decided that Article 21(3) of the Statute "makes the interpretation as well as the application of the law applicable under the Statute subject to internationally recognized human rights. It requires the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court in accordance with internationally recognized human rights norms" '; Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure Pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-108-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 19 May 2006, para. 7; Decision on the Joinder of the Cases against Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 94); Decision on the Set of Procedural Rights Attached to the Procedural Status of Victims at the Pre-Trial Stage of the Case, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-475, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008, paras 57 and 78.

[206] Pellet, 'Applicable Law' (n 52) 1079–81, 1079: '[I]t seems to introduce (or recognize?) a hierarchy between the norms to be applied by the Court: certain rules are given (or recognized as having?) an intrinsic superiority stemming not from their source, but their subject matter.'

[207] Cf. G Hafner and C Binder, 'The Interpretation of Article 21(3) ICC Statute, Opinion Reviewed' (2004) 9 Austrian Review of International and European Law 163. The main crux of their argument being, if super-legality had been intended, it would have been expressly mandated.

[208] Schabas, The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (n 193) 398.

[209] See Hafner and Binder (n 207). [210] Ibid.

[211] Grover (n 13) 559. See also M Arsanjani, 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (1999) 93 American Journal of International Law 22: 'While the original intention behind this paragraph principle of legality under Article 22, but also allows scope for the progressive development of the law via creative judicial interpretation.[212]

While Kenneth Gallant argues that Article 21(3) potentially allows the bench 'to some extent to modify the definitions of crimes over which the Statute gives the ICC jurisdiction',[213] it is more likely that in such instances Article 22(2) will intervene to prevent any prejudice to the rights of the accused. It is clear that Article 21(3) does not override the Statute as such, but rather comes into effect when more than one interpretation of a provision is possible, dictating that the interpretation that best conforms with human rights must be adopted.[214] So while Article 21(3) has significant potential, its necessary utilization in conjunction with Article 22 ensures that the principle of legality and the rights of the accused retain their potent force. Indeed, the principle of legality is without question subsumed within the category of internationally recognized human rights; to suggest its exclusion would be an absurdity. An example of the interpretation and application of Article 21(3) in conjunction with Article 22 in the interests of the rights of the accused is observable in Judge Van den Wyngaert's Concurring Opinion in the Ngudjolo case. In rejecting the Pre-Trial Chamber's application of the notion of indirect co-perpetration, she remarked that:

> Individuals must have been in a position to know at the time of engaging in certain conduct that the law criminalized it. The Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights has given considerable weight to the elements of 'accessibility' and 'foreseeability' in its assessment of the legality principle. I doubt whether anyone (inside or outside the DRC) could have known, prior to the Pre-Trial Chamber's first interpretations of Article 25(3)(a), that this article contained such an elaborate and peculiar form of criminal responsibility as the theory of 'indirect co-perpetration', much less that it rests upon the 'control over the crime' doctrine.[215]

Looking to the current practice of the Court with respect to Article 21(3), it is evident that its employment often acts as an effective means of circumventing the strict hierarchy of sources instituted by Article 21(1). As such, it is clear that external sources of law can be readily relied upon in the interpretation and application of the internal law of the Court without necessarily invoking textual ambiguity or a statutory lacuna, which, as we have seen, would be required in order for sources of law falling under Article 21(1)(b) and (c) to be formally utilized. In this sense, international human may have been to limit the court's powers in the application and interpretation of the relevant law, it could have the opposite effect and broaden the competence of the court on these matters. It provides a standard against which all the law applied by the court should be tested. This is sweeping language, which, as drafted, could apply to all three categories of Article 21'; J Verhoeven, 'Article 21 of the Rome Statute and the Ambiguities of Applicable Law' (2002) 33 Netherlands Yearbook of International Law 2.

[212] See K Gallant, 'Individual Human Rights in a New International Organization: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' in M C Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law—Volume III (Leiden: Brill 2008) 693; G Edwards, 'International Human Rights Law Challenges to the New International Criminal Court: The Search and Seizure Right to Privacy' (2001) 26 Yale Journal of International Law 323.

[213] See Gallant, 'Individual Human Rights in a New International Organization' (n 212) 693.

[214] Hafner and Binder (n 207) 178.

[215] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Ngudjolo (n 123) para. 20.

rights law constitutes a potentially ever-present guiding aid in the construction of all aspects of the Rome Statute and acts as a bulwark against judicial arbitrariness.

A useful example is observable in the Lubanga case with respect to the applicability of the doctrine of abuse of process in the context of proceedings before the Court despite its absence from the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Addressing the issue, the Appeals Chamber focused on the centrality of Article 21(3) to any determination arrived at:

> Article 21(3) of the Statute stipulates that the law applicable under the Statute must be interpreted as well as applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights. Human rights underpin the Statute; every aspect of it, including the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court. Its provisions must be interpreted and more importantly applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights; first and foremost, in the context of the Statute, the right to a fair trial, a concept broadly perceived and applied, embracing the judicial process in its entirety.... Where fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial. Justice could not be done. A fair trial is the only means to do justice. If no fair trial can be held, the object of the judicial process is frustrated and the process must be stopped.[216]

Following an examination of a selection of ECtHR case law and domestic practice, the Appeals Chamber held that the application of Article 21(3) dictated that the right to a stay of proceedings based on abuse of process must be recognized as falling within the ambit of Article 67 of the Statute:

> Unfairness in the treatment of the suspect or the accused may rupture the process to an extent making it impossible to piece together the constituent elements of a fair trial. In those circumstances, the interest of the world community to put persons accused of the most heinous crimes against humanity on trial, great as it is, is outweighed by the need to sustain the efficacy of the judicial process as the potent agent of justice.[217]

The Appeals Chamber therefore recognized the applicability of abuse of process, not on the basis of its inherent jurisdiction as one might have predicted given the practice of the ad hoc Tribunals, but rather via direct invocation of Article 21(3).[218] In this respect, the interpretative developmental potential of Article 21(3) seems clear for all to see.

The recognition of abuse of process by the Appeals Chamber in light of Article 21(3), and in particular the rights of the accused under Article 67, can be compared [216] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court Pursuant to Art 19(2) of the Statute of 3 October 2006, Lubanga (n 205) para. 37.

[217] Ibid., para. 39.

[218] See J Liang, 'The Inherent Jurisdiction and Inherent Powers of International Courts and Tribunals: An Appraisal of their Application' (2012) 15 New Criminal Law Review 375. See also Decision on the Admissibility and Abuse of Process Challenges, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-802, TC III, ICC, 24 June 2010, paras 252 and 253.

with their interpretation of the permissible timeframe and circumstances in which the recharacterization of facts under Regulation 55 may be implemented by Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers.[219] In its consideration of the issue in the Lubanga case, the Appeals Chamber determined, following an examination of numerous international human rights instruments and relevant jurisprudence of the ECtHR in line with Article 21(3), that 'human rights law demands that the modification of the legal characterization of facts in the course of the trial must not render the trial unfair'.[220] It held further that the modalities of the Regulation's application in accordance with the rights of the accused would, of necessity, have to be considered on a case-by-case basis.[221] From a reasoning perspective, it would appear that Article 21(3) was appropriately utilized in this instance; however, the same can hardly be said about the interpretation and application of Regulation 55 by the Trial Chamber in the Katanga case.[222]

Numerous examples of the developmental potential of Article 21(3) are observable throughout the practice of the Court; however, it would be remiss not to mention in passing the extent to which the Court has relied on international human rights law in giving substance to the right of victim participation.[223] Without delving into the issue in any detail, it is nonetheless worth noting that the Court has consistently interpreted the right of victim participation pursuant to Article 68 and Rules 85 and 89 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence through the lens of international human rights law via direct invocation of Article 21(3).[224] In this respect the Court has sought guidance in (amongst other instruments) the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, the Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law, and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. On the related issue of victim reparations, the Trial Chamber in Lubanga, acting pursuant to Article 21(3), issued its decision establishing guidelines for the operationalization of the Court's reparations regime

[219] For an in-depth discussion of this issue see Heller, Chapter 39, this volume. See also D Jacobs, 'A Shifting Scale of Power: Who is in Charge of the Charges at the International Criminal Court and the Uses of Regulation 55?' in Schabas et al. (n 66).

[220] Judgment on the Appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009, paras 84–5.

[221] Ibid., para. 85.

[222] See Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against Accused Persons, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319-tENG/FRA, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012; Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against Accused Persons—Minority Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngeart, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319-tENG/FRA, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012; Judgment on the Appeal of Germain Katanga against the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 21 November 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3363, AC, ICC, 27 March 2013.

[223] For a detailed examination of this issue, see Vasiliev, Chapter 45, this volume.

[224] See for example (amongst many): Decision on the Application for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the

in light of a wealth of international human rights law and practice.[225] The Court has also invoked Article 21(3) with respect to a plethora of procedural and evidential questions. For instance, in the context of the Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber grounded their interpretation of the evidential standard of 'substantial grounds to believe' firmly on the jurisprudence of the ECtHR.[226]

The foregoing constitutes nothing more than a mere snapshot of the Court's practice with respect to Article 21(3).[227] However, it is sufficient to establish the point that, while Article 21(3) does not endow the bench with exceptional creative powers, it does represent a chink in the armour of Article 21(1) such that the judicial role in the progressive development of the law via creative judicial interpretation, far from being extinguished, may continue to flourish and evolve in accordance with the requirements of the international criminal legal order.

19.4.3 Article 22(2)—interpretative freedom and the requirements of strict construction

'It is a basic principle of justice that a person may not be punished if the incriminating acts, when they were committed, were not prohibited by law.'[228] The principle of legality, thus put, has been ever present in the international criminal justice discourse going right back to the post-First World War Leipzig trials.[229] As a basic principle of justice,

Congo (n 91); Decision on Victims' Participation in Proceedings, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-24, PTC II, ICC, 3 November 2010; Decision on Victims' Participation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-267, PTC II, ICC, 26 August 2011; Fourth Decision on Victims' Participation, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-320, PTC II, ICC, 12 December 2008; Decision on the Treatment of Application for Participation, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-933, PTC I, ICC, 26 February 2009; Decision on the Applications by Victims to Participate in the Proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1556, PTC I, ICC, 15 December 2008.

[225] Decision Establishing the Principles and Procedures to be Applied to Reparations, Lubanga, Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2904, TC I, ICC, 7 August 2012, paras 185 and 186: '[T]he right to reparations is a well-established and basic human right, that is enshrined in universal and regional human rights treaties, and in other international instruments, including the UN Basic Principles; the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power; the Guidelines on Justice in Matters involving Child Victims and Witnesses of Crime; the Nairobi Declaration; the Cape Town Principles and Best Practices on the Recruitment of Children into the Armed Forces and on Demobilization and Social Reintegration of Child Soldiers in Africa; and the Paris Principles. . . . [G]iven the substantial contribution by regional human rights bodies in furthering the right of individuals to an effective remedy and to reparations; the Chamber has taken into account the jurisprudence of the regional human rights courts and the national and international mechanisms and practices that have been developed in this field.'

[226] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 93) para. 38. See also Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-20-Anx1, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda (n 138) para. 36.

[227] For further insight into the practice of the Court with respect to Article 21(3), see Bitti, Chapter 18, this volume.

[228] W Schabas, 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the International Criminal Court Statute (Part III)' (1998) 6 European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice 402, 406. See also K Ambos, 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the Rome Statute' (1999) 10 Criminal Law Forum 1.

[229] See A Kramer, 'The First Wave of International War Crimes Trials: Istanbul and Leipzig' (2006) 14 European Review 441; G Gordon Battle, 'The Trials before the Leipsic Supreme Court of Germans Accused it enjoys the rare distinction of constituting a non-derogable norm of international human rights law with a positive basis in all of the major international and regional human rights instruments.[230] Along with fidelity to customary international law, it typically constitutes the 'Golden Rule' of interpretation applicable to international criminal instruments and should be viewed as an element of a sequenced interpretative approach that aims at ensuring certainty, predictability (or fair warning), and textual consistency.[231] Enshrined most concretely in Article 22 of the Rome Statute, there is no ambiguity as to its centrality in the interpretative schematics of the instrument.[232] While issues surrounding recourse to the principle in an interpretative sense would certainly justify lengthy treatment in its own right, it is nonetheless worth highlighting a number of factors which establish that the formal operation of the principle is a central component of the interpretative regime of the Rome Statute.

The principle of the non-retroactive application of law, as a core element of the principle of legality, is well known and uncontested.[233] Of more discursive value at this juncture are a number of its constituent presumptions, particularly the presumption in favour of the strict construction of penal statutes and the inextricably linked principle of in dubio pro reo, which appears to specifically institute a quasi-judicial obligation to cautiously interpret penal statutes or at least to emphasize the non-creative interpretation of criminal statutes. Article 22(2) of the Rome Statute supplies a succinct definition: '[t]he definition of a crime shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy. In case of ambiguity, the definition shall be interpreted in favour of the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted'.[234] As a general principle of law it has enjoyed a long history; for instance, in 1887 Lord Escher proclaimed in Tuck & Sons v Priester that:

of War Crimes' (1921) 8 Virginia Law Review 1; W Schabas, 'Nullum Crimen Sine Lege' in W Schabas, Unimaginable Atrocities: Justice, Politics and Rights at the War Crimes Tribunals (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 47–72.

[230] See e.g. Art 15 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (adopted by UNGA Res 2200A (XXI) (16 December 1966), entered into force 23 March 1976) 999 UNTS 171; Art 7 Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (concluded 11 April 1950, entered into force 3 September 1953) 213 UNTS 221; Art 9 American Convention on Human Rights (adopted 22 November 1969, entered into force 18 July 1978) 1144 UNTS 123; Art 7(2) African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (adopted 27 June 1981, entered into force 21 October 1986) OAU Doc CAB/LEG/67/3 Rev. 5.

[231] See Report of the Secretary-General, 3 May 1993 (n 57) para. 34: 'In the view of the Secretary-General, the application of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege requires that the international tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond doubt part of customary law so that the problem of adherence of some but not all States to specific conventions does not arise. This would appear to be particularly important in the context of an international tribunal prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law'. See also Powderly, 'Judicial Interpretation at the Ad Hoc Tribunals: Method from Chaos?' (n 50) 17.

[232] Additional limbs of the principle of legality (particularly with respect to retroactivity) are also observable in: Art 11(1)—'The Court has jurisdiction only with respect to crimes committed after the entry into force of this Statute'; and Art 24(1) and (2)—'1. No person shall be criminally responsible under this Statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the Statute. 2. In the event of a change in the law applicable to a given case prior to a final judgment, the law more favourable to the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted shall apply.'

[233] In this respect Art 22(1) of the Rome Statute provides, '[a] person shall not be criminally responsible under this Statute unless the conduct in question constitutes, at the time it takes place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'. See generally, Gallant, The Principle of Legality in International and Comparative Criminal Law (n 165); L Grover, Interpreting Crimes in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2014) 102–219.

[234] Art 22(2) Rome Statute.

> [i]f there is a reasonable interpretation which will avoid the penalty in any particular case, we must adopt that construction. If there are two reasonable constructions we must give the more lenient one. That is the settled rule for construction in penal sections.[235]

The nature of its application, at least domestically, is, however, rather removed from the literal import of its definition. It is quite obvious, most particularly in a common-law context, that in fact the principle is infrequently invoked and rarely acts as a disincentive for the adoption of broad or developmental interpretations.[236] The great Granville Williams, commenting some years ago, remarked that:

> [n]owadays the criminal courts rarely apply the rule of strict construction. They will still apply it if they are in genuine doubt as to the intention of the legislature and if there are no considerations indicating the desirability of a wide interpretation of the statute. But if the statute admits of alternative interpretations and public policy suggests that the wider interpretation should be preferred, the courts will usually apply the wider one.[237]

In this sense the presumption appears to act as a last resort once the various canons and aids to construction have failed to provide legitimate interpretative clarity. In support of this conclusion, the renowned authority on issues of statutory interpretation, Peter Maxwell, commented that:

> [t]he effect of the rule of strict construction might almost be summed up in the remark, that where an equivocal word or ambiguous sentence leaves a reasonable doubt of its meaning which the canons of interpretation fail to solve, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the subject, and against the Legislature which has failed to explain itself. But it yields to the paramount rule that every statute is to be expounded according to its expression of manifest intention; and that all cases within the mischiefs aimed at are, if the language permits, to be held to fall within its remedial influence.[238]

Thus, if after attempting to rationalize the text in accordance with the intentions of the drafters and the general object and purpose of a provision the ambiguity persists, then the benefit of such ambiguity is to accrue to the accused.[239] In many ways, the [235] (1887) 19 QBD 629, 638. Quoted in J Bell and G Engle, Cross: Statutory Interpretation 3rd edn (London: LexisNexis Butterworths 1995) 172.

[236] See UK Law Commission Report 177, 'Criminal Law: A Criminal Code of England and Wales (1989) 3.17: 'We are skeptical…whether such a principle really exists. It is of course often referred to by the courts, but it is rarely applied in practice. This is because the "principle" cannot sensibly be used as a rule for the resolution of all ambiguities.' See also A Ashworth, 'Interpreting Criminal Statutes: A Crisis of Legality? (1991) 107 Law Quarterly Review 419; A Ashworth and J Horder, Principles of Criminal Law 7th edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 68; L Hall, 'Strict or Liberal Construction of Penal Statutes' (1934–5) 48 Harvard Law Review 748; J Walker, 'Judicial Tendencies in Statutory Construction: Differing Views on the Role of the Judge' (2003) 58 New York University Annual Survey of American Law 203; J Jeffries, 'Legality, Vagueness and the Construction of Penal Statutes' (1985) 71 Virginia Law Review 189. Cf. Oxford v Moss (1979) 68 Cr App R 183.

[237] Quoted in Bell and Engle (n 235) 174–5.

[238] P Maxwell, On the Interpretation of Statutes 6th edn (London: Sweet and Maxwell 1920) 500–1.

[239] See also DPP v Ottewell (1970) AC 642: 'where after full inquiry and consideration one is left in doubt. It is not enough that the provision is ambiguous in the sense that it is capable of having two meanings.'

invocation of in dubio pro reo is a confession of no clear resolution of interpretative ambiguity, akin perhaps to the notion of non liquet, such that the only equitable determination must be the one that best protects the rights of the accused (linked most frequently to the presumption of innocence).

In the context of international criminal proceedings, the principle of strict construction has been infrequently referenced and only occasionally invoked.[240] One such instance was in the Akayesu case before the Rwanda Tribunal where there was a disparity of meaning between the English and French versions of the Statute, specifically relating to reconciling the understanding to be given to 'killing' and 'meurtre' under Article 2(2) of the Statute in the context of the crime of genocide. Utilizing the principle, the Trial Chamber determined that:

> [g]iven the presumption of innocence of the accused, and pursuant to the general principles of criminal law, the Chamber holds that the version more favourable to the accused should be upheld and finds that Article 2(2)(a) of the Statute must be interpreted in accordance with the definition of murder given in the Penal Code of Rwanda, according to which 'meurtre' (killing) is homicide committed with intent to cause death.[241]

However, the best exploration of the principle and the potential impact its invocation may have on the interpretative enterprise of the bench is to be found in the comments of the Trial Chamber in the Čelebići case. The discussion is well worth reproducing in full:

> It is for the legislature and not the court or judge to define a crime and prescribe its punishment. It is the well-recognized paramount duty of the judicial interpreter, or judge, to read into the language of the legislature, honestly and faithfully, its plain and rational meaning and to promote its object. The rule of strict construction requires that the language of a particular provision shall be construed such that no cases shall be held to fall within it which do not fall both within the reasonable meaning of its terms and within the spirit and scope of the enactment. The accepted view is that if the legislature has not used words sufficiently comprehensive to include within its prohibition all the cases which should naturally fall within the mischief intended to be prevented, the interpreter is not competent to extend them. A strict construction requires that no case shall fall within a penal statute which does not comprise all the elements which, whether morally material or not, are in fact made to constitute the offence as defined by the statute. It has always been the practice of courts not to fill omissions in legislation when this can be said to have been deliberate. It would seem, however, that where the omission was accidental, it is usual to supply the missing words to give the legislation the meaning intended. The paramount object in the > construction of a criminal provision, or any other statute, is to ascertain the legislative intent. The rule of strict construction is not violated by giving the expression its full meaning or the alternative meaning which is more consonant with the legislative intent and best effectuates such intent. The effect of strict construction of the provisions of a criminal statute is that where an equivocal word or ambiguous sentence leaves a reasonable doubt of its meaning which the canons of construction fail to solve, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the subject and against the legislature which has failed to explain itself. This is why ambiguous criminal statutes are to be construed contra proferentem.[242]

[240] See e.g. Decision on Appellant's Motion for the Extension of the Time-Limit and Admission of Additional Evidence, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 October 1998, para. 73; Sentencing Appeal Judgment—Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Cassese, Erdemović (n 68) para. 49; Judgment, Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-T, TC, ICTR, 21 May 1999, para. 103; Judgment, Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-T, TC, ICTR, 6 December 1999, para. 51; Judgment, Musema, ICTR-96-13-T, TC, ICTR, 27 January 2000, para. 155.

[241] Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, TC, ICTR, 2 September 1998, para. 501.

It follows from this, therefore, that there is (at least theoretically) nothing in the principle of strict construction which prohibits the bench from addressing lacunae in the Statute via recourse to creative interpretation of positive rules. This conclusion, which applies with equal validity to the entirety of the principle of legality, is entirely consistent with the jurisprudence of the ECtHR. Like all rules, the effectiveness of criminal rules is dependent on their judicial interpretation and application to changing circumstances. Commenting on this point in C R v the United Kingdom, the ECtHR found that the principle of legality 'cannot be read as outlawing the gradual clarification of the rules of criminal liability through judicial interpretation from case to case, provided that the resultant development is consistent with the essence of the offence and could reasonably be foreseen'.[243]

Provided that the interpretation of the offence proceeds on the basis of an extant positive rule, its clarification and modification to related foreseeable circumstances is entirely consistent with the principle of legality. As Mohamed Shahabuddeen has declared, 'the principle of nullum crimen sine lege does not bar the progressive development of the law, provided that the developed law retains the essence of the original crime'.[244] This accords with the general tenor of Andrew Ashworth's contention that those 'who knowingly "sail too close to the wind" should not be surprised if the law is interpreted so as to include their conduct'.[245] The general import of this conclusion finds support in the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber of the Yugoslav Tribunal, who held in the Odjanić case that, while the principle of legality does not outlaw the progressive development of the law via creative judicial interpretation, it

[242] Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 16 November 1998, paras 408–13.

[243] C R v United Kingdom (Judgment) 22 November 1995, para. 34 (emphasis added); Kokkinakis v Greece (Judgment) 17 EHRR 397, para. 397.

[244] M Shahabuddeen, 'Does the Principle of Legality Stand in the Way of the Progressive Development of the Law?' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1013. He continues at 1017: 'For the moment, it seems that, in applying the principle of nullum crimen sine lege, the proper approach is for the court to consider the scientific implication of the basic principles of a crime and to see whether the impugned behaviour falls within the framework of conduct proscribed by those principles. Thus, when the substance of the matter is regarded as against the theory of the thing, it is difficult not to support rulings in the larger sense mentioned, always provided that the alleged acts are within the "very essence" of the original crime even though not corresponding to every detail of it.' See also Shahabuddeen (n 4) 70–4.

[245] Ashworth, 'Interpreting Criminal Statutes' (n 236) 430. See also Knuller v DPP [1973] AC 435, 463, where Lord Morris remarked that 'those who skate on thin ice can hardly expect to find a sign which will denote the precise spot where he will fall in'.

does, however, 'prevent a court from creating new law or from interpreting existing law beyond the reasonable limits of acceptable clarification'.[246]

Turning to the manner in which the principle of strict construction has been interpreted and applied thus far by the bench of the ICC, the Appeals Chamber has underlined that 'it is guided by the principle [of] in dubio pro reo as a component of the presumption of innocence, which is a general principle in criminal procedure that applies, mutatis mutandis, to all stages of the proceedings'.[247] While the principle is central to the interpretative regime of the Rome Statute, it must be emphasized that Article 22(2) is unambiguous in limiting its application to the interpretation of the substantive penal provisions of the Statute (i.e. the definition of crimes pursuant to Articles 6–8*bis* and modes of liability as provided for in Articles 25 and 28), with the possible caveat that it may be applied with respect to the interpretation of additional articles of the Statute and general principles having a direct impact on the application of these substantive provisions.[248]

However, in certain respects the jurisprudence to date would benefit from clarity on this point. For instance, in challenging the application of the power to join cases at the pre-trial stage, Ngudjolo argued that the principle of strict construction trumped any interpretation arrived at via recourse to the Vienna rules. Rejecting this argument, the Pre-Trial Chamber determined that since Article 64(5) and Rule 136 were silent on the matter, a procedural lacuna existed such that 'the strict literal interpretation of the relevant provisions required by the principle of legality [was] not possible', before proceeding to resolve the question pursuant to the Vienna rules.[249] Reviewing the question, the Appeals Chamber failed to point out the questionable relevance of strict construction to the interpretation of the impugned provisions, stating instead that the Pre-Trial Chamber's determination was in accordance with the rights of the accused and far from violating the principle of legality in fact gave 'expression to it'.[250] A statement to the effect that the resolution of such procedural questions must be achieved pursuant to Article 21(3) and the Vienna Convention rules would certainly have been useful in this instance.

Express acknowledgement of the specific applicability of Article 22(2) to the interpretation of the penal provisions of the Statute is, however, found in the Concurring Opinion of Judge Van den Wyngaert in the Ngudjolo case. As alluded to previously, in rejecting the inclusion of the notion of indirect co-perpetration in the interpretation of Article 25(3)(a), she remarked that:

[246] Decision on Dragoljub Ojdanic's motion challenging jurisdiction—joint criminal enterprise, Ojdanić, IT-99-37-AR72, AC, ICTY, 21 May 2003, paras 37–8.

[247] Defence Response to the Prosecution's Document in Support of the Appeal, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-508-tENG, AC, ICC, 2 April 2012, para. 35; Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba (n 94) para. 31.

[248] See Schabas, The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (n 193) 410.

[249] Decision on Application for Leave to Appeal by the Defence of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui against the Decision on Joinder, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 94) 7.

[250] Judgment on the Appeal against the Decision on Joinder Rendered on 10 March 2008 by the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui Cases, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-573, AC, ICC, 9 June 2008, para. 9.

> I attach the greatest importance to Article 22(2) of the Statute, which obliges the Court to interpret the definition of crimes strictly and prohibits any extension by analogy. There can be little doubt that this fundamental principle applies with equal force in relation to the definition of criminal responsibility. Indeed, I believe that this article overrides the conventional methods of treaty interpretation, as defined in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, particularly the teleological method. Whereas these methods of interpretation may be entirely adequate for interpreting other parts of the Statute, I consider that for interpreting articles dealing with the criminal responsibility of individuals, the principles of strict construction and in dubio pro reo are paramount.[251]

As for the rationale underpinning the express inclusion of the principle within the Statute framework, Van den Wyngaert was outspoken in her remarks that, while the principle was necessary in the interests of certainty and predictability, it was nonetheless the case that 'the drafters wanted to make sure that the Court could not engage in the kind of "judicial creativity" of which other jurisdictions may at times have been suspected'.[252]

There are a number of examples of Article 22(2) intervening in order to stymie the potentially creative or developmental urges of the bench. For example, in the Bemba case, the Pre-Trial Chamber was required to determine whether the concept of dolus eventualis or foreseeability was cognizable in Article 30 of the Statute.[253] Following a textual interpretation, confirmed via recourse to the relevant travaux préparatoires, and considered in light of Article 22(2), the Chamber rejected its inclusion, stating that such a finding:

> [a]ims to ensure that any interpretation given to the definition of crimes is in harmony with the rule of strict construction set out in article 22(2) of the Statute. It ensures that the Chamber is not substituting the concept of de lege lata with the

[251] Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 18.

[252] Ibid., para. 19. See also Decision on the OPCD's Request for Leave to Appeal the 3 July 2008 Decision on Applications for Participation, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-535, PTC I, ICC, 4 September 2008. Here the Office of Public Counsel for the Defence ('OPCD') challenged the manner in which the Pre-Trial Chamber decided on victim status applications submitted at the investigation stage as being in violation of the principle of in dubio pro reo. Rejecting the argument, the Single Judge, Judge Anita Ušacka, held that, 'the OPCD's argument that the Decision of 3 July 2008 modified the application of the principle of in dubio pro reo in respect of the decisions applications is misguided' (para. 23). She then proceeded to draw on the jurisprudence of the Pre-Trial Chamber to the effect that the principle was inapplicable to this aspect of the proceedings, since 'the application process is not related to questions pertaining to the guilt or innocence of the suspect or accused person or to the credibility of Prosecution witnesses as it only aims at determining whether the procedural status of victims should be granted to applicants. Hence, it can be distinguished from criminal proceedings before the Court, which include the investigation of a situation, the initiation of a case and the pre-trial, trial and appeal stages of a case, which are governed by specific articles, rules and regulations' (para. 23, citing Decision on the Requests of the OPCD on the Production of Relevant Supporting Documentation Pursuant to Regulation 86(2)(e) of the Regulations of the Court and on the Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials by the Prosecutor, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-417, PTC I, ICC, 7 December 2007, para. 6).

[253] Since Art 30 provides for the inclusion of a general mental element in the definition of crimes—unless otherwise provided for—it clearly falls within the scope of Art 22(2)'s interpretative ambit.

> concept of de lege ferenda only for the sake of widening the scope of article 30 of the Statute and capturing a broader range of perpetrators.[254]

Interestingly, this interpretation constituted a tacit rejection of the Pre-Trial Chamber's prior recognition of the concept in the Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision. In that instance, the Chamber made no effort to tally their interpretation with Article 22(2), relying instead on interpretative guidance derived from doctrine and ad hoc Tribunal jurisprudence.[255] Later in the Bemba Confirmation of Charges Decision, the Chamber invoked a similarly literal textual interpretation in recognizing the presence of a causality requirement in the chapeau of Article 28. Once again, the Chamber emphasized that their interpretation was 'consistent with the principle of strict construction mirrored in article 22(2) of the Statute which, as a part of the principle nullum crimen sine lege, compels the Chamber to interpret this provision strictly'.[256]

With respect to the interpretation of crimes specifically, the Court has been alert to the need to adopt interpretations in accordance with the Elements of Crimes document (as mandated by Article 9) read in light of Article 22 and in particular Article 22(2). For example, in their interpretation of the elements of the offence of conscripting, enlisting, and using children in armed conflict, the Trial Chamber in the Lubanga case was careful to point out the consistency of their textual interpretation with both the Elements of Crimes and Article 22(2).[257] A similar approach was adopted in the Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision with respect to the interpretation of other inhumane acts under Article 7(1)(k) of the Statute, although significant guidance was also derived from ad hoc Tribunal jurisprudence.[258] However, for the most comprehensive treatment of the close alliance between the Elements of Crimes and Article 22, we must look to the first arrest warrant decision in the Al Bashir case. In this instance, the Pre-Trial Chamber was addressing whether or not the crime of genocide, as provided for under Article 6 of the Statute, should be interpreted to include a contextual element to the effect that the conduct in question 'must have taken place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against the targeted group or must have had such a nature so as to itself effect, the total or partial destruction of the targeted group'.[259] The Majority, Judge Ušacka dissenting, found that the Elements of Crimes and the Rules 'must be applied unless the competent Chamber finds an irreconcilable contradiction between these documents on

[254] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba (n 94) para. 369.

[255] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 93) paras 349–60.

[256] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba (n 94) para. 423. For a critique of interpretative issues arising in the Bemba Confirmation Decision see K Ambos, 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision' (2009) 22 Leiden Journal of International Law 715.

[257] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 95) para. 620. See section 19.4.1 for a detailed discussion of the Trial Chamber's reasoning on this issue.

[258] Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 93) paras 446–55.

[259] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir (n 138) para. 123. For more on this issue, see Kreβ, Chapter 27, this volume.

the one hand, and the Statute on the other hand'.[260] The Majority considered that this interpretation was:

> [a]lso supported by the object and purpose of article 9(1) of the Statute, which consists of furthering the nullum crimen sine lege principle embraced in article 22 of the Statute, by providing a priori legal certainty on the content of the definition of crimes provided for in the Statute. In the Majority's view, had the application of the Elements of Crimes been fully discretionary for the competent Chamber, the safeguards provided for by the article 22 nullum crimen sine lege principle would be significantly eroded.[261]

This interpretation was also held to be fully consistent with a strict construction of Article 6.[262]

The inclusion of Article 22(2) is merely an additional reminder of the fact that states intended the Rome Statute to constitute a detailed lex scripta of substantive international criminal law. While the objective may have been to lend certainty and predictability to the law, it is undoubtedly the case, as suggested by Judge Van den Wyngaert, that states also wished to curtail the creative interpretative potential of the bench. The potential continuation of the liberally legislating bench, so characteristic of the judges at the ad hoc Tribunals, was anathema to the drafters of the Rome Statute. Article 22(2) allied with Article 21(1) simply act as restraining buckles in the attempted straitjacketing of the interpretative judicial function visibly brought to bear in the Rome Statute framework. However, as the jurisprudential reality to date illustrates, the bench is more than capable of performing impressive feats of creative interpretative escapology.

19.5 Conclusions

This chapter has illustrated that the Rome Statute's attempted corseting of the creative interpretative freedom of the bench through the inclusion of a set of specific 'disciplining' rules, in the form of Article 21's institution of textualism and a hierarchy of sources and Article 22(2)'s mandating of strict construction in the interpretation of substantive international criminal law, has ultimately proved to be a failure. While adherence to the ordinary meaning of the text has been given priority and has in numerous instances resulted in a decidedly restrained interpretative approach, it is nonetheless evident, such as with respect to the prevailing interpretation of Article 25(3)(a), that the bench is prepared to forgo the ordinary meaning of the text when policy considerations enter the interpretative fray. Such instances have, thus far, been rare in comparison to the liberal teleology characteristic of the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals. However, the discussion of Article 21's strict hierarchy of sources suggests that accusations to the effect that the Rome Statute 'evinces a certain mistrust in the judges',[263] and shows an intent on the part of the drafters to 'maintain control over the making of international law and to keep a tight leash on the ability of international judges to go beyond what the States Parties have agreed to',[264] are neither hyperbolic nor defamatory.

[260] Ibid., para. 128. [261] Ibid., para. 131. [262] Ibid., para. 133.

[263] Cassese, 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections' (n 47) 163.

It has been argued that the objective of the Rome Conference was not to expressly codify rules developed before the antecedent criminal tribunals—the extent to which this occurred was little more than a welcome by-product—but was rather focused on arriving at a consensually drafted penal Statute constructed such as to attract as many ratifications as possible. It is evident that in drafting the Statute, states went to considerable lengths to attempt to ensure that the circumstances in which it would be deemed necessary to have recourse to judicial discretion in the interpretation and application of the law would be kept to an absolute minimum. In this respect, the internal law of the Court, taken as a whole, can be viewed as an attempt to reconfigure the traditional and prevailing contours of the international criminal judicial function.

This endeavour is no better illustrated than in the form of Articles 21(1) and 22(2). As we have discussed, Article 21(1) not only sought to identify the applicable law—in itself a seminal development in an international criminal context—but also to carefully dictate the methodology to be applied by the bench in its invocation. In so doing, the drafters showed a regrettable ignorance of the complex nature of the interplay of sources of law within the international legal order and enumerated a provision with the potential to frustrate permissible and legitimate interpretational creativity aimed at progressively developing the law. However, Article 21(3)'s requirement that the interpretation and application of the Rome Statute be in conformity with international human rights law constitutes one obvious avenue via which the bench can free themselves from the constraints of the strict hierarchy of sources and the prioritization of text. While Article 21(3)'s rich potential is yet to be fully realized, it is expected that as the Court's jurisprudence continues to mature, so will its invocation of this provision. Article 22(2)'s requirement that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Court be strictly construed is entirely in keeping with general principles of criminal law and is entirely appropriate, but should not be viewed as prohibiting developmental interpretation in any and all circumstances. This chapter's examination of the law and practice of the Court with respect to sources of law and interpretational techniques illustrates that, whereas the drafters may have wished to corset the judicial function in positive rules, the bench has identified sufficient wriggle-room in order to allow them to breathe life into the law.

[264] Hunt (n 47) 61.

20

Perpetration and Participation in Article 25(3)

*Elies van Sliedregt

20.1 Introduction

Article 25 of the ICC Statute[1] and its interpretation has generated much debate amongst practitioners and commentators, on blogs, in scholarly writing, and in dissenting opinions appended to ICC judgments. Case law on Article 25, in particular the Pre-Trial Chamber Decisions confirming charges in the cases against Lubanga[2] and Katanga and Ngdjolo,[3] and the Trial Chamber judgment in Lubanga,[4] are lengthy and replete with complex meanderings on criminal law theory. Particularly striking are the reliance on German criminal law and the attempt to develop a Dogmatik in Article 25(3).

Relying on Article 21 of its Statute (on the sources of law), the ICC has forged a distinct path away from the law of other international and internationalized courts and liability theories, such as the JCE. With respect to the latter, this may be welcomed from a liberal justice perspective. Despite its usefulness as a tool fighting systemic and masterminded criminality, JCE has been controversial for its broad scope. Also, the text of the ICC Statute indicates a different approach to criminal responsibility than jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals. Article 25(3)(a) is unique in that it explicitly recognizes the remote principal or the non-physical perpetrator.[5] It follows from Article 25(3)(a) that joint and indirect perpetrators who do not fulfil all the elements of the actus reus can be regarded as perpetrators. This means that indirect and joint perpetrators are liable in their own right; liability is not derived from the person who physically commits the crimes, as is the case with complicity liability. The ICC has embraced the concept of 'control' to interpret Article 25 and to identify who can be regarded as the criminal mastermind behind mass violence.

* Elies van Sliedregt is Professor of Criminal Law at Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam, Director of the Center for International Criminal Justice, and Dean of the Faculty of Law.

[1] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[2] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007 ('Lubanga Confirmation Decision').

[3] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision').

[4] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04–01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 ('Lubanga Trial Judgment').

[5] See also Weigend, Chapter 22, this volume. See also ICC, Prosecutor v Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Judgment, Case No. ICC-01/04-01/06A A 5, 1 December 2014, paras 465–6 (hereinafter Lubanga Appeal Judgment).

The text of Article 25(3) was the result of difficult diplomatic negotiations. It brings together different modes of liability, which explains why it contains a number of partially overlapping liability theories.[6] The question before the ICC is how to interpret such a provision. Should a (Pre-)Trial Chamber adopt a dogmatic approach structuring the whole of the provision, rationalizing overlapping modes of liability, or should it adopt a case-by-case approach, focusing on the wording of the Statute and limiting itself to interpreting the subparagraph in the case before it? The answer to this question has divided the Trial Chambers in the first two judgments of the ICC: the Lubanga conviction of 14 March 2012[7] and the Ngudjolo acquittal of 18 December 2012.[8] Roughly speaking, the majority opinion in Lubanga, endorsing the Pre-Trial Chamber Decision in Lubanga (and Katanga and Ngudjolo), represents a dogmatic approach where one single legal theory—based on the concept of 'control'—is thought to provide the theoretical grounding of Article 25 and where the law is expected to reflect subtle differences in the degrees of blameworthiness.[9] The separate and dissenting opinions in the Lubanga and the Ngudjolo cases, on the other hand, take a more pragmatic approach and look at the law from the perspective of the legality principle. What matters is that the definitions of modes of liability capture as comprehensively as possible potential forms of reprehensible conduct.[10] Modes of liability can be interpreted one by one only insofar as the charges and the facts before it require a judge or court to do so. On 1 December 2014 the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga found in favour of the majority and adopted the control theory as structuring Article 25(3) into modes of liability that reflect different degrees of blameworthiness.[11]

In this chapter I aim to bring together some of the earlier writings on Article 25(3).[12] Furthermore, I base my discussion on a body of scholarly work and commentaries that have been published since the Confirmation Decision in Lubanga, the first ICC ruling on Article 25(3). By now, opinions have developed and critique has crystallized. In an attempt to summarize and analyse this critique, I rely on some of the thoughtful and eloquent contributions published in this volume on Article 25(3). In that sense, this chapter provides a meta-analysis of the chapters that address modes of liability: co-perpetration by Jens Ohlin,[13] indirect perpetration by Thomas Weigend,[14] and common purpose liability by Kai Ambos.[15] For a thorough analysis of the respective modes of liability, I refer to these contributions.

[6] W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 431; R Rastan, 'Review of ICC Jurisprudence 2008' (2009) 7 Northwestern University Journal of International Human Rights 261, para. 14.

[7] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 4).

[8] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012 ('Ngudjolo Trial Judgment').

[9] J Ohlin et al., 'Assessing the Control-Theory' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 725, 743.

[10] Ibid.

[11] Lubanga Appeal Judgment (n 5) paras 467–8.

[12] E van Sliedregt, 'The Curious Case of International Criminal Liability' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1171; E van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012); Ohlin et al. (n 9).

[13] See also Ohlin, Chapter 21, this volume.

[14] See also Weigend (n 5).

[15] See also Ambos, Chapter 24, this volume.

To give Article 25 more context and to place it in a history of liability theories attuned to system criminality, I discuss post-Second World War case law and Tribunal law on criminal responsibility.

20.2 JCE and its Predecessors: A Twist on Complicity Liability

It has been said many times that international crimes differ from domestic or 'ordinary' crimes in that they connote, by definition, a plurality of people engaged in the commission of crimes and a criminal mastermind planning and inducing such crimes.[16] This type of criminality is also referred to as system criminality and challenges traditional theories of perpetration and criminal participation, such as complicity liability, and a 'physical' concept of perpetration. While certain domestic crimes—e.g. organized crime and hooliganism—also display features of system criminality, and thus deviate from the basic structure of most cases in municipal law, this type of criminality constitutes the exception while in ICL it is the rule.

The Nuremberg Tribunal proceeded on the basis of a liability theory that was especially designed to capture the magnitude and bureaucratic nature of Nazi criminality. This theory, referred to as the 'collective criminality theory', focused on (i) members of organizations through which the Nazi war machine carried out the 'final solution' and (ii) those in leadership positions orchestrating the Holocaust.[17] Its architect, US Colonel Bernays, brought these two groups of defendants and levels of culpability together by proposing that organizations like the Gestapo and the Nazi cabinet would stand trial through their individual representatives. Organizations would be declared criminal and their representatives would be responsible for being part of a criminal conspiracy. Those occupying lower positions would be prosecuted for 'membership of a criminal organization' in subsequent proceedings.

While Bernays' theory was never fully implemented, it became the framework within which national Allied war crimes courts and tribunals applied liability theories drawn from domestic law that deviated from traditional complicity law. It is this case law that constitutes the basis for JCE as developed at the ICTY. As the following examples illustrate, peculiar features of system criminality surface when studying post-Second World War cases.[18] In particular, two points warrant attention: (i) nuancing the principal–accomplice distinction and (ii) the lack of theoretical grounding.

[16] See for instance the contributions in A Nollkaemper and H van der Wilt (eds), System Criminality in International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009). See also Ohlin (n 13), who compares co-perpetration in the 'garden-variant' of criminality in the domestic context and co-perpetration in an international context.

[17] For an elaborate account of this theory see N Jørgensen, The Responsibility of States for International Crimes (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2000).

[18] Examples are drawn from earlier work: E van Sliedregt, 'Joint Criminal Enterprise as a Pathway to Convicting Individuals for Genocide' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 184, 185; Van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (n 12) 30–6.

20.2.1 Non-categorization in normative terms

To make clear that there was no normative difference between direct (physical) involvement and indirect (functional) involvement in a crime, prosecutors and judges in post-Second World War proceedings refrained from using the principal–accomplice terminology. Instead, they relied on concepts such as 'participating in a criminal organization or pursuing a common criminal design'. In the trial of Altstötter et al. (Justice Case),[19] an American military court attributed liability on the basis of the division of tasks in an organization. Strictly speaking, defendants were accomplices to the crimes, yet the court held that:

> the person who persuades another to commit murder, the person who furnishes the lethal weapon for the purpose of the commission, and the person who pulls the trigger are all principals or accessories to the crime.[20]

In establishing guilt for the extermination and deportation of Jews, in Pohl et al. the US military court drew the analogy of four men robbing a bank where 'the acts of any of the four, within the scope of the overall plan, become the acts of all the others'.[21] In this way, 'the various participants in the programme tossing the shuttlecock of responsibility from one to the other'[22] could be found individually responsible. All forms of participation were treated equally and each of the participants was liable as a direct perpetrator. Similar reasoning can be found in the Max Wielen case, where the commander who ordered the shooting and the men who shot the victims were all considered participants in a joint criminal effort.[23]

In the trial of Franz Holstein & Twenty-Three Others, the military tribunal in Dijon divided the accused, who were all charged with crimes against the French resistance, into three categories: 'those found guilty as instigators, mainly by issuing orders; those found guilty as perpetrators; and those found guilty as their accomplices'.[24] The accused who had been in command of the men who committed the crimes were held responsible as instigators. Those who could not be labelled as instigators were found guilty as accomplices, for having facilitated and prepared the crimes before the fact, whereas others were found guilty as accomplices for supplying means during the crime.[25] The court made clear, however, that no fundamental distinction existed between these two types of accomplice:

> It is a universally recognised principle of modern penal law that accomplices during or after the fact are responsible in the same manner as actual perpetrators or as instigators, who belong to the category of accomplices before the fact (emphasis added).[26]

[19] Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, Nuremberg, Washington (1949–53) ('TWC') Vol. III, 954–1201.
[20] Ibid., 1063. [21] TWC, Vol. V, 1173. [22] Ibid.
[23] Trial of Max Wielen and Seventeen Others, United Nations War Crimes Commission, Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals ('UNWCC Law Reports') Vol. XI, 43–4, 46 (1949).
[24] Trial of Franz Holstein and Twenty-Three Others, UNWCC Law Reports, Vol. VII, 26.
[25] Their liability was regulated by Art 60(2) and (3) of the French Penal Code: 'Those who have furnished arms, instruments or any other means which have served in the action knowing that they would serve this purpose; those who knowingly have aided or assisted the perpetrator or perpetrators of the action in the facts which have prepared or facilitated or in those which have consummated the action,' UNWCC Law Reports Vol. VII, 33.
[26] Ibid., 32.

