 'Progress and Challenges in International Criminal Justice' (1997) 21 Fordham International Law Journal 531; see also R Cryer, Prosecuting International Crimes: Selectivity and the International Criminal Law Regime (New York: Cambridge University Press 2005); DeGuzman (n 11) 268–9.

[14] Côté (n 12) 322; see also C del Ponte and C Sudetic, Madame Prosecutor: Confrontations with Humanity's Worst Criminals and the Culture of Impunity (New York: Other Press 2009).

[15] Art 42 ICC Statute. [16] See Côté (n 12) 322.

[17] F Mégret, 'Accountability and Ethics' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 416, 418.

[18] Wright and Miller (n 1) 1600–9; Tonry (n 1). [19] See text accompanying n 108.

expected in a domestic criminal justice system. At the same time, some state representatives wanted to include some type of political check on the prosecution, and this led them to entrust the ASP—a political body composed of ICC member state representatives and possessing quasi-legislative functions—with a limited power to discipline prosecutors for serious misconduct.

Both judicial and political oversight of prosecutorial actions at the ICC must contend with the dilemma between accountability and effectiveness. Judges can respond to prosecutorial misconduct with powerful sanctions and remedies, including dismissals, retrials, and the exclusion of evidence, which could effectively end a case. Through the imposition of such remedies, judges can affirm the ICC's commitment to the rule of law and fair trials.[20] At the same time, case-determinative remedies inflict serious costs on other objectives of international criminal justice, including the Court's primary goal of preventing impunity for international crimes. Judicial oversight must grapple with the tension between these goals.

Likewise, political oversight by the ASP can come into conflict with prosecutorial independence. Most obviously, this can occur when the Assembly launches an investigation into prosecutorial actions in order to interfere with a prosecution that Assembly members oppose on political grounds. Even when such blatant manipulation is not at issue, regular inquiries into prosecutorial activity can undercut legitimate prosecutorial efforts. A prosecutor who has to account for each and every one of his acts can quickly cease to be effective.[21] Prosecutors who are routinely forced to respond to inquiries must divert scarce time and resources away from their work of developing and presenting cases. More broadly, the prospect of investigations can deter certain socially desirable actions by prosecutors and diminish the zeal with which they pursue cases. The Court cannot tolerate arbitrariness and injustice by prosecutors, but at the same time, accountability must not 'be so pervasive as to defeat the purpose of having an independent Prosecutor'.[22]

17.3 Internal Oversight

Relying on the Rome Statute's provisions on prosecutorial independence, the OTP has argued that internal oversight is the most appropriate means of regulating its staff. In support of this position, the Office has referred to the general provision that its staff members should act independently and not on external instructions, as well as to Article 42(2), which vests the prosecutor with 'full authority over the management and administration of the Office, including the staff, facilities and other resources thereof'.[23] The ICC Staff Rules and Regulations likewise contemplate that members of the OTP would be disciplined for 'unsatisfactory conduct' primarily through an internal administrative process.[24] Unsatisfactory conduct is broadly defined and [20] J Turner, 'Policing International Prosecutors' (2013) 45 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 175, 205–6.

[21] Mégret (n 17) 418. [22] Ibid. [23] Art 42(2) ICC Statute.

[24] Art X Staff Regulations, ICC-ASP/2/Res.2, 8–12 September 2003 (Second Session of the Assembly of States Parties ('ASP')); Rule 110.1, Staff Rules of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/4/3, 28 November–3 December 2005 (Fourth Session of the ASP); Decision on the Defence application concerning professional ethics applicable to prosecution lawyers, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, includes 'failure to observe the standards of conduct expected of an international civil servant'.[25]

Administrative sanctions imposed within the OTP are most likely to be effective in addressing individual misconduct by line prosecutors. At the domestic level, internal discipline is already used widely to police prosecutors in civil-law countries and is increasingly seen as key to reducing prosecutorial misconduct in the United States.[26] Internal sanctions work well because they are imposed directly on those prosecutors responsible for the violations and take the form of punishments that prosecutors care about—for example, salary reductions, suspensions, demotions, and even termination of employment. If imposed consistently, such punishments send a clear message about the importance of following the rules of the court. In addition, internal mechanisms such as training and oversight programmes play a critical role in preventing misconduct in the first place.[27] In all these ways, the OTP can take concrete and effective measures to foster a culture of respect for the rule of law among its staff.

The Office already appears to have a hierarchical structure with clear lines of control and several levels of oversight, which would indicate the basic infrastructure for internal oversight is present.[28] But anecdotal accounts also suggest that the Office could do more to train and regularly audit its personnel in proper investigative and disclosure procedures. The recent failure to identify and disclose potentially exculpatory evidence in the Kenyatta case confirms these accounts.[29] As others have argued persuasively, it is also important for the Office to promulgate a detailed Code of Conduct to guide its prosecutors.[30]

ICC-01/09-02/11-747, TC V(B), ICC, 31 May 2013, para. 12 ('As the Staff Regulations make clear, the authority to impose disciplinary measures on Prosecution staff for misconduct lies primarily with the Prosecutor.'). Allegations of unsatisfactory conduct are to be reviewed by a Disciplinary Board, which consists of one member appointed by the Prosecutor, one by the Registrar, and one by the staff representative body. Rule 110.3, Staff Rules of the ICC. The Board's decision is not binding on the Prosecutor, however. The Prosecutor also has the authority to summarily dismiss staff members for serious misconduct, but the summary dismissal may still be reviewed by the Board. Ibid., Rule 110.8.

[25] Rule 110.1 Staff Rules of the ICC.

[26] For discussion of proposed or current internal policies used to regulate prosecutors in various offices across the world, see D Johnson, The Japanese Way of Justice: Prosecuting Crime in Japan (New York: Oxford University Press 2002) 128–32; R Barkow, 'Institutional Design and the Policing of Prosecutors: Lessons from Administrative Law' (2009) 61 Stanford Law Review 869, 895–905; S Bibas, 'Prosecutorial Regulation Versus Prosecutorial Accountability' (2009) 157 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 959, 996–1015; M Coleman et al., 'Assessing the Role of the Independent Oversight Mechanism in Enhancing the Efficiency and Economy of the ICC' (Universiteit Utrecht, August 2011) <http://www.iilj.org/newsandevents/documents/IOMFinalPaperasPublishedinOTPWebSite.pdf> last accessed 31 July 2014. 56; E Luna and M Wade, 'Prosecutors as Judges' (2010) 67 Washington and Lee Law Review 1413, 1478–9; J Whitman, 'Equality in Criminal Law: The Two Divergent Western Roads' (2009) 1 Journal of Legal Analysis 119, 139.

[27] See section 17.6.4.

[28] Important management decisions are handled first by the head of the respective division, then by the Executive Committee, and then by the Prosecutor. G Townsend, 'Structure and Management' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 171, 287. Despite this formal hierarchy, some in the OTP have complained that 'OTP's management and management culture is lacking'. Ibid. 293.

[29] Decision on defence application pursuant to Art 64(4) and related requests, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-728, TC V, ICC, 26 April 2013, paras 93–4.

[30] M Markovic, 'The ICC Prosecutor's Missing Code of Conduct' (2011) 47 Texas International Law Journal 201. The OTP has, however, issued regulations that cover many questions pertaining to professional conduct. See Regulations of the OTP, ICC-BD/05-01-09, 23 April 2009. It is also revising its Responding to these concerns, the Office recently adopted a Code of Conduct.[31] It also commissioned a study to examine its supervision practices and has committed to reform in this area.[32] Finally, the Office has pledged to institute more regular and comprehensive training programmes for its members.[33] By strengthening its internal review mechanisms, the Office can bolster its argument that external investigations, such as those by the IOM, should be limited. Credible internal discipline will also generally help improve the Office's reputation with judges and with the international community. Maintaining a strong reputation with these two constituencies is critical to ICC prosecutors' ability to function effectively.

Even an effective internal oversight programme does not entirely eliminate the need for external monitoring, however. First, internal discipline will not work when the violation of the rules is condoned or ignored by supervisors. The main violations that occurred in the Court's first case, Prosecutor v Lubanga, did not concern errant line prosecutors, but involved a fundamental disagreement between the OTP and the judges about how to interpret the Rome Statute. In cases where the defendant has been seriously harmed by the misconduct, moreover, internal discipline will typically not be sufficient to repair the injury. While in-house efforts have a role to play, it remains critical for the ICC itself to develop a robust approach to policing prosecutorial misconduct.

17.4 Judicial Oversight

The ICC Statute vests judges with the primary authority to police prosecutorial conduct that may harm the integrity of the proceedings. In response to misconduct, judges can exclude evidence, order compensation to the accused, give warnings to the prosecution, impose fines, and interdict prosecutors from the courtroom.[34] Over time, the Court has developed several other responses to misconduct by relying on its 'inherent' powers, its authority to ensure the fairness of the trial, and its duty to ensure that the Statute's provisions are read in conformity with human rights law.[35] These policies and Operations Manual and planning to 'clarify operational processes, reporting lines, and responsibilities'. Townsend (n 28) 294.

[31] ICC, OTP, Code of Conduct for the OTP (5 September 2013).

[32] ICC, OTP, Strategic Plan, June 2012–15, at 33, paras 77–84 (11 October 2013).

[33] Ibid., paras 74, 57.

[34] Arts 69(7), 71, and 85 ICC Statute. The Court can also exercise jurisdiction over offences against the administration of justice under Art 70, but it is not entirely clear from the Statute and the Rules who would investigate and prosecute such offences when the suspected offender is a member of the OTP. Ibid., Art 70; compare Prosecution's Observations on Art 70 of the Rome Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2716, OTP, ICC, 1 April 2011 (prosecution brief arguing that the prosecution is exclusively responsible for prosecuting such offences) with Observations de la Défense sur la mise en oeuvre de l'Article 70, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2715, Defence of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 1 April 2011 (arguing that when the prosecution has a conflict of interest, the Trial Chamber can ask the Registrar to appoint an amicus curiae to conduct the prosecution).

[35] See Decision on Defence Application Pursuant to Art 64(4) and Related Requests, Kenyatta (n 29) paras 89–90; Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements, Lubanga (n 2) para. 17; Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Art 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, para. 37.

include conditional and unconditional stays of the proceedings, orders to release the accused, and adverse inferences from the evidence.[36] They even extend to prophylactic measures, such as orders for the OTP to implement specific measures to prevent misconduct from recurring.[37]

The Court has also gradually shifted its approach from one that focuses strictly on the prejudice to the defendant and the integrity of the proceedings to one that considers broader competing interests in determining the appropriate remedies for misconduct. The first two decisions in which the Court took a more absolutist approach to remedies concerned the failure to disclose potentially exculpatory evidence before trial and the refusal to obey court orders to disclose the identity of an intermediary who had worked for the prosecution.

In Lubanga, several months before trial, prosecutors informed the Trial Chamber that they had discovered more than 200 documents containing potentially exculpatory evidence or evidence material to the defence.[38] Prosecutors maintained that they could not disclose the documents to either the defence or the Chamber, because the documents had been obtained under confidentiality agreements. The sources that had supplied the documents to the prosecution—the United Nations and several NGOs—had refused to grant consent for any disclosure, even to the Court.[39] Prosecutors maintained that they were acting in good faith and had repeatedly tried to obtain consent to disclose the documents.[40] While acknowledging that the prosecution was acting in good faith, the Trial Chamber emphasized that the prosecution had violated the accused's fundamental right of access to exculpatory evidence. By collecting much of its evidence under broad confidentiality agreements, which prevented even the Trial Chamber from reviewing the evidence in camera, the prosecution laid the foundation for the conflict between confidentiality and disclosure.[41] Because the judges could not ensure a fair trial without first reviewing the evidence to determine its materiality, they decided to stay the proceedings indefinitely and order the release of the defendant.[42]

After an intervention by the Appeals Chamber and a change of course by information providers, who finally consented to the disclosure of the documents to the Trial Chamber, the proceedings resumed.[43] Soon after the trial began, however, the [36] Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements, Lubanga (n 2) para. 17; Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Article 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1486, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008, paras 41, 55; Redacted Decision on the 'Defence Application Seeking a Permanent Stay of the Proceedings', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2690-Red2, TC I, ICC, 7 March 2011, para. 212.

[37] Decision on Defence Application Pursuant to Art 64(4) and Related Requests, Kenyatta (n 29) paras 89-90, 97.

[38] Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements, Lubanga (n 2) para. 17.

[39] Ibid., para. 64. [40] Ibid., para. 17. [41] Ibid., para. 75.

[42] Decision on the release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1418, TC I, ICC, 2 July 2008, para. 30.

[43] Reasons for Oral Decision lifting the stay of proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1644, TC I, ICC, 23 January 2009, para. 13. The prosecution obtained the consent after assuring the providers that the Chamber would treat the documents as

Lubanga Trial Chamber imposed a second stay of the proceedings.[44] The prosecution had deliberately refused to comply with the Chamber's order to release the identity of an intermediary whom the prosecution had used to contact witnesses in the DRC.[45] The prosecution argued that it could not comply with the order because disclosure of the person's identity might jeopardize his safety and would conflict with the prosecution's duty to protect witnesses.[46] The Trial Chamber noted, however, that it had ordered the disclosure of the person's identity only after consulting the ICC's Victims and Witnesses Unit about the necessary protective measures.[47] The prosecution's deliberate refusal to follow the court order meant that the prosecutor declined 'to be "checked" by the Chamber'.[48] The Chamber concluded that there was no realistic prospect of a fair trial under the circumstances, so it again stayed the proceedings and ordered the release of the defendant.[49]

In both Lubanga Decisions, the combination of the stay and order to release, if actually implemented, would have effectively ended the case. If the defendant had in fact been released, it would have been unlikely that the Court could regain custody of him. The judges suggested in passing that they were aware of the potential significant costs of their orders—to the international community, which created the ICC to punish and deter international crimes; to victims, who would not receive a remedy for the wrongs they suffered; and to the Court's own goal of uncovering the truth.[50] But the judges deliberately chose to set aside these competing social and legal interests and instead focused solely on the seriousness of the procedural violation.[51] They refused to consider whether less burdensome remedies might be available to address the misconduct, and by effectively dismissing the case, opted for what one might call an absolutist approach to remedies.[52]

While these first two decisions by the Lubanga Trial Chamber might suggest that the Court would take a very strict and uncompromising line on prosecutorial misconduct, more recent pronouncements by both Trial and Appeals Chambers indicate that the Court is adopting a more measured approach. When the Appeals Chamber reviewed the first decision to stay the proceedings in Lubanga, for example, it recognized the need to leave open the possibility for the trial to proceed. The Appeals Chamber recharacterized the stay as 'conditional' and reversed the order to release the confidential (an assurance that the Chamber had given much earlier in the process and before the initial stay) and after promising that it would take all protective measures necessary, including withdrawal of the charges, in the event the Appeals Chamber were to order the disclosure of documents without the providers' consent. R Rastan, 'Review of ICC Jurisprudence 2008' (2009) 7 Northwestern Journal of International Human Rights 261, 275–6 fn. 42.

[44] Redacted Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultations with the VWU, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2517-Red, TC I, ICC, 8 July 2010.

[45] Ibid., para. 31. [46] Ibid., paras 13–16. [47] Ibid., paras 12–17. [48] Ibid., para. 31.

[49] Ibid.

[50] Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements, Lubanga (n 2) para. 95.

[51] Ibid.

[52] See M Khosla, 'Proportionality: An Assault on Human Rights?: A Reply' (2010) 8 International Journal of Constitutional Law 298 (contrasting balancing and absolutist approaches to human rights).

defendant.[53] The re-categorization of the stay allowed the Court to reach the merits of the case once the prosecution was able to obtain consent to disclose the documents to the Chamber.[54]

The Appeals Chamber embraced the balancing approach more openly two years later, when it overturned the second stay of proceedings in Lubanga. It held that the Trial Chamber should first consider less drastic measures, such as sanctions against the prosecutor, before ordering a stay of the proceedings.[55] Because an indefinite stay of proceedings imposes significant costs on the ICC's ability to fulfil all of its purposes, it should be used only in the last resort. In concluding that a stay was not appropriate under the circumstances, the Appeals Chamber expressly considered the interests of victims and of the international community 'to see justice done', as well as the interest of the accused in a final decision on the merits.[56]

Since then, Trial Chambers in several cases have rejected defence motions to stay the proceedings and have emphasized the need to seek less costly corrective measures.[57] In Lubanga, for example, the defence requested a permanent stay to remedy several prosecutorial failures, including the failure to verify certain witness statements and the failure to supervise several intermediaries who had allegedly bribed prosecution witnesses.[58] The Trial Chamber concluded that even if these allegations of misconduct were true, a remedy less drastic than a stay could cure the prejudice at issue. At the conclusion of the case, the Trial Chamber would review the instances in which the prosecution might have been submitting unreliable evidence, and it would weigh or exclude evidence as necessary.[59] In deciding whether to impose a stay, the Chamber noted that it 'must weigh the nature of the alleged abuse of process against the fact that

[53] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Consequences of Non-disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Art 54(3)(e) Agreements', Lubanga (n 36) paras 4–5; Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1487, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008, paras 44–5.

[54] The prosecution obtained the consent after assuring the providers that the Chamber would treat the documents as confidential (an assurance that the Chamber had given much earlier in the process and before the initial stay) and after promising that it would take all protective measures necessary, including withdrawal of the charges, in the event the Appeals Chamber were to order the disclosure of documents without the providers' consent. Rastan (n 43) 275–6, fn. 42. Reasons for Oral Decision lifting the stay of proceedings, Lubanga (n 43) para. 13.

[55] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber I of 8 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultations with the VWU', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2582, 8 October 2010, para. 61.

[56] Ibid., para. 60.

[57] Redacted Decision on the 'Defence Application Seeking a Permanent Stay of the Proceedings', Lubanga (n 36) para. 197; Decision on Defence Application Pursuant to Art 64(4) and Related Requests, Kenyatta (n 29) paras 77–8 (reviewing more recent cases and concluding that '[i]t is clear from the more recent jurisprudence of the Court that not every violation of fair trial rights will justify the imposition of a stay (conditional or unconditional) of the proceedings and that this is an exceptional remedy to be applied as a last resort').

[58] Redacted Decision on the 'Defence Application Seeking a Permanent Stay of the Proceedings', Lubanga (n 36) para. 196.

[59] Ibid., para. 204.

only the most serious crimes of concern for the international community as a whole fall under the jurisdiction of the Court'.[60]

The Trial Chamber applied a similar balancing approach to remedies in Kenyatta.[61] In that case, the prosecution failed to disclose a potentially exculpatory witness statement until after the hearing to confirm the charges had concluded. The omission resulted from a deficient review system within the OTP where 'persons without knowledge of the overall state of the evidence against the accused, or at a minimum the overall evidence provided by the witness concerned', reviewed documents for disclosure.[62] The defence therefore received the document only after it had requested the prosecution to provide more information about it.[63]

The Trial Chamber noted that the prosecution's failure to turn over the document was 'a cause for serious concern, both in terms of the integrity of the proceedings and the rights of Mr Kenyatta'.[64] But it noted that the document was ultimately disclosed before trial, even if belatedly. The Chamber also emphasized that there was no evidence of bad faith on the part of the prosecution and that the prejudice caused by the late disclosure could be cured at trial, where the defence would be able to challenge the credibility of the evidence.[65] For these reasons, the Chamber concluded that it would be disproportionate to stay the proceedings.[66] Instead, the Chamber reprimanded the prosecution and required it to conduct a complete review of its case file and 'certify to the court that it has done so in order to ensure that no other materials in its possession that ought to have been disclosed to the Defense, are left undisclosed'.[67] The Chamber stressed that it expected the prosecution, 'if it had not already done so, to make appropriate changes to its internal procedures'.[68] While imposing relatively mild sanctions on the prosecution—a mere reprimand—the Chamber left open the possibility that the sanctions might escalate if a similar disclosure problem were uncovered as the case progressed.[69]

This most recent decision concerning prosecutorial misconduct illustrates three positive developments in the Court's approach towards prosecutorial misconduct. First, it confirms the Court's commitment to policing prosecutors for errors and misconduct. As in earlier decisions in Lubanga and Katanga, ICC judges have actively assumed the responsibility to address procedural violations by prosecutors and have not deferred disciplinary questions to internal mechanisms within the OTP or to [61] Ibid., para. 189. Although a stay guarantees the enforcement of fundamental rights, it also has significant costs: 'It brings proceedings to a halt, potentially frustrating the objective of the trial of delivering justice in a particular case as well as affecting the broader purposes expressed in the preamble to the Rome Statute'. Ibid., para. 165.

[60] Ibid., para. 195.

[62] Decision on Defence Application Pursuant to Art 64(4) and Related Requests, Kenyatta (n 29) para. 93. Even though other prosecutors from the Office conducted further interviews with the witness, requested authorization from a Judge to withhold the affidavit, and reviewed the evidence provided by the witness when preparing for the confirmation hearing, no one noticed the potentially exculpatory nature of the statement. Ibid.

[63] Ibid., para. 94. [64] Ibid., para. 95. [65] Ibid., para. 96. [66] Ibid., para. 97.

[67] Ibid. [68] Ibid.

[69] ICC Trial Chambers have also taken different approaches to the remedy of excluding evidence—in some cases using a balancing approach and in other cases using an absolutist approach. For a more detailed discussion of these two different approaches to excluding evidence, see Turner (n 20) 192–4, 199–203.

the ASP. Given the current weakness of these other mechanisms, judicial activism in addressing misconduct is generally a positive development, even when it occasionally results in overly burdensome remedies.

Second, the Kenyatta Decision builds on the line of cases that have adopted a structured balancing approach to remedies. Following this approach, the Trial Chamber acknowledges that providing relief to defendants, while important for vindicating fair trial rights, can impair the Court's ability to achieve other goals, such as punishing international crimes and compiling an accurate historical record.[70] The Court is transparent and forthright about the considerations that motivate its decision, allowing a more fruitful debate about its merits.[71] Significantly, by enumerating the specific factors that guide its balancing analysis, the Kenyatta Chamber is providing much-needed structure and predictability to the balancing approach developed in earlier ICC Decisions.[72]

Finally, the Kenyatta Decision further expands the range of remedies and sanctions for prosecutorial misconduct. The Court had previously done so on several occasions by reading broadly its authority to ensure the fairness of the proceedings and its duty to interpret the Rome Statute consistently with international human rights. By reprimanding prosecutors and threatening more serious sanctions unless prosecutors implement a specific plan to reform their disclosure practices, the Kenyatta Chamber has further diversified the remedies available to the Court. As the Court adds to the palette of remedies and sanctions provided under the Statute, it helps to ensure that it can offer more proportionate and targeted responses to misconduct. Going forward, the Court can build on this record and introduce two important additional remedies, sentence reductions and dismissals of select counts, which have been used effectively in other international criminal tribunals and a number of national jurisdictions. These remedies have the virtue of allowing the trial to proceed non the merits, while still effectively punishing errant prosecutors and vindicating individual rights.[73]

These first decisions by ICC Chambers have shown that, in many cases, judges are both legally and practically well situated to respond to prosecutorial misconduct. They are often the first witnesses to misconduct and are able to address it promptly and directly. At the same time, judges do not have unlimited time or resources to investigate and sanction prosecutorial misconduct. Their investigative capacity is especially likely to be insufficient when it comes to systemic misconduct by the OTP or when [70] Turner (n 20) 204–9. But cf. K Pitcher, 'Addressing Violations of International Criminal Procedure' in D Abels et al. (eds), Dialectiek van Nationaal en Internationaal Strafrecht (Den Haag: Boom Juridische uitgevers 2013) 257–308.

[71] Turner (n 20) 211–12.

[72] The early decisions on prosecutorial misconduct offer some indication of what factors may be relevant. These include the prejudice to the defendant's rights, the culpability of the Prosecutor, and the level of involvement by the prosecution. The Court can build on these to establish a clear framework for responses to misconduct. Turner (n 20) 246–56.

[73] Ibid., 215–37. The Court could also broaden the use of sanctions, such as fines and interdiction, to respond to misconduct. Ibid., 232–8. In Kenyatta, the Trial Chamber referred to its 'broad discretionary powers to ensure a fair trial' as a basis for imposing sanctions for breaches of its orders even when the breach did not occur during the proceedings, as Art 71, pertaining to sanctions, appears to require. Decision on the Defence application concerning professional ethics applicable to prosecution lawyers, Kenyatta (n 24) para. 14.

the misconduct does not directly threaten the integrity of the proceedings. This is one reason why additional political and administrative measures remain necessary to police prosecutorial misconduct adequately. In addition, even when judges are able to impose remedies that effectively punish misconduct, these remedies are often too blunt and may interfere with other goals of the international criminal justice, including the goal to punish and deter international crimes effectively. Judicial mechanisms therefore remain an imperfect response to prosecutorial misconduct, and political and administrative mechanisms are still necessary to address misconduct effectively.

17.5 Political Oversight

Political accountability of prosecutors is a common feature of domestic criminal justice systems. Common-law countries have applied it as a check on prosecutorial discretion for a long time, and civil-law countries occasionally use it to supplement bureaucratic mechanisms of accountability.[74] Yet the idea of holding prosecutors accountable through political institutions remains controversial at the ICC. Commentators fear that oversight by a political body such as the ASP would undermine the ability of prosecutors to accomplish their tasks impartially and effectively. The concern is that the political implications of cases are often too immense—and the prosecutorial role in them too central—to allow for disinterested action by Assembly delegates when it comes to policing prosecutors.

While these concerns are not entirely without merit, the ICC Statute explicitly provides for Assembly oversight in several provisions concerning the appointment, removal, and discipline of the prosecutor and deputy prosecutor and provisions concerning the management of the OTP.[75] In addition to textual support for Assembly oversight, there is also a policy argument for it. Given the frequently mentioned 'democratic deficit' of the ICC, some level of oversight by the Assembly may help the Court gain a measure of political legitimacy (at least with those member states that see political accountability of prosecutors as a virtue).[76] Finally, even if the concerns about political interference by the Assembly are valid as a theoretical matter, they are not likely to be borne out regularly in practice. The Assembly's disciplinary powers are already legally and practically so circumscribed that we are more likely to see a problem of insufficient discipline rather than overzealous inquiries for political ends.

The ASP can act by majority to elect, remove, or discipline the ICC prosecutor and deputy prosecutor. Disciplinary measures range from reprimands to fines and removal. The Assembly can remove the prosecutor and deputy prosecutor for gross negligence in the performance of their duties, for knowingly acting in contravention of their duties, and for serious misconduct that is 'incompatible with official [74] Wright and Miller (n 1) 1590–1. [75] Arts 46, 47, and 112 ICC Statute.

[76] See A Greenawalt, 'Justice without Politics? Prosecutorial Discretion and the International Criminal Court' (2007) 39 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 583, 657; A Marston Danner, 'Enhancing the Legitimacy and Accountability of Prosecutorial Discretion at the International Criminal Court' (2003) 97 American Journal of International Law 510, 535. For an analysis of the different attitudes towards political accountability of prosecutors in civil-law and common-law countries, see D Brown, 'Law, Democracy, and Structures of Adjudication' (manuscript on file with author); Tonry (n 1).

functions, and causes or is likely to cause serious harm to the proper administration of justice before the Court or the proper internal functioning of the Court'.[77] The Assembly can fine or also reprimand the prosecutor and deputy prosecutor for less serious misconduct that 'causes or is likely to cause harm to the proper administration of justice before the Court or the proper internal functioning of the Court'.[78] As an example, repeatedly 'failing to comply with or ignoring requests made by the presiding judge or by the Presidency in the exercise of their lawful authority' qualifies as such misconduct.[79]

The broad language of these provisions lends some credence to the concern that the Assembly may use discipline for political reasons (for example, when a majority of states believes that a prosecutor is mishandling a sensitive case). But a layer of procedural constraints sharply limits the odds of misuse. First, any complaint about prosecutorial misconduct must be transmitted to the Presidency of the Court before it is sent to the Assembly for consideration. A board of three judges reviews the complaints and sets aside anonymous or manifestly unfounded complaints.[80] Only after such complaints are filtered out does the Presidency forward the remaining ones to the Assembly.[81]

It is still theoretically possible that complaints that are not 'manifestly unfounded', but are also not entirely legitimate, can be used to harass top prosecutors and frustrate their work.[82] Yet other statutory provisions set additional limits on Assembly intervention in most cases of misconduct. First, measures by the Assembly can be imposed only on the prosecutor and the deputy prosecutor. At least for now, judicial responses remain the only external source of accountability for line prosecutors.[83] Even with respect to misconduct by the two top prosecutors, the Assembly's ability to respond is procedurally constrained. The Assembly meets regularly only once a year, and during that sole meeting it must decide on a number of important budgetary and management questions pertaining to the Court as a whole. The Assembly is not likely to devote its limited time to disciplinary measures except in extraordinary cases. Disciplinary measures also require an absolute majority vote in the ASP, which is a high threshold

[77] Art 46 ICC Statute; Rule 24(1)(a) Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence'). An example of serious misconduct is the disclosure of information that the Prosecutor has acquired in the course of her duties or on a matter which is under consideration by the Court 'where such disclosure is seriously prejudicial to the judicial proceedings or to any person'. Rule 24(1)(a)(i) ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence. The other two examples involve serious misconduct for personal benefit. Specifically, '(ii) Concealing information or circumstances of a nature sufficiently serious to have precluded him or her from holding office'; and '(iii) Abuse of judicial office in order to obtain unwarranted favourable treatment from any authorities, officials or professionals'.

[78] Art 47 ICC Statute; Rule 25 ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[79] Rule 25(a) ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[80] Rule 26 ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence; Regulation 120 Regulations of the Court, ICC-BD/01-03-11, 26 May 2004, as amended on 2 November 2011 ('Regulations of the Court').

[81] Regulation 121(2) Regulations of the Court.

[82] The limited experience of the Court so far contradicts such concerns, however. In a controversial case concerning allegations that the former ICC Prosecutor, Luis Moreno Ocampo, had committed sexual assault, the panel of Judges found that the complaint was 'manifestly unfounded' although not malicious. Mégret (n 17) 480.

[83] Once the IOM becomes functional, it will also provide such external oversight. See section 17.6.1.

to cross.[84] Under these procedural constraints, the Assembly is likely to address only egregious misconduct by top prosecutors. The more realistic prospect is therefore that the Assembly would provide weak oversight, and judicial oversight will remain the backstop for most instances of prosecutorial misconduct.

Although the Assembly is not likely to discipline prosecutorial misconduct frequently, its authority to do so overlaps to some degree with judicial authority to police prosecutorial misconduct. To ensure that the Assembly and judges use their disciplinary powers efficiently, it is important to delineate more clearly when each body should intervene. In determining how to divide responsibility for different types of misconduct, the ICC may consider the following three factors: (i) the relative expertise of each body in investigating the specific type of misconduct at hand; (ii) the relative ability of each body, with respect to the type of misconduct at issue, to impose sanctions that effectively punish misconduct, affirm the rule of law, and promote fair trials; (iii) the relative burden that judicial and Assembly interventions might impose on the ability of the ICC to accomplish its central purposes, such as preventing impunity for international crimes and ascertaining the truth about the crimes.

With respect to the last factor—the cost of the measures imposed—reprimands and fines by the Assembly fare relatively well. Reprimands and fines do not alter the result of judicial proceedings and do not directly undermine the goals of punishing international crimes and uncovering the truth. In many cases, therefore, they represent a superior alternative to judicial remedies that disrupt the course of the case, such as a stay of proceedings, dismissal, or exclusion of evidence. On the other hand, reprimands and fines provide no concrete relief for violations of individual rights, and the Assembly is not well suited to determining when such a violation has occurred. Accordingly, a reprimand or fine by the Assembly would not be a useful substitute for judicial remedies when the violation at issue has harmed individual rights. They would be more appropriate for violations that have not prejudiced individual rights, yet are significant or pervasive enough to warrant a response.

The Court could also refer to the Assembly cases of misconduct that have affected individual rights or the integrity of the proceedings and for which the Court has already imposed some remedies. Because remedies are costly, the Court could impose more measured remedies but then refer a case for further discipline by the Assembly (at least where the misconduct can be attributed to the prosecutor or deputy prosecutor). The judicial referral could help overcome the procedural hurdles to Assembly action and reduce the risk of politicization. At the same time, by combining milder judicial remedies with Assembly sanctions, the Court could achieve the desired punitive effect at a lesser cost to the proceedings on the merits.[85]

[84] The ASP can call special sessions by a vote of a third of its members or on the initiative of its Bureau, but this adds yet another procedural threshold. Art 112(6) ICC Statute.

[85] Milder remedies may include a sentence reduction, adverse evidentiary inference, or reprimand. Even when combined with Assembly sanctions, however, these remedies would not be appropriate when prosecutorial misconduct has undermined confidence in the verdict. See Turner (n 20) 182.

17.6 Administrative and Professional Oversight

17.6.1 IOM

Perhaps in recognition of its limited practical ability to discipline prosecutors directly, the ASP recently created an IOM to investigate misconduct by prosecutors, judges, court staff, and contractors retained by the court.[86] The IOM is not yet fully operational but is expected to begin work in the near future. The IOM would have the power to investigate misconduct by prosecutors and recommend disciplinary measures to the OTP.[87] Where criminal conduct is suspected, it could recommend that the Court refer the matter to the relevant national authorities.[88] Misconduct is interpreted very broadly and includes 'any act or omission … in violation of [the staff member's] obligations to the Court pursuant to the Rome Statute and its implementing instruments, Staff and Financial Regulations and Rules, relevant administrative issuances and contractual agreements, as appropriate'.[89] It does not, however, include offences against the administration of justices, such as presenting false testimony and interfering with witness testimony, which are covered by Article 70 of the ICC Statute and remain subject to prosecution by the OTP and trial by the Court.[90]

The IOM is presented by the Assembly as an independent administrative body that would hold ICC prosecutors to account in order to ensure the effective functioning of the Court. The Assembly grounded its authority to establish the IOM on two provisions of the Rome Statute. Article 112(2)(2) provides that the Assembly 'shall … provide management oversight to … the Prosecutor … regarding the administration of the Court'.[91] To do so, under Article 112(4), 'the Assembly may establish such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary, including an independent oversight mechanism for inspection, evaluation and investigation of the Court, in order to enhance its efficiency and economy'.[92]

The OTP has objected to the Assembly's competence to establish the IOM and has argued that IOM investigations into prosecutorial misconduct would interfere with [86] The ASP established the Mechanism under Art 112(4) of the ICC Statute, which provides that: 'The Assembly may establish such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary, including an independent oversight mechanism for inspection, evaluation and investigation of the Court, in order to enhance its efficiency and economy'. Art 112(4) ICC Statute. Some commentators have questioned whether the authority to discipline a wide range of prosecutorial misconduct can be based on this grant of competence to enhance the 'efficiency and economy' of the Court. The Proposed Independent Oversight Mechanism for the International Criminal Court, Invited Experts on Oversight Question (UCLA Law Forum, May–September 2011) <http://uclalawforum.com/home> accessed 31 July 2014 (contribution by Nicholas Cowdery).

[87] Establishment of an Independent Oversight Mechanism, ICC-ASP/8/Res.1, 26 November 2009 (Seventh Plenary Meeting of the ASP), para. 6(d). In a more recent resolution, adopted as this book chapter was going through the editing process, the ASP expanded the IOM's function to include unscheduled inspections of 'any premises or processes' of the Court, as requested by the Bureau of the ASP. Independent Oversight Mechanism, ICC-ASP/12/Res.6, 27 November 2013 (12th Plenary Meeting of the ASP) Annex, para. 6. The new functions will also include 'evaluation of any programme, project or policy as requested by the Assembly or Bureau'. Ibid., para. 16.

[88] Independent Oversight Mechanism, ICC-ASP/12/Res.6 (n 87) para. 41.

[89] Ibid., para. 28, fn. 4.

[90] Ibid., para. 30.

[91] Art 112(2)(2) ICC Statute.

[92] Art 112(4) ICC Statute.

the principle of prosecutorial independence enshrined in Article 42 of the Rome Statute.[93] According to the OTP, if an external body such as the IOM were to 'instruct' or demand cooperation from prosecutorial staff without the consent of the prosecutor, it would violate the Rome Statute's language that prosecutors 'shall not seek or act on instructions from any external source'.[94] Because the Statute also provides that the prosecutor has 'full authority over the management and administration of the Office, including the staff, facilities and other resources thereof', the prosecutor has argued that he enjoys 'full and unfettered administrative independence' to investigate and discipline his own staff.[95]

In view of the prosecutor's objections, the ASP revised the IOM's procedures twice. The first amendment provided that whenever the ICC prosecutor and the IOM disagree as to whether investigations of prosecutorial staff should proceed, an independent third party would be brought in to resolve the dispute.[96] If the third party determined that the investigation might undermine prosecutorial independence, the investigation would be suspended. Even after this amendment was adopted, however, concerns remained that the IOM's investigations could be used by the Assembly to interfere with the independence of the ICC prosecutor.[97] Commentators suggested that States Parties unhappy with the charging decisions of the prosecutor might use the IOM to harass the OTP, prevent the Office from devoting full attention to prosecutions, and place pressure on the prosecutor to change her policies.[98] To some degree, these concerns were accommodated through the recourse to an independent third party and the requirement that investigations be conducted 'with strict regard for fairness and due process for all concerned'.[99] But it was still unclear what exact procedures the IOM would adopt to ensure due process and confidentiality, and how independent the third-party arbiter would in fact be (since it would be appointed by the AASP, some observers worried that its independence may not be entirely assured).[100]

In its most recent session, the Assembly revised the IOM procedures once more. This time, it provided that the IOM must notify the prosecutor of any pending investigation of a staff member and then consult with the prosecutor within five working days of the notification, 'in order to avoid any negative impact on on-going investigative, prosecutorial and judicial activities resulting from the proposed investigation'.[101] If following the consultation, the prosecutor continues to believe that the proposed [93] Art 42 ICC Statute (providing that '[t]he Office of the Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Court' and that '[a] member of the Office shall not seek or act on instructions from any external source').

[94] Report of the Bureau on the IOM, ICC-ASP/9/31, 29 November 2010, para. 44.

[95] Ibid. The submissions to the Bureau on this issue were signed by then-Prosecutor Luis Moreno Ocampo. The most recent Strategic Plan of the OTP suggests that the new Prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda, similarly insists on maintaining the independence of the Office in disciplinary matters. Strategic Plan (n 32) 33, para. 85.

[96] IOM, ICC-ASP/9/Res.5, 10 December 2010 (Fifth Plenary Meeting of the ASP) Annex, paras 20–5.

[97] See The Proposed Independent Oversight Mechanism for the International Criminal Court (n 86) (contributions by José Alvarez, Nicholas Cowdery, and Harmen van der Wilt) (discussing how IOM could interfere with the operation of the ICC Prosecutor's Office).

[98] Ibid. (contribution by Harmen van der Wilt); Coleman et al. (n 26) 51.

[99] IOM, ICC-ASP/9/Res.5 (n 96) para. 27.

[100] Coleman et al. (n 26) 6.

[101] IOM, ICC-ASP/12/Res.6 (n 87) Annex, para. 34.

investigation is outside the mandate of the IOM, the prosecutor can report its concerns to the Bureau and then seek a determination from the Presidency of the ICC.[102] The President of the Court will be assisted by three judges in issuing a final and binding judgment on this matter.

The most recent amendment minimizes the risk that the IOM would interfere with legitimate prosecutorial actions. In an earlier writing on this topic, I had proposed that IOM procedures be revised to require that any complaints about prosecutorial misconduct relating to investigative and trial work be referred or at least vetted by ICC judges.[103] Such a mechanism already exists with respect to complaints of misconduct transmitted to the Assembly for disciplinary measures under Article 46. I therefore argued that the same mechanism for complaints to the IOM would be practical and consistent with the existing legal framework. The judicial referral mechanism could prevent politically motivated investigations of prosecutors from occurring, but would still allow valid complaints to be investigated by the IOM. The 2013 Assembly Resolution provides for a similar judicial check on IOM inquiries, but it requires the prosecutor to trigger the procedure by seeking a determination from the Presidency.[104] This new procedure appears to strike a good balance between the need to preserve prosecutorial independence and yet ensure accountability.

Even if the judicial referral mechanism addresses the concern about the IOM's potential politicization, another problem remains. The current structure of the IOM includes only four staff members. It was increased from the earlier provision for only two members, but the mandate of the IOM was also extended to cover inspections and evaluation of ICC programmes more broadly.[105] Given that the IOM is supposed to inspect and evaluate ICC programmes and then also investigate complaints concerning prosecutors, judges, the Registrar, staff members of the Court, and contractors, a four-member office seems inadequate for the task. Unless the IOM's capacity is expanded, the Mechanism is likely to have only a limited role to play in monitoring ICC prosecutors. In addition to these resource constraints, as noted earlier, the IOM is also legally limited to investigate misconduct other than offences against the administration of justice.[106] Therefore, the real problem with the IOM may be that it would provide insufficient rather than overzealous scrutiny of prosecutorial misconduct.

In light of its currently limited resources, the IOM would do best to direct its efforts to cases where it is likely to have the most impact and where other sanctions and remedies are insufficient. For example, the IOM could usefully investigate complaints alleging that prosecutors knowingly or purposefully engaged in misconduct, but the defendant was not directly or seriously harmed. Similarly, investigations would be helpful where the prejudice to an individual defendant is minor, but there is a pattern of misconduct by the OTP. In such cases, the Court may be reluctant to impose any meaningful remedies, because the harm to an individual defendant is small. Action by the IOM would therefore be critical to holding prosecutors accountable and deterring future violations. As with disciplinary measures by the Assembly, it would be useful to delineate the instances in which IOM action would be more beneficial than judicial intervention.

[102] Ibid., para. 35. [103] Turner (n 20) 243–4.
[104] IOM, ICC-ASP/12/Res.6 (n 87) para. 35. [105] Ibid., para. 4. [106] Ibid., para. 30.

17.6.2 Bar associations

Because of the various shortcomings of discipline by the ASP and the IOM, some have suggested that bar associations could be used to regulate international prosecutors. Bar associations have the authority to investigate and discipline prosecutorial misconduct in common-law systems, and at least in theory, they offer a fair and efficient way to handle misconduct. They are composed of prosecutors' professional peers and can draw on members' legal expertise to address questions of misconduct competently; they are generally seen as neutral and apolitical bodies; and their disciplinary measures have no direct effect on the outcome of ongoing cases. But as commentary on bar discipline at the domestic level has shown, in practice, such discipline is rarely imposed, and it has failed to constrain prosecutorial misconduct effectively.[107]

At the ICC, regulation by bar authorities is even less likely to work, for several reasons. First, ICC prosecutors are not required to be members of a national bar association, and at least some current prosecutors appear to lack such membership.[108] Unless the OTP begins requiring membership as a matter of policy, local bar associations could not offer comprehensive regulation. A bar membership requirement is not likely to be forthcoming, however, because prosecutors from civil-law countries are typically not regulated through their bar associations. They are seen as organs of the Court and members of the civil service, on par with judges, and are disciplined either through internal administrative measures, or, for more serious violations, by civil-service tribunals.[109]

Another potential problem is that national bar associations may not always apply their codes of conduct extraterritorially.[110] Even when rules do apply across borders, national bar authorities would be reluctant to conduct expensive and logistically challenging investigations of misconduct abroad.[111] If national authorities are already failing in their duties to discipline prosecutorial misconduct at home, it appears implausible that they would consider inquiries into misconduct at the ICC a high priority.

[107] D Keenan et al., 'The Myth of Prosecutorial Accountability after Connick v Thompson: Why Existing Professional Responsibility Measures Cannot Protect against Prosecutorial Misconduct' (2011) 121 Yale Law Journal Online 203 <http://www.yalelawjournal.org/the-yale-law-journal-pocket-part/volume-121> accessed 31 July 2014; F Zacharias, 'The Professional Discipline of Prosecutors' (2001) 79 North Carolina Law Review 721; see also J Maute, 'Bar Associations, Self-Regulation and Consumer Protection: Whither Thou Goest?' (2008) Journal of the Professional Lawyer 53, 73–6.

[108] Decision on the Defence application concerning professional ethics applicable to prosecution lawyers, Kenyatta (n 24).

[109] Luna and Wade (n 26) 1474–9; Turner (n 20) 238.

[110] Bar Standards Board, Code of Conduct, Annexe A: The International Practising Rules R.2 <https://www.barstandardsboard.org.uk/regulatory-requirements/the-code-of-conduct/annexes-to-the-code/annexe-a-the-international-practising-rulesred-european-lawyers-rules> accessed 31 July 2014. But see Rule 8.5(a) Model Rules of Professional Conduct ('A lawyer admitted to practice in this jurisdiction is subject to the disciplinary authority of this jurisdiction, regardless of where the lawyer's conduct occurs').

[111] See C Rogers, 'Lawyers without Borders' (2009) 30 University of Pennsylvania Journal of International Law 1035, 1083.

Even if we were to assume that some enforcement by local authorities would occur, another problem remains. As debates about witness proofing, ex parte contacts, and cross-examination at the ICCs have shown, norms of conduct still differ significantly across jurisdictions. Depending on the choice-of-law rules applied by local bar associations, ICC prosecutors may be subject to different norms of conduct, creating a problem of inconsistent treatment. In fact, even if the choice-of-law rules consistently directed national bar associations to apply ICC rules,[112] a problem of expertise in interpreting and applying these rules would likely arise. Moreover, choice-of-law provisions typically do not apply to procedural and evidentiary matters, so the problem of different treatment would still remain to a certain degree.

In response to these concerns, some have suggested that an international professional body, such as the International Association of Prosecutors ('IAP' or 'Association'), ought to play a more central role in sanctioning ICC prosecutors.[113] But at least at present, the IAP has not assumed any disciplinary role and has limited itself to drafting a model Code of Conduct for ICC prosecutors.[114] It is not at all clear that relevant actors at the ICC would wish to see a more active role for the Association. The ASP decided to create an IOM under its own auspices instead of entrusting the IAP with the task of disciplining prosecutors.

Requiring international prosecutors to join an international association such as the IAP and giving it investigative authority over prosecutorial misconduct would have certain benefits. Regulation by an international association would provide greater uniformity in the standards governing prosecutorial actions compared to regulation by national bar associations. Compared to oversight by the IOM and the ASP, it would also present a lesser risk that disciplinary measures would be used for political ends. Finally, the Association would draw on the expertise of prosecutors from different legal systems, including some with international experience, ensuring that discipline is imposed with a good understanding of the context in which international prosecutors operate.

Despite these potential benefits of IAP oversight, it is not likely to be the optimal means of accountability for prosecutors at the ICC in the foreseeable future. The Association is not an organ of the Court, and it might be difficult to reconcile its oversight functions with the Rome Statute. The creation of the IOM further reduces the appeal of transforming the IAP into a regulatory body for ICC prosecutors. Regulation by both the IAP and the IOM would be duplicative and inefficient. In choosing between the two oversight mechanisms, ICC prosecutors would likely prefer the IAP because of its perceived neutrality, expertise, and distance from the ASP. But the Assembly would prefer to rely on the mechanism it has already created, and it is not clear that the Rome [112] Rule 8.5(b)(1) Model Rules of Professional Conduct ('[F]or conduct in connection with a matter pending before a tribunal, the rules of the jurisdiction in which the tribunal sits, unless the rules of the tribunal provide otherwise').

[113] Mégret (n 17) 465; see also J Stewart, 'New Thoughts about Barayagwiza: Reactions to Policing International Prosecutors' (Opinio Juris, 5 April 2013) <http://opiniojuris.org/2013/04/05/nyu-jilp-symposium-new-thoughts-about-barayagwiza-reactions-to-policing-international-prosecutors> accessed 31 July 2014.

[114] Markovic (n 30) 205.

Statute gives the OTP the authority to override that preference. Finally, some civil-law prosecutors working at the ICC, who identify above all as organs of the Court, might be reluctant to be regulated by an external professional association. For all these reasons, the IAP is unlikely to take on disciplinary duties with respect to ICC prosecutors, at least in the foreseeable future.

17.6.3 Informal sanctions

A less obvious mechanism of regulating the conduct of international prosecutors includes informal sanctions by other prosecutors, defence attorneys, and judges.[115] Such sanctions can be imposed promptly and efficiently, as they do not require an extensive information-gathering process or an elaborate procedure before judgment.[116] While they are milder in effect than most formal sanctions, informal measures are likely to be imposed more frequently because they are relatively economical. The speed with which they can be levied adds to their deterrent effect. Such sanctions are especially effective in tight-knit legal communities, in which lawyering norms are broadly shared and prosecutors' careers depend heavily on their reputation with peers.[117]

At least at present, informal sanctions are less likely to be a significant source of regulation at the ICC. The ICC's legal community is both very diverse and transient, and consensus on governing professional norms has yet to emerge. But because social norms are likely to become more influential as the ICC matures, it is important to examine their potential usefulness in policing prosecutorial actions.

A great deal of informal regulation is likely to occur within the OTP itself. Conversations in the corridor and discussions over lunch can help impart codes of professional conduct.[118] By virtue of their experience and status, senior prosecutors can set standards particularly effectively, and this type of peer assessment can work well in cases where the errors result from inexperience or incompetence. Like formal internal sanctions, however, informal regulation within the OTP is less apt to address systemic misconduct. Such misconduct becomes pervasive precisely because it is condoned or at least neglected by leaders of the Office, so internal regulation—whether formal or informal—is likely to be ineffectual in such cases.

[115] For a discussion of the role of informal sanctions in a domestic setting, see e.g. B Green and F Zacharias, 'Regulating Federal Prosecutors' Ethics' (2002) 55 Vanderbilt Law Review 381, 405, 472 (discussing informal sanctions by judges); K Levine and R Wright, 'Prosecution in 3-D' (2012) 102 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 1119 (discussing informal instruction by fellow prosecutors); D Brown, 'Criminal Procedure Entitlements, Professionalism, and Lawyering Norms' (2000) 61 Ohio State Law Journal 801, 812 (discussing the limited ability of defence attorneys to impose informal sanctions on prosecutors).

[116] See B Wendel, 'Nonlegal Regulation of the Legal Profession: Social Norms in Professional Communities' (2001) 54 Vanderbilt Law Review 1955.

[117] Ibid., 2042.

[118] Levine and Wright (n 115) 1122; cf. E Baylis, 'Function and Dysfunction in Post-Conflict Justice Knowledge Networks and Communities' 37–42 (unpublished manuscript, on file with author) (discussing the active exchange of information about legal norms among professionals working for international criminal courts and tribunals).

Defence attorneys can also indirectly influence prosecutorial conduct through informal channels. They may, for example, spread negative gossip about prosecutors whom they perceive as overly aggressive or unprofessional, and they may refuse to cooperate on scheduling requests, deadline extensions, and procedural waivers.[119] But as in the domestic setting, international criminal defence attorneys have no significant leverage over the outcome of cases or over formal sanctions on prosecutors, and this limits their ability to apply informal pressure on prosecutors. The influence of defence attorneys is likely to be minimal for other reasons as well. At least at this time, personal interaction between defence and prosecution lawyers at the ICC tends to be limited to the courtroom. While prosecutors frequently interact socially with one another, with prosecutors from other international tribunals, and with members of the Chambers, they do not tend to socialize as often with defence attorneys.[120] Defence attorneys are in The Hague only part-time, since they have to attend to other cases in their domestic practice; professional divisions likely further diminish social interactions with prosecutors. Even dealings within the Court are frequently limited to one case, reducing the 'repeat-player' effect that may lead prosecutors to cooperate with defence attorneys in domestic settings.[121] Finally, ICC prosecutors rarely trade places with international criminal defence attorneys during their professional career. This further reduces their incentives to maintain friendly relations with the defence. For all these reasons, defence attorneys are not well situated to influence prosecutors informally. In many cases, defence attorneys may also not even attempt to apply any social pressure on prosecutors. Defence attorneys are ethically bound to place their clients' interests first, and they may perceive that the risk of antagonizing prosecutors conflicts with the duty to serve their clients in a particular case.[122]

ICC judges are likely to be more effective in sanctioning prosecutors informally. They can admonish a prosecutor off the record, relate improper conduct to a prosecutor's superior, make scheduling decisions inconvenient to the misbehaving prosecutor, demand additional written submissions from prosecutors who act unprofessionally, and make the courtroom experience of a prosecutor unpleasant in various other ways.[123] Because ICC judges in general wield broad authority over the outcome of a case (to a greater degree than judges in common-law jurisdictions, for example[124]) and because they can impose formal sanctions for misconduct, their informal reprimands [119] See Brown (n 115) 812.

[120] See e.g. Baylis (n 118) 66–7; J McMorrow, 'Creating Norms of Attorney Conduct in International Tribunals: A Case Study of the ICTY' (2007) 30 Boston College International and Comparative Law Review 139, 151–3 (reviewing the isolation of ICTY defence attorneys from prosecutors and judges and concluding that '[t]he disparate legal backgrounds of the legal actors at the ICTY and the need for strict separation of functions means that socialization . . . does not appear to be a strong source of norms at the ICTY').

[121] See J Jackson and Y M'Boge, 'The Effect of Legal Culture on the Development of International Evidentiary Practice: From the "Robing Room" to the "Melting Pot"' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 947, 967–8.

[122] Brown (n 115) 843–4.

[123] P Margulies, 'Above Contempt? Regulating Government Overreaching in Terrorism Cases' (2005) 34 Southwestern University Law Review 449; Green and Zacharias (n 115) 472.

[124] See e.g. J Turner, 'Legal Ethics in International Criminal Defense' (2010) 10 Chicago Journal of International Law 685, 704–5.

are likely to be taken seriously by ICC prosecutors. Judges at the ICC have shown that they are eager to use both formal and informal means to encourage prosecutors to adopt certain standards of professional conduct, although it is too early to assess the effectiveness of these sanctions.[125]

Judges' ability to apply informal sanctions is not unlimited, however. The effect of such sanctions is likely to be felt primarily by the individual prosecutor working on the case. Informal sanctions are not publicized and for that reason would not be the optimal means of addressing a pattern of misconduct in the OTP.[126] Moreover, the ICC is generally a 'far less structured social system' than a domestic criminal justice community.[127] Both prosecutors and judges are typically at the ICC for only a short time. Judges' terms are limited to nine years.[128] Prosecutors frequently work on only one ICC case and then return either to domestic practice or move on to a different international institution.[129] As international court practitioners themselves have commented, this reduces the pressure on them to please judges.[130] A bad reputation internationally does not necessarily '[trickle] down into a domestic practice that is separate in geography, community, and law'.[131]

More broadly, until a more solid consensus develops on the applicable norms of professional conduct at the ICC, informal sanctions are likely to remain a weak constraint on prosecutorial actions. Unlike in local legal communities, where 'internalized standards of professional conduct … are written in the hearts and minds of each lawyer', ICC lawyers come from diverse legal traditions and cultures and do not yet share a common understanding of professional norms.[132] The lack of a formal Code of Conduct for prosecutors and the rapid turnover of lawyers and judges at the ICC also contribute to the problem. In the near future, therefore, the ICC will have to continue to rely primarily on formal rules and methods of policing misconduct. But as the ICC develops its own set of identifiable and harmonized ethical norms and expectations, informal sanctioning will become a more potent source of regulating prosecutorial conduct, as it has been in domestic settings.

17.6.4 Preventive measures

While the discussion so far has focused on measures responding to misconduct after the fact, the ICC can also benefit from developing structures that prevent misconduct

[125] At the ICTY, Chambers concluded that they did not have jurisdiction to develop a prosecutorial Code of Conduct, but they sought at least indirectly to encourage the Prosecutor to adopt certain standards. Mégret (n 17) 460. ICTY Judges generally used their informal sanctioning powers broadly to encourage the development of norms of attorney conduct. See McMorrow (n 120). At the ICC, judges have read their own powers to ensure the fairness and integrity of the proceedings more broadly and have imposed certain rules of professional conduct on prosecutors. Decision on the Defence application concerning professional ethics applicable to prosecution lawyers, Kenyatta (n 24); Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1049, TC I, ICC, 30 November 2007.

[126] Green and Zacharias (n 115) 472. [127] Mégret (n 17) 419; see also Stewart (n 113).

[128] Art 36 ICC Statute. [129] Jackson and M'Boge (n 121) 967–8. [130] Ibid., 967–9.

[131] Stewart (n 113).

[132] Wendel (n 116) 1960, citing G Hazard, Jr et al., The Law and Ethics of Lawyering 3rd edn (Foundation Press 1999) 19–20.

from occurring in the first place. An important element of prevention is the establishment of a set of shared norms of professional conduct. Commentators had long argued that the prosecutor must adopt a Code of Conduct to guide its prosecutors.[133] In both common-law and civil-law systems, formal rules and codes of ethics serve as a critical ex ante constraint on prosecutorial actions.[134] They are even more necessary in a pluralist legal culture such as the ICC, where wide disagreement about the applicable norms persists. The formulation of a Code of Conduct could help deter misconduct before the fact and ensure fair punishment after misconduct occurs.

For more than ten years, however, the Office had failed to promulgate such a Code, even though similar Codes were adopted for defence attorneys, victim's representatives, and judges. The Office argued that the Rules of the Court, Staff Rules, and the OTP Operations Manual provide sufficient guidance for prosecutors. In September 2013, the Office finally adopted a Code of Conduct, perhaps in response to a judicial nudge. In May 2013, acting under its authority to ensure a fair trial, the Trial Chamber in Kenyatta ordered the prosecution to follow several provisions of the Code of Professional Conduct for counsel, which formally applies only to defence counsel, counsel for states, amici curiae, and counsel or legal representatives for victims and witnesses.[135] The Chamber acknowledged that its order is limited only to the case before it and that only the OTP can promulgate a more broadly applicable Code of Conduct for ICC prosecutors. While it was limited to one case, the Chamber's Decision to impose the defence Code of Conduct provisions to prosecutors in Kenyatta sent a clear signal that greater ethical regulation of ICC prosecutors is needed. The adoption of the Code of Conduct for the OTP helps address this concern and is a positive development towards accountability and transparency.

The OTP can do more to prevent misconduct by adopting additional training and monitoring programmes for its lawyers. These features—'training, articulated standards, internal review of individual decisions and writing-based processes'—are a staple of civil-law systems' accountability frameworks for prosecutors, and they are increasingly being considered by common-law systems as a means of preventing misconduct.[136] They help reduce misconduct not only by clarifying the applicable rules, but also by 'strengthen[ing] the concept of the prosecutor's job as a neutral quasi-judicial officer' rather than a partisan advocate.[137]

The OTP has not clarified what training and internal review programmes it has put in place to prevent misconduct, and the recent failure to disclose potentially exculpatory evidence in Kenyatta exposed certain flaws in its internal processes.[138] But the most recent Strategic Plan unveiled by the prosecutor in October 2013 suggests that the new prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda, is aware of the need to address this problem and is taking steps in that direction. The Plan sets out a concrete goal of revising training programmes and evidence disclosure practices, and it avows that the Office will pay [133] Markovic (n 30). [134] Wright and Miller (n 1) 1601.

[135] Decision on the Defence application concerning professional ethics applicable to prosecution lawyers, Kenyatta (n 24) paras 13–16.

[136] Wright and Miller (n 1) 1604. [137] Ibid.

[138] Decision on Defence Application Pursuant to Art 64(4) and Related Requests, Kenyatta (n 29) paras 93–4.

'increased attention to proper performance management and an increased provision of training'.[139] If the Office fails to follow through on these commitments to prevent misconduct, judges can again use their sanctioning powers to encourage the Office to adopt specific compliance programmes.[140] Given the high cost of imposing remedies for misconduct after the fact, it is critical for the Court to develop more effective prophylactic measures.

17.7 Conclusion

Soon after the ICC encountered prosecutorial errors and misconduct in its first case, it became clear that the Court could not rely exclusively on the OTP to oversee the conduct of its members. In an important early accomplishment, ICC judges asserted an active role in sanctioning prosecutorial misconduct, imposing bold and sometimes drastic remedies. These early decisions were an important expression of the Court's commitment to the rule of law and fair trial rights. Over time, however, the Court recognized that remedies must be calibrated in order to account for other important goals of the international criminal justice system, such as retribution, deterrence, and the establishment of an accurate historical record. Trial and Appeals Chambers began relying on a balancing approach to remedies and articulated some of the factors that would guide it.

Going forward, the ICC will undoubtedly continue to rely greatly on judicial intervention to address prosecutorial misconduct. Judges are often the first to observe ethical and procedural violations by prosecutors, and they have the legal authority to impose sanctions and remedies to ensure the fairness and integrity of the proceedings.[141] But judicial remedies can be too blunt and interfere with the legitimate interests of the ICC in completing proceedings on the merits. Conversely, remedies can be too narrow; they often respond merely to the specific instance of misconduct before the Court and may not be well suited to addressing systemic violations. Commentators have therefore begun turning their attention to other mechanisms that could provide more comprehensive oversight of prosecutorial actions. These include the ASP, the IOM, bar associations, and the OTP itself.

These mechanisms have the potential to address systematic violations by the OTP without imposing undue burdens on ongoing judicial proceedings. Yet they also carry distinct risks. Internal oversight is not likely to correct violations that are tolerated, explicitly or implicitly, by the leadership of the OTP. Discipline by the Assembly and the IOM, on the other hand, can be misused for political reasons. More broadly, the multiplication of oversight mechanisms may lead to duplicative and inefficient inquiries, which impose unnecessary burdens on prosecutors, calling them to account too frequently and distracting them from their primary tasks of investigating and prosecuting international crimes. Conversely, the diffusion of regulatory responsibility may [139] Strategic Plan (n 32) paras 74 and 57. The Plan describes various additional steps that can be taken to 'maintain a professional office with specific attention to performance management and measurement'. Ibid., paras 77–84.

[140] Ibid., para. 97.

[141] Mégret (n 17) 459; McMorrow (n 120) 171.

undermine efforts to hold prosecutors accountable, as each institution presumes that another will respond to an instance of misconduct.[142]

To avoid these risks and ensure that the system functions effectively, the Court could develop mechanisms to coordinate the tasks of judicial, political, and administrative authorities.[143] The Court could draft a protocol that outlines when judges should take the lead in sanctioning misconduct and when they should refer cases for investigation and discipline to the Assembly, the IOM, or the OTP. As discussed earlier, the Court may adopt a presumption that judges focus on misconduct that prejudices the defendant or the integrity of the proceedings, while non-judicial mechanisms address other cases. In some cases of systemic misconduct, both a judicial and an administrative response may be necessary. When investigations of misconduct are undertaken by the Assembly or the IOM, a procedure that relies on judicial referrals can help minimize the risk of politicization. As foreseen in the ICC Statute, the OTP would likely continue to have the primary responsibility to prevent misconduct—by drafting a Code of Conduct, instituting more regular training sessions, and improving its system of internal supervision. But judges may use their disciplinary powers to prompt the OTP to take additional preventive steps when there is evidence that existing measures are inadequate. As the ICC's accountability framework matures, the Court will be well-served by a coordinated approach that is led by the judges, yet assisted by other authorities, such as the ASP, the IOM, and the OTP.

[142] B Green, 'Policing Federal Prosecutors: Do Too Many Regulators Produce Too Little Enforcement?' (1995) 8 Saint Thomas Law Review 69, 91–2.

[143] Ibid., 93.

PART IV

THE ICC AND ITS APPLICABLE LAW

18

Article 21 and the Hierarchy of Sources of Law before the ICC

*Gilbert Bitti

18.1 Introduction

The Rome Statute ('Statute') of the ICC (or Court)[1], adopted on 17 July 1998,[2] contains an interesting Article 21 entitled 'Applicable law', which provides:

1. The Court shall apply:
   (a) In the first place, this Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence;
   (b) In the second place, where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict;
   (c) Failing that, general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards.
2. The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions.
3. The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3, age, race, colour, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status.

This is a very interesting article for many reasons: its very existence, the specificity and complexity of its content, the hierarchy or one should better say the multiplicity of hierarchies it establishes, and, last but not least, what it mandates the Court to do.[3]

* Senior Legal Adviser to the Pre-Trial Division of the ICC; the views expressed are solely those of the author and do not in any way reflect those of the ICC. This chapter draws in part on G Bitti, 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Treatment of Sources in the Jurisprudence of the ICC', in C Stahn and G Sluiter, The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff, 2009), 285–304.

[1] Text of the Rome Statute circulated as document A/CONF.183/9 of 17 July 1998 and corrected by procès-verbaux of 10 November 1998, 12 July 1999, 30 November 1999, 8 May 2000, 17 January 2001, and 16 January 2002. Officially: Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[2] The Statute entered into force on 1 July 2002.