In Dutch post-Second World War law, the distinction between accomplices as mere facilitators and accomplices as full participants was abandoned when trying war criminals. This meant that a special statute was adopted to set aside, temporarily, ordinary rules of criminal participation that provided for an automatic mitigation of sentence for facilitators (medeplichtigen).[27]

The Nuremberg cases are still relevant today. They constitute international precedents that have been relied upon in case law at the ICTY, mainly to carve out the contours of JCE liability.[28] Also, in ICTY and ICTR law categorization is irrelevant when charges are brought under JCE.[29] In principle, all members of a JCE are equally liable. JCE liability enables reference to political and military superiors as 'participants' in a JCE rather than accessories, which, strictly speaking, they are under a theory of complicity.

This brings me to the nature of 'fair labelling'. Anglo-American complicity law is the classic example of a 'naturalistic' or 'empirical' approach to perpetration and participation.[30] It takes as a starting point the natural world and the reality of cause and effect. In the empirical approach the perpetrator-principal is the one who most immediately causes the actus reus/the offence. The accessory/accomplice is the one who contributes to causing the actus reus. The empirical system is a bottom-up system. If you apply it to a complex structure of criminal cooperation, for instance an army, you start with the soldier who killed a civilian upon the orders of his superior who implemented a policy issued by a government minister. Thus, in the Anglo-American scheme, the government minister is an accessory.

The complicity-model has been the dominant approach at the Tribunals, albeit in a somewhat adapted version. Some have argued it does not meet the demands of 'fair labelling', which requires that liability is expressed in such a way that it fairly represents the nature and magnitude of the law breaking.[31] In the context of masterminded violence, using the term 'accessory' sounds inappropriate. Schabas observes that 'the "accomplice" is often the real villain, and the "principal offender" a small cog in the machine. Hitler did not, apparently, physically murder or brutalize anybody; technically, he was "only" an accomplice to the crime of genocide.'[32]

[27] Art 12 of the Decree of 22 December 1943 encapsulates the rule that facilitators are liable to the same penalties as those prescribed for the crime itself. It is left to the Court to decide whether the same penalty will actually be imposed. This rule deviates from Arts 45 and 49 of the Dutch Penal Code, where the maximum penalty for complicity is reduced by one-third of the punishment prescribed for the crime. A similar adaptation was made in the Netherlands East Indies legislation with Art 5 of the Statute Book Decree No. 45 of 1946. For cases by Dutch military courts, see UNWCC Law Reports, Vol. XI, 97–8. See for a similar change to domestic law Art 4 of the Norwegian War Crimes Law, UNWCC Law Reports, Vol. XV, 89.

[28] Van Sliedregt, 'Joint Criminal Enterprise' (n 18) 185–6. [29] Ibid., 186.

[30] Van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (n 12) 71–7; Ohlin et al. (n 9) 740.

[31] D Guilfoyle, 'Responsibility for Collective Atrocities: Fair Labeling and Approaches to Commission in International Criminal Law' (2011) 64 Current Legal Problems 1, 6.

[32] W Schabas, Genocide in International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2000) 286. On the origin of the complicity terminology and the classification of the 'secondary principal' for those who were closely involved in committing the crime as non-principals, see also Van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (n 12) chapter 6, section 6.6.1, 112–16.

Judges at the ICTY have insisted on the non-normative meaning of terms such as 'principal', 'perpetrator', and 'co-perpetrator' when referring to a participant in a JCE.[33] They are merely terms of 'convenience'.[34] This is to make clear that variance in role and blameworthiness has no place when attributing criminal responsibility. It is at the sentencing stage that each contribution to a crime is weighed. This position also implies that reference to accomplice or accessorial liability does not imply 'lesser' liability. This non-normative complicity model has been somewhat difficult to sustain. It is undeniable that aiding and abetting-liability at the Tribunals has developed into a form of 'lesser liability' vis-à-vis JCE liability.[35]

Non-differentiation in normative terms has evoked criticism. The extended form of JCE,[36] which requires a dolus eventualis/recklessness test, differs from the basic form of JCE liability (closely akin to co-perpetration), which requires participants to share the intent. It is felt that extended JCE with its lower mens rea degree and more attenuated link to the crime should translate to lesser rather than equal liability.[37]

20.2.2 JCE: ever-expanding and a weak theoretical basis

Analysis of post-Second World War case law on common design-liability shows that cooperation in the war machine results in liability when the act had some 'real bearing' on the crime; a vague and potentially broad concept of causation.[38]

[33] Consider Judge Hunt's view: 'No such distinction exists in relation to sentencing in this Tribunal, and I believe that it is unwise for this Tribunal to attempt to categorise different types of offenders in this way when it is unnecessary to do so for sentencing purposes. The Appeals Chamber has made it clear elsewhere that a convicted person must be punished for the seriousness of the acts which he has done, whatever their categorisation.' Separate Opinion of Judge David Hunt on Challenge by Ojdanić to Jurisdiction Joint Criminal Enterprise, Milutinović et al., IT-99-37-AR72, AC, ICTY, 21 May 2003, para. 31.

[34] Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999 ('Tadić Appeal Judgment') para. 192; Judgment, Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, TC II, ICTY, 15 March 2002, para. 77.

[35] Van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (n 12) 78–9.

[36] Also known as Third Category JCE. The Appeals Chamber in Tadić recognized three categories. The first category relates to cases where all co-defendants possessing the same intent pursue a common criminal design, for instance the killing of a certain person. The second category concerns the so-called concentration camp cases, where the requisite actus reus comprises the active participation in the enforcement of a system of repression, as it could be inferred from the position of authority and the specific functions held by each accused. The mens rea element comprises: (i) knowledge of the nature of the system and (ii) the intent to further the common concerted design to ill-treat inmates. Intent may also be inferred from the accused's position within the camp. The third category concerns cases where 'one of the perpetrators commits an act which, while outside the common design, was nevertheless a natural and foreseeable consequence of the effecting of that common purpose'. Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 34) para. 204.

[37] See Ohlin, who argues that '[t]he most basic problem with the doctrine of joint criminal enterprise [is] its imposition of equal culpability for all members of a joint enterprise'. J Ohlin, 'Three Conceptual Problems with the Doctrine of Joint Criminal Enterprise' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 69, 85. See also G Boas et al., International Criminal Law Practitioner Library (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2008) 65–6. One scholar proposed to abandon differentiation and modes of liability altogether. James Stewart argues in favour of a unitary approach to criminal participation that collapses all modes of liability into a single standard. See J Stewart, 'The End of "Modes of Liability" for International Crimes' (2012) 25 Leiden Journal of International Law 165.

[38] Culpability for common design-liability requires that the defendant knew of the crime and that his conduct amounted to a certain degree of participation in the crime. This is not necessarily tangible

Because of a remote or 'overdetermined'[39] link to the underlying crime, and thus the difficulty of establishing actus reus, the rationale of culpability under common purpose/JCE liability lies in the ambit of mens rea. Agreeing to a common criminal purpose or plan is JCE's distinctive feature and raison d'être. In Tadić, JCE was contrasted to aiding and abetting-liability, which requires an act to be assistance that is specifically directed to a specific crime.[40] The word 'specific' is used to mark the difference with common purpose/JCE liability, which makes culpable, acts that in some way are directed to the furtherance of the common criminal design.[41]

Over time, however, ICTY case law has reversed the objective–subjective balance of JCE. This is due to the expansion of JCE liability and the court's response to this development. Initially applied to mob-violence type situations and small-scale enterprises, JCE's scope of application broadened to large-scale enterprises, broad in time and geographical scope.[42] Common plans of the JCE can be persecution, deportation, and forcible transfer. These objectives are achieved through the commission of specific crimes such as murder, torture, and rape.[43] The objective can be even more at the 'meta-level', e.g. the aim to modify the balance of Kosovo through the commission of deportation, murder, forcible transfer, and persecution[44] or 'the establishment of an ethnically Serb territory through the displacement of the Croat and other non-Serb population'.[45] In these broad JCEs, leaders and foot soldiers, representing different levels of liability, are all charged as participants in one single JCE. In Brđanin, the Appeals Chamber distinguished the different levels of liability as constituting two separate but connected JCEs.[46] This introduced the concept assistance. In the case Bruno Tesch & Others (the Zyklon B case), a case against the suppliers of poison gas to concentration camps, the Judge Advocate pointed out that the prosecutor had to prove that the accused knew that the gas was to be used for the purpose of killing human beings (TWC, Vol. I, 101). He did not pay attention to the causal link (part of actus reus); the proof that gas had been supplied was sufficient, coupled with the knowledge that such large deliveries could not possibly be going there to disinfect the buildings or delouse clothing. As to the actus reus, it was found in Max Wielen & Seventeen Others (the Stalag Luft III case) that '[t]he persons concerned must have been part of the machine doing some duty, carrying out some performance which went on directly to achieve the killing, that it had some real bearing on the killing, would not have been so effective or been done so expeditiously if that person had not contributed his willing aid' (UNWCC Law Reports, Vol. XI, 46).

[39] See J Stewart, 'Overdetermined Atrocities' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1189.

[40] Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 34) para. 229.

[41] Ibid., subpara. (iii). See also Judgment, Šainović et al., IT-05-87-A, AC, ICTY, 23 January 2014, para. 1623.

[42] The Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 34, para. 227) left the door open for such a broad interpretation by holding that '[t]here is no necessity for this plan, design or purpose to have been previously arranged or formulated, [it] may materialise extemporaneously and be inferred from the fact that a plurality of persons act in unison to put into effect a joint criminal enterprise'.

[43] Judgment, Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, TC, ICTY, 2 November 2001 ('Kvočka et al. Trial Judgment') paras 319–20.

[44] Amended Joinder Indictment, Milutinović et al./Sainović et al., IT-05-87-PT, OTP, 16 August 2005, para. 19.

[45] For example, 'the establishment of an ethnically Serb territory through the displacement of the Croat and other non-Serb population'. Judgment, Martić, IT-95-11-A, AC, ICTY, 8 October 2008, para. 445.

[46] To enable imputation of crimes of foot soldiers to leaders, it must be proved that there is a link between the two JCEs through at least one person at 'leadership level' who uses a person at 'execution level' to physically commit crimes. Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-A, AC, 3 April 2007, paras 410–13.

of inter-linked or vertical JCEs[47] and fundamentally changed JCE or common purpose-liability as it was applied in Tadić.

In an attempt to limit over-expansion, the Kvočka Trial Chamber qualified participation in a JCE as 'significant' if the act or omission 'makes an enterprise efficient or effective'.[48] The Kvočka Appeals Chamber endorsed this ruling, but used different wording: JCE liability requires a 'substantial contribution' to the joint criminal enterprise.[49] The Brđanin Appeals Chamber went back to the term 'significant' when it held that, '[a]lthough the contribution need not be necessary or substantial, it should at least be a significant contribution to the crimes for which the accused is to be found responsible'.[50]

Haan concludes from an analysis of case law that in the end not much is required to satisfy JCE's subjective elements of a common plan while attempts to limit JCE's expansive scope have resulted in emphasizing the objective element.[51] She deplores the inconsistency between theory and practice of JCE. The latter concept, based on an actual agreement of the participants in the crime, is not apt to reflect the interplay between members of different levels of authority and the co-existence of vertical and hierarchical links between the participants.[52] Senior leaders, for instance, are found guilty because they possessed a position of authority, which enabled them to provide '[f]or the legal, political, and social framework that allowed the direct perpetrators to act in a climate of total impunity'.[53] I agree with Haan. To my mind, JCE's inconsistency in theory and practice is, partly, the result of its weak theoretical grounding. Its underlying principles are insufficiently clear; JCE in ICTY case law has traits of membership liability, of co-perpetration, but also of indirect perpetration.

20.3 Control Theory: A Novel Approach

The ICC Pre-Trial Decision confirming the charges in Lubanga[54] laid the foundation for the control theory. It was further endorsed and developed in the Confirmation Decision in Katanga and Ngudjolo[55] and the Trial Chamber judgment in Lubanga.[56] The theory has its source in the writings of criminal law scholar Claus Roxin, who attempted to devise a theory for holding Nazi leaders such as Adolf Eichmann responsible as perpetrators of the atrocities committed under their regime.[57]

[47] See C Farhang, 'Point of no Return: Joint Criminal Enterprise in Brđanin' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 137.

[48] Kvočka et al. Trial Judgment (n 43) para. 309.

[49] Judgment, Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2005, para. 97

[50] The exact difference between substantial contribution or significant contribution is not entirely clear. See also Boas et al. (n 37) 46–51.

[51] V Haan, 'The Development of the Concept of Joint Criminal Enterprise at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia' (2005) 5 International Criminal Law Review 167, 194–195.

[52] Ibid., 196. [53] Ibid. [54] Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 2).

[55] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 3). [56] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 4).

[57] C Roxin, 'Straftaten im Rahmen organisatorischer Machtsapparate', *Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrech*t (GA) (1963) translated to English: C Roxin, 'Crimes as Part of Organized Power Structures' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 193. See also C Roxin, Täterschaft und Tatherrschaft 8th edn (Berlin: De Gruyter 2006) 242–52, 704–17; C Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil Band II: Besondere Erscheinungsformen der Straftat (Munich: C H Beck 2003) 46 et seq.

The ICC has relied on Roxin's theory to conceptualize a non-physical concept of perpetration (functional or intellectual perpetration). Principals are those who control the will and the act of physical perpetrators whose crimes are imputed to him or her. This approach to perpetration is referred to by Roxin as an 'objective approach' in the sense that the ability to dominate or control the acts of physical perpetrators or an organization is regarded as a form of perpetration triggering principal liability. Dominance/control is the defining line between principals and accessories[58] and requires the person to have the power to determine whether a certain act is done. There are three ways in which domination can occur: (i) when a person does the relevant act him/herself (here Roxin's theory coincides with classic theories of (physical) perpetration), (ii) when he does it jointly with others (joint or co-perpetration), or (iii) when he uses another person as a tool (indirect perpetration).

Roxin's theory has been adopted in other parts of the world, mainly Spanish-speaking countries, where German scholars have assisted in criminal law reform. Given that the Spanish approach is German-influenced, this essentially means that one legal system lies at the basis of the control theory at the ICC.[59] Judges Fulford and Van den Wyngaert in their minority opinions to the cases of Lubanga and Ngudjolo, respectively, disagree with the reliance on German law. First, because Article 21(1)(a) requires interpretation of the text of the Statute in its 'plain' or 'ordinary' meaning. In their view the text of the Statute does not provide for the control theory.[60] Second, because the control theory does not have the status of customary international law or a general principle and hence does not rank as a source of law under Article 21 of the Statute. Ohlin, in his chapter on co-perpetration, does not regard the import of German law as problematic. It can be viewed as an independent exercise in international Dogmatik; an attempt to develop an international criminal law theory.[61] I take a middle position, as will be made clear later in the chapter. The control theory can be regarded as subsumed under the text of Article 25(3)(a), which provides for the perpetrator behind the perpetrator, but Roxin's theory should not be embraced in its entirety.

Before discussing the interpretation of Article 25(3), we need to have a closer look at two of the control theory's innovative features: (i) its normative nature, and (ii) its inaptitude to capturing complex collective violence.

[58] His seminal piece in this respect: Roxin, 'Straftaten im Rahmen organisatorischer Machtsapparate' (n 57).

[59] S Manacorda and C Meloni, 'Indirect Perpetration versus Joint Criminal Enterprise: Concurring Approaches in the Practice of International Criminal Law?' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 159, 170. See also T Weigend, 'Perpetration through an Organization. The Unexpected Career of a German Legal Concept' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 91, 105.

[60] Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 4) paras 6–12; Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-4, TC II, ICC, 19 December 2012, para. 17.

[61] See also Ohlin (n 13).

20.3.1 The normative principal

The theory of 'control of the crime' can be regarded as subsumed under Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute because of its recognition of the perpetrator behind the perpetrator, i.e. 'functional perpetration'. This can be taken from the wording: A person is criminally responsible if that person, 'commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible' (emphasis added).

Functional perpetration as subsumed in subparagraph (3)(a) is not readily apparent when one is not familiar with Roxin's work or other theories of functional perpetration.[62] Still, principal liability for crimes committed through culpable persons is fundamentally different from the complicity law theory of innocent agency where the indirect perpetrator only qualifies as principal when the agent he uses to commit crimes is innocent.[63] Indeed, Article 25(3)(a) deviates from the other subparagraphs in 25(3) that do contain classic forms of complicity liability. The ruling by the ICC Trial Chamber in Katanga recognized this:

> La liste des modes de responsabilité énoncée à l'article 25-3 du Statut distingue les personnes dont le comportement est constitutif de la commission du crime elle-même de celles dont le comportement est seulement en lien avec la commission d'un crime par autrui.[64]

As I will discuss, this essentially means that Article 25(3) incorporates two theories of liability.

Functional perpetration and the control theory are a response to the desire to capture the liability of those who mastermind violence whilst being remote from the crime scene. The control theory has a normative starting point. Perpetrators/principals are those who are considered 'most responsible' because they have a position of control. Unlike complicity law, which we termed 'naturalistic' or 'empirical' in its approach to criminal participation and that constitutes a bottom-up approach, the normative approach is a top-down system. Going back to our soldier who killed a civilian upon the orders of his superior who implemented a policy issued by a government minister, we start with the person who has the main responsibility, the minister, and work our [62] Dutch criminal law provides for a theory of functional perpetration developed in case law. See H van der Wilt, 'Joint Criminal Enterprise. Possibilities and Limitations' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 91.

[63] Roxin's theory of perpetrator behind the perpetrator has been subject to critique, exactly because it deviates from the innocent agency-format and provides for this parallel structure. Those who criticize him argue that one cannot indirectly perpetrate a crime when the person who carries out the act is an autonomous, criminally responsible person. Weigend counters this critique by pointing out that the attribution of criminal responsibility is not a yes/no question of logic. In normative terms, it is possible to hold the person in the background as well as the person at the front criminally responsible as perpetrators because they both—and independently of each other—possess sufficient autonomous dominance over the criminal act. See J Ohlin (n 13).

[64] Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TCII, ICC, 7 March 2014 ('Katanga Trial Judgment') para. 1384. See also Lubanga Appeal Judgment (n 5) para. 465.

way down to the smaller fry in the lower echelons of the military unit. The government minister is a principal as well as the others in the lower echelons of the military unit.

20.3.2 Organizational liability

The Eichmann case also inspired Roxin to develop an organizational variant of his theory: dominance over an organization (Organisationsherrschaft).[65] In this theory, dominance over physical perpetrators is channelled through an organization with a tight hierarchical structure, consisting of replaceable members (fungibility) and operating outside the legal order. 'Fungibility' of members and 'illegality' ensure that those in the organization had no incentive but to abide by the norms/orders set by the perpetrator at the highest echelon of the organization.[66] Remoteness from the crime is compensated by organizational control.[67]

The PTC in the case of Katanga and Ngudjolo applied a liability theory developed along the lines of Organisationsherrschaft to impute crimes committed by militia in the Congolese village of Bogoro to the two defendants who commanded these militia. The judges affirmed that control over the direct perpetrator can be exerted by means of an organization: an Organized Structure of Power (OSP).[68] The PTC held that the accused had control over an apparatus based on hierarchical relations between the accused and their subordinates. This OSP consisted of 'sufficient subordinates'. As commanders, the accused are 'perpetrators behind the perpetrators' who mobilize the authority and power within the organization to secure compliance with their orders.[69] Execution of the crime is secured by automatic compliance and the crimes can be mutually attributed to both accused.

A complication in this case was that the subordinates were of different ethnic origin and would only be commanded by the commander directly superior to them who was of the same ethnic origin. Mutual attribution of crimes was thus problematic. Another complication concerned the sexual offences (rape, sexual slavery) that were committed by soldiers in the aftermath of the attack on Bogoro, since they could not be traced back to the common plan.

The first complication was addressed by combining two modes of liability, indirect perpetration and co-perpetration: indirect co-perpetration. This would require proof of a common plan and coordinated cooperation. Van den Wyngaert, in her dissenting to the Katanga judgment and earlier in her concurring opinion to the Ngudjolo acquittal, opines that combining modes of liability resulted in creating a fourth mode of liability in Article 25(3)(a), which goes beyond the text of the Statute and violates the legality principle (nullum crimen sine lege), in particular Article 22(2).[70]

[65] See (n 57) for references that discuss the liability theory.

[66] Weigend (n 59) 97, Roxin, 'Crimes as Part of Organized Power Structures' (n 57) 198–9, 202–4.

[67] 'Loss of proximity to the act is compensated by an increasing degree of organizational control by the leadership positions in the apparatus.' Ibid., 200.

[68] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 3) para. 498.

[69] Ibid., para. 513.

[70] Minority Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436-AnxI, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014, para. 278; Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert (n 59) paras 63–4.

I would argue that the combination of indirect perpetration and co-perpetration is not necessarily prohibited in that it would eo ipso violate the principle of legality. It should, however, be approached with caution. With a cascading connection of modes of liability, the base crime may disappear into the background. Thus, proof is required of the elements of each mode of liability.[71] The PTC in Katanga and Ngudjolo did not insist on accumulation of the elements of indirect perpetration and co-perpetration. While it did require proof of the elements of co-perpetration as discerned in Lubanga, it required 'distinct elements'[72] for indirect co-perpetration, i.e. not elements of indirect perpetration as a separate mode of liability.[73] By now, indirect co-perpetration features in a number of ICC cases; it seems to have become part of the fabric of ICC law.[74]

The second complication, the 'extended' (sexual) crimes, was addressed by accepting a broad understanding of 'control'. According to the PTC, violent and strict training regimes before the attack on Bogoro instilled in the subordinates a propensity to commit crimes.[75] Osiel uses the analogy of the 'watchmaker'. A leader is like an evil watchmaker who attaches a clock to a bomb, winds it up, and walks away knowing with reasonable certainty that the device will detonate.[76] As I have argued elsewhere, this is an interesting but also troublesome comparison because it shows the potential of this theory to broaden the scope beyond that of personal culpability.[77] In a dissenting opinion, Judge Ušacka expressed her disagreement with the PTC's majority on the charges of sexual crimes. In her view, there was insufficient evidence to establish that the accused had knowledge that rape and sexual slavery would be committed by the combatants in the ordinary course of events.[78] As will be further discussed, the PTC's ruling on control through an OSP is problematic and warrants critique.

On 7 March 2014 the Katanga Trial Chamber[79] acquitted Katanga of the charges of sexual offences where Ngudjolo had been acquitted a year earlier on all charges.[80]

20.4 How to Understand Article 25(3): Some Suggestions

20.4.1 Categorization and fair labelling

Why the insistence at the ICC on distinguishing between principal and accessorial liability? This is a valid question. After all, the practical value of distinguishing between

[71] Van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (n 12) 69–70.
[72] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 3) para. 494. [73] Ibid., paras 494–518.
[74] Warrant of Arrest for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo replacing the Warrant of Arrest issued on 23 May 2008, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-15, PTC II, ICC, 10 June 2008; Warrant of Arrest for Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-1, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012.
[75] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 3) para. 518.
[76] M Osiel, Making Sense of Mass Atrocities (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 105.
[77] Van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (n 12) 170.
[78] Partly Dissenting Opinion by Judge Anita Ušacka, Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 3) paras 19–22.
[79] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 64).
[80] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012.

principals and accessories is limited: it does not come with a sentence reduction. This is also what Judge Fulford opines in his separate and partly dissenting opinion in Lubanga:

> Article 78 of the Statute and Rule 145 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, which govern the sentences that are to be imposed, provide that an individual's sentence is to be decided on the basis of 'all the relevant factors', 'including the gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the convicted person'. Although the 'degree of participation' is one of the factors listed in Rule 145(1)(c) of the Rules, these provisions overall do not narrowly determine the sentencing range by reference to the mode of liability under which the accused is convicted, and instead this is simply one of a number of relevant factors.[81]

Moreover in ICL, accessories are punished as principals; someone who aided and abetted rape is convicted of rape.

The answer lies in the quest for expressive justice. Value is attached to fair labelling and the idea that international criminal justice is tasked with expressing a narrative. Fair labelling accounts for the advance of the normative approach to criminal participation and the desire to adhere to the distinction between those who are culpable as principals and those who are culpable as accessories. Stigmatization through principal status is important bearing in mind the denunciatory and educational function of punishment. Making clear who masterminded crimes by referring to him/her as a 'principal' who 'commits' crimes is important in communicating to victims and the international community as a whole who was the 'real' culprit.

This is why the 'empirical' approach to criminal participation, referring to masterminds as accessories, cannot perform this denunciatory function. It is interesting to note that at the ad hoc Tribunals the normative approach has also gained ground. Think of the creation of a hierarchy of liability: aiding/abetting—JCE and development of broad, non-physical concepts of 'commission' at the ICTR.[82]

20.4.2 Two liability models in one provision

The PTC in Lubanga and Katanga embraced the control theory by exclusion of other theories of liability. The normative approach in Article 25(3)(a) has been taken to govern the whole of Article 25, including subparagraphs (b)–(d). A rigorous distinction is made between principal liability in subparagraph (3)(a) and accessorial liability in subparagraphs (b)–(d). The latter forms are regarded as less blameworthy. Charging defendants as intellectual or remote principals under 25(3)(a) means they played a central role, that they had 'control of the crime'.[83] This is contrasted with liability

[81] Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 4) para. 9.

[82] Judgment, Seromba, ICTR-2001-66-A, AC, ICTR, 12 March 2008, para. 171. See for a comment, F Giustanini, 'Stretching the Boundaries of Commission Liability. The ICTR Appeals Judgment in Seromba' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 783.

[83] Consider, for instance, para. 518 of the Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 3): 'The leader's ability to secure this automatic compliance with his orders is the basis for his principal—rather than accessorial—liability. The highest authority does not merely order the commission of a crime, but under 25(3)(b)–(d) where control plays no role.[84] According to Werle and Burghardt, the control element implies a higher degree of blameworthiness for perpetrators in subparagraph (3)(a).[85] As a result, there is a preference at the ICC to charge and confirm charges under Article 25(3)(a). According to Schabas, this has diminished the significance of the other modalities of liability in Article 25(3).[86] The Lubanga Appeals Chamber recently endorsed this 'all-inclusive' normative reading of Article 25(3).[87]

I disagree with this interpretation of Article 25. The fact that Article 25(3)(a) provides for intellectual perpetration and hence the normative approach does not make it the sole theoretical grounding for the whole of Article 25. Nor does it 'reduce' the modalities in subparagraphs (b)–(d) to a lesser liability. This does not comport with the text and the drafting history of Article 25. As the chairman of the Working Group on General Principles recalls, Article 25(3) posed great difficulties to negotiate; eventually a near-consensus was reached where there would be one provision covering the responsibility of principals and all other modes of participation.[88] It was to provide the court with a range of modalities from which to choose from.

The Katanga Trial Chamber also rejected the idea of a hierarchy of blameworthiness. Accepting that Article 25(3) contains a number of overlapping modes of liability, it held that:

> En effet, l'article 25 du Statut ne fait qu'identifier différents comportements illégaux et, en ce sens, la distinction proposée entre la responsabilité de l'auteur du crime et celle du complice ne constitue en aucun cas une 'hiérarchie de culpabilité' (hierarchy of blameworthiness) pas plus qu'elle n'édicte, même implicitement, une échelle des peines. Aussi ne peut-on exclure que, après avoir statué sur la culpabilité, le juge décide de prononcer des peines atténuées contre les complices sans que, pour autant, cela constitue pour lui une règle impérative. Il demeure que ni le Statut ni le Règlement de procédure et de preuve ne prévoient un principe d'atténuation de la peine pour les formes de responsabilité autre qu'une commission et, pour la Chambre, il n'existe pas de corrélation automatique entre le mode de responsabilité et la peine. Ceci démontre bien que l'auteur d'un crime n'est pas toujours considéré comme étant moralement plus répréhensible que le complice.[89] through his control over the organization, essentially decides whether and how the crime would be committed.'

[84] The PTCs in Lubanga and Katanga reject the ICTY understanding of JCE liability as a form of co-perpetration/principal liability and instead regard common purpose-liability in 25(3)(d) as a 'residual form of accessorial liability' since it is described in terms of contributing to the commission of crimes. Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 58) para. 483 and Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 2) para. 337.

[85] G Werle and B Burghardt, 'Indirect Perpetration: A Perfect Fit for International Prosecution of Armchair Killers?' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 85, 88. See also G Werle and B Burghardt, 'Establishing Degrees of Responsibility. Modes of Participation in Article 25 of the ICC Statute' in E van Sliedregt and S Vasiliev (eds), Pluralism in International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2014) 301–19.

[86] See Schabas (n 7) 430–1.

[87] Lubanga Appeals Judgment (n 5) para. 471.

[88] P Saland, 'International Criminal Law Principles' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court. The Making of the Rome Statute—Issues, Negotiations, Results (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 198.

[89] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 64) para. 1386.

In my view, the modes of liability listed in subparagraphs (b)–(d) constitute the classic/empirical scheme of criminal participation that we find in most national criminal justice systems and at the ad hoc Tribunals. These modalities differ from the forms of perpetration in subparagraph (a) in that they are derivative or accessorial; liability depends on the principal crime.[90] For someone who orders a crime to be culpable, the crime must have been committed. This derivative nature does not entail 'lesser liability'. There is no rule or theory that links accessorial liability to a mitigated form of criminal responsibility.[91] More specifically, there is no reason why indirect perpetrators under Article 25(3)(a) deserve a more severe punishment than instigators under subparagraph (b).

Logic dictates that relying on Article 78 of the Statute and Rule 145 of the RPE, making clear that it is at the sentencing stage where all relevant factors are weighed to determine a sentence, no hierarchy exists amongst the modes of liability in subparagraphs (b)–(d). Contributions to crimes qualified as instigation, aiding and abetting, or common purpose-liability are to be weighed each on their own merits. Ambos, who earlier defended the idea of hierarchy between Article 25(3)(c) and common purpose liability in Article 25(3)(d), where the latter was viewed as a residual category of liability and thus less 'blameworthy' than aiding and abetting, is now of the view that these modes of liability are not structured in a hierarchical manner.[92] This means that one should not attempt to distinguish between these two modes of liability when it comes to the nature of contribution (significant or substantial: what is the difference between the two?).[93]

20.4.3 Mitigation for aiding and abetting?

A remaining question relates to the normative weight of aiding and abetting liability in Article 25(3)(c). Ohlin, generally in favour of using German law to develop an international Dogmatik, argues that this is where importing the German model would be a mistake.[94] The latter model provides for an automatic sentence reduction for accomplices. The heinous nature of international crimes is the objection to such a system. Even the defendant who aids and abets a massive genocide deserves a serious penalty.[95]

It would not comport with post-Second World War case law to adopt an automatic sentence reduction. The changes to domestic law on aiding and abetting in the Netherlands, where the sentence reduction was abolished for Second World War crimes, accords with that point of view. Also, nuancing the principal–accomplice distinction in Nuremberg case law, to make clear that each of the parties to a crime, close and remote, could be punished with equal sentences, is still valid as a sentencing [90] See also Ohlin et al. (n 9) 743–4.

[91] Even in those systems that provide for a distinction between principals and accessories where categorization comes with a sentence reduction, 'principal liability' may still be derivative/accessorial. For instance, co-perpetrators in Dutch law have the status of accessories. Their liability rests on that of the physical perpetrator; they are only liable when the crime is committed or attempted. They are punished as if they were principals (Art 47(1) Dutch Penal Code: 'Als daders van een strafbaar feit worden gestraft: 1. zij die het feit plegen, doen plegen of medeplegen'). See Ohlin et al. (n 9) 744 n 87.

[92] See also Ambos (n 15). [93] Ibid. [94] See also Ohlin (n 13). [95] Ibid.

principle. The Katanga Trial Chamber's finding cited earlier can be referred to as evidence of that.

Having said that, aiding and abetting in Tribunal case law has developed into a form of lesser liability.[96] This, however, is only the case in very specific circumstances, namely vis-à-vis JCE. Moreover, as the Charles Taylor case has shown, aiding and abetting may, in its own right, constitute the basis for a serious sentence.[97]

20.4.4 Control through an OSP: Dogmatik gone wrong

The organizational variant of the control theory is fraught with difficulties, particularly when applied to the reality of African ethnic violence. While I accept that one can read Article 25(3)(a) in a 'multiple sense', accepting that the term 'through another person' can include multiple persons, thus enabling the importation of organizational liability, the PTC's ruling on control through an OSP is unpersuasive. Weigend points out that the concept of control is too broad and unspecific; it cannot support a conviction.[98] Moreover, he wonders whether international criminal law needs such a theory. Why not rely on instigation under Article 25(3)(b)?[99]

The most problematic point of this theory is that it does not at all accord with the reality on the ground. Take, for instance, the charges of 'collateral' sexual crimes. Accepting that the physical perpetrator can go beyond what is ordered and act on his own initiative undermines the central tenet of Roxin's theory. Organisationsherrschaft requires the physical perpetrators to be mere cogs in the wheel, where the leaders, as intellectual perpetrators, dominate their will and acts to such an extent that their compliance with orders is automatic.

One cannot escape the impression that the PTC in Katanga and Ngudjolo was blinded by the beauty of Dogmatik and lost sight of the African reality. No wonder the OSP theory ended up as the basis for an acquittal[100] and a (controversial) recharacterization of charges (under Regulation 55).[101]

20.5 Concluding Observations

Mass criminality challenges traditional theories of criminal responsibility in at least three ways. First, because of the difficulty of establishing a causal link between conduct [96] See Van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility (n 12) 78–99.

[97] Taylor was convicted to 50 years. See Judgment, Charles Taylor, SCSL-03-1-T, TC, SCSL, 26 April 2012, para. 6959; affirmed on appeal in Judgment, Charles Taylor, SCSL-03-1-A, AC, SCSL, 26 September 2013.

[98] See also Weigend (n 5).

[99] This is indeed what the defence submitted in the Katanga trial as an alternative to indirect co-perpetration. See Katanga Trial Judgment (n 63) para. 1375 and Conclusions écrites de la Défense, ICC-01/04-01/07-3266-Corr2-Red, Defence, ICC, 29 June 2012, para. 1217.

[100] Ngudjolo Trial Judgment (n 8).

[101] A majority in the Katanga Trial Chamber recharacterized the charges from indirect co-perpetration to common purpose under Art 25(3)(d). Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012 (see also the Dissenting Opinion by Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert included in this TC Decision).

and crime.[102] Second, because of the normative weight of functional, non-physical involvement in crimes (the 'remote principal'). Third, because of the parallel nature of culpability which means that one crime triggers liability at different levels: at leadership/intellectual level and at foot soldier/execution level.

In international law, novel concepts of perpetration and participation have been developed to meet these challenges. JCE and the control theory are two such theorizations. Comparing Nuremberg case law, JCE liability at the ICTY, and the control theory at the ICC, two differences emerge that run along the Nuremberg/ICTY–ICC divide. First, the (non-)adherence to categorization of modes of liability. Second, (not) adopting a dogmatic approach to perpetration and participation.

While in Nuremberg and in ICTY case law the distinction between principals and accomplices in suppressed, making sure that it has no significance to the outcome of the case, the ICC adheres to categorizing principals and accomplices. To my mind, this difference between Tribunal law and ICC law is really only important in the ambit of fair labelling. Categorization should not affect sentencing. Yet, with the recent Appeals Chamber judgment in Lubanga, accepting a hierarchy of blameworthiness in Article 25(3), categorizing and sentencing are now directly linked. This deviates from previous practice. Ever since Nuremberg, ICL has adopted a unitary theory of participation when it comes to sentencing.[103] Role variance was only considered at the sentencing stage. In other words, categorizing contributions to a crime did not necessarily have a normative meaning. What really sets Tribunal law apart from ICC law in the realm of liability theories is the reliance on Dogmatik. The usage of criminal law doctrine when interpreting Article 25(3) is a break from the more pragmatic, Anglo-American approach to law-making that dominated at the ad hoc Tribunals. The dogmatic approach, however, is not uncontroversial. It is criticized for its import of German law and for losing sight of the facts on the ground. I largely agree with this critique, although I value Dogmatik and the control theory to the extent that it accepts the normative/remote principal in subparagraph (a). The latter approach, better than complicity law (representative of an 'empirical' approach), captures the nature of masterminded violence, which matters from the perspective of fair labelling. The all-inclusive approach, suggesting that the whole of Article 25 is premised on the control theory, should, however, be faulted. I endorse Van den Wyngaert and Fulford's position to approach modes of liability on a case-by-case basis and to reject the idea of a hierarchy of blameworthiness in Article 25.

Having discussed the differences, one should not lose sight of the similarities in the law of perpetration and participation at the ICTY and the ICC. For instance, there are similarities between indirect co-perpetration at the ICC and interlinked JCE at the ICTY. As Ohlin submits, 'the ICC's problem of combining modes of liability is structurally identical to the ICTY's problem of linking a leadership level JCE with the RPP [102] Either because of the remoteness to the crime, or the impossibility to establish which conduct caused the prohibited result or consequence considering multiple sufficient causes: 'overdetermined atrocities'. See Stewart (n 39).

[103] This unitary theory is premised on classic complicity law and essentially means that '[s]omeone against whom it is proved that they aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of murder

(relevant physical perpetrators)'.[104] The principles of attribution are not so different; they both need proof of a common plan and control over a person used as a tool. They thus share distinctive features, which is not so strange bearing in mind that they capture similar forms of criminality. Also, in-depth analysis, by looking into the interplay between law and fact, demonstrates that co-perpetration and JCE liability are much more alike than ICC PTCs are willing to admit.[105] Moreover, we must be mindful of the fact that the ICC has no monopoly on the normative approach to criminal participation. It has been part of ICL since Nuremberg, albeit in a different, even opposite way, from the approach at the ICC. As was made clear earlier, in Nuremberg and at the ICTY, recognizing the remote principal resulted in abandoning the accomplice–principal distinction, whereas the ICC, by insisting on categorization, endorses the normative approach.

For future perspectives it is opportune to adopt a harmonizing approach and look through labels and legal categories. This serves national adjudication of international crimes, since national adjudicators rely on the international framework when trying war criminals. Moreover, it halts legal pluralism where it is unnecessary.

20.6 Outlook on the Future

The ICC has been functioning for more than a decade now. It is well beyond its infancy and it is time to discuss its first achievements. In the area of substantive ICL, in particular theories of liability, its main achievement is recognizing the normative/remote principal through the control theory. The impact of the latter theory, however, is greater than it should be; it should not provide the theoretical grounding of the whole of Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute.

In the realm of substantive criminal law, in particular with regard to modes of liability, the ICC should resist two temptations. First, the temptation to create the perfect liability theory. The ICC Statute with its elaborate statutory definitions, general part, Elements of Crime, and Article 21 on sources of law, breathes a 'black letter law' approach. Practice at the ICC, however, does not comport with this approach. The first decisions by PTCs constitute substantive law-making that to my mind goes well beyond the task of confirming charges. I would expect the court to take a more textual approach, on a case-by-case basis, guided by Article 31 of the VCLT.

The second, related temptation that should be resisted is to mould the law to fit the facts. Here I think of the contrived findings of the PTC in Katanga and Ngdjolo with regard to the rape and sexual slavery charges that were regarded as 'collateral crimes'. Broadening the control theory this way betrays a result-oriented approach and makes it vulnerable to the exact same critique that has been voiced with regard to JCE liability.

by another—for example, by supplying the gun which fired the fatal shot—is herself convicted of murder. So far as her conviction goes, it is just as if she had pulled the trigger herself.' J Gardner, 'Aid, Abet, Counsel, Procure: an English View of Complicity' in A Eser et al. (eds), Einzelverantwortung und Mitverantwortung im Strafrecht. European Colloquium on Individual, Participatory and Collective Responsibility in Criminal Law (Freiburg i. Br, Eigenverlag Max-Planck-Institut für ausländisches und internationales Strafrecht 1998) 227–8.

[104] J Ohlin, 'Second-Order Linking Principles: Combining Vertical and Horizontal Modes of Liability' (2012) 25 Leiden Journal of International Law 771.

[105] M Cupido, 'Pluralism in Theories of Liability: Joint Criminal Enterprise versus Joint Perpetration' in Van Sliedregt and Vasiliev (n 85).

21

Co-Perpetration

German Dogmatik or German Invasion?

*Jens David Ohlin

21.1 Introduction

In order to understand the ICC's jurisprudence on co-perpetration, one needs to trace the recent history of modes of liability at the international legal tribunals and the clash of legal traditions embodied by competing doctrinal paradigms. The current doctrines of co-perpetration, most notably the control theory of perpetration, are heavily influenced by German criminal law theory. To some judges and observers, the ICC's importation of Claus Roxin's famous theory is evidence that the ICC is finally getting serious about criminal law theory. To critics, though, the application of a particularly Germanic interpretation of co-perpetration is evidence that one legal culture is having an outsized influence on the direction of the court's jurisprudence.

In order to understand and evaluate this complaint, it is necessary to situate the current doctrines within their historical context, since in many respects the ICC's doctrine of co-perpetration is a reaction against the modes of liability applied at the ICTY and the ICTR. After providing that historical context, this commentary will then proceed to lay out the foundations of the ICC doctrine of co-perpetration, present and evaluate the most notable objections to the doctrine, and consider some alternate versions of co-perpetration that could be applied by the ICC in place of Roxin's control theory of perpetration. The resulting picture suggests a growing influence of criminal law theory in The Hague as the judges struggle to interpret Article 25 of the Rome Statute, a provision not known for its doctrinal sophistication.[1] The result is a set of ICC decisions that might even lay the groundwork for an emerging international Dogmatik, a sui generis discipline that one might describe as international criminal law theory. Despite these positive efforts, however, the Court has done insufficient work to justify its methodology (in particular its substantial reliance on German sources) and to properly ground its importation of domestic criminal law theory within a general

* Professor of Law, Cornell Law School, jdo43@cornell.edu.

[1] In this regard, see K Ambos, 'Article 25 Individual Criminal Responsibility' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (Münich/Oxford: C H Beck/Hart Publishing 2008) 743, 759 (Art 25 'demonstrates that a provision drafted without regard to basic dogmatic categories will create difficult problems of interpretation for the future ICC'). But see G Werle and B Burghardt, 'Establishing Degrees of Responsibility: Modes of Participation in Article 25 of the ICC Statute' in E van Sliedregt and S Vasiliev (eds), Pluralism in International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2014) 301–19 (arguing that Art 25 embodies a coherent hierarchy of blameworthiness).

theory of sources of international law. The following analysis will detail this emerging trend and critically evaluate the positive and negative aspects of the ICC doctrine of co-perpetration.

21.2 The Emergence of Co-Perpetration

In 1999 Judge Cassese presided over the Tadić Decision at the ICTY.[2] The Appeals Chamber announced that Tadić should be prosecuted as a participant in a JCE. Although JCE was not explicitly listed as a mode of liability in the ICTY Statute, the Chamber found that the mode of liability was implicitly recognized in Article 7 of the Statute.[3] As customary evidence, the ICTY Appeals Chamber examined post-Second World War prosecutions before British and American military tribunals, including Essen Lynching,[4] Borkum Island,[5] and Jepsen and Others.[6] These cases were not well known among scholars and some of them had never been translated or published. Nonetheless, the ICTY Appeals Chamber used them as an interpretive gloss on Article 7 of the ICTY Statute. Essentially, the ICTY concluded that JCE as a mode of liability was supported by customary international law.[7]

By now, the specifics of JCE are well understood and need not be chronicled in detail. The doctrine requires a plurality of persons acting in conformance with a common plan or design.[8] Actions pursued by the group are attributable to the defendant as long as they are performed pursuant to the purpose or design of the endeavour (JCE I), pursuant to a system of ill-treatment (JCE II), or a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the common design (JCE III).[9] The third category substantially resembles the vicarious responsibility that common-law lawyers associate with the Pinkerton doctrine.[10] More importantly, JCE represented a de facto unitary approach to perpetration that eschewed categorical distinctions between principals and accessories.[11] True, JCE did not fully replace the category of aiding and abetting, such that aiding and abetting remained a viable mode of liability under the ICTY and ICTR jurisprudence.[12] That

[2] See Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999 ('Tadić').

[3] Ibid., para. 189 (discussing object and purpose of Art 7).

[4] Trial of Erich Heyer and Six Others [Essen Lynching], British Military Court for the Trial of War Criminals, Essen, 18–19 and 21–22 December (1945) UNWCC, vol. I, 88, 91.

[5] United States of America v Goebell et al. [Borkum Island Case], Case No. 12–489 (1946), microformed on 1–6 Records of United States Army War Crimes Trials, M1103 Rolls 1–7 (National Archives Microfilm Publications 1980), cited in Tadić (n 2) para. 210.

[6] Gustav Alfred Jepsen and Others, UK, Proceedings of a War Crimes Trial held at Lueneburg, Germany (13–24 August 1946), judgment of 24 August 1946.

[7] See Tadić (n 2) para. 220. See also D'Ottavio and Others, Cass Pen (12 Mar 1947) n 270 (Ita), reprinted in D'Ottavio and Others (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 232; Aratano and Others, No. 102, Judgment (Ct of Cassation, February 21, 1949) (Ita), reprinted in Aratano and Others (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 241.

[8] See A Cassese, International Criminal Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 191.

[9] Ibid., 199.

[10] Pinkerton v United States, 328 US 640, 648 (1946).

[11] See J Ohlin, 'LJIL Symposium: Names, Labels, and Roses' (Opinio Juris, 23 March 2012) <http://opiniojuris.org/2012/03/23/ljil-names-labels-and-roses/> accessed 1 May 2014.

[12] See Tadić (n 2) para. 192 (distinguishing JCE liability from aiding and abetting-liability). See also the excellent discussion in E van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law 2nd edn (New York: Oxford University Press 2012) 77–8.

being said, few defendants were charged with aiding and abetting and even fewer were convicted of it. The virtue (or vice, depending on one's doctrinal inclination) of the JCE doctrine was that it treated all members of the common design as legally equivalent. As long as the defendants were all deemed to be members of the JCE, their relative importance became a matter of little importance to the doctrine of the ICTY. It was for this reason that JCE was criticized for being a 'Just Convict Everyone' doctrine.[13] In the more technical language of criminal law theory, the JCE doctrine was close in spirit to a unitary approach to perpetration whereby all members causally responsible for the crime were labelled as perpetrators, regardless of their level of participation.