[3] On this very last point, see the contribution of J Powderly in this volume, Chapter 19—'The Rome Statute and the Attempted Corseting of the Interpretative Judicial Function: Reflections on Sources of Law and Interpretative Technique'. Whereas Powderly seems to consider that the 'creativity of the bench' should be preserved for the benefit of the 'progressive development of international criminal law',

Indeed, there is no article on applicable law in (i) the Charter of the International Military Tribunal annexed to the London Agreement of 8 August 1945 ('Nuremberg Tribunal'),[4] (ii) the Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East in its original version of 19 January 1946 or its amended version of 26 April 1946 ('Tokyo Tribunal'),[5] or (iii) the Statutes of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 ('ICTY') and the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 ('ICTR'), adopted by the Security Council ('SC') of the United Nations ('UN') respectively on 27 May 1993[6] and 8 November 1994.[7]

The same is true for the 'mixed' or 'internationalized' Tribunals; indeed, neither the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of the SCSL nor the Statute of the Court annexed to the said Agreement contains an article on applicable law.[8] The same applies to both the Law on the Establishment of the ECCC (or 'Khmer Rouge Tribunal') for the Prosecution of Crimes Committed During the Period of Democratic Kampuchea in its amended version dated 27 October 2004 and the Agreement between the United Nations and the Royal Government of Cambodia Concerning the Prosecution under Cambodian Law of Crimes Committed During the Period of Democratic Kampuchea, signed on 6 June 2003 at Phnom Penh.[9] Finally, there is no article on applicable law in the Agreement between the United Nations and the Lebanese Republic on the Establishment of a Special Tribunal for Lebanon ('Lebanon Tribunal') annexed to Resolution 1757 (2007) adopted on 30 May 2007 by the UNSC, although the Statute of the Lebanon Tribunal (which is also attached to Resolution 1757 (2007)) contains a Section I entitled 'Jurisdiction and applicable law'. Article 2 within that section deals with 'Applicable criminal law', but refers only to the applicability (subject to the provisions of the Statute) of some provisions of the Lebanese Criminal Code and Articles 6 and 7 of the this author considers that the existence of Art 21 is an incredible improvement in comparison with the absence of any guidance on applicable law in the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals. 'Judicial creativity', whether at the national or international level, should have strict limits established by law.

[4] Charter of the International Military Tribunal, Annex to the Agreement by the Government of the United States of America, the Provisional Government of the French Republic, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals of the European Axis (signed 8 August 1945, entered into force 8 August 1945) 82 UNTS 279.

[5] See J Pritchard (ed.), The Tokyo Major War Crimes Trial: The Records of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East with an Authoritative Commentary and Comprehensive Guide vol. II (New York: Edwin Mellen 1998).

[6] Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute').

[7] Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute').

[8] Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of a SCSL (signed 16 January 2002, entered into force 12 April 2002) 2178 UNTS 137 ('SCSL Statute').

[9] All legal texts relating to the ECCC are available at <http://www.eccc.gov.kh/en> accessed 25 August 2014.

Lebanese Law of 11 January 1958 on 'increasing the penalties for sedition, civil war and interfaith struggle'.

The authors of the Statute have been far more ambitious or simply cautious. This is understandable since the ICC is a permanent court with a far-reaching jurisdiction. More interestingly, they did not follow the sources of international law described in Article 38 of Statute of the ICJ.

An article on applicable law was already included in the successive drafts presented by the ILC in 1993[10] and 1994.[11] It is interesting to observe that, at that time, the ILC draft article on applicable law was limited to what is today paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the Statute and no reference was made to 'internationally recognized human rights'. Unlike the present Article 21 of the Statute, the ILC draft article did not seem to establish a hierarchy between the different sources of law, following the precedent of Article 38 of the ICJ Statute which contains a list of the sources of international law without establishing a hierarchy between them.

Therefore, it is striking that the negotiations[12] have introduced a hierarchy between the different sources of law, or one should better say 'a multiplicity of hierarchies', making the Statute closer to domestic criminal law, something which must be seen as an improvement of international criminal law. Indeed, traditionally 'international law is not as clear as domestic law in listing the order of constitutional authority'.[13] Another aspect which makes the applicable law before the Court closer to national law is the level of precision of the Statute and the fact that both the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ('Rules'), contrary to the ICTY and ICTR ('ad hoc Tribunals'), 'escape judicial control'.[14] This is 'meant to provide procedural certainty to the parties and participants and to limit judicial discretion'.[15]

There is a hierarchy between the different formal sources of law described in Article 21(1), combined with a hierarchy between formal sources of law and the material source of law[16] described in Article 21(3), namely 'internationally recognized human

[10] Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Fifth Session (3 May–23 July 1993) UN Doc A/48/10, 111. The text of Art 28, entitled 'Applicable law', read as follows: 'The Court shall apply: (a) this Statute; (b) applicable treaties and the rules and principles of general international law; and (c) as a subsidiary source, any applicable rule of national law.'

[11] Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Sixth Session (2 May–22 July 1994) UN Doc A/49/10, 103. The text of Art 33, entitled 'Applicable law', read as follows: 'The Court shall apply: (a) this Statute; (b) applicable treaties and the principles and rules of general international law; and (c) to the extent applicable, any rule of national law.'

[12] In this respect, see the proposals contained in the Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court vol. II (Compilation of proposals), UN Doc A/51/22,104.

[13] M Shaw, International Law 6th edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2008) 123.

[14] A Pellet, 'Applicable Law' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 1064: '[…] not only is the Court's procedure very largely framed by the Statute (i.e. established ne varietur in reality), but the RPE [Rules of Procedure and Evidence] also escape judicial control, in accordance, it is true, with the internal legal tradition of most countries, but in contradiction with habitual international practice'.

[15] Separate Opinion of Judge René Blattmann to the Decision on the Defence Request to Reconsider the 'Order on Numbering of Evidence' of 12 May 2010, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2707, TC I, ICC, 30 March 2011, para. 7.

[16] On the distinction between formal sources of law and material sources of law in Art 21, see Pellet (n 14) 1051.

rights', together with a hierarchy between the different sources of law described in Article 21(1)(a). To make things more complex, Article 21 refers both to internal sources of law, which could be referred to also as the 'proper law of the ICC'[17] and external sources of law.

18.2 Internal Sources of Law

The internal sources of law are comprised of two very different bodies of law: legal texts on the one hand, which the Court has to apply and which are based on a very delicate hierarchy, and on the other hand, the jurisprudence of the ICC itself, which is a non-binding source of law.

18.2.1 The applicable legal texts and their hierarchy

Within those applicable legal texts, we will distinguish the 'main' legal texts, i.e. those expressly mentioned in Article 21(1)(a), and the 'supplementary' legal texts which are part of the applicable law before the Court under Article 21(1)(a) because the main legal texts mandate the drawing up of such supplementary texts.

18.2.1.1 The main legal texts

In accordance with Article 21(1)(a), the Court shall apply in the first place the Statute, the Elements of Crimes and its Rules.[18]

The pivotal issue of the applicable law relied upon by the participants in the proceedings has proved to be controversial since the very start of the jurisprudence of the Court. Indeed, Article 21 should provide an exhaustive list of sources of applicable law before the Court: in other words, all legal arguments presented by the participants before the Court and all decisions issued by the Court should be based on the sources of law mentioned in that article.[19] It is to be recalled in this respect that ICC Chambers initially affirmed the supremacy of the Statute and the Rules.

Already, in a decision issued on 9 March 2005,[20] Pre-Trial Chamber I declined to consider the submissions made by the Prosecutor on the basis that 'the Prosecutor's concerns in relation to the convening of the status conference should have been raised

[17] Id.

[18] Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Official Records of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE').

[19] Regulation 23 of the Regulations of the Court, ICC-BD/01-03-11, 26 May 2004 (Adopted by the Judges of the Court), as amended on 14 June and 14 November 2007 and 2 November 2011, which describes the content of documents presented to the Court by participants in the proceedings, obliges the latter to state, 'as far as practicable, (. . .) (d) all relevant legal and factual issues, including details of the articles, rules, regulations or other applicable law relied upon' ('ICC Regulations of the Court').

[20] Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on Pre-Trial Chamber I's 17 February 2005 Decision to Convene a Status Conference, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-11, PTC I, ICC, 9 March 2005.

in accordance with the procedural mechanism provided for in the Rome Statute, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and the Regulations of the Court'.

The Chamber reminded the prosecutor that the only procedural remedy was the one provided for in the Statute, namely a request for leave to appeal under Article 82(1)(d) of the Statute, and concluded therefore that there was no procedural basis for the filing of a so-called Prosecutor's position. Indeed, the Prosecutor had tried to present his 'position', which was in reality his opposition to a decision issued by Pre-Trial Chamber I convening a status conference with the Prosecutor concerning the investigation in the situation of the DRC. There was no legal basis in the Statute or the Rules allowing the Prosecutor, or any other participant, to present such a document to a Chamber, a document which was in fact a statement by the Prosecutor presenting his disagreement in relation to a decision taken by the Chamber.

This happened again before Pre-Trial Chamber II,[21] assigned with the situation in Uganda, which followed the decision issued by Pre-Trial Chamber I:

> The Chamber wished to point out in this context that neither the Statute nor the Rules of Procedure and Evidence allow participants to communicate positions on chamber decisions to the Chamber and to have them filed as part of the record of the proceedings. Participants in proceedings before the Court must comply with the procedures provided for in the Statute and the Rules when making submissions to the Chamber. They cannot freely choose the form in which they present their views to the Chamber. Compliance with procedural requirement is necessary, in order to preserve the integrity and transparency of Court proceedings. A 'position' is not a procedural remedy under the Statute. If the Prosecutor wished to make submissions to the Chamber, which shall be part of the official Court record, such submissions must be presented in the form of a proper judicial motion.

This original strong stance shown by ICC Chambers in favour of the Statute and Rules contrasts with more recent jurisprudence where some dissenting judges have started to express concern about what they perceive as a 'creative interpretation'[22] of the Statute by their colleagues leading to an 'inappropriate arrogation of the legislative function by the judiciary'. In this particular instance the majority of the Appeals Chamber came to the conclusion that Article 63 of the Statute, which clearly states that the accused 'shall be present' during his or her trial, still gave discretion to the Trial Chamber to allow an accused not to be present during his or her trial.[23] Furthermore, a Trial Chamber has recently used the notion of 'implied powers' in order to subpoena

[21] Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II to Redact Factual Descriptions of Crimes from the Warrants of Arrest, Motion for Reconsideration, and Motion for Clarification, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-60, PTC II, ICC, 28 October 2005, para. 13.

[22] Joint Separate Opinion of Judge Erkki Kourula and Judge Anita Ušacka to Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber V(a) of 18 June 2013 entitled 'Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, AC, ICC, 25 October 2013, para. 11.

[23] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber V(a) of 18 June 2013 entitled 'Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, AC, ICC, 25 October 2013.

witnesses and request a state to compel them to appear before the Court against the clear wording of Article 93(1)(e) of the Statute, which only refers to the 'voluntary' appearance of witnesses.[24]

If the Statute and the Rules shall be applied in 'the first place', there is, however, a hierarchy within the hierarchy and the Statute prevails over the Rules in accordance with Article 51(5) of the Statute. In addition, the ASP, when adopting the Rules in 2002, decided to attach the following explanatory note:

> The Rules of Procedure and Evidence are an instrument for the application of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, to which they are subordinate in all cases. In elaborating the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, care has been taken to avoid rephrasing and, to the extent possible, repeating the provisions of the Statute. Direct references to the Statute have been included in the Rules, where appropriate, in order to emphasize the relationship between the Rules and the Rome Statute, as provided in Article 51, in particular, paragraphs 4 and 5.
>
> In all cases, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence should be read in conjunction with and subject to the provisions of the Statute.
>
> The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Court do not affect the procedural rules for any national court or legal system for the purpose of national proceedings.

This originally very strong stance of the ASP in favour of the Statute supremacy, which found its origin in the unwillingness to allow the United States of America to use the Rules as a tool to increase the scope of Article 98(2) of the Statute to prevent any American citizen from being surrendered to the Court, contrasts with the attitude of this same Assembly ten years later, with the adoption first of Rule 132*bis* in 2012 and then of Rules 134*bis, ter*, and quarter in 2013.

Rule 132*bis*, which introduces a single judge for the preparation of the trial, was proposed by the judges acting by absolute majority,[25] in accordance with Article 51(2)(b) of the Statute, and was adopted by consensus without modification by the ASP,[26] although some delegations expressed concerns as to its compatibility with the Statute during the discussions prior to its adoption. Rule 132*bis* seems indeed to be in contradiction with Article 39 of the Statute. The designation of a single judge was foreseen in the Statute solely for the Pre-Trial Chamber,[27] not for the Trial Chamber. Moreover, Article 39(2)(b)(ii) states unequivocally that the 'functions of the Trial Chamber shall be carried out by three judges of the Trial Division'. Finally, Article 64(3)(a) of the [24] Decision on Prosecutor's Application for Witness Summonses and Resulting Request for State Party Cooperation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1274-Corr2, TC V(A), ICC, 17 April 2014; see also Dissenting opinion of Judge Herrera Carbuccia on the 'Decision on Prosecutor's Application for Witness Summonses and Resulting Request for State Party Cooperation', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1274-Anx, TC V(A), ICC, 29 April 2014, para. 21.

[25] Report of the Study Group on Governance on Rule 132 bis of the Rules of procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/11/41, 1 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the Assembly of States Parties).

[26] Amendment of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/11/Res 2, 21 November 2012 (Adopted at the Eighth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), new Rule 132 bis entitled 'Designation of a Judge for the Preparation of the Trial'.

[27] See Arts 39(2)(b)(iii) and 57(2) ICC Statute.

Statute was found to be a sufficient legal basis for such a rule, although this Article only refers to the functions of the Trial Chamber and does not address in any way its composition, contrary to Article 39(2)(b)(ii) of the Statute. It was therefore simply not possible to institute such a single judge at trial without a prior modification of Article 39 of the Statute: such a modification was possible under the simplified scheme of Article 122 of the Statute which only requires that the amendment be adopted by the ASP (a two-thirds majority of States Parties is required), without any subsequent ratification by the States Parties to the Statute. It is to be noted that Rule 132*bis* has for the moment not been used by ICC Trial Chambers. It may be that its application will be challenged by participants in the proceedings due to its incompatibility with Article 39(2)(b)(ii) of the Statute.

In 2013 the ASP adopted[28] three new rules[29] which seem to be difficult to reconcile with the Statute. Those new rules were adopted only a few weeks after the ICC Appeals Chamber issued its contested 25 October 2013 judgment,[30] allowing in some circumstances an accused to be absent from his or her trial. Although the interpretation adopted by the majority of the Appeals Chamber was criticized by the two judges of the minority as not respecting the clear wording of Article 63 of the Statute, which requires the presence of the accused during the trial, the ASP adopted the Appeals Chamber interpretation of Article 63 in a new Rule 134*ter* but went even further in a new Rule 134*quarter*; this last Rule allows an accused who is 'mandated to fulfil extraordinary public duties at the highest national level' to be excused from being present at his or her trial even if the restrictive conditions set forth in Rule 134*ter* are not met. It is the first time that ICC jurisprudence, which is a non-binding source of law in accordance with Article 21(2) of the Statute, has developed so rapidly into a binding source of law under Article 21(1)(a) of the Statute as part of the Rules.

In accordance with Article 51(4) of the Statute, the 'Rules of Procedure and Evidence, amendments thereto and any provisional Rule shall be consistent with the Statute'. According to one author,[31] this will have the effect that 'when Rules are proposed, it will doubtless be expected that the proposing party satisfy the Assembly as to consistency before it will be prepared to adopt the new Rule'. Obviously, it was not too difficult to convince the ASP when it adopted new Rules 132*bis*, 134 bis, ter, and quater in 2012 and 2013.

[28] Amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/12/Res 7, 27 November 2013 (Adopted at the Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP); see new Rule 134*bis* entitled 'Presence through the Use of Video Technology'; new Rule 134*ter* entitled 'Excusal from Presence at Trial' and new Rule 134*quater* entitled 'Excusal from Presence at Trial due to Extraordinary Public Duties'. In the same resolution, the ASP has decided to replace Rules 100 and 68 by newly drafted rules.

[29] It is to be noted that these new rules, contrary to Rule 132*bis* adopted in 2012, were not proposed by the judges acting by absolute majority in accordance with Art 51(2) ICC Statute. Judges only proposed amended Rules 100 and 68: see Report of the Bureau on Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/12/37, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP).

[30] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber V(a) of 18 June 2013 Entitled 'Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, AC, ICC, 25 October 2013.

[31] B Broomhall, 'Article 51' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Article by Article 2nd edn (Oxford: Hart 2008) 1044.

Rules 134*bis*, 134*ter*, and 134*quater* were adopted during ongoing proceedings[32] at the ICC against a sitting Head of State and a sitting Deputy Head of State and were immediately used by the Defence of Mr Ruto, Deputy President of the Republic of Kenya, to request to be excused from attendance at trial.[33]

The Prosecutor requested the Chamber to adopt a reading of Rule 134*quater*, which was consistent with the Statute, as mandated by Article 51(4) of the Statute. Indeed, it is for the judges to 'ultimately decide whether the requirement of consistency between the Rules and the Statute has been respected by the Assembly of States Parties'.[34]

The Chamber first underlined that 'it is the States Parties who adopt amendments to the Rules'[35] and concluded that by 'the incorporation of these Rules, the ASP clarified the position of States Parties in relation to the scope and application of Article 63(1) of the Statute'.[36]

This reading of the Rules, as an instrument which 'clarifies' the Statute, seems to be in contradiction with the explanatory note attached to the Rules at the moment of their adoption in 2002, which clearly underlines that the Rules are simply an instrument for the application of the Statute to which they are subordinated in all cases. By adopting rules 'clarifying' the Statute, the States Parties are simply avoiding the cumbersome process established by those states in Article 121 of the Statute for amendments to the Statute. Such a process requires ratification of those amendments by seven-eighths of the States Parties, whereas the adoption of Rules only requires the a two-thirds majority of States Parties to the Statute and therefore allows governments to avoid the process of ratification, which most often means national parliament control and significant delays.

It seems that, less than 12 years after the adoption of the Rules and the commitment expressed by states at that time to defend the integrity and supremacy of the Statute, neither the States Parties nor the ICC judges have respected or enforced the Statute supremacy over the Rules.

Originally, however, as a consequence of the hierarchy between the Statute and the Rules strongly underlined by the ASP at the moment of the adoption of the Rules in 2002, Pre-Trial Chamber I, in its decision issued on 17 January 2006,[37] stated that:

[32] This could already raise serious concerns. In this regard, the ECHR has repeatedly stated that: 'The principle of the rule of law and the notion of fair trial enshrined in Article 6 (art 6) preclude any interference by the legislature with the administration of justice designed to influence the judicial determination of the dispute.' See Stran Greek Refineries and Stratis Andreadis v Greece App no 13427/87 (ECtHR, 9 December 1994) para. 49; see also Zielinski et al. v France App no 24846/94 and 34165/96 to 34173/96 (ECtHR, 28 October 1999) para. 57. This issue was apparently not discussed before Trial Chamber V(A): see Reasons for the Decision on Excusal from Presence at Trial under Rule 134*quater, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya*, ICC-01/09-01/11-1186, TC V(A), ICC, 18 February 2014.

[33] Defence Request pursuant to Art 63(1) of the Rome Statute and Rule 134*quater* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence to Excuse Mr William Samoei Ruto from Attendance at Trial, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1124, ICC, 16 December 2013.

[34] See B Broomhall (n 31).

[35] Reasons for the Decision on Excusal from Presence at Trial under Rule 134*quater, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya*, ICC-01/09-01/11-1186, TC V(A), ICC, 18 February 2014, para. 53.

[36] Ibid., para. 56.

[37] Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-0l/04-101-tEN-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 17 January 2006, para. 47.

> With regard to the Prosecutor's argument pertaining to rule 92 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the Chamber must point out that, pursuant to article 51, paragraph 5 of the Statute, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence is an instrument that is subordinate to the Statute. It follows that a provision of the Rules cannot be interpreted in such a way as to narrow the scope of an article of the Statute.

With regard to the binding character of the Rules for the judges, in accordance with Article 21(1)(a) of the Statute, the ICC jurisprudence seems to no longer follow the original strict respect for those Rules: at times, ICC Chambers have either disregarded the Rules or adopted procedures not foreseen in those Rules.

Indeed, Trial Chamber V has established in 2012[38] a system of victims' participation in the proceedings which does not follow what is established in Rules 89 to 93 of the Rules. In its decision, the Chamber referred to Article 68(3) of the Statute as the legal basis to develop a distinct model for victims' participation, disregarding what the States Parties agreed in the Rules. Although the Chamber refers also to Article 51(5) of the Statute, which indeed allows a Chamber to set aside a rule if it is in contradiction with the Statute, the Chamber does not come to the conclusion in its decision that Rules 89 to 93 are in contradiction with the Statute, but simply that the system of victims' participation in the proceedings established in the Rules is not the most appropriate in the case the Chamber is dealing with. The Chamber is here clearly disregarding Article 21(1)(a) of the Statute, which obliges the judges to apply the Rules, subject to the sole exception of finding those Rules either in contradiction with the Statute or with internationally recognized human rights, a conclusion which was not reached by Trial Chamber V.

In addition to setting aside rules without proper justification, recent jurisprudence shows that Trial Chambers have used the 'flexibility' which they have found in the Statute, especially in Article 64, by adopting the 'procedures' felt to be most appropriate by the bench in order to properly manage the trial, even if such procedures were not foreseen in the Statute or Rules:

> Article 64 of the Statute grants the Chamber flexibility in managing the trial. Its formulation makes it clear that the Statute is neither an exhaustive nor a rigid instrument, especially on purely procedural matters such as witness preparation, and that silence on a particular procedural issue does not necessarily imply that it is forbidden. Article 64 is formulated so as to give judges a significant degree of discretion concerning the procedures they adopt in this respect, as long as the rights of the accused are respected and due regard is given to the protection of witnesses and victims.[39]

Different examples may be given in this regard. Trial Chambers have generally requested the Prosecutor to present a post-confirmation document containing the charges which is referred to as an 'updated document containing the charges',[40]

[38] Decision on Victims' Representation and Participation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-460, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012, para. 29.

[39] Decision on Witness Preparation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-524, TC V, ICC, 2 January 2013, para. 27.

[40] Order for the Prosecution to File an Amended Document Containing the Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1548, TC I, ICC, 9 December 2008;

whereas neither the Statute nor the Rules provide for such a document to be presented by the prosecutor after the confirmation of charges. To the contrary, Article 61(7) of the Statute is rather clear in stating that the accused person is to be committed to trial on the charges as confirmed, which indicates that the decision on the confirmation of charges issued by the Pre-Trial Chamber is the basis for the trial, with no further document containing the charges being foreseen in the Statute or the Rules. More recently, Trial Chamber V(A) has also accepted the possibility of a 'no case to answer motion' while recognizing that such a procedure was not contemplated by the Statute or the Rules.[41]

It seems, therefore, that the original principled approach for a strict respect of the Statute and the Rules is slowly fading away in favour of a more 'flexible approach'. However, such an approach obviously provides less 'procedural certainty' to the parties, which have to adapt to the procedural framework established by each Trial Chamber. This was probably not the result intended by the drafters of the Statute and the Rules, especially through the adoption of Article 21 of the Statute.

The last of the three main legal texts, the Elements of Crimes,[42] does certainly constitute a particular text in the trilogy contained in Article 21(1)(a). In order to understand their exact status before the Court, one has to refer to Article 9 of the Statute where it is explained that the Elements of Crimes (although they must be applied by the Court) are not binding upon it, but are meant to be of assistance to the Court in the interpretation and application of Articles 6, 7, and 8. Indeed, the way in which the Elements of Crimes have been drafted and adopted by the ASP evidently differs from the drafting of the Statute and the Rules, especially through the presence of extensive footnotes in the text. Pre-Trial Chambers have, however, made extensive reference to Elements of Crimes[43] and have, for example, requested the parties to strictly apply them when preparing their in-depth analysis charts of the evidence submitted to the Chamber.[44]

The exact relationship between the Elements of Crimes and the Statute, which was a controversial issue during the negotiations of those texts, has also been controversial in the jurisprudence of the Court. In the decision issued together with the first see also oral order issued by Trial Chamber III, Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-14-ENG ET WT, TC III, ICC, 7 October 2009, 13, lines 5–10; see also Order for the Prosecution to File an Updated Document Containing the Charges, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-439, TC V, ICC, 5 July 2012.

[41] Decision No. 5 on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (Principles and Procedure on 'No case to Answer' Motions), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1134, TC V(A), ICC, 3 June 2014, paras 10–18.

[42] Elements of Crimes, Official Records of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, First Session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3), Part II-B.

[43] Decision on the Confirmation of the Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-0l/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, paras 205 and 240; Decision on the Prosecution Application under Art 58(7) of the Statute, Harun and Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, lCC-02/05-01/07-1, PTC I, ICC, 27 April 2007, paras 29 and 43.

[44] Decision on the Submission of an Updated, Consolidated Version of the In-Depth Analysis Chart of Incriminatory Evidence, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-232, PTC III, ICC, 10 November 2008, see the structure of the model chart annexed to that decision.

warrant of arrest against Omar Hassan Al-Bashir,[45] the majority of Pre-Trial Chamber I concluded that the Elements of Crimes must be applied 'unless the competent Chamber finds an irreconcilable contradiction' between the Elements on the one hand, and the Statute on the other.[46] In case such contradiction would be found, the Statute should prevail according to the majority, as indicated by Article 9(3) of the Statute. This position is justified, according to the majority, by:

> the object and purpose of article 9(1) of the Statute, which consists of furthering the nullum crimen sine lege principle embraced in article 22 of the Statute, by providing a priori legal certainty on the content of the definition of the crimes provided for in the Statute. In the majority's view, had the application of the Elements of crimes been fully discretionary for the competent Chamber, the safeguards provided for by the article 22 nullum crimen sine lege principle would be significantly eroded.[47]

This last affirmation by the majority is rather strange, as it seems to suggest that the elaborate definitions of the crimes contained in Articles 6, 7, and 8 of the Statute actually do not comply with the principle nullum crimen sine lege. As stressed in the dissenting opinion, the 'legal definitions of the crimes are espoused in the Statute alone'.[48] The position of the majority is indeed difficult to reconcile with the role entrusted to the Elements of Crimes in Article 9(1) of the Statute, which is to 'assist' the Court in its interpretation and application of the Statute. The travaux préparatoires indicate that this was meant to establish the non-binding nature of this particular instrument as indicated earlier, and as stressed also in the dissenting opinion of Judge Usacka.[49]

18.2.1.2 The supplementary legal texts

In addition to the three texts explicitly mentioned in Article 21(1)(a), the Statute and the Rules, as first sources of law before the ICC, refer to other texts which play an important role in the jurisprudence of the Court, such as the Regulations of the Court,[50] the Regulations of the Registry,[51] the Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel,[52] the Regulations of the Trust Fund for Victims,[53] and the Regulations of the Office of the prosecutor.[54] Those texts indicate clearly that the Regulations of the Registry are subject

[45] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al-Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, see in particular paras 126 to 133 for the Majority's Decision and paras 16 to 18 for the Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka.

[46] Ibid., majority decision, para. 128. [47] Ibid., para. 131.

[48] See Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka (n 45) para. 18.

[49] H Von Hebel, 'The Making of the Elements of Crimes' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 8; see also Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka (n 45) para. 17.

[50] ICC Regulations of the Court.

[51] Regulations of the Registry, ICC-BD/03-03-13, 6 March 2006 (Approved by the Presidency), as amended on 25 September 2006 and 4 December 2013 ('ICC Regulations of the Registry').

[52] Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel, ICC-ASP/4/Res 1, 2 December 2005 (Third Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

[53] Regulations of the Trust Fund for Victims, ICC-ASP/4/Res 3, 3 December 2005 (Fourth Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

[54] Regulations of the Office of the Prosecutor, ICC-BD/05-01-09, 23 April 2008 ('ICC Regulations of the OTP').

to the Regulations of the Court,[55] which are in turn subject to the Rules,[56] which are subject to the Statute as explained previously. The Regulations of the OTP also indicate that they are subject to the Statute, the Rules, and the Regulations of the Court.[57] The legal system established by the Statute is therefore already a beautiful pyramid, composed of at least four different layers which represent a sum of almost 800 articles, rules, and regulations. This means of course (as noted by the ICC Appeals Chamber)[58] that the Regulations of the Court, for example, are subject to the Rome Statute. The same applies obviously to the Regulations of the Registry, which are at the bottom of the pyramid.

The Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel does not indicate its exact position within this complex hierarchy. The ICC Appeals Chamber has stated that this 'Code is a part of the Court's applicable law under Article 21(1)(a) of the Statute, which requires the Court to apply, in the first place, its Statute, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence'.[59] This is because Rule 8 of the Rules mandates the drawing-up of such a Code.

The Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel, however, affirms clearly its primacy towards national law in its Article 4:

> Where there is any inconsistency between this Code and any other code of ethics or professional responsibility which counsel are bound to honour, the terms of this Code shall prevail in respect of the practice and professional ethics of counsel when practicing before the Court.

Unlike the Regulations of the Court or the Regulations of the Registry, the text of the Regulations of the Trust Fund for Victims does not contain any reference concerning its placement in the pyramid. The ICC Appeals Chamber has applied those Regulations 'in conjunction' with the Statute and Rules, without clarifying where they should fit in the beautiful pyramid.[60]

18.2.2 The case law of the ICC

According to Article 21(2) of the Statute, the ICC may apply its own case law, but is not bound to do so. The paragraph does not make any difference between the jurisprudence of the Pre-Trial, Trial, or Appeals Chambers of the Court.

[55] Regulation 1 ICC Regulations of the Registry.

[56] Regulation 1 ICC Regulations of the Court; for an example in the jurisprudence of the Court, see Decision on Defence request on the suspension of time limits during judicial recess, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-585, PTC I, ICC, 27 December 2013, para. 7.

[57] See Regulation 1 ICC Regulations of the OTP.

[58] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo Against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I Entitled 'Décision sur la Demande de Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-0l/04-01/06-824, AC, ICC, 13 February 2007, para. 43.

[59] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II Dated 20 July 2011 Entitled 'Decision with Respect to the Question of Invalidating the Appointment of Counsel to the Defence', Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-365, AC, ICC, 10 November 2011, para. 48.

[60] Decision on the Admissibility of the Appeals Against Trial Chamber I's 'Decision Establishing the Principles and Procedures to be Applied to Reparations' and Directions on the Further Conduct of Proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2593, AC, ICC, 14 December 2012, paras 52–7.

Existing case law was applied very soon in the jurisprudence of the ICC. On 28 October 2005[61] Pre-Trial Chamber II, noting Article 21(2) of the Statute, made reference to a decision issued by Pre-Trial Chamber I on 9 March 2005 concerning the necessity for the participants to abide by procedural remedies provided for in the Statute.

On 31 March 2006 Pre-Trial Chamber I[62] decided to follow the principles established by Pre-Trial Chamber II concerning the interpretation of Article 82(1)(d) of the Statute:

> Article 21 (2) of the Statute allows the Court to apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions. Accordingly, in the opinion of the Chamber, the principles set out in the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II should be applied here.

Article 21(2) leaves a lot of discretion to the ICC concerning the use of its case law and it seems that ICC Chambers have used such discretion: indeed, some Chambers have heavily relied on their own case law[63]; the case law of the Appeals Chamber[64] does not seem to be placed on a higher level than the case law of other Chambers of the Court, which is in line with the wording of Article 21(2) which refers to the Court and does not give a particular weight to the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber. This will certainly produce some instability in the ICC jurisprudence for the next few decades, as Chambers are not bound by their previous case law. Moreover, the frequent modification of their composition, taking into consideration that judges shall hold office for a term of nine years and are not eligible for re-election,[65] may provoke important changes in the jurisprudence in all ICC Chambers, including the Appeals Chamber. As a matter of fact, the present Appeals Chamber will dramatically change its composition in March 2015, as four out of five judges composing the Appeals Chamber are leaving the Court at that time.

However, it may be interesting for a Court whose Statute is so difficult to amend[66] and may remain substantially unchanged for a long time to have more flexibility as far as the evolution of its case law is concerned.

Recent jurisprudence tends to further demonstrate that Chambers do not feel bound by the jurisprudence of other Chambers. Even more interesting to note, Chambers have deviated from previous jurisprudence either explicitly or implicitly, simply ignoring the jurisprudence of other Chambers. As an example, Trial Chamber V has [61] Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II to Redact Factual Descriptions of Crimes From the Warrants of Arrest, Motion for Reconsideration, and Motion for Clarification, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-60, PTC II, ICC, 28 October 2005.

[62] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the Chamber's Decision of 17 January 2006 on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-135-tENG, PTC I, ICC, 31 March 2006, para. 18.

[63] Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of Applicants a/0327/07 toa/0337/07 and a/0001/08, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-357, PTC I, ICC, 2 April 2008.

[64] Decision on Application for Leave to Appeal by the Defence of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui against the Decision on Joinder, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-0l/04-01/07-384, PTC I, ICC, 9 April 2008.

[65] See Art 36(9)(a) ICC Statute.

[66] See Art 121 ICC Statute.

allowed witness preparation at trial, deviating clearly and explicitly from the jurisprudence of Trial Chambers I, II, and III, even going so far as noting that Trial Chamber I had prohibited witness preparation by 'relying heavily on Article 21'.[67]

On other occasions, Chambers have deviated from previous jurisprudence without mentioning previous decisions by other Chambers; this was the case, for example, with regard to the legal basis used to reach the conclusion that States Parties had an obligation to arrest and surrender Omar Al Bashir notwithstanding his position as sitting head of a State not Party to the Statute.[68] This was criticized by the doctrine, as, according to one author, Article 21(2) 'certainly does not mean that the Court can change its jurisprudence without even clarifying the reasons why'.[69] Actually, this is what Article 21(2) at least allows: a Chamber may totally disregard the jurisprudence of other Chambers, either explaining why it does so or without even uttering a word about previous jurisprudence.

One area where the jurisprudence of the Court has been particularly unstable and divergent is in relation to victims both with regard, to a certain extent, to the criteria under Rule 85 of the Rules to admit them to participate in the proceedings[70] and with regard to their procedural rights.[71]

Article 21(2) has been interpreted by ICC Chambers as a source of law which can be used without resorting to other sources of law. As an example, once the ICC Appeals Chamber established that the procedural remedy of a 'stay of the proceedings', although not foreseen in the Statute or Rules,[72] could be used by ICC Chambers under some specific conditions,[73] other Chambers have applied such a procedural remedy by referring to 'principles' established in the 'Court's previous jurisprudence'.[74] This could of course be easily criticized, as it would suffice that one Chamber establishes

[67] Decision on Witness Preparation, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-588, TC V, ICC, 2 January 2013, see para. 30 and note 57.

[68] Compare, Decision Pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-139, PTC I, ICC, 12 December 2011; with, Decision on the Cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo Regarding Omar Al Bashir's Arrest and Surrender to the Court, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-195, PTC II, ICC, 9 April 2014.

[69] See P Gaeta, 'Guest Post: The ICC Changes its Mind on the Immunity from Arrest of President Al Bashir, But It Is Wrong Again' (Opinio Juris, 23 April 2014) <http://opiniojuris.org/2014/04/23/guest-post-icc-changes-mind-immunity-arrest-president-al-bashir-wrong/> accessed 25 August 2014.

[70] See T Bachvarova, 'Victims' Eligibility before the International Criminal Court in Historical and Comparative Context' (2011) 11 International Criminal Law Review 665.

[71] See G Bitti, 'Les Droits Procéduraux des Victimes Devant la Cour Pénale Internationale' (2011) 44 Criminologie 63.

[72] This is not to criticize the decision taken by the Appeals Chamber, which correctly based its decision to create such a new procedural remedy on Art 21(3) ICC Statute.

[73] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Article 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, Together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1486, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008, para. 77.

[74] Decision on Defence Application for a Permanent Stay of the Proceedings Due to Abuse of Process, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-868-Red, TC V(B), ICC, 5 December 2013, para. 14.

a 'principle' on a dubious legal basis in order to allow other Chambers to apply such a principle on the basis of Article 21(2) of the Statute. In this sense, ICC Chambers should not simply apply previous jurisprudence without analysing what was the legal basis used to establish such a jurisprudence.

18.3 External Sources of Law

Article 21 of the Statute refers to two very different bodies of external sources of law. Article 21(1)(b) and (c) refer to different formal sources of law as subsidiary sources of law to be applied by the Court. Article 21(3) refers to a material source of law, namely 'internationally recognized human rights', which seem to enjoy a superior status before the Court.

18.3.1 Subsidiary sources of law

Article 21(1) refers to two different formal sources of law: the applicable treaties and principles and rules of international law, mentioned in paragraph 1(b) on the one hand, and the general principles of law, mentioned in paragraph 1(c) on the other.

Those two sources of law are, however, subsidiary to the internal sources mentioned in paragraph 1(a), namely the Statute, the Elements of Crimes, and the Rules. They are also precisely ranked: paragraph 1(b) is a second source of law whereas paragraph 1(c) is a third source of law.[75]

Indeed, in accordance with Article 21(1)(b), the Court shall apply, in the second instance, where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict. No hierarchy is indicated between the 'applicable treaties' and the 'principles and rules of international law'.

Failing that, in accordance with Article 21(1)(c), the Court shall apply general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of states that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards.

The Appeals Chamber has, however, ruled that the application of these second or third sources of law is subject to the same condition: the existence of a gap in the Statute.[76]

[75] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Art 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC,14 December 2006, para. 34.

[76] Id.

The first decision in this respect is in fact the first decision issued by the ICC Appeals Chamber, which shows that the issue of applicable law has been crucial for the development of the ICC jurisprudence from the very beginning. Much remains to be decided in this respect.

On 24 April 2006 the prosecutor presented to the Appeals Chamber an application entitled 'Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal'. The application was indeed nothing less than 'extraordinary'. Nothing in the Statute provides for the possibility to appeal a decision denying leave to appeal. According to the prosecutor, this was simply a lacuna in the law established by the Statute and the Rules, which could be remedied by resorting to the general principles of law referred to in Article 21(1)(c) of the Statute.

The existence of a gap in the Statute was analysed by the Appeals Chamber in its decision issued on 13 July 2006[77] concerning the Prosecutor's application for extraordinary review. In order to do so, the Appeals Chamber had to interpret the Statute and in doing so stated the obvious, which is that the Statute is a treaty and that its interpretation is to be governed by the VCLT,[78] more specifically, Articles 31 and 32 of that convention.

The Appeals Chamber, analysing the text of Article 82(1)(d) of the Statute and more generally the entire Part VIII of the Statute dealing with appeal and revision, decided that the Statute defines exhaustively the right to appeal against decisions of Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers and that there is no gap in the regime of interlocutory appeals established by the Statute. This was, according to the Appeals Chamber, confirmed by the travaux préparatoires and by the fact that a proposal by a state to provide for an appeal against a refusal of leave to appeal was rejected. The Appeals Chamber then concluded:

> The inexorable inference is that the Statute defines exhaustively the right to appeal against decisions of first instance courts, namely decisions of the Pre-Trial or Trial Chambers. No gap is noticeable in the Statute with regard to the power claimed in the sense of an objective not being given effect to by its provisions. The lacuna postulated by the Prosecutor is inexistent.[79]

Therefore, a gap in the Statute may be defined as an 'objective' which could be inferred from the context or the object and purpose of the Statute, an objective which would not be given effect by the express provisions of the Statute or the Rules, thus obliging the judge to resort to the second or third source of law—in that order—to give effect to that objective. In short, the subsidiary sources of law described in Article 21(1)(b) or (c) cannot be used just to add other procedural features to those already provided for in the Statute and the Rules. In this sense, we saw, already in the first

[77] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of the Pre-Trial Chamber l's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, lCC-0l/04-168, AC, ICC, 13 July 2006, paras 33–42.

[78] VCLT (signed 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331.

[79] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of the Pre-Trial Chamber l's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, lCC-0l/04-168, AC, ICC, 13 July 2006, paras 33–42.

years of the Court, continuity in the jurisprudence of the ICC concerning the respect for the Statute and the Rules, as was already decided by both Pre-Trial Chamber I and Pre-Trial Chamber II in their decisions issued in March and October 2005 concerning the 'Prosecutor's positions'.

From that position of the jurisprudence, it was possible to infer that the interpretation of the different ICC Chambers of the Court was going in the direction of restricting the application of both Article 21(1)(b) and (c), in order to give full effect to the superiority of the Statute and the Rules regarding the procedural framework of the Court—a result certainly intended by the states when drafting the Statute and the Rules.

The decision by the Appeals Chamber has been a clear affirmation that the external sources of law described in Article 21(1)(b) and(c) were subsidiary sources of law and not additional sources of law. They would therefore only be applied when a gap arose in the application of the Statute or the Rules which had to be filled by subsidiary sources of law in order to give effect to the provisions of the Statute or the Rules.

Of course, this means that the application of sources of law before the ICC is to be much less flexible than it had been before the ICTY or the ICTR. But this is certainly the result that states intended when they drafted a very precise Statute of 128 articles and very precise Rules comprised initially of 225 rules.

However, even if there is a gap in the Statute or the Rules, it may not be easy to find a 'principle or rule of international law' or 'general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of states that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with the Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards'. What is to be understood by 'applicable treaties and principles and rules of international law' under Article 21(1)(b), has not been addressed by the Appeals Chamber in its decision of 14 December 2006[80] because there was no noticeable gap in the Statute or the Rules.

The most exciting issue in relation to Article 21(1)(b) has been the relevance of the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals in the context of ICC proceedings. This topic is an ongoing and vivid matter of discussion before the ICC, since participants have tended to refer to the jurisprudence of both ad hoc Tribunals constantly in their submissions to the ICC. The jurisprudence of these Tribunals, however, is not as such part of the applicable law under Article 21 of the Statute, although the proceedings and jurisprudence of these Tribunals have had a considerable degree of attraction for participants in ICC proceedings.

The popularity of the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals may be explained by two reasons. First, it is easier to rely on a system which has been working for 20 years instead of contributing to the development of a new system, which appears both more complex and more controversial because it combines elements of the civil law and the common-law traditions (as opposed to the ad hoc Tribunals which were initially essentially relying on the common-law tradition). Second, many of the people who have been recruited by the ICC had previously worked at the ad hoc Tribunals for years and became acquainted with their practices. These persons are naturally inclined to import rules of the system of the ad hoc Tribunals to the ICC. The application of the jurisprudence and practices of the ad hoc Tribunals before the ICC is thus both a sociological and a legal problem.

[80] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Art 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, para. 34.

Indeed, if the ICC was only meant to follow the Statute, Rules, and jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals, it would be difficult to justify why states have negotiated the ICC Statute and Rules for so many years when they could have just referred to the Statute and Rules of the ad hoc Tribunals. Obviously, states wanted to establish a different system for the ICC. In addition, one may notice that, contrary to the Statute of the SCSL, the Statute makes no reference to the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals.[81]

This important issue was first dealt with by Pre-Trial Chamber II in its decision issued on 28 October 2005, which responded to the argument concerning the relevance of the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals for the ICC in the following way:

> As to the relevance of the case law of the ad hoc tribunals, the matter must be assessed against the provisions governing the law applicable before the Court. Article 21, paragraph 1, of the Statute mandates the Court to apply its Statute, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence 'in the first place' and only 'in the second place' and 'where appropriate', 'applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflicts'. Accordingly, the rules and practice of other jurisdictions, whether national or international, are not as such 'applicable law' before the Court beyond the scope of article 21 of the Statute. More specifically, the law and practice of the ad hoc tribunals, which the Prosecutor refers to, cannot per se form a sufficient basis for importing into the court's procedural framework remedies other than those enshrined in the Statute.[82]

This problem was once again addressed in a decision issued by Pre-Trial Chamber I on 8 November 2006 regarding the contested practice of 'witness proofing'.[83] Indeed, the prosecutor asserted that the practice of witness proofing was a widely accepted practice in international criminal law, thus referring, albeit implicitly, to Article 21(1)(b).

To support his submission, the prosecutor mentioned two decisions of the ICTY and one decision of the SCSL. In fact, according to the Chamber, only one of the three decisions mentioned by the prosecutor expressly authorized the practice of witness proofing and therefore the Chamber concluded that the prosecution assertion that the practice of witness proofing was a widely accepted practice in international criminal law was unsupported.

[81] By contrast, see Art 20(3) of the SCSL Statute which states: 'The Judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda.'

[82] Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber 11 to Redact Factual Descriptions of Crimes in the Warrants of Arrest, Motion for Reconsideration, and Motion for Clarification, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-60, PTC II, ICC, 28 October 2005, para. 19.

[83] Decision on the Practices of Witness Familiarization and Witness Proofing, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-0l/04-0l/06-679, PTC I, ICC, 8 November 2006, paras 28–34.

The question which should have been answered first is to what extent 'practices in international criminal law' may be seen as 'principles and rules of international law' under Article 21(1)(b) of the Statute. Thus far, only one Trial Chamber has made reference to the 'general practice in the administration of international criminal justice'[84] or 'customary international criminal procedural law':

> Rule 54 common to ICTR and ICTY Rules is a general template that is repeatedly seen in identical or varying formulations in the procedural laws of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the Special Tribunal for Lebanon and Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia. The result of these repeated procedural laws is inescapably the crystallisation of customary international criminal procedural law, which recognises that a trial chamber of an international criminal court may subpoena a witness to appear for testimony.[85]

However, it seems doubtful that the concept of 'international criminal practice' exists in reality. 'International criminal proceedings' are widely fragmented as a result of the unprecedented development of international or internationalized criminal Tribunals which follow very different approaches as far as criminal procedural law is concerned. For example, if one takes a closer look at the issue of the participation of victims in criminal proceedings, one may already observe at least three different types of approaches: (i) the practice of the ICTY, the ICTR, and the SCSL is closely based on the common law model which traditionally does not provide at all for the participation of victims in the proceedings; (ii) the Khmer Rouge Tribunal[86] follows the civil law model which allows victims to participate in the proceedings as full parties; and, finally, (iii), somewhere between those two approaches are the ICC[87] and the Lebanon Tribunal[88] which allow for the participation of victims in proceedings but with a somewhat undefined status. 'International criminal practice' has become as diverse as national criminal practice and is thus at the moment, and has certainly for a long time been, a 'mirage' in international law. It is obvious that with the adoption of a very precise (and different from those of the ad hoc Tribunals) Statute and very precise Rules, states wanted to move away from the Rules adopted by the ad hoc Tribunals. The reference to those Rules as constituting 'customary international criminal procedural law' is not only misplaced but also in complete contradiction with what Article 21 dictates to the ICC judges.

This is reflected in the position of Trial Chamber 1,[89] which was also confronted with the issue of witness proofing at the request of the ICC prosecutor. Trial Chamber I noted:

> 43. Turning to the practices of international criminal tribunals and courts, the prosecution submitted that the practice of witness proofing is here permissible,

[84] Decision No. 5 on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (Principles and Procedure on 'No Case to Answer' motions), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1334, TC V(A), ICC, 3 June 2014, para. 17.

[85] Decision on Prosecutor's Application for Witness Summonses and Resulting Request for State Party Cooperation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1274-Corr2, TC V(A), ICC, 17 April 2014, para. 91.

[86] See Internal Rules for the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, 12 June 2007, especially Rule 23 on 'Civil Party Action by Victims'.

[87] See Arts 15(3), 19(3), and 68(3) ICC Statute and Rules 50, 59, and 89 to 93 ICC RPE.

[88] Art 17 of the Statute of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon is a copy of Art 68(3) of the ICC Statute.

[89] Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarize Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-/04-01/06-1049, TC I, ICC, 30 November 2007.

endorsed and well established. The Trial Chamber notes, as has been established by recent jurisprudence from the International Criminal Tribunals of the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, that witness proofing, in the sense advocated by the prosecution in the present case, is being commonly utilized at the ad hoc Tribunals.

44. However, this precedent is in no sense binding on the Trial Chamber at this Court. Article 21 of the Statute requires the Chamber to apply first the Statute, Elements of Crimes and Rules of the ICC. Thereafter, if ICC legislation is not definitive on the issue, the Trial Chamber should apply, where appropriate principles and rules of international law. In the instant case, the issue before the Chamber is procedural in nature. While this would not, ipso facto, prevent all procedural issues from scrutiny under Article 21(1)(b), the Chamber does not consider the procedural rules and jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals to be automatically applicable to the ICC without detailed analysis.
45. The ICC Statute has, through important advances, created a procedural framework which differs markedly from the ad hoc tribunals, such as, for example, in the requirement in the Statute that the prosecution should investigate exculpatory as well as incriminatory evidence, for which the Statute and the Rules of the ad hoc tribunals do not provide. Also, the Statute seemingly permits greater intervention by the Bench, as well as introducing the unique element of victim participation. Therefore, the Statute moves away from the procedural regime of the ad hoc tribunals, introducing additional and novel elements to aid the process of establishing the truth. Thus, the procedure of preparation of witnesses before trial is not easily transferable into the system of law created by the ICC Statute and Rules. Therefore, while acknowledging the importance of considering the practice and jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals, the Chamber is not persuaded that the application of the ad hoc procedures, in the context of preparation of witnesses for trial, is appropriate.

If ICC Chambers have been generally cautious with regard to the rules and jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals as far as procedural law is concerned, a slightly different picture prevails in the area of substantive criminal law. For example, Pre-Trial Chamber I found that neither the Statute nor the Elements of Crimes provide for a definition of an international armed conflict.[90] In reaching a conclusion on this issue, the Chamber relied on the jurisprudence of the ICTY Appeals Chamber on the basis of Article 21(1)(b). The same was done in respect of the definition of an armed conflict not of an international character.[91] The same methodology was also used to determine the necessary nexus between the armed conflict

[90] Decision on the Confirmation of the Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-0l/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, paras 205–11.

[91] Ibid., para. 233; see also Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7) (a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 229.

and the alleged war crimes concerned.[92] But Pre-Trial I refused to adopt the jurisprudence of the ICTY on modes of liability, especially the concept of 'joint criminal enterprise', taking into consideration the specific wording of Article 25(3) of the Statute.[93]

Turning now to the source of law described in Article 21(1)(c), what is to be understood by 'general principles of law'? In its decision dated 13 July 2006,[94] the Appeals Chamber did not try to provide an interpretation of all the conditions set up by this paragraph. In his elaborate application to the Appeals Chamber, the Prosecutor sought to demonstrate that there was a general principle of law to the effect that any decision of a first instance court could be appealed, especially a decision disallowing an appeal to a higher court. The Prosecutor referred to 14 countries from the civil law system, four countries from the common law system, and three countries from the Islamic law system.

The Appeals Chamber dismissed the prosecutor's submission in its decision issued on 13 July 2006 on the basis that 'nothing in the nature of a general principle of law exists or is universally adopted entailing the review of decisions of hierarchically subordinate courts disallowing or not permitting an appeal'.[95]

In its decision, the Appeals Chamber did not define what is to be understood by 'general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world'. It may be difficult to ever find such a principle in the field of criminal procedural law, as the laws vary considerably from one country to another even within the same legal system. The same is certainly true for substantive criminal law, including modes of liability, where there is also a 'radical fragmentation' of national legal systems.[96]

But even if such a principle existed, it would be difficult to apply it before an international criminal court since the structure of courts in a state is fundamentally different from the structure of an international court. Indeed, in its 13 July 2006 Decision, the ICC Appeals Chamber noted that:

> The Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers of the International Criminal Court are in no way inferior courts in the sense that inferior courts are perceived and classified in England and Wales. Hence, any comparison between them and inferior courts under English law is misleading.[97]

[92] Decision on the Confirmation of the Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-0l/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, para. 287.

[93] Ibid., paras 322–41.

[94] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of the Pre-Trial Chamber l's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, lCC-0l/04-168, AC, ICC, 13 July 2006.

[95] Ibid., para. 32.

[96] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-4, TC II, ICC, 19 December 2012, para. 17.

[97] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of the Pre-Trial Chamber l's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, lCC-0l/04-168, AC, ICC, 13 July 2006, para. 30.

Very recently however, a Trial Chamber[98] has referred to Article 21(1)(c) to conclude that ICC Chambers were in an 'analogous position as a domestic criminal court':

> On the question of whether an ICC Trial Chamber may compel the appearance of a witness, not only do general principles of international law—including those derived from national laws, pursuant to article 21(1)(c) of the Rome Statute—offer a basis to place an ICC Trial Chamber in an analogous position as a domestic criminal court.

Such an affirmation is rather strange, as certainly the drafters of the Statute were not willing to place the ICC in an analogous position to national courts. Indeed, national courts often may order police forces to enforce their decisions, something which was clearly denied to the ICC by states negotiating and adopting the Statute. Therefore, the fact that generally national courts have such a power cannot be used against the clear wording of the Statute to establish such a power for the ICC in accordance with Article 21(1)(c). Such a source of law can only be used, as explained earlier, if there is a gap in the Statute and not, as stated by a Trial Chamber, to 'augment' the provisions of the Statute.[99] Indeed, as noted in the dissenting opinion[100] to this decision:

> The concept of 'implied powers' cannot apply in this case. The Court shall exercise its functions and powers 'as provided for in the Statute' and this provision 'is directed against an expansion of the Court's powers beyond the Statute'. In the case at hand, there is no lacuna in the Statute, as States Parties have clearly agreed that in matters of cooperation, only voluntary appearances of witnesses shall be facilitated. It also strikes me as particularly difficult to rely on the implied powers doctrine in a context where the drafters of the Statute have demonstrated a deliberate intent to limit the Court's authority.

The issue of the existence of a 'general principle of law' was raised again in the context of witness proofing. The Prosecutor invoked Article 21(1)(c) in order to establish the existence of a general principle of law concerning the practice of witness proofing. Trial Chamber I rejected this argument on the ground that the Prosecutor had only referred to countries from the common law tradition in his submission. The Chamber noted:

> However, the Trial Chamber does not consider that a general principle of law allowing the substantive preparation of witnesses prior to testimony can be derived from national legal systems worldwide, pursuant to Article 21 (1) (c) of the Statute. Although this practice is accepted to an extent in two legal systems, both of which are founded upon common law traditions, this does not provide a sufficient basis for any conclusion that a general principle based on established practice of national legal systems exists. The Trial Chamber notes that the Prosecution's submission with regard to national jurisprudence did not include any citations from the Romano-Germanic legal system.[101]

[98] Decision on Prosecutor's Application for Witness Summonses and Resulting Request for State Party Cooperation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1274-Corr2, TC V(A), ICC, 17 April 2014, para. 65.

[99] Ibid., para. 91.

[100] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Herrera Carbuccia on the 'Decision on Prosecutor's Application for Witness Summonses and Resulting Request for State Party Cooperation', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1274-Anx, TC V(A), ICC, 29 April 2014, para. 21.

[101] Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarize Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-/04-01/06-1049, TC I, ICC, 30 November 2007.

The fact that the parties could not rely on solely a few national legal systems in order to establish a 'general principle of law' has been recently reaffirmed by the ICC Appeals Chamber, therefore avoiding at the ICC a jurisprudence analogous to the one developed at the ICTY and ICTR where national jurisprudence from Australia and/or the United States of America was sufficient to establish the existence of 'customary international law' and therefore 'applicable law' before those tribunals. This was just a technique to ensure complete common law domination in the law applied by those tribunals. However, this was certainly not acceptable for a permanent international criminal court for most of the delegations at the Rome Conference, which explains, at least partially, both the precision in the drafting of the Statute and the existence of its Article 21.

Fortunately, at the ICC, the Appeals Chamber has very recently again reminded the Prosecutor that case law from the United States of America was not applicable in light of the clear wording of Article 21(1).[102] It seems, however, difficult for the ICC Prosecutor to understand properly Article 21 of the Statute and therefore to avoid excessive reliance on the case law from common law jurisdictions. Previously, in 2011, the ICC Appeals Chamber reminded the Prosecutor that the Court had its own legal framework:

> This Court has its own legal framework governing the issues that arise in this appeal, as set out above. This cannot be replaced by the practice of other courts and tribunals in the present circumstances. In this context, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Prosecutor does not explain his reliance upon case law from just one domestic jurisdiction (the United States). It is not argued that article 21 (1) (c) of the Statute is applicable in the current circumstances, nor that the case law presented should be interpreted as founding a general principle of law 'derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world' within the meaning of that article. The Appeals Chamber therefore does not find that case law to be of assistance in resolving the issues before it in the present appeal.[103]

This finding shows once again that the external sources of law mentioned in Article 21(1)(b) and (c) of the Statute should be of limited use before the ICC and indeed have been of limited use apart from some very isolated jurisprudence. The most important source of law (in addition to the Statute and the Rules) should be Article 21(3) of the Statute, i.e. 'internationally recognized human rights'.

18.3.2 'Internationally recognized human rights' as source of law before the ICC

Long before the first jurisprudence of the ICC, some authors pointed out the consequences which Article 21(3) may have on the application of the Statute:

> While the original intention behind this paragraph may have been to limit the court's powers in the application and interpretation of the relevant law, it could have the

[102] Decision on the Prosecutor's Appeal against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Request to Amend the Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1123, AC, ICC, 13 December 2013, see paras 28 and 32.

[103] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II Dated 20 July 2011 Entitled 'Decision with Respect to the Question of Invalidating the Appointment of Counsel to the Defence', Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-365, AC, ICC, 10 November 2011, para. 62.

> opposite effect and broaden the competence of the court on these matters. It provides a standard against which all the law applied by the court should be tested. This is a sweeping language, which, as drafted, could apply to all three categories in Article 21.[104]

Article 21(3) raises two interesting issues. The first question is what is to be understood by 'internationally recognized human rights'? The second one concerns the role of 'internationally recognized human rights', i.e. the meaning of 'application and interpretation'. If the ICC jurisprudence has been quite audacious with regard to the first question, it has been much more hesitant with regard to the second one.

18.3.2.1 What are 'internationally recognized human rights'?

The Statute does not provide any definition concerning the scope of this material source of law. This provision may encompass a quite broad category of rights, especially if compared with the language used in Article 7(1)(h) of the Statute which uses the expression 'grounds that are universally recognized as impermissible under international law'. Thus, 'internationally recognized human rights' represent arguably a broader category of human rights which do not have to reach the level of 'universal recognition'.[105] Of course, the interesting question then arises: is regional recognition sufficient?

It seems that the jurisprudence of the Court has given a broad meaning to 'internationally recognized human rights'. It has relied heavily, for example, on the jurisprudence of regional courts such as the European Court of Human Rights and the IACHR, and also on resolutions adopted by the UN General Assembly ('GA').

In this respect, it may even be said that the jurisprudence of the Court has been audacious. In a decision issued on 10 March 2009,[106] the ICC Presidency, with regard to the right of detainees to receive visits at the expense of the Court, referred to 'international human rights jurisprudence and instruments' such as resolutions of the UNGA and the Economic and Social Council, but also recommendations from the Council of Europe, concluding observations from the UN Committee Against Torture, the Standards of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture, a report of the European Commissioner for Human Rights, and concluding observations of the UN Human Rights Committee. The Presidency in its decision also accepted what could be seen as an 'emerging internationally recognized human right' when recalling the 'growing international support for positive action on the part of detaining authorities in order to enable detained persons to exercise their rights'. There is therefore a huge [104] M Arsanjani, 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (1999) 93 American Journal of International Law 22.

[105] G Edwards, 'International Human Rights Challenges to the New International Criminal Court: the Search and Seizure Right to Privacy' (2001) 26 Yale Journal of International Law 323.

[106] Decision on 'Mr Mathieu Ngudjolo's Complaint under Regulation 221(1) of the Regulations of the Registry against the Registrar's Decision of 18 November 2008', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-RoR-217-02/08-8, Presidency, ICC, 10 March 2009, paras 27–9 and 40.

probability that Article 21(3) will become the way for the ICC to make the Statute, which is almost impossible to amend or adapt to the evolution of international law as far as international human rights are concerned. It is to be hoped that what has been qualified as a 'chink in the armour of the Rome Statute'[107] will be used effectively by the ICC judges.

As an example of the use of 'internationally recognized human rights' in the ICC jurisprudence, when defining 'harm suffered' in Rule 85 of the Rules in the context of the participation of victims, Pre-Trial Chamber I[108] referred to the 'Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power' adopted by the UNGA on 29 November 1985[109] and to the 'Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law' ('Basic Principles') adopted by the UNGA on 16 December 2005.[110] Likewise, Trial Chamber I[111] referred to the Basic Principles as an authoritative source for the definition of victims. The same resolutions were referred to by Pre-Trial Chamber II with regard to the rights of victims in the context of the situation in the Republic of Kenya.[112]

But it is certainly the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights which has been referred to most, as has, to a lesser extent, the jurisprudence of the IACHR. Pre-Trial Chamber I made reference to the case law of both courts in relation to the right to liberty:

> 11. In the Chamber's view, the review which article 58 (1) of the Statute requires that the Chamber undertake consistent with the fact that, apart from other collateral consequences of being the subject of a case before the Court, the fundamental right of the relevant person to his liberty is at stake. Accordingly, the Chamber emphasizes that it will not take any decision limiting such a right on the basis of applications where key factual allegations are fully unsupported.
>
> 12. As required by Article 21 (3) of the Statute, the Chamber considers this to be the only interpretation consistent with the 'reasonable suspicion' standard provided for in article 5 (1) (c) of the European Convention of Human Rights and the interpretation of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in respect of the fundamental right of any person to liberty under article 7 of the American Convention on Human Rights.[113]

[107] See also Powderly, Chapter 19, this volume.

[108] Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-0l/04-101-tEN-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 17 January 2006, para. 115.

[109] Annex to UNGA Res 40/34 (29 November 1985) UN Doc A/RES/40/34.

[110] Annex to UNGA Res A/RES/60/147 (16 December 2005) UN Doc A/RES/60/147.

[111] Decision on Victims' Participation, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 18 January 2008, ICC-01/04-01/06-1119, TC I, ICC, 18 January 2008, para. 35.

[112] Decision on Victims' Participation in Proceedings Related to the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-24, PTC II, ICC, 3 November 2010, para. 5.

[113] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest, Art 58, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006; this decision is to be found as Annex I to the Decision Concerning Pre-Trial Chamber I's Decision of 10 February 2006 and the Incorporation

To give another example, the ICC Appeals Chamber referred to the case law of the European Court of Human Rights to underline the importance of sufficient reasoning in judicial decisions and to allow the use of anonymous witnesses in the context of the confirmation of the charges.[114]

Pre-Trial Chamber I[115] has more recently referred to both the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, the ICTY, the ICTR, and the ECCC in order to define 'fitness to stand trial'. It is interesting to see that the ICC Chambers have not only referred to the jurisprudence of human rights courts but also to the jurisprudence of international or internationalized criminal tribunals. What matters is not the nature of the Tribunal or Court issuing the decision, but how the substance of the international human right at stake has been defined by those international Courts. It is certainly acceptable to also refer to the jurisprudence of other international criminal Tribunals to see how international human rights have been defined by those tribunals. However, the use of their jurisprudence or rules to import into the ICC procedural framework aspects of their procedural system which has nothing to do with the ICC procedural framework is certainly not acceptable in view of Article 21 of the Statute.

18.3.2.2 The meaning of 'interpretation and application'

The Court must ensure that the interpretation and application of the law described in Article 21 of the Statute is consistent with internationally recognized human rights, thus subordinating all formal sources of law described in Article 21, including the Statute and the Rules to internationally recognized human rights. ICC Chambers have shared different interpretations of the notions of 'interpretation and application'.

Pre-Trial Chamber I has read 'interpretation and application' to mean only 'interpretation', thus adopting a restrictive reading of Article 21(3):

> Considering that, as this Chamber has repeatedly stated, the Chamber, in determining the contours of the statutory framework provided for in the Statute, the Rules and Regulations, must, in addition to applying the general principle of interpretation set out in article 21 (3) of the Statute, look at the general principles of interpretation as set out in article 31 (1) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, according to which 'a treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in light of its object and purpose'.[116] of Documents into the Record of the Case against Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, lCC-01/04-01/06-8-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 24 February 2006.

[114] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision of Pre- Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Requests and Amended Requests for Redactions under Rule 81', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 14 December 2006, ICC-0l/04-0l/06-773, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, paras 20 and 50.

[115] Decision on the Fitness of Laurent Gbagbo to Take Part in the Proceedings before this Court, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-286-Red, PTC I, ICC, 2 November 2012, paras 43–9.

[116] Decision on the Joinder of the Cases against Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 10 March 2008, ICC-01/04-01/07-257, PTC I, ICC, 10 March 2008.

However, in international law, a distinction must be made between the rules of interpretation of treaties as set forth in the VCLT and a material source of law, such as the one stipulated in Article 21(3), which refers to 'internationally recognized human rights'.