In their earliest decisions at the ICC, the judges of the Pre-Trial Chamber were inclined to approach collective criminality with a different set of doctrinal tools. Consequently, the judges imported the latest devices of German criminal law theory, in particular Claus Roxin's well-known control theory of perpetration. Roxin had developed the theory in 1963 in his book Täterschaft und Tatherrschaft, which immediately gained wide influence in German criminal law theory circles.[14] Specifically, Roxin sought to develop a third way to perpetration that mediated between the competing mistakes of the objective and subjective approaches to perpetration. In the objective approach, well known in common-law jurisdictions such as the United States and Britain, the perpetrator is defined as the individual who performs the actus reus of the crime. All others are defined as accomplices or instigators.[15] This produces somewhat paradoxical results, because a mob boss who orders a subordinate to kill a rival criminal will only be convicted as an accomplice since he did not perform the physical act of shooting the victim. However, our intuitions suggest that the mob boss, by virtue of his advanced location in the hierarchy, is more culpable (rather than less culpable) than the foot soldier who carries out the attack. Over time, the common law developed numerous doctrinal techniques to mitigate this shortcoming in its jurisprudence, most notably de-emphasizing or even collapsing the distinction between principals and accessories. Accordingly, US criminal law states that accomplices and principals are equally guilty and are subject to the same criminal penalties.[16] When the doctrine provides an incoherent or implausible definition of the distinction between principals and accessories, the best solution is to deny the distinction any real relevance in the outcome of the case, which is precisely the avenue selected by the common law.

The rival theory, which gained adherence in German criminal law circles, is the subjective approach to perpetration. This solution concentrates on the mens rea of the actors involved. So, with regard to our hypothetical mob boss, he could be convicted as a principal perpetrator because he displays the relevant mens rea necessary for a murder

[13] See M Badar, '"Just Convict Everyone!"—Joint Perpetration: From Tadić to Stakić and Back Again' (2006) 6 International Criminal Law Review 293.

[14] See C Roxin, Täterschaft und Tatherrschaft 8th edn (Berlin: de Gruyter 2006).

[15] See W Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England in Four Books, vol. 2 (Philadelphia: J B Lippincott Co. 1893) section 34. See also T Hughes, A Treatise on Criminal Law and Procedure (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co. 1919) 122, s. 167.

[16] Crimes and Criminal Procedure (18 US Code) s. 2(a).

conviction.[17] This too has its detractors, since the individual with the relevant mens rea may be causally, temporally, and geographically removed from the physical commission of the crime—a tenuous connection that some may feel is emblematic of the uncertain causal connection between the defendant and the resulting crime.[18] Is it fair to label such an individual as a principal perpetrator given the conceptual distance between them and the criminal act?

Roxin's brilliance came in devising, from whole cloth, a third way between the objective and subjective approaches to perpetration. Under Roxin's control theory, the perpetrator is defined as the individual who has control or 'hegemony' over the act, who decides whether the criminal transaction will occur.[19] If there are two individuals who are in a position to jointly control the execution of the act, then they are labelled as co-perpetrators. In garden-variety murder cases in the domestic context, the control theory will frequently generate the same outcome as the subjective and objective approaches.[20] Most regular murders involve the unification within a single individual of mens rea, actus reus, and control. So if the defendant pulls the trigger, desires the outcome, and controls whether the murder occurs, he is the principal perpetrator regardless of the theory of commission applied in the case.

However, international crimes are not like garden-variety crimes that occur in the domestic context, for two reasons. First, international crimes are almost always perpetrated by a plurality of persons, making co-perpetration (or some variant such as JCE) crucial to prosecutorial strategy.[21] Second, the person in control of the crime usually does not perform the actual killings that constitute the war crime, crime against humanity, or genocide. Rather, the person in control is higher up the chain of authority, directing a hierarchy, usually though not always military troops, who carry out the actus reus of the crime in question.[22] In this regard, Roxin was heavily influenced by the prosecution of Adolf Eichmann in Israel, which prompted him to extend his control theory of perpetration to cases of indirect perpetration and organizational

[17] See e.g. Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803, PTC I, 29 January 2007, para. 329 ('Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision'). ('The subjective approach—which is the approach adopted by the jurisprudence of the ICTY through the concept of joint criminal enterprise or the common purpose doctrine—moves the focus from the level of contribution to the commission of the offence as the distinguishing criterion between principals and accessories, and places it instead on the state of mind in which the contribution to the crime was made. As a result, only those who make their contribution with the shared intent to commit the offence can be considered principals to the crime, regardless of the level of their contribution to its commission.')

[18] For a comprehensive discussion, see K Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law, vol. I (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 2011–12.

[19] See also G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (reprint, New York: Oxford University Press 2000), who prefers to translate Roxin's concept of Tatherrschaft as 'hegemony over-the-act'.

[20] But see Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (n 18) 2011 (concluding that in prosecutorial practice it is the objective and subjective approaches that will provide similar results).

[21] The point is explored in greater depth in J Ohlin, 'Joint Intentions to Commit International Crimes' (2011) 11 Chicago Journal of International Law 693.

[22] See J Ohlin, 'Second-Order Linking Principles: Combining Vertical and Horizontal Modes of Liability' (2012) 25 Leiden Journal of International Law 771; K Ambos, 'Command Responsibility and Organisationsherrschaft: Ways of Attributing International Crimes to the "Most Responsible" ' in A Nollkaemper and H van der Wilt (eds), System Criminality in International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 127, 152.

perpetration.[23] In the case of indirect perpetration, Roxin argued, the defendant should be convicted as a principal perpetrator even though he does not perform the actus reus of the crime; he is, rather, an indirect perpetrator who uses other individuals as instruments to perform the killings.[24] He is, as the Germans say, the Täter hinter dem Täter, the perpetrator who stands behind the perpetrators.[25] The Eichmann trial provided an occasion to extend the control theory even further to deal with indirect perpetrators who indirectly perpetrate the crime by using an organization as an instrument to perform the international crime.[26] Roxin referred to this as Organisationsherrschaft (literally perpetration through an organization), which requires the use of an organized apparatus of power (or bureaucracy) as an instrument of the crime.[27] The individual sitting atop the organized hierarchy is defined by Roxin as the Hintermann, the mastermind behind the scene who implements the plan to be executed through others.[28] The common thread running through all of these doctrines—co-perpetration, indirect perpetration, and Organisationsherrschaft—is the defining feature of control as the sine qua non of perpetration. He who controls the crime is the perpetrator; all others are mere accomplices.

Roxin's theories were highly influential in German academic circles through the subsequent decades, although they were only operationalized in German criminal law when German courts decided the Border Guard Cases.[29] After unification, the German government prosecuted former East German government officials for the murder of East German citizens who were shot and killed as they attempted to flee across the Berlin Wall to freedom in the West. Unification increased the calls for justice for these atrocities—killings that sparked an ongoing and pervasive fear among the East German population that prevented them from attempting future escapes knowing of the deadly consequences of failure. So it is perhaps unsurprising that the German courts were unwilling to label the East German officials who ordered the fatal policy of shoot to kill as mere accomplices of the killings. They found that the government officials, including Honecker himself, should be convicted as principal perpetrators. The case became an occasion for the German courts to endorse and apply Roxin's control theory of perpetration. Roxin's theory moved from academic theory to doctrinal reality.[30]

[23] See C Roxin, 'Crimes as Part of Organized Power Structures' (B Cooper tr.) (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 193, reprinted from Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrecht (1963) 193.

[24] See Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (n 19) 639.

[25] Some of these principles were also developed in F-C Schroeder, Der Täter hinter dem Täter: Ein Beitrag zur Lehre von der mittelbaren Täterschaft (Berlin: Duncker and Humblot 1965).

[26] See Roxin, 'Crimes as Part of Organized Power Structures' (n 23) 193. [27] Ibid.

[28] See Roxin, Täterschaft und Tatherrschaft (n 14) 244; C Roxin, 'The Dogmatic Structure of Criminal Liability in the General Part of the Draft Israeli Penal Code—A Comparison with German Law' (1996) 30 Israel Law Review 60, 71 (E Silverman tr.). See also Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law (n 18) 154–5.

[29] Bundesgerichtshof (Federal Court of Appeals), judgment of 26 July 1994, in 40 Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen (1995) 218, 236. For analysis, see T Weigend, 'Indirect Perpetration through an Organization: the Unexpected Career of a German Legal Concept' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 91, 94.

[30] M Bohlander, Principles of German Criminal Law (Portland: Hart Publishing 2009) 158.

In Lubanga, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber imported Roxin's approach as an interpretive gloss on Article 25(3)(a) of the Rome Statute.[31] No one seriously expected the Court to adopt the ICTY jurisprudence on JCE, though it was somewhat surprising that the Pre-Trial Chamber was so specific in concluding that Article 25(3)(a) codified Roxin's approach to perpetration.[32] After all, Article 25(3)(a) makes no reference to control at all, simply asserting that a person is criminally responsible for a crime if he '[c]ommits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible'.[33] The Rome Statute clearly codifies perpetration, co-perpetration ('jointly with another'), and indirect co-perpetration ('through another'), though without specifying any particular doctrinal framework to understand these concepts. To add further confusion to the situation, Article 25(3)(d) also includes liability for contributions to collective crimes. Though the dividing line between Article 25(3)(a) and 25(3)(d) is unclear and mysterious, several scholars have attempted to provide answers to this question.[34] As it happens, the ICC has all but ignored Article 25(3)(d), preferring instead to prosecute cases as co-perpetration or indirect perpetration under Article 25(3)(a).[35] For this reason the ICC has not yet offered concrete answers about the overall structure of Article 25 of the Rome Statute.[36]

The Lubanga Decision on co-perpetration was notable in several respects. The Pre-Trial Chamber concluded that Lubanga's trial should proceed under Article 25(3)(a) with Lubanga accused as a co-perpetrator of the crime of using child soldiers. The Pre-Trial Chamber also listed the formal requirements of co-perpetration as the following: (i) an agreement or common plan among a plurality of persons;[37] (ii) coordinated essential contribution by each co-perpetrator resulting in the realization of the objective elements of the crime;[38] (iii) the defendant fulfils the subjective elements of the crime in question;[39] (iv) the co-perpetrators are (a) mutually aware that implementing their common plan may result in the realization of the objective elements of the crime and (b) mutually accept the result by reconciling themselves to it or consenting to it;[40] and (v) the suspect is aware of the factual circumstances enabling him or her to jointly control the crime.[41] What emerges from these doctrinal

[31] Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 17) para. 324.

[32] See ibid., para. 348.

[33] Art 25(3)(a) Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('Rome Statute').

[34] My own attempt was built largely on the conclusion that no coherent explanation is possible. Compare J Ohlin, 'Joint Criminal Confusion' (2009) 12 New Criminal Law Review 406, with G Werle, 'Individual Criminal Responsibility in Article 25 ICC Statute' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 953 (arguing that Art 25 embodies a hierarchy or differentiation of participation based on four different levels of participation). See also Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut—Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine van den Wyngaert, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-4, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012, paras 22–30 ('Ngudjolo, Van den Wyngaert Opinion').

[35] One of the few exceptions is Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011, para. 275.

[36] The issue is also discussed in J Ohlin et al., 'Assessing the Control-Theory' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 725, 740–1. See also Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, paras 994–9 ('Lubanga Judgment').

[37] Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 17) para. 343. [38] Ibid., paras 346–8.

[39] Ibid., paras 349–60. [40] Ibid., paras 361–5. [41] Ibid., paras 366–7.

requirements is a picture of the control theory as a hybrid functional approach to perpetration that attempts to combine the most relevant elements of the objective and subjective approaches.[42] In particular, the control theory combines objective requirements regarding the circumstances of the defendant's control (either individually or jointly) with awareness of these circumstances.

The Lubanga Decision was noteworthy in another regard. The Pre-Trial Chamber took great pains to insist that the control theory was widely representative of the world's legal cultures, concluding that '[t]he concept of control over the crime constitutes a third approach for distinguishing between principals and accessories which, contrary to the Defence claim, is applied in numerous legal systems'.[43] While this is no doubt true—Roxin's control theory has been applied in Latin American legal systems heavily influenced by German criminal law theory[44]—it is a vast exaggeration to imply that Roxin's theories regarding co-perpetration are widely representative of different legal cultures. For this proposition, the Lubanga Pre-Trial Chamber cited Professor Fletcher's Rethinking Criminal Law, a treatise that extensively discussed, with admiration, Roxin's approach to perpetration.[45] However, though Fletcher himself is American, his Rethinking is not so much an analysis of Anglo-American or criminal law but rather a comparative examination of criminal law theory at the normative level.[46] Indeed, Fletcher has repeated that he is more interested in normative arguments for how the criminal law ought to be structured, without too much concern for the actual doctrine that persists in any particular jurisprudence.[47] To be too beholden to the current doctrine in any jurisdiction is to fall victim to the naturalistic fallacy—moving from what is to what ought to be. In the case of his discussion of Roxin in Rethinking, Fletcher's support amounted to admiration of Roxin's approach,[48] but neither Roxin nor Fletcher's analysis of it had any impact on Anglo-American common law for decades.[49] Indeed, even after Fletcher's well-known discussion of Roxin in Rethinking, no scholar of criminal law in the United States discussed or even cited Roxin for decades until just before Roxin's reemergence in the jurisprudence of the ICC with the Lubanga Decision.[50] This is not surprising, since Fletcher is

[42] Ibid., para. 330. [43] Ibid.

[44] See K Ambos, 'The Fujimori Judgment: A President's Responsibility for Crimes against Humanity as Indirect Perpetrator by Virtue of an Organized Power Apparatus' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 137.

[45] See Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (n 19) cited in Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 17) para. 330, fn. 418.

[46] See Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (n 19) xxiii.

[47] See G Fletcher, 'Remembrance of Articles Past' in R Christopher (ed.), Fletcher's Essays on Criminal Law (New York: Oxford University Press 2013) 269, 275 ('when someone argues the way the law ought to be, it is not much of a claim to say, yes, but the law is not that way').

[48] See Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (n 19) 655–7.

[49] Roxin was cited a few isolated times in the 1980s in American law review articles, though these citations had nothing to do with the control theory. See e.g. T Weigend, 'Sentencing in West Germany' (1983) 42 Maryland Law Review 37, 58, fn. 114 et seq.

[50] Two years prior to the Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision, a few important articles appeared, including M Osiel, 'The Banality of Good: Aligning Incentive Against Mass Atrocity' (2005) 105 Columbia Law Review 1751, 1829–37.

often credited with helping to explain and popularize the civil law approach to criminal law scholars in the English-speaking world.[51] He is, therefore, responsible for a major exportation of German patterns of thought to English-speaking cultures. But one cannot cite Rethinking for the proposition that the control theory enjoys broad support in both civil-law and common-law jurisdictions. If the Pre-trial Chamber meant to imply this, it were mistaken.

This raises a methodological quandary about how criminal law theory fits into a general theory of sources within international law. When the Pre-Trial Chamber read Roxin's control theory of perpetration into Article 25 of the Rome Statute, was it engaged in treaty interpretation, recognizing customary international law, or relying on general principles of international law? The answer remains elusive. If the Lubanga Decision was an example of the first—treaty interpretation—the result must confront the fact that there is little evidence that the negotiators of the Rome Statute had Roxin's control theory in mind when they drafted the precise language of Article 25(3)(a) that allowed liability for crimes committed individually or jointly with another individual. Indeed, the bare text of Article 25(3) suggests that cases of co-perpetration were limited to two individuals working concurrently, since it states with another individual as opposed to saying with other individuals. The provision most explicitly describing mass criminality appears in Article 25(3)(d) and its reference to 'a group of persons acting with a common purpose'.[52]

If the Lubanga Decision was a reference to the second option—customary international law—then other problems emerge. The control theory, while spreading in influence and application in other domestic legal systems, is not yet applied in such a wide range of domestic legal systems that it demonstrates the type of 'widespread' or 'uniform' state practice that would be sufficient to generate a norm of customary international law. Furthermore, it is unclear if its incorporation into the domestic systems where it is used was accompanied by any opinio juris (i.e. by a sense of legal obligation). Can it seriously be suggested that states that have adopted Roxin's theory of perpetration did so because they felt an international legal obligation to do so? This seems unlikely. Rather, it seems that they did so because they believed that the control theory of perpetration yielded intuitively correct results from a normative perspective, thus making it a positive candidate for importation into domestic law. But that is a far cry from the opinio juris necessary to establish a norm of customary law.

Indeed, this represents a far greater problem in international criminal law: the occasional use of the phrase 'customary international law' by some lawyers to describe the widespread use of particular doctrines within domestic systems or even international tribunals.[53] Criminal law approaches within domestic systems are usually [51] See also G Fletcher, The Grammar of Criminal Law: American, Comparative, and International (New York: Oxford University Press 2007); G Fletcher, Basic Concepts of Criminal Law (New York: Oxford University Press 1998).

[52] Art 25(3)(d) Rome Statute. For analysis, see Ambos, 'Article 25' (n 1) 757–60.

[53] The issue is discussed in M Fan, 'Visionary Legal Construction: Custom, General Principles and the Great Architect Cassese' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1063.

unaccompanied by opinio juris, and properly speaking are not customary norms.[54] Furthermore, criminal law approaches from another international tribunal are not an example of state practice, since the decisions of particular judges in international tribunals cannot be attributed to specific states. Therefore, decisions of international tribunals are not a source of customary international law, though they may follow pre-existing customary law in some circumstances. But it appears that some lawyers often refer to 'customary international law' with regard to ICL when what they really mean is a kind of 'common law' of ICL, a body of precedent or prior decisions that support a particular result. The use of the phrase 'customary international law' in this context is inconsistent with the general theory of customary international law as found in public international law.

The final possibility is to view the Lubanga Pre-Trial Chamber as engaging in an exercise in general principles of law.[55] However, this route demonstrates some of the same difficulties as the customary analysis. Is the control theory sufficiently widespread that it constitutes a general principle of law? Most scholars believe that the general principles ought to be truly general and, in the words of the ICJ Statute, 'recognized by civilized nations'.[56] In that respect, the citation of Fletcher is helpful but, as discussed, hardly evidence of a transcultural adoption of the control theory.

Perhaps it is best to interpret the Lubanga Pre-Trial Chamber Decision as an independent exercise in international Dogmatik, a sui generis attempt to engage in international criminal law theory.[57] By engaging in an examination of the nature of mass atrocity, and seeing the great potential of the control theory as a means of understanding co-perpetration in the Rome Statute, the Pre-Trial Chamber was developing an ICC-specific Dogmatik, an attempt to reason from first principles the nature of co-perpetration and collective action in the context of atrocity. This is an admirable pursuit. The only question is how to square this pursuit with a general theory of sources of international law. Perhaps the only solution is to liberate international criminal law from its subsidiary status within public international law and recognize that international judges are, fundamentally, criminal law judges deciding on the wrongfulness of actions and the culpability of actors appearing before them in a criminal trial. This necessarily requires elucidation of the Rome Statute when its content reveals gaps that require doctrinal elaboration. This is not necessarily an invitation to judicial experimentation,[58] but rather a recognition that criminal law categories codified in a statute are not self-applying and that sui generis criminal law theory has a role to play in law [54] For a discussion of the requirements for the establishment of a customary norm, see generally A D'Amato, The Concept of Custom in International Law (Ithaca: Cornell University Press 1971).

[55] On the relationship between general principles and criminal law theory, see N Jain, 'General Principles of Law as Gap-Fillers' (forthcoming); F Mantovani, 'The General Principles of International Criminal Law: The Viewpoint of a National Criminal Lawyer' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 26.

[56] Art 38 Statute of the International Court of Justice (adopted 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 33 UNTS 933.

[57] See G Fletcher, 'New Court, Old Dogmatik' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 179.

[58] For a critical example, see B Saul, 'Legislating from the Radical Hague: The United Nations Special Tribunal for Lebanon Invents an International Crime of Transnational Terrorism' (2011) Leiden Journal of International Law 677.

application to fact in specific cases. Roxin's control theory of perpetration is probably best viewed within this framework.

The Katanga and Ngudjolo Decision represented the second application of Roxin's control theory to Article 25 of the Rome Statute.[59] However, the factual scenario presented in the case was remarkably different from Lubanga. Whereas Lubanga was charged as a co-perpetrator for his joint commission of recruiting child soldiers, Katanga and Ngudjolo were charged with responsibility for crimes committed by their respective subordinates. The application of the control theory to their co-perpetrated crimes was complicated by the fact that the two defendants controlled separate rebel forces.[60] In its Confirmation of Charges Decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber concluded that there was sufficient evidence to warrant a trial to determine whether the two rebel organizations jointly perpetrated the atrocities in question. Consequently, Katanga and Ngudjolo were viewed as co-perpetrators who formed a collective unit with a division of labour regarding the accomplishment of the task. However, since neither directly performed the criminal conduct in question, but controlled the outcome of the crime through an organized apparatus of power, the defendants were indirect perpetrators.[61] The combination of these two facts—their horizontal cooperation to control the crime and their vertical control over their respective organizations—gave birth to a new flavour of the control theory.[62] The Pre-Trial Chamber referred to this as indirect co-perpetration.[63]

Although indirect co-perpetration is not explicitly listed in the Rome Statute, the Pre-Trial Chamber reasoned that it was a natural combination of the raw materials of co-perpetration and indirect perpetration.[64] Add the two together and you get indirect co-perpetration. The combination has been asserted in other recent ICC cases and it is likely to feature prominently in future ICC jurisprudence as long as the control theory reigns as the guiding doctrine of co-perpetration at the court.[65] Given that the Rome Statute has delegated to the court the task of prosecuting cases and defendants of the highest concern to the world community, many of the defendants in question will be geographically and perhaps temporally removed from the physical commission of the crime. Indeed, past prosecutors have publicly indicated their desire to concentrate their limited institutional resources on individuals high in the bureaucratic [59] See Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, para. 484 ('By adopting the final approach of control over the crime, the Chamber embraces a leading principle for distinguishing between principals and accessories to a crime, one that synthesises both objective and subjective components').

[60] Ibid., para. 544. [61] Ibid., para. 511. [62] Ibid., para. 491.

[63] Ibid., para. 490 (rejecting the defence assertion that indirect co-perpetration is unsupported by the text of the Rome Statute).

[64] Ibid., para. 491 (cataloguing the various ways of interpreting the disjunction 'or' in the text of Art 25(3)(a)).

[65] See also Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 370. See also Judgment, Stakić, ICTY-97-24-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 July 2003, para. 469; Decision on Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-1, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, paras 216–23; Decision on Confirmation of Charges, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, paras 361–8.

chain of command, rather than foot soldiers who personally commit the actus reus.[66] Given that such defendants often collaborate with other leadership-level defendants to direct these crimes, it seems certain that the concept of indirect co-perpetration will play an ever-increasing significant role in the ICC jurisprudence on modes of liability.

21.3 Criticisms of the Control Theory of Perpetration

The application of the control theory in Lubanga, Katanga and Ngudjolo, and other ICC cases has prompted no shortage of criticisms. First, critics complain that the approach represents a form of comparative cherry picking. Second, the approach requires a hypothetical and nearly impossible counterfactual inquiry into whether the defendant's behaviour constituted an essential contribution to the crime. Third, the control theory's goal of separating co-perpetrators from mere accomplices might be inapposite in ICL, which does not have mandatory sentencing ranges that attach to these Dogmatik categories. These criticisms will now be explained and critically evaluated.

First, consider the claim about cherry picking. It is true that the control theory does not represent a wide swathe of legal cultures, although this might be equally true of competing modes of liability that are equally unsupported by some rival legal cultures. In a world of radical legal pluralism, finding a baseline of a universal criminal law may be difficult, unless one moves to a normative level and looks for a universal grammar of criminal law.[67] But if one is confined to the level of positive legal doctrine, any approach will inevitably prejudice either a civil-law or common-law approach to perpetration. If a court adopts JCE, it looks suspiciously like conspiracy or other common law modes of liability. If a court adopts co-perpetration based on the control theory, it looks suspiciously like a civil-law approach to co-perpetration. Once the criminal law is reduced to a universal baseline, it becomes as thin as paper.

The more legitimate criticism is that the ICC's version of co-perpetration based on the control theory might be unsupported by the Rome Statute. Both Judge Fulford and Judge Van den Wyngaert expressed similar sentiments in their respective Lubanga and Ngudjolo separate opinions.[68] For example, Fulford connects the [66] See Paper on some policy issues before the OTP, OTP, ICC, September 2003. See also J Locke, 'Indictments' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 604, 609.

[67] On the issue of fragmentation, see E van Sliedregt, 'Pluralism in International Criminal Law' (2012) 25 Leiden Journal of International Law 847, 852: 'Accepting pluralism at the national level does not disqualify the need for a general part at the international level. Substantive international criminal law is undertheorized and lacks a common "grammar". Moreover, certain liability theories have developed as genuine, sui generis international liability theories (JCE, command responsibility) that could be implemented at the national level alongside local law that traditionally forms part of the domestic general part (complicity liability, defences, sentencing). Developing an international general part will contribute towards a more sophisticated substantive international criminal law, especially when drawn on (general) principles of time-honoured domestic criminal law. In doing so, one must adopt a harmonizing approach'; A Greenawalt, 'The Pluralism of International Criminal Law' (2011) 86 Indiana Law Journal 1063.

[68] Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga Judgment (n 36) ('Lubanga, Separate Opinion Judge Fulford'); Ngudjolo, Van den Wyngaert Opinion (n 34). The Lubanga judgment and sentence control theory in Article 25(3) with the alleged hierarchy between the different forms of perpetration embodied in Article 25(3)(a)–(d).[69] Under the 'hierarchy' view, Article 25 lists forms of perpetration in descending order of severity, so that Article 25(3)(a) involves principal forms of perpetration, either individually, cooperatively, or indirectly (or indeed cooperatively indirectly)—all of which generate liability as a principal perpetrator. In contrast, the other provisions in the article generate derivative forms of liability, such as accessorial or accomplice liability. For example, Article 25(3)(b) deals with ordering, soliciting, and inducing, while Article 25(3)(c) deals with facilitation and aiding and abetting. Viewed in this light, the control theory helps animate the conceptual distinction that runs right down the middle between Article 25(3)(a) and 25(3)(b), i.e. the distinction between principals and mere accessories. Without the control theory, there is no principled way of distinguishing these categories.

Fulford rejects this line of argument, concluding that the various modes of liability 'were not intended to be mutually exclusive'.[70] As such, their ordering in Article 25 is not suggestive and the need for a categorical explanation between them is illusory. Moreover, Fulford is not convinced by the majority that the Statute implies that accessories in Article 25(3)(c) are more culpable than those who contribute to group crimes under Article 25(3)(d).[71] Contributing to a common criminal endeavour under Article 25(3)(d) seems to fit the paradigm of the history of collective atrocities, so it seems odd to reduce it to the lowest stop on the ladder of culpability.[72]

Similarly, Judge Van den Wyngaert in her Ngudjolo concurring opinion also questioned whether the ICC was straying too far from the plain text of Article 25 of the Rome Statute.[73] In particular, Van den Wyngaert noted that the text says nothing about organizations, but the ICC has repeatedly applied Roxin's Organisationsherrschaft as a version of indirect perpetration in cases where the defendant's control was mediated through an organized apparatus of power.[74] In Van den Wyngaert's view, the ICC statute defines indirect perpetration as committing a crime through another individual, not committing a crime through an organization, a term that is conspicuously absent from Article 25.[75]

Second, Judge Fulford complained in his Lubanga separate opinion (at the Judgment phase) that determining whether the defendant provided an essential contribution to the criminal effort requires that the fact-finder engage in a hypothetical evaluation.[76] This criticism demands further explanation. The complaint is that the evaluation is unduly counterfactual. By asking whether the contribution was essential rather than simply substantial, the doctrine requires that the court posit the existence of an alternate world, without the defendant's contribution, and assess how the criminal plan were confirmed by the Appeals Chamber in 2014 in a decision that did not substantially revisit issues relating to modes of liability. See Judgment on the appeals of the Prosecutor and Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the 'Decision on Sentence pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3122, AC, ICC, 12 January 2014.

[69] Lubanga, Separate Opinion Judge Fulford (n 68) para. 7. [70] Ibid. [71] Ibid., para. 8.
[72] Ibid. [73] Ngudjolo, Van den Wyngaert Opinion (n 34) paras 11–12. [74] Ibid., 52.
[75] Ibid., 53. [76] Lubanga, Separate Opinion Judge Fulford (n 68) para. 17.

would have progressed in his absence. If the crime would have occurred anyway, then the defendant's contribution is hardly essential. On the other hand, if the commission of the crime was stymied by the defendant's putative non-participation, then the defendant's contribution is essential, and the requirements of the co-perpetration doctrine are satisfied. Why are some jurists reluctant to engage in such modal analysis? Indeed, such possible-world semantics arguably underlie any commonplace statement of a subjunctive nature. To say: 'I would have brought my umbrella if I had known that it was going to rain' is to posit the existence of a possible world where one has the relevant information, and then makes a claim about this possible world, i.e. I would have picked up my umbrella. Of course, this world does not exist; I did not know the weather forecast. So of course this entire subjunctive statement is hypothetical and counterfactual. But the fact remains that we all understand the semantic content of such statements. They are meaningful.

Indeed, the law often engages in counterfactual reasoning whenever causation is at issue; this is not the unique domain of the international criminal lawyer.[77] When the judge argues that the defendant's negligence caused the car crash, he is examining a world that never happened, where the defendant acts reasonably and prudently, and concludes that the car crash would have been avoided in that instance.[78] This is deeply counterfactual. So the law is shot through with hypothetical and counterfactual reasoning that cannot easily be replaced with other modes of analysis.

That being said, not all counterfactual reasoning is made alike. Some standards are easier to apply than others. With the control theory and the notion of an 'essential contribution', some problems emerge. In particular, the essential contribution requirement demands a trans-modal definition of the crime that crosses possible worlds. Imagine that if the defendant had not acted, some criminal activity would have occurred anyway but it would not have been exactly the same as the criminal activity that occurred in the real world. Does that count as an essential contribution or not? It depends on our definition of 'the crime' in question. Say the defendant is a police official who helps coordinate the transfer of civilians of an oppressed minority from one village to a death camp. In the absence of the defendant's contribution, the victims would not have been deported to the death camp on that day. But perhaps the victims would have been deported a month later instead, and many of the same victims would have died. Does this suggest that the defendant's conduct was not essential? It depends on whether you define the first and second scenarios as the same crime. The only way to answer this is to have some theoretical account of the characteristics of the crime that distinguish between the essential nature of the crime and the peripheral details of the criminal activity. Change the essential nature and it is no longer the same crime; change the peripheral characteristics and you still have the same crime but just different details. These questions are not easy to answer.

[77] The issue is discussed in H L A Hart and T Honoré, Causation in the Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1985) 411–21.

[78] Ibid., 414.

The third criticism attacks the underlying rationale for the entire doctrinal enterprise that co-perpetration is designed to address. Judge Fulford noted that domestic criminal law systems often attach rigid consequences for sentencing depending on whether a particular defendant is convicted as a principal perpetrator or an accessory.[79] This is certainly true in Germany, where the control theory originated, and where the Penal Code codifies a requirement that defendants convicted as accomplices receive sentences reduced by a percentage amount.[80] Consequently, the status of accomplice or accessory is equal parts mode of liability and equal parts mitigation. In contrast, international criminal law includes no mandatory sentencing ranges; indeed, ICL does not even include any statutorily defined sentencing guidelines. Each crime prosecuted under the Rome Statute is subject to life in prison, and the result falls within the discretion of the Trial Chamber judges (subject to review by the Appeals Chamber). So Judge Fulford asks, why bother focusing the criminal law doctrine so rigidly around the distinction between principals and accessories when the law attaches no significance to the distinction when it comes to sentencing?[81]

The criticism is both right and wrong at the same time. It is right insofar as it correctly identifies the control theory as a creature of the German system that cannot be divorced from its origins. The German Penal Code, and other codes heavily influenced by it, consider the distinction between principal perpetrators and mere accomplices to be one of the most important in the general part,[82] and the control theory is best understood as a new and innovative sorting mechanism to decide which defendants fall under one category or another.[83] Its merit stems from its alleged capacity to deliver more convincing answers to this sorting dilemma than other competing legal doctrines.[84] But one should never forget that the control theory is parasitically related to the distinction between principals and accessories, which has greater purchase on some legal systems than on others.

That being said, it is an exaggeration to say that the distinction between principals and accessories is irrelevant in ICL just because no sentencing consequences directly attach to the determination. First, although judges retain discretion, they will be highly influenced by these categories and will be more inclined to hand out heavier sentences if the defendant meets the legal requirements as a co-perpetrator. Second, the labels are also significant even before the issue of sentencing is addressed.[85] The

[79] Lubanga, Separate Opinion Judge Fulford (n 68) para. 11.

[80] Criminal Code of Germany (Strafgesetzbuch StGB) s. 27(2).

[81] Lubanga, Separate Opinion Judge Fulford (n 68) paras 10–11.

[82] See Bohlander (n 30) 153: 'Criminal law as a state, of state reaction to the degree of personal guilt in law-breaking must provide for differing answers and liabilities depending on the type of participation in criminal behaviour.' See also Van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (n 12) 77 (discussing rise of normative model in international criminal law).

[83] Ibid., 162.

[84] See Ambos, Treaties on International Criminal Law (n 18) 159–60: 'If the state orders a violation of these rights or fails to prevent such violations, it does not live up to this special duty and thus its highest representatives incur criminal responsibility for being part of the state organization.'

[85] See, in this regard, H Vest, 'Business Leaders and the Modes of Individual Criminal Responsibility under International Law' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 851, 856 fn. 19: 'With regard to international criminal law it may be preferable to speak of a "differentiating model with uniform (unified) range of punishment".'

labels are independently significant, signalling levels of culpability to the world at large (both perpetrators and victims), as well as third parties watching the legal proceedings unfold. To insist upon the distinction between principals and accessories is to do more than just limit or guide the discretion of judges regarding sentencing; it is also to insist that labels matter, that the legal categories that attach to conduct and agents have real meaning and significance.[86] Moreover, defendants have a right to insist that these labels are accurate and carefully capture their relative culpability and the nature of their conduct. To call someone a co-perpetrator is far worse than to convict them of aiding and abetting genocide, and the international system should work hard to generate normatively defensible descriptions of behaviour.

One solution to the problem would be to import the German approach into international criminal law. There is no reason why, in theory, the ICC or a future ad hoc tribunal statute could not be amended so that co-perpetrators receive the highest sentences and accomplices receive a sentence reduction. However, I think importing the German model into international criminal law would be a mistake. International crimes are far more serious (morally) than the average domestic crime, and it is fanciful to pretend otherwise. We are dealing with conduct that resides on the margins of human decency and that often shocks our imagination about human nature. In some situations, even the defendant who aids and abets a massive genocide is deserving of a serious penalty, and that penalty might be life in prison.[87] In order to implement a system whereby accomplices receive automatic sentencing mitigation, one would have to insist that defendants convicted of aiding and abetting international crimes always deserve something less than a life sentence. Is this conclusion warranted after a priori investigation, without regard to the facts and evidence of a particular conflict, particular defendants, and particular victims? To pre-judge the scenario and, at the level of institutional design, decide that aiders and abettors of international crimes should never receive a life sentence—because that sentence would need to be reserved for the co-perpetrator—strikes me as the type of abstract analysis that ICL ought to eschew. There are some crimes that are so severe that even the defendants who fail to meet the requirements of co-perpetratorship are still culpable enough to deserve a lengthy sentence.

21.4 Alternative Accounts of Co-Perpetration

What are the alternative solutions where co-perpetration is concerned? Judge Fulford posited the possibility of a streamlined theory of co-perpetration, more closely [86] On the principle of fair labelling, see F Mégret, 'Prospects for "Constitutional" Human Rights Scrutiny of Substantive International Criminal Law by the ICC, with Special Emphasis on the General Part' (paper presented at Washington University School of Law, Whitney R Harris World Law Institute, International Legal Scholars Workshop, Roundtable in Public International Law and Theory, 4–6 February 2010); Ohlin, 'Joint Intentions to Commit International Crimes' (n 21) 751; A Ashworth, 'The Elasticity of Mens Rea' in C Tapper (ed.), Crime, Proof, and Punishment: Essays in Memory of Sir Rupert Cross (London: Butterworths 1981) 45.

[87] An example of this reasoning appears in Kaing Guek Eav (Duch), (Appeal Judgment) 001/18-07-2007-ECCC/SC (3 February 2012) para. 377.

attuned to the bare language of Article 25, which requires only the existence of a common plan between multiple individuals with coordinated activity to accomplish the result.[88] Fulford justified his new version of co-perpetration by noting that:

> This self-evidently necessitates a sufficient meeting of minds, by way of an agreement, common plan or joint understanding. In practice, this will not always be explicit or the result of long-term planning, and the existence of the joint venture may need to be inferred from the conduct of the co-perpetrators.[89]

This version of co-perpetration would deemphasize the aspect of control that forms the sine qua non of Roxin's theory and the Lubanga jurisprudence. In a sense, it elevates the subjective element to a higher place in the theory, generating a potential return to a subjective approach to co-perpetration, a doctrinal move that I have supported in other writings.[90] Indeed, there is no reason why a theory of co-perpetration could not be based on the mutuality of intention among the co-perpetrators.[91] It seems at least plausible to suggest that the joint intention to carry out the crime—what Fulford describes as the meeting of the minds—constitutes a normative accurate description of collective criminality generating liability as a principal perpetrator.[92] If an individual agrees with others to commit the crimes, and desires the result accomplished by the group, then the action is properly attributable to the individual qua participant in the collective agent. The act of the individual becomes the act of the whole by virtue of the mental element.[93]

Fulford would, at the same time, reduce the objective requirements for co-perpetration. Instead of the robust requirement of an essential contribution, lower forms of contribution would be sufficient to meet the objective elements of co-perpetration.[94] Specifically, Fulford notes that:

> Nothing in the Statute requires that the contribution must involve direct, physical participation at the execution stage of the crime, and, instead, an absent perpetrator may be involved. Either way, the use of the word 'commits' simply requires an operative link between the individual's contribution and the commission of the crime.[95]

This would alleviate any pressure on the court to engage in hypothetical or counterfactual reasoning. As Fulford concludes, 'the plain text of Article 25(3) does not require proof that the crime would not have been committed absent the accused's involvement (viz. that his role was essential)'.[96]

This streamlined version of co-perpetration would effectively flip the relative importance of the subjective and objective requirements that exist in the current control theory version of co-perpetration. Right now, the Lubanga standard requires a very high objective element (essential contribution) and a lower mental element (up to and including dolus eventualis based on the defendant reconciling oneself with

[88] Lubanga, Separate Opinion Judge Fulford (n 68) para. 16. [89] Ibid., para. 15.
[90] J Ohlin, 'Searching for the Hinterman: In Praise of Subjective Theories of Imputation' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 325–43.
[91] See Ohlin, 'Joint Intentions to Commit International Crimes' (n 21) 742. [92] Ibid., 745.
[93] For a discussion of the subjective approach as applied by German courts, see Bohlander (n 30) 162–3.
[94] Lubanga, Separate Opinion Judge Fulford (n 68) para. 15. [95] Ibid. [96] Ibid.

the knowledge that the common plan will result in the commission of the offence). The Fulford version of co-perpetration involves the exact opposite: a more robust mens rea requirement and a lower objective element that ensures that the defendant is causally connected to the crime but not necessarily an essential element in the actus reus. The subjective element would gain increased prominence in this version of co-perpetration. I have supported this move in the form of a Joint Intentions Theory of Co-Perpetration, which provides a philosophical foundation for this doctrinal option.[97]

This raises a related point: What is the required mental element for co-perpetration? In the Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber declared that dolus eventualis met the required mental element for co-perpetration.[98] This conclusion was embodied by its expressing of the co-perpetration standard as including that co-perpetrators must 'mutually accept the result by reconciling themselves to it or consenting to it'.[99] This language explicitly captured some of the more common theories of dolus eventualis, a civil law mental state that has generated no shortage of scholarly and judicial controversy.[100] The basic principle behind dolus eventualis is that the defendant does not purposely or knowingly produce the result, though he is aware of the possibility that the result will occur. For this reason, comparative law scholars and judges have sometimes referred to dolus eventualis as a civil law cousin to the common law mental state known as recklessness.[101] However, other scholars have suggested that dolus eventualis represents a higher mental state, residing somewhere between recklessness and knowledge, since the defendant must reconcile himself to the possibility that the fulfilment of the common plan will bring about the crimes in question.

Setting aside for a moment the question of whether dolus eventualis equates with recklessness, the Pre-Trial Chamber's inclusion of dolus eventualis within the standard for co-perpetration was controversial, in part because it stood in some tension with the default mental state expressed in Article 30 of the Rome Statute, which requires acting with 'intent or knowledge unless otherwise provided'.[102] Some have argued that dolus eventualis is one aspect of intent (or dolus), an argument that might ring true to civil-law-trained criminal lawyers (who think of intent as the broader concept of dolus) but sounds opaque and confusing to common-law-trained criminal lawyers, who are inclined to limit the concept of intent to acting with purpose

[97] See Ohlin, 'Joint Intentions to Commit International Crimes' (n 21) 742–3; Ohlin, 'Searching for the Hinterman' (n 90).

[98] See Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 17) para. 352. [99] Ibid.

[100] For a general discussion of the different theories grounding dolus eventualis, see M Badar, 'Dolus Eventualis and the Rome Statute Without It?' (2009) 12 New Criminal Law Review 433. These issues are also explored in K Ambos, 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision' (2009) 22 Leiden Journal of international Law 715; S Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability: Article 25(3)(b) and (c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2012) 158–60 (correctly noting that 'the fact that the individual decides to proceed with the relevant conduct despite knowledge of the substantial risk is evidence of some level of volition').

[101] See also Cassese (n 8) 66.

[102] G Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law 2nd edn (The Hague: TMC Asser Press 2009) 153–4 and fn. 87 ('Remarkably, the few commentators who advocate the inclusion of recklessness and dolus eventualis in the standard set by Art 30 of the ICC Statute rarely give any reasons for their position').

and acting knowingly. The other possibility is to argue that the 'unless otherwise provided' prong provides an invitation to import lower mens rea standards from customary international law, which in this case would include a customary rendering of the law of co-perpetration.[103] However, it seems clear that the reference to 'unless otherwise provided' was designed to refer to the Elements of Crimes or perhaps other statutory codifications,[104] but not customary law. To read it in this way produces an exception so large that it swallows the rule and undermines the whole point of establishing a default mens rea standard in the statute.[105]

The Lubanga Trial Chamber backed away from the Pre-Trial Chamber's commitment to dolus eventualis, or it appeared to do so. The Lubanga Trial Chamber concluded that the Pre-Trial Chamber was wrong to think that dolus eventualis was consistent with Article 30 of the default mens rea standard, so the co-perpetration standard should be expressed without reference to dolus eventualis or liability based on a realization of events that might occur.[106] However, at the same time, the Lubanga Trial Chamber confused matters by importing the principles of dolus eventualis but simply dropping the controversial label. Specifically, the Trial Chamber noted that:

> [i]n the view of the Majority of the Chamber, the 'awareness that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events' means that the participants anticipate, based on their knowledge of how events ordinarily develop, that the consequence will occur in the future. This prognosis involves consideration of the concepts of 'possibility' and 'probability', which are inherent to the notions of 'risk' and 'danger'. Risk is defined as 'danger, (exposure to) the possibility of loss, injury or other adverse circumstance'. The co-perpetrators only 'know' the consequences of their conduct once they have occurred. At the time the co-perpetrators agree on a common plan and throughout its implementation, they must know the existence of a risk that the consequence will occur. As to the degree of risk, and pursuant to the wording of Article 30, it must be no less than awareness on the part of the co-perpetrator that the consequence 'will occur in the ordinary course of events'. A low risk will not be sufficient.[107]

With all due respect to the majority of the Lubanga Trial Chamber, this argument is unconvincing and incoherent. It purports to reject dolus eventualis but then it reintroduces liability for future acts that may 'possibly' or will 'probably' occur. Indeed, the Trial Chamber explicitly concedes that it is talking about liability for risk-taking [103] See Badar, 'Dolus Eventualis and the Rome Statute Without It?' (n 100) 446.

[104] See W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 475–6.

[105] In Bemba, Pre-Trial Chamber II disagreed with the Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision by rejecting the application of dolus eventualis with regard to Art 30. See Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo (n 65) para. 362.

[106] Lubanga Judgment (n 36) para. 1011: 'The drafting history of the Statute suggests that the notion of dolus eventualis, along with the concept of recklessness, was deliberately excluded from the framework of the Statute (e.g. see the use of the words "unless otherwise provided" in the first sentence of Article 30). The plain language of the Statute, and most particularly the use of the words "will occur" in Art 30(2)(b) as opposed to "may occur", excludes the concept of dolus eventualis.'

[107] Ibid., para. 1012.

behaviour, precisely the type of behaviour that falls within dolus eventualis or recklessness: risky behaviour that a defendant is aware of but decides to engage in anyway.

The only normative argument in favour of this approach is the Trial Chamber's philosophical scepticism that true knowledge is impossible because human agents can never predict the future. While this may be true, it cannot form a basis to collapse the distinction between recklessness and knowledge. The classical distinction between the two concepts is that acting with knowledge requires practical certainty while recklessness requires awareness of a risk that a consequence will probably occur. The only concession that the Trial Chamber makes is that a low risk will not be significant—a point consistent with the mental states of dolus eventualis and recklessness—doctrines that exclude liability for far-flung possibilities or justified risks. It is therefore submitted that the Trial Chamber, while purporting to reject dolus eventualis, immediately reintroduced it through the back door by virtue of its confused discussion of knowledge and risk-taking behaviour.[108]

The important point here is that we should conceptually separate the issue of dolus eventualis from the doctrine of co-perpetration. The Trial Chamber agreed with the Pre-Trial Chamber that Article 25 should be interpreted in light of Roxin's control theory. That conclusion, however, is separate from the second question of which mental state applies to co-perpetration, and whether dolus eventualis will be sufficient to generate liability. In theory, the control theory of co-perpetration can be applied with dolus eventualis or without, and nothing internal to the concept of 'control' dictates an answer in either direction. The decision on dolus eventualis under Article 30 is therefore conceptually distinct from the decision of which the theory of co-perpetration is governed by Article 25 of the Rome Statute. Adopting the control theory does not 'control' the outcome of the dolus eventualis analysis. (However, the reverse may be true: if dolus eventualis is inconsistent with Article 30, then no amount of criminal law theory will justify the importation of the lower mental element into one's doctrine of co-perpetration under Article 25.)

This relates to a second point regarding the nature of the underlying agreement (under the objective elements for co-perpetration). Does the underlying plan need to be criminal in nature in order to generate liability, or might the co-perpetrators formulate a non-criminal plan that simply produces criminal consequences? This issue is of extreme importance given that some co-perpetrators will argue in court that their underlying agreement involved a legitimate war effort and that any atrocities committed by soldiers were incidental to that plan.[109] This is especially important given that the ICC has limited jurisdiction (or almost no jurisdiction) over the crime of aggression and matters of jus ad bellum generally. Co-perpetrators can claim that [108] In contrast, Pre-Trial Chamber II correctly analysed the issue in Bemba when it concluded that the drafters of the Rome Statute did not use the words 'may occur' or 'might occur', thus demonstrating that liability required 'near inevitability or virtual certainty'. See Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo (n 65) para. 363.