The ICC Appeals Chamber has underlined the importance of the fact that, pursuant to Article 21(3) of the Statute, the applicable law must not only be interpreted, but also be applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights. It held:

> 37. Breach of the right to freedom by illegal arrest or detention confers a right to compensation to the victim (see article 85 (1) of the Statute). Does the victim have any other remedy for or protection against breaches of his/her basic rights? The answer depends on the interpretation of article 21 (3) of the Statute, its compass and ambit. Article 21 (3) of the Statute stipulates that the law applicable under the Statute must be interpreted as well as applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights. Human rights underpin the Statute; every aspect of it including the exercise of jurisdiction of the Court. Its provisions must be interpreted and more importantly applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights.

It appears, therefore, that 'application' is something different from 'interpretation'. It implies that a certain result must be reached, whether or not it is explicitly or implicitly provided for in the law applicable in accordance with Article 21, and that such a result must be in conformity with internationally recognized human rights.

This means for the application of subsidiary sources of law such as those described in Article 21(1)(b) or (c) that a certain objective must be found in the Statute or the Rules, as primary sources of law, which is not given effect by those sources. In the context of Article 21(3), however, the objective is to be found in internationally recognized human rights. Hence, the application of the Statute, Rules, and other subsidiary sources of law set out in Article 21(1) will always have to produce a result compatible with internationally recognized human rights, even if such an objective does not appear from the application of the Statute, Rules, or subsidiary sources of law provided in Article 21(1), as interpreted in accordance with the rules of interpretation set out in Articles 31 and 32 of the VCLT adopted on 23 May 1969.

This interpretation supports the conclusion that internationally recognized human rights may constitute an additional source of law. They might, for instance, provide additional procedural remedies to participants in the proceedings which were not foreseen in the Statute or the Rules. The ICC jurisprudence goes in that direction with the creation by the ICC Appeals Chamber of a new procedural remedy, not foreseen in the Statute and Rules, i.e. the possibility for ICC Chambers to 'stay proceedings'.[117] Such a remedy was directly based on Article 21(3) which requires the Court to exercise its jurisdiction in accordance with internationally recognized human rights. Such a procedural remedy may oblige the ICC to renounce to exercise its jurisdiction in case of a fundamental violation of the human rights of the person prosecuted. Such a remedy is not provided for in the Statute or the Rules, which appear to limit the right of the victim of such a violation to receiving compensation in accordance with Article 85 of the Statute.

[117] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Art 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, para. 37; Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Article 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, Together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1486, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008, paras 77–83; Judgment on the

This creation of new procedural remedies by the ICC jurisprudence on the basis of Article 21(3) will certainly be very useful for persons prosecuted before the ICC and victims participating in the proceedings before the ICC. Whereas the example of the stay of the proceedings is certainly an interesting, albeit limited, new procedural remedy for persons prosecuted, internationally recognized human rights could be very useful to create new procedural remedies for victims, such as, for example, the right to challenge a decision by the prosecutor not to investigate or not to prosecute, or the absence of such a decision taken by the prosecutor within a reasonable time. In this regard, it is interesting to note that Recommendation Rec(2000)19 adopted by the Council of Europe[118] provides for the following:

> 34. Interested parties of recognised or identifiable status, in particular victims, should be able to challenge decisions of public prosecutors not to prosecute; such a challenge may be made, where appropriate after an hierarchical review, either by way of judicial review, or by authorising parties to engage private prosecution.

This could, therefore, become an additional procedural mechanism for judicial review, on the initiative of victims, of prosecutorial decisions not to investigate or not to prosecute, or of the excessive time taken by the Prosecutor to decide whether to initiate an investigation or a prosecution, in addition to what the Statute provides in Article 53.

According to a more controversial interpretation of Article 21(3), this provision might serve as a basis to set aside an article of the Statute which is, or which application would be, in contradiction with internationally recognized human rights.

In 2011 Trial Chamber II decided, on the basis of Article 21(3) of the Statute, that detained witnesses who were transferred to the Court by the DRC to testify in the Katanga and Ngudjolo trial could not be returned to that country, contrary to the dispositions of Article 93(7)(b) of the Statute:

> As matters stand, the Chamber is unable to apply article 93(7) of the Statute in conditions which are consistent with internationally recognized human rights, as required by article 21(3) of the Statute. If the witnesses were to be returned to the DRC

Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 8 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultations with the VWU', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2582, AC, ICC, 8 October 2010, paras 55–61.

[118] Recommendation Rec(2000)19 of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the Role of Public Prosecution in the Criminal Justice System adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 6 October 2000. On the procedural rights of victims in criminal proceedings, see R Aldana-Pindell, 'An Emerging Universality of Justiciable Victims' Rights in the Criminal Process to Curtail Impunity for State-Sponsored Crimes' (2004) 26 Human Rights Quarterly 605; see also Perez v France App no. 47287/99 (ECtHR Grand Chamber, 12 February 2004) para. 68; see also Blake v Guatemala (IACtHR, 24 January 1998) para. 97.

> immediately, it would become impossible for them to exercise their right to apply for asylum and they would be deprived of the fundamental right to effective remedy.[119]

This seems to be the first time where an article of the Statute was clearly set aside by a Chamber, as the application of that article would have been contrary to Article 21(3) of the Statute.

On 4 February 2013 those witnesses still detained in the Court detention centre in The Hague filed a request to be released. Trial Chamber I rejected that request, albeit only by a majority, giving an a posteriori explanation to its decision issued on 9 June 2011 where it decided not to apply Article 93(7)(b) in light of internationally recognized human rights:

> Ultimately, in the 9 June 2011 Decision, two decisive factors were at play: the risk of the immediate violation of a fundamental norm of international customary law whose peremptoriness finds increasing recognition among States and from which no derogation is permitted (jus cogens) and the impossibility of applying the Statute in compliance with this norm. Otherwise stated the only means to adhere to the peremptory norm of non-refoulement was to suspend article 93(7) of the Statute temporarily and not apply it should the asylum claims succeed.[120]

The reasoning adopted by Trial Chamber II raises the question of whether there are different categories of 'internationally recognized human rights'. In such a case, according to that Chamber, only one particular category of those internationally recognized human rights, i.e. those raising to the level of 'jus cogens', would permit a Chamber to set aside an article of the Statute. Such a reasoning does not seem to be in conformity with Article 21(3) of the Statute, which only refers to one category of rights, i.e. 'internationally recognized human rights', with no further specification. It is also in contradiction with the jurisprudence of the Court so far, which has applied Article 21(3) of the Statute without any requirement that the rights to be applied under that category be part of 'jus cogens'. This would unduly restrict the category of internationally recognized human rights to be applied by the Court. The dissenting opinion to this decision correctly raises this issue:

> Furthermore, the Majority does not convincingly explain why the Court's obligation under article 21(3) to apply article 93(7) in accordance with internationally recognized human rights sufficed to set aside the Court's obligation to return the Detained Witnesses immediately after finishing their testimony in order to protect their fundamental right to seek asylum, but why this obligation is inapplicable in relation to the equally fundamental right not to be detained arbitrarily. This unequal treatment is especially difficult to understand in light of the fact that it would be the > exact same legal provision—i.e. article 93(7) of the Statute—that would have to be suspended in order to give effect to the Chamber's obligations to respect fundamental human rights. In this regard, I strongly distance myself from the Majority's suggestion that the reason why article 21(3) prevailed in the first case but not in the second is because the former human right—i.e. the right to apply for asylum and the prohibition against non-refoulement—is a norm of jus cogens from which no derogation is permitted. A lot could be said about such an argument, but I will simply note here that article 21(3) speaks of 'internationally recognized human rights' and is thus not limited in its application to jus cogens or 'non-derogable norms'.[121]

[119] Decision on an Amicus Curiae Application and on the 'Requête Tendant à Obtenir Présentations des Témoins DRC-D02-P-0350, DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 aux Autorités Néerlandaises aux Fins d'Asile' (Arts 68 and 93(7) of the Statute), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3003-tENG, TC II, ICC, 9 June 2011, para. 73.

[120] Decision on the Application for the Interim Release of Detained Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3405-tENG, TC II, ICC, 1 October 2013, para. 30.

As Trial Chamber II declared that it lacked competence to entertain the request for release presented by the three detained witnesses and therefore declared such request inadmissible, the three detained witnesses tried to appeal the decision under Article 82(1)(b) of the Statute, which provides for the possibility to appeal directly (without leave) a decision granting or denying release of the person being investigated or prosecuted.

The Appeals Chamber declared, by majority, the appeal inadmissible:

> The Appeals Chamber considers that the Detained Witnesses' arguments regarding article 21(3) of the Statute are misplaced. The Detained Witnesses do not identify, nor does the Appeals Chamber find, an internationally recognized human right to appeal that requires the Appeals Chamber to expand its limited subject-matter appellate jurisdiction under the Statute, beyond the scope of the powers vested in it by the States Parties.[122]

The argument used by the Appeals Chamber to declare the appeal inadmissible is not really pertinent. What was at stake in this case was not 'an internationally recognized human right to appeal' but actually the right to liberty, which was clearly identified by the detained witnesses and is without doubt a very important, internationally recognized human right. This point is rightly raised in the dissenting opinion:

> In my view, a narrow understanding of article 82 (1) (a) of the Statute, would, in the circumstances of this case, be irreconcilable with article 21 (3) of the Statute, according to which the Court has to apply and interpret the Statute consistently with internationally recognized human rights. This is because if the appeal were found to be inadmissible, it would become impossible for the Detained Witnesses to exercise their right to judicial review of the legality of their detention. It would be an especially peculiar result for a court such as the ICC, which is meant to provide a forum to address the most serious human rights' violations, not to be able to address and remedy human rights violations for which it itself is responsible.[123]

[121] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3405-Anx, TC II, ICC, 1 October 2013, para. 6.

[122] Decision on the Admissibility of the Appeal against the 'Decision on the Application for the Interim Release of Detained Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 and DRC-D02-P-0350', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3424, AC, ICC, 20 January 2014, para. 30.

[123] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Sang-Hyun Song, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3424-Anx, AC, ICC, 20 January 2014, para. 17.

What is even more interesting in relation to those three detained witnesses is that the Appeals Chamber issued another decision the same day,[124] also by majority, acting proprio motu within the context of the Ngudjolo case which it was seized of since the prosecutor's appeal against the decision of acquittal issued by Trial Chamber II on 18 December 2012. Basically reversing the decision issued by Trial Chamber II on 9 June 2011, the Appeals Chamber came to the conclusion that Article 93(7)(b) of the Statute could be applied in the case of the three detained witnesses in conformity with Article 21(3) of the Statute. It seems that the Appeals Chamber was concerned about the adverse consequences that Trial Chamber II's interpretation of Article 21(3) could have on the cooperation of states with the Court:

> article 21(3) of the Statute requires that article 93 (7) of the Statute be applied and interpreted in conformity with internationally recognized human rights; it does not require the Court to violate its obligations pursuant to article 93 (7) (b) of the Statute. Furthermore, such an interpretation would seriously damage the Court's ability to enter into future cooperation agreements with States, which would undermine the Court's ability to obtain needed testimony and evidence and render it more difficult to establish the truth in the cases before it.[125]

The analysis of this recent ICC jurisprudence gives a mixed picture of the way ICC Chambers are using Article 21(3) as a source of law. If they have been generous in the way to define 'internationally recognized human rights', the use of such a source, especially to set aside an article of the Statute, seems to be much more controverted.

This mixed picture about the real impact of Article 21(3) with regard to the sources of law to be applied by the ICC appears also from a rather selective use of Article 21(3) by ICC Chambers. Indeed, a closer look at ICC jurisprudence leaves the impression that although Article 21(3) mandates the Court to apply all sources of law described in Article 21 in conformity with internationally recognized human rights, sometimes references to those rights are conspicuously absent from ICC decisions.

For example, in two decisions[126] issued in the context of the situation in Kenya, Pre-Trial Chamber II denied the possibility for those who were publicly named in the Prosecutor's applications under Article 58 of the Statute for the issuance of summonses to appear to present observations. The reasons given by Pre-Trial Chamber II were that 'the proceedings triggered by the Prosecutor's application for a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear are to be conducted on an ex parte basis' and that 'under the statutory framework of the Court, there is no legal basis for a person under the Prosecutor's investigation to submit observations at the current stage of the proceedings'. While correct with regard to the wording of Article 58 of the Statute, those decisions fail to consider the impact of internationally recognized human rights in accordance with Article 21(3) of the Statute. Actually, those rights are not even considered and Article 21(3) is not even mentioned. However, the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights with regard to when a person can be considered as 'charged'[127] and therefore when the rights under Article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights start to apply, could have led the Chamber to a different result, applying Article 58 of the Statute in conformity with internationally recognized human rights as mandated by Article 21(3) of the Statute.

[124] Order on the Implementation of the Cooperation Agreement between the Court and the Democratic Republic of the Congo Concluded Pursuant Art 93(7) of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-158, AC, ICC, 20 January 2014.

[125] Ibid., para. 26.

[126] Decision on Application for Leave to Submit Amicus Curiae Observations, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-35, PTC II, ICC, 18 January 2011, para. 10; Decision on the 'Application for Leave to Participate in the Proceedings before the Pre-Trial Chamber Relating to the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58(7)', Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-42, PTC II, ICC, 11 February 2011, para. 6.

The same is true of a decision taken by Pre-Trial Chamber I[128] with regard to a request by victims in the situation in the DRC to receive information from the Prosecutor about the investigation in that situation into the crimes they had allegedly suffered. Pre-Trial Chamber I denied the request without even mentioning Article 21(3) or internationally recognized human rights. However, the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power of 29 November 1985, which was used by the very same Pre-Trial Chamber for the definition of harm suffered by victims in a decision issued the previous year,[129] provides in its paragraph 6(a) that victims should be informed of 'the scope, timing and progress of the proceedings and of the disposition of their cases, especially where serious crimes are involved and where they have requested such information'.[130]

In order to really apply in a consistent way Article 21(3), ICC Chambers should systematically in their decisions consider the compatibility of their conclusions with internationally recognized human rights. This is not done and the result is a selective application of internationally recognized human rights, a result which is not in conformity with Article 21(3) of the Statute.

It remains to be seen whether the Court will in fact use all the potential of Article 21(3), as it is doubtful that it has done so for the moment. It is, however, clear that the compatibility of certain articles of the Statute with internationally recognized human rights remains uncertain. One of these controversial articles is Article 16, which allows a political body, the UNSC, to interfere with prosecutions conducted by a judicial body, the ICC. Such interference would certainly be in breach of Article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights, which establishes the requirement of [127] See Eckle v Germany App no. 8130/79 (ECtHR, 15 July 1982) para. 73; Foti and others v Italy App no. 7604/76, 7719/76, 7781/77, and 7913/77 (ECtHR, 10 December 1982) para. 52; Kravtas v Lithuania App no, 12717/06 (ECtHR, 18 January 2011), Second Section, para. 36. The European Court of Human Rights has repeatedly stated that a person is to be considered as 'charged' when he or she has been officially notified that he or she would be prosecuted.

[128] Decision on the Requests of the Legal Representative for Victims VPRS 1 to VPRS 6 Regarding 'Prosecutor's Information on Further Investigation', Situation in the Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-399, PTC I, ICC, 26 September 2007.

[129] Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-0l/04-101-tEN-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 17 January 2006, para. 115; the Chamber used paragraph 1 of that Declaration.

[130] Adopted by the UNGA on 29 November 1985, see Annex to UNGA Res 40/34 (29 November 1985) UN Doc A/RES/40/34; on the rights of victims to receive information with regard to criminal investigations concerning the crimes they have allegedly suffered, see also MC Kerr v United Kingdom App no. 28883/95 (ECtHR, 4 May 2001), Third Section, para. 157; Ogur v Turkey App no. 21594/93, (ECtHR Grand Chamber, 20 May 1999) para. 92.

an independent tribunal. It remains to be seen whether the ICC will in fact set aside a Chapter VII Resolution adopted by the SC requesting the Court not to proceed with a prosecution under Article 16. However, it is difficult to argue that such an intervention by a political body in an ongoing case before the ICC would be compatible with internationally recognized human rights.

18.4 Conclusion

While the picture which appeared from the review conducted in 2008[131] of the application of Article 21 of the Statute by ICC Chambers was rather clear and seemed to be respectful of the applicable law before the ICC, the picture appears more blurred in 2014.

If the original jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber from 2006[132] asserting the supremacy of the Statute and Rules still stands in theory, in practice, however, several attempts, especially at the trial stage, were made in order to try to move away from the procedural framework established by the Statute and the Rules.

Such attempts should not be encouraged, as they contradict the clear willingness of the drafters of the Statute to provide procedural certainty for the participants in the proceedings before the ICC.

To leave more space for 'judicial creativity' outside of the procedural framework established by the Statute and the Rules would allow the judges, at their will, to reject a motion by arguing that the applicable law before the ICC does not provide for such a procedural remedy or to accept such motion by creating the remedy themselves if they find it is appropriate to do so.

It is submitted that there is no need to allow for more judicial creativity than that already foreseen in Article 21(3). One 'chink in the armour of the Rome Statute' is enough. This would allow the ICC Chambers to adapt the Statute and the Rules to the growing and evolving body of 'internationally recognized human rights' and should be encouraged. Rather than trying to import procedures from the ad hoc Tribunals or from some domestic jurisdictions in contradiction with what is mandated by Article 21, ICC Chambers should use to their full extent the possibility given to them by Article 21(3), something they are hesitant to do.

[131] See G Bitti, 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Treatment of Sources of Law in the Jurisprudence of the ICC' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 293.

[132] See supra Subsidiary sources of law, the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber in relation to the use of subsidiary sources of law.

19

The Rome Statute and the Attempted Corseting of the Interpretative Judicial Function

Reflections on Sources of Law and Interpretative Technique

*Joseph Powderly

19.1 Introduction

The successful conclusion of the Rome Conference in July 1998 heralded a new era in which the utopia of a genuinely realizable notion of global justice was one small but significant step closer to realization. While in the context of the ad hoc Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda primary responsibility for the drafting of the constituent statutes was entrusted to the United Nations Office of Legal Affairs,[1] at Rome, state delegations assumed the reins for what was to prove to be a highly complex and often fraught drafting process.[2] With direct state involvement came the influence of competing state interests and the challenge of delicate consensus-building. Amongst the primary objectives of states at Rome was the desire to ensure, as much as possible, that the constituent statute of any future permanent ICC should be comprehensive in terms of the clear provision of positive rules in a manner akin to that of a domestic criminal code.

While states may have sought such a comprehensive code out of a genuine desire to ensure the certainty and predictability of applicable rules in full conformity with the principle of legality, this brought with it the potential added benefit (at least in the view of sceptical or cautious states) of curtailing the interpretative freedom of the bench and, by extension, their role in the progressive development of the law. It is evident from a cursory observation of the near-exhaustive nature of the definitional

* Assistant Professor of Public International Law, Grotius Centre for International Legal Studies, Leiden University.

[1] See V Morris and M Scharf, An Insider's Guide to the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia: A Documentary History and Analysis (New York: Transnational Publishers 1995); R Zacklin, 'Some Major Problems in the Drafting of the ICTY Statute' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 361; V Morris and M Scharf, An Insider's Guide to the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (New York: Transnational Publishers 1998).

[2] See M C Bassiouni (ed.), The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (New York: Transnational Publishers 1998); M C Bassiouni (ed.), The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court (New York: Transnational Publishers 2005); M C Bassiouni, 'Negotiating the Treaty of Rome on the Establishment of the International Criminal Court' (1999) 32 Cornell International Law Journal 443; R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court, The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999); J Washburn, 'Negotiation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and International Lawmaking in the 21st Century' (1999) 11 Pace International Law Review 361; F Benedetti and J Washburn, 'Drafting the International Criminal parameters of the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Court (Articles 6, 7, and 8)[3] that states wished to limit the space within which the bench would be required to look beyond the text of a provision in the exercise of their interpretative mandate. The logical inference to be drawn from the punctilious nature of the Rome Statute is that it represents an implied stifling of the judicial role in the continued progressive development of international criminal law, a role that has been central to the realization of the international criminal legal order.[4] In drawing this inference, it is assumed that states wished to move international criminal adjudication away from its common law heritage, placing ever-greater emphasis on the sanctity of positive rules and a pseudo separation of powers which clearly distinguished the bench from the legislative mandate assumed by the states themselves. However, in so doing, states effectively sought to reengineer the very nature of the international criminal judicial function.

While the drafters of the Rome Statute may have intended to curtail the creative interpretative capacity of the bench, of course it does not automatically follow that such intentions would be obediently and unwaveringly honoured by the bench. Irrespective of the purported textual clarity of the instrument, the primary task of the judge with respect to the interpretation and application of the law remains undiluted. Textual clarity does not transform adjudication into a simple and entirely predictable mechanical process, however much states may wish this to be the case. The application of law is dependent on a preceding act of interpretation, since it is necessary 'to form an understanding of what the authoritative text requires in order to apply it'.[5] Interpretation, which we might define as the process by which the meaning of a text is understood and expressed, cannot be realistically constructed as an impersonal objective process. The subjective predilections and cultural assumptions of the bench lie to a greater or lesser extent in the background of the interpretative process. On a hermeneutical level, '[t]he text is not an object entirely independent of its reader, nor its interpretation an entirely individual and subjective activity'.[6]

Court Treaty: Two Years to Rome and an Afterword on the Rome Diplomatic Conference' (1999) 5 Global Governance 1; P Kirsch and J Holmes, 'The Rome Conference on an International Criminal Court: The Negotiating Process' (1999) 93 The American Journal of International Law 2; R Clark, 'Drafting a General Part to a Penal Code: Some Thoughts Inspired by the Negotiations on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and by the Court's First Substantive Law Discussion in the Lubanga Dyilo Confirmation Proceedings' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 519; P Kirsch and V Oosterveld, 'Negotiating an Institution for the Twenty-First Century: Multilateral Diplomacy and the International Criminal Court' (2000-2001) 46 McGill Law Journal 1141.

[3] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('Rome Statute').

[4] See generally, A Zahar and G Sluiter, International Criminal Law: A Critical Introduction (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008); S Darcy and J Powderly (eds), Judicial Creativity at the International Criminal Tribunals (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010); M Shahabuddeen, International Criminal Justice at the Yugoslav Tribunal: A Judge's Recollection (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012); L van den Herik, The Contribution of the Rwanda Tribunal to the Development of International Law (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2005); S Darcy, Judges, Law and War: The Judicial Development of International Humanitarian Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2014).

[5] N MacCormick, 'Argumentation and Interpretation in Law' (1995) 9 Argumentation 467, 470.

[6] I Johnstone, 'Treaty Interpretation: The Authority of Interpretative Communities' (1990–1) 12 Michigan Journal of International Law 371, 378.

Rather than engaging in a futile attempt to entirely extinguish subjectivity from the interpretative process, legal orders typically seek to balance subjectivity and objectivity through the institution of what Owen Fiss has labelled as a set of 'disciplining rules'.[7] These disciplining rules take on a variety of forms dependent on the legal order in question, but are generally recognizable in the traditional canons or aids to statutory construction and constitutional principles invoked by the bench in the interpretative process. While the argument can and has been made that such disciplining rules themselves require interpretation, this does not, however, render them incapable of constraining the interpretative process.[8]

Looking specifically to the international legal order, the relevant set of disciplining rules are to be found in the specific interpretative provisions included within treaty texts themselves and, more generally, in Articles 31–3 of the VCLT.[9] Article 31(1)'s iconic wording provides that, '[a] treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in light of its object and purpose'. As remarked by Jean-Marc Sorel and Valerie Boré Eveno, the text of Article 31(1) offers a compromise between 'defenders of textual interpretation, of subjective interpretation based on the parties' intention, and of ends-focused or teleological interpretation which attempts to extract those meanings from the text which might be intended beyond the formulation used'.[10] The primary objective of Articles 31–3 is to allow the bench to adopt an interpretative approach 'that is simultaneously obvious (the ordinary meaning of terms), logical (an acte clair), and effective (a useful effect)'.[11] The direct applicability of the Vienna rules in the interpretation of the statutes of the Yugoslavia and Rwanda Tribunals was accepted in the absence of a dedicated interpretative provision despite the fact that these instruments were not treaty texts per se.[12] However, since the ad hoc Tribunals were ostensibly tasked with the interpretation and application of a penal statute for the purposes of determining individual criminal responsibility, additional disciplining rules beyond Articles 31–3 came into play, namely, the principle of legality and norms of international human rights law.

Given the treaty status of the Rome Statute, similar concerns with respect to the direct applicability of the Vienna rules do not arise; however, questions remain as to the safety of invoking the teleological or purposive ambit of the Vienna rules in the interpretation of substantive international criminal law and related provisions of the [7] O Fiss, 'Objectivity and Interpretation' (1981–2) 34 Stanford Law Review 739, 744.

[8] O Fiss, The Law as it Could Be (New York: New York University Press 2003) 179. See also S Fish, 'Fish v Fiss' (1984) 36 Stanford Law Review 1325.

[9] Arts 31–3 VCLT (signed 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331 ('Vienna Convention').

[10] J-M Sorel and V Boré Eveno, 'Article 31: General Rule of Interpretation' in O Corten and P Klein, The Vienna Conventions on the Law of Treaties: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011) 808.

[11] Ibid.

[12] See Trial Chamber Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion Requesting Protective Measures for Victims and Witnesses, Tadić, IT-94-1-T, TC, ICTY, 10 August 1995, para. 10: 'Although the Statute of the Tribunal is a sui generis legal instrument and not a treaty, in interpreting its provisions and the drafter's conception of the applicability of the jurisprudence of other courts, the rules of treaty interpretation contained in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties appear relevant.'

Statute directly relevant to individual criminal responsibility.[13] However, it seems that states were not blind to this question during the drafting process and sought to directly address it through the express inclusion of additional disciplining rules within the text of the Rome Statute itself. It is argued that these additional interpretative disciplining rules are enshrined most concretely in the provisions of Articles 21 and 22 on the applicable law and nullum crimen sine lege respectively. Both of these provisions insist on the prioritization of a literal or ordinary textual approach to the interpretation and application of norms of substantive international criminal law provided for in the Statute, such as the definition of crimes, modes of liability, and defences. Taken together, they can be viewed as implicitly seeking to constrain and control the freedom of the bench to engage in creative or expansive interpretation undertaken in the interests of the progressive development of the law.

The objective of this chapter is to examine the law and practice of the ICC with respect to these two provisions, with a view to determining whether or not they are effectively corseting the interpretative freedom of the bench as intended by the drafters of the Rome Statute. In considering Article 21, it is argued that it constitutes much more than a mere provision delineating the sources of applicable law, and should be viewed as implicitly endorsing a set of interpretative guidelines, dictating not only the applicable rules but also the manner, circumstances, and order in which the bench must interpret and apply them. It is suggested that Article 21 conceives of the judicial function as a mechanical and (crucially) manageable process in which the text of the statute is omniscient. However, while the textualism mandated by Article 21 is certainly to the fore in the Court's interpretative practice to date, it is nonetheless evident that it is not dogmatically adhered to, with the bench willing to exploit the chinks in Article 21's armour in order to pursue a creative interpretational approach (most typically in line with a teleological approach) when deemed necessary from a normative and policy perspective. In delineating the contours of the Court's practice with respect to Article 22, and in relation to the provision of strict construction under Article 22(2) in particular, it is suggested that while such a provision is entirely appropriate in the context of a penal statute, its application does not necessarily prohibit progressive interpretation in all circumstances.

In order to frame the parameters of the discussion of Articles 21 and 22's disciplining potential, the chapter begins in section 19.2 with a consideration of the potential negative impact of the Rome Conference's codification effort on the diverse applicable law available to the ICC bench, before looking at the import of Article 10 of the Rome Statute on the development of customary norms of international criminal law. In section 19.3 we embark on a detailed analysis of the manner in which applicable law has been identified by the ad hoc Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda and [13] L Grover, 'A Call to Arms: Fundamental Dilemmas Confronting the Interpretation of Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (2010) 21 European Journal of International Law 543; D Jacobs, 'Positivism and International Criminal Law: The Principle of Legality as a Rule of Conflict of Theories' in J d'Asprement and J Kammerhofer (eds), International Legal Positivism (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2014) 451–74 <http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=2046311> last accessed 18 August 2014.

the influence of Article 38 of the Statute of the ICJ on this process. In section 19.4 we turn from framing the discussion to a detailed exploration of the contours of Articles 21 and 22(2) and their potential corseting of the interpretative freedom of the bench. In so doing, the section considers issues surrounding the limits of textualism (with a specific focus in this respect on the bench's interpretation of Article 25(3)(a)), the institution of a hierarchy of sources, the role of internal and external precedent, and the overarching significance of international human rights law in providing space for progressive interpretation of the Rome Statute. Finally, in section 19.5 some conclusions are offered.

19.2 The Rome Statute as a Means of Codifying Judicial Interpretative Restraint

The codification of law is a necessary and important step in the maturation of any legal order. Legislative efforts in this area, to any observer with an interest in legal certainty and the general flourishing of the rule of law, are to be encouraged and widely supported. This rings especially true with respect to the codification of penal laws. On the eve of embarking on the epic task of drafting the Model Penal Code, its principal architect, Herbert Wechsler, reflected on the societal significance of such an undertaking:

> If penal law is weak or ineffective, basic human interests are in jeopardy. If it is harsh or arbitrary in its impact it works a gross injustice on those caught within its toils. The law that carries such responsibilities should surely be as rational and just as law can be. Nowhere in the entire legal field is more at stake for the community or for the individual.[14]

For Weschler, the absence of a codification effort was an indicator of 'neglect and inattention' of the legal order.[15] We might say that from an international legal perspective, the importance of the development of codified rules has not gone entirely unnoticed or unaddressed.[16] For instance, it is important not to forget the import of Article 13(1)(a) of the Charter of the United Nations bestowing on the General Assembly the responsibility of 'promoting international cooperation in the political field and encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification'.[17] Neither should we forget the fact that in giving substance to Article 13(1)(a), [14] H Wechsler, 'The Challenge of a Model Penal Code' (1952) 65 Harvard Law Review 1097, 1098. See also F Remington, 'The Future of the Substantive Criminal Law Codification Movement—Theoretical and Practical Concerns' (1987–8) 19 Rutgers Law Journal 867.

[15] Wechsler (n 14) 1100.

[16] See H Thirlway, International Customary Law and Codification: An Examination of the Continuing Role of Custom in the Present Period of Codification of International Law (Leiden: Brill 1972); R Jennings, 'The Progressive Development of International Law and its Codification' (1947) 24 British Yearbook of International Law 301; R Jennings, 'Judicial Legislation in International Law' (1937–8) 26 Kentucky Law Journal 112.

[17] Art 13(1)(a) Charter of the United Nations (signed 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 1 UNTS XVI (emphasis added).

the General Assembly saw fit to establish the ILC (the Commission), which since 1947 has been actively engaged in 'the promotion of the progressive development of international law and its codification'.[18] The codification of customary norms offers the prospect of 'legal clarity and certainty, systematization of the law, coherence, consistency and perhaps the reform of pre-existing deficient law'. But in general terms at least, what does codification necessarily mean? For instance, does it simply involve 'the writing down of already existing rules of law',[19] with little or no deviation from established practice?

Conveniently, Article 15 of the Statute of the Commission provides us with some guidance: ' "codification of international law" is used for convenience as meaning the more precise formulation and systematization of rules of international law in fields where there already has been extensive State practice, precedent and doctrine'.[20] For Hersch Lauterpacht, the codification of international rules was much more than the mere addition of form to substance, but rather was critical to the preservation of the international legal order itself. Writing in 1955, he remarked that:

> It is probably a fact that the absence of agreed rules partaking of a reasonable degree of certainty is a serious challenge to the legal nature of what goes by the name of international law. That circumstance alone supplies cogent proof of the justification, nay, of the urgency of the task of codification of international law. The matter is not merely one of elegantia juris and of a 'better expression of international law' in the sense that it evokes 'a somewhat vague and distant interest of States'. Clarity and certainty are not mere embellishments of the law. They are, particularly in the international sphere, of its essence. Within the state obscurity and uncertainty of the law are a drawback (…) [T]he uncertainties, gaps, and obscurities of the law are not merely perpetuated. They feed and grow on their own evil inasmuch as they are kept alive and magnified by the conflicting and extreme assertions of the parties to disputes. The call for codification is therefore not the product of legal perfectionism. It is an imperative need of international society, and it is only on account of more pressing problems assailing its very existence that the consciousness of the urgency of codification has been relegated into the background.[21]

In the international legal context, codification necessarily implies the enumeration of accepted customary norms via the conclusion of a treaty text. Consequently, the fruits of any codification effort will be subject to the will and consensual agreement of states; '[t]hus, every codification of international law involves an element of innovation, meaning the difference between codification of custom and progressive

[18] UNGA Res 174(II) (21 November 1947) UN Doc A/RES/174(II).

[19] Jennings, 'The Progressive Development of International Law and its Codification' (n 16). See also K Wolfke, 'Can Codification of International Law be Harmful?' in J Makarczyk (ed.), Essays in International Law in Honour of Judge Manfred Lachs (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff 1984).

[20] Art 15 Statute of the ILC (adopted by the General Assembly in Resolution 174(II) of 21 November 1947, as amended by Resolutions 485(V) of 12 December 1950, 984(X) of 3 December 1955, and 36/39 of 18 November 1981); see also Arts 18–24.

[21] H Lauterpacht, 'Codification and Development of International Law' (1955) 49 American Journal of International Law 16, 20 (internal citations omitted). See also W Friedmann, 'The United Nations and the Development of International Law' (1969–70) 25 International Journal 272.

development of the law is a matter of degree'.[22] In essence, should the reformatory effects of the presumed codifying effort overwhelm the acknowledged elements of the customary rule 'it becomes misleading to describe the process as one of codification at all'.[23] However, it is rare that a treaty will be entirely declaratory of custom, and it is more likely that it will include both codified and reformatory or developmental provisions.[24]

While Lauterpacht's comment attaches in a general sense to the international legal order, it applies with particular resonance to the codification of rules of international criminal law. A narrow, rather simplistic analysis might suggest that the verve with which the international community undertook the task of codifying aspects of substantive international criminal law only really gathered momentum during the complex and often fraught negotiations at Rome. There is undoubtedly some truth to this contention; however, it ignores the codification efforts undertaken in the immediate aftermath of the Nuremberg process and the sporadic and often incomplete activities of the Commission during the period spanning 1947–98.[25]

Amongst the principal objectives of the United Nations in the aftermath of the Nuremberg judgment was the prioritization of building on the rather creative argument that the London Charter, far from being contrary to the principle of legality, was expressive of international law existing at the time of its creation.[26] In this respect, we should bear in mind a number of seminal resolutions of the General Assembly, most obviously, Resolution 95(I) of 11 December 1946, which, in affirming 'the principles of international law recognized by the Charter of the Nurnberg Tribunal and the judgment of the Tribunal', instructed the antecedent of the Commission, the Committee on the Progressive Development of International Law and its Codification, to 'treat as a matter of primary importance plans for the formulation, in the context of a general codification of offences against the peace and security of mankind, or of an International Criminal code, of the principles recognized in the Charter of the Nurnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal'.[27] With the adoption of General Assembly Resolution 177(II) in 1947, responsibility for this undertaking was entrusted to the newly established Commission. Indeed, General Assembly

[22] Grover (n 13) 565.

[23] J Brierly, 'The Future of Codification' (1931) 12 British Yearbook of International Law 1, 3—quoted in M Villiger, Customary International Law and Treaties (The Hague: Brill 1985) 126.

[24] Grover (n 13) 566.

[25] See generally, M C Bassiouni, 'Historical Survey: 1919–1998' in M C Bassiouni (ed.), The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (New York: Transnational Publishers 1999); M C Bassiouni, 'From Versailles to Rwanda in Seventy-Five Years: The Need to Establish a Permanent International Criminal Court' (1997) 10 Harvard Human Rights Journal 11; M C Bassiouni, 'The International Criminal Court in Historical Context' (1999) Saint Louis-Warsaw Transatlantic Law Journal 55; M C Bassiouni, 'The Need for an International Criminal Court in the New International World Order' (1992) 25 Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law 151; J Armstead, 'The International Criminal Court: History, Development and Status' (1998) 38 Santa Clara Law Review 745; H Jescheck, 'The Development of International Criminal Law after Nuremberg' in G Mettraux (ed.), Perspectives on the Nuremberg Trial (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2009).

[26] Trials of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg, 14 November 1945–1 October 1946, vol. 1, Judgment (International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg 1947–9), reprinted in (1947) 41 American Journal of International Law 172, 216 ('IMT Judgment').

[27] UNGA Res 94(I) (11 December 1946) UN Doc A/RES/94(I).

Resolution 260(B)(III) of 1948 instructed the Commission to go a step further and 'study the desirability and possibility of establishing an international judicial organ for the trial of persons charged with genocide or other crimes over which jurisdiction will be conferred upon that organ by international conventions'.[28] Simply stated, the necessity of codifying the jurisprudential legacy of the Nuremberg process was not ignored in the immediate aftermath of its conclusion; in fact, it was seen as essential in reifying the concept of international criminal justice against accusations of illegality and Victor's justice, giving substance to the mantra that 'law which is not backed by sanctions quickly loses its credibility'.[29]

With the affirmation by the General Assembly of the principles contained in and derived from the Nuremberg process, it was felt that the substantive law of the Tribunal—most particularly that relative to individual criminal responsibility—was now beyond reproach in terms of its customary status. However, the fact that the principles were merely affirmed and not formally adopted by the General Assembly[30] is perhaps indicative of the unwillingness of states to move from ex post facto acknowledgement of the principles of law unpinning the London Charter, to prospective acceptance of rules of general, binding applicability. This conclusion is supported by the ultimate fate of the Commission's efforts to draw up a Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, a process set in motion in 1947,[31] stalled in 1954,[32] resumed in 1981,[33] and ultimately concluded in 1996 with the submission of an unadopted draft Code.[34] It is perhaps a little unfair to criticize the Commission for its efforts, especially when we recall its conception of codification as being based on 'extensive State practice, precedent and doctrine'.[35] These basic ingredients simply were not in existence at the time of the Commission's original undertaking and the geopolitical climate was, to put it kindly, not exactly accommodating of or receptive to its efforts. Such a conclusion necessarily sets to one side the related, regular multilateral instruments concluded in the decade following the conclusion of the Nuremberg process, the most obvious being the Genocide Convention of 1948,[36] the Geneva Conventions of 1949,[37] and the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees

[28] UNGA Res 260(B)(III) (9 December 1948) UN Doc A/RES/260(B)(III).

[29] J Kellenberger, 'Foreword' in K Dörmann et al., Elements of War Crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2003) ix.

[30] UNGA Res 455(V) (12 December 1950) UN Doc A/RES/455(V) merely invited 'the governments of Member States to furnish their observations' on the principles codified by the Commission.

[31] UNGA Res 177(II) (21 November 1947) UN Doc A/RES/177(II).

[32] UNGA Res 897 (IX) (4 December 1954) UN Doc A/RES/897(IX).

[33] UNGA Res 36/106 (10 December 1981) UN Doc A/RES/36/106.

[34] See 1996 Yearbook of the International Law Commission, vol. II.

[35] Art 15 Statute of the ILC (n 20).

[36] Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (signed 9 December 1948, entered into force 12 January 1951) 78 UNTS 277.

[37] Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field (First Geneva Convention) (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 31; Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick, and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea (Second Geneva Convention) (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 85; Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 85; Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (Fourth Geneva Convention) (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 287.

of 1951.[38] These instruments, while of great value and import, did not provide any meaningful movement in the direction of formalizing a permanent institutional forum for the adjudication of individual criminal responsibility. In terms of tangible outcomes, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the immediate effort to codify the substantive legal legacy of Nuremberg can only be viewed as being partially successful.

The limited success of the post-Nuremberg codification project can be contrasted with that of the Rome Conference. While the impetus behind the effort to establish a permanent international criminal court had been reignited in 1989, it was only really with the establishment of the ad hoc Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda in 1993 and 1994 respectively that significant inroads were made towards meaningful, binding codification of international criminal rules. On one level, the 1998 Rome Conference can be viewed as a concerted effort to reaffirm, but also crucially to codify, the Nuremberg principles in the light of the now existent state practice, precedent, and doctrine brought about by the activities of the ad hoc Tribunals.[39] On another level, it is perhaps more persuasive to argue that far from being the primary objective of the drafters, the codification of elements of substantive international criminal law, afforded customary status by the ad hoc Tribunals, was merely a positive by-product of the Rome project. As argued by Leena Grover, it is possible to infer from the drafting history that States Parties intended 'to draft definitions of crimes in the Rome Statute which would mirror existing custom and crystallize emerging custom to the greatest extent possible, while recognizing the need to build consensus with a view to promoting universal ratification'.[40]

While it is hardly surprising that by enumerating positive rules pertaining to individual criminal responsibility the Rome Statute should be viewed as a radical embodiment of the post-Westphalian legal order, it should be noted that at no point does the Statute claim the status of an international criminal code. It is fair to say that while a large percentage of the definitions of the subject-matter jurisdiction (Articles 6, 7, and 8) are generally consistent with customary standards, there are some notable deviations from custom, thereby supporting Philippe Kirsch's contention that 'the definitions of crimes in the ICC Statute were to reflect existing customary international law, and not create new law', but the end result 'contain[s] uneasy technical solutions, awkward formulations, [and] difficult compromises that fully satisfied no one'.[41] As the inclusion of Article 10 makes clear, it was the understanding of States Parties that the inclusion of certain norms in the Rome Statute does not prejudice the continued

[38] Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (signed 18 July 1951, entered into force 22 April 1954) 189 UNTS 137.

[39] See Bassiouni, 'From Versailles to Rwanda in Seventy-Five Years' (n 25).

[40] Grover (n 13) 567.

[41] P Kirsch, 'Customary International Humanitarian Law, its Enforcement, and the Role of the International Criminal Court' in L Maybee and B Chakka (eds), Custom as a Source of International Humanitarian Law: Proceedings of the Conference to Mark the Publication of the ICRC Study 'Customary International Humanitarian Law' (Geneva: International Committee of the Red Cross 2006) 79–80. See also R Cryer, 'Of Custom, Treaties, Scholars and the Gavel: The Influence of International Tribunals on the ICRC Customary Law Study' (2006) 11 Journal of Conflict and Security Law 239.

development of international criminal norms in the practice of other domestic and international fora.[42] This appears to acknowledge or indeed mandate that customary norms of international criminal law may very well continue to develop outside of the context of the Rome Statute, but such developments may not necessarily be directly applicable before the Court. In this respect, Kriangsak Kittichaisaree has remarked that Article 10 'was intended to emphasize that the inclusion or non-inclusion in the ICC Statute of certain norms would not prejudice the positions of states on the customary law status of such norms, would not prejudice existing norms or further developments of international law, and would not authorize the ICC to apply existing or new norms omitted deliberately in the ICC Statute'.[43]

Therefore, unlike the ad hoc Tribunals, customary international law is not considered a direct, primary source of law at the ICC. In this regard, Grover comments that, 'there was perhaps a fear that if custom were recognized as the direct source of law for the Court's jurisdiction, the perceived creativity of ICTY and ICTR judges might repeat itself with judges of the Court'.[44] The likely impact of Article 10 on the continued progressive development of international criminal law can be viewed in both positive and negative terms.[45] On the one hand, it acknowledges that the Rome Statute is not determinative of the entire international criminal legal order and that rules will continue to develop in accordance with the needs and wishes of the international community; however, in so doing, it implies that such developments will not be automatically applicable before the Court unless a pre-existing basis is found in the primary internal law of the Statute to which customary international law can act merely as an interpretational aid. In short, the bench is to interpret and directly apply the text of the Rome Statute, not emerging or crystallizing norms of customary international law. It is clear, therefore, that, like codification, the prospect of the significant fragmentation of the international criminal order was not something of genuine concern to the drafters. Their aim, it would appear, was to create a self-contained regime.[46]

The import of the foregoing analysis is that while it is tempting to declare the codifying effect of the Rome Statute, this has only a partial basis in reality. The lengths to which the drafters went in defining the constituent law was not indicative of a precise codification effort but rather an attempt to lend certainty, predictability, and formality to the substantive law of the Court via consensual rule drafting. The object of this chapter is to consider whether or not, in their efforts to lend certainty and predictability to the law, the drafters of the Rome Statute in fact went too far. To put it more provocatively, the chapter will assess whether rigid positivism and quasi-formalist

[42] Art 10 Rome Statute: 'Nothing in this Part shall be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute.'

[43] K Kittichaisaree, International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2001) 52.

[44] Grover (n 13) 571. See also W Schabas, 'Customary Law or "Judge-Made" Law: Judicial Creativity at the UN Criminal Tribunals' in J Doria et al., The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court: Essays in Honour of Professor Igor Blishchenko (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009).

[45] See L Wexler Sadat, 'Custom, Codification and Some Thoughts About the Relationship between the Two: Article 10 of the ICC Statute' (1999) 49 De Paul Law Review 909.

[46] R Cryer, 'Royalism and the King: Article 21 of the Rome Statute and the Politics of Sources' (2009) 12 New Criminal Law Review 390, 394.

conceptions of law are prioritized over any real appreciation or desire for the continued progressive development of the law via creative judicial interpretation.

The basis for such an accusation lies most obviously in the punctilious drafting of the entire document; so punctilious in fact, that it has invited accusations to the effect that it represents a fundamental mistrust in the competence and independence of the judiciary tasked with its interpretation and application.[47] When looking at the provisions addressing the Court's subject-matter jurisdiction, it is clear even to the lay reader why such inferences can be (and very often are) drawn. Take Article 8's treatment of war crimes as a natural, if slightly jaded, example, although it could attach with equal validity to the Statute's treatment of genocide under Article 6 and crimes against humanity under Article 7. Here the Rome Statute defines in 1,594 words what the constitutive statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals took 239 words to define and what the London Charter dispensed with in only 73 words.[48] This tally refers only to the wording of Article 8 in the Statute itself and does not take into account the Elements of Crimes document, prepared by the Preparatory Commission, with the express aim of providing the 'judges with an additional instrument which might help them with their interpretation of the definitions of crimes contained in the Statute'.[49] Whereas in the context of the ad hoc Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda there is a logical tendency to reflect on the 'undernourished'[50] state of their constituent statutes and the creative onus this placed on the judiciary, in the context of the Rome Statute we are very much dealing with an acute case of legislative obesity. Where the ad hoc Tribunal statutes allowed for and placed faith in the exercise of the creative interpretative judicial function, the Rome Statute appears, at least on the face of it, to encourage judicial sedentariness in the mechanical interpretation and application of rules.[51]

19.3 Identifying the Applicable Law—From Nuremberg to the Ad Hoc Tribunals

That a treaty establishing an international court should include a provision on the applicable law is hardly unusual; indeed, as Alain Pellet has said, such efforts are 'as old (or as recent!) as that of creating such courts themselves'.[52] However, in an international criminal context, Article 21 is truly enigmatic, with only the vaguest genealogical connections

[47] D Hunt, 'The International Criminal Court: High Hopes, "Creative Ambiguity" and an Unfortunate Mistrust in International Judges' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 56. See also A Cassese, 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections' (1999) 10 European Journal of International Law 144, 163.

[48] A point well made by W Schabas, in W Schabas, 'Follow-Up to Rome: Preparing for Entry into Force of the International Criminal Court Statute' (1999) 20 Human Rights Law Journal 157, 163.

[49] Kellenberger, 'Foreword' in Dörmann et al. (n 29) x.

[50] See J Powderly, 'Judicial Interpretation at the Ad Hoc Tribunals: Method from Chaos?' in Darcy and Powderly (n 4) 17.

[51] See P Kirsch and V Oosterveld, 'The Post-Rome Conference Preparatory Commission in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 97: '[A] majority of delegations expressed concern about imposing upon the judges a "checklist" approach to deciding cases.'

[52] A Pellet, 'Applicable Law' in Cassese et al. (n 51) 1051.

with the antecedent statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals or the London Charter, which contain no equivalent provision. As noted by Robert Jackson, in drafting the London Charter, 'substantive law could be gleaned from scattered sources', but 'there was no codification of applicable law'.[53] Looking at Article 6's enunciation of the IMT's subject-matter jurisdiction, we encounter some oblique references in paragraph (a) to 'war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances',[54] and in paragraph (b) to 'violations of the laws or customs of war', but nothing further.[55] In the judgment itself, the closest we come to a statement on the applicable law involves a restatement of the subject-matter jurisdiction followed by the bald determination that '[t]hese provisions are binding upon the Tribunal as the law to be applied to the case'.[56]

In the context of the Yugoslav and Rwanda Tribunals, the most fruitful expression of the applicable law is perhaps unsurprisingly to be found not in the Statute, but rather in the interpretative commentaries/reports of the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General merely provided with respect to the Yugoslav Tribunal that it 'should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law so that the problem of adherence of some but not all States to specific conventions does not arise'.[57] The Report provides further that domestic criminal law is relevant only in consideration of sentence.[58] In terms of the Rwanda Tribunal, the Secretary-General's remarks are similar but allow for greater flexibility, especially with respect to the applicability of Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, stating that in drafting the Statute, the Security Council

> …elected to take a more expansive approach to the choice of applicable law than the one underlying the statute of the Yugoslav Tribunal, and included within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Rwanda Tribunal international instruments regardless of whether they were considered part of customary international law or whether they have customarily entailed the individual criminal responsibility of the perpetrator of the crime.[59]

This constituted the barest semblance of interpretative guidance and was of questionable binding authority.[60]

In essence, the Secretary-General merely provided that the Statutes were to be interpreted in the light of norms of customary international law and a non-exhaustive list

[53] R Jackson, 'Nuremberg in Retrospect: Legal Answers to International Lawlessness' (1949) 25 American Bar Association Journal 813.

[54] Art 6(a) Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals of the European Axis, and Charter of the International Military Tribunal, London, 8 August 1945 in Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg, 15 November 1945–1 October 1946 Vol. 1 (International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg 1947–9) ('Statute of the IMT').

[55] Ibid., Art 6(b). [56] IMT Judgment (n 26) 175.

[57] Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), UN Doc S/25704 (3 May 1993) para. 34.

[58] Ibid., para. 35.

[59] Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 5 of Security Council Resolution 955 (1994), UN Doc S/1995/134 (13 February 1995) para. 12.

[60] The Report of the Secretary-General has been identified as providing for a general interpretative methodology. See Judgment, Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16-T, TC, ICTY, 14 January 2000, fn. 797 ('Kupreškić Trial Judgment').

of conventional instruments.[61] A significant responsibility was therefore vested in the bench to determine the applicable law. Judge Mohamed Shahabuddeen would seem to reject any accusation of ambiguity, implying instead that the Secretary-General's statements provided sufficient legal certainty and guidance to the bench, stating that '[s]ince the criminal law was involved, it was important that there should not be the least doubt about what laws were applicable'.[62] There was certainly little doubt, at least in his mind, as to the proper invocation of second-order applicable rules:

> In effect, giving to the texts a fair meaning, the Tribunal has to apply customary international law. The Tribunal must be able to trace the origins of any law which it applies to customary international law; otherwise, it is applying an unauthorized source of law. The Tribunal is not therefore to apply a treaty which has not matured into customary law.[63]

We know that the laconic nature of the ad hoc Statutes coupled with the free rein of the bench in the identification of the applicable law, particularly customary international law, accounts in no small way for the flourishing of the judicial role in the progressive development of international criminal law.[64] In the absence of an express provision detailing the applicable law, the judicial function at the ad hoc Tribunals undoubtedly involved not only the interpretation and application of the constituent statutes, but also the discovery, or rather excavation, of additional applicable rules to be invoked when confronting lacunae or textual ambiguities.[65] However, the extent of such freedom carries an additional burden, in terms of the establishment of decisional legitimacy and the pre-empting of accusations of judicial arbitrariness.[66] Commenting on this point, William Schabas has remarked that '[i]t does not appear obvious that the judges of the ad hoc Tribunals are even entitled to go beyond their statutes for sources of applicable law, given the silence of the statutes in this respect'.[67] The absence of an express provision detailing the applicable law will naturally encourage certain quarters of the interpretative community to proclaim that the spectre of judicial activism is in our midst.

It is fair to say that Shahabuddeen's apparent confidence in the clarity and completeness of the Secretary-General's guidance was not shared by all of his colleagues on the bench, resulting in the invocation of some creative, but also some analogous, reasoning. A kindred spirit, however, was to be found in the form of the late Antonio Cassese, who in his sibylline dissenting opinion in the Erdemović Sentencing Appeals [61] Report of the Secretary-General, 3 May 1993 (n 57) para. 34.

[62] Shahabuddeen (n 4) 52. [63] Ibid.
[64] See Powderly, 'Judicial Interpretation at the Ad Hoc Tribunals: Method from Chaos?' (n 50).
[65] See B Schlütter, Developments in Customary International Law: Theory and the Practice of the International Court of Justice and the International Ad Hoc Criminal Tribunals for Rwanda and Yugoslavia (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2010).
[66] See J Powderly, 'Distinguishing Creativity from Activism: International Criminal Law and the "Legitimacy" of Judicial Development of the Law' in W Schabas et al., The Ashgate Research Companion to International Criminal Law: Critical Perspectives (Farnham, Surrey: Ashgate 2013).
[67] W Schabas, The United Nations International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Sierra Leone (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007) 93.

Judgment invoked a teleological approach in reasoning that the identification of applicable rules must be determined, 'by virtue of a contemplation of the unique object and purpose of an international criminal court, and the constraints to which such a court is subject'.[68] For Cassese, the parameters of the applicable law were clearly set out:

> This International Tribunal is called upon to apply international law, in particular our Statute and principles and rules of international humanitarian law and international criminal law. Our International Tribunal is a court of law; it is bound only by international law. It should therefore refrain from engaging in meta-legal analysis. In addition, it should refrain from relying exclusively on notions, policy considerations or the philosophical underpinnings of common-law countries, while disregarding those of civil-law countries or other systems of law. What is even more important, a policy-oriented approach in the area of criminal law runs contrary to the fundamental customary principle nullum crimen sine lege. On the strength of international principles and rules my conclusions . . . differ widely from those of the majority of the Appeals Chamber.[69]

Such reasoning provides little in the way of a judicial roadmap for the identification of positive applicable rules beyond the confines of individual reasoning. The relatively meagre guidance provided by both the Secretary-General and the Statute was highlighted in the early stages of the Tadić case (with particular relevance to the question of the persuasive value of extant jurisprudence from related international courts and tribunals):

> The Report of the Secretary-General gives little guidance regarding the applicable sources of law in construing and applying the Statute and Rules of the International Tribunal. Although the Report of the Secretary-General states that many of the provisions in the Statute are formulations based upon provisions found in existing international instruments, it does not indicate the relevance of the interpretation given to these provisions by other international judicial bodies. This lack of guidance is particularly troubling because of the unique character of the International Tribunal.[70]

This comment from the Trial Chamber reveals an appreciable sense of judicial frustration that a clear provision on the applicable law was not included in the Statute given the infancy of the international criminal legal order and the questionable value, or indeed persuasive legitimacy, of existing relevant jurisprudence. The Trial Chamber made its concerns plain:

> It is the first international criminal tribunal ever to be established by the United Nations. Its only recent predecessors, the International Military Tribunals at [68] Sentencing Appeals Judgment—Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Cassese, Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, AC, ICTY, 7 October 1997, para. 10.

[69] Ibid., para. 11(ii).

[70] Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion Requesting Protective Measures for Victims and Witnesses, Tadić (n 12) para. 19. Para. 17: 'A fundamental issue raised by this motion is whether, in interpreting and applying the Statute and Rules of the International Tribunal, the Trial Chamber is bound by interpretations of other international judicial bodies or whether it is at liberty to adapt those rulings to its own context.'

> Nuremberg and Tokyo, were created in very different circumstances and were based on moral and judicial principles of a fundamentally different nature. In addition, the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals were multinational but not international in the strict sense as only the victors were represented. By contrast, the International Tribunal is not the organ of a group of States; it is an organ of the whole international community.[71]

It is perhaps unsurprising, therefore, that refuge was sought by more positively inclined members of the bench in the seminal provisions of Article 38(1) of the Statute of the ICJ. By way of reminder, Article 38(1) provides as follows:

> Article 38(1). The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply:
>
> International conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting states;
>
> International custom, as evidence of a general principle accepted as law;
>
> The general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;
>
> Subject to the provisions of Article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.[72]

Following on from Cassese's comments, in their joint separate opinion in Erdemović, Judges Gabriel Kirk McDonald and Lal Chand Vohrah relied on Article 38 as enumerating an exhaustive list of the sources of international law.[73] Adopting it as their reasoning template, they then proceeded to apply it systematically in their efforts to determine whether or not there existed a rule or general principle of law allowing for duress to be invoked as a defence to charges of crimes against humanity or war crimes.[74] While proclaiming the exhaustiveness of Article 38[75] is something of an overstatement, it is clear that, before the ad hoc Tribunals, Article 38 was considered an unwritten provision of the constituent statutes.[76] Indeed, on occasion it has been determined that it 'must be regarded as declaratory of customary international law'.[77] This seems a rather peculiar determination; quite how Article 38 could be considered a norm of customary international law, given its exclusive presence in the Statute of the ICJ and the potential consequences of applying such a label, is lost somewhat on the present author.

[71] Ibid., para. 19

[72] Art 38(1) Statute of the ICJ (adopted 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 33 UNTS 933 ('ICJ Statute').

[73] Sentencing Appeals Judgment—Joint Separate Opinion of Judge McDonald and Judge Vohrah, Erdemović, IT-96-22-A, AC, ICTY, 7 October 1997, para. 40: 'The sources of international law are generally considered to be exhaustively listed in Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.'

[74] Ibid., para. 39.

[75] A sentiment shared by Judge David Hunt, see Appeal Judgment—Declaration of Judge David Hunt, Alexsovski, IT-95-14/1-A, AC, ICTY, 24 March 2000, fn 364: 'Article 38 is generally regarded as a complete statement of the sources of international law.'

[76] See Schabas (n 67) 93.

[77] Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 60) para. 540.

It is certainly reasonable to argue that the sources of law provided for under paragraphs (a) to (d) are the accepted sources of international law, but this does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that that which constitutes the applicable law before the ICJ is of general applicability to all international courts and tribunals. This could potentially lead to the absurd situation where a constituent statute of an international court or tribunal that expressly excludes a source of law provided for under Article 38 could be declared contrary to customary international law. The situation is not helped by rather simplistic doctrinal statements such as 'the source of law in international criminal proceedings is not the national criminal law of any State, but the law emanating from the sources of law listed in Article 38(1)'.[78] Of course, the rationale for declaring the customary nature of Article 38 most likely lies in a desire to justify analogous reasoning. After all, Article 38 is one of the most recognizable provisions of the Statute of the ICJ, even if, as Pellet posits, '[i]t can be seen as a superfluous and useless clause, at best a clumsy and outmoded attempt to define international law, at worst a corset paralyzing the world's highest judicial body'.[79]

Its invocation can often adopt a syllogistic tone, as illustrated in the Mucić Trial Judgment:

> It is obvious that the subject matter jurisdiction of the Tribunal is constituted by provisions of international law. It follows, therefore, that recourse would be had to the various sources of international law as listed in Article 38 of the Statute of the ICJ, namely international conventions, custom, and general principles of law, as well as other subsidiary sources such as decisions and the writings of jurists.[80]

The constituent statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals are founded on principles of international law, the sources of international law are provided for in Article 38 of the Statute of the ICJ, hence Article 38 is applicable before the ad hoc Tribunals. There is a tendency here to treat Article 38 as a 'kind of revealed truth rigidly defining the frontiers of international law and even the Court's function'.[81] Indeed, there is even an argument to be made that such a provision is entirely unnecessary, since as Pellet remarks, 'it does no more than state the obvious and, most probably, had Article 38 not existed, the Court itself would have in any event complied with its requirements'.[82]

It seems obvious that the true value of Article 38 is to be found not in the content or revelatory character of its provisions, but simply on account of its existence as a positive rule of international law. It ascribes no particular hierarchy of sources (paragraph (d) excepted), nor does it provide for any particular interpretative methodology. Its primary virtue is that, 'it probably points to a rather fortunate midpoint between a mechanical application of the rules of law … and the dangers of the "gouvernement de juges" '.[83] It provides a formalist element in confronting statutory lacunae which is [78] V Degan, 'On the Sources of International Criminal Law' (2005) 4 Chinese Journal of International Law 45, 50.

[79] A Pellet, 'Article 38' in A Zimmermann et al. (eds), The Statute of the International Court of Justice: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2006) 680.

[80] Judgment, Mucić et al., IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 16 November 1998, para. 414.

[81] Pellet, 'Article 38' (n 79) 680. [82] Ibid. [83] Ibid.

of persuasive value to the interpretative community, but its impact beyond this point is minimal. Much like the invocation of the general rule of interpretation found in Article 31 of the VCLT, it acts as a positivistic limb upon which individual reasoning can rest, insulating the bench from accusations of arbitrariness, judge-made law, and violations of the principle of legality. As Pellet remarked, the fluidity of Article 38 (in the sense that it omits reference to a specific hierarchy or interpretational method) is such that, were it to cease to exist, this would not greatly curtail the capacity of the bench to exercise their judicial function.[84] It goes without saying that inherent in the judicial function is responsibility for the identification of applicable rules necessary for the administration of justice.

This discussion of the manner in which the ad hoc Tribunals have dealt with the absence of a statutory provision dedicated to the exposition of the applicable law only serves to further illuminate the enigmatic and prescriptive character of Articles 21 and 22 of the Rome Statute, which, it is argued, do not seek to facilitate the exercise of the judicial function in the tradition of Article 38, but rather, to closely manage it.

19.4 Articles 21 and 22(2) of the Rome Statute: A Deliberate Effort to Restrict the Creative Capacity of the Bench?

19.4.1 Article 21(1) and (2)—the chaperoning of the judicial function and the prioritization of textual interpretation

Article 21 is truly unique and certainly one of the most idiosyncratic provisions of the Rome Statute. It is intriguing for a number of distinguishable reasons: its very existence, the specificity of its content, the series of hierarchies it imposes, and the constraints it appears to at least attempt to place on the creative interpretational capacity of the bench.[85] Before proceeding further, let us remind ourselves of what precisely Article 21 provides for:

> Article 21
>
> (1) The Court shall apply:
>
> In the first place, this Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence;
>
> In the second place, where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict;
>
> Failing that, general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards.

[84] Ibid.

[85] See G Bitti, 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Treatment of Sources of Law in the Jurisprudence of the ICC' in G Sluiter and C Stahn (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Brill 2009) 286. Bitti claims Article 21 is interesting for three reasons; in omitting its impact on the judicial function he has in this author's opinion failed to highlight perhaps its most important feature. See also Bitti, Chapter 18, this volume.

(2) The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions.

(3) The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3, age, race, colour, language, religion, or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status.[86]

A plain reading of the provision indicates a series of hierarchies distinguishing, with some precision, between the various 'internal' and 'external' sources of applicable law. As Pellet has remarked, '[i]t gives the judges apparently clear instructions concerning the application of the different sources of applicable law it enumerates: the Statute occupies the summit of the hierarchy it creates and the other sources are placed in hierarchical relationships that appear both relatively simple and logical'.[87] The clear distinction between the 'internal' or 'proper' law of the Court (Article 21(1)(a)) and the 'external' sources of law (Article 21(1)(b)–(c) and 21(3)) is to be expected and is certainly a welcome addition.

Looking first at the internal or proper sources of law, namely the Statute, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, and the Elements of Crimes, it is worth noting the absence of any mention of the Regulations of the Court, the Regulations of the Registry, the Code of Professional Conduct for counsel, or the Regulation of the Trust Fund for Victims, all of which play essential roles in the jurisprudence of the Court, some of which are expressly referred to in both the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[88] These internal instruments take their place at the foot of the hierarchical order and are to be 'read subject to the Statute and the Rules'.[89] When these are taken into consideration, the internal law of the Court can be described as 'a beautiful pyramid, composed of at least four different layers which represent a sum of 702 articles, rules and regulations'.[90] Naturally, the Statute sits atop this pyramid absorbing the subordinate sources of law below; the inclusion of the phrase '[i]n the first place' in Article 21(1)(a) puts this well and truly beyond question. If any clarification were needed with respect to the hierarchy of internal law, Article 51(5) provides that 'the Rules of Procedure and Evidence are an instrument for the application of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, to which they are subordinate in all cases',[91] whereas the Elements of [86] Art 21 Rome Statute. [87] Pellet, 'Applicable Law' (n 52) 1077.

[88] See e.g. Art 52 Rome Statute.

[89] Regulation 1 Regulations of the Court, adopted by the Judges of the ICC on 26 May 2004 in accordance with Art 52 of the Rome Statute, and as amended on 14 June and 14 November 2007, ICC-BD/01-02-07. A similar provision is to be found in Regulation 1 of the Regulations of the Registry, stating that they are essentially at the base of the hierarchy: 'These Regulations… shall be read subject to the Statute, the Rules and the Regulations of the Court.' See also Decision on the Prosecutor's 'Application for Leave to Reply to "Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d'appel du Procureur"', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-424, AC, ICC, 12 September 2006, para. 4.