[109] This argument was successfully made, in a slightly different context, by Stanišić and Simatović. See Judgment, Stanišić and Simatović, IT-03-69-T, TC I, ICTY, 30 May 2013, para. 2361.

they agreed to fight a war—and nothing more—and that the Court is prevented in most cases from inquiring into the legality of that war effort as a matter of jus ad bellum.[110]

The Pre-Trial Chamber in its Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision claimed to reject the possibility that a purely non-criminal plan could generate liability. It must have an 'element of criminality', it claimed.[111] However, on closer inspection it becomes clear that the 'element of criminality' does not require an explicit criminal goal, but rather is based on dolus eventualis and the possibility that crimes might occur during the execution of the non-criminal plan. Specifically, the Pre-Trial Chamber concluded that liability attaches to co-perpetrators if:

i. the co-perpetrators have agreed: (a) to start the implementation of the common plan to achieve a non-criminal goal, and (b) to only commit the crime if certain conditions are met; or
ii. that the co-perpetrators (a) are aware of the risk that implementing the common plan (which is specifically directed at the achievement of a non-criminal goal) will result in the commission of the crime, and (b) accept such outcome.[112]

The notion that co-perpetrators are liable if they 'accept' that crimes might occur during the course of a non-criminal plan can only be justified by the principle of dolus eventualis, so it is clear that the Pre-Trial Chamber's rendering of the common plan prong of the standard, as an objective element, was conceptually linked to the awareness prong of the standard as a subjective element. If dolus eventualis is appropriate in one domain, it presumably is appropriate in another; but if dolus eventualis contravenes Article 30 on one side of the equation it is equally inappropriate on the other side.

In the subsequent Lubanga Judgment, the Trial Chamber predictably followed its flawed analysis from the mental element and concluded that a non-criminal plan could generate liability if the common plan 'included a critical element of criminality, namely that, its implementation embodied a sufficient risk that, if events follow the ordinary course, a crime will be committed'.[113] This again replicates the principle of dolus eventualis in every way except the name. Under this jurisprudence, co-perpetrators must be careful not to agree to non-criminal plans, such as pursuing a legitimate war effort, that might result in the commission of international crimes by subordinates under their control. This seems to transform co-perpetration as a mode of liability much closer in content to the doctrine of command responsibility, where commanders are responsible for the actions of their subordinates when they recklessly fail to prevent or punish the offences.[114] But co-perpetration is not command responsibility. Furthermore, whether the Trial Chamber is normatively correct about liability for co-perpetrators who agree [110] This issue was also present in the Perišić case. See Judgment, Perišić, ICTY-IT-04-81-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2013.

[111] Lubanga Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 17) para. 344.

[112] Ibid. [113] Lubanga, Judgment (n 36) para. 984.

[114] For a discussion of the conceptual inconsistencies in the command responsibility doctrine, see D Robinson, 'How Command Responsibility Got so Complicated: A Culpability Contradiction, its Obfuscation, and a Simple Solution' (2012) 13 Melbourne Journal of International Law 1.

to cooperate in non-criminal plans, it is certainly the case that the argument used to reach this result was theoretically disingenuous. If the Trial Chamber had wanted to reach this result, it should have explicitly endorsed the Pre-Trial Chamber's use of the concept of dolus eventualis. To take away dolus eventualis with one hand and then bring it back with the other is conceptually confusing, to say the least.

21.5 Concluding Evaluations

Is the ICC doctrine of co-perpetration a worthwhile example of criminal law Dogmatik or is it representative of a new theoretical invasion of The Hague with German criminal law principles? Judge Fulford's separate opinion in Lubanga demonstrates marked scepticism about the need to import certain distinctions from German criminal law theory that might have little place in the ICC scheme. Others have worried about the ICC becoming too weighted towards the criminal law approach of one particular system, a danger for an international institution hoping to achieve transcultural and global legitimacy. This is related to the question of sources and methodology, and whether the content of international criminal law, especially when it strays from the bare text of a codified instrument, should be broadly representative of multiple legal cultures, as opposed to weighted towards one particular approach.

It seems to me that whispers of a German invasion are unfair. The judges are engaging in first-order questions of criminal law theory. Regardless of whether they are reaching the correct answers on any particular question (and on this reasonable minds can disagree), it is laudable that the judges are engaging directly with the deep structure of the criminal law and the key distinctions, such as co-perpetrators and accessories, embodied within it. One should not fault the Germans for being successful in exporting their approach to the criminal law. In fact, the reason that other nations have modelled their penal codes on the German approach must be because the German Penal Code is either theoretically convincing, pragmatically useful, or both.[115] If this constitutes an invasion, it is a welcome one.

However, one should also admit that judges and scholars have more work to do with regard to a general theory of sources that offers a central role for criminal law theory. It is neither statutory interpretation nor customary international law. If it is general principles of law, then the results ought to be more general, rather than weighted towards particular legal traditions. But reducing criminal law theory to the lowest common denominator would rob international tribunals of the rich materials that sophisticated criminal law systems have to offer. Nowhere is this more in evidence than in the doctrine of co-perpetration. The ICC was unwilling to adopt the ICTY jurisprudence on JCE and therefore worked hard to mine national legal systems for an account of co-perpetration that would carve a unique path in the international jurisprudence. This task should be supported and encouraged regardless of the specific doctrinal results that may generate controversy.

[115] See Bohlander (n 30) 9: 'The fact that German law is to a large extent based on the more or less strict application of logic and well-developed methods of interpretation is also a function of the German academics' attitude to the judicial process: they do not see academic as the mere handmaiden of the judges, but as the guiding light.'

22

Indirect Perpetration

*Thomas Weigend

22.1 Background

The perpetration of a crime through another person is a concept that has long been recognized in many legal systems. A person who instructs an innocent agent, for example a child, to kill another person, achieves his criminal purpose without personally facing the victim. He may be called an 'indirect' perpetrator (or a 'perpetrator-by-means') because he does not himself set in motion the immediate cause of the victim's death. He is nevertheless held responsible for the victim's death as a perpetrator because he controls the chain of events that leads to the killing.

According to traditional doctrine, the reason for holding the indirect perpetrator responsible as a perpetrator lies in the fact that no other responsible actor intervenes between the offender's act (instructing the child) and the forbidden consequence (the victim's death). This fact distinguishes an indirect perpetrator from an instigator, who also triggers a chain of events that leads to the commission of a crime, but who achieves his purpose 'through' a responsible person (namely, the direct perpetrator who acts upon the instigation). In spite of this sound theoretical distinction between indirect perpetrators and instigators, it is a policy question whether instigators should be punished less severely than principals. One may argue that it makes no difference for a person's blameworthiness whether he persuades a child or an adult to carry out the criminal act that he intends to be committed. Many legal systems therefore authorize the judge to impose the same sentence on instigators as on (direct or indirect) perpetrators.[1]

Indirect perpetration typically occurs where the human agent is not himself criminally responsible, for example, because he lacks mens rea or acts under duress or is below the age of criminal responsibility. The same reason that excludes the physical actor's criminal responsibility makes him susceptible to being controlled by another person: a child can easily be manipulated into doing what an adult wants him to do, and a person under duress will act upon the will of the individual threatening him with harm to his life or health. Consequently, indirect perpetration is typically characterized by a combination of (a) a dominant position of the indirect perpetrator over the agent and (b) a lack of control (and a concomitant lack of criminal responsibility) on the part of the agent. But in some instances, only condition (a) may be fulfilled. For example, the actor who physically carries out the offence may be a legally responsible adult who is personally strongly dependent on another person, for example a dominant spouse, and therefore unquestioningly fulfils any wish the other person may express.[2] In that case, the person in the background has a dominant position, and yet the immediate actor does not lack control over the act.

* Professor of Criminal Law, University of Cologne.

[1] See, e.g., Arts 121–6, 121–7 French Penal Code; German Penal Code s. 26; Arts 18(2) and 19(1) Polish Penal Code; Art 28(2)(a) Spanish Penal Code.

In international criminal law, it is by no means exceptional that a person is legally responsible and at the same time under someone else's strict control. International crimes, such as war crimes or crimes against humanity, are typically committed not by individuals acting alone (or using just one human agent) but by collectives that frequently are hierarchically organized.[3] In that case, the thin line between instigation and indirect perpetration becomes blurred. A soldier who receives an order from his superior remains a responsible agent under the law and may, under modern international criminal law,[4] be held liable for any offence he commits, except for special situations where he can claim the defence of duress.[5] Yet the commander may be in full control over what the soldiers in his unit will or will not do, because they obediently carry out his orders.

It is an open question whether the law should hold the commander in this situation responsible as an (indirect) perpetrator or as an accessory (for example, for ordering or instigating the crime). As mentioned earlier, this distinction will often not have a great bearing on the offender's sentence,[6] but it is nevertheless important, in the interest of fair labelling, to draw a clear line between principal and accessorial responsibility. In the situation described, the fact that the act can legally be attributed to the soldier physically carrying out the offence is an argument for holding the superior liable as a mere accessory; for the doctrine of indirect perpetration is not needed in order to avoid a gap of impunity, where no one could be held responsible as a principal.[7] In addition, the superior may have 'control' over the soldier as an empirical fact, but the law presumes a responsible adult to be in control of himself and not to be the tool of someone else, hence the kind of control presupposed by the doctrine of indirect perpetration is not present. On the other hand, one may argue that the concept of committing an offence 'through another person' does not refer to the legal responsibility

[2] For a case of this kind, see German Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof), Judgment of 15 September 1988, 35 Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen 347. A couple (Ms H and Mr P) had instructed R, a naive young man who was secretly in love with Ms H, to kill a young woman, making him believe that the killing was necessary in order to appease a mythical 'King of Cats', who might otherwise kill thousands of innocent persons. R was held to be legally responsible and was convicted as a direct perpetrator of the (attempted) killing of the victim, but H and P were convicted as indirect perpetrators of the offence.

[3] See F Jeßberger and J Geneuss, 'On the Application of a Theory of Indirect Perpetration in Al Bashir' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 853, 855.

[4] The doctrine of respondeat superior, which had previously generally exonerated soldiers ordered to commit war crimes, has been abandoned; see A Cassese and P Gaeta (eds), International Criminal Law 3rd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 228–30.

[5] See Sentencing Judgment, Erdemović, IT-96-22-T, TC, ICTY, 29 November 1996.

[6] See R Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010) 364. See also section 22.6.2.1.

[7] In the situation where a child is used as an agent, the child may be legally disqualified as a principal, so that there may exist no basis even for accessorial liability on the part of the person instructing the child.

of the physical actor but to the position of the person in the background: if he controls the commission of the criminal act then he should be held responsible as a perpetrator, regardless of the legal responsibility of the physical actor.

Indirect perpetration is only one of several legal concepts designed to describe the criminal responsibility of leaders who make others commit crimes but who avoid having blood on their own hands. Competing concepts are, e.g., superior responsibility,[8] joint criminal enterprise, accessorial liability for 'ordering', and conspiracy.[9] Given its traditional narrow focus on innocent agents, indirect perpetration was perhaps the least likely candidate for becoming the favourite concept of the ICC when dealing with leaders of organized groups whose members commit atrocities. The concept of indirect perpetration had not been part of the picture at the Nuremberg trial of the main war criminals: under Article 6 of the London Statute of the IMT, 'leaders, organizers, instigators and accomplices participating in the formulation or execution of a common plan or conspiracy to commit any of the listed crimes'[10] were defined as 'responsible for all acts performed by any person in execution of such plan'; additionally, conspiracy to commit the Crime against Peace was mentioned in Article 6(a) of the Statute. The IMT did not in fact distinguish between principal and accessorial responsibility.[11]

From the outset, the ICTY embraced the concept of JCE, rarely considering indirect perpetration (or even co-perpetration) as an alternative concept for adjudicating military and civilian leaders. It was only in the case against Milomir Stakić that the notion of indirect perpetration timidly raised its head,[12] only to be immediately pushed back on appeal.[13] Nevertheless, when the Statute of the ICC was written, there appeared in Article 25(3)(a) a very broad version of indirect perpetration as a mode of perpetration, and the ICC was quick to apply it, even expanding the concept based on certain theories developed in German literature and case law on the subject.[14] Still, there is doubt whether the concept of indirect perpetration has become part of customary international law beyond the ICC Statute.[15] This question is particularly acute with regard to the expansive notion of indirect perpetration as adopted in Article 25(3)(a) ICC Statute, which is not reflected in many national jurisdictions.[16] Moreover, two prominent ICC judges voiced their opposition to the broad use of indirect perpetration,

[8] See Art 28 ICC Statute.

[9] For an overview see K Ambos, 'Command Responsibility and Organisationsherrschaft: ways of attributing international crimes to the "most responsible" ' in H van der Wilt and A Nollkaemper (eds), System Criminality in International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 127.

[10] This formulation is close to what was to become JCE at the ICTY.

[11] The US and British military occupation tribunals in subsequent trials of war criminals likewise failed to distinguish between liability as a principal and as an accessory; see K Ambos, Treatise of International Criminal Law. Volume I: Foundations and General Part (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 113.

[12] Judgment, Stakić IT-97-24-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 July 2003 ('Stakić Trial Judgment') paras 439 et seq.

[13] Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-A, AC, ICTY, 22 March 2006 ('Stakić Appeal Judgment') para. 62.

[14] See section 22.3 for details.

[15] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[16] Jeßberger and Geneuss (n 3) 867–8. As the authors point out, the question of whether indirect perpetration is part of customary international law becomes acute in cases referred to the ICC by the UN Security Council.

especially in connection with co-perpetration.[17] Given the relatively small number of decisions on this point, it is still an open question whether the concept of indirect perpetration will have the bright future that the first decisions of ICC Pre-Trial Chambers seemed to suggest, or whether competing ways of dealing with leaders' criminal responsibility will eventually prevail at the ICC.

22.2 Ad Hoc Tribunals and Indirect Perpetration

Before entering into a more detailed discussion of the 'state of the art' at the ICC, let us take a brief look at how the major ad hoc tribunals have dealt with the issue of leadership crime. The Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR do not mention indirect perpetration. Article 7(1) ICTY Statute and Article 6(1) ICTR Statute list only the following forms of individual criminal responsibility: planning, instigation, ordering, committing, and aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation, or execution of a crime. In its seminal judgment in Tadić, the ICTY Trial Chamber found that these modes of liability have a basis in customary international law.[18] The Tadić Appeals Chamber also found that JCE is one recognized mode of 'committing' a crime under Article 7(1) of the Statute.[19] The Appeals Chamber mentioned the fact that most international crimes 'constitute manifestations of collective criminality'[20] and found that many national jurisdictions recognize similar forms of criminal responsibility.[21] According to ICTY case law, not all direct perpetrators need to be members of the JCE. There can hence exist a structure similar to indirect co-perpetration: several co-conspirators at the top level commit the crimes 'through' intermediaries who are not part of the common enterprise.[22]

Although JCE had been firmly implanted in ICTY case law a trial chamber presided over by German judge Wolfgang Schomburg in a 2003 judgment attempted to reverse the tide by rejecting JCE and introducing co-perpetratorship as a form of 'committing' a crime.[23] But this attempt was promptly rejected by the Appeals Chamber, which determined that this mode of liability 'does not have support in customary [17] See Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-4, TC II, ICC, 19 December 2012, paras 49–57; see also Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, paras 6–12.

[18] Opinion and Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-T, TC, ICTY, 7 May 1997 ('Tadić Trial Judgment') paras 663–9. For criticism of this assertion, see A Zahar and G Sluiter, International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 223 et seq.

[19] Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999 ('Tadić Appeal Judgment') paras 188 and 190. For a thorough analysis and critique of the theory and practice of JCE, see E van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 131–47.

[20] Ibid., paras 191–3. For a list of recent cases applying the JCE concept, see Ambos (n 11) 122, note 123.

[21] Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 19) paras 224–5. The Appeals Chamber includes in its listing several national systems which do not recognize JCE as such, but recognize some form of co-perpetration as a mode of criminal liability.

[22] See Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-A, AC, ICTY, 3 April 2007, paras 410 et seq. For a discussion of this judgment, see van Sliedregt (n 19) 158–65.

[23] Stakić Trial Judgment (n 12) paras 439 et seq.

international law or in the settled jurisprudence of this Tribunal'.[24] This decision confirmed the dominant position of JCE in the jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals.[25]

When comparing JCE and indirect perpetration, one should not overlook the fact that these two concepts are not direct competitors but relate to differing structures: in JCE, the focus is on a horizontally conceived 'common plan or design', all participants of which are attributed equal responsibility for all acts carried out in furtherance of the design. Indirect perpetration, by contrast, relates to vertical structures and considers the responsibility (only) of those on the top of the criminal pyramid. Although JCE covers these persons as well, JCE liability is less able to convey the specific responsibility of those in high positions. It is hence quite conceivable that both concepts co-exist.

22.3 The Inception of Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute

In line with the majority of national legal systems,[26] Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute distinguishes between perpetrators[27] and accessories.[28] According to ICC Trial Chamber I, Article 25(3) of the Statute reflects a hierarchical structure of modes of liability, with the notion of principal liability expressing 'the blameworthiness of those persons who are the most responsible for the most serious crimes of international concern',[29] and the ICC Appeals Chamber has approved of this view.[30] ICC Trial Chamber II, by contrast, has emphasized that the distinction between principals and accomplices, inherent in Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute, does not reflect a 'hierarchy of blameworthiness'; according to Trial Chamber II, sentencing of principals and accomplices depends on each individual's personal blameworthiness, not on his or her formal role.[31]

The concept of indirect perpetration has been included among the modes of perpetration in Article 25(3)(a) of the Statute. In the 1996 proposal submitted by the Preparatory Committee, indirect perpetration was still formulated in the traditional way of innocent agency:

> A person shall be deemed a principal where that person commits the crime through an innocent agent who is not aware of the criminal nature of the act committed, such as a minor, a person of defective mental capacity or a person acting under mistake of fact or otherwise acting without mens rea.[32]

[24] Stakić Appeal Judgment (n 13) para. 62.

[25] For an overview of ICTR case law with regard to 'committing' crimes through using an agent see van Sliedregt (n 19) 91–3.

[26] See Ambos (n 11) 146.

[27] Art 25(3)(a) ICC Statute.

[28] Art 25(b), (c), and (d) ICC Statute.

[29] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 ('Lubanga Trial Judgment') para. 999. But see Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford (n 17) paras 6–12; Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert (n 17) paras 22–30.

[30] ICC, Judgment on the Appeal of Thomas Lubanga Diylo against his conviction, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, AC, ICC, 1 Dec. 2014 ('Lubanga Appeals Judgment') para. 462: 'generally speaking and all other things being equal, a person who is found to commit a crime him- or herself bears more blameworthiness than a person who contributes to the crime of another person or persons'.

[31] Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Le Procureur c. Germain Katanga, ICC-01/04-01/07, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014 ('Katanga Trial Judgment') paras 1383–7.

[32] Materials can be found in C Bassiouni, The Legislative History of the International Criminal Court, vol. 2 (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2005) 200.

But a year later, the Preparatory Committee had changed the formulation to read almost exactly as the present Article 25(3)(a) reads:

> A person is criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime…if that person…(a) commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another, or through another person regardless of whether that person is criminally responsible.[33]

It is not known what brought about this change towards a more expansive concept of indirect perpetration, which differs from indirect perpetration as understood by many national jurisdictions which still limit indirect perpetration to the employment of innocent agents. The new formula obviously was not given much attention at the Rome conference but was adopted en bloc along with the other rules on the 'General Part'.[34] It is, in any event, beyond doubt that Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute recognizes indirect perpetration both by innocent and by culpable agents.[35]

22.4 Application of Article 25(3)(a) of the Statute by the ICC

The ICC, starting from its very first decisions on substantive issues, has consistently maintained that the hallmark of a principal perpetrator is his 'control' over the commission of the crime.[36] 'Control', according to the ICC, can be exerted not only by personally performing the actus reus of an offence, but also by 'masterminding' the commission of the crime from afar.[37] In its 2007 Decision on the confirmation of charges against Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Pre-Trial Chamber I declared that 'principals to a crime are not limited to those who physically carry out the objective elements of the offence but also include those who, in spite of being removed from the scene of the crime, control or mastermind its commission because they decide whether and how the offence will be committed'.[38] One group of such principals, according to the Pre-Trial Camber, are those who control the will of those who carry out the objective

[33] Ibid., 198.

[34] See Jeßberger and Geneuss (n 3) 857, note 19. The issue is not mentioned in the brief account of the main debates at the Rome conference by P Saland, 'International Criminal Law Principles' in R Lee (ed.), The ICC, The Making of the Rome Statute, Issues, Negotiations, Results (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 189 and 198.

[35] Van Sliedregt (n 19) 94–5; Werle (n 29) 178–9.

[36] Decision on the confirmation of charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007 ('Lubanga Confirmation Decision') paras 329–30; Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, para. 210. Both Trial Chambers I and II as well as the Appeals Chamber of the ICC have explicitly subscribed to this theory; see TC I, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 29) para. 1003; TC II, Katanga Trial Judgment (n 31) paras 1393–6; AC, Lubanga Appeals Judgment (n 30) paras 469 and 473. For a strong critique of 'control theory' see L Yanev and T Kooijmans, 'Divided Minds in the Lubanga Trial Judgment: A Case against the Joint control theory' (2013) 13 International Criminal Law Review 89. See further J Ohlin et al., 'Assessing the Control-Theory' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 725, 743–4. In support of control theory, see Ambos (n 11), 146–7; G Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law 2nd edn (The Hague: T M C Asser Press 2009) 169.

[37] Lubanga Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 465.

[38] Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 36) para. 330.

elements of the offence.[39] Pre-Trial Chamber I considers indirect perpetration to be 'the most typical manifestation of the concept of control over the crime',[40] which it regards as the hallmark of principal responsibility under the ICC Statute.

ICC Pre-Trial Chamber I made its most extensive statement on indirect perpetration in the 2008 Decision on the confirmation of charges against Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui.[41] Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui were leaders of military groups connected with different ethnic groups in the Eastern Congo region of Ituri. According to the prosecutor's charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui developed the common plan to 'wipe out' the village of Bogoro, and their respective troops carried out that plan in a joint action. In the course of this action, the troops killed many members of the civilian population of Bogoro and committed other atrocities amounting to war crimes. The prosecutor charged Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui as co-perpetrators pursuant to Article 25(3)(a) ICC Statute, based on the theory that they exercised 'joint control' over the crimes committed.[42] Since the defendants did not personally take part in the raid, their control over the acts committed by their soldiers could not be based on their presence at the place where the offences were committed; instead, Pre-Trial Chamber I declared that they jointly committed the war crimes 'through other persons' under their command, thus combining the modalities of co-perpetration and perpetration through another person.[43]

The application of the doctrine of indirect perpetration in Katanga and Ngudjolo involved two special features, which are perhaps typical of indirect perpetration in the context of international criminal law: (i) there was—allegedly[44]—not just one indirect perpetrator, but two of them working together, and (ii) their 'agents' were not individuals under their personal control but were troops whom they 'controlled' by means of a military organization. Both issues were squarely addressed by the Pre-Trial Chamber, and neither was regarded as precluding a finding of liability as indirect (co-)perpetrators.

22.4.1 Indirect co-perpetration

In dealing with the issue of joint indirect perpetration, the Pre-Trial Chamber I applied a combination of co-perpetration and indirect perpetration, two separate modes of responsibility under Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute.[45] The problem in attributing the crimes committed by the soldiers to Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui, respectively, consisted in the fact that each leader commanded troops from different ethnicities, who distrusted each other and would not take orders from a leader belonging to [39] Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 36) para. 332; see also Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan (n 36) para. 221.

[40] Ibid., para. 339.

[41] Decision on the confirmation of charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision').

[42] Ibid., para. 473. [43] Ibid., paras 491–4.

[44] The proceedings against Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui were subsequently separated, and Ngudjolo was eventually acquitted of all charges.

[45] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) paras 520–6, 546–9.

another ethnic group; hence Katanga would not have been able personally to 'control' the troops that were led by Ngudjolo Chui, and vice versa.[46] The Pre-Trial Chamber sought to solve this problem by explaining that co-perpetrators may jointly—i.e. based on a common plan—commit the criminal acts not physically but through other persons.[47] The activities of the co-perpetrators (for example, planning the attack and coordinating the activities of their troops) can be carried out long before the physical commission of the criminal acts by their subordinates.[48] The (indispensable) contribution of a co-perpetrator may then consist in nothing more than 'activating the mechanisms which lead to the automatic compliance with their orders and, thus, the commission of the crimes'.[49] The Pre-Trial Chamber thus returned to an analysis that the ICTY Trial Chamber had employed in Stakić.[50]

22.4.2 Perpetration through another person by means of an organization

Since the accused in Katanga and Ngudjolo were not alleged to have had immediate personal control over each soldier who committed the crimes in question, the main issue was how they 'controlled' the perpetration of the offences. The Pre-Trial Chamber found that the necessary 'control over the will of those who carry out the objective elements of the offence'[51] can also be exerted by means of an organization: '[t]he cases most relevant to international criminal law are those in which the perpetrator behind the perpetrator commits the crime through another by means of "control over an organization" (Organisationsherrschaft)'.[52]

Since the crimes covered by the ICC Statute 'will almost inevitably concern collective or mass criminality', the Statute must be understood to encompass organizational control as a form of perpetratorship: '[b]y specifically regulating the commission of a crime through another responsible person, the Statute targets the category of cases which involves a perpetrator's control over the organization'.[53]

The Pre-Trial Chamber then defined the necessary elements of an 'organization' by which the perpetrator can control the will of his subordinates:

> The Chamber finds that the organization must be based on hierarchical relations between superiors and subordinates. The organization must also be composed of sufficient subordinates to guarantee that superiors' orders will be carried out, if not by one [46] Ibid., para. 519. [47] Ibid., para. 521. [48] Ibid., para. 526. [49] Ibid., para. 525.

[50] Stakić Trial Judgment (n 12) paras 439 and 741. Whereas the ICTY Appeals Chamber had rejected the Trial Chamber's approach in favour of JCE (n 24, para. 62), the Pre-Trial Chamber of the ICC declared that 'this is a good example of the need not to transfer the ad hoc tribunals' case law mechanically to the system of the Court' (Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) para. 508).

[51] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) para. 488. [52] Ibid., para. 498.

[53] Ibid., para. 501. The Pre-Trial Chamber cites as authorities, among others, German authors K Ambos, 'Article 25 Marginal Note 10' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008), and C Kreß, 'Claus Roxins Lehre von der Organisationsherrschaft und das Völkerstrafrecht' (2006) 153 Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrecht 304, 307–8.

> subordinate, then by another. These criteria ensure that orders given by the recognised leadership will generally be complied with by their subordinates.[54]

In such an organization, the Chamber claimed, the orders of the leader will be carried out 'automatically'; if one member should refuse to obey, another member will take over.[55]

In a 2012 Decision, Pre-Trial Chamber II applied a similar standard, requiring for indirect perpetration, inter alia, that the offender must have control over an organization which 'must consist of an organized and hierarchal apparatus of power' and that 'the execution of the crimes must be secured by almost automatic compliance with the orders issued by the suspect'.[56]

The Pre-Trial Chambers were in agreement that perpetration by means of an organization can also be committed jointly by several leaders acting in concert, provided that each leader supplies a contribution necessary for the fruition of the common plan.[57] Applying these standards to the case before it, Pre-Trial Chamber I in Katanga and Ngudjolo concluded that there was sufficient evidence to show that defendants Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui in fact co-perpetrated the crimes in question through their respective troops, because compliance with their orders was 'ensured' and both leaders were aware of the crimes to be committed in the course of 'wiping out' the village of Bogoro.[58]

After the cases of Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui had been separated and the latter had been acquitted, Trial Chamber II was again faced with the question as to whether Mr Katanga had 'controlled' the commission of crimes against humanity by soldiers in troops under his command. A majority of Trial Chamber II relied on the concept of 'control over an organization' as developed by Pre-Trial Chamber I and defined as the key element of such an organization its 'automatisme fonctionnel', which makes sure that the commander's orders are carried out even if there is no personal link between the commander and the individual members of the group:[59]

> Le supérieur n'a pas besoin de contrôler la volonté de chacun des exécutants en recourant, par exemple, à la coercition ou à un subterfuge puisqu'il sait que, si un membre de l'organisation refuse d'obtempérer, un autre membre sera normalement disponible pour le remplacer et assurer, d'une manière ou d'une autre, l'exécution des ordres émis.[60]

The exchangeability of each individual member of the organization is necessary, in the view of Trial Chamber II, to ensure the commander's absolute control, and thereby to limit liability as a principal to those 'qui contrôlent, effectivement et sans interférence possible, une partie au moins d'un appareil de pouvoir'.[61]

[54] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) para. 512. [55] Ibid., paras 515–17.

[56] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey, and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012 ('Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision') para. 292.

[57] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) paras 524–6; Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 56) para. 291.

[58] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) paras 540–72.

[59] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 31) paras 1408–9. [60] Ibid., para. 1408.

[61] Ibid., para. 1412. Based on this high standard, Trial Chamber II regarded Germain Katanga not as a principal of the crimes charged, but found him guilty only under Art 25 (3)(d) ICC Statute; ibid., paras 1420–1.

When Pre-Trial Chamber I developed its concept of 'perpetration through an organization', it relied on legal writings and court opinions from various legal systems.[62] But its approach has been most heavily influenced by German legal theory. The Chamber's 'crown witness' was the influential German criminal law scholar Claus Roxin, who first published a theory of perpetration by means of an organization in 1963.[63] According to Roxin's theory, the hallmark of indirect perpetration (mittelbare Täterschaft) is the perpetrator's domination (Beherrschung) of the human agent who physically carries out the criminal act. Domination can take various forms. The indirect perpetrator can, for example, create a misconception about relevant facts, he can exert strong psychological pressure upon the actor, or he can employ a person who because of mental illness or immaturity is unable to realize what he is doing. Up to that point, Roxin followed the traditional German doctrine according to which indirect perpetration required an 'innocent agent'. But when Roxin considered the case of Adolf Eichmann, who at the time when Roxin wrote his seminal article had just been tried and convicted of genocide in Jerusalem, he came to the conclusion that there must exist a further category of domination, one that does not rely on the immediate actor's lack of criminal responsibility. He suggested that a person who is in charge of a hierarchically structured criminal organization can be said to 'dominate' the criminal acts committed by his subordinates where these subordinates unquestioningly carry out any orders given to them; this holds true, according to Roxin, even though the subordinates are themselves responsible perpetrators of the crimes they commit.[64] Roxin maintained that 'domination' of the commission of a crime is as absolute when the perpetrator works through an organization as when he uses an irresponsible human agent. In order to limit his concept to situations where the indirect perpetrator is capable of imposing his will on his subordinates, Roxin posited three additional conditions: the organization must have a tight hierarchical structure, members of the organization must be easily replaceable,[65] and the organization must (at least partially) operate outside the legal order.

After Roxin's theory had lain dormant for 30 years, the German Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof, BGH) brought it to life in the 1990s when it adjudicated crimes committed in the context of the strict border regime installed by the leadership of the German Democratic Republic (GDR).[66] After the end of the GDR, German courts were faced with determining criminal responsibility for the death

[62] Ibid., 485 note 647 (citing a large number of German and Spanish authors).

[63] C Roxin, 'Straftaten im Rahmen organisatorischer Machtsapparate', Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrecht (GA) (1963) 193. A similar concept was proposed almost contemporaneously by F-C Schroeder, Der Täter hinter dem Täter (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot 1965).

[64] Claus Roxin's 1963 article has been translated into English: C Roxin, 'Crimes as Part of Organized Power Structures' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 193. For a more recent statement of his views, see C Roxin, 'Organisationsherrschaft und Tatentschlossenheit' (2006) Zeitschrift für internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik 293 (an online law journal, accessible at <http://www.zis-online.com>).

[65] Ibid., 297. Roxin emphasizes that members of the organization must be 'fungible', that is, any member unwilling or unable to carry out the leader's orders must be replaceable by another subordinate. If the crime requires a specialist who is difficult to replace, the head of the organization can consequently not be responsible as a principal but only as an instigator.

[66] 40 Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen 218, 236 (1994).

of hundreds of GDR citizens who were killed when they attempted to cross the border to the West. Some of the border guards who had fired deadly shots were convicted of intentional homicide, and their claims of duress and mistake of law were rejected.[67] Subsequently, some of the highest political and military leaders of the GDR were accused of murder for instituting and maintaining the border regime, which included strict orders to border guards to prevent, by all means, any illegal defection from the GDR. These cases confronted the BGH with the question as to whether the leaders of the relevant GDR institutions could be punished as principal perpetrators even though the border guards had themselves been convicted as direct perpetrators of the border killings. Relying on Roxin's theory of 'perpetration through an organization', the BGH in 1994 held that the leaders of the GDR regime were not mere instigators but indirect perpetrators of homicide.[68] The Court conceded that normally a responsible actor who fires the fatal shot 'dominates' the unlawful killing, which would preclude any domination by other persons. But the Court recognized an exception for situations where the activity of a person in the background 'almost automatically' brings about the desired result, because that person makes use of certain organizational structures and rules and thus sets into motion 'rule-determined processes' (regelhafte Abläufe).[69]

22.5 Criticism of the Pre-Trial Chamber's Approach

At the basis of the Pre-Trial Chambers' approach to principal and accessorial liability under Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute lies the so-called control theory. Under that theory, a perpetrator is a person who 'controls' (that is, determines) whether the acts constituting an offence are carried out.[70] This concept has both a restrictive and an expansive effect:[71] it excludes from the scope of perpetration under Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute anyone whose contribution is not a necessary condition for the commission of the offence; but this concept also turns into perpetrators those whose (necessary) contributions have been made at a time and place far removed from the physical perpetration of the crime.[72] The concept of indirect perpetration is closely linked to the expansive branch of control theory: 'control' can be said to extend to anyone whose interaction with another person is necessary for making that other

[67] 39 Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen 1 (1992); 39 Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen 168 (1993).

[68] 40 Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen 218 (1994).

[69] Ibid., 236. In a seemingly irrelevant but intentionally placed dictum, the Court indicated that 'the problem of responsibility for leading business enterprises could also be solved that way'; ibid., 237. In a series of later decisions, it became apparent that the BGH had inconspicuously but intentionally laid the groundwork for a broad extension of Roxin's original doctrine to business enterprises; see e.g. 40 Entscheidungen des Bundesgerichtshofes in Strafsachen 257, 268 (1995); [2008] Neue Zeitschrift für Strafrecht 89. For a more detailed analysis of German case law see T Weigend, 'Perpetration through an Organization. The Unexpected Career of a German Legal Concept' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 91.

[70] The primary statement of this theory can be found in Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 36) paras 330, 338–42.

[71] For a more detailed analysis of 'control theory' see Ohlin et al. (n 29) 730–4.

[72] See Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 29) paras 1003–4.

person commit the crime. There are no theoretical limits as to how the indirect perpetrator exerts his influence, whether by personal persuasion or by other means.

Although the ICC Pre-Trial Chambers have consistently applied this concept of perpetratorship, it has not unanimously been accepted in the Court. In separate opinions, Judges Fulford and Van den Wyngaert—both members of ICC Trial Chambers—raised a number of objections to the Pre-Trial Chambers' approach.[73] Their criticism concerns primarily the requirements for co-perpetration, but it also applies to the issue of indirect perpetration.

The judges' first objection concerns methodology: neither the text of the ICC Statute nor customary international law, they assert, indicates that the concepts of 'domination of another' or 'control by means of an organization' should be used to interpret the words of Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute. As Judge Van den Wyngaert eloquently put it:

> I believe that it is not appropriate to draw upon subsidiary sources of law, as defined in Articles 21(1)(b) and (c) of the Statute, to justify incorporating forms of criminal responsibility that go beyond the text of the Statute. Reliance on the control over the crime theory, whatever its merits are in Germany and other legal systems that have followed the German model, would only be possible to the extent that it qualifies as a general principle of criminal law in the sense of Article 21(1)(c). However, in view of the radical fragmentation of national legal systems when it comes to defining modes of liability, it is almost impossible to identify general principles in this regard. It is therefore very unlikely that the control theory could aspire to such a status. Moreover, even if general principles could be identified, reliance on such principles, even under the guise of treaty interpretation, in order to broaden the scope of certain forms of criminal responsibility would amount to an inappropriate expansion of the Court's jurisdiction.[74]

Judge Van den Wyngaert further notes that the Court, under Article 22(2) of the ICC Statute, is obliged to interpret the provisions of the Statute strictly and is prohibited from expanding their plain meaning by analogy. Reading new modes of perpetratorship into the words of Article 25(3)(a) of the Statute, she claims, might violate the principles of strict construction and in dubio pro reo.[75]

The second, substantive argument concerns two special forms of indirect perpetration adopted by the Pre-Trial Chambers, namely perpetration through an organization and indirect joint perpetration. Judge Van den Wyngaert thinks that neither of these modes has a basis in the text of Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute or in customary international law.[76] She therefore deems the relevant case law of the ICC Pre-Trial Chambers to be an unwarranted expansion of the concept of indirect perpetration. With regard to exerting control over an agent through an organization, Judge Van den Wyngaert criticizes the Pre-Trial Chambers for 'dehumanising the relationship

[73] See (n 17).
[74] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert (n 17) para. 17. See also Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford (n 17) para. 10.
[75] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert (n 17) paras 18–20.
[76] Ibid., paras 52, 60–4.

between the indirect perpetrator and the physical perpetrator' and for thereby diluting the level of personal influence that the indirect perpetrator must exercise over the physical perpetrator.[77] In Judge Van den Wyngaert's view, joint indirect perpetration as accepted by the Pre-Trial Chambers likewise goes beyond the Statute, because under that doctrine a person can be held 'responsible for the conduct of the physical perpetrator of a crime, even though he/she neither exercised any direct influence or authority over this person, nor shared any intent with him or her'.[78]

In what follows, I will briefly address the validity of the criticism voiced by Judge Van den Wyngaert and then speculate about the possible direction the Court might take in the future.

22.6 A Narrow Version of Indirect Perpetration?

22.6.1 Indirect perpetration and the principle of legality

The authors of Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute have left no doubt that 'commission' of a crime through another person is possible 'regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible', and they have clearly separated this mode of criminal liability from ordering, soliciting, or inducing a crime as listed in Article 25(3)(b) of the Statute. The Statute thus neither ties liability for perpetration to the physical carrying out of the criminal act[79] nor negates indirect perpetration when the 'front man' is fully responsible for his act. In that regard, the expansive version of indirect perpetration adopted by the Pre-Trial Chambers cannot be faulted with going beyond the words of the Statute.

But that statement does not dispose of the question whether control through an organization is covered by the wording of Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute.[80] In its decision in Katanga and Ngudjolo, Pre-Trial Chamber I claims that this particular mode of exerting control over another person 'has been incorporated into the framework of the Statute; . . . has been increasingly used in national jurisdictions; and . . . has been addressed in the jurisprudence of the international tribunals'.[81] The evidence that the Chamber presents for this proposition, however, is not overly strong. The list of 'numerous' national jurisdictions claimed to be in favour of the concept of perpetration through an organization is limited to five (Argentina, Chile, Germany, Peru, and Spain), in one of which (Argentina) the Supreme Court had overturned a lower court judgment proposing this theory.[82] International tribunals have indeed 'addressed' the issue, but so far have preferred to employ the JCE doctrine to convict organizers and other figures further removed from the scene of the crime.[83] The Pre-Trial Chamber's [77] Ibid., para. 53. [78] Ibid., para. 61. For similar criticism see van Sliedregt (n 19) 168–9.

[79] See Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 34) paras 332–3, 339.

[80] There is nothing to suggest that customary international law recognizes the concept of 'perpetration through an organization' as a mode of criminal liability; cf. G Werle and B Burghardt, 'Die mittelbare Täterschaft—Fortentwicklung deutscher Strafrechtsdogmatik im Völkerstrafrecht?' in R Bloy et al. (eds), Gerechte Strafe und legitimes Strafrecht (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot 2010) 849, 854–5.

[81] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) para. 500. [82] Ibid., paras 502 and 504.

[83] See e.g. Stakić Appeal Judgment (n 13) para. 62 (discussing status of indirect perpetration in international criminal law and rejecting a combination of indirect perpetration and co-perpetration as suggested by the Trial Chamber in the same case). JCE has also been accepted by most 'hybrid' criminal tribunals; see Ambos (n 11) 136 et seq.

single substantive argument in favour of including control through an organization is that the ICC Statute 'will almost inevitably concern collective or mass criminality', and that it must therefore be understood to 'target the category of cases which involves a perpetrator's control over the organization'.[84] But this policy argument is hardly sufficient to address Judge Van den Wyngaert's concern based on the legality principle. The best one can say in defence of the Pre-Trial Chambers' opinion is that Article 25(3)(a) of the Statute makes no definitive statement either way. The Statute only speaks of committing a crime 'through another person' and says nothing about how the indirect perpetrator makes that other person do what he wants him to do. The word 'through' does not necessarily imply that a direct interaction between the indirect perpetrator and the 'front man' is a necessary element of indirect perpetration. The Pre-Trial Chambers' interpretation thus cannot be said to violate the legality principle.

22.6.2 Substantive arguments

22.6.2.1 Perpetration through an organization

If the wording of the ICC Statute permits treating the use of an organization as indirect perpetration, that does not necessarily mean that it is good policy to recognize this particular mode of perpetration. Perpetration by means of an organization may well be too far removed from the prototype of indirect perpetration, where the perpetrator uses an individual 'innocent agent' to bring about the commission of the crime.

Historically, the introduction of 'control through an organization' into German legal doctrine can best be understood as a reaction to the phenomenon of 'systemic' crime, which defies the categories of traditional criminal law doctrine.[85] Events such as mass atrocities in the Second World War or the planned large-scale pollution of the environment by business enterprises may make it necessary to devise new modes of criminal responsibility, and the notion of indirect perpetration by using an organization is a response to that need. But the questions remain whether this special variant is indeed necessary for filling a gap and whether it can be defined with a precision sufficient for basing criminal punishment on it.

At the outset, it is useful to remember that leaders who order their subordinates to commit crimes will not escape punishment. Their conduct can easily be brought under the labels of instigation or ordering, and even in the absence of proof that orders were given, the concept of superior responsibility will permit the imposition of criminal punishment on leaders who condone criminal conduct. In many legal systems, these modes of responsibility are regarded as 'accessorial', which means that a person can be punished as an instigator only if the person instigated has at least attempted to commit an offence. But sentences for instigation or ordering can be as severe as those for perpetrators. According to Articles 77 and 78 of the ICC Statute, the Court can impose any sentence up to lifelong imprisonment, taking into account the gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the convicted person, and there is no distinction made among the various forms of responsibility listed in Article 25(3) of the Statute. There is thus no practical need for devising an additional mode of perpetration for leaders of organizations in international law.[86]

[84] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) para. 501.

[85] For a useful analysis, see G Heine, 'Täterschaft und Teilnahme in staatlichen Machtapparaten' (2000) 55 Juristenzeitung 920.

It has been argued, on the other hand, that the inherently collective nature of international crime makes it particularly important that the verdict and sentence reflect precisely the specific role of each participant in the collective enterprise.[87] According to the case law of the ICTY, the 'form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime' is a determinant factor of the gravity of the crime and hence of the sentence;[88] and Rule 145(1)(c) of the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence mirrors that view by listing the 'degree of participation of the convicted person' among several factors to be taken into account in sentencing. There may thus be more than an intuitive appeal to the idea that the individuals at the very top of a criminal system or state should not be labelled 'mere' instigators but should be named as who they are: those chiefly responsible for the atrocities committed in their name. 'Perpetration through an organization' may thus be a useful tool for achieving the largely symbolic but important goal of fair labelling.

But the usefulness of this tool depends on whether it is (i) theoretically consistent and (ii) generally applicable, and can (iii) be defined with sufficient precision.

i. With regard to the first issue, some authors have spotted a self-contradiction in the concept of indirect perpetration through a culpable agent: how can the 'front man' who physically commits the criminal act be criminally responsible as a perpetrator and at the same time be a mere instrument in the hands of the leader of the organization?[89] One answer to this objection may be that the attribution of criminal responsibility is not a yes/no question of logic but a normative issue.[90] Under normative aspects, it is possible to hold the person in the background as well as the person at the front criminally responsible as perpetrators because they both—and independently of each other—possess sufficient autonomous dominance over the criminal act.

ii. General applicability of the concept is another troublesome issue. Claus Roxin's original version of this concept was devised ad hoc under the impression of large-scale state-organized atrocities and therefore contains elements that seem [86] See Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford (n 17) paras 9–11.

[87] See F Giustiniani, 'The Responsibility of Accomplices in the Case-Law of the Ad Hoc Tribunals' (2009) 20 Criminal Law Forum 417, 419; Kreß (n 53) 308; Werle and Burghardt (n 80) 852.

[88] See e.g. Judgment, Kupreškić et al., IT 95-16-T, TC, ICTY, 14 January 2000, para. 852.

[89] The Pre-Trial Chamber in Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) para. 499 note 660 put the problem as such: 'Essentially, the possibility that a person may so control the will of another that he can be said to perpetrate a crime through that other, seems incompatible with a meaningful notion of that other as a fully responsible actor.' See further L Kutzner, Die Rechtsfigur des Täters hinter dem Täter und der Typus der mittelbaren Täterschaft (Peter Lang 2004) 250; H Olásolo, The Criminal Responsibility of Senior Political and Military Leaders as Principals to International Crimes (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2009) 119–22.

[90] Cf. J Vogel, 'Individuelle Verantwortlichkeit im Völkerstrafrecht' (2002) 114 Zeitschrift für die gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft 403, 405–9.

accidental rather than essential. Even if applicability of the concept were reduced to inherently violent organizations,[91] it lacks both an empirical and a theoretical basis other than the fact that the leaders of some organizations can, under certain conditions, be fairly certain that their orders will be carried out even if these orders involve the commission of a criminal offence. Moreover, Roxin's concept may fit 'orderly', bureaucratic dictatorships such as that of the National-Socialists in Germany or the Socialist Unity Party in the GDR; it hardly lends itself to being applied to largely disorganized militias or rebel armies, where the authority of a leader may be accepted only as long as he is successful in providing material goods and military success.[92]

iii. This leads to the issue of the concept's vagueness. There may exist an ideal type of an oppressive, authoritarian organization exerting irresistible pressure on its members to conform, but it is difficult, even within a single legal culture, to achieve agreement on the necessary components of such an organization.[93] Nor is there agreement on what position within the organization a person must have in order to qualify as an indirect perpetrator.[94] Moreover, even within a highly repressive organization not every aspect of a group member's activity is under full control; it is therefore necessary to decide, in each particular instance, whether a particular act was controlled by the organization to such an extent that principal responsibility can be allocated to the leaders of the organization.

Given these difficulties, recognizing a general concept of indirect perpetration by use of an organization may raise more problems than it solves.

22.6.2.2 Indirect co-perpetration

In her critical assessment of the Pre-Trial Chambers' approach to indirect perpetration, Judge Van den Wyngaert finds particularly objectionable the imposition of liability for indirect perpetration on leaders of two separate groups who have joined these [91] As suggested by B Schünemann, 'Die Rechtsfigur des "Täters hinter dem Täter" und das Prinzip der Tatherrschaftsstufen' in A Hoyer et al. (eds), Festschrift für Friedrich-Christian Schroeder zum 70. Geburtstag (Heidelberg: C F Müller 2006) 401 and 412.

[92] It may be a sign of this weakness that the Pre-Trial Chamber in Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) para. 518, felt compelled to define 'rigorous training methods' as a tool of controlling organization members. The Chamber may have sensed that Roxin's original model was not conceived for an African environment and attempted to make up for the lack of a tight institutional organization of the militia by adding ad hoc new elements that it found to be present. Trial Chamber II, on the other hand, insisted on a 'strict control' model of an organization where leaders can be certain that their orders will be carried out 'automatically' (Katanga Trial Judgment [n 31], para. 1408). It is no surprise that the Trial Chamber found this feature absent in a relatively disorganized military group participating in ethnic conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (ibid., para. 1420).

[93] Even in Germany, there has been great disagreement as to whether the 'lawlessness' of the organization and the 'fungibility' of its members are necessary components of an organization that can transmit control of its leaders to its subordinate members; see the overview by B Schünemann, '§ 25 marginal notes 122–127' in H Laufhütte et al. (eds), Strafgesetzbuch Leipziger Kommentar vol. I, 12th edn (Berlin: De Gruyter 2007).

[94] On the question whether 'control' of an organization can be attributed only to its supreme leaders or to intermediate leaders as well, see Ambos (n 11) 115–16, 160 (citing cases from Latin America with differing results).

groups together for a criminal action. This, Judge Van den Wyngaert thinks, 'leads to a radical expansion of Article 25(3)(a) of the Statute, and indeed is a totally new mode of liability'.[95] Judge Van den Wyngaert would accept the 'junta' scenario, where one single group of subordinates is subject to control by a group of leaders working together.[96] But in the (hypothetical) scenario presented by the Katanga and Ngudjolo case, there are two separate (feuding) groups cooperating in just one single (criminal) operation based on an agreement between their respective leaders. In this situation, two recognized forms of perpetration (co-perpetration and indirect perpetration) factually coincide. Leaving immaterial linguistic issues[97] aside, it is not necessary to invent a 'fourth alternative'[98] in order to establish the responsibility of both leaders for the crimes committed by members of both groups. The leaders' common plan is the key to their co-liability.[99] Co-perpetrators linked by a common plan can contribute in various ways to the commission of the crime, and one contribution can be to provide a human agent under the control of the co-perpetrator. If, for example, A and B carry out their common design to commit arson in the house of V by taking their young children (A's son X and B's daughter Y) together to V's house, giving them matches, and instructing them to make a 'nice fire', A and B clearly are co-perpetrators of arson: they jointly use X and Y as their human agents to commit the offence. The situation in Katanga and Ngudjolo is structurally similar, if one assumes that Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui exerted control over their respective troops and intended them to commit the crimes they actually perpetrated.[100] There exists no doctrinal obstacle to applying Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute to this situation. The critical issue lies not in joining human agents but in what it means to 'control' their operation.

22.7 Outlook

Given the vocal dissent of two ICC judges from the concepts developed by the Pre-Trial Chambers, it is difficult to predict the eventual fate of the broad 'Germanized' interpretation of indirect perpetration which has dominated ICC case law in the past few years. But which direction should the judges of the ICC take with respect to indirect perpetration?

The Statute of the ICC rules out a return to the traditional concept of commission through an innocent agent, because its Article 25(3)(a) expressly mentions non-innocent agents as a possible 'means' of indirect perpetration. Beyond this general guideline, we have seen that there are two basic approaches, one 'literal' and narrow, the [95] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert (n 17) para. 61.

[96] Ibid., para. 62.

[97] There has been a controversy between Pre-Trial Chamber I and Judge Van den Wyngaert as to whether 'or' in Art 25(3)(a) of the Statute is an 'inclusive' or an 'exclusive' conjunction; ibid., para. 60.

[98] Ibid., para. 59.

[99] Cf. J Ohlin, 'Joint Intentions to Commit International Crimes' (2011) 11 Chicago Journal of International Law 693; Ohlin et al. (n 29) 732–3.

[100] Similar analysis in Ambos (n 11) 157–8; Olásolo (n 89) 269; H van der Wilt, 'The Continuous Quest for Proper Modes of Criminal Responsibility' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 307, 314.

other 'dogmatic' (with a German accent) and relatively broad. Since there is not much by way of customary international law on the subject, and since the Statute merely mentions indirect perpetration without defining it, the legality principle does not prescribe either of the two solutions, and the judges are relatively free to decide which course they wish to take. Their decision in that regard does not depend on the issue as to whether there exists a 'hierarchy' among the modes of perpetration and participation in Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute. Even if that proposition were true, it would not give more than a small indication of a broader concept of indirect perpetration (because in a hierarchical system the competing modes of ordering and instigation would have a subsidiary function).

Since the judges need not choose among several 'models' of indirect perpetration, they can address and resolve the various substantive questions one by one. As regards the issue of joint indirect perpetration, the arguments that Judge Van den Wyngaert has raised against recognizing this mode of perpetration have not proved convincing. Co-perpetration based on a common plan can take many forms, and one of them is bringing together the human agents each co-perpetrator has under his control. There is hence no good reason for abandoning the course that the Pre-Trial Chambers have taken on this issue.

Indirect perpetration by means of an organization is a more difficult issue. We have seen[101] that this concept has serious weaknesses and that it especially lacks precision. It may therefore be preferable to fall back on a broader, open-ended definition of 'commission through another person'. Pre-Trial Chamber I in Katanga and Ngudjolo defined a principal as one who 'has control over the will of those who carry out the objective elements of the offence'.[102] The wisest course may be to leave that definition as it is. There exist are various ways of controlling another person's will, such as exercising strong physical or psychological pressure, or creating a misconception concerning the relevant facts. The existence of an oppressive organization in which the actor is a subordinate member may, in a given case, likewise be instrumental in bringing strong pressure to bear on the subordinate's will; but the fact that the defendant is the leader of an organization cannot by itself be conclusive evidence of his having control over the will of all members of the organization.[103]

What amount of control is necessary to make a top member of an organization (or any other person) an indirect perpetrator is a normative question. There is no better general criterion for answering this question than the 'control over the will' test. Courts should be able to apply this test to the facts of each particular case; their determination should not be tied to legally binding sub-rules, for example, about the necessary qualities of an organization which would then automatically turn the leaders of this organization into perpetrators of whatever crimes other group members commit. Under the approach suggested here, it is not sufficient for the prosecution to merely establish the existence of an organization (with whatever qualities), but they need to prove, on the particular facts of the case, that the defendant actually 'controlled the will' of the physical perpetrator.

[101] See section 22.6.2.1. [102] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 41) para. 488.

[103] A similar solution has been suggested by Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert in her Concurring Opinion (n 17) paras 55–6; see also van Sliedregt (n 19) 169.

It is not clear whether all judges of the ICC are ready to abandon their infatuation with the concept of 'domination by organization'. But they might make life easier for themselves if they did, and they might be able to concentrate on the key requirement of indirect perpetration: control over another person.

23

Forms of Accessorial Liability under Article 25(3)(b) and (c)

Héctor Olásolo and Enrique Carnero Rojo

23.1 Introduction

The ICC understands the modes of liability listed in Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute pursuant to the theory of 'control over the crime'.[1] According to this theory, as one moves down through the different sub-paragraphs in Article 25(3), the level of control over the crime decreases. As a result, principal liability is provided for in paragraph (a) (direct perpetration, indirect perpetration, co-perpetration with joint control, and indirect co-perpetration), whereas paragraphs (b) to (d) provide for accessorial liability (ordering, instigation, planning, aiding and abetting, and assisting groups of persons acting with a common purpose). In other words, Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute assigns principal liability to persons perpetrating a crime, whereas Article

* Law Degree, University of Salamanca; LLM in Law, Columbia University; PhD in Law, University of Salamanca. Professor Olásolo holds the Chair in International Law at the University of El Rosario (Colombia), and is chairman of the Ibero-American Institute of The Hague for Peace, Human Rights and International Justice ('IIH') and director of the Anuario Iberoamericano de Derecho Internacional Penal (Ibero-American Yearbook of International Criminal Law). Professor Olásolo previously held the Chair in International Criminal Law at the University of Utrecht (2010–12), and served as Legal Officer in Chambers of the ICC (2004–9) and the OTP of the ICTY (2002–4). He was Legal Adviser to the Spanish Delegation to the Preparatory Commission for the ICC (1999–2002).

 Law Degree, University of Deusto; LLM in Public International Law, Leiden University; PhD candidate in International Criminal Law, University of Utrecht. Mr Carnero Rojo is Legal Officer at the Office of Public Counsel for Victims of the ICC. He previously served as Associate Legal Adviser at the OTP of the ICC (2004–9) and completed an internship at the Appeals Section of the OTP of the ICTY (2003). The views expressed herein are those of the authors in their personal capacity and do not necessarily represent those of the ICC, the ICTY, the United Nations, or the Spanish Government.

[1] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, para. 338 ('Lubanga Confirmation Decision'); Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision') paras 484–6; Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009 ('Al Bashir arrest warrant decision') para. 210; Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 348; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, PTC I, ICC, 8 February 2010, para. 152; Corrigendum of the 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-121-Corr-Red, PTC I, ICC, 7 March 2011, para. 126; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Summons to Appear for William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey, and Joshua Arap Sang, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1, PTC II, ICC, 8 March 2011, para. 39; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for

25(3)(b)–(d) ascribes accessorial liability to those participating in the commission of a crime by third persons.[2]

Accessories to crimes perpetrated by third persons can promote the commission of the crimes with their orders, inducement, or plans, as envisaged in Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute. Accessories can also facilitate the commission of crimes by third persons by their contribution or assistance thereto as provided for in Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute. The present chapter analyses how these forms of accessorial liability operate.[3]

Elements of the modes of liability envisaged in paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 25(3) were proposed but eventually not included in the Elements of Crimes adopted in 2002 by the Preparatory Commission for the ICC.[4] Consequently, the Court itself must refine these forms of liability through its case law.

Summonses to Appear for Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta, and Mohammed Husse in Ali, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-1, PTC II, ICC, 8 March 2011, para. 35; Decision on the 'Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Article 58 as to Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi, Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi, and Abdullah Al-Senussi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-1, PTC I, ICC, 27 June 2011, para. 68; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011, para. 279; Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 ('Lubanga Trial Judgment') paras 994, 998–9; Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014 ('Katanga Trial Judgment') paras 1382, 1393–4; Public redacted version of 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Article 58 for a Warrant of Arrest against Laurent Koudou Gbagbo', L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-9-Red, PTC III, ICC, 30 November 2011, para. 74; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Art 58 for a Warrant of Arrest against Charles Blé Goudé, Blé Goudé, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-02/11-3, PTC III, ICC, 6 January 2012, para. 27; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012 ('Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision') para. 291; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, para. 296; Public redacted version of 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Art 58 for a Warrant of Arrest against Simone Gbagbo', S Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/12-2-Red, PTC III, ICC, 2 March 2012, para. 27; Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 1) paras 6–12; Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-4, TC II, ICC, 19 December 2012, paras 22–4, 28–30, 67; Dissenting Opinion of Judge Cuno Tarfusser, Judgment on the appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the decision of Trial Chamber II of 21 November 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3363, AC, ICC, 27 March 2013, paras 15–18.

[2] Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 320–1; Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 471 and 517; Al Bashir arrest warrant decision (n 1) para. 27; Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 354; Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 1) paras 998–9; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58, Mudacumura, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, PTC II, ICC, 13 July 2012 ('Mudacumura arrest warrant decision') para. 63; Katanga Trial Judgment (n 1) paras 1383 and 1387. See also F Diarra and P D'Huart, 'Art 25: Responsabilité Pénale Individuelle' in J Fernandez and X Pacreau (eds), Statut de Rome de la Cour Pénale Internationale: Commentaire Article par Article vol I (Paris: Pedone 2012) 810–11, 825, 827–8. See also E van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 79, 83–8; J Ohlin et al., 'Assessing the Control-Theory' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 725, 742–5.

[3] For an analysis of the participation in a crime under Art 25(3)(d) of the ICC Statute, see Ambos, Chapter 24, this volume.

[4] Preparatory Commission for the ICC, 'Proposal Submitted by the United States of America: Draft Elements of Crimes. Addendum', PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.3, 4 February 1999.

During its first decade of activities, the Court has charged individuals with alleged responsibility for ordering, soliciting, or inducing the commission of crimes under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute in seven cases.[5] Furthermore, in two cases the Court has dealt with the alleged responsibility of individuals for aiding and abetting or otherwise assisting in the commission of a crime under Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute.[6] Nevertheless, since judgments have not been rendered in any of these cases yet, the case law of the Court on these forms of liability is rather limited.[7] Indeed, the first judgments of the Court only clarified that paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 25(3) provide for 'secondary' or 'accessory' liability,[8] and that such liability depends on the existence of a 'principal' to the crime under Article 25(3)(a).[9]

Against this background and in conformity with Article 31(1) of the VCLT,[10] the interpretative analysis of paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 25 of the ICC Statute provided in this chapter benefits from relevant jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals applicable pursuant to Article 21(1)(b) of the ICC Statute,[11] and from other pertinent sources on a case-by-case basis.[12]

[5] Kony et al. (ICC-02/04-01/05); Ntaganda (ICC-01/04-02/06); Harun and Kushayb (ICC-02/05-01/07); Ruto and Sang (ICC-01/09-01/11); L Gbagbo (ICC-02/11-01/11); Mudacumura (ICC-01/04-01/12); Bemba et al. (ICC-01/05-01/13).

[6] Ruto and Sang (ICC-01/09-01/11); Bemba et al. (ICC-01/05-01/13).

[7] In none of these seven cases has a decision on the confirmation of charges been issued, except for the case against Ruto and Sang, where judicial notice of a possible change in the legal characterization of the facts under Art 25(3)(b) and (c) was issued after the charges had been confirmed.

[8] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 1) paras 997–8. See also Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 320.

[9] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 1) paras 1384–5.

[10] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-168, AC, ICC, 13 July 2006, para. 33; Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Defence Request Concerning Languages', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-522, AC, ICC, 27 May 2008, paras 38–9; Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Art 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, Together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1486, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008, para. 40; Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 28 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Review of the Detention of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Pursuant to Rule 118(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1019, AC, ICC, 19 November 2010, note 74.

[11] Mudacumura arrest warrant decision (n 2) para. 63. See Katanga Trial Judgment (n 1) paras 40, 57, and 1395. See also V Nerlich, 'The Status of ICTY and ICTR Precedent in Proceedings before the ICC' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 317–20; B Goy, 'Individual Criminal Responsibility before the International Criminal Court: A Comparison with the Ad Hoc Tribunals' (2012) 12 International Criminal Law Review 1, 3–6.

[12] S Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability: Article 25(3)(b) and (c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2012) 33–6, and 179–80. The practice of the Special Panels for Serious Crimes in East Timor is not considered in this chapter because their judgments predominantly involve low-level perpetrators and it is often difficult to discern therein the elements of the form(s) of liability applied in the cases. See G Boas et al., International Criminal Law Practitioner Library: Forms of Responsibility in International Criminal Law vol. I (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007) 377.

23.2 Ordering, Instigating, and Planning (Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute)

23.2.1 Ordering

23.2.1.1 Introduction

Ordering has long been recognized as a mode of liability for international crimes.[13] Accordingly, Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute establishes that an individual will be criminally responsible if he 'orders . . . the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted'. However, the meaning of the term 'orders' used in this provision is not explained in the ICC Statute. Neither Article 25 nor Article 33 defines it.

To date, the ICC has made use of the mode of liability of ordering under Article 25(3)(b) in several cases.[14] In the Kony and Others case, Pre-Trial Chamber II found reasonable grounds to believe that Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Okot Odhiambo, and Dominic Ongwen ordered direct attacks against the civilian population, killing and enslaving civilians, and pillaging property in Uganda in 2003–4.[15] In the Mudacumura case, Pre-Trial Chamber II found reasonable grounds to believe that Sylvestre Mudacumura ordered direct attacks against the civilian population, raping, torturing, mutilating, and killing civilians, imposing cruel treatment and violating the civilians' dignity, and pillaging and destroying property in the DRC in 2009–10.[16] In the Bemba and Others case, Pre-Trial Chamber II found reasonable grounds to believe that Jean-Pierre Bemba had ordered the commission of offences against the administration of justice since early 2012, namely the presentation of evidence that he knew was false or forged, the coaching of Defence witnesses called before the ICC, and the transfer of money to the latter during the trial held [13] Art II(2)(b) Control Council Law No. 10; Art 49 Geneva Convention I; Art 50 Geneva Convention II; Art 129 Geneva Convention III; Art 146 Geneva Convention IV; Art 7(1) Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute'); Art 6(1) Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1994) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute'); Art 2(3)(b) 1996 ILC Draft Code of Crimes.

[14] The Court has ruled on allegations of ordering the commission of crimes in other cases, but under Art 25(3)(a) of the Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute'). E.g. Banda and Jerbo Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 155; Blé Goudé arrest warrant decision (n 1) para. 34.

[15] Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony Issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC II, ICC, 27 September 2005, 12–19; Warrant of Arrest for Vincent Otti, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-54, PTC II, ICC, 8 July 2005, 12–20; Warrant of Arrest for Okot Odhiambo, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-56, PTC II, ICC, 8 July 2005, 10–12; Warrant of Arrest for Dominic Ongwen, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-57, PTC II, ICC, 8 July 2005, 9–10. Additional allegations stand for ordering the enlistment of children, the imposition of cruel treatment and enslavement of civilians, and the infliction of serious bodily injury and suffering. See Kony arrest warrant (n 15) 13, 15, 17–19; Otti arrest warrant (n 15) 13, 15, 17–19; Odhiambo arrest warrant (n 15) paras 10–11; Ongwen arrest warrant (n 15) 9–10. So far, these warrants of arrest remain unexecuted. Another warrant alleging responsibility for ordering was withdrawn upon the death of the suspect (Decision to Terminate the Proceedings against Raska Lukwiya, Kony et al., Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-248, PTC II, ICC, 11 July 2007).

[16] Mudacumura arrest warrant decision (n 2) paras 64 and 69.

against him.[17] In the Ruto and Sang case, Trial Chamber V(a) gave notice that the legal characterization of the facts and circumstances described in the charges may be subject to change in the eventual judgment to accord with liability for ordering, because, inter alia, William Ruto allegedly gave instructions for the perpetrators to carry out acts of killing and displacement of the civilian population in Kenya in 2007–8.[18]

In the Ntaganda case allegations are pending before Pre-Trial Chamber II that Bosco Ntaganda issued orders for his subordinates to commit crimes of murder, attacks against the civilian population and protected objects, forcible transfer, rape, pillaging, destruction of property, and training and using children under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities in the DRC in 2002–3.[19] Similarly, in the Laurent Gbagbo case charges are pending before Pre-Trial Chamber I that Mr Gbagbo issued orders to his subordinates to carry out actions, such as the purchase of weapons or the containment of demonstrators, that led to the commission of murders, rapes, inhumane acts, and persecution in Côte d'Ivoire in 2010–11.[20]

Finally, in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case the prosecutor submitted that the suspects ordered their subordinates to attack the civilian population of Bogoro on or around 24 February 2003, but Pre-Trial Chamber I did not entertain this allegation upon finding substantial grounds to believe that they were responsible under Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute.[21] Furthermore, in the Mbarushimana case the Court highlighted the distinction between ordering and the mode of liability envisaged in Article 25(3)(d).[22]

23.2.1.2 Material elements

Pursuant to the case law of the ICTY, the ICTR, and hybrid tribunals such as the SCSL and the ECCC, ordering consists in making use of a 'position of authority' to command or instruct—and thereby to convince, persuade, compel, or impel—an individual to carry out the material elements of a crime.[23] An order may be limited to carry [17] Warrant of arrest for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Aimé Kilolo Musamba, Jean-Jacques Mangenda Kabongo, Fidèle Babala Wandu, and Narcisse Arido, Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-1-Red2-tENG, PTC II, ICC, 20 November 2013, 3, and paras 15 and 23.

[18] Decision on Applications for Notice of Possibility of Variation of Legal Characterization, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1122, TC V(A), ICC, 12 December 2013, para. 44; Decision on Applications for Notice of Possibility of Variation of Legal Characterisation—Annex A: Reproduction of Annex A of the Prosecution Additional Submission (ICC-01/09-01/11-943-AnxA), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1122-AnxA, 12 December 2013, paras 109 and 117.

[19] Annex A: Prosecution's Submission of Document Containing the Charges and the List of Evidence, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-203-AnxA, 10 January 2014, 56–7, 59–60, and paras 155–6; Annex A9: Prosecution's Submission of its Presentation of Evidence at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-258-AnxA9, 14 February 2014, 2.

[20] Prosecution's Submission of Document Amendé de Notification des Charges, l'Inventaire Amendé des Éléments de Preuve à Charge, and le Tableau Amendé des Éléments Constitutifs des Crimes, and Response to Issues Raised by Pre-Trial Chamber I—Annexe 1: Document Amendé de Notification des Charges, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-592-Anx1, 13 January 2014, paras 222 and 232–5.

[21] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 470–1.

[22] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 274, 278–81, 286, 289.

[23] Mudacumura arrest warrant decision (n 2) para. 63, referring to Appeal Judgment, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, AC, ICTY, 17 December 2004, para. 28; Appeal Judgment, Dragomir Milošević, out one isolated crime. It may also consist of general directions to act in a particular way whenever a given set of circumstances takes place.[24]

It is not necessary to prove a formal superior-subordinate relationship in order to establish the existence of a position of authority to order the perpetrator the commission of the crime.[25] It is enough that the individual issuing the order exercises a significant influence over the perpetrator, pursuant to which the latter obeys the order of the former.[26] Therefore, criminal responsibility for ordering under the ICC Statute could be ascribed not only to hierarchical superiors in regular army units, but also to commanders of irregular forces (such as paramilitary groups) and political party leaders.[27]

For responsibility to arise for ordering, the perpetrator must be sufficiently identified (i.e. by reference to the group or unit to which he belongs), but need not be individually identified.[28] Otherwise, it is not possible to evaluate whether the individual ordering the crime enjoyed a 'position of authority' over the perpetrator.

IT-98-29-1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 November 2009, para. 290. See also Appeal Judgment, Semanza, ICTR-97-20-A, AC, ICTR, 20 May 2005, para. 361; Appeal Judgment, Gacumbitsi, ICTR-97-20-A, AC, ICTR, 7 July 2006, para. 182; Appeal Judgment, Ntagerura et al., ICTR-99-46-A, AC, ICTR, 7 July 2006, para. 365; Appeal Judgment, Galić, IT-98-29-A, AC, ICTR, 30 November 2006, para. 176; Judgment, Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, TC II, SCSL, 20 June 2007, para. 772; Judgment, Fofana and Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-T, TC I, SCSL, 2 August 2007, para. 225; Appeal Judgment, Sesay et al., SCSL-04-15-A, AC, SCSL, 26 October 2009, para. 164; Appeal Judgment, Boškoski and Tarčulovski, IT-04-82-A, AC, ICTY, 19 May 2010, para. 160; Judgment, Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC (Duch), E188, ECCC, 26 July 2010, para. 527; Appeal Judgment, Kalimanzira, ICTR-05-88-A, AC, ICTR, 20 October 2010, para. 213; Appeal Judgment, Setako, ICTR-04-81-A, AC, ICTR, 28 September 2011, para. 240; Appeal Judgment, Bagosora and Nsengiyumva, ICTR-98-41-A, AC, ICTR, 14 December 2011, para. 277; Appeal Judgment, Ndindiliyimana et al., ICTR-00-56-A, AC, ICTR, 11 February 2014, paras 291 and 365.

[24] Finnin (n 12) 45.

[25] Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 28; Semanza Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 361 and 363; Appeal Judgment, Kamuhanda, ICTR-99-54A-A, AC, ICTR, 19 September 2005, para. 75; Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 181–2; Galić Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 176; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 772; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 225; Appeal Judgment, Nahimana et al., ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2007, note 1162; Judgment, Sesay et al., SCSL-04-15-T, TC I, SCSL, 2 March 2009, para. 273; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 290; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 164; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 527. Cassese, Finnin and Goy hold the same opinion (A Cassese, International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2003) 193; Finnin (n 12) 55–6, Goy (n 11) 54). By contrast, Werle considers that a superior-subordinate relationship in the military sense is typically required (G Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law 2nd edn (The Hague: TMC Asser Press 2009) 181 mn 486); Diarra and D'Huart suggest that at least authority over the perpetrator is required (Diarra and D'Huart (n 2) 824); Weernink argues that a superior-subordinate relationship should be clearly separated from the 'authority' required for ordering (A Weernink, 'The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, Case No. ICTR-97-20, Judgment, Appeals Chamber (20 May 2005)' (2007) 6 Chinese Journal of International Law 115, 121); and Ambos is of the opinion that this requirement is currently a controversial one (K Ambos, La parte general del derecho penal internacional: bases para una elaboración dogmática (Berlin: Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung 2005) 274). See also C Del Ponte, 'Investigation and Prosecution of Large-Scale Crimes at the International Level: The Experience of the ICTY' (2006) 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice 539, 548.

[26] Judgment, Strugar, IT-01-42-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 January 2005, para. 331; Semanza Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 361. See also Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 182; Judgment, Muvunyi, ICTR-00-55A-T, TC II, ICTR, 12 September 2006, para. 467. See also V Hamilton and H Kelman, Crimes of Obedience: Toward a Social Psychology of Authority and Responsibility (New Haven: Yale University Press 1989) 77; Boas et al. (n 12) 365, 369–70.

[27] Semanza Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 363; Kamuhanda Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 76; Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 187. See also H Olásolo, The Criminal Responsibility of Senior Political and Military Leaders as Principals to International Crimes (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2009) 136.

[28] Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 75; Appeal Judgment, Renzaho, ICTR-97-31-A, AC, ICTR, 1 April 2011, para. 320.

Ordering requires that an individual instructs the perpetrator to commit a crime. This implies in all cases a positive action, and excludes ordering by omission.[29] Consequently, an omission can never give rise to responsibility for ordering. However, an order need not be in a particular form to give rise to criminal responsibility. Orders entailing criminal responsibility can be oral or written,[30] explicit or implicit.[31] For instance, an express order to conduct a lawful military operation may be accompanied by an implied order to commit a crime.

The existence of an order to commit a crime can be proved not only with direct evidence, but also with circumstantial evidence.[32] If circumstantial evidence is used to prove the existence of an order, the latter must be the only reasonable conclusion from the proven facts.[33] In this regard, although the presence at the scene of the crime of the individual giving the order may be a relevant factor to deduce that he ordered the commission of the crime,[34] such presence is not required for responsibility to arise.[35] An individual's omissions can also be taken into account as circumstantial evidence to prove the existence of an order,[36] although the omissions alone cannot amount to an order.

Orders need not be transmitted directly to the perpetrator of the crime.[37] An order to commit a crime may be transmitted through several levels in a chain of [29] Appeal Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-A, AC, ICTY, 29 July 2004, para. 660; Galić Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 176; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 164; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 267; Bagosora and Nsengiyumva Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 277. See also Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 481, referring to Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 28; Semanza Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 361; Kamuhanda Appeal Judgment (n 25) [75]; Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 182; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 365.

[30] Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, TC, ICTY, 3 March 2000, para. 281; Kamuhanda Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 76; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 160; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 527.

[31] Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, TC II, ICTY, 1 September 2004, para. 270; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 267. See also Finnin (n 12) 46.

[32] Kamuhanda Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 76; Galić Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 171, 178, and 389; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 265; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 160; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 213. See also Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 281; Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 270; Judgment, Limaj et al., IT-03-66-T, TC II, ICTY, 30 November 2005, para. 515; Judgment, Martić, IT-95-11-T, TC I, ICTY, 12 June 2007, para. 442; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 772; Judgment, Boškoski and Tarčulovski, IT-04-82-T, TC II, ICTY, 10 July 2008, para. 400; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 164; Ndindiliyimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 291.

[33] Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 213.

[34] Other factors relevant to infer the existence of an order to commit the crimes are (i) the number of illegal acts; (ii) the number, identity, and type of troops involved; (iii) the logistics involved; (iv) the widespread occurrence of the acts; (v) the tactical tempo of operations; (vi) the modus operandi of similar illegal acts; (vii) the officers and staff involved; and (viii) the location of the commanders at the time (Final Report of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992), Annex to Letter Dated 24 May 1994 from the Secretary-General to the President of the Security Council (27 May 1994) UN Doc S/1994/674, para. 58).

[35] Appeal Judgment, Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16-A, AC, ICTY, 23 October 2001, para. 365; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 290; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) note 347, para. 132.

[36] Galić Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 177–8.

[37] Mudacumura arrest warrant decision (n 2) para. 63, referring to Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 282; Judgment, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, TC III, ICTY, 26 February 2001, para. 388; Judgment, Naletilić and Martinović, IT-98-34-T, TC I, ICTY, 31 March 2003, para. 61; Judgment, Đorđević, IT-05-87/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 23 February 2011, para. 1871. See also Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 270; Strugar Trial Judgment (n 26) para. 331; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 772; Judgment, Vujadin Popović et al., IT-05-88-T, TC II, ICTY, 10 June 2010, para. 1012.

command.[38] Any intermediate superior transmitting an order is considered to be reissuing the order and, therefore, can be held responsible for ordering the commission of the crime.[39] Furthermore, any intermediate superior who impliedly consents to an order to commit a crime by taking no action to oppose it can be held responsible for ordering.[40]

Under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute, an individual is responsible for ordering whenever the perpetrator reaches the execution phase of a crime in compliance with such individual's order. It is therefore necessary that the perpetrator commits or at least attempts the commission of the crime in carrying out or setting in motion the order.[41] Consequently, proof of a 'causal link' between the order and the conduct of the perpetrator is required.[42] However, it is not required for the order to be a necessary condition for the commission of the crime by the perpetrator.[43] All that is required is that the order has a direct and substantial effect on the commission of the crime.[44] While there is little ICC case law at this time interpreting ordering under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute, the case law of the ad hoc tribunals on ordering suggests that a substantial contribution to the crime may be contemplated.[45]

23.2.1.3 Mental elements

Pursuant to Article 30(1) of the ICC Statute, the intent and knowledge envisaged in this provision are generally applicable to the elements of all crimes and modes of liability.[46] Hence, they apply to ordering under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute [38] Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 282. The ILC shared this opinion (Report of the ILC on the Work of its 48th Session (6 May–26 July 1996), Draft Code of Crimes against Peace and Security of Mankind, UN Doc A/51/10 (1996), Art 2, commentary para. 14).

[39] Judgment, Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16-T, TC II, ICTY, 14 January 2000, para. 827, and 862; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 574; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 167; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 527; Judgment, Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, TC II, SCSL, 18 May 2012, para. 476.

[40] Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, TC I, ICTR, 2 September 1998, paras 693–4.

[41] Goy (n 11) 53–4.

[42] Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 278 uses the expression 'in furtherance of', and Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 July 2003, para. 445 refers to 'executing or otherwise furthering the implementation of the order'. Judgment and Sentence, Semanza, ICTR-97-20-T, TC III, ICTR, 15 May 2003, para. 382 and Naletilić and Martinović Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 61 also refer to 'executing' the order. See also Strugar Trial Judgment (n 26) para. 332; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 225; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 273.

[43] Strugar Trial Judgment (n 26) para. 332; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 225; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 273; Popović et al. Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1013.

[44] Mudacumura arrest warrant decision (n 2) para. 63, referring to Kamuhanda Appeal Judgment (n 25) paras 75–6; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 481. See also Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 185; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 492; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 160; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 527; Renzaho Appeal Judgment (n 28) para. 315; Appeal Judgment, Taylor, SCSL-03-01-A, AC, SCSL, 26 September 2013, paras 368 and 589; Ndindiliyimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 291 and 365.

[45] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 279, referring to Kamuhanda Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 76; Popović et al. Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1013.

[46] A Eser, 'Mental Elements—Mistake of Fact and Mistake of Law' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 933; D Piragoff and D Robinson, 'Article 30: Mental Element' in O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (Munich: C H Beck 2008) 851.

because the latter provision does not include any mental element in its definition of this mode of liability.[47]

Accordingly, an individual may be held responsible for ordering the commission of a crime under the ICC Statute if he acts (i) with a purposeful will to have a crime committed and in the knowledge that such crime will be committed in the ordinary course of events following the execution of his order (direct intent/dolus directus in the first degree);[48] or (ii) solely with the awareness that the material elements of a crime will occur in the ordinary course of events following the execution of his order (oblique or indirect intent/dolus directus in the second degree).[49]

No responsibility may arise for ordering under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute if the individual giving the order is merely negligent.[50] Conversely, neither Articles 25(3)(b) and 30(2) of the ICC Statute nor the ICC case law to date require the individual issuing the order to act driven by the ulterior intent/dolus specialis of the crime committed by the perpetrator carrying out his order.[51] By contrast, due to the different interpretations of Article 30 of the ICC Statute made to date,[52] it is still not settled whether an individual may be held liable for ordering under Article 25(3)(b) where he issues an order (i) with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that the material elements of the crime will

[47] Diarra and D'Huart (n 2) 823; Finnin (n 12) 180, 197; Goy (n 11) 55 and 57.

[48] Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 29; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 365; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 481; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 68; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 528; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1289, and para. 589; Ndindiliyimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 297 and 300. This mental element is also referred to with the expressions dol spécial, dolo intenzionale, dolo directo de primer grado, прямой умысел, القصد المباشر, 直接故意, and Absicht.

[49] Mudacumura arrest warrant decision (n 2) paras 63 and 67. See also Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 42; Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 30; Strugar Trial Judgment (n 26) para. 333; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) note 733; Galić Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 152 and 157; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 481; Appeal Judgment, Martić, IT-95-11-A, AC, ICTY, 8 October 2008, paras 221–3; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 68 and 172; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 528; Judgment and Sentence, Kanyarukiga, ICTR-02-78-T, TC II, ICTR, 1 November 2010, note 1708; Renzaho Appeal Judgment (n 28) para. 315; Bagosora and Nsengiyumva Appeal Judgment (n 23) note 642; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1289 and para. 589; Ndindiliyimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 297 and 300. This mental element is also referred to with the expressions dol général, dolo diretto, dolo directo de segundo grado, косвенный умысел, القصد غير المباشر, 间接故意 and direkter Vorsatz. See also Finnin (n 12) 60; M Badar, The Concept of Mens Rea in International Criminal Law: The Case of a Unified Approach (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2013) 335.

[50] Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 1) note 438; Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 360.

[51] Werle (n 25) 182; Goy (n 11) 55. Cf. Boas et al. (n 12) 352; R Clark, 'Drafting a General Part to a Penal Code: Some Thoughts Inspired by the Negotiations on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and by the Court's First Substantive Law Discussion in the Lubanga Dyilo Confirmation Proceedings' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 519, 547; K Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law: Foundations and General Part vol. I (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 163.

[52] Reading Art 30 as inclusive of dolus eventualis, Cassese (n 25) 176; Piragoff and Robinson (n 46) 860 mn 22; M Badar, 'The Mens Rea Enigma in the Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Court' in L van den Herik and C Stahn (eds), The Diversification and Fragmentation of International Criminal Law (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2012) 534; Badar (n 49) 425. For the opposite view, E van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (The Hague: TMC Asser Press 2003) 51–2; W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 476; Finnin (n 12) 172–3, 176, 185. For an ambivalent view, see J Olin et al. (n 2) 739–40.

result in the ordinary course of events from the execution of his order, and (ii) accepting or reconciling himself with this situation (conditional intent/dolus eventualis).[53]

Pursuant to the case law of ICC Pre-Trial Chamber I, which includes conditional intent/dolus eventualis within Article 30 of the ICC Statute,[54] the mental element for ordering under the ICC Statute will be satisfied where an individual issues an order, and his acceptance of the commission of the ensuing crime can be inferred from the fact that he gave the order in the awareness of the substantial risk that the crime would be committed upon the implementation of the order. By contrast, pursuant to the case law of ICC Pre-Trial Chamber II, which excludes conditional intent/dolus eventualis from Article 30 of the ICC Statute,[55] it is necessary that an individual issues an order at least with the awareness of the virtual or practical certainty that the crime will be committed in the execution of the order.

Against this background, Trial Chamber I adopted a somewhat contradictory approach to the issue of conditional intent/dolus eventualis. On the one hand, it stated that this type of intent is excluded from Article 30(2) of the ICC Statute relying on the literal and contextual interpretation provided by ICC Pre-Trial Chamber II.[56] On the other hand, when defining the content of the expression 'awareness that it [a consequence] will occur in the ordinary course of events' provided for in Article 30(2) of the ICC Statute, it accepted that criminal liability may arise in cases of awareness of the substantial likelihood that the material elements of a crime will result from the conduct at hand (for instance, the execution of an order).[57]

[53] Stakić Trial Judgment (n 42) paras 445 and 587; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1289 and para. 589. The standard defined by the ad hoc tribunals in other cases for a mental element lower than direct intent may include conditional intent/dolus eventualis ('ordering with such awareness [of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed] has to be regarded as accepting that crime'). See Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 42; Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 30; Martić Appeal Judgment (n 49) paras 221–3; Renzaho Appeal Judgment (n 28) para. 315. For a consideration of this standard as not including conditional intent/dolus eventualis, see Boas et al. (n 12) 350. Conditional intent/dolus eventualis is also referred to with the expressions dol éventuel, dolo eventuale, dolo eventual, القص الاحتمالى, and bedingter Vorsatz. The correspondence of the three mental elements in common-law systems and civil-law systems is discussed in Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court, Request from the Governments of Belgium, Finland, Hungary, Mexico, the Republic of Korea, and South Africa and the Permanent Observer Mission of Switzerland to the United Nations regarding the Text Prepared by the International Committee of the Red Cross on the Mental Element in the Common Law and Civil Law Systems and on the Concepts of Mistake of Fact and Mistake of Law in National and International Law (15 December 1999), PCNICC/1999/WGEC/INF/2/Add.4, 13.

[54] Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 352–4. See also Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 1) note 329; Decision on the Applications for Leave to Appeal the Decision on the Admission of the Evidence of Witnesses 132 and 287 and on the Leave to Appeal on the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-727, PTC I, ICC, 24 October 2008, paras 15–16.

[55] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 360–9; Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 335–6. See also Concurring Opinion of Judge Van den Wyngaert to Ngudjolo Trial Judgment (n 1) paras 38–9 and 70.

[56] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 1) para. 1011.

[57] Ibid., para. 1012 ('[T]he participants anticipate, based on their knowledge of how events ordinarily develop, that the consequence will occur in the future. This prognosis involves consideration of the concepts of "possibility" and "probability", which are inherent to the notions of "risk" and "danger"…they must know the existence of a risk that the consequence will occur.…A low risk will not be sufficient'). For a detailed analysis of the treatment of the notion of conditional intent/dolus eventualis in the Lubanga Trial Judgment, see H Olásolo Alonso, Tratado de Autoría y Participación en Derecho Penal Internacional (Valencia: Tirant lo Blanch 2013) 152–4.

Pursuant to Article 30(3) of the ICC Statute, responsibility for ordering only arises where the individual issuing the order is aware that '[any relevant] circumstance exists'. Accordingly, the individual issuing the order must be aware (i) that he can exercise influence over the perpetrator to whom his order is addressed, (ii) that the order concerns an act that constitutes a crime or will lead to the commission of a crime, and (iii) that the perpetrator executing his order will act with the general mental element and any ulterior intent/dolus specialis required by the crime.[58] Article 30 seems also to require that the person giving the order be aware of the causal link between his order and the crime eventually committed.[59] However, the Court has still not addressed this issue.

Finally, the Court has not expressly clarified either whether the mental elements of ordering can be satisfied by proof of 'wilful blindness', i.e. by showing that the person who gave the order suspected that these circumstances existed but deliberately avoided taking steps to find out the truth.[60]

23.2.1.4 Differences with perpetration

For some scholars, the concept of ordering provided for in Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute, as well as in Articles 7(1) of the ICTY Statute, 6(1) of the ICTR Statute, and 6(1) of the SCSL Statute, is more related to the concept of indirect perpetration through organized structures of power (principal liability) than to the participation in crimes committed by third persons (accessorial liability), since ordering is based on the use of a hierarchical structure to ensure the commission of the crimes.[61] Other scholars have even suggested that ordering under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute could indeed be considered a form of indirect perpetration.[62]

However, since Article 25(3) of the ICC Statute as well as Articles 7(1) of the ICTY Statute, 6(1) of the ICTR Statute, and 6(1) of the SCSL Statute make an express distinction between 'ordering' and 'committing' a crime, it is necessary to determine the boundaries between indirect perpetration through organized structures of power, like the armed forces, the police, or a hierarchically organized armed group,[63] which gives rise to principal responsibility, and ordering as a form of accessorial liability.[64]

[58] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) paras 40–2. See also Werle (n 25) 182 mn 488; Finnin (n 12) 195.

[59] Mudacumura arrest warrant decision (n 2) paras 63 and 67. See also Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 528. Against requiring awareness of the causal link on the part of the accessory, see Finnin (n 12) 195–7.

[60] Supporting a broad possibility for the Court to make use of 'wilful blindness', see Eser (n 46) 931–3; Piragoff and Robinson (n 46) 861 mn 26. Supporting a limited possibility to resort to 'wilful blindness', see M Badar, 'The Mental Element in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary from a Comparative Criminal Law Perspective' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 473, 496; Finnin (n 12) 174, 176, 185, 190.

[61] Ambos (n 25) 196; Ambos (n 51) 163. See van Sliedregt (n 2) 108–9.

[62] Van Sliedregt (n 52) 76; R Cryer et al. (eds), An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010) 379.

[63] C Roxin, 'Straftaten im Rahmen organisatorischer Machtsapparate', Goltdammer's Archiv für Strafrecht (GA) (1963) translated to English: C Roxin, 'Crimes as Part of Organized Power Structures' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 193, 202–4. See also Olásolo (n 27) 140–2.

[64] 'Ordering' is recognized in customary international law as a form of participation in the commission of the crime (A Eser, 'Individual Criminal Responsibility' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of

The practice of the ICC so far shows that the existence of an order does not rule out indirect perpetration under Article 25(3)(a). For instance, in the Muthaura and Kenyatta case, Pre-Trial Chamber II stated that the commission of the crimes was found to have been triggered by precise instructions given by Francis Muthaura and Uhuru Kenyatta, and that such orders were 'the most important contribution of both Mr Muthaura and Mr Kenyatta to the crimes'.[65] The orders, along with 'additional forms of contribution' to the crimes, such as the provision of financial and logistical support, provided substantial grounds to believe that they were criminally responsible as 'indirect co-perpetrators' under Article 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute.[66] Similarly, in the Ruto and Sang case, Pre-Trial Chamber II found William Ruto to have given orders to commit the crimes.[67] The orders, along with Mr Ruto's wider contribution to the commission of the crimes, led the Pre-Trial Chamber to eventually conclude that there were substantial grounds to believe that Mr Ruto was an 'indirect co-perpetrator' pursuant to Article 25(3)(a).[68]

Conversely, there are two scenarios where individuals can be held responsible for ordering under Article 25(3)(b) without being considered indirect perpetrators under Article 25(3)(a). Firstly, instances where the individual who issues the order belongs to an organized structure of power not comprising the perpetrators of the crime, but has significant influence over the latter. Such individual cannot be an indirect perpetrator because those receiving the order are not part of the organization controlled by him. However, he is in a position of authority over the perpetrators to order the commission of the crimes. Second, cases where the individual who issues the order controls an organization comprising the perpetrators of the crime, but the organization has a limited number of members and therefore, unless the perpetrators are children, automatic compliance with the order is not guaranteed.[69] For instance, this scenario arises where the crimes are committed by paramilitary groups, small organized armed groups opposing the state and flexible terrorist organizations.

The Court has still not addressed whether indirect perpetration requires the relevant organization to have a culture of unlawful conduct.[70] If the Court answers this question in the affirmative, a third scenario will arise for individuals to be held responsible for ordering under Article 25(3)(b) without being considered indirect perpetrators the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 796; Ambos (n 25) 274; Werle (n 25) 181 mn 486). However, for Cassese (n 25) 194, 'ordering' is not a form of participation in the commission of a crime, but a preparatory act giving rise to liability on its own, regardless of whether the unlawful order is eventually carried out or not. It is submitted, however, that ICTR and ICTY case law does not sustain Cassese's interpretation, since this case law requires that ordered crimes be committed pursuant to or supported by an order. See Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 278; Naletilić and Martinović Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 61; Semanza Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 61; Stakić Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 445; Kamuhanda Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 75; Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 185.

[65] Kenyatta et al. Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 375–6.

[66] Ibid., paras 384, 398, and 404–6.

[67] Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 1903 and 197.

[68] Ibid., paras 308–11, 319, and 349.

[69] The organization in this scenario will not amount to an organized structure of power. See Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 518.

[70] In favour of a positive answer, C Roxin, Täterschaft und Tatherrschaft 7th edn (Berlin: De Gruyter 2000) 149. Supporting a negative answer, K Ambos, 'The Fujimori Judgment. A President's Responsibility for Crimes against Humanity as Indirect Perpetrator by Virtue of an Organized Power Apparatus' (2011)

under Article 25(3)(a). According to this third scenario, ordering will be applicable where the individual issuing the order belongs to an organization comprising the perpetrators of the crime, but the organization does not have a culture of unlawful conduct (such as a regular police unit).