[90] Bitti (n 85) 291.

[91] Art 51(5) Rome Statute. See also Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-101-tEN-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 17 January 2006, para. 47—'[T]he Chamber must point out that, pursuant to article 51, paragraph 5 of the Statute, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence is an

Crimes document is intended merely to 'assist the Court in the interpretation and application of articles 6, 7 and 8, consistent with the Statute'.[92]

So far, so uncontroversial you might say. The jurisprudence to date clearly illustrates that the bench has had few difficulties applying this logical hierarchy, with one of the first decisions of the Appeals Chamber in the Lubanga case affirming the obvious textual structure of the provision:

> Article 21(1) of the Statute provides that the Court must apply firstly the Statute, Rules of Procedure and Evidence and Elements of Crimes, secondly applicable treaties and principles and rules of international law and thirdly '[f]ailing that, general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international and internationally recognized norms and standards'.[93]

In invoking Article 21, the bench has frequently emphasized that while the general rules of treaty interpretation enshrined in Articles 31 and 32 of the VCLT apply, they ordinarily will only be directly invoked following an inconclusive textual or plain meaning analysis.[94] For example, in the Lubanga Trial Judgment, the Chamber was tasked with determining the elements of the war crime of the conscription, enlistment, and use of children under the age of 15 pursuant to Article 8(2)(e)(vii). In interpreting the contextual element of the offence as provided for in the Statute and the Elements of Crimes, the Chamber was of the opinion that adopting the plain meaning of the provision clearly determined that 'it was sufficient to show that there was a instrument that is subordinate to the Statute. It follows that a provision of the Rules cannot be interpreted in such a way as to narrow the scope of an article of the Statute.'

[92] Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3(part II-B), 9 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP) 'General introduction', para. 1. See also Art 9(1) Rome Statute.

[93] See Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-168, AC, ICC, 13 July 2006, para. 23; see also Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, para. 69; Decision on the Prosecution Motion for Reconsideration, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-123, PTC I, ICC, 23 May 2006, 3; Decision on the Prosecution Motion for Reconsideration and, in the Alternative, Leave to Appeal, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-166, PTC I, ICC, 23 June 2006, para. 9; Decision on the Practice of Witness Familiarization and Witness Proofing, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-679, PTC I, ICC, 8 November 2006, paras 7–10; Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1049, PTC I, ICC, 11 June 2007, paras 5 and 44; Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II to Redact Factual Descriptions of Crimes from the Warrants of Arrest, Motion for Reconsideration and Motions for Clarification, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-60, PTC II, ICC, 28 October 2005, para. 19; Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, para. 508: '[U]nder article 21(1)(a) of the Statute, the first source of applicable law is the Statute. Principles and rules of international law constitute a secondary source applicable only when the statutory material fails to prescribe a legal solution.'

[94] See e.g. Decision Adjourning the Hearing Pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Rome Statute, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-388, PTC II, ICC, 3 March 2009, paras 21, 30, and 31; Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, connection between the conscription, enlistment or use of children under 15 and an armed conflict that was not international in character'.[95]

Satisfied that such a textual analysis was sufficiently determinate, the Chamber concluded that it was unnecessary to discuss the interpretation of this element in any greater detail.[96] Turning to the interpretation of the constituent acts, namely, conscripting or enlisting of children under the age of 15 or using them to actively participate in hostilities, the Chamber acknowledged that 'in each instance the conduct is not defined in the Statute, the Rules or the Elements of Crimes',[97] and therefore attempted a more holistic interpretative approach purportedly in line with the Vienna Convention rules. Quoting the Appeals Chamber on this point, the Trial Judgment elaborated that:

> The rule governing the interpretation of a section of the law is its wording read in context and in light of its object and purpose. The context of a given legislative provision is defined by the particular sub-section of the law read as a whole in conjunction with the section of an enactment in its entirety. Its objects may be gathered from the chapter of the law in which the particular section is included and its purposes from the wider aims of the law as may be gathered from its preamble and general tenor of the treaty.[98]

In the reasoning that followed, the Trial Chamber noted the relevance of the jurisprudence of the SCSL with respect to the offence; however, it cautioned that:

> Although the decisions of other international courts and tribunals are not part of the directly applicable law under Article 21 of the Statute, the wording of the provision

ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 361; Decision on the Final System of Disclosure and the Establishment of a Timetable, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-102, PTC I, ICC, 15 May 2006, para. 1; Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Décision sur la demande de mise en líberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-824, AC, ICC, 13 February 2007, para. 15; Judgment on the Appeals of the Prosecutor and the Defence against Trial Chamber I's Decision on Victims' Participation of 18 January 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1432, AC, ICC, 11 July 2008, para. 54; Decision on the Joinder of the Cases against Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-257, PTC I, ICC, 10 March 2008, at 7; Decision on Application for Leave to Appeal by the Defence of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui against the Decision on Joinder, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-384, PTC I, ICC, 9 April 2008, at 6; Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Statements of Witnesses 4 and 9', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-521, AC, ICC, 27 May 2008, para. 16; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Art 58, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-20-Anx2, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006, para. 43; Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-19, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010, para. 19.

[95] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, para. 571 ('Lubanga Trial Judgment').

[96] Ibid. [97] Ibid., para. 600.

[98] Ibid., para. 601, quoting, Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Lubanga (n 93) para. 33. For similar statements of the Appeals Chamber see also Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Defence Request Concerning Languages', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-522, AC, ICC, 28 May 2008, paras 38 and 39; Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered > criminalizing the conscription, enlistment and use of children under the age of 15 within the Statute of the SCSL is identical to Article 8(2)(e)(vii) of the Rome Statute, and they were self-evidently directed at the same objective. The SCSL's case law therefore potentially assists in the interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Rome Statute.[99]

This cautionary note highlights the ambiguous status of external jurisprudence under Article 21(1)(b) and the extent to which the bench can formally and expressly rely on it in its interpretative enterprises. We will return to this issue in several instances later in the chapter, but at this juncture it is worth noting that, in the end result, the jurisprudence of the SCSL was given only sparing express consideration.[100] The Chamber evidently found itself on firmer ground, at least with respect to Article 21(1)(b), when referring to external instruments such as the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions, the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child.[101] However, despite referring to these external sources of law as relevant aids to construction, it is evident that they were only utilized with a view to confirming the ordinary textual interpretation that was ultimately relied upon by the Chamber.[102]

In declining the opportunity to further elaborate on the precise contours of Article 8(2)(e)(vii) beyond its ordinary meaning, the Trial Chamber courted controversy given prosecution submissions that the term 'use' should be interpreted to encompass circumstances of ill treatment, sexual violence, and forced marriage.[103] In the view of the majority (Judge Odio Benito dissenting on this point), since evidence relating to sexual and gender-based violence was not expressly included by the prosecution at the confirmation of charges stage of the proceedings, 'as a matter of law…it would be impermissible for the Chamber to base its Decision pursuant to Article 74(2) on the evidence introduced during the trial that is relevant to this issue'.[104] In her dissenting opinion, which dealt in large part with this interpretative choice, Judge Odio Benito emphasized that such a restrained textual approach was 'contrary to the "object and purpose" of the Rome Statute, contrary to internationally recognized human rights and discriminatory under Article 21(3)'.[105] She argued that '[s]ince neither the Statute nor the Elements of Crimes define further these three by Art 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, Together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1486, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008, para. 40; Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 28 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Review of the Detention of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Pursuant to Rule 118(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1019, AC, ICC, 19 November 2010, para. 49.

[99] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 603.

[100] Ibid., paras 607, 616, 618, 624, and 626.

[101] Ibid., para. 604.

[102] Ibid., para. 608, where the Chamber relies on Oxford English Dictionary definitions of the constituent acts under Art 8(2)(e)(vii).

[103] See Prosecution's Closing Brief, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2748-Red, TC I, ICC, 1 June 2011, paras 227–34.

[104] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 630.

[105] Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Odio Benito, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 6.

criminal conducts, the Chamber is required to define them taking into consideration other applicable law. Furthermore, pursuant to Article 21(3) of the Rome Statute, the Chamber is compelled to interpret and apply the law consistent with internationally recognized human rights'.[106]

While the majority's decision not to address evidence of sexual and gender-based crimes may have been compatible with Article 22(2)'s mandating of strict construction,[107] such judicial restraint undermined the gap-filling role inherent in the judicial function. As Judge Odio Benito remarked:

> Although the Rome Statute's provisions are applied and interpreted in relation to specific charges brought against individuals, the Chamber must not disregard the interests that these provisions are meant to protect. In the present case, the statutory provisions are meant to protect the life and personal integrity of children under the age of 15. It would thus be impermissible for a Chamber to decline to enter a comprehensive legal definition of a crime and leave it open to a case-by-case analysis or to the limited scope of the charges brought against the accused. This would be a step backwards in the progressive development of the law.[108]

While Judge Odio Benito may be accused of victim-centred teleological interpretation,[109] 'liberal overreach',[110] or even of promoting a normative agenda, her concerns with respect to the adoption of an exclusively textual methodology reflect the inevitable unease that accompanies an interpretative regime that prioritizes plain meaning and strict construction over related considerations such as context and object and purpose.[111]

Another example of relatively inflexible adherence to the ordinary meaning of the statutory text to the exclusion of other aids to construction is found once again in the Lubanga case, when the Appeals Chamber was required to expound on the parameters of the right to appeal as provided for under Article 82(1)(d) of the Statute. The prosecution argued that there was a glaring gap in Article 82(1)(d) given the omission of an automatic right to appeal all decisions of first instance chambers. Purportedly applying Article 31 of the Vienna Convention in union with Article 21(3), the Chamber concluded that, 'the Statute defines exhaustively the right to appeal against decisions of first instance courts, namely decisions of the Pre-Trial or Trial Chambers. No gap is noticeable in the Statute with regard to the power claimed in the sense of an objective not being given effect to by its provisions. The lacuna postulated by the Prosecutor

[106] Ibid.

[107] The majority were clearly of this opinion, see Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 620. For in-depth consideration of Art 22(2), see section 19.4.4.

[108] Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Odio Benito, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 7 (emphasis added).

[109] For more on victim-centred teleological interpretation, see D Robinson, 'The Identity Crisis of International Criminal Law' (2010) 21 Leiden Journal of International Law 925.

[110] See L Sadat and J Jolly, 'Seven Canons of ICC Treaty Interpretation: Making Sense of Article 25's Rorshach Blot' (2014) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 755.

[111] For an exploration of theoretical aspects of textualism, from a domestic viewpoint, see for example C Nelson, 'What is Textualism' (2005) 91 Virginia Law Review 347; J Molot, 'The Rise and Fall of Textualism' (2006) 106 Columbia Law Review 1; J Manning, 'Textualism and Legislative Intent' (2005) 91 Virginia Law Review 419; A Gluck, 'The States as Laboratories of Statutory Methodological Consensus and the New Modified Textualism' (2010) 119 Yale Law Journal 1750.

is inexistent.'[112] The Chamber argued that this construction of Article 82(1)(d) was confirmed by the relevant travaux which were invoked in line with Article 32 of the Vienna Convention.[113]

Such interpretative restraint is consistent with the intent underpinning the drafting of Article 21.[114] However, it is worth heeding the remark of Judge Mohammad Shahabuddeen in his partially dissenting opinion in the Stakić case, that '[e]ven more than domestic law, international law is concerned with substance; it is not willing to be mesmerized by sacramental words'.[115] While Article 21(1)(a) certainly elevates the internal law to the status of a sacrament, as the following section will illustrate, this does not necessarily imply that the bench will in all instances observe it with dogmatic reverence, especially when normative and policy considerations come to pass.

19.4.1.1 The interpretation of Article 25(3)(a): the betrayal of textualism

While the prioritization of textual interpretative approaches coupled with fidelity to drafters' intent are typically associated with positivist or restrained judicial interpretative practices, it is nonetheless equally true that the express invocation of such interpretative techniques may mask or conceal the creative normative agenda of the bench. As Lauterpacht remarked, 'there is nothing easier than to purport to give the appearance of legal respectability and plausibility—by the simple operation of selecting one or more rules of interpretation—to a judicial decision which is lacking in soundness, in impartiality, or in intellectual vigour'.[116] Similarly, the interpretative techniques formally identified are 'not the determining cause of judicial decisions, but the form in which the judge cloaks a result arrived at by other means',[117] or as Gleider Hernandez

[112] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Lubanga (n 93) para. 39.

[113] Ibid., para. 40: 'The interpretation accorded hereinabove to subparagraph (d) of paragraph 1 of article 82 of the Statute and article 82 generally is confirmed by the travaux préparatoires that establish as laid down in article 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties supplementary means of interpretation designed to provide (a) confirmation of the meaning of a statutory provision resulting from the application of article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and (b) the clarification of ambiguous or obscure provisions and (c) the avoidance of manifestly absurd or unreasonable results. The travaux préparatoires reveal that a specific suggestion made by the Kenyan delegation to the Committee of the Whole at the 1998 United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries designed in essence to give effect to the right claimed by the Prosecutor was turned down.'

[114] See P Saland, 'International Criminal Law Principles' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court, The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 213–16.

[115] Judgment—Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, Stakić, IT-97-24-A, AC, ICTY, 22 March 2006, para. 69. The sentiment of this remark was echoed by Judge David Hunt in his partially dissenting opinion in the Hadžihasanović case. Drawing on the Nuclear Weapons case at the ICJ, he remarked that 'there is no reason why the interpretation of rules of international law should be limited to literal interpretation, any more than the interpretation of municipal law'—Trial Chamber Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Challenging Jurisdiction in Relation to Command Responsibility, Separate and Partially Dissenting Opinion of Judge David Hunt, Hadžihasanović et al., IT-01-47-AR72, TC, ICTY, 16 July 2003, para. 4.

[116] E Lauterpacht (ed.), International Law: Being the Collected Papers of Sir Hersch Lauterpacht, vols VII–VIII (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 411.

[117] H Lauterpacht, 'Restrictive Interpretation and the Principle of Effectiveness in the Interpretation of Treaties' (1949) XXVI British Yearbook of International Law 48.

has argued, 'judges shield their decisions through an outward show of judicial technique, behind which judges shield themselves from the accusation that they are engaging in law-creation rather than merely the interpretation of the law'.[118]

The foregoing examples have given a sense of the extent to which the bench of the ICC have relied on an isolated textual approach to avoid the appearance of express law-making. However, it is also possible to observe how a purportedly textual and teleological approach has been utilized in pursuit of an overtly developmental cause. The most striking example in this regard is the highly controversial interpretation of the contours of individual criminal responsibility provided for in Article 25 of the Rome Statute, and, in particular, the institution of the 'control of the crime' theory in the context of co-perpetration and indirect co-perpetration under Article 25(3)(a).[119] Indeed, the Court's jurisprudence with respect to Article 25 is such that some have argued that it has the capacity to act as a Rorschach blot test of interpretative techniques employed by the bench of the ICC.[120]

The avenues through which the various Pre-Trial Chambers arrived at their interpretation and development of the control of the crime theory of co-perpetration, the related principal/accessary distinction, and, perhaps more controversially, the concept of indirect co-perpetration, are dealt with at length in the contributions of Jens David Ohlin, Thomas Weigend, and Elies van Sliedregt in this volume and will not be revisited in detail.[121] However, it is worth highlighting the relative incoherence of the purportedly textual interpretative basis upon which these respective theories of individual criminal responsibility are based, and their apparent incompatibility with the interpretative regime dictated by Articles 21 and 22 of the Rome Statute. Indeed, this tension between Articles 21 and 22 and the prevailing interpretation of Article 25 (in particular Article 25(3)(a)) was eloquently emphasized by Judge Adrian Fulford in his Separate Opinion in the Lubanga Trial Judgment[122] and by Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert in her Concurring Opinion in the Ngudjolo Trial Judgment.[123]

Looking to the origins of the control of the crime theory for the purposes of Article 25(3)(a) in the Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision, it is remarkable to note the ease with which the bench was prepared to forgo the interpretative guidance instituted by Articles 21 and 22. In its opening gambit with respect to modes of liability, Pre-Trial Chamber I curiously remarked that '[t]he concept of co-perpetration embodied in article 25(3)(a) of the Statute requires analysis'.[124] While it may well be blatant [118] G Hernandez, The International Court of Justice and the Judicial Function (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2014) 13.

[119] See e.g. J Ohlin et al., 'Assessing the Control-Theory' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 725; E van Sliedregt, 'The Curious Case of International Criminal Liability' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1171; G Werle, 'Individual Criminal Responsibility in Article 25 ICC Statute' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 953; [120] See Sadat and Jolly (n 110).

[121] Ohlin, Chapter 21, this volume; Weigend, Chapter 22, this volume; Van Sliedregt, Chapter 20, this volume; Olásolo, Chapter 23, this volume; and Ambos, Chapter 24, this volume.

[122] See Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95).

[123] See Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-4, TC, ICC, 18 December 2012.

[124] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 93) para. 322 (emphasis added).

pedantry to point out the use of the doctrinally or scholarly associated noun 'analysis' as opposed to the more judicial and hermeneutically sound noun of 'interpretation', it is nonetheless arguable that its use is an indication of the Chamber's belief that co-perpetration required the application of foundational conceptual reasoning as opposed to mere interpretative or textual clarity. In short, the Chamber was implying from the outset that given its evident indeterminacy, a certain degree of creative reasoning was required with respect to Article 25(3)(a). When confronted with conceptual and textual indeterminacy it would perhaps be expected that the Chamber would invoke the reasoning of the Appeals Chamber already mentioned, to the effect that such impasses must be negotiated via recourse to the sources of law incorporated in Article 21(1)(b) and (c) applied in conjunction with Article 31 of the Vienna Convention.[125] However, the Pre-Trial Chamber made little attempt to follow this methodological blueprint, choosing instead to base their analysis predominately on doctrinal sources (in particular, the scholarship of Claus Roxin), the reasoning of the Trial Chamber of the Yugoslav Tribunal in the (by now infamous) Stakić case, and the minority opinion of Judge Wolfgang Schomburg appended to the Appeals Judgment in the Gacumbitsi case at the Rwanda Tribunal.[126] Indeed, it is striking to observe the absence from the Chamber's 'analysis' of any grounding in the sources of law provided for in Article 21(1)(b) and (c) and the extent to which a plain textual interpretation, which has been so prevalent in the bench's approach to date, is forgone.

The Chamber unconvincingly suggests that despite rooting their 'analysis' almost exclusively in German criminal legal theory, the conceptualization of co-perpetration is 'applied in numerous legal systems'.[127] Were the Chamber capable of providing a detailed insight into the current status of state practice on the issue, a persuasive argument could perhaps be made that the co-perpetration ought to be considered a general principle of law in accordance with Article 21(1)(c). However, the Chamber makes no effort to provide such an insight.[128] The reliance on doctrinal sources is particularly problematic given the fact the Article 21 does not include a provision equivalent to Article 38(1)(d) of the Statute of the ICJ allowing for recourse to 'the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists' as a subsidiary source of law.[129]

It is difficult to tally the Pre-Trial Chamber's expansive and relatively incomplete reasoning with respect to co-perpetration/indirect co-perpetration with the prevailing textual approach to interpretation mandated by Articles 21(1)(a) and 22(2) and as expressed in the burgeoning jurisprudence of the Court. It is perhaps the case, as suggested by Leila Sadat and Jarrod Jolly, that the Chamber was persuaded by Judge Schomburg's contention that the German conceptualization of co-perpetration 'suits the needs … of international criminal law particularly well … [as] a means to bridge

[125] See Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Lubanga (n 93) para. 23.

[126] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 93) paras 322–67 and accompanying footnotes.

[127] Ibid., para. 330. [128] Ibid., para. 330, fn. 418.

[129] Art 38(1)(d) ICJ Statute (n 72). See also M Peil, 'Scholarly Writings as a Source of Law: A Survey of the Use of Doctrine by the International Court of Justice' (2012) 1 Cambridge Journal of International and Comparative Law 136.

any potential physical distance from the crime scene of persons who must be regarded as main perpetrators'.[130] At no point did the Pre-Trial Chamber intimate that the adoption of the German model was made necessary by virtue of a glaring statutory lacuna. Rather it seems that its adoption was a bald normative choice based on a perception that the choice of language adopted by the drafters implied a desire to deviate from the purely subjective standard of complicity developed and enforced by the ad hoc Tribunals as well as the perceived necessity to distinguish between principals and accessories. In essence, the adoption of the control over the crime theory was an issue of policy, rather than purely one of statutory interpretation. The subsequent Trial Judgment in the case effectively stated as much when it determined that Articles 25 and 28, 'should be interpreted in a way that allows properly expressing and addressing the responsibility for these crimes [sic]'.[131]

In the Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation of Charges Decision, Pre-Trial Chamber I, in elaborating on the notion of indirect co-perpetration, confirmed the control theory and expanded its reasoning to elucidate the presence of the theory in a number of domestic jurisdictions (i.e. five countries—Germany, Spain, Peru, Chile, and Argentina) while also providing a wealth of additional doctrinal authorities.[132] Commenting on the Lubanga Pre-Trial Chamber's 'analysis' of the respective objective, subjective, and control over the crime approaches to co-perpetration, the Katanga and Ngudjolo Pre-Trial bench determined that:

> The methodology for deciding between these three approaches was to analyze their consistency with the Statute, which is the first source of applicable law for this Court under Article 21(1)(a) of the Statute. Application of the Statute requires not only resorting to a group of norms by applying any of the possible meanings of the words in the Statute but also requires excluding at least those interpretations of the Statute in which application would engender an asystematic corpus juris of unrelated norms… [Referring here to the incompatibility of the objective standard with the notion of perpetration through another.][133]
>
> The Chamber considers that in order for the Statute to be understood as a consistent body of predictable law, the criminal responsibility of a person—whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person—must be determined under the control over the crime approach to distinguishing between principals and accessories.[134]

The adoption of the control over the crime theory was, therefore, in the view of the Katanga and Ngudjolo Pre-Trial Chamber necessary in order to afford coherence, consistency, and predictability to the interpretation and application of Article 25(3)(a), with such considerations outweighing a purely textual approach.

[130] Sadat and Jolly (n 110) 776, citing Judgment—Separate Opinion of Judge Schomburg, Gacumbitsi, ICTR-01-64-A, AC, ICTR, 7 July 2006, para. 21.

[131] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 976.

[132] Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 93) paras 486 and 510 and accompanying footnotes.

[133] Ibid., para. 481.

[134] Ibid., para. 486.

Turning its attention to the notion of indirect co-perpetration the Chamber argued that it had clear textual support given Article 25(3)(a)'s inclusion of the phrase 'jointly with another or through another person'. Embarking on what was purportedly a classical textual interpretation, the Chamber determined that:

> Two meanings can be attributed to the word 'or'—one known as weak or inclusive and the other strong or exclusive. An inclusive disjunction has the sense of 'either one or the other, and possibly both' whereas an exclusive disjunction has the sense of 'either one or the other, but not both'. Therefore to interpret the disjunction in article 25(3)(a) of the Statute as either 'inclusive' or 'exclusive' is possible from a strict textualist interpretation. In the view of the Chamber, basing a person's criminal responsibility upon the joint commission of a crime through one or more persons is therefore a mode of liability 'in accordance with the Statute'.[135]

This invocation of so-called strict textualism is a perfect illustration of how a purported reliance on the ordinary, dictionary, meaning of a statutory text can nonetheless merely veil an overtly expansive interpretation. In rejecting the Chamber's 'inclusive/exclusive disjunctive' understanding of 'or' in the context of Article 25(3)(a) as 'with the greatest respect, unconvincing',[136] Judge Christine van den Wyngaert remarked that the '[i]nclusive disjunctive may be a concept known in formal logic, but it is totally foreign to ordinary language.... The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties requires that the terms be interpreted in accordance with their "ordinary meaning", rather than through the prism of formal logic.'[137]

The Pre-Trial Chamber was unconcerned that the Appeals Chamber of the Yugoslav Tribunal had determined that indirect co-perpetration had no basis in customary international law. Noting this fact, the Chamber reasoned that:

> Under article 21(1)(a) of the Statute, the first source of applicable law is the Statute. Principles and rules of international law constitute a secondary source applicable only when the statutory material fails to prescribe a legal solution. Therefore, and since the Rome Statute expressly provides for this specific mode of liability, the question as to whether customary law admits or discards the 'joint commission through another person' is not relevant for this Court. This is a good example of the need not to transfer the ad hoc tribunals' case law mechanically to the system of the Court.

This statement is a useful example of a reasoning double standard. While the Chamber is happy to invoke the reasoning of the Yugoslav Trial Chamber in the Stakić case when it comports with its normative and policy agenda, the strict hierarchy of sources mandated by Article 21(1) can be utilized and directly invoked in order to avoid inconvenient alternative sources of potentially persuasive authority. It also adds to the ambiguity surrounding the status of external jurisprudence as a source of law in the context of Article 21, an issue we will return to later in this chapter.

[135] Ibid., para. 491.
[136] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Ngudjolo (n 123) para. 60.
[137] Ibid., para. 60 and fn. 76.

Despite the deficiencies evident in the Lubanga and Katanga and Ngudjolo Pre-Trial Chamber interpretation of Article 25(3)(a), their reasoning has nonetheless been consistently endorsed, almost without question, in subsequent arrest warrant and confirmation of charges decisions, a fact which in itself provides an interesting insight into the operation of Article 21(2).[138] However, this is not to say that there has been a complete absence of judicial dissent on the matter. As alluded to earlier, Judge Adrian Fulford and Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert have been outspoken in their criticism of the Pre-Trial Chamber's reasoning in both the Lubanga and Katanga and Ngudjolo cases. Of particular interest is the fact that both have sought to highlight the incompatibility of the Pre-Trial Chamber's reasoning with an ordinary textual interpretation of Article 25(3)(a) and its inconsistency with Articles 21(1) and 22(2).

In his separate opinion appended to the Lubanga Trial Judgment, Judge Fulford remarked that in his view the control of the crime theory 'is unsupported by the text of the Statute and it imposes an unnecessary and unfair burden on the prosecution'.[139] Furthermore, he fundamentally rejected the determination that Article 25(3) instituted a hierarchy of modes of liability:

> In my judgment, the plain text of Article 25(3) defeats the argument that subsections (a)–(d) of Article 25(3) must be interpreted so as to avoid creating an overlap between them. . . . [I]n my judgment the plain language of Article 25(3) demonstrates that the possible modes of commission under Article 25(3)(a)–(d) of the Statute were not intended to be mutually exclusive.[140]

Invoking Article 31 of the Vienna Convention, in Fulford's view, 'a plain reading of Article 25(3)(a) establishes the criminal liability of co-perpetrators who contribute to the commission of the crime notwithstanding their absence from the scene, and it is unnecessary to invoke the control of the crime theory in order to secure this result'.[141]

[138] See e.g. Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, paras 296–7; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, paras 289–92; Corrigendum of the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-121-Corr-Red, PTC I, ICC, 7 March 2011, para. 126; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, PTC I, ICC, 8 February 2010, paras 152–7; Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba (n 94) paras 346–8; Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, paras 210–13.

[139] Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 3.

[140] Ibid., para. 7. See also para. 8: 'Some have suggested that Article 25(3) establishes a hierarchy of seriousness as regards the various forms of participation in a crime, with Article 25(3)(a) constituting the gravest example and Article 25(3)(d) the least serious. I am unable to adopt this approach. In my judgment, there is no proper basis for concluding that ordering, soliciting or inducing crime (Article 25(3)(d)) is a less serious form of commission than committing it "through another person" (Article 25(3)(a)), and these two concepts self-evidently overlap. Similarly, I am unable to accept that the criminality of accessories (Article 25(3)(c)) is greater than those who participate within a group (Article 25(3)(d)), particularly since many of history's most serious crimes occurred as a result of the coordinated action of groups of individuals, who jointly pursued a common goal.'

[141] Ibid., paras 12 and 13.

Elaborating further on his rejection of the control of the crime theory, Judge Fulford acknowledged the relevance of the concept in certain domestic jurisdictions, but in light of Article 21(1)(c) cautioned against its direct transposition into the statutory framework of the ICC:

> While Article 21(1)(c) of the Statute permits the Court to draw upon 'general principles of law' derived from national legal systems, in my view before taking this step, a Chamber should undertake a careful assessment as to whether the policy considerations underlying the domestic legal doctrine are applicable at this Court, and it should investigate the doctrine's compatibility with the Rome Statute framework. This applies regardless of whether the domestic and the ICC provisions mirror each other in their formulation. It would be dangerous to apply a national statutory interpretation simply because of similarities of language, given the overall context is likely to be significantly different.[142]

Judge Van den Wyngaert shared this view, remarking that '[c]onsidering its universalist mission, the Court should refrain from relying on particular national models, however sophisticated they may be'.[143] In this respect, Van den Wyngaert pointed out, entirely appropriately in this author's view, the inconsistency of both the control theory and the notion of indirect co-perpetration with the requirement of strict construction provided for under Article 22(2).[144] Indeed, for Van den Wyngaert, Article 22(2)'s institution of strict construction was to be given interpretative primacy with respect to substantive law and modes of liability.[145] Such an interpretative rule was necessary in the interests of certainty and predictability of the law, both of which are amongst the central tenets of the rule of law and the right to a fair trial.[146] The Majority Opinion in the Katanga Trial Judgment appeared, at least momentarily, to agree with this reasoning in pointing out the potential incompatibility of a teleological approach to the interpretation of the definition of crimes and modes of liability with the principles of strict construction and the circumscribed applicability of the Vienna rules to the entirety of the Rome Statute text.[147] However, in their subsequent interpretation of modes of liability, crimes against humanity, and the application of Regulation 55, it can hardly be claimed that the Majority heeded their own cautionary statement.[148]

The fact that the bench of the ICC has interpreted Article 25(3)(a) to include the Roxinian notions of co-perpetration and indirect co-perpetration is not in itself problematic or objectionable. In truth, the difficulty arises from the failure of the bench to coherently locate its reasoning within the sources of law regime mandated by Article 21 of the Rome Statute. As Jens David Ohlin remarks in his contribution in this volume, in adopting the prevailing interpretation of co-perpetration and indirect

[142] Ibid., para. 10.
[143] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Ngudjolo (n 123) paras 5 and 17.
[144] Ibid., paras 6 and 7. [145] Ibid., para. 18. [146] Ibid., paras 19 and 20.
[147] See Jugement redu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3426, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014, paras 54–5, see generally paras 38–57.
[148] For a detailed analysis, see C Stahn, 'Justice Delivered or Justice Denied? The Legacy of the Katanga Judgment' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 804.

co-perpetration, it is unclear whether the bench is predominately relying on principles of conventional treaty/statutory interpretation, is applying customary international law or general principles of law, or indeed, is engaging in a form of international Dogmatik in the sense that the bench is attempting 'to reason from first principles the nature of co-perpetration and collective action in the context of atrocity'.[149] What is certain, however, is the unpersuasiveness of the argument that a purely textual understanding of Article 25(3)(a) supports the adoption of a particularly Germanic conception of co-perpetration and indirect co-perpetration. Such an argument is in danger, as Lauterpacht might put it, of being viewed as 'lacking in soundness, in impartiality [and] in intellectual vigour'.[150] Moreover, the prevailing interpretation of Article 25(3)(a) profoundly compromises the contention that the inclusion of Articles 21 and 22(2) in the Rome Statute framework has fundamentally curtailed the creative interpretative capacity of the bench, and instead reinforces a more realist analysis that where policy issues and normative agendas are at play, the bench, if it so wishes, is more than capable of veiling its true interpretative intentions behind positive rules and the appearance of textual conformity.

19.4.1.2 Charting the origins of Article 21's hierarchy of sources and the potential impact on the interpretative judicial function

Despite the consistent reasoning with respect to Article 25(3), and in particular Article 25(3)(a), there are certainly grounds to believe that the strict hierarchy of sources mandated by Article 21(1) is, for the most part, consistently observed, to the extent that in its interpretation and application the bench might be considered 'more royalist than the king'.[151] For instance, in the Al Bashir case the Pre-Trial Chamber determined that:

> [a]ccording to article 21(1)(a) of the Statute, the Court must apply 'in the first place' the Statute, the Elements of Crimes and the Rules.… [T]hose other sources of law provided for in paragraphs 1(b) and 1(c) of article 21 of the Statute, can only be applied when the following two conditions are met: (i) there is a lacuna in the written law contained in the Statute, the Elements of Crimes and the Rules; and (ii) such lacuna cannot be filled by the application of the criteria provided for in articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and article 21(3) of the Statute.[152]

This comment of the Appeals Chamber necessarily begs the question of how a lacuna in the Statute can be identified without giving some consideration to other relevant sources of law influential in the construction of a contextual understanding of any [149] Ohlin, Chapter 21, section 21.2, this volume.