Lastly, it is important to note that an indirect perpetrator must always personally fulfil all the mental elements of the crime and must therefore act driven by any required ulterior intent/dolus specialis, whereas an individual ordering the commission of a crime need not act pursuant to the ulterior intent/dolus specialis required by the crime.[71]

23.2.2 Instigating

23.2.2.1 Introduction

Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute attributes criminal responsibility to the individual who 'solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted'. The Court has noted that the notion of 'instigating' as found in the ICTY Statute is 'roughly analogous to soliciting or inducing in Article 25(3)(b) of the [ICC] Statute'.[72] In turn, the ICTY has found that 'instigating' requires 'some kind of influencing the principal perpetrator by way of inciting, soliciting or otherwise inducing him or her to commit the crime'.[73] Similarly, for a number of scholars the criminal responsibility arising from soliciting, inducing, or inciting another individual to commit a crime can be described by the term 'instigation'.[74]

To date, the ICC has relied on instigating under Article 25(3)(b) in several cases. In the Kony and Others case, Pre-Trial Chamber II found reasonable grounds to believe that Joseph Kony and Vincent Otti induced the commission of rape in Uganda in 2003.[75] In the Harun and Kushayb case, Pre-Trial Chamber I found reasonable grounds to believe that Ahmad Harun personally encouraged the Militia/Janjaweed to attack civilians and induced the pillaging of shops, houses, and livestock in Darfur in 2003.[76] In the Bemba and Others case, Pre-Trial Chamber II found reasonable grounds to believe that Jean-Pierre Bemba had solicited or induced his associates to commit offences against 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 154; S Bottke, 'Criminalidad económica y derecho criminal económico en la República Federal de Alemania' (1999) 4 Revista Penal 21, 25–6. The case law of the Court has still not addressed this issue, and therefore, has so far not required the existence of a culture of unlawful conduct for the application of the notion of indirect perpetration. See Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 415–517.

[71] See (n 51). [72] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) note 661.

[73] Judgment, Orić, IT-03-68-T, TC II, ICTY, 30 June 2006, para. 271.

[74] Eser (n 64) 795; van Sliedregt (n 52) 77. See also Ambos (n 25) 275; Boas et al. (n 12) 371; Schabas (n 52) 432–3; Finnin (n 12) 62; Goy (n 11) 57; D Dimov, 'Article 25. Individual Criminal Responsibility' in P De Hert et al. (eds), Code of International Criminal Law and Procedure, Annotated (Ghent: Larcier 2013) 150.

[75] Kony arrest warrant (n 15) 13; Otti arrest warrant (n 15) 13.

[76] Decision on the Prosecution Application under Art 58(7) of the Statute, Harun and Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/07-1-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 27 April 2007, paras 90–1 and 94; Warrant of arrest for Ahmad Harun, Harun and Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/07-2-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 27 April 2007, 5 and 12. So far, this warrant remains unexecuted. For a critical analysis of the allegations of inducing the commission of the crimes in Darfur ratified by the Chamber against Mr Harun, see Olásolo (n 57) 653–4.

the administration of justice since early 2012, namely to present false or forged evidence, to coach Defence witnesses called before the ICC, and to transfer money to the latter during the trial held against him.[77] In the Ruto and Sang case, Trial Chamber V(a) gave notice that the legal characterization of the facts and circumstances described in the charges may be subject to change in the eventual judgment to accord with liability for soliciting or inducing because, inter alia, William Ruto allegedly (i) established a scheme of payment for the purposes of motivating and rewarding the perpetrators upon the successful killing of the civilian population and the destruction of their property, and (ii) encouraged them to commit the crimes with discriminatory rhetoric and promises of immunity in Kenya in 2007–8.[78]

In the Ntaganda case allegations are pending before Pre-Trial Chamber II that Bosco Ntaganda, through his own behaviour and his failure to act, induced his subordinates to commit crimes of murder, attacks against the civilian population and protected objects, rape, sexual slavery, pillaging, destruction of property, and recruitment of children under the age of 15 in the DRC in 2002–3.[79] Similarly, in the Laurent Gbagbo case charges are pending before Pre-Trial Chamber I that Mr Gbagbo, encouraging his supporters and issuing the pertinent instructions, induced the commission of crimes of murder, rape, inhumane acts, and persecution in Côte d´Ivoire in 2010–11.[80]

Lastly, in the Katanga and Ngudjolo judgment, Trial Chamber II made reference to the difference between instigation and indirect perpetration under Article 25(3)(a).[81] Furthermore, in the Mbarushimana case the Court highlighted the distinction between instigating and the mode of liability envisaged in Article 25(3)(d).[82]

23.2.2.2 Material elements

Instigating the commission of a crime has been defined in the case law of the ICC, the ICTY, the ICTR, the SCSL, and the ECCC as prompting another person to commit a crime.[83] In turn, commentators agree that soliciting and inducing refer to a situation where 'a person is influenced by another to commit a crime'.[84] Hence, a person [77] Bemba et al. arrest warrant decision (n 17) 3–4, and paras 15 and 23.

[78] Ruto and Sang Regulation 55 notice decision (n 18) para. 44; Ruto and Sang Regulation 55 notice decision annex (n 18) paras 22 and 57.

[79] Ntaganda document containing the charges (n 19) 56, 60, and paras 155–6; Ntaganda Prosecution's submissions on confirmation (n 19) 13–14.

[80] See (n 20).

[81] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 1) para. 1396.

[82] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 274, 278–81, 286, 289.

[83] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 1) para. 1396. See also Akayesu Trial Judgment (n 40) para. 482; Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 280; Judgment, Krstić, IT-98-33-T, TC, ICTY, 2 August 2001, para. 601; Judgment, Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, TC I, ICTY, 2 November 2001, paras 243 and 252; Naletilić and Martinović Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 60; Judgment, Kajelijeli, ICTR-98-44A-T, TC II, ICTR, 1 December 2003, para. 762; Judgment, Kamuhanda, ICTR-95-54A-T, TC II, ICTR, 22 January 2004, para. 593; Judgment, Gacumbitsi, ICTR-2001-64-T, TC III, ICTR, 17 June 2004, para. 279; Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 27; Limaj et al. Trial Judgment (n 32) para. 514; Appeal Judgment, Ndindabahizi, ICTR-2001-71-A, AC, ICTR, 16 January 2007, para. 117; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 480; Appeal Judgment, Karera, ICTR-01-74-A, AC, ICTR, 2 February 2009, para. 317; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 522; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 589.

[84] K Ambos, 'Article 25: Individual Criminal Responsibility' in Triffterer (n 46) 753 mn 15. See also Eser (n 64) 796.

instigating, soliciting, or inducing the commission of a crime does not carry out any of its material elements.[85] If a person carries out any such elements, and prompts others to commit the remaining material elements of the crime, he will become a co-perpetrator.[86]

The instigation of a crime may be carried out verbally, by other means of communication, and in many different ways,[87] even by omission.[88] Threats, bribery, as well as appeals to family bonds, friendship, group ideology, or even patriotism may instigate the perpetrator to commit a crime.[89]

The instigation may be implicit or explicit.[90] Unlike the inchoate crime of 'directly and publicly incit[ing] others to commit genocide' under Article 25(3)(e) of the ICC Statute, instigation as a mode of liability under Article 25(3)(b) need not be 'public'[91] or 'direct'.[92] In fact, pursuant to ICTY and ICTR case law the instigator need not be present at the crime scene[93] and can instigate by intermediaries.[94] Likewise, instigation may be exerted over a specific individual, a larger audience, or even the public at large.[95] Although the perpetrator subject to the instigation must be sufficiently [85] Blaškić judgment (n 30) para. 282; Kordić and Čerkez judgment (n 37) para. 388. See also Boas et al. (n 12) 361.

[86] Decision on the Defence Rule 98 bis Motion for Judgment of Acquittal, Stakić, IT-97-24-T, TC II, 31 October 2002, para. 107.

[87] Judgment, Ndindabahizi, ICTR-2001-71-I, TC I, ICTR, 15 July 2004, para. 456; Judgment, Mpambara, ICTR-01-65-T, TC I, ICTR, 11 September 2006, para. 18.

[88] Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) paras 270 and 280; Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 387; Naletilić and Martinović Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 60; Kajelijeli Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 762; Kamuhanda Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 593; Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 269; Limaj et al. Trial Judgment (n 32) para. 514; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 273. On instigation by a superior's consistent failure to prevent or punish the perpetrator's crimes: Judgment, Bagilishema, ICTR-95-01A-T, TC I, ICTR, 7 June 2001, para. 50; Appeal Judgment, Hadžihasanović and Kubura, IT-01-47-A, AC, ICTY, 22 April 2008, para. 30; Appeal Judgment, Strugar, IT-01-42-A, AC, ICTY, 17 July 2008, para. 301; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 311. See also van Sliedregt (n 2) 108.

[89] As stated in the Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 273, '[I]nstigation can be performed by any means'. See also Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) paras 270, 277, and 280; Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 269; Limaj et al. Trial Judgment (n 32) para. 514. According to Ashworth, threats or any other kind of pressure may also constitute instigation (A Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 3rd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1999) 481).

[90] Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) paras 270, 277, and 280; Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 269; Limaj et al. Trial Judgment (n 32) para. 514; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 273; Muvunyi Trial Judgment (n 26) para. 464; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 769; Fofana and Kondewa judgment (n 23) para. 223; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 399; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 271; Đorđević Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1870.

[91] Appeal Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-A, AC, ICTR, 1 June 2001, paras 474–83, reversing the finding of the Trial Chamber whereby any act of instigation must be public and direct (Akayesu Trial Judgment (n 40) paras 481–2). See also Kajelijeli Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 762; Kamuhanda Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 593; Gacumbitsi Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 279; Judgment and Sentence, Muhimana, ICTR-95-1B-T, TC III, ICTR, 28 April 2005, para. 504; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 273; Muvunyi Trial Judgment (n 26) para. 464; Popović et al. Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1008. All these judgments follow the position adopted by the Appeals Chamber in Akayesu. See also Finnin (n 12) 68–9.

[92] Id. See also Judgment, Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-T, TC II, ICTR, 21 May 1999, para. 200; Semanza Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 381; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 679.

[93] Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 660; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) note 347 and para. 132.

[94] Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 359; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 273. See also Eser (n 64) 796; Ambos (n 84) 753 mn 15.

[95] Semanza Trial Judgment (n 42) paras 261 and 476–9; Judgment, Nahimana et al., ICTR-99-52-T, TC I, ICTR, 3 December 2003, para. 949; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 273; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 588. See also Badar (n 49) 332.

identified (i.e. by reference to the group or unit to which he belongs), he need not be individually identified.[96]

According to the case law of the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals, the act of instigation, solicitation, or inducement must be a 'factor substantially contributing to the commission of the crime' by the perpetrator.[97] Hence, the person or group of persons prompted to commit the crime must have not already, and independently from the instigator, formed a definitive intent to commit the crime in question.[98] Nevertheless, the act of instigation is not required to be a necessary condition for the commission of the crime by the perpetrator.[99]

The scarce case law of the Court to date on this mode of liability is consistent with this approach, suggesting that a substantial contribution to the crime may be contemplated under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute.[100] Such case law has also pointed out that a position of authority alone may not suffice to find responsibility for instigation.[101]

The instigated crime must be committed or attempted for responsibility to arise under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute.[102] Only regarding the crime of incitement to commit genocide, the mere incitement without its actual commission, or attempted commission gives rise to individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 25(3)(e) of the ICC Statute.[103]

23.2.2.3 Mental elements

Pursuant to Article 30(1) of the ICC Statute, the intent and knowledge envisaged in this provision applies to instigating under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute because the latter provision does not incorporate any mental element in its definition of this mode of liability.[104]

[96] Karera Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 318; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 75.

[97] Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 278; Bagilishema Trial Judgment (n 88) para. 30; Kvočka et al. Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 252; Naletilić and Martinović Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 60; Kamuhanda Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 590; Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 27; Limaj et al. Trial Judgment (n 32) para. 514; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) paras 271 and 274; Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 129; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 223; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 480; Appeal Judgment, Fofana and Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-A, AC, SCSL, 28 May 2008, para. 52; Karera Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 317; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 271; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 522; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) paras 368 and 589.

[98] This approach was adopted for the first time in Stakić Rule 98 bis Decision (n 86) para. 107. See also Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 271.

[99] Id. See also Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 27; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 274; Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 129; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 223; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) paras 480, 502, and 660; Karera Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 317; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 271; Đorđević Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1870; Boas et al. (n 12) 363.

[100] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 279, referring to Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 27; Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 129; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Trial Judgment (n 32) para. 399; Popović et al. Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1009; Đorđević Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1870. See also Harun and Kushayb arrest warrant decision (n 76) para. 91.

[101] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 1) para. 1396.

[102] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 48; Ndindabahizi Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 117.

[103] Werle (n 25) 169 mn 446, 180 mn 481; Ambos (n 84) 761 mn 34.

[104] See (n 47).

However, the interpretation of Article 30 of the ICC Statute as including or excluding conditional intent/dolus eventualis will affect the mental element required for instigation. If, following the case law of Pre-Trial Chamber I, conditional intent/dolus eventualis is read into Article 30,[105] an individual may be held responsible as an instigator in similar circumstances as those identified by the case law of the ad hoc tribunals. Accordingly, an individual will be an instigator if he acts with: (i) a purposeful will to provoke or induce the commission of the crime and the knowledge that such crime will be committed in the ordinary course of events following his conduct (direct intent/dolus directus in the first degree);[106] (ii) the sole awareness that the material elements of the crime will occur in the ordinary course of events following his acts or omissions prompting the commission of the crime (oblique or indirect intent/dolus directus in the second degree);[107] or at least (iii) the awareness of the substantial likelihood that the material elements of the crime will occur in the ordinary course of events following his conduct prompting the commission of the crime, and his acceptance of this situation (conditional intent/dolus eventualis).[108]

In the latter scenario, the instigator's acceptance of the commission of the crime would be deduced from the fact that he prompts the perpetrator to commit the crime despite being aware of the substantial likelihood that the crime would be eventually committed.

By contrast, if conditional intent/dolus eventualis is excluded from Article 30 as concluded in the case law of Pre-Trial Chamber II,[109] it would be necessary for the instigator to carry out his instigating conduct with the awareness of the virtual or practical certainty that his conduct will bring about the commission of the crime.[110]

No responsibility may arise for instigating under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute if the individual acts negligently when prompting the commission of the crime. Moreover, consistently with relevant ICTY and ICTR case law[111] neither Articles 25 and 30 of the ICC Statute nor the ICC jurisprudence to date require the instigator to [106] Harun and Kushayb arrest warrant decision (n 76) paras 93–4. See also Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 29; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 480; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 271; Appeal Judgment, Nchamihigo, ICTR-2001-63-A, AC, ICTR, 18 March 2010, para. 61; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 68; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 524; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1289 and para. 589. For additional expressions used to refer to this mental element, see (n 48).

[105] See (n 54).

[107] Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 32 and 112; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 480; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 271; Nchamihigo Appeal Judgment (n 106) para. 61; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 68; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 524; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1289 and para. 589. For additional expressions used to refer to this mental element, see (n 49).

[108] Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 279 and note 773; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 172; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1289 and para. 589. The standard defined by the ad hoc tribunals in other cases for a mental element lower than direct intent may include conditional intent/dolus eventualis ('Instigating with such awareness [of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed] has to be regarded as accepting that crime'). See Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 32 and 112. See Badar (n 49) 332. For additional expressions used to refer to this mental element, see (n 53).

[109] See (n 55).

[110] With regard to the position of ICC Trial Chamber I, see (nn 56–7).

[111] Semanza Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 388; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 279, note 772; Appeal Judgment, Seromba, ICTR-2001-66-A, AC, ICTR, 12 March 2008, paras 181–2; Nchamihigo Appeal Judgment (n 106) para. 61. See Boas et al. (n 12) 352.

act with the ulterior intent/dolus specialis of the prompted crime. Only the perpetrator of the crime must act pursuant to such ulterior intent/dolus specialis.[112]

Lastly, for responsibility to arise pursuant to Article 30(3) of the ICC Statute the individual prompting the perpetrator to commit the crime must also be aware that '[any relevant] circumstance exists'. Accordingly, the instigator must be aware that the prompted perpetrator acts with the general mental element and any ulterior intent/dolus specialis required by the definition of the crime.[113] Article 30(3) seems also to require that the instigator be aware of the fact that his conduct is a factor substantially contributing to the commission of the crime. However, the Court has not addressed this issue yet.

23.2.2.4 Differences with ordering and perpetration

Instigation can be distinguished from ordering because the influence exercised by the instigator over the perpetrator is not related to a superior–subordinate relationship or an authority to order.[114] Although family, religious, or friendship bonds, professional trust, or an ideological affinity may provide the possibility for the instigator to exert influence on the perpetrator, instigation does not presuppose any kind of authority or effective control of the instigator over the latter.[115] Conversely, ordering requires the person issuing the order to be in a position of de jure (formal) or de facto (informal) authority over the perpetrator.[116]

Another difference between instigation and ordering lies with the type of relation required between the instigator and the perpetrator of the crime. Whereas ordering requires that the crime be committed executing or setting in motion the order, instigation only requires that the instigator's conduct be a substantially contributing factor to the commission of the crime.[117]

Lastly, an indirect perpetrator must personally fulfil all mental elements of the crime and must therefore act pursuant to the required ulterior intent/dolus specialis.[118] By contrast, an individual instigating the commission of a crime need not act pursuant to the ulterior intent/dolus specialis required by the prompted crime.[119]

[112] Diarra and D'Huart (n 2) 823; Goy (n 11) 57. See Clark (n 51) 547; Badar (n 49) 333.

[113] Werle (n 25) 181 mn 485, 182 mn 488.

[114] Nchamihigo Appeal Judgment (n 106) para. 188; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 522. See also Cassese (n 25) 189; Ambos (n 51) 164.

[115] Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 359; Semanza Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 257; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 272; Popović et al. Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1008; Đorđević Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1870.

[116] See (n 26). See also Judgment, Mrkšić et al., IT-95-13/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 27 September 2007, para. 550; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Trial Judgment (n 32) para. 400; Finnin (n 12) 54–8.

[117] See (nn 42–5 and 97–101).

[118] Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 527; Al-Bashir arrest warrant decision (n 1) para. 223; Gaddafi and Al-Sennusi arrest warrant decision (n 1) para. 69; L Gbagbo arrest warrant decision (n 1) paras 75–6; Blé Goudé arrest warrant decision (n 1) paras 28 and 35; Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 292; Kenyatta et al. Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 297; S Gbagbo arrest warrant decision (n 1) paras 28 and 35. See also Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 349; Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 351.

[119] See (nn 111–12).

23.2.3 Planning

23.2.3.1 Introduction

Unlike Articles 7(1) of the ICTY Statute, 6(1) of the ICTR Statute, and 6(1) of the SCSL Statute, Article 25(3) of ICC Statute does not expressly attribute criminal responsibility to the 'planning' of crimes.[120] Nonetheless, planning can be impliedly foreseen in Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute, which refers to those who order, solicit, or induce the commission of crimes.[121] Since the ICC has still not dealt with any case of planning under Article 25(3)(b),[122] the discussion of this mode of liability is made on the basis of the case law of the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals.

23.2.3.2 Material elements

According to the case law of the ICTY, the ICTR, the SCSL, and the ECCC, responsibility for planning arises where one or more persons design an act or omission constituting a crime which is later perpetrated and such conduct has a substantial effect on the commission of the crime.[123] By contrast, pursuant to the literal tenor of Article 25(3)(b) and (f) of the ICC Statute, it would be sufficient that the execution phase of the planned crime be reached.

Whereas the initial case law of the ICTY required that the crimes be committed in the execution of the plan,[124] subsequently it has been clarified on appeal that it is only required that the planning be 'a substantially contributing factor to the criminal conduct'.[125] The determination of whether a particular conduct amounts to a substantial contribution to the crime for the purposes of planning liability is assessed on a case-by-case basis in light of the evidence as a whole.[126]

Responsibility may arise for planning the commission of a crime without the existence of a 'direct' connection between the individual planning the crime and the perpetrator thereof.[127] Moreover, the individual planning the crime need not be present

[120] Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1358. See also van Sliedregt (n 2) 112.

[121] Van Sliedregt (n 52) 78. As stated by V Morris and M Scharf, The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (Ardsley: Transnational 1998) 236, the expression 'planning' refers to the first stage of a crime. However, Boas et al. (n 12) 371, and Goy (n 11) 58–9 argue that conduct characterized as 'planning' could be better covered by 'aiding and abetting' as envisaged in the ICC Statute.

[122] The Court has ruled on allegations of planning the commission of crimes in several cases, but under Art 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute. See Banda and Jerbo Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 155.

[123] Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 26; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 479; Appeal Judgment, Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-A, AC, SCSL, 22 February 2008, para. 301; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 1170; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 268; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 518; Appeal Judgment, Kanyarukiga, ICTR-02-78-A, AC, ICTR, 8 May 2012, para. 258; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 494. It is not required that the accused be the originator of the plan (Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) note 418; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 494). See also Boas et al. (n 12) 355–6.

[124] Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 278.

[125] Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 26; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 268. See also Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 492; Brima et al. Appeal Judgment (n 123) para. 301; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 687 and 1170; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 518; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 368.

[126] Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 769.

[127] Van Sliedregt (n 52) 80, referring to Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 386.

at the crime scene,[128] as those who plan the crimes are usually the perpetrator's superiors, with a better knowledge of the logistic and operational requirements for the execution of the crimes. Although the perpetrator implementing the plan need not be individually identified, he must be sufficiently identified (i.e. by reference to the group or unit to which he belongs).[129]

23.2.3.3 Mental elements

Pursuant to Article 30(1) of the ICC Statute, the intent and knowledge envisaged in this provision apply to planning under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute because the latter provision does not provide for any mental element in its definition of this mode of liability.[130] As a result, an individual will be responsible for planning a crime if he acts with a purposeful will to have the designed crime committed and in the knowledge that such crime will be committed following his conduct (direct intent/dolus directus in the first degree).[131] Responsibility for planning a crime will also arise if the individual acts solely with the awareness that the material elements of the crime will occur in the ordinary course of events when implementing his plan (oblique or indirect intent/dolus directus in the second degree).[132]

Furthermore, planning a conduct with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed when implementing the said plan implies the acceptance of the commission of the crime.[133] This in turn may indicate the existence of the planner's conditional intent/dolus eventualis.[134] As seen in previous sections, this will suffice for planning liability to arise pursuant to the case law of Pre-Trial Chamber I. By contrast, it will not suffice according to the case law of Pre-Trial Chamber II.[135] In any event, no responsibility may arise for planning under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute if the individual planning the conduct is merely negligent.

Similarly to instances of ordering and instigation,[136] those planning crimes involving an ulterior intent/dolus specialis are not required to act with such intent. Only the perpetrator of the planned crime must act pursuant to the required ulterior intent/dolus specialis.

[128] Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) note 347 and para. 132.
[129] Ibid., para. 75. [130] See (n 47).
[131] Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 29; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 479; Brima et al. Appeal Judgment (n 123) para. 301; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 268; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 68; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 519; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 494. For additional expressions used to refer to this mental element, see (n 48).
[132] Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 31; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 479; Brima et al. Appeal Judgment (n 123) para. 301; Martić Appeal Judgment (n 49) note 553; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 268; Boškoski and Tarčulovski Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 68; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 519; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 494. For additional expressions used to refer to this mental element, see (n 49).
[133] Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 31 and 976; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1289 and para. 494.
[134] Badar (n 49) 329. For additional expressions used to refer to this mental element, see (n 53).
[135] See (nn 54–5). [136] See (nn 51, 111).

Pursuant to Article 30(3) of the ICC Statute, the planner must also be aware of the existence of any relevant circumstances. Accordingly, he must be aware that the perpetrator executing his plan acts with the general mental element required for the commission of the planned crime, and that he acts motivated by any ulterior intent/dolus specialis required by such crime. Article 30(3) seems also to require that the planner be aware of the fact that his conduct is a factor substantially contributing to the commission of the crime. However, as in the case of instigating, the Court has not addressed this issue yet.

23.2.3.4 Differences with ordering, instigating, and perpetration

The difference between planning and ordering lies with the fact that a position of authority is required only for ordering.[137] As a consequence, the ad hoc tribunals have considered planning to be fully encompassed by ordering where the set of facts to which the orders referred were essentially the same as those for which planning was found to have taken place.[138]

Planning and instigating differ in the content of their material elements. While the former focuses on participation in the design of the crime, the latter consists of influencing the perpetrator through activities other than being involved in the design of the crime.

With regard to the distinction between planning and perpetration, it must be highlighted that individuals are not required to participate in the implementation of their plan in order to be criminally responsible for planning. Criminal responsibility for planning arises from participating in the formulation of a criminal plan or from endorsing a plan proposed by another individual.[139] As a form of accessorial liability, planning is limited to contributions during the design of a criminal plan and consequently, using the language of the ILC, cannot be a 'decisive factor in the commission of the crimes'.[140] When those planning a crime also participate in the implementation of their plan, they will be responsible as co-perpetrators.[141] Likewise, when the plan has been designed by a single individual who implements it through an organized

[137] Kanyarukiga Appeal Judgment (n 123) para. 258.

[138] Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 386; Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 268; Dragomir Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 274.

[139] Bagilishema Trial Judgment (n 88) para. 30. See also Judgment, Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-T, TC I, ICTY, 25 June 1999, para. 61.

[140] Art 2(3)(e), commentary 14 of the Draft Code of Crimes against Peace and Security of Mankind (n 38), pointing out that the major role played by high-level government officials or military commanders who formulate a criminal plan is 'often' a decisive factor in the commission of the crimes covered by the Code. Sharing this point of view, see United States of America v Altstoetter et al., Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, Nuremberg, Washington (1949–53), Vol. III, 954–1201; Trial of Dr. Joseph Buhler, Supreme National Tribunal of Poland, United Nations War Crimes Commission, Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, Vol. XIV, 23 (1949); van Sliedregt (n 52) 80.

[141] Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 386; Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 268. See also Stakić Rule 98 bis decision (n 86) para. 104; Boas et al. (n 12) 357.

structure of power, the individual will not be a mere planner but an indirect perpetrator who uses his subordinates to commit the planned crime.[142]

Nevertheless, the ICTY has extended the scope of planning to include within it persons who not only elaborate a criminal plan, but also intervene during the execution of such plan. However, the criteria used by the ICTY to assess responsibility for planning are not entirely consistent in situations where the level of contribution is more significant during the planning of the crime than during its actual execution: whereas in some cases convictions for planning have been entered,[143] in other cases accused persons have been found responsible as co-perpetrators on the basis of the 'joint criminal enterprise' theory.[144]

A final difference between planning and perpetration lies with the fact that planning does not require that the planner acts pursuant to the ulterior intent/dolus specialis of the crime.[145] As set out previously, this is explained by the fact that planning, ordering, and instigation are forms of accessorial liability.

23.3 Aiding, Abetting, or Otherwise Assisting (Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute)

23.3.1 Introduction

Pursuant to Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute, an individual will be liable if he 'aids, abets, or otherwise assists' in the commission or attempted commission of a crime, 'including providing the means for its commission'.[146] The ICC has so far understood aiding and abetting as a mode of accessorial liability,[147] in a similar manner to the ICTY, the ICTR, and the SCSL understanding of aiding and abetting under Articles 7(1) of the ICTY Statute, 6(1) of the ICTR Statute, and 6(1) of the SCSL Statute.[148]

The terms 'aids', 'abets', 'otherwise assists', and 'providing the means' are not defined in the ICC Statute. As a consequence, the meaning of such terms must be developed by the case law of the Court. Nevertheless, to date the Court has relied on aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c) in only two cases.[149] In the Bemba and [142] For the same opinion, see K Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Volkerstrafrechts: Ansatze einer Dogmatisierung (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot 2002) 566. For an implied finding supporting the opposite point of view (responsibility for planning), see Appeal Judgment, Krnojelac, IT-97-25-A, AC, ICTY, 17 September 2003, paras 83–4.

[143] Stakić Rule 98 bis decision (n 86) paras 104–5.

[144] Appeal Judgment, Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2005, para. 97; Judgment, Krajišnik, IT-00-39-T, TC I, ICTY, 27 September 2006, para. 883; Appeal Judgment, Krajišnik, IT-00-39-A, AC, ICTY, 17 March 2009, para. 714.

[145] By contrast, an indirect perpetrator through an organized structure of power must personally fulfil all the mental elements of the crime at hand and must therefore act pursuant to the required ulterior intent/dolus specialis. See (n 118).

[146] This mode of liability is referred to in this chapter as 'aiding and abetting' because the ad hoc tribunals have dealt with both terms as a single concept. See Boas et al. (n 12) 307.

[147] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 1) para. 9978; Katanga Trial Judgment (n 1) para. 1383–5. See also Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 320.

[148] Appeal Judgment, Blagojević and Jokić, IT-02-60-A, AC, ICTY, 9 May 2007, para. 192; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 351. See also Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) paras 517 and 532.

[149] The Court has ruled on allegations of assisting the commission of crimes in other cases, but under Art 25(3)(a) of the ICC Statute. See Banda and Jerbo Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 155.

Others case, Pre-Trial Chamber II found reasonable grounds to believe that Jean-Jacques Mangenda, Fidèle Babala, and Narcisse Arido aided, abetted, or otherwise had assisted in the commission of offences against the administration of justice since early 2012, namely the coaching and bribing of Defence witnesses called before the ICC to provide false testimony, and/or the presentation of evidence that they knew was false or forged during the trial held against Jean-Pierre Bemba.[150] In turn, in the Ruto and Sang case, Trial Chamber V(a) gave notice that the legal characterization of the facts and circumstances described in the charges may be subject to change in the eventual judgment to accord with liability for aiding and abetting because, inter alia, William Ruto allegedly provided the perpetrators with food and weapons, contributed funds, and identified the targets of the attacks in Kenya in 2007–8.[151]

Moreover, in the Mbarushimana and Ruto and Sang cases, the Court highlighted the differences between aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c) and the mode of liability provided for in Article 25(3)(d) of the ICC Statute.[152]

As a result, the ICC case law interpreting aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute is very limited. Although scholars disagree as to whether the interpretation of aiding and abetting under the ICC Statute should follow the case law of the ad hoc tribunals,[153] the existing ICC case law has pointed out that the case law of the ad hoc tribunals may be of assistance for a better understanding of the material elements of aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute.[154]

23.3.2 Material elements

The ICTY, ICTR, and SCSL Appeals Chambers have stated that aiding and abetting consists of 'acts or omissions which assist, encourage and/or lend moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime'.[155] The ad hoc and hybrid tribunals have also stated [150] Bemba et al. arrest warrant decision (n 17) 4–6, paras 17–19 and 23.

[151] Ruto and Sang Regulation 55 notice decision (n 18) para. 44; Ruto and Sang Regulation 55 notice decision annex (n 18) paras 56 and 103–7.

[152] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 274, 278–81, 286, and 289; Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 354.

[153] Supporting the 'substantial' contribution requirement established by the ad hoc tribunals, see Eser (n 64) 800–1; G Werle, 'Individual Criminal Responsibility in Article 25 ICC Statute' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 953, 969; Ambos (n 84) 756 mn 21; Schabas (n 52) 434–5; Kai Ambos' Intervention in the Presentation of Evidence by the Defence, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-T-8-Red2-ENG, PTC I, ICC, 20 September 2011, 10, lines 11–16; Finnin (n 12) 146; Goy (n 11) 63–4; Dimov (n 74) 151. Against the requirement of a 'substantial' contribution, see Ambos (n 84) 757 mn 23; W Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court 4th edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 228; A Kiss, 'La contribución en la comisión de un crimen por un grupo de personas en la jurisprudencia de la Corte Penal Internacional' (2013) 2 InDret 1, 16–17.

[154] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 279, referring to Judgment, Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 10 December 1998, para. 249; Appeal Judgment, Vasiljević, IT-98-32-A, AC, ICTY, 25 February 2004, para. 102; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 48. See also Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 354; Katanga Trial Judgment (n 1) para. 1618.

[155] Appeal Judgment, Duško Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999, para. 229(iii); Appeal Judgment, Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-A, AC, ICTY, 24 March 2000, para. 162; Krnojelac Appeal Judgment (n 142) para. 33; Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) para. 102; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) paras 45–8; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 370; Appeal Judgment, Blagoje Simić, IT-95-9-A, AC, ICTY, 28 November 2006, para. 85; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 127; Appeal Judgment, that the support or assistance to the crime may be material or psychological, verbal or instrumental,[156] and close or geographically removed from the crime scene,[157] but must have a 'substantial effect' on the perpetration of the crime.[158] They have also found that the determination of the 'substantial' effect on the commission of the crime is a 'fact-based inquiry' to be made 'on a case-by-case basis in light of the evidence as a whole'.[159]

However, according to ICTY, ICTR, and SCSL case law, the conduct of the aider and abettor need not be a necessary condition for the commission of the crime by the perpetrator.[160] No causal link is required to exist between the former and the Muhimana, ICTR-95-1B-A, AC, ICTR, 21 May 2007, para. 189; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 775; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) paras 228–9; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 482; Seromba Appeal Judgment (n 111) paras 44 and 139; Appeal Judgment, Orić, IT-03-68-A, AC, ICTY, 3 July 2008, para. 43; Appeal Judgment, Muvunyi, ICTR-00-55A-A, AC, ICTY, 29 August 2008, paras 79–80; Karera Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 321; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 276–8; Appeal Judgment, Mrkšić and Šljivančanin, IT-95-13/1-A, AC, ICTY, 5 May 2009, paras 81 and 146; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 74 and 86; Appeal Judgment, Rukundo, ICTR-2001-70-A, AC, ICTR, 20 October 2010, para. 52; Appeal Judgment, Ntawukulilyayo, ICTR-05-82-A, AC, ICTR, 14 December 2011, para. 214; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 401; Appeal Judgment, Ndahimana, ICTR-01-68-A, AC, ICTR, 16 December 2013, para. 147.

[156] Furundžija Trial Judgment (n 154) para. 231; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 282.

[157] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 48; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 372; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 85; Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgment (n 97) para. 72; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 278; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 81; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 87, and note 238; Appeal Judgment, Lukić and Lukić, IT-98-32/1-A, AC, ICTY, 4 December 2012, para. 425; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) paras 370 and 480.

[158] See (n 155). See also Opinion and Judgment, Duško Tadić, IT-94-1-T, TC, ICTY, 7 May 1997, para. 688; Furundžija Trial Judgment (n 154) paras 233–5 and 249; Aleksovski Trial Judgment (n 139) para. 61; Judgment, Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-T, TC I, ICTR, 6 December 1999, para. 43; Judgment and Sentence, Musema, ICTR-96-13-T, TC I, ICTR, 27 January 2000, para. 126; Aleksovski Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 162; Appeal Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, AC, ICTY, 20 February 2001, para. 352; Judgment, Kunarac et al., IT-96-23-T & IT-96-23/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 22 February 2001, para. 391; Bagilishema Trial Judgment (n 88) para. 33; Judgment, Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, TC II, ICTY, 15 March 2002, para. 88; Judgment and Sentence, Elizaphan and Gérard Ntakirutimana, ICTR-96-10-T & ICTR-96-17-T, TC I, ICTR, 21 February 2003, para. 787; Naletilić and Martinović Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 63; Kajelijeli Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 766; Kamuhanda Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 597; Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 271; Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgment (n 144) para. 90; Gacumbitsi Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 140; Ndindabahizi Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 117; Appeal Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-A, AC, ICTY, 3 April 2007, para. 348; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 187; Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgment (n 97) para. 73; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 156; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 1170; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 533; Rukundo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 52; Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law: Terrorism, Conspiracy, Homicide, Perpetration, Cumulative Charging, Ayyash et al., STL-11-01/I/AC/R176bis, AC, STL, 16 February 2011, para. 226; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 437; Appeal Judgment, Perišić, IT-04-81-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2013, note 99; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) paras 362, 368, 385, 390, 475, 482; Appeal Judgment, Šainović et al., IT-05-87-A, AC, ICTY, 23 January 2014, para. 1649. See also A Clapham, 'On Complicity' in M Henzelin and R Roth (eds), Le droit pénal à l'épreuve de l'internationalisation (Paris: LGDJ 2002) 253; J Rikhof, 'Complicity in International Criminal Law and Canadian Refugee Law: A Comparison' (2006) 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice 702, 706; Werle (n 25) 183 and note 254; Finnin (n 12) 135–7; Diarra and D'Huart (n 2) 825; Ambos (n 51) 164–5.

[159] Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 134; Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgment (n 97) para. 75; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 86; Rukundo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 52; Ntawukulilyayo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 214; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 438; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 475.

[160] Appeal Judgment, Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-A, AC, ICTR, 1 June 2001, para. 201; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 85; Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 348; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) paras 127 and 134; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 229; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 277; Rukundo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 52; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 86; Ntawukulilyayo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 214.

latter.[161] Similarly, responsibility for aiding and abetting does not require that the aider and abettor has an effective control over the perpetrator, or that the former exercises any kind of authority or influence over the latter.[162] Consequently, responsibility for aiding and abetting also arises if the perpetrator has not been identified,[163] or if the aider and abettor's participation is unknown to the perpetrator.[164]

The ad hoc and hybrid tribunals have considered different types of contribution as sufficient to have a 'substantial effect' on the perpetration of the crimes. For instance, aiding and abetting has been found to take place where accused persons have (i) provided the weapons used to commit the crimes;[165] (ii) permitted the use of their resources, including subordinates under their command, for the commission of the crimes;[166] (iii) provided implied moral support or approval while being present at the crime scene;[167] (iv) prevented the victims from escaping the crime scene;[168] or (v) failed to prevent the commission of the crimes.[169]

According to ICTY, ICTR, and SCSL case law, the aider and abettor's participation in the crime may take place before, during, or after the crime is committed.[170] It does

[161] Kajelijeli Trial Judgment (n 83) para. 766; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 48; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 85; Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 348; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 81; Rukundo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 52; Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 158) note 98; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 480; Ndahimana Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 149.

[162] Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 195; Muhimana Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 189; Rukundo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 92. See also Brima et al. Appeal Judgment (n 123) para. 305; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 370.

[163] Appeal Judgment, Krstić, IT-98-33-A, AC, ICTY, 19 April 2004, para. 143; Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 355; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 534; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 370.

[164] Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 229(ii); Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) para. 102; Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 349; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 87. See also Brima et al. Appeal Judgment (n 123) paras 245 and 247; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 370.

[165] Tadić Trial Judgment (n 158) paras 680 and 684; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 1941; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 473–4; Ndindiliyimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 373.

[166] Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) paras 127, 131, and 134. See also Krstić Appeal Judgment (n 163) paras 137 and 144.

[167] Kayishema and Ruzindana Appeal Judgment (n 160) paras 201–2; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 47; Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) paras 273 and 277; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) paras 775, 1786, and 1940; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 230; Brima et al. Appeal Judgment (n 123) para. 245; Orić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 42; Muvunyi Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 80; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 541; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 74–5; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 425; Ndahimana Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 147. See also Boas et al. (n 12) 307–10; Finnin (n 12) 75–80.

[168] Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) paras 133–4.

[169] Akayesu Trial Judgment (n 40) paras 703–5; Mpambara Trial Judgment (n 87) para. 22. See also Furundžija Trial Judgment (n 154) paras 266–70; Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, TC II (quater), ICTY, 16 November 1998, para. 842; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 74. See also W Schabas, 'Commentary' in A Klip and G Sluiter (eds), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunal: The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia 1997–1999, vol 3 (Antwerp: Intersentia 2001) 753; Cassese (n 25) 189. Cf. Boas et al. (n 12) 310–15; Diarra and D'Huart (n 2) 826.

[170] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 48; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 372; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 85; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 127; Fofana and Kondewa Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 229; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 482; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 81; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 425. As noted by G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2000) 645, aiding and abetting after the commission of the crime is aimed at ensuring the impunity of the perpetrators of the crime or the benefits from the proceeds of the crime.

not require a previous plan or agreement with the perpetrator.[171] Hence, the assistance may even be provided after the commission of the crime on the aider and abettor's own initiative, in the absence of any prior agreement with the perpetrator.[172] The contribution may therefore be temporally[173] and geographically[174] remote from the crime.

The drafting history of Article 25 (3)(c) of the ICC Statute shows that the drafters were cautious about including ex post facto aiding and abetting into such provision, and believed that a specific provision would be necessary to criminalize such conduct.[175] No explicit provision in this regard was incorporated into the final Statute, and scholars disagree as to the meaning of the statutory silence on this point.[176] To date, the Court has not clarified this issue because it has not dealt with contributions after the fact under Article 25(3)(c).[177]

It must be highlighted that an aider and abettor may participate in a crime committed by one perpetrator or may extend his participation to all crimes committed by a group of co-perpetrators.[178] Nevertheless, in the case law of the ICTY the issue has arisen as to whether the acts carried out by the aider and abettor must be 'specifically directed' to assist the commission of the crime.

In the Tadić case, the ICTY Appeals Chamber explained the distinction between acting in pursuance of a common purpose or design to commit a crime, and aiding

[171] Tadić Trial Judgment (n 158) para. 677; Delalić et al. Trial Judgment (n 169) paras 327–8; Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 229(ii); Krnojelac Appeal Judgment (n 142) para. 33; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 534.

[172] Furundžija Trial Judgment (n 154) para. 230; Judgment, Haradinaj et al., IT-04-84-T, TC I, ICTY, 3 April 2008, para. 145.

[173] Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 229(ii); Musema Trial Judgment (n 158) para. 125; Delalić et al. Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 352; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) para. 681; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 775; Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgment (n 97) paras 72 and 75; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 278; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 480.

[174] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 48; Strugar Trial Judgment (n 26) para. 349; Orić Trial Judgment (n 73) paras 282, 285, and 681; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 372; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 85; Brima et al. Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 775; Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgment (n 97) paras 72 and 75; Sesay et al. Trial Judgment (n 25) para. 278; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 81; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 87 and note 238; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 425; Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 158) paras 39–40, and 42; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 480.

[175] Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an ICC, 'Compilation of Proposals', UN Doc A/51/22, 13 September 1996, 83; Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 'Chairman's Text on Article B. Individual criminal responsibility', UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.2/CRP.2/Add.2, 19 February 1997, 2 and note 2; Decisions Taken by the Preparatory Committee at its Session Held from 11 to 21 February 1997, Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an ICC, UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/L.5, 12 March 1997, 21 and note 9.

[176] Arguing for the exclusion of complicity after the fact, see Schabas (n 52) 435; questioning complicity after the fact on the basis of the travaux préparatoires of the ICC Statute, see Diarra and D'Huart (n 2) 826; conditioning complicity after the fact to the provision of assistance before the completion of the crime, see Ambos (n 84) 767 mn 46; conditioning complicity after the fact to the principal perpetrator's awareness that such assistance will be provided, see Finnin (n 12) 89–90; and reading contributions after the fact in Article 25(3)(c), see Eser (n 64) 807.

[177] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 286. See Dimov (n 74) 151.

[178] Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgment (n 144) para. 90. However, as concluded by the ad hoc tribunals, an aider and abettor cannot assist the very joint criminal enterprise pursuant to which the co-perpetrators commit the crimes because the latter is simply a means of committing a crime but not a crime in itself (Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgment (n 144) para. 91; Krajišnik Trial Judgment (n 144) para. 86).

and abetting the commission of a crime. Whereas participation in the former requires only to perform acts that are 'in some way directed' to the furtherance of the common plan or purpose, '[t]he aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime'.[179]

Such distinction was subsequently endorsed in the Vasiljević, Blaškić, Blagojević and Jokić, Mrkšić and Šljivančanin, and Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgments.[180] Furthermore, in the Blagojević and Jokić case, the ICTY Appeals Chamber emphasized that the reference to 'specifically directed' in Tadić was only made for the purpose of distinguishing joint criminal enterprise from aiding and abetting.[181] As a consequence, it concluded that 'specific direction' is not an essential ingredient, but only an occasional implicit part of the material elements of aiding and abetting, namely providing assistance with a substantial effect on the commission of the crime.[182] Hence, the analysis of aiding and abetting liability must focus on the level of assistance provided for the commission of the crime, and not on the degree of proximity between the aid and the crime.

By contrast, in the subsequent Perišić case, the ICTY Appeals Chamber, with Judge Liu dissenting, required as a material element of aiding and abetting that the aider and abettor provide aid 'specifically directed' to the commission of the crime by the perpetrator.[183] The Appeals Chamber concluded that explicit consideration of specific direction is required where the alleged aider and abettor is temporally or geographically remote from the crime scene,[184] particularly in cases where general assistance, which could be used for both lawful and unlawful activities, is provided. Therefore, in such cases, evidence establishing a direct link between the aid provided by an accused and the relevant crime committed by the perpetrator is necessary to enter a conviction for aiding and abetting.[185] As a result, the degree of proximity between the aid and the crime becomes a key factor for assessing aiding and abetting-liability.

In order to reach this conclusion in the Perišić case, the ICTY Appeals Chamber read the Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment as stating that specific direction is a requisite element of aiding and abetting-liability, albeit one that may at times be satisfied by an implicit analysis of the substantial contribution.[186] It also concluded that the findings of the Appeals Chamber in Mrkšić and Šljivančanin and Lukić and Lukić that specific direction is 'not an essential ingredient' of the material elements of aiding and abetting were only 'an attempt to summarise, in passing, the Blagojević and Jokić

[179] Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 229(iii) (emphasis added).

[180] Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) para. 102(i); Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 188, referring to Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 229(iii); Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 159; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 424. See also Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 45.

[181] Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 185.

[182] Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 189; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 159; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 424 ('substantial effect' of the aid provided on the crime committed suffices to establish a culpable link between the crime and the aider and abettor).

[183] Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 158) paras 36 and 41.

[184] Ibid., paras 38–40, 42.

[185] Ibid., paras 37–8 and 44 (need to establish a 'direct link' between the aid provided and the crime committed in order to demonstrate a culpable link).

[186] Ibid., para. 33.

Appeal Judgment's holding that specific direction can often be demonstrated implicitly through analysis of substantial contribution'.[187]

The position of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Perišić was not subsequently endorsed by the SCSL Appeals Chamber in the Taylor case. After finding that no customary international law analysis had been carried out in Perišić, the SCSL Appeals Chamber, on the basis of an exhaustive review of post-Second World War case law and relevant state practice, concluded that customary international law does not require 'specific direction' for responsibility to arise as an aider and abettor.[188] It also found that the reference in the ICTY Tadić Appeal Judgment to 'specific direction' did not identify the latter as a material element of aiding and abetting, but was limited to explaining the differences between aiding and abetting and joint criminal enterprise.[189]

After Taylor, the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Šainović and Others case agreed with the SCSL Appeals Chamber that 'specific direction' is not an element of aiding and abetting under customary international law.[190] Furthermore, the ICTY Appeals Chamber found that its own analysis in Perišić was based on the flawed premise that the Tadić Appeal Judgment established a precedent with respect to specific direction, and concluded that the other judgments relied upon in Perišić did not clearly establish a specific direction requirement.[191] As a result, with Judge Tuzmukhamedov dissenting, the ICTY Appeals Chamber rejected its findings in Perišić, and concluded that '"specific direction" is not an essential ingredient of the material elements of aiding and abetting'.[192] By so doing and despite subsequently refusing to apply these legal findings to the Perišić case,[193] the Appeals Chamber has brought the focus of the analysis on aiding and abetting back to the level of assistance provided for the commission of the crime.

23.3.3 Mental elements

In addition to the generally applicable intent and knowledge provided for in Article 30 of the ICC Statute, Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute expressly requires the 'purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime' by the perpetrator.[194] Accordingly, an aider and abettor under the ICC Statute must have a purposeful will to bring about the crime (direct intent/dolus directus in the first degree),[195] or at least the will to assist in

[187] Ibid., paras 34–5 and 41.
[188] Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) paras 475–7, 481, and 486.
[189] Ibid., para. 478.
[190] Šainović et al. Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 1649, referring to Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) paras 471–81.
[191] Ibid., paras 1623–5.
[192] Ibid., para. 1650.
[193] Decision on Motion for Reconsideration, Perišić, IT-04-81-A, AC, ICTY, 20 March 2014, denying a motion to reconsider filed by the Prosecutor 'based on Šainović appeals Chamber's unequivocal rejection of the Perišić appeals Chamber's articulation of the legal requirements for aiding and abetting'.
[194] Van Sliedregt (n 52) 88; Diarra and D'Huart (n 2) 827; Finnin (n 12) 180–3, 197.
[195] As stated by Ambos (n 84) 757 mn 23, '[t]his concept introduces a subjective threshold which goes beyond the ordinary mens rea requirement within the meaning of article 30'. See also Eser (n 64) 801; van Sliedregt (n 52) 93; Badar (n 60) 507; Diarra and D'Huart (n 2) 826–7; Dimov (n 74) 151. For a nuanced approach to the possible interpretation of this additional element, inferring purpose from knowledge, see Finnin (n 12) 183–4, 202. For additional expressions used to refer to this mental element, see (n 48).

the commission of the crime.[196] As a result, mere awareness that assistance in a crime will be the necessary outcome of one's conduct (oblique or indirect intent/dolus directus in the second degree) does not suffice for responsibility to arise as an aider and abettor under Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute.[197] Any other lower mental element, such as conditional intent/dolus eventualis or negligence, is not sufficient either.

In cases of crimes involving an ulterior intent/dolus specialis, it is submitted that the aider and abettor is not required to act with such ulterior intent/dolus specialis.[198] He only has to be aware that the perpetrator is driven by such intent.[199]

[196] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 274; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) paras 449 and 451. See also Presbyterian Church of Sudan v Talisman Energy Inc, 582 F.3d 244 (2nd Circuit 2009) 259; A Reggio, 'Aiding and Abetting in International Criminal Law: The Responsibility of Corporate Agents and Businessmen for "Trading with the Enemy" of Mankind' (2005) 5 International Criminal Law Review 623, 646–7; H Olásolo, 'Developments in the Distinction between Principal and Accessorial Liability in Light of the First Case Law of the International Criminal Court' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 353–4; N Farrell, 'Attributing Criminal Liability to Corporate Actors: Some Lessons from the International Tribunals', (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 873, 882; Goy (n 11) 63; Kiss (n 153) 22, 26–7. Cf. Doe VIII v Exxon Mobil Corporation, 654 F.3d 11 (DC Circuit 2011) 46–7, 50.

[197] Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 337; Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 274, 281, and 289; Concurring Opinion of Judge Van den Wyngaert to Ngudjolo Trial Judgment (n 1) para. 25. Cf. Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 229(iv); Aleksovski Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 162; Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) para. 102(ii); Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) paras 45–6 and 49–50; Appeal Judgment, Elizaphan and Gérard Ntakirutimana, ICTR-96-10-A and ICTR-96-17-A, AC, ICTR, 13 December 2004, para. 508; Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgment (n 144) para. 88; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 370; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 86; Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 484; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) paras 127 and 221; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 482; Brima et al. Appeal Judgment (n 123) paras 242–3; Seromba Appeal Judgment (n 111) para. 56; Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgment (n 97) para. 366; Orić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 43; Muvunyi Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 79; Karera Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 321; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) paras 49 and 159; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 546; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 535; Rukundo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 53; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 86; Ayyash et al. Interlocutory decision on applicable law (n 158) para. 227; Ntawukulilyayo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 222; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 440; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) paras 414, 436–8, 446, 483; Ndahimana Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 157. See also Boas et al. (n 12) 319–21. See also Ruto and Sang Regulation 55 notice decision annex (n 18) para. 116, exclusively referring to the 'awareness and knowledge' of an accused who may be found guilty under Art 25(3)(c) of the Statute. For additional expressions used to refer to this mental element, see (n 49).

[198] Krnojelac Appeal Judgment (n 142) para. 52; Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) paras 102 and 142; Krstić Appeal Judgment (n 163) paras 140–1; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 46; Ntakirutimana Appeal Judgment (n 197) paras 364 and 500–1; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 370; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) paras 86 and 101; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 127; Seromba Appeal Judgment (n 111) para. 56; Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgment (n 97) para. 367; Appeal Judgment, Haradinaj et al., IT-04-84-A, AC, ICTY, 19 July 2010, para. 58; Duch Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 535; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 458; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) note 1286; Ndahimana Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 157. See also R Dixon et al. (eds), Archbold: International Criminal Courts. Practice, Procedure and Evidence (London: Sweet & Maxwell 2003) ss 10–15; Boas et al. (n 12) 321–4; Werle (n 25) 184 mn 492; Finnin (n 12) 183–4; Goy (n 11) 63; van Sliedregt (n 2) 129–30; Ambos (n 51) 166. Cf. Badar (n 49) 341–2; Clark (n 51) 547.

[199] Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) para. 102; Krstić Appeal Judgment (n 163) paras 140–1; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 46; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 370; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 86; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 127. See also K Kittichaisaree, International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2001) 245. The ICTY and ICTR Appeals Chambers have based the distinction between aiding and abetting genocide and complicity in genocide on whether the ulterior intent/dolus specialis to commit genocide is shared or not. Complicity comprises a broader scope of conduct than aiding and abetting. However, 'complicity in genocide' requires that the assistance to commit genocidal acts be driven by the ulterior intent/dolus specialis

The intent required by Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute marks an important difference with the case law of the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals on aiding and abetting. The initial case law of the ICTY established a low mental element for aiding and abetting, namely 'aware[ness] that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed' by the perpetrator.[200] Following this interpretation, the SCSL does not require that the aider and abettor knows the specific crime committed by the perpetrator. As a result, accessorial liability arises from the awareness of the aider and abettor of the substantial likelihood that his acts will assist in the commission of a crime by the perpetrator.[201]

Nevertheless, the ICTY and ICTR case law on appeal has subsequently established that the required standard is knowledge that the conduct of the aider and abettor assists in the commission of the specific crime by the perpetrator.[202] This mental element is applicable to aiding and abetting one or more crimes, regardless of whether such crimes are committed by one or more persons.[203]

In the Perišić case the direct link required between the assistance and the crime eventually committed[204] was found to involve considerations closely related to the mental elements.[205] On the one hand, 'specific direction' was not interpreted to require that the aider and abettor share the perpetrator's intent to have the crime committed.[206] On the other hand, the element of 'specific direction' was applied in this case to require from the aider and abettor more than mere knowledge of the commission of crimes by to destroy, in whole or in part, the attacked group. Consequently, a conduct different from aiding and abetting which is part of the broader conduct of complicity may give rise to criminal responsibility only where it is motivated by a genocidal intent. See Krnojelac Appeal Judgment (n 142) para. 52; Krstić Appeal Judgment (n 163) paras 140–2; Decision on Motion for Judgment of Acquittal, Slobodan Milošević, IT-02-54-T, TC III, ICTY, 16 June 2004, paras 290–7; Ntakirutimana Appeal Judgment (n 197) paras 500–1; Judgment, Blagojević and Jokić, IT-02-60-T, TC I (Section A), ICTY, 17 January 2005, paras 678–80; Semanza Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 316; Rukundo Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 53; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 86. See also Ayyash et al. interlocutory decision on applicable law (n 158) note 343. See also Boas et al. (n 12) 324–7.

[200] Furundžija Trial Judgment (n 154) para. 246; Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 30) para. 287; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 50. See also Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 86; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 482; Karera Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 321; Šainović et al. Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 1772.

[201] Brima et al. Appeal Judgment (n 123) paras 243 and 245; Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgment (n 97) para. 366; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 546; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 438. See also Ayyash et al. interlocutory decision on applicable law (n 158) para. 227.

[202] Aleksovski Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 163; Kayishema and Ruzindana Appeal Judgment (n 160) para. 186; Krnojelac Appeal Judgment (n 142) para. 51; Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) para. 102; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) paras 45–6; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 370; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 86; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 148) para. 127; Orić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 43; Muvunyi Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 79; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 159; Haradinaj et al. Appeal Judgment (n 198) para. 58; Kalimanzira Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 86; Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 158) note 99 and para. 48; Ndahimana Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 157. See also Ndindiliyimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 317.

[203] Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgment (n 144) para. 90. [204] See (n 183).

[205] Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 48. See also Perišić Appeal Judgment—Joint Separate Opinion of Judges Theodor Meron and Carmel Agius (n 158) paras 3–4; Perišić Appeal Judgment—Opinion séparée du Juge Ramaroson sur la question de la visée spécifique dans la complicité par aide et encouragement (n 158) paras 7, 9–10.

[206] Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 48.

the perpetrator.[207] Nevertheless, in Šainović and Others the ICTY Appeals Chamber rejected its own findings in Perišić, and highlighted that only knowledge is required for aiding and abetting-liability to arise.[208] Thus, the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals do not require that the aider and abettor share the perpetrator's intent to commit the crime.[209]

Lastly, pursuant to Article 30(3) of the ICC Statute, the aider and abettor must be aware that his conduct substantially contributes to the execution of the material elements of the crime by the perpetrator.[210] It is not necessary that the aider and abettor knows the identity of the perpetrator or of the victim of the crime.[211]

23.3.4 Differences with ordering, instigating, planning, and perpetration

Aiding and abetting is different from ordering in several aspects. The material elements of aiding and abetting may be an omission proper—as opposed to an act of tacit approval or encouragement.[212] By contrast, ordering always requires a positive action.[213] Moreover, a position of authority need not be established for aiding and abetting,[214] unlike the strict requirement for ordering in this regard.[215] As a consequence, responsibility for aiding and abetting arises even if the perpetrator has not been identified, whereas at least the group or unit to which the perpetrator belongs must be determined before liability may be imposed for ordering.[216]

Aiding and abetting also differs from ordering in that the former does not require a causal link between the conduct of the accessory and the commission of the crime.[217] Apparently, on this basis, the ad hoc tribunals consider that aiding and abetting is fully encompassed by ordering where the set of facts to which the order referred were [207] Ibid., 68–9, 71. Cf. Doe I v Nestlé USA Inc (9th Cir) Order, 19 December 2013. As a result, the understanding of the mental elements of aiding and abetting in the Perišić case is the closest one in the case law of the ad hoc tribunals to the combined requirements of Articles 25(3)(c) and 30(2) of the ICC Statute.

[208] Šainović et al. Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 1649. See also Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 474 referring to para. 437. This divergent approach to the mental element of aiding and abetting appears to reflect the different understanding of the material elements of this mode of liability. See (nn 182, 185).

[209] Aleksovski Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 162; Krnojelac Appeal Judgment (n 142) para. 51; Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) para. 102(ii); Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) paras 45–6 and 49; Seromba Appeal Judgment (n 111) para. 56; Karera Appeal Judgment (n 83) para. 321; Sesay et al. judgment (n 25) para. 280; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 159; Haradinaj et al. Appeal Judgment (n 198) para. 58; Lukić and Lukić Appeal Judgment (n 157) para. 428; Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 48; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) paras 436 and 483; Ndahimana Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 157; Šainović et al. Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 1649.

[210] See Cf. Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 439.

[211] On the applicability of 'wilful blindness', see (n 60).

[212] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 29) para. 47; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) para. 370; Simić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 85 and note 259; Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 274; Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 482; Orić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 43; Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgment (n 155) paras 49, 134, and 154. Cf. G Boas, 'Omission Liability at the International Criminal Tribunals—A Case for Reform' in S Darcy and J Powderly (eds), Judicial Creativity at the International Criminal Tribunals (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 210–12, 223–4.

[213] See (n 29). [214] See (n 162). [215] See (n 23). [216] See (nn 28, 163).

[217] See (n 161).

essentially the same as those for which aiding and abetting was found to have taken place.[218]

Nevertheless, 'preparing' illegal orders subsequently issued by another person could qualify as 'aiding and abetting' under Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute, where the preparation of the illegal orders is directed to assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the commission of a crime, and has a 'substantial effect' on the perpetration thereof.[219] The transmittal or reissuance of illegal orders will be 'ordering' under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute, where such conduct adds an authoritative weight to the order or otherwise contributes to its implementation.[220]

Aiding and abetting is different from planning in that the former does not require any sort of agreement between the accessory and the perpetrator, whereas an agreement with the accessory is a requisite for planning.[221] Moreover, the perpetrator need not be identified in cases of aiding and abetting, whereas he must be sufficiently identified for planning.[222]

Lastly, aiding and abetting differs from instigating and planning, as well as from ordering, because the material elements of aiding and abetting may occur before, during, or after the crime, whereas the other modes of accessorial liability require that the conduct of the accused precede the perpetration of the crime itself.[223] Moreover, the mental elements of aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute ('purpose of facilitating the commission of such crime') are more demanding than the ones required for ordering, instigating, or planning ('awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed').[224]

Concerning the distinction between aiding and abetting and perpetration, it must be highlighted that the contribution of an aider and abettor must have a 'substantial', but not 'essential', effect on the commission of the crime.[225] As a result, in the Lubanga case the Majority of ICC Trial Chamber I found that:

> [A]rticle 25(3)(c) establishes the liability of accessories—those who aid, abet or otherwise assist in the commission or attempted commission of the crime. In the view of the Majority, principal liability 'objectively' requires a greater contribution than accessory liability. If accessories must have had 'a substantial effect on the commission of the crime' to be held liable, then co-perpetrators must have had, pursuant to a systematic reading of this provision, more than a substantial effect.[226]

With regard to the mental elements, whereas a perpetrator may be held responsible for carrying out a criminal conduct without a purposeful will to commit a crime,[227] an aider and abettor under the ICC Statute must have a purposeful will to bring about the prohibited result or the will to assist in the commission of the crime.[228] Knowledge

[218] Semanza Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 353 and 364; Kamuhanda Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 77.
[219] Finnin (n 12) 52–3. [220] See (n 39). See also Finnin (n 12) 50.
[221] See (nn 123, 171–2). Cf. Boas et al. (n 12) 371, and Goy (n 11) 58–9, who argue that conduct characterized as 'planning' can be covered by 'aiding and abetting' as envisaged in the ICC Statute.
[222] See (nn 129, 163). [223] Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 482.
[224] See (nn 53, 108, 133–4). [225] Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 1) paras 997–9.
[226] Ibid., para. 997 (footnotes omitted) (emphasis in the original). [227] See (nn 54, 57).
[228] See (nn 195–6).

that one's conduct assists in the commission of the crime is only sufficient to incur liability under Article 25(3)(d) of the ICC Statute for contributing to the commission of a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose.[229] From this point of view, the ICC Statute has apparently adopted a higher standard than the ICTY and the ICTR on the mental elements of aiding and abetting, compared with that required for perpetration.[230]

Lastly, it is important to note that the distinction under the ICC Statute between aiding and abetting and perpetration stems from the express reliance by the ICC case law on the 'control over the crime' theory to distinguish between principals and accessories.[231] By contrast, the case law of the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals applies a subjective approach to distinguish between principals and accessories.[232] As a result, the distinction between aiding and abetting and perpetration in these tribunals is based on the lower mental element required for aiding and abetting.[233]

[229] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 274 and 289, note 658. This finding suggests that unless a requisite superior–subordinate relationship exists to charge responsibility under Art 28 of the ICC Statute, Art 25(3)(d) of the ICC Statute is the only legal basis to hold an individual criminally responsible before the Court for acting merely with knowledge of the criminal intentions of the co-perpetrators.

[230] Šainović et al. Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 1648. See also Eser (n 64) 800–1; Ambos (n 84) 757 mn 23; Schabas (n 153) 228.

[231] See (n 1). See also Olásolo (n 27) 291–6, 316–30.

[232] Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 431; Sesay et al. Appeal Judgment (n 23) paras 474–5; Taylor Appeal Judgment (n 44) para. 382. This distinction between principals and accessories is mainly made considering the attitude vis-à-vis the crime of each person involved in the commission of the crime, namely the degree of intent with which the contribution to the crime is made. See Olásolo (n 27) 32–3; Olásolo (n 196) 347–51, 353, 357–8.

[233] Tadić Appeal Judgment (n 155) para. 229(iv); Vasiljević Appeal Judgment (n 154) para. 102; Krajišnik Trial Judgment (n 144) para. 885. The mental element for aiding and abetting before the ad hoc tribunals is lower than the one required for perpetration, namely 'intent to perpetrate the crime or intent to pursue the common criminal design plus foresight that those crimes outside the criminal common purpose are likely to be committed'. See also Decision on Dragoljub Ojdanić's Motion Challenging Jurisdiction—Joint Criminal Enterprise, Milutinović et al., IT-99-37-AR72, AC, ICTY, 21 May 2003, para. 20; Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) para. 365. Following this approach, before the ad hoc tribunals a person who aids and abets the commission of a crime by a group of persons involved in a 'joint criminal enterprise' (i.e. persons sharing a common purpose) becomes a co-perpetrator of the crimes committed in the execution of the common purpose only if, in addition to being aware of the fact that he is supporting the commission of said crimes with his significant but unsubstantial assistance, he shares the common purpose of the co-perpetrators (Delalić et al. Trial Judgment (n 169) para. 328; Krstić Appeal Judgment (n 163) para. 137; Blagojević and Jokić Trial Judgment (n 199) paras 712–13, 723–4; Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgment (n 144) para. 90). In turn, the co-perpetrators' will to bring about the prohibited result can be said to 'compensate' their low material contribution to the crime ('the accused must possess the requisite intent…although the contribution need not be necessary or substantial, it should at least be a significant contribution to the crimes') (Brđanin Appeal Judgment (n 158) paras 429–30; Krajišnik Appeal Judgment (n 144) paras 662 and 675. See also Đorđević Trial Judgment (n 37) para. 1863; Appeal Judgment, Gotovina and Markač, IT-06-90-A, AC, ICTY, 16 November 2012, para. 89).

23.4 Conclusions

The Court considers all forms of liability envisaged in Article 25(3)(b) and (c) of the ICC Statute (ordering, instigating, planning, and aiding and abetting) to be forms of accessorial liability.

Their common nature as accessorial forms of liability explains that the Court has found that a substantial—not essential—effect or contribution to the commission of the crime is the link required between the crime and the conduct of the person ordering, instigating, planning, or aiding and abetting such crime. Nevertheless, during its first ten years of activities the Court has also recognized relevant differences in the material and mental elements of each form of accessorial liability.

The material elements envisaged in Article 25(3)(b) and (c) of the ICC Statute are very broad and as a consequence the Court has found relevant differences in the way in which accessories may make their contribution to the commission of a crime. The most obvious difference relates to the moment of such contribution. Accessories can either issue instructions for a given course of action, prompt a particular behaviour, and/or design a conduct for the commission of a crime before such crime is committed (Article 25(3)(b)), or they can assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the commission of a crime before, during, and even after the crime has been perpetrated (Article 25(3)(c)). Less obvious differences in the material elements envisaged in Article 25(3)(b) and (c) of the ICC Statute concern the accessory's authority over the perpetrator of the crime, the degree of identification by the accessory of the perpetrators of the crime, and the degree of connection of the accessory with the perpetrator.

Regarding the required degree of authority of the accessory over the principal, the Court has found that the accessory must make use of his/her 'position of authority' over the perpetrator only in cases of liability for ordering under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute. Instigators, planners, and aiders and abettors are not required to enjoy the same degree of influence over the perpetrators to be found responsible. Similarly, the Court requires the existence of a causal link between the accessory's action and the crime committed by the perpetrator only to find liability for ordering. In cases of instigation, the Court appears to have followed the approach of the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals in demanding only that the instigator's conduct have an actual effect on the commission of the crime by the perpetrator. In cases of liability for aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute, proof of the cause–effect relationship between the accessory's contribution and the perpetration of the crime is not required.

Regarding the accessory's connection with the perpetrator, ordering requires the identification of those who perpetrated the crimes pursuant to the accessories' orders. By contrast, the Court has still not clarified whether the same degree of identification of the perpetrators is required in order to attribute liability for instigating and planning under Article 25(3)(b) of the ICC Statute, and for aiding and abetting under Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute. The practice of the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals suggests that the identification of the perpetrators is not necessary to determine liability for aiding and abetting. In a similar fashion, the Court has not yet determined whether the aider and abettor's conduct must be directly linked with the commission of the crime. Nevertheless, the most recent jurisprudence of the ad hoc and hybrid tribunals refuting the need for the aider and abettor's assistance to be specifically directed to the commission of a crime suggests that a direct link between the crime and the aider and abettor's conduct is not required.

Finally, the mental elements of ordering, instigating, planning, and aiding and abetting are the same, namely intent and knowledge as provided for in Article 30(1) of the ICC Statute. Nevertheless, during its first ten years of activities the Court has provided different interpretations of this provision, accepting and rejecting liability for conditional intent/dolus eventualis. Moreover, to date the Court has still not clarified the degree of intent required by Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute for liability to arise as an aider and abettor. It is submitted that this provision requires a high degree of intent, but it is still unsettled in the practice of the Court whether a contribution to the crime made with a degree of intent somehow lower than direct intent/dolus directus in the first degree may give rise to criminal liability as an aider and abettor.

24

The ICC and Common Purpose—What Contribution is Required under Article 25(3)(d)?

*Kai Ambos

Article 25(3)(d) of the ICC Statute has not yet been the object of much academic or jurisprudential debate,[1] but the few authors who have attempted to make sense of the provision have had serious problems in doing so and have therefore fiercely criticized it.[2] This chapter will not deal with all the possible aspects and problems but will rather focus, after some general preliminary remarks, on the quality or nature of the contribution required by Article 25(3)(d). Some other issues of the provision are only dealt with insofar as they relate to the contribution issue.

24.1 Preliminary Remarks: Key Features of Article 25(3)(d) and Necessary Delimitations

Article 25(3)(d) constitutes an almost verbatim copy of a provision of a 1997 anti-terrorism convention[3] and stands, as to its normative approach, unprecedented in international criminal law as well as in customary international law.[4] It represents a compromise that tries to combine the strong opposition of state delegations to any

* Kai Ambos is Chair of Criminal Law, Criminal Procedure, Comparative Law, and International Criminal Law at the Georg-August-Universität Göttingen, and judge at the Landgericht (District Court) of Göttingen, currently delegated to the Oberlandesgericht (Appeals Court) of Braunschweig, Germany. He wishes to express his gratitude to Stephanie Kern for her invaluable research assistance.

[1] See for references to the relevant case law the following text and A Kiss, 'La contribución en la comisión de un crimen por un grupo de personas en la jurisprudencia de la Corte penal Internacional' (2013) 2 InDret 1, 3–4. For a summary of ICL jurisprudence with regard to cover-ups and concealment of crimes, including recent decisions of the ICC concerned with that question and the legal nature of such behaviour, see M Kearney, 'Any Other Contribution? Ascribing Liability for Cover-Ups of International Crimes' (2013) 24 Criminal Law Forum 331.

[2] Perhaps the most radical critique has been voiced by J Ohlin, 'Joint Criminal Confusion' (2009) 12 New Criminal Law Review 406 arguing that it is 'nearly impossible to devise a holistic interpretation' of the provision and that therefore it should be revised, at 406, 408, and 410. Critically also A Eser, 'Individual Criminal Responsibility' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 803; C Burchard, 'Ancillary and Neutral Business Contributions to "Corporate-Political Crime"' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 919, 942.

[3] Art 2(3)(c) of the International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, UN Doc A/RES/52/164 (1997), (adopted 15 December 1997, entered into force 23 May 2001) 2149 UNTS 256. See Eser (n 2) 802; see also K Ambos, 'Article 25' in O Triffterer and K Ambos (eds), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 3rd edn (München: C H Beck 2015) margin no (mn) 28.

[4] G Werle and F Jessberger, Principles of International Criminal Law 3rd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2014) 196, 219; G Werle, Völkerstrafrecht 3rd edn (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck 2012) 242.

form of anticipated or organizational/collective liability with the need to have a form of individual participation in collective criminal enterprises, which is in line with the principles of legality and culpability.[5]

Taking into account the history and wording of the provision, subparagraph (d) encompasses neither any form of conspiracy nor membership liability. As to conspiracy, contrary to its antecedent provisions in the 1991 and 1996 Draft Codes of the ILC, subparagraph (d) now clearly requires direct participation in, at the very least, the (attempted) commission of a crime that falls under the ICC's jurisdiction.[6] Thus, from a simple literal interpretation, it becomes clear that subparagraph (d) does not include any form of anticipated liability, i.e. liability that, as in the classical case of conspiracy, is based on the mere agreement to commit a crime (the 'meeting of minds'), independent of its eventual execution.[7]

As to criminal responsibility for mere membership in a criminal or terrorist organization, the wording of subparagraph (d) even more clearly shows that the provision does not encompass this form of criminal responsibility, but, quite to the contrary, requires a concrete contribution to the (attempted) execution of a crime. Indeed, the drafters of the Statute clearly opted for a model of individual responsibility, ie a model of imputation where the individual contribution to a criminal result is the indispensable prerequisite for any kind of criminal liability. In fact, the exemplary historic provision contained in Article 10 of the Statute of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg (IMT),[8] which criminalized members of the SS and other Nazi entities (declared criminal by the IMT), was neither based in (historic) customary law, nor did it plant a seed for the later development of any such customary norm.[9] For this very reason Article 10 was not used as a basis for criminal responsibility by the drafters of the ICC Statute.[10] While national law[11] typically provides for this type of

[5] See generally on these principles in ICL: K Ambos, Treatise of International Criminal Law. Volume I: Foundations and General Part (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 87ff.

[6] This clearly follows from the travaux préparatoires, see P Saland, 'International Criminal Law Principles' in R Lee (ed.), The ICC, The Making of the Rome Statute, Issues, Negotiations, Results (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 199ff. Swedish Diplomat Per Saland was chairman of Working Group 3 on General Principles during the Rome Conference; this author was a member of this working group as part of the German delegation.

[7] See Eser (n 2) 802; Ambos (n 3) mn 28; Werle and Jessberger (n 4) 263.

[8] Statute of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg (reprinted in (1945) 39 American Journal of International Law Sup 259). Art 10 reads: 'In cases where a group or organization is declared criminal by the Tribunal, the competent national authority of any Signatory shall have the right to bring individuals to trial for membership therein before national, military or occupation courts. In any such case the criminal nature of the group or organization is considered proved and shall not be questioned' (emphasis added). The Statute of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East (reprinted in N Boister and R Cryer (eds), Documents on the Tokyo International Military Tribunal: Charter, Indictment and Judgments (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 7–11) did not contain such a provision.

[9] See K Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts 2nd edn (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot 2004) 103; A Cassese, International Criminal Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 34.

[10] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[11] See e.g. Art 278 Austrian Penal Code; ss 129, 129a German Penal Code (Strafgesetzbuch); s 11 UK Terrorism Act; Art 416 Italian Codice Penale ('Quando tre o più persone si associano allo scopo di commettere più delitti, coloro che promuovono o costituiscono od organizzano l'associazione sono puniti, per ciò solo, con la reclusione da tre a sette anni.Per il solo fatto di partecipare all'associazione, la pena è della reclusione da uno a cinque anni'); Art 68(a) Botswana Penal Code ('Any person who is a member of an unlawful society is guilty of an offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding membership liability, modern ICL, as demonstrated in the ICC Statute, does not do so out of respect for the principle of culpability. It follows from a literal interpretation of Article 25(3)(d) that any 'person' (para 3) who contributes to a group crime incurs criminal responsibility. This person need not be a member of the group, nor does membership preclude criminal liability. Thus, both members and non-members of the respective group may incur criminal responsibility if they perform the relevant contribution and the other requirements are met.[12]

Joint criminal enterprise (JCE) liability can only be compared to subparagraph (d) with regard to its common purpose element—the Lubanga Pre-Trial Chamber (PTC) and the Katanga Trial Chamber (TC) are right in this regard[13]—but subparagraph (d) does not constitute a fully fledged common purpose liability[14] giving prevalence to the collective element (common purpose) over the individual one (individual contribution).[15] In fact, as said before, a concrete individual contribution is required, and therefore subparagraph (d) constitutes a form of assistance to a group crime.[16] Apart from that, the subjective requirements of JCE, especially its extended form of JCE III, are also different from subparagraph (d).[17]

seven years'); and Art 288 Brazilian Penal Code ('Associarem-se mais de três pessoas, em quadrilha ou bando, para o fim de cometer crimes: Pena—reclusão, de um a três anos'; see for the dominant interpretation L Prado, Curso de Direito Penal Brasileiro, vol. 3, Parte Especial, Arts 250 a 359-H, 6th edn (São Paolo: Revista dos Tribunais 2010) 189–90: 'Não é necessário que a quadrilha ou bando tenha cometido algum delito para que o delito se concretise; pune-se o simples fato de se figurar como integrante da associação'; see also Art 2 of the recent Brazilian Law No 12.850 of 2 August 2013.

[12] See also Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011 ('Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision') paras 272–5; Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014 ('Katanga Trial Judgment') para. 1631 ('…que l'accusé appartienne au groupe…ne constitue pas un élément determinant…'); for the same result with a good discussion Ohlin (n 2) 410–16; also Kiss (n 1) 26ff (focusing on a literal interpretation); previously Ambos (n 5) 168.

[13] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007 ('Lubanga Confirmation Decision') para. 335: '…closely akin to the concept of joint criminal enterprise or the common purpose doctrine adopted by the jurisprudence of the ICTY…'; Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1625 (referring to the criteria developed by the ICTY, in particular with regard to the identical 'common purpose' element). On the structural similarity see also Ohlin (n 2) 408–9 ('alternative theories for establishing complicity in collective criminality').

[14] As wrongly suggested by the Mbarushimana Prosecution, cf. Ms Solano, Transcript, ICC-01/04-01/10-T-7- Red-ENG WT 19-09-2011 1-86 NB PT, 42 line 12; see also ibid., 33 line 18 and 35 line 11 to 38 line 15. See also A Heyer, Grund und Grenze der Beihilfestrafbarkeit im Völkerstrafrecht (Köln: Institute for International Peace and Security Law 2013) 452, 513 convincingly explaining that while the common purpose of subparagraph (d) refers to the collective act (Gesamttat) to be implemented by the group, the JCE's common purpose refers to the common aim of the persons who are part of the criminal enterprise.

[15] For the same result Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1619 arguing that under Art 25(3)(d) the accused is only responsible for the crimes he contributed to ('…uniquement des crimes à la commission desquels il aura contribute.'), not for all crimes forming part of the JCE.

[16] Cf. Ambos (n 3) mn 49–50; conc L Yaneva and T Kooijmans, 'Divided Minds in the Lubanga Trial Judgement: A Case against the Joint control theory' (2013) 13 International Criminal Law Review 789, at 802; Werle and Jessberger (n 4) 205.

[17] For a discussion see K Ambos, 'Joint Criminal Enterprise and Command Responsibility' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 159, 173; id. (n 5) 172–4; Ohlin (n 2) 414–15 also seems to agree that JCE is not covered by subparagraph (d). See also Heyer (n 14) 125ff.

Let us conclude these preliminary remarks with some reflections on the essential factors of delimitation between subparagraph (d) and subparagraphs (a) and (c). As to subparagraph (a), the relevant form of perpetration constitutes co-perpetration. To this end, the necessary objective threshold makes the difference: while co-perpetration requires (joint) control over the crime, resulting in the ability to frustrate its commission by omitting one's contribution,[18] subparagraph (d) does not set such a distinguished high objective standard, but rather serves as a residual mode of (accomplice) liability in which the participant's influence is regarded insufficient to frustrate the crime's commission.[19]

As to ordinary complicity pursuant to subparagraph (c), things are more complicated. The most obvious difference between these forms of accessory liability lies on the subjective level, because subparagraph (c) demands the contribution to be made with the 'purpose of facilitating' the commission of a crime, i.e. more is required than general intent, as in subparagraph (d).[20] On the objective level, subparagraph (d)'s

[18] For more details see Ambos (n 5) 150ff.; in the same vein Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06 A 5, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014, para. 7, 434 ff. The underlying control theory has, however, recently come under fire, for an excellent nuanced critique see J Ohlin et al., 'Assessing the control theory' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law 725 (arguing with regard to co-perpetration in favour of a mixed objective–subjective approach taking into account several factors, at 730–4); less convincing Yaneva and Kooijmans (n 16) 789ff (ultimately advocating a subjective—common intent—approach, at 827). In any case, the control theory can be considered as settled case law after its recent confirmation by the majority in Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1382, 1393 ff (Minority Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436-AnxI, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014, paras 279–81) and the Lubanga Appeals Chamber, op. cit., para. 469. The majority in Katanga argues, at paras 1393–5, that this theory, being objective and subjective at the same time, constitutes the 'seul critère…pour permettre de distinguer entre les auteurs d'un crime et les complices', fits best to Art 25(3) ('le plus conforme à l'article 25') and makes a distinction between the different forms of participation possible ('rendre opérationnelle la distinction entre les auteurs d'un crime et les complices'); for this reason the Chamber decides to retain this theory (para. 1382 ['…il n'y a pas lieu de s'écarter de l'interprétation…fondée sur la théorie du contrôle sur le crime.'], para. 1396 ['…entend donc retenir le critère du contrôle']). The Chamber then applies this theory to define perpetrators ('auteurs') as persons 'qui ont un contrôle sur la commission dudit crime et qui ont connaissance des circonstances de fait leur permettant d'exercer ce contrôle' (para. 1396) and the indirect perpetrator ('auteur indirect') as 'celui qui a le pouvoir de décider si et comment le crime sera commis dans la mesure où c'est lui qui en détermine la perpétration' (ibid., emphasis in the original, fn omitted) while the accomplice ('complice') 'n'exerce pas un tel contrôle' (ibid.). The Lubanga Appeals Chamber discusses the control theory in the context of co-perpetration (para. 434 ff) and considers it a convincing theory to delimitate perpetration and secondary participation (para. 469); it dismisses the domestic analogy argument first advanced by Judge Fulford as being beside the point, since the Chamber only applies and interprets Art 25(3)(a) and in doing so does not act 'in a vacuum, but…needs to be aware of and can relate to concepts and ideas found in domestic jurisdictions' (para. 470).

[19] For this correct view see Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 13) para. 337; see also thereafter Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012 ('Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision') para. 354 (with respect to Joshua Arap Sang; in the same vein Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1618 ('complicité résiduel'), 1633 ('…crime ne doit pas nécessairement dépendre de cette contribution ni même être conditionnée par celle-ci.').

[20] See H Vest, 'Business Leaders and the Modes of Individual Criminal Responsibility under International Law' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 851, who (also) refers to subparagraph (d) as a 'rescue clause' with respect to subparagraph (c). See also Lubanga Confirmation Decision (n 13) para. 337 and Ambos (n 3) mn 33–34 and 49–50; Werle and Jessberger (n 4) 220.

reference to 'a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose', i.e. the already mentioned collective (group) common purpose element, marks its difference from subparagraph (c)'s exclusively individual focus.[21] Indeed, it is fair to say that while subparagraph (c) criminalizes individual assistance to single acts, subparagraph (d) covers the individual assistance to a collective crime in the sense of a Gesamttat (collective or global act, hecho global).[22] This led the ICTY to state in Furundzija that these provisions confirm the distinction between aiding and abetting a crime and participation in a common criminal plan as 'two separate categories of liability for criminal participation'.[23] This, of course, begs the question of whether the individual contribution as such, which is required in both provisions, is to be understood identically. This brings us to the focus of this chapter: subparagraph (d) requires at least a contribution ('contributes') to a collective (attempted) commission of a crime.[24] Further, this contribution has to be 'intentional'. Thus, a two-fold objective–subjective nexus must connect the alleged contribution to the alleged criminal results. But what kind of objective contribution is required, exactly?[25]

24.2 The Key Issue: What Objective Contribution is Required?

As to the definition of a 'contribution' within the meaning of subparagraph (d), two questions must be distinguished. First, the question of the factual nature of this contribution with regard to its relevance/impact on the main crime, and, second, the question of its legal nature (its lawfulness or unlawfulness). Each of these questions will be discussed separately because they must be distinguished for methodological reasons.

[21] It is controversial whether the common purpose of the group may also be per se lawful but the group uses criminal means to achieve it (in this vein Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1627 ['groupe ne doit pas non plus poursuivre un objectif uniquement criminel pas plus qu'il n'est exigé que son objectif final soit criminel']) or whether the common purpose must be exclusively or at least predominantly criminal (in this vein Van den Wyngaert (n 18) para. 286 ['criminal component…inherent part of the common plan']). This reminds us of a similar discussion with regard to the 'common plan' element in Art 25(3)(a) alternative 2, cf. Ambos (n 5) 152.

[22] In the same vein Cassese (n 9) 213; see also recently Heyer (n 14) 451, 453 (who considers this collective act as an objective condition of punishability); for the same result Yaneva and Kooijmans (n 16) at 802.

[23] Judgment, Furundzija, IT-95-17/1-T, TC, ICTY, 10 December 1998, paras 216, 249.

[24] Pursuant to a literal reading of subparagraph (d), the contribution goes to the (attempted) commission, not directly to the crime (ambiguously Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 12) para. 285: 'contribution to the crimes committed or attempted'; inconsistent Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12), on the one hand referring to the commission [e.g. para. 1632], on the other, directly to the crime [e.g. para. 1635]). As a consequence, there need not be a direct causal relationship between the contribution and the crime (cf. Kiss (n 1) 14, 31).

[25] On the further (subjective) requirements of Art 25(3)(d) see Ambos (n 5) 168–9 and now Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1637ff. If one argues that the required intent only refers to the act of contributing as such, but not to the commission of the crime, this (attempted) crime is turned into an objective condition of punishability ('objektive Bedingung der Strafbarkeit') which need not be the object of the mental element (cf. Burchard (n 2) 943). Crit Heyer (n 14) 123 who, however, as already stated (n 22), qualifies the collective crime (Gesamttat) itself as such an objective condition (452).

24.2.1 The factual nature of the contribution

The factual nature of the contribution has been the object of controversy in the recent case law. The Mbarushimana PTC I thoroughly dealt with subparagraph (d) as the first Chamber of the ICC,[26] and compared subparagraph (d) to the—structurally similar—JCE liability. While admitting that these modes of liability are not identical, the fact that both focus on group criminality was considered sufficient by the Chamber to apply the 'JCE significance standard' to subparagraph (d).[27] The Chamber thus argued that the contribution 'cannot be just any contribution' and employs the 'significance' standard as a minimum threshold 'below which responsibility . . . does not arise'.[28] As a result, the contribution must 'be at least significant'.[29] As to the concrete assessment of a contribution as 'significant', the PTC proposed a case-by-case analysis of the person's conduct in the given context taking into account several factors.[30] In casu, PTC I—with Judge Monageng dissenting[31]—held that the defendant's actions, performed essentially as the FDLR[32] secretary general issuing press releases and directing media campaigns from France, did not amount to significant contributions to the alleged FDLR crimes in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC)[33].

The Katanga TC essentially adopted the same approach as the Mbarushimana PTC. It also requires a 'contribution significative' to be analysed 'crime para crime'[34] and on a case-by-case basis.[35] A contribution is 'significant' if it influences the commission of the crime as to its occurrence and way of commission,[36] but the crime must not depend on the contribution or be conditioned by it.[37] The contribution may assist the perpetrators or other participants in an objective or subjective sense.[38] However, there need neither be a 'direct link' between the accomplice's conduct (contribution) and

[26] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 12) paras 268 ff. [27] Ibid., paras 280–2.

[28] Ibid., para. 283. On this standard with regard to JCE recently R DeFalco 'Contextualizing Actus Reus under Article 25(3)(d) of the ICC Statute' (2013) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 715, 718 ff (unclearly speaking of an 'inherently contextual nature of the word "significant" ', 721).

[29] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 12) para. 285: 'person must make a significant contribution'.

[30] Ibid., para. 284: '(i) the sustained nature of the participation after acquiring knowledge of the criminality of the group's common purpose, (ii) any efforts made to prevent criminal activity or to impede the efficient functioning of the group's crimes, (iii) whether the person creates or merely executes the criminal plan, (iv) the position of the suspect in the group or relative to the group and (v) perhaps most importantly, the role the suspect played vis-à-vis the seriousness and scope of the crimes committed'.

[31] Ibid., Dissenting Opinion of Judge Sanji Mmasenono Monageng, paras 39ff (arguing that the crimes committed by the FDLR soldiers can be imputed to the leadership circle, including Mbarushimana, paras 56 ff, 65 ff, who contributed to the soldiers' crimes 'by encouraging them to stay in their ranks, continue the military efforts and remain faithful to the FDLR's goal', paras 101, 134–5).

[32] Forces Démocratiques de la Libération du Rwanda.

[33] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 12) paras 303, 315, 320, 339.

[34] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1632. [35] Ibid., para. 1634.

[36] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1632 ('de nature à influer sur la commission du crime') and 1633 ('influé soit sur la survenance du crime soit sur la manière dont il a été commis, soit sur les deux').

[37] Ibid., para. 1633 ('ne doit pas nécessairement dépendre de cette contribution ni même être conditionnée par celle-ci').

[38] Ibid., para. 1635 ('apportée à une personne qui soit ou non auteur du crime', 'reliée soit aux éléments matériels des crimes . . . soit à leurs éléments subjectifs.').

the conduct of the physical perpetrators of the (main) crime[39] nor a spatial proximity between the accomplice and the crime.[40]

Thus, in essence, both the Mbarushimana PTC and the Katanga TC, driven by a liberal, culpability-based approach, try to avoid an overly broad interpretation of the contribution requirement. However, it remains unclear whether this puts such a requirement on an equal footing with the substantial contribution requirement of subparagraph (c). On the one hand, the Mbarushimana PTC states with regard to subparagraphs (b) and (c) 'that a substantial contribution to the crime may be contemplated';[41] on the other, it implicitly suggests that the significance standard is lower than the substantiality one.[42]

In contrast, the Kenya PTC II, with regard to defendant Joshua Arap Sang, explicitly held that 'subparagraph (d) is satisfied by a less than "substantial" contribution'.[43] It justifies this interpretation with the residual, 'catch all' character of subparagraph (d) and the wording '[i]n any other way'.[44] In casu, the Chamber confirmed the charges against Sang for his alleged broadcasting of hate messages and false news via Kass FM, a regional radio station, which inflamed the violent atmosphere.[45]

The majority of the Appeals Chamber rejected the Prosecution Appeal against the non-confirmation, but said nothing on the nature of the contribution, adducing procedural reasons.[46] Yet, in a Separate Opinion, Argentinean Judge Fernández de Gurmendi took issue with the significance standard, arguing that it made a difference with regard to the additional evidence to be brought by the prosecutor under Article 61(8) of the Statute.[47] As to the issue at hand, she argued that the wording 'in any other way' entails that 'there should not be a minimum threshold or level of contribution'.[48] In contrast, the PTC's reference to the gravity threshold of Article 17(1)(d) was misplaced since this aspect is only relevant in connection with the admissibility procedure;[49] similarly, the JCE comparison is irrelevant since it has no basis in the ICC Statute.[50] Finally, the judge did not see the addition of the qualifier 'significant' as providing a solution to the problems posed by the so-called neutral contributions, ie the ones which could be made by every landlord, grocer, utility provider,

[39] Ibid, para. 1635 ('il n'est pas nécessaire d'établir un lien direct entre le comportement du complice et celui de l'auteur matériel').

[40] Ibid., para. 1636 ('proximité avec le crime n'est pas un critère pertinent').

[41] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 12) para. 279.

[42] Ibid., para. 282 (discussing JCE and stating that it requires 'a lower threshold of contribution than aiding and abetting').

[43] Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 19) paras 350 ff, at 354 (quoting this author in n 560 in support of this restrictive view held in O Triffterer (ed, Commentary on the Rome Statute of the ICC 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) mn 25).

[44] Ibid., para. 354. [45] Ibid., para. 355.

[46] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 16 December 2011 entitled 'Decision on the confirmation of charges', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-514, AC, ICC, 30 May 2012, paras 65–9 (arguing that even if the PTC erred with regard to the significance of the contribution, this would not have materially affected the decision, as the PTC found that the group element of Art 25(3)(d) was lacking and that Mr Mbarushimana did not contribute at all to the alleged crimes, and that therefore addressing the merits would lead to 'a purely academic discussion').

[47] Ibid., Separate Opinion of Judge Silvia Fernández de Gurmendi, paras 5–15, at 5.

[48] Ibid., paras 8–9. [49] Ibid., para. 10; see also Kiss (n 1) 15–16.

[50] Ibid., para. 14; in a similar vein Kiss (n 1) 18.

secretary, janitor, or even every taxpayer who all, in one way or another, may causally contribute to a group crime.[51] We will return to this issue later.

Summing up this case law, there is neither agreement as to the hierarchical relationship between the forms of participation in Article 25(3), including in relation to subparagraphs (c) and (d),[52] nor as to the quantum or degree of the contribution required in subparagraph (d). As to the latter issue we have, arguably, three possibilities: a substantial contribution within the meaning of subparagraph (c), a 'significant' contribution, or a less than substantial/significant contribution.[53] These three possibilities are, however, predicated on two assumptions that need further attention. First, it is assumed that ordinary assistance within the meaning of subparagraph (c) requires a 'substantial' contribution.[54] This sounds plausible since the principles of culpability and ultima ratio (de minimis criminal law intervention)[55] demand a minimum threshold to be surpassed in order for the behaviour to incur international criminal responsibility.[56] Such an interpretation also follows from an analysis of the ILC drafts and of the consolidated jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals, which have defined aiding and abetting by way of the substantial standard. Accordingly, a contribution is considered substantial 'if the criminal act most probably would not have occurred in the same way had not someone acted in the role that the suspect in fact assumed'.[57]

The second assumption concerns the meaning of the significance standard and, therefore, goes to the core of our issue. Interestingly, the relevant case law does not speak to the relationship between 'substantial' and 'significant', apart from assigning, in a somewhat stereotypical fashion, the former to the contribution in aiding and abetting and the latter to the contribution in a JCE.[58] As noted, the Mbarushimana

[51] Ibid., paras 11–12.