[150] Lauterpacht, International Law: Being the Collected Papers of Sir Hersch Lauterpacht (n 116) 411.
[151] Cryer, 'Royalism and the King' (n 46) 392.
[152] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir (n 138) para. 126 (emphasis added); see also Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Lubanga (n 93) paras 22–4.

particular provision. It is a simple fact that the interpretation of a provision, and in particular the identification of lacunae, cannot be achieved in a reasoning vacuum.[153]

Variations on the Al Bashir approach have been expressed, such as in the Ruto et al Confirmation of Charges Decision, where the Pre-Trial Chamber determined that it 'should not resort to applying article 21(1)(b), unless it has found no answer in paragraph (a)'.[154] The bench is, therefore, as we have seen, required to exhaust all avenues of interpretative resolution via a textual interpretation of the internal law pursuant to the general rule of treaty interpretation enshrined in Article 31 of the VCLT.[155] Should the lacuna or ambiguity persist, Article 21(1)(b) provides '[i]n the second place, and where appropriate' relevant external treaties and 'the principles and rules of international law' may be invoked. Should this fail to resolve the interpretative impasse general principles of criminal law, derived from the 'legal systems of the world' may be drawn upon as a last resort. Irrespective of the source eventually utilized, pursuant to Article 21(3), the interpretation adopted and applied must be 'consistent with internationally recognized human rights'. By establishing this sequenced methodology, Article 21(1) appears to institute a predetermined, mechanical approach to the resolution of statutory gaps and may be contrasted with the spirit of Article 38 of the Statute of the ICJ, which merely establishes the sources of law and not their means of interpretation or application. As Gilbert Bitti has remarked, 'this means that the application of sources of law before the International Criminal Court is . . . much less flexible than it has been before the ICTY or ICTR. But this is certainly the result that States intended when they drafted a very precise Statute of 128 articles and very precise Rules of Procedure and Evidence comprised of 225 rules.'[156]

Regrettably, little if anything can be gleaned from the travaux préparatoires to the Rome Statute, such as they exist, which might throw some light on the true rationale behind the drafting of Article 21, most crucially with respect to whether or not the drafters wished to provide for a particular conception of the judicial function through Article 21.[157] Looking to the pre-history of the Rome Conference, namely the ILC's efforts, it is evident that such a fastidious provision was a relatively late edition to the debate on the applicable law. For instance, the 1993 ILC Draft provided for the following wording:

[153] Cryer, 'Royalism and the King' (n 46) 398.

[154] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 138) para. 289. See also Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 93) para. 508.

[155] See Decision on Application for Leave to Appeal by the Defence of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui against the Decision on Joinder, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 94) 7: '[U]nder these specific circumstances—the existence of a legislative lacuna in the regulation of a procedural matter—the strict literal interpretation of the relevant provisions required by the principle of legality is not possible and the Chamber, acting under paragraph 1(a) of article 21 must apply the interpretative criteria provided for in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties'.

[156] Bitti (n 85) 295–6. See also Bitti, Chapter 18, this volume.

[157] See Cassese, 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections' (n 47) 144–5: '[U]nlike most multilateral treaties concluded under the auspices of the United Nations, in the case of the Rome Statute there hardly existed preparatory works reflecting the debates and negotiations that took place at the Rome Diplomatic Conference. The need for informal, off-the-record discussions clearly arose out of the necessity to overcome major rifts in a smooth manner and in such a way as to avoid states losing face by changing their position. . . . Considered as a contribution to international

> The Court shall apply:
> (a) this Statute;
> (b) applicable treaties and the rules and principles of general international law; and
> (c) as a subsidiary source, any applicable rule of national law.[158]

Commenting on the draft, its chief architect, James Crawford, made clear that the provision was expressly modelled on Article 38 in accordance with the 'if it's not broken, don't fix it' mentality:

> By contrast with the inevitably rather complex jurisdictional provisions, the treatment of applicable law is simplicity itself. The court is to apply its statute, applicable treaties, and rules and principles of general international law, and as a subsidiary source, applicable rules of national law.…No doubt to say that applicable rules, whether derived from treaties, general international law or national law, are to be applied is not to say very much. But the way in which treaties and rules and principles of international law are applied under Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court is now fairly well understood, and there was little point in seeking to elaborate them in one particular context.[159]

The 1996 Report of the Preparatory Committee, however, does provide some interesting guidance as to the thinking of states at that particular juncture in the drafting process. It shows a split amongst states with respect to the flexibility of any eventual statute. On the one hand, there were those delegations who 'cautioned against the risk of compounding the Statute with extensive and detailed rules', since 'the Statute could not specify all rules, nor could it predict all types of issues which might come before the Court'.[160] On the other hand, there were delegations who were fearful that allowing for a judicial role in the progressive development of the law 'would not be consistent with the principle of legality'.[161] It is here that we first encounter the move towards a more prescriptive conception of the applicable law treaty law, the Statute strikes the commentator as a text that is markedly different from other multilateral treaties. It bears the mark of strong political and diplomatic difference over certain major issues, and shows the difficulty to ironing them out'. In this regard M Cherif Bassiouni has commented that, 'some problems were inevitable since the drafting process itself suffered from the flaws of multilateral negotiating practices. The drafting process was too vulnerable to the obstinacy of single delegations or even single delegates who refused to allow approval by consensus. There has to be a better way to draft such complex multilateral treaties.' Bassiouni, 'Negotiating the Treaty of Rome on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court' (n 2) 467. See also Sadat, 'Custom, Codification and Some Thoughts about the Relationship between the Two' (n 45) 910: 'As the drafting of the ICC treaty proceeded, however, the disadvantages of codification also became clear. Indeed, it began to seem that there might be a fundamental incompatibility between the political agendas of States and the process of codifying, in a progressive manner, the customary international law of war and crimes against humanity. Thus, the codification process was fated to produce a text that represented a set of political compromises, rather than a new set of progressive norms criminalizing behavior on a broad scale. To put it another way, if the criminal law in the ICC Statute was seen as a net in which to catch the war criminals of the world, it contained some very large holes through which some major criminals might escape the Court's reach.'

[158] Report of the ILC on the work of its forty-fifth session (3 May–23 July 1993) UN Doc A/48/10, at 111.

[159] J Crawford, 'The ILC's Draft Statute for an International Criminal Tribunal' (1994) 88 American Journal of International Law 140, 147–8 (emphasis added).

[160] Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Vol. I, UN Doc A/51/22VOL-I (1996) para. 182.

[161] Ibid., para. 184.

provision. Most particularly, discussions within the Committee highlighted concerns that draft Article 33 (later Article 21)

> …was vague and should be revised by: (a) substantiating in more detail the sources of the substantive law which the Court would apply; and (b) elaborating the essential elements of the general principles of criminal law.… It was also suggested that the primacy of the Statute and the order of relevance and applicability of other sources of applicable law should be made explicit in the revision of the article.[162]

This belief, that the detailed elaboration of positive rules was the only way of ensuring interpretative compliance with the principle of legality, has been the subject of vociferous criticism. For instance, in his commentary to Article 21, Alain Pellet remarks that 'it was undoubtedly necessary to define the jurisdiction of the Court and to respect the requirements of the nullum crimen sine lege principle as in all criminal proceedings… [h]owever, there was no need to go into such great detail, or even to set out the substantial rules applicable'.[163] He continues further that, 'under the pretext that this exercise was rendered necessary by the criminal law principle of "legality" of crimes and misdemeanours, the negotiators have mechanically transposed an internal legal principle to the international sphere'.[164] What is perhaps more curious is the fact that states' concerns as to the sanctity of the principle of legality within the text of the Statute would be directly addressed by the more general interpretative provisions of Articles 21(3) and 22, which, as Kenneth Gallant points out, 'immediately incorporate[s] the principles of legality that have become customary international law'.[165] It seems somewhat trite to remark that the enumeration of the applicable law can help guard against violations of the principle of legality; however, it is unpersuasive to argue that the principle could only be properly protected if such a provision included the delineation of a series of complex hierarchies such as to carefully regiment the interpretative freedom of the bench.

The issue of the imposition of a hierarchical structure arose during the drafting of Article 38 of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, the text of which was replicated without amendment as Article 38 of the Statute of the ICJ. The travaux préparatoires are revealing and have a definite resonance in trying to disentangle the rationale behind Article 21(1)'s attempted corseting of the applicable law

[162] Ibid., para. 188.

[163] Pellet, 'Applicable Law' (n 52) 1055. Cf. I Caracciolo, 'Applicable Law' in F Lattanzi and W Schabas (eds), Essays on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Volume I (Rome: il Sirente 1999) 212: 'The complexity of the normative system that the activity an international criminal tribunal must keep as a reference is manifested by the content of Article 21 on applicable law. This article can be viewed as the closing provision of the Statute, embodying the legal principle nullum crimen sine proevia lega.'

[164] Ibid., 1056. See also M McAuliffe-DeGuzman, 'Article 21—Applicable Law' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary to the Rome Statute 2nd edn (München: C H Beck, Hart, Nomos 2008) 703–4: 'The primary challenge faced in drafting article 21 was the need to adhere to the principle of nullum crimen sine lege in the context of the loosely structured international legal order, with no sovereign legislature. Modern criminal law, even in common law countries, lies almost exclusively within the domain of legislators. International law, on the other hand, develops through the gradual emergence of custom and the recognition of general principles of law.'

[165] K Gallant, The Principle of Legality in International and Comparative Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 332.

and by extension the interpretative freedom of the bench. In considering the question of the applicable law, the President of the Advisory Committee of Jurists to the Council of the League of Nations, Baron Deschamps, passionately advocated for the inclusion of a strict 'ordre successif' in the draft article. He argued that 'it would be dangerous to allow the judges to apply the law of right and wrong exclusively according to their own personal understanding of it'; he felt it imperative 'to indicate the line which the judges must follow; and compel them to conform to the dictates of the legal conscience of civilized nations'.[166] If such a controlling provision could be concluded, it 'would merit the gratitude of humanity'.[167] The proposed inclusion of a specified order of applicable law was quite clearly, therefore, for the purposes of ensuring that the bench did not in any way encroach on the sanctity of sovereign consent in the resolution of disputes. It was certainly not expressly proposed as being in the interests of justice or the proper administration of the judicial function.

Despite Deschamps' plea and promise of the gratitude of humanity, the proposal was ultimately rejected.[168] In this regard, delegate De Lapradelle argued that '[a] judge must, of course, judge according to law'; the law must be defined, 'but this duty must be left to the judges'.[169] The inclusion of a strict definition of the sources of law would be unreasonable 'and even unjust'.[170] In his view, '[t]here would be no danger in allowing the Court to consider whether any particular legal solution were just and equitable, and if necessary to modify, if the situation arose, the legal solution according to the exigencies of justice and equity'.[171] 'Confidence', he argued, 'must be put in the judges, and they must be allowed to consider these different elements for themselves.'[172] Delegate Root shared these sentiments, warning that '[i]f the Committee undertook to establish the actual rules to be followed by the judges, they would exceed their mandate which was to organize the Court and not to make laws for it'.[173] Indeed, it was also proposed that 'the law of objective justice' be included within the applicable law provision not only because it would have a significant impact on 'progress in international life', but also because it would complement the application of law, and 'as such [would be] essential to the judge in the performance of the great task entrusted to him'.[174]

The end result therefore rejected a provision on the applicable law which mandated the formalized and controlled judicial application of law (in a manner protective of essential state interests) in favour of a provision which protected judicial independence and the full and proper exercise of the judicial function. What's more, it acknowledged that sources other than law could be utilized if necessary in the interests of justice. Taking this into consideration, it is difficult not to share Pellet's scepticism [166] Procès-Verbaux of the Proceedings of the Advisory Committee of Jurists (1920) Annexe No. 3, 318.

[167] Ibid.
[168] See League of Nations, Documents Concerning the Action Taken by the Council of the League of Nations under Art 14 of the Covenant and the Adoption of the Assembly of the Statute of the Permanent Court (1920) 145. Commenting on its proposed removal from the draft, the French Delegate, Fromageot, 'explained that its effect would be to enable the Court to state as the sole reason for its judgments that the award seemed to it to be just. This did not imply that the Court might disregard existing rules'.
[169] Procès-Verbaux of the Proceedings of the Advisory Committee of Jurists (n 166) 296.
[170] Ibid. [171] Ibid. [172] Ibid. [173] Ibid., 293. [174] Ibid., 324–5.

with respect to the legality argument raised by certain delegations when considering Article 21, since such protections are expressly provided for in the Statute. The more likely scenario is that states simply utilized the principle of legality as a convenient shield to mask a desire to be more protective of state interests. In this sense, it is not necessary to be versed in the 'tenets of critical legal scholarship to accept that the sources of international [criminal] law are not untouched by politics'.[175]

19.4.1.3 Article 21(1)(b)–(c) and Article 21(2): the position of customary international law, general principles of law, and internal and external precedent in the Rome Statute's interpretative regime

In instituting a precise hierarchy of sources, the drafters have displayed a wilful ignorance of the contours of the interpretative process and, crucially, of the complex nature of the interplay of sources in international adjudication.[176] The absence of a hierarchy in Article 38(1) implicitly acknowledges the complex overlap of sources of law that cannot be addressed via recourse to a simple formula.[177] The actual sources of law provided for in Article 21(1)(b) and (c) are relatively uncontroversial; however, the wording of Article 21(1)(b) is unlikely to be revered for its clarity or eloquence. It provides for the application, 'where appropriate'—that is, once a textual interpretation of the internal law has been exhausted—of applicable treaties 'and principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict'. This rather opaque reference has given rise to some speculation as to the applicability of customary international law. Pellet put his criticism thus:

> The sibylline drafting of this provision nonetheless gives cause for perplexity. Why use such an indirect expression when a simple reference to international custom would have sufficed? Why refer to 'principles and rules', when both are placed on the same footing? Why, above all, make special reference to the 'established principles [and not rules?] of the international law of armed conflict', when they undoubtedly form part of the 'principles of international law'?[178]

It would no doubt be amusing to develop a conspiracy theory to the effect that the wording of Article 21(1)(b) establishes the drafter's intent to exclude customary international law as a subsidiary source of law, but in reality there is no doubt that 'principles and rules of international law' is intended to refer to both general principles and customary norms of international law. It is arguable that, even in the absence of any reference to custom, it could nonetheless be permissibly invoked by the bench. Why customary international law was not referred to in less remote terms is not obvious from the drafting history. For Pellet, this anomaly was 'most likely due to the fact that the criminal lawyers, whose influence increased during the drafting of the Statute, opposed it in the name of an erroneous conception of the principle of legality of offences and punishment'.[179]

[175] Cryer, 'Royalism and the King' (n 46) 390. See also D Kennedy, 'The Sources of International Law' (1987) 2 American University Journal of International Law and Policy 1.
[176] Ibid., 394. [177] Ibid. [178] Pellet, 'Applicable Law' (n 52) 1070. [179] Ibid., 1071.

The wording of Article 21(1)(b) leaves uncertain the extent to which the bench is permitted to rely on the jurisprudence of other international criminal tribunals in identifying 'principles and rules of international law'. However, before returning to this issue, it is clear from Article 21(2) that 'the Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions'. However, this fails to establish a clear hierarchy delineating the decisions of the various Chambers of the Court—perhaps the only hierarchy one would expect to find in a provision of this nature.[180] In this regard, it fails to fully or coherently adopt the oft-repeated finding of the Yugoslav Appeals Chamber in the Aleksovski case that, in the interests of certainty and predictability, the Appeals Chamber should follow its previous decisions and should only depart from them 'for cogent reasons in the interests of justice', and further that the ratio decidendi of its decisions are binding on subordinate chambers of the Tribunal in line with the common law tradition and the equivalent, if unacknowledged, practice of the civil law tradition.[181]

In one of its very first decisions in the Lubanga case, the Appeals Chamber not only ignored the Aleksovski principle, but rejected the notion of inferior or subordinate Chambers: '[t]he Pre-Trial and Trial chambers of the International Criminal Court are in no way inferior courts in the sense that inferior courts are perceived and classified in England and Wales. Hence, any comparison between them and inferior courts under English law is misleading.'[182] While relying on a purely textual interpretation of the provision, subsequent practice of 'lower' chambers reveals a readiness to follow previous decisions. For example, in the Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation of Charges Decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber in its interpretation of the evidentiary standard of substantial grounds to believe saw 'no compelling reason to depart from its application of the standard as established in the Lubanga case'.[183] In addressing the understanding to be given to direct or indirect co-perpetration under Article 25(3)(a), the same Chamber remarked in following the precedent set in the Lubanga case, that such guidance was 'particularly significant in the instant proceedings, as no other Chamber of the Court has thus far provided a divergent interpretation of these matters'.[184] In the Bemba case, the Pre-Trial Chamber, in its interpretation of 'jointly with another' under Article 25(3)(a), determined that there was 'no reason to deviate from the approach and line of reasoning embraced by Pre-Chamber I, as it is consistent with the letter and spirit of article 25(3) of the Statute'.[185] Indeed, given the relative paucity of Appeals Chamber jurisprudence and the contrasting flourishing of Pre-Trial Chamber jurisprudence, there is an argument to be made that the Pre-Trial [180] See Bitti (n 85) 293.

[181] Judgment, Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-A, AC, ICTY, 24 March 2000, paras 107 and 113, see generally paras 92–113.

[182] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Lubanga (n 93) para. 30.

[183] Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 93) para. 65.

[184] Ibid., fn. 618.

[185] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba (n 94) para. 348.

Chamber enjoys de facto binding authority, especially given the potential impact any deviation from Pre-Trial authorities may have on the rights of the accused.[186]

In Lubanga, we get some acknowledgement of the binding nature of Appeals Chamber jurisprudence, with the Pre-Trial Chamber deciding to follow the 'guiding principles prescribed in the judgments rendered by the Appeals Chamber'.[187] There are, however, several instances in which Chambers have invoked Article 21(2) in order to reject pre-existing jurisprudence, although there is yet to be an instance in which the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber has been expressly rejected.[188] While the Court's jurisprudence on Article 21(2) continues to develop, it is nevertheless evident that, in wishing to make clear the rejection of a dedicated stare decisis rule, the drafters entirely failed to delineate a clear and (what might be considered) obvious hierarchy between Chambers. It is ironic, in a provision so replete with complex hierarchies, that the relatively straightforward question of the necessary internal hierarchy between Chambers was not addressed. If, as is inferable from the travaux, concern for the sanctity of the principle of legality—the need for certainty and predictability of rules—lies behind the rigid drafting of Article 21(1), no such equivalent concern appears to attach to the question of establishing a consistent and coherent body of internal jurisprudence. It seems likely that the true explanation lies simply with poor or sloppy drafting or with states wishing to protect possible future interests by replicating the basic import of Article 59 of the Statute of the ICJ, which expressly excludes stare decisis.[189] It may be the case that states wished the Court to decide cases based on law, not precedent—non exemplis, sed legibus iudicandum est.

Returning to the question of whether or not the Court may rely on the jurisprudence of other international courts and tribunals in the identification of rules and principles of law for the purposes of Article 21(1)(b),[190] it is clear, at least on the back of current jurisprudence, that this is going to be a regretfully difficult struggle, with somewhat divergent (but equally cautious) approaches emerging depending on whether the issue [186] See e.g. Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 21, where Judge Fulford rejected the control of the crime theory for the purpose of Art 25(3)(a) but nonetheless acknowledged that to deviate from the Pre-Trial Chamber determination of the matter at the Art 74 stage would be detrimental to the rights of the accused.

[187] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 93) para. 154.

[188] See Decision on Art 54(3)(e) Documents Identified as Potentially Exculpatory or Otherwise Material to the Defence's Preparation for the Confirmation Hearing, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-621, PTC I, ICC, 20 June 2008, para. 59; Decision on the Requests of the Legal Representative of Applicants on Application Process for Victim's Participation and Legal Representation, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-374, PTC I, ICC, 17 August 2007, paras 37–8.

[189] Art 59 ICJ Statute (n 72): 'The decision of the Court has no binding effect except between the parties and in respect of that particular case.'

[190] See Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 60) para. 540: 'More specifically, precedents may constitute evidence of a customary rule in that they are indicative of the existence of opinio iuris sive necessitatis and international practice on a certain matter, or else they may be indicative of the emergence of a general principle of international law.' Cf Art 20(3) Statute of the SCSL (2002) 2178 UNTS 138, annex: 'The judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda.'

under examination relates to procedural or substantive law.[191] Under Article 38(1)(d), judicial decisions are of course identified as a subsidiary means for the determination of international rules, which, as Volker Nerlich points out, 'is reflective of a general methodological approach for the ascertainment of rules of international law'.[192] For William Schabas, the interpretation of Article 21(1)(b) 'surely cannot be taken as depriving the Court of the authority to consider principles and rules of law derived from the case law of other judicial bodies'.[193] It would therefore be exceptional if the Court were to rule entirely against their applicability to considerations under Article 21(1)(b).

There is, nonetheless, an appreciable reluctance in the jurisprudence to benefit directly from this rich resource. Looking first at the interpretation of procedural rules the Court appears willing to give the external jurisprudence at least some consideration. For example, in the now infamous witness proofing debate in the Lubanga case,[194] Trial Chamber I made the following determination:

> The Trial Chamber notes, as has been established by recent jurisprudence from the International Criminal Tribunals of the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, that witness proofing, in the sense advocated by the prosecution in the present case, is being commonly utilized at the ad hoc Tribunals.... However, this precedent is in no sense binding on the Trial Chamber at this Court. Article 21 of the Statute requires the Chamber to apply first the Statute, Elements of Crimes and Rules of the ICC. Thereafter, if ICC legislation is not definitive on the issue, the Trial Chamber should apply, where appropriate, principles and rules of international law. In the instant case, the issue before the Chamber is procedural in nature. While this would not, ipso facto, prevent all procedural issues from scrutiny under Article 21(1)(b), the Chamber does not consider the procedural rules and jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals to be automatically applicable to the ICC without detailed analysis.... [W]hile acknowledging the importance of considering the practice and jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals, the Chamber is not persuaded that the application of the ad hoc procedures, in the context of preparation of witnesses for trial, is appropriate.[195]

[191] If Art 38 was under discussion, this point would be clearly addressed by paragraph (d). On this issue see generally, V Nerlich, 'The Status of ICTY and ICTR Precedent on Proceedings before the ICC' in Sluiter and Stahn (n 85).

[192] Ibid., 313.

[193] W Schabas, The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 396, backing up this point by reference to extant ICC jurisprudence—see fn. 116.

[194] See generally, K Ambos, 'Witness Proofing before the ICC: Neither Legally Admissible nor Necessary' in Sluiter and Stahn (n 85); R Karemaker et al., 'Witness Proofing in International Criminal Tribunals: A Critical Analysis of Widening Procedural Divergence' (2008) 21 Leiden Journal of International Law 683; W Jordash, 'The Practice of "Witness Proofing" in International Criminal Tribunals: Why the International Criminal Court Should Prohibit the Practice' (2009) 22 Leiden Journal of International Law 501; S Vasiliev, 'Proofing the Ban on "Witness Proofing": Did the ICC Get it Right?' (2009) 20 Criminal Law Forum 193.

[195] Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial, Lubanga (n 93) paras 43–5 (emphasis added) . Cf. Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II to Redact Factual Descriptions of Crimes in the Warrants of Arrest, Motion for Reconsideration, and Motion for Clarification, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-60, PTC II, ICC, 28 October 2005, para. 19: 'As to the relevance of the case law of the ad hoc tribunals, the matter must be assessed against the provisions governing the law applicable before the Court... [T]he

Given the noted differences in procedural regimes governing the ad hoc Tribunals on the one hand and the ICC on the other, there is definite merit to the Trial Chamber's determination of the limited value that can be attached to the procedural jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals. As Nerlich puts it:

> Particular care should be exercised in identifying faux amies: many of the procedural provisions of the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence are similar, or even identical, to provisions of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ad hoc tribunals; yet given the systemic difference between the procedural systems outlined above, it may well be that an interpretation of the corresponding provisions by the ICTY or the ICTR may be inappropriate for the ICC. In other words, when relying on the external context of a provision it must always be ensured that the internal context…is respected.[196]

While similar divergences are appreciable in aspects of substantive law—bearing in mind the detailed definitional constructs of Articles 6, 7, 8 and 25—there is nevertheless evidence of considerable openness to ad hoc jurisprudential guidance, particularly with respect to the determination of contextual elements. For example, in the Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision, Pre-Trial Chamber I determined that coherent definitions of international and non-international armed conflict could not be distilled from either the Statute or the Elements of Crimes. Faced with such a predicament, Article 21(1)(b) was called upon to assist in addressing what must be regarded as a glaring statutory lacuna, whereupon the Chamber allowed itself to be guided by the established jurisprudence of both the Yugoslav Tribunal and the ICJ on the matter.[197] Addressing the question of the necessity of establishing a nexus between an armed conflict and the commission of alleged war crimes, the Pre-Trial Chamber held that '[i]n this respect…[it] follows the approach of the jurisprudence of the ICTY, which requires the conduct to have been closely related to the hostilities occurring in any part of the territories controlled by the parties to the conflict'.[198] However, it is also clear that such jurisprudence will only be considered once the textual interpretation of the provision has been exhausted in accordance with Article 21(1)(a). There are of course notable exceptions, such as the aforementioned use of the Stakić Trial Judgment in the interpretation of Article 25(3)(a). It seems that while ad hoc Tribunal jurisprudence on substantive international criminal law is unlikely to be directly applied, it is frequently an important aspect of the interpretative process.

The applicability of ad hoc Tribunal jurisprudence with respect to Article 21(1)(b) applies with equal validity to the identification of 'general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world' pursuant to Article 21(1)(c).[199] The intelligibility of this provision stands in contrast to the vast majority of Article 21(1), and would in fact appear to be consistent with the approach adopted by law and practice of the ad hoc tribunals, which the Prosecutor refers to, cannot per se form a sufficient basis for importing in the Court's procedural framework remedies other than those enshrined in the Statute.'

[196] Nerlich (n 191) 322.

[197] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 93) paras 205–37.

[198] Ibid., para. 287.

[199] Art 21(1)(c) Rome Statute.

the ad hoc Tribunals in the identification of general principles of law.[200] In this respect the general principles of law falling under paragraph (c) are entirely distinct from the principles of international law provided for under paragraph (b). It is clear that the general principles of law envisaged as populating paragraph (c) are not related to 'general principles of law' as provided for under Article 38(1)(c) of the Statute of the ICJ, but rather to those principles of law commonly underpinning domestic legal orders, particularly in the criminal sphere.[201] As Schabas maintains, it acts as 'an invitation to consult comparative criminal law as a subsidiary source of norms'.[202]

It is worth noting that Article 21(1)(c) is entirely consistent with the general tenor of the remarks made by Judge Antonio Cassese in his dissenting opinion in the Erdemović Sentencing Appeals Judgment. Commenting on the extent to which 'an international criminal court may or should draw upon national concepts and transpose these concepts into criminal proceedings', he cautioned that 'legal constructs and terms of art upheld in national law should not be automatically applied at the international level. They cannot be mechanically imported into international criminal proceedings.'[203] Article 21(1)(c) heeds this advice in instituting the caveat that such principles identified following an examination of a cross-section of diverse domestic practices can only be utilized provided that 'those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards'. In making particular reference to 'the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction', it would appear that once again the drafters wished to reinforce Article 21's absolute consistency with the principle of legality, even if it is difficult to conceive of a scenario where it would be 'appropriate' to rely on the national law of a specific state to the exclusion of all others.[204] The absolute requirement of consistency with the internal law of the Court serves not only to reinforce the textual primacy of the Statute, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, and the Elements of Crimes, but also protects against a liberal invocation of paragraph (c) for creative purposes. However, given its consistency with what is now established as international criminal practice, there are few grounds for criticism.

It is neither expected nor entirely desirable that the bench of the ICC would seek to casually adopt the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals as an additional primary source of internal law. However, as demonstrated by the ad hocs themselves, the jurisprudence of related international courts and tribunals nonetheless constitutes a series of extremely rich resources which can be creatively utilized in the ascertainment of customary norms under Article 21(1)(b) and general principles of law under Article 21(1)(c). There is some cause for concern, however, in observing the reluctance with which the Court has, at least thus far, consciously relied on this vast resource. The [200] See F Raimondo, General Principles of Law in the Decisions of International Criminal Courts and Tribunals (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2008).

[201] Art 38(1)(c) ICJ Statute (n 72): '(c) the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations'.

[202] Schabas, The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (n 193) 393.

[203] Sentencing Appeals Judgment—Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Cassese, Erdemović (n 68) paras 2–3.

[204] For a more detailed examination of the drafting history of Art 21(1)(c), see Schabas, The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (n 193) 393–4.

drafting of Article 21 is such that Chambers have felt compelled to clearly justify their utilization and have frequently favoured restraint. Instead of freely drawing on the complex interplay of sources identifiable in the international legal order in the interpretation of its constituent instruments, the bench of the ICC has instead effectively had to reinvent the wheel. The strict hierarchy instituted by Article 21(1) makes this a regrettable inevitability. The drafters of Article 21 clearly wished to mandate a restrained, formalized approach to the interpretation of the applicable law, making recourse to additional sources and a creative methodology a rare and last resort which must be tallied with the hierarchical structure of Article 21. However, observing Article 21(3), it would appear that not all avenues are closed to permissible interpretative creativity at the ICC.

19.4.2 Article 21(3)—consistency with international human rights law as a general interpretative provision

The foregoing analysis of Article 21(1) and (2) reveals a concerted effort on the part of the drafters to consciously limit the capacity of the bench to move beyond the interpretation and application of the internal law of the Court in accordance with its ordinary textual meaning. We have discussed at length the potential stifling of the judicial function brought about by the inclusion of a series of strict, mechanical hierarchies and modes of application of applicable law, which conceive of the judicial function as a statutorily manageable process. There is no doubt that the practice of the Court to date illustrates that the interpretational regime imposed by Article 21(1) and Article 22(2) is utilized in numerous instances in order to justify a restrained interpretative approach, with various Chambers expending some effort in justifying interpretational recourse to supplementary rules and principles in a manner inconsistent with the reality of the complex interplay of sources in the international legal order. However, a potential chink in the armour of this burgeoning culture of restraint is appreciable in the wording of Article 21(3), which provides that:

> The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3, age, race, colour, language, religion, or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status.

Appended curiously to the tail end of Article 21, paragraph (3) constitutes a general principle of interpretation to be applied to both the internal and external law of the Court.[205] Alain Pellet refers to it as 'perplexing', instituting what he describes as 'a sort of international "super-legality" ' whereby norms of international human rights law are afforded normative superiority over all other sources of both internal and external

[205] See e.g. Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Art 19(2)(a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-772, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, para. 36; Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 602: 'The Appeals Chamber has also law.[206] While arguments can be made to the contrary, there is nothing in either the drafting history or the ordinary meaning of the terms, beyond negative inferences, that might prohibit such an interpretation.[207] William Schabas, in acknowledging Article 21(3)'s rich potential, comments that:

> No other provision of the Rome Statute governs the application and interpretation of all of its provisions, as well as all of the other sources of applicable law. It is analogous to constitutional provisions in national law that authorize courts to interpret and even disallow legislated texts to the extent they are incompatible with fundamental human rights standards or they are discriminatory.[208]

The nature of Article 21(3)'s true potential lies in the construction that any and all interpretations and applications of the panoply of applicable law provided for in Article 21(1) must be consistent with 'internationally recognized human rights'. Therefore, Article 21(3) effectively proclaims that it is within the power of the bench to refuse to apply any provision of the internal law (i.e. the Statute, Rules of Procedure and Evidence, and Elements of Crimes) if such application would be contrary to norms of internationally recognized human rights.[209] The absence of a definition of internationally recognized human rights leaves it open to the bench to determine the rules populating this obtuse category, thereby allowing for judicial autonomy in the application of the Statute's overarching interpretative provision.[210] In this respect it acts as the lex specialis for the interpretation and application of the applicable law, irrespective of possible conflicts with interpretative results arrived at via recourse to the Vienna rules. That we can speak of Article 21(3) in such terms is ironic given that the supposed rationale for its inclusion lay once again with 'the principle of legality and the desire to limit judicial discretion'.[211] However, far from limiting judicial discretion, it mandates the bench to draw on a wide variety of external rules and jurisprudence in its interpretation and application of the law which not only reinforces and complements the