[52] In favour of a hierarchy: Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, paras 996 ff; Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 12) para. 279; Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 19) para. 354; in the same vein Werle and Jessberger (n 4) 196–7; Kiss (n 1) 16; contra Lubanga, ibid., Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, paras 8 ff; Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-4, TC II, ICC, 19 December 2012, paras 22 ff; Katanga Trial Judgment (n 12) para. 1386 with fn 3185 (distinguishing between the recognition of different forms of participation in Art 25(3) and a value and blame based hierarchy between these forms which is to be rejected for the lack of the assignation of differing sentences: 'la distinction proposée entre la responsabilité de l'auteur du crime et celle du complice ne constitue en aucun cas une "hiérarchie de culpabilité" pas plus qu'elle n'édicte, même implicitement, une échelle des peines.' [fn omitted]); crit also Ohlin et al. (n 18) 740 ff. See generally on the structure of Art 25(3) Ambos (n 5) 145 ff.

[53] This latter position would do without any qualifier for the contribution and would have to extract a minimum threshold from the term 'contribution' itself, in this vein Kiss (n 1) 15 ff.

[54] See previously Ambos (n 3) mn 21–22; see also W Schabas, The International Criminal Court. A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 434 ff.

[55] On the ultima ratio principle as a limitation to the criminalization of 'ancillary and neutral' business contributions to core crimes Burchard (n 2) 933–4.

[56] This is, of course, controversial because, arguably, the ultima ratio principle does not affect the threshold of wrongfulness and thus the minimum threshold for the contribution but only may have an impact on the final sentence.

[57] Opinion and Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-T, TC, ICTY, 7 May 1997, para. 688; for further case law see Ambos (n 5) 128 ff.

[58] See only Judgment, Vasiljević, IT-98-32-A, AC, ICTY, 25 February 2004, para. 102; Judgment, Gotovina and Markač, IT-06-90-A, AC, ICTY, 16 November 2012, para. 149; Judgment, Stanišić and Simatović, IT-03-69-T, TC I, ICTY, 30 May 2013, paras 1258, 1261; Judgment, Simba, ICTR-01-76-A, AC,

PTC only implicitly suggests that 'significant' requires a lesser contribution than 'substantial' when referring to the former in relation to JCE by stating that it requires 'a lower threshold of contribution than aiding and abetting'.[59] But, is there a relevant difference between the two standards at all? In fact, instead of elaborating on the alleged difference, the ILC and the case law of the ad hoc Tribunals have continuously invoked the significant qualifier to define the substantial standard. Thus, Article 2(3)(d) of the ILC Draft Code of 1996 requires (with regard to 'aiding and abetting') that any contribution be 'direct and substantial'; further, it is stated that the respective contribution should facilitate the commission of a crime in 'some significant way'.[60] The ICTY adopted these same criteria in Tadić,[61] and in several decisions the Tribunal has used the term 'significant' to define the term 'substantial'.[62] The ICTR has taken the same approach.[63] Finally, while the Katanga TC does not explicitly refer to the substantial qualifier, its definition of 'significant' as having an influence on the commission of the crime is not substantially different from the 'substantial' standard of the case law.[64]

Against this background it is fair to assume that there is no difference—or at least no substantial (!) difference—between the substantial and significant standards. What is clear from the case law, however, is that minimal contributions—called 'infinitesimal' by the Mbarushimana PTC[65]—should be exempted from criminal responsibility notwithstanding their possible subsumption under subparagraph (c) or (d). Even Judge Fernández de Gurmendi, while rejecting the significance standard, does not want to therefore subsume any contribution—however minimal it may be—under subparagraph (d). Indeed, she does not ignore the issue of 'infinitesimal' contributions but wants to address it as a (normative) problem of the legal nature of the contribution, i.e. 'by analysing the normative and causal links between the contribution and the crime'.[66] We will return to this

ICTR, 27 November 2007, para. 303; Judgment, Zigiranyirazo, ICTR-01-73-T, TC III, ICTR, 18 December 2008, para. 383; Judgment, Mpambara, ICTR-01-65-T, TC I, ICTR, 11 September 2006, para. 17.

[59] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision, as quoted in n 42.

[60] ILC, 1996 Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, Yearbook of the International Law Commission 1996, vol. 2 (pt 2), 24 (para. 10).

[61] See (n 57).

[62] See e.g. Furundzija judgment (n 23) paras 217 ff, 233–4 ('The suggestion made in the … cases is … that the acts of the accomplice make a significant difference…' [233]; 'The position under customary international law seems therefore to be … that the assistance must have a substantial effect' [234] [emphases added]); Judgment, Blagojević & Jokić, IT-02-60-A, AC, ICTY, 9 May 2007, paras 195, 199; Judgment, Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-T, TC, ICTY, paras 61, 65; Judgment, Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, TC II, ICTY, 15 March 2002, paras 88–9; Judgment, Vasiljević, IT-98-32-T, TC II, ICTY, 29 November 2002, para. 70.

[63] Judgment, Seromba, ICTR-2001-66-I, TC, ICTR, 13 December 2006, paras 307–8 (regarding the approving spectator); in the same vein Judgment and Sentence, Bisengimana, ICTR 00-60-T, TC II, ICTR, 13 April 2006, paras 33–4. With regard to the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) see Judgment, Sesay et al., SCSL-04-15-T, TC I, SCSL, 2 March 2009, paras 268, 2115; but see also Judgment, Sesay et al., SCSL-04-15-A, AC, SCSL, 26 October 2009, paras 687–8 ('An accused's "significant" contribution may denote a lesser degree of impact on the crime than "substantial" contribution', 688, footnote omitted).

[64] Compare with the definition given supra in the main text corresponding to (n 57).

[65] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 12) para. 277: 'Without some threshold level of assistance, every landlord, every grocer, every utility provider, every secretary, every janitor or even every taxpayer who does anything which contributes to a group committing international crimes could satisfy the elements of 25(3)(d) liability for their infinitesimal contribution to the crimes committed.'

[66] Mbarushimana (n 46), Separate Opinion of Judge Silvia Fernández de Gurmendi, para. 12; in the same vein Kiss (n 1) 19 ('establecer si existe un vinculo normativo entre la conducta y el resultado que permita verificar la tipicidad de la contribución'). DeFalco (n 28) 728 ff fails to understand the

point later. Thus, the only remaining question is whether there should be a difference between subparagraphs (c) and (d) with regard to the quantum of the contribution or whether they should be treated equally. More concretely speaking, if for subparagraph (c) a 'substantial'—or for that matter 'significant'—contribution is required (which, as I said before, seems to be beyond any reasonable doubt), should this standard then also apply to subparagraph (d), leaving to one side the other differences between these two subparagraphs, especially with regard to the subjective requirements, or should something less than substantial/significant be required?

I am, of course, aware that my earlier view that the expression 'in any other way' displays the lowest objective threshold within the different modes of attribution of Article 25[67] implies a lower threshold for subparagraph (d) and has indeed been interpreted in this sense.[68] Upon further reflection I must, however, confess that I fail to see a normatively convincing reason to continue to defend this view.[69] Specifically, I am no longer convinced that such a distinction can be based on the expression 'in any other way' in subparagraph (d) for the simple fact that subparagraph (c) uses similar and essentially identical language ('otherwise assists'), with the Spanish version practically using identical wording ('algún modo' v 'algún otro modo').[70] Apart from that, it can be plausibly argued, as did the Ruto defence, that the term 'any' only refers to the type, but not to the degree of the contribution.[71] I am equally unconvinced that the difference can be derived predominantly normative nature of the criterion proposed by Fernández de Gurmendi when he states that it appears 'substantially the same' as the significance standard. The distinction can only be captured by distinguishing between the factual and legal nature of the contribution as proposed here. Also, while it is correct to argue that neither approach is 'textually warranted' by subparagraph (d) (DeFalco, 733), this does not answer the substantial question regarding the nature of the contribution but only shows that a mere textual interpretation of criminal law norms rarely yields normatively convincing results (see previously my critique on Judge Fulford's dissenting opinion in the Lubanga Trial Judgment: K Ambos, 'The First Judgment of the ICC (Prosecutor v Lubanga): A Comprehensive Analysis of the Legal Issues' (2012) 12 International Criminal Law Review 115, 143–4).

[67] Ambos (n 43) mn 25.

[68] See Ruto et al. Confirmation Decision (n 19). See in the same vein Eser (n 2) 802 ff; H Satzger, Internationales und Europäisches Strafrecht 6th edn (Baden-Baden: Nomos 2013) para. 15 mn 63; E van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (The Hague: T M C Asser Press 2003) 107; Werle and Jessberger (n 4) 219 and Werle (n 4) 242 calling it the 'least grave' mode of liability. Also S Manacorda and C Meloni, 'Indirect Perpetration Versus Joint Criminal Enterprise—Concurring Approaches in the Practice of International Criminal Law?' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 159, 176 refer to the 'lowest degree of responsibility'.

[69] For a similar view H Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher Verfolgen: ein abgestuftes Mehrebenenmodell systemischer Tatherrschaft (Bern: Stämpfli and others 2011) 349, who argues that subparagraph (d), due to its lower subjective standard as compared to subparagraph (c), could even cover contributions which may, in objective terms, be more serious than those covered by subparagraph (c). Apparently also against such a limitation of Art 25(3)(d) is Kearney (n 1) 367–70, who argues that Art 25(3)(d) could instead be applied to prosecute cover-ups and denial of ongoing crimes even without the existence of a prior agreement, because such ex post facto conduct could constitute contributions in the sense of Art 25(3)(d)'s '[i]n any other way'.

[70] For a different view Kiss (n 1) 17 (arguing that the term 'otro' implies that lesser contributions not yet included in the previous subparagraphs are covered ['debe necesariamente captar contribuciones que no estén ya incluidas en los apartados anteriores.']). However, Kiss does not analyse the other authentic languages (not even the English version). They confirm that deriving a substantial difference from the wording amounts to an overstatement. Indeed, a virtually identical terminology is used in the French, Russian, Chinese, and Arabic versions of the Statute: toute autre forme—toute autre manière; каким-либо иным образом—любым другим образом; 以其他方式—以任何其他方式; . بطريقة اخرى—اية طريقة اخر .

[71] Defence Response to Prosecution's Submissions on the law of indirect co-perpetration under Art 25(3)(a) of the Statute and the application for notice to be given under Regulation 55(2) with respect to from a terminological distinction between assistance and contribution, giving the latter term a broader meaning.[72] If assistance is defined by contributions of a certain quality, as I understand it, a possible distinction between these terms is irrelevant; the only relevant question is what kind of contribution, in qualitative and quantitative terms, is needed to have a criminally relevant assistance? Of course, the term contribution can be defined broadly,[73] but the key question remains: when do one or more contributions amount to a criminally relevant assistance?

Thus, in substance, both subparagraphs (c) and (d) provide for assistance liability with the ensuing question of the nature of the respective contribution(s).[74] While assistance as a secondary, accessorial participation in crime can certainly be of less importance than a primary, perpetrator-like contribution within the meaning of subparagraph (a), in particular in the case of co-perpetration, it is hardly plausible to make a further distinction between the forms of assistance pursuant to subparagraphs (c) and (d). As a consequence, while there is a clear hierarchy between perpetrator-like contributions (subparagraph (a)) and secondary contributions (subparagraphs (c) and (d)), such a hierarchy is less clear with regard to distinctions within the latter and cannot plausibly be explained by their necessary objective contributions alone.

In any case, the two fundamental principles of ICL that support a restrictive interpretation of assistance liability within the meaning of Article 25(3) apply equally to assistance under subparagraph (c) or (d): on the one hand, the principle of culpability and, on the other, the policy choice to focus on cases of a certain minimum (considerable) gravity as expressed in the preamble of the Rome Statute (in particular its para 4) and, more importantly, in Articles 17(1)(d) and 53(1)(b)–(c) and (2)(b)–(c) of the Statute.[75] Gravity is, contrary to Judge Fernández de Gurmendi's view,[76] not only a concept relevant in admissibility proceedings, but an overarching principle or idea that represents the said policy choice. Thus, this rationale also plays a role with regard to the modes of liability to be prosecuted before the Court. Of course, the gravity of a crime is normally not determined by one single contribution, but by the multiple incidents which constitute a situation or a case; it is for this reason that although a number of incidents (including the ensuing minimal contributions) may pass the gravity threshold at the admissibility stage, that does not preclude us from invoking

William Samuel Ruto's individual criminal responsibility, Ruto and Sang, ICC-01/09-01/11-443, TC V, ICC, 25 July 2012, para. 10 (25 July 2012) (arguing that '[T]his is clear given that the Statute reads "in any other way" contributes to the commission of a crime'); conc DeFalco (n 28) 732–3.

[72] Cf. Burchard (n 2) 942 (arguing, relying on the Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary, that 'contribute' means 'to be one of the causes of [something]' whereas 'assisting' means 'to help [something] to happen more easily').

[73] For example as encompassing 'the facilitation of merely contextual and general conditions that ultimately feed into the commission of a crime by a group' (Burchard (n 2) 942).

[74] For the same view apparently Heyer (n 14) who, albeit interpreting subparagraph (d)'s wording as indicating the lowest threshold (513), sees no phenomenological difference between the forms of assistance (515).

[75] Here, regarding a case, Art 53(2)(b) referring back to Art 17(1)(d) and Art 53(2)(c) ICC Statute are especially relevant. For the different gravity standards see I Stegmiller, The Pre-Investigation Stage of the ICC (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot 2011) 332 ff, 425 ff; K Ambos, The Colombian Peace Process and the Principle of Complementarity of the International Criminal Court (Heidelberg: Springer 2010) 44 ff.

[76] See (n 49).

the gravity rationale at the later confirmation or trial stage with regard to a mode of liability.[77] For assistance within the meaning of subparagraphs (c) and (d), this means that, as I argue, the respective contribution must have a certain gravity.

There is an additional consideration that speaks in favour of a restrictive interpretation of assistance liability under both subparagraphs (c) and (d): what is required for criminal responsibility to ensue—and this is particularly relevant in this context—is a certain normative relationship or nexus between the alleged contributing conduct and the criminal result, a relationship that in any case goes beyond a purely naturalistic causal nexus. For this reason, modern criminal law doctrine applies the theory of objective imputation or attribution (imputación objectiva,[78] objektive Zurechnung), which requires that the given conduct increases the (non-permitted) risk (for the protected legal interest) and this risk realizes itself in the commission of the crime.[79] If one applies this theory, which is essentially about the fair imputation of criminal results to those agents who are truly responsible,[80] to secondary participation (accessorial liability),[81] a contribution is only punishable if (i) it creates a higher risk for the protected legal interest by having a substantial impact on the actual commission of the (main) crime, or (ii) it manifests itself in the commission of the crime insofar as this particular (higher) risk has been 'realized' (had a comprehensible impact on the commission; this requirement contains normative causational elements).[82] While this theory has not yet been explicitly recognized by the ICC, the Bemba PTC invoked the theory of risk increase in the context of command responsibility with regard to the consequences of the superior's failure to intervene. According to the Chamber, it suffices for the commander's liability that his non-intervention increased the risk of the commission of the subordinates' crimes.[83]

Finally, in practical terms, it is difficult, if not impossible to find a meaningful definition for contributions that are less than substantial or significant. In fact, it is commonly agreed upon that the relevance of the contribution depends on its impact on the

[77] For a different view Kiss (n 1) 16.

[78] S Mir Puig, Derecho Penal Parte General 8th edn (Barcelona: Reppertor 2010) 250 ff.

[79] See C Roxin, Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil, vol. I, 4th edn (München: C H Beck 2006) 371 ff. For an English explanation see K Ambos, 'Toward a Universal System of Crime: Comments on George Fletcher's Grammar of Criminal Law' (2007) 28 Cardozo Law Review 2647, 2664 ff. Compare for the Italian doctrine G Fiandaca and E Musco, Diritto penale: Parte generale 6th edn (Bologna: Zanichelli 2009) 234. The doctrine is also widely accepted in Latin America, see for example for Brazil: Prado (n 11) 82. On the French 'causalité adéquate', see X Pin, Droit Pénal Général 5th edn (Paris: Dalloz 2012) 145 ff.

[80] Cf. G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little, Brown 1978) 495 speaks of fair accountability within a theory of normative attribution; see also A von Hirsch, 'Extending the Harm Principle: "Remote" Harms and Fair Imputation' in A Simester and A Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996/repr 2003) 259, 265 ff. For a normative tendency in attribution in common law see also K Smith, A Modern Treatise on the Law of Criminal Complicity (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1991) 88 ff; see also the proximate cause theories understood as normative theories, for references cf. Ambos (n 79) 2666 with n 110.

[81] See e.g. U Murmann, Grundkurs Strafrecht 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2013) para. 27 mn 127 with further references.

[82] Cf. Ambos (n 5) 165.

[83] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC 01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 425. For a critique see K Ambos, 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision' (2009) 22 Leiden Journal of International Law 715, 721 ff.

main crime. To be more concrete, one can say that the contribution must have some relevance with regard to the alleged main crime. A further elaboration or specification must be left to the case law. If this is so, what else should then remain for a less than substantial contribution?

24.2.2 The legal nature of the contribution

A contribution to a criminal enterprise, e.g. the running of a concentration camp, may consist of a normal economic activity which is per se lawful, e.g. the selling of food, petrol, or other ordinary marketable commodities to the camp. This kind of assistance is discussed in scholarly writings, albeit almost exclusively in civil law jurisdictions, under the concept of 'neutral' (i.e. per se lawful) acts of assistance.[84] The gist of the issue is whether and when such neutral acts of assistance can be qualified as criminally relevant contributions. The answer is relatively simple and in the affirmative if the assistant violates rules that prohibit the provided assistance, for in this case the act of assistance is no longer 'neutral' in the first place. Take for example, the case of an arms dealer who sells arms to a regime which is the object of an United Nations (UN) arms embargo.[85] In contrast, the answer is more difficult in the truly hard cases, i.e. where the assistance is indeed, as such, lawful, as, for example, in our initial example of selling food to a concentration camp.

Given the obvious relevance of this issue for ICL,[86] it needs to be investigated in greater detail and in a more comprehensive fashion than possible in this chapter. At this juncture only some preliminary reflections can be presented. While the Mbarushimana PTC did not address the issue under the heading of 'neutral' acts, the Chamber was driven by the very same concerns of overcriminalization as its recourse to the significance standard to exclude 'infinitesimal' contributions[87] shows. In fact, [84] C Roxin, Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil, vol. II (München: C H Beck 2003) 206ff; for a good summary of the German discussion W Joecks, '§ 27' in W Joecks and K Miebach (eds), Münchener Kommentar zum StGB, vol. I, 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2011) 1265–76 mn 48–89. For an analysis of neutral acts in macrocriminal contexts compare P Rackow, Neutrale Handlungen als Problem des Strafrechts (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang 2007). The discussion also takes place in other jurisdictions, although less intensive than in Germany: for Italy see M Bianchi, 'La "complicità" mediante condotte "quotidiane"' (2009) 12 L'indice penale 37–86; for Spain see J-M Landa Gorostiza, La complicidad delictiva en la actividad laboral "cotidiana": contribución al "límite mínimo" de la participación frente a los "actos neutros" (Granada: Gomares 2002); for Brazil: L Greco, Cumplicidade através de ações neutras: a imputação objetiva na participação (Rio de Janeiro: Renovar 2004). See also K Ambos, 'Beihilfe durch Alltagshandlungen' (2000) 32 Juristische Arbeitsblätter 721, 721–5; in Spanish 'La complicidad a través de acciones cotidianas o externamente neutrales' (Julio 2001) 2ª Época No 8 Revista de Derecho Penal y Criminología (Universidad Nacional de Educación a Distancia. Facultad de Derecho, Madrid) 195–206. See from an ICL perspective Kiss (n 1) 19–20 with further references; from the perspective of an international economic criminal law see Heyer (n 14) 131ff.

[85] See in this respect on the Dutch Van Anraat case H van der Wilt, 'Genocide v. War Crimes in the Van Anraat Appeal' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 557, 563 ff. While van Anraat was only convicted for complicity in Sadam Hussein's crimes he also violated the UN embargo which was implemented in the Netherlands by the 'Sanctiewet'.

[86] See for a very useful compilation of relevant international and national case law Kiss (n 1) 22–6; more detailed Heyer (n 14) 173 ff; see for the relevance with regard to (corporate) business activities Burchard (n 2) 919 ff.

[87] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 12) para. 277 (as quoted in n 65).

the Chamber's examples of potentially criminally liable assistants (landlord, grocer, utility provider, etc) all refer to persons whose normal economic, commercial, or social activity may be the object of criminalization if no reasonable threshold of assistance within the meaning of subparagraph (d)—and equally, one should add, subparagraph (c)—can be established. Of course, it is questionable whether the significance standard has enough normative potential to play this role; in any case, the methodologically correct approach would have been to discuss the problem under the heading of 'neutral' acts—Judge Fernández de Gurmendi is right in this regard.[88] However, what is clear from both the PTC's and Fernández de Gurmendi's view is that some threshold is needed. In the context of the legal nature of the contribution, such a threshold cannot be found by making recourse to mere naturalistic or factual criteria alone or, even worse, a judge's—highly subjective—intuition.[89] Rather, and here again Fernández de Gurmendi's separate opinion goes in the right direction, one must analyse 'the normative and causal links between the contribution and the crime'.[90]

Of course, the reference to normative, value-based criteria alone does not help to decide concrete cases. Indeed, the long-expected 'Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights' drafted by Harvard Human Rights Professor John Ruggie in his capacity as UN Secretary General Special Representative on this issue, only refer, with concern to criminal law standards, to the general ICL jurisprudence on aiding and abetting as 'knowingly providing practical assistance or encouragement that has a substantial effect on the commission of a crime'.[91] Ruggie had previously concluded that 'it is not possible to specify exacting tests for what constitutes complicity even within the legal sphere'.[92] Also, Alejandro Kiss, legal officer at the ICC Chambers, in an important academic contribution

[88] Mbarushimana (n 46), Separate Opinion of Judge Silvia Fernández de Gurmendi, para. 12; in the same vein Kiss (n 1) 19.

[89] In this sense, however, DeFalco (n 28) 730–1 arguing that the 'acts of this grocer are intuitively non-criminal' (emphasis added).

[90] Mbarushimana (n 46), Separate Opinion of Judge Silvia Fernández de Gurmendi, para. 12; in the same vein Kiss (n 1) 19–20 (stressing the normative, value-based character of the assessment of the contribution).

[91] Report of the Special Representative of the Secretary General on the issue of human rights and transnational corporations and other business enterprises, John Ruggie. Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights: Implementing the United Nations 'Protect, Respect, and Remedy' Framework, Human Rights Council, Seventeenth Session, UN Doc A/HRC/17/31 (21 March 2011), Principle 17, 17. Also note that Ruggie did not focus on individual criminal responsibility but on the corporate responsibility of the respective companies. Focusing on the individual criminal responsibility in business cases A Heyer, 'Corporate Complicity under International Criminal Law: A Case for Applying the Rome Statute to Business Behaviour' (2012) 6 Human Rights and International Legal Discourse 14, 47–55, concluding that prosecuting agents of business corporations will prove difficult but nevertheless possible under the current ICL regime.

[92] Clarifying the Concepts of 'Sphere of influence' and 'Complicity', Human Rights Council, Eighth Session, UN Doc A/HRC/8/16 (15 May 2008) para. 33 (also stressing that the ICL practice on aiding and abetting provides the 'clearest guidance'). This report provides a more detailed analysis of the respective ICL practice (paras 35–44). Further, Ruggie discusses the different (legal and non-legal) understandings of complicity with regard to business involvement in human rights violations (paras 26 ff) and stresses 'due diligence' on the part of the companies to avoid complicity (paras 4, 17, 19, 23). See also the Report Protect, Respect, and Remedy: a Framework for Business and Human Rights, Human Rights Council, Eighth Session, UN Doc A/HRC/8/5 (7 April 2008) paras 73 ff.

on our topic from an ICL perspective, is forced to admit that it is yet too early to identify convincing normative criteria.[93]

Be that as it may, what is clear is that there must be some minimum threshold in order to exempt socially desirable and legitimate conduct from criminalization. In other words, criminal conduct should be limited to a significant deviation from standard social or commercial behaviour in order to capture really wrongful and blameworthy conduct.[94] As previously argued, conduct that violates specific prohibitions (conduct norms) cannot be considered 'socially desirable and legitimate' and thus qualifies, if all other requirements are met, as criminally relevant assistance within the meaning of subparagraphs (c) and (d). With regard to other per se lawful conduct, a mixed objective–subjective approach should be followed. On the objective level, the risk-based approach of the theory of objective or fair imputation requires that the respective contributing conduct should at least increase the risk with regard to the commission of the main crime. That risk must be realized through the commission of the (main) crime (murder) or, in other words, the risk-creation or increase must be causal for the commission of this crime in the sense of a specific risk.[95] On the subjective level, responsibility should depend on the agent's knowledge and specific purpose pursued with the contribution.[96] This is an alternative test in line both with the general intent requirement of Article 30 of the ICC Statute (applicable to the 'intentional' contribution and excluding lower mental standards, especially dolus eventualis)[97] and with Article 25(3)(d)(i) and (ii): either the agent is aware that the contribution increases the risk that the (collective) crime be committed, or he or she acts with the respective purpose.[98] In this regard the 'specific direction' standard, developed by the ICTY with regard to aiding and abetting liability[99] and recently invoked by ICC Judge Van den Wyngaert in our context,[100] may indeed be relevant in that it must be proved that the accused's assistance was 'specifically directed' to the (criminal) common purpose.[101]

[93] Kiss (n 1) 26. See also see Burchard (n 2) 935 ff (concluding at 945 that it is 'unclear whether the ICC Statute's modes of participation actually encompass…business contributions to "corporate-political core crime"').

[94] See previously Ambos (n 5) 165. See also Burchard (n 2) 920 with n 6 (arguing that 'in order to criminalize a contribution to a crime, it must normatively have a socially unacceptable and injurious relation to the crime').

[95] In a similar vein advocating a specific risk creation ('tatspezifisches Risiko') cf. Heyer (n 14) 516, 545, 547–8, 554–7. The further requirement of personal responsibility for that risk is, in my view, redundant since it is implicit in the concept of an objective (personal) imputation (attribution).

[96] See previously Ambos (n 5) 165; conc. Werle and Jessberger (n 4) 218–19.

[97] Cf. Ambos (n 5) 276 ff.

[98] I draw here on Roxin's approach (n 84) of a 'deliktischer Sinnbezug' (the giving of a criminal meaning to the contribution by the agent).

[99] Judgment, Perišić, IT-04-81-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2013, para. 44 ('specifically directed assistance'); previously e.g. Vasiljević (n 58) para. 102; but contra Judgment, Šainović et al., IT-05-87-A, AC, ICTY, 23 January 2014, paras 1621ff; crit also Judgment, Taylor, SCSL-03-01-A, AC, SCSL, 26 September 2013, paras 475ff. Judge Van den Wyngaert (n 18) quotes this jurisprudence indiscriminately in fn 404. See also J Jones et al., Milestones in International Criminal Justice: Recent Legal Controversies at the UN Yugoslav Tribunal, Chatham House (2013), 5 ff; K Ambos and O Njikam, 'Charles Taylor's Criminal Responsibility' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 789, 799 ff.

[100] Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert (n 18) para. 287 with fn 406 (referring to the significance standard in relation to Art 25(3)(d) and the term 'neutral' contributions as employed by Judge Fernández de Gurmendi).

[101] In a similar vein Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert (n 18) para. 287 ('whether someone's assistance is specifically directed to the criminal or non-criminal part of a group's activities').

Criminal responsibility may also depend on the nature of the collective crime or the criminal enterprise. Thus, for example, applying this test previously[102] to contributions to the running of a concentration camp, I distinguished between the nature of the camp as a pure extermination camp ('pure' criminal enterprise) and a mixed camp (mixed criminal enterprise) where other (labour) activities also existed and the detainees had a realistic chance of survival, i.e. their death was only a 'side effect' of the inhumane conditions of the camp and the forced labour. In the former case, criminal responsibility for external or indirect contributions, i.e. taking place from outside the camp, which do not directly relate to the destructive purpose of the camp (such as the delivery of potassium cyanide does), depends on the knowledge of the supplier: if he is aware of the criminal purpose of the concentration camp and therefore of the criminal impact of his contribution, he incurs criminal responsibility. In the case of contributions to a 'mixed' enterprise, criminal responsibility is predicated on the proof of an identifiable individual contribution to concrete crimes.

24.3 Conclusion

This brief inquiry has produced the following findings:

i. There is no substantial difference between the forms of assistance in subparagraphs (c) and (d) of Article 25(3) ('otherwise assists' versus '[i]n any other way contributes').

ii. Both subparagraphs (c) and (d) require a minimum threshold of assistance. This follows from the principles of culpability and ultima ratio of criminal law.

iii. The key issue is, therefore, not the alleged or apparent difference between subparagraphs (c) and (d), but the definition of their minimum threshold. Insofar, the factual and the legal nature of the contribution must be distinguished.

iv. As to the factual contribution, quantitative criteria must be used and further developed.

v. The legal nature of the contribution refers to the problem of so-called neutral acts of assistance. Here it is necessary to further develop normative criteria drawing on relevant international and national case law and scholarly writings. A good starting point is a distinction between lawful and unlawful acts. Further, one should focus on the specific risk creation by the respective contribution with regard to the legal interests violated.

[102] K Ambos, 'Prosecution of Former Nazi Camp Guards: About Restoring Society's Trust in Law and Participation in a Criminal Enterprise' (EJIL: Talk!, 20 May 2013) <http://www.ejiltalk.org/prosecution-of-former-nazi-camp-guards-about-restoring-societys-trust-in-law-and-participation-in-a-criminal-enterprise/> accessed 28 August 2013.

25

Command Responsibility under Article 28 of the Rome Statute

*Alejandro Kiss

25.1 Introduction

After the Second World War, the legal interpretation of concepts and notions explaining the attribution of criminal liability in the field of humanitarian and international criminal law reached a turning point. The existing concepts were never conceived to address cases of individuals in high positions of authority, responsible for mass criminality. In reality, as is well known, even when addressing plain domestic criminality, concepts such as commission, induction, and complicity fail to provide any clear-cut guidance for application and this shortcoming persists when applied to international crimes. The usual difficulties and grey areas, which are inherent to the interpretation of the modes of liability, are exacerbated by the complexity of the illegal conduct in question, the indirect nature of the intervention, and the widespread harm that typically results from them. The tools developed in the framework of ordinary criminal law needed to be rethought, which led judges and academics to develop legal interpretations, all with the intention of defining the contours of these concepts in a manner that would ensure a consistent, systematic, and fair jurisprudence. Understandably, the resulting legal constructions are sophisticated and fair labelling came at the expense of simplicity.

The doctrine of 'command responsibility' evolved in parallel to the aforementioned efforts. Some of the sui generis aspects thereof result from the limitations of the ordinary modes of liability in capturing the wrongdoing of commanders and superiors. There is a plethora of literature and jurisprudence, particularly since the experiences of the ad hoc Tribunals, dealing with the most contentious aspects of this mode of liability, but nonetheless they remain unclear and, still today, prominently discussed.[1]

This chapter will focus on the issues which involve the most significant practical consequences including the superior–subordinate relationship and the requirement of effective control, the duties imposed on commanders and superiors, the role of causation, and the mental element.

* Legal Officer, ICC; LLM and PhD, Münster University; Adjunct Professor, The Hague University. The views expressed are those of the author and cannot be attributed to the ICC (kiss_alejandro@yahoo.com).

[1] C Meloni, 'Command Responsibility, Mode of Liability for the Crimes of Subordinates or Separate Offence of the Superior?' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 619; B Bonafé, 'Finding a Proper

25.2 Development of this Mode of Liability

The development of notions that underpin command responsibility may be traced to antiquity.[2] Several important precedents have contributed to shaping the main features of this mode of liability and, in spite of the time that has elapsed, their fingerprint remains perceptible today.[3] The responsibility of superiors for failure to prevent crimes committed by subordinates was affirmed by these precedents,[4] as was the principle that such a failure may lead to responsibility for the offences as if the commanders had committed the crimes themselves.[5]

Article 3 of the Fourth Hague Convention of 1907 holds particular importance amongst these precedents. This Article, which was absent in the 1899 version of the Convention, set out the principle of responsible command, according to which '[a] belligerent party… shall be responsible for all acts committed by persons forming part Role for Command Responsibility' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 599; A Cassese, International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2003) 200–13; R Arnold/O Triffterer, 'Article 28: Responsibility of Commanders and Other Superiors' in O Triffterer (ed.) Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 795; K Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' in A Cassese et al., The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court vol. I (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 805.

[2] Commentators indicate that as early as 500 BC, the 'oldest military treaties in the world' written by Sun Tzu in China contain references to a rudimentary notion of commanders' responsibility; see W Parks, 'Command Responsibility for War Crimes' (1973) 62 Military Law Review 1, 3.

[3] In 1439 the King of France, Charles VII of Orleans, called 'the victorious', promulgated an ordinance which contained principles that foreshadow Arts 86 and 87 of the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I) (adopted on 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 4 ('API'), provisions that have been important landmarks in the legal development towards Art 28 of the Rome Statute. The ordinance set out the following: 'The King orders that each captain or lieutenant to be held responsible for the abuses, ills, and offenses committed by members of his company, and that as soon as he receives any complaint concerning any such misdeed of abuse, he bring the offender to justice so that the said offender be punished in a manner commensurate with his offence, according to these Ordinances. If he fails to do so or covers up the misdeed or delays taking action, or if, because of his negligence or otherwise, the offender escapes and thus evades punishment, the captain shall be deemed responsible for the offense, as if he had committed it himself and be punished in the same way as the offender would have been.' See L Green, 'War Crimes, Crimes against Humanity and Command Responsibility (1997) 50 Naval War College Review 26.

[4] The superior's failure to prevent crimes committed by subordinates as the basis of criminal liability appeared in the 1474 Trial against Peter von Hagenbach on charges of murder, rape, perjury, and other crimes against 'the laws of god and men', conducted by an ad hoc tribunal composed of 28 judges of the Holy Roman Empire. Peter von Hagenbach was convicted for crimes that he, as a knight, had the duty to prevent. G Gordon, 'The Trial of Peter von Hagenbach: Reconciling History, Historiography, and International Criminal Law' (2012) <http://ssrn.com/abstract=2006370> or <http://dx.doi.org/10.2139/ssrn.2006370> 32 and 33, accessed 12 May 2014.

[5] The responsibility of an individual in a position of authority for crimes committed by another person was known already in Roman law. Pursuant to Ulpiano's rule, those who ordered the commission of a murder must be held responsible as if they had committed murder themselves ('mandator coedis pro homitida habetur'). If a slave committed a crime ordered by his owner, both were considered to have perpetrated the crime, see T Mommsen, El Derecho Penal Romano vol. II (T. Dorado Montero tr., Madrid: La España Moderna 1999) 208. The 'Fuero Juzgo', a translation of the 'Liber Jiuridicum' that ruled the Iberian Peninsula during Visigoth domination, Book VI.V. number XII described, in old Spanish, the notion that those who order servants to commit murder shall be punished more severely than the servant who executed the murder: 'el que manda o conseia fazer omezillio, es mas enculpado que aquel que lo faze de fecho, por ende establecemos especialmientre que si el siervo dize que so sennor le of its armed forces'.[6] In addition, Article 1(1) of the Regulations Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land stipulated that an army, a militia, and volunteer corps be 'commanded by a person responsible for subordinates'.[7] As discussed later in the chapter, this Convention constitutes an important landmark in the development of command responsibility.

As set out in one particularly thoughtful and well-documented study, 'command has always imposed responsibility: yet few instances are recorded prior to the end of World War II where that responsibility was either criminal or international in nature'.[8] Immediately after the War, the situation did not change substantially. It is true that, at the time, important developments occurred in relation to the establishment of international criminal law and the codification of international humanitarian law. The Nuremberg Statute, the 1949 Geneva Conventions, and the 1949 Genocide Convention established that individuals may be held criminally responsible for international crimes, and the contours of criminal responsibility in relation to crimes of this nature started to be delineated. Conspicuous by its absence from this legislation, however, is a definition of command responsibility.[9] It is also notable that no such definition is found in the precursors to the drafting of the ICC Statute, namely the drafts produced between 1949 and 1954 in the framework of the ILC.

The Nuremberg trials and the follow-up proceedings developed on the responsibility of individuals.[10] Save for a handful of cases, commanders were not called to responsibility for failing to control of or taking measures to prevent the crimes. As mentioned, the Statute of the IMT at Nuremberg did not even contain an explicit provision on mandó matar … deve recibir c.c. azotes … é los seniores que lo mandaron fazer deven seer descabezados', H Dobranich, El Derecho Penal en el Fuero Juzgo vol. XII (Buenos Aires: Arias 1924) 63. As set out here, the 1439 ordinance promulgated by the King of France stated that: 'the captain shall be deemed responsible for the offense, as if he had committed it himself and be punished in the same way as the offender would have been'. In addition, the 1775 American Military Code, called the American Articles of War, set out in Article XII: 'Every officer, commanding in quarters or on a march, shall keep good order, and, to the utmost of his power, redress all such abuses or disorders which may be committed by any officer or soldier under his command: If upon any complaint [being] made to him, of officers or soldiers beating, or otherwise ill-treating any person, or of committing any kind of riot, to the disquieting of the inhabitants of this Continent; he, the said commander, who shall refuse or omit to see justice done on the offender or offenders, and reparation made to the party or parties injured, as far as the offender's wages shall enable him or them, shall, upon due proof thereof, be punished as ordered by a general court-martial, in such manner as if he himself had committed the crimes or disorders complained of.' Journals of the Continental Congress 1774–9, vol. II, 111–23. Edited from the original records in the Library of Congress by Worthington Chauncey Ford; Chief, Division of Manuscripts; Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1905 <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/18th_century/contcong_06-30-75.asp> accessed 22 October 2013.

[6] Convention (IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and its annex: Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land (adopted 18 October 1907, entered into force 26 January 1910) 187 CTS 227 ('Fourth Hague Convention of 1907').

[7] Annex to the Convention: Regulations respecting the laws and customs of war on land—Section I: On belligerents—Chapter I: The qualifications of belligerents—Regulations: Art 1.

[8] Parks (n 2) 19. [9] Triffterer (n 1) 803.

[10] K Ambos, 'Responsabilidad penal individual en el Derecho penal supranacional. Un análisis jurisprudencial. De Núremberg a La Haya', Revista Penal 5 <http://www.uhu.es/revistapenal/index.php/penal/article/viewFile/95/90> accessed 5 August 2014; A Kiss, 'La contribución en la comisión de un crimen por un grupo de personas en la jurisprudencia de la Corte Penal Internacional' (2013) Indret 1, 23 et seq. <http://www.indret.com/pdf/964.pdf> accessed 5 August 2014, Triffterer (n 1) 803.

command responsibility and, in the limited relevant instances, commanders were prosecuted on the basis of the 1907 Hague Convention and its regulations, which referred that the armed forces must be commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates.[11] The relevant post-Second World War jurisprudence will be addressed in more detail later in this chapter; it suffices to say at this stage that, after Nuremberg, command responsibility attracted attention mainly in situations where none of the traditional modes of liability could be established.[12]

The 1977 Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions (API) reflects for the first time in the international arena[13] the trend towards imposing liability on superiors for an omission to interfere with the commission of crimes. Article 86 of API creates an obligation to repress and supress grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions when these are 'the result' of a 'failure to act' when 'under a duty to do so'. The API sets out that the fact that a breach was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach. Pursuant to Article 87, military commanders are obliged to prevent, suppress, and report breaches of the Conventions. In order to prevent and suppress the breaches, commanders have the duty to ensure that members of the armed forces under their command are aware of their obligations under the Conventions and API. If a Commander is aware that persons under his control are going to commit or have committed a breach, they are obliged to initiate the necessary steps to prevent the breaches, and, where appropriate, to initiate disciplinary or penal action.

The principles embraced by Articles 86 and 87 of API have made their way into the Rome Statute in much more explicit terms than the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals. These Statutes all contain virtually identical wording:[14]

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute were committed by a subordinate does not relieve his superior of criminal responsibility if he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[15]

[11] Triffterer (n 1) 810. [12] Ibid., 814.

[13] The 1968 Convention on Non-statutory Limitations for War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity (adopted 26 November 1968, entered into force on 11 November 1970) 754 UNTS 73, acknowledged the responsibility of state authority beyond the traditional modes of liability to cover those who 'merely tolerate' the commission of crimes, thus accepting liability for omissions.

[14] The responsibility of superiors is set out in Art 7(3) Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex, Art 6(3) Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex, and Art 6(3) Statute of the SCSL, Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of the SCSL (signed 16 January 2002, entered into force 12 April 2002) 2178 UNTS 138, Annex ('SCSL Statute').

[15] Art 3(2) SCSL Statute sets out: 'With respect to superior and subordinate relationships, a superior shall be criminally responsible for any of the crimes set forth in article 2 of this Statute committed by subordinates under his or her effective authority and control, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such subordinates, where: (a) The superior either knew, or consciously disregarded information that clearly indicated that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such

The ad hoc Tribunals have had various opportunities to interpret their respective provisions. It is established jurisprudence that the following elements are required to substantiate command responsibility:

i. The existence of a superior–subordinate relationship;
ii. The superior knew or had reason to know that the criminal act was about to be or had been committed; and
iii. The superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act or punish the perpetrator thereof.[16]

25.3 Commanders and Forces, Superiors and Subordinates

Not every individual who has the capacity to prevent crimes under the jurisdiction of the Court may be called to responsibility under the Rome Statute. Such responsibility requires the individual to hold a special position vis-à-vis the legal interests protected by the Statute. Those who hold these positions are called 'guarantors'. In the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals, this idea has been expressed as follows:

> [A] material ability to prevent and punish may also exist outside a superior–subordinate relationship relevant for Article 7(3) of the Statute. For example, a police officer may be able to 'prevent and punish' crimes under his jurisdiction, but this would not as such make him a superior (in the sense of Article 7(3) of the Statute) vis-à-vis any perpetrator within that jurisdiction.[17]

The guarantor position is traditionally sustained two-fold; first, individuals may have a special obligation to protect certain interests, persons, and objects from attacks. They may be called to responsibility if these legally protected interests are harmed. Second, some individuals may be tasked with the supervision of objects or persons which may become a source of danger to the rights of others. These individuals may be called to responsibility if harm arises from these sources.[18]

The special duties imposed on commanders and superiors are based on the experience that their forces and subordinates are a source of danger.[19] Accordingly, they are guarantors pursuant to the first modality. In relation to the second modality, international jurisprudence has moved to extend the guarantor position to encompass duties crimes; (b) The crimes concerned activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior; and (c) The superior failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.'

[16] Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-A, AC, ICTY, 29 July 2009, para. 484 ('Blaškić Appeal Judgment'). See also Judgment, Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2007, para. 484 ('Nahimana Appeal Judgment'); Judgment, Dragomir Milošević, IT-98-29/1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 November 2009, para. 280 ('D Milošević Appeal Judgment').

[17] Judgment, Halilović, IT-01-48-A, AC, ICTY, 16 October 2007, para. 59 ('Halilović Appeal Judgment').

[18] A Kaufmann, Die Dogmatik der Unterlassungsdelikte (Göttingen: Schwartz 1959) 283 et seq.

[19] Arnold (n 1) 825; K Ambos, 'Joint Criminal Enterprise and Command Responsibility' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 159, 177; K Ambos, Treatise on International Criminal Law: Foundation and General Part vol. I (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 207.

relating to the protection of interests (and not only to sources of danger). It has been held, in instances of occupied territory, that a commanding General is charged with the duty of maintaining peace, punishing crime, and protecting lives and property within the area of his command.[20]

The language of Article 28 of the Rome Statute specifies the agents who, by virtue of their position, are obliged to carry out what is prescribed by the duty. Duties are imposed upon military commanders and persons effectively acting as military commanders, pursuant to Article 28 paragraph (a), with respect to crimes committed by forces under their control. Superior and subordinate relationships not described in paragraph (a), commonly referred to as civilian superiors or non-military superiors, are governed by Article 28 paragraph (b), which imposes duties upon superiors with respect to crimes committed by subordinates under their control.

The distinction between military commanders, persons effectively acting as military commanders, and non-military superiors may become a crucial issue at the ICC. The responsibility of non-military superiors requires higher actus reus and mens rea standards compared to the responsibility of military commanders and persons effectively acting as such. As set out later in this chapter, as regards the mental element, the reason for the responsibility of civilian superiors to require higher standards[21] is that in military settings, there is a strict punishment system that ensures a greater degree of control over subordinates. A punishment system of that nature does not usually exist with respect to civilian settings and this impacts on the authority that can be predicated from non-military superiors.[22]

When establishing whether superiors had the required authority, the Tokyo and the Nuremberg jurisprudence as well as the findings of the United Nations War Crimes Commission emphasized the de jure position of the superior.[23] By contrast, the ad hoc Tribunals looked at the superior's real authority and control over the subordinates.[24] The de jure position of authority was considered, at most, an indication of effective control.[25]

A 'commander' has been defined as a person who, in the framework of a hierarchical system of power, possesses the structural ability to issue orders to other persons who,

[20] Judgment of 19 February 1948, United States of America v Wilhelm List et al., in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 (Vol. XI/2, Washington: United States Government Printing Office) 1271 ('The Hostage Trial').

[21] This was inspired by a US proposal during the drafting history of the Statute, see under the subheading 'Military commanders and persons effectively acting as such—"should have known" '.

[22] N Karsten, 'Distinguishing Military and Non-Military Superiors, Reflections on the Bemba Case at the ICC' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 983, 988 et seq.

[23] Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 831.

[24] Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, AC, ICTY, 20 February 2011, para. 300 ('Čelebići Appeal Judgment').

[25] The ICTY Appeals Chamber clarified that in Čelebići, it did not reverse the burden of proof, but simply acknowledged that the possession of de jure authority constitutes prima facie a reasonable basis for assuming that an accused has effective control over his subordinates. Thus, the burden of proving beyond reasonable doubt that the accused had effective control over his subordinates ultimately rests with the Prosecution. Judgment, Hadžihasanović and Kubura, IT-01-47-A, AC, ICTY, 22 April 2008, para. 21 ('Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment'). See also Judgment, Orić, IT-03-68-A, AC, ICTY, 3 July 2008, paras 91–2 ('Orić Appeal Judgment'); Judgment, Blagojević and Jokić, IT-02-60-A, AC, ICTY, 9 May 2007, para. 302 ('Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment'); Halilović Appeal Judgment (n 17) para. 85.

because of this very hierarchy, will comply with the orders.[26] A 'military' commander is a person within a military organization who is entitled to give orders to soldiers, who are duty bound to obey.[27]

In the jurisprudence of the ICC, the term 'military commander' has been indicated to refer to persons who are formally or legally appointed to carry out a military commanding function (i.e. de jure commanders).[28] In turn, in the jurisprudence of the ICC, the notion of a 'person effectively acting as a military commander' was interpreted to apply to those who are not elected by law to carry out a military commander's role, but who nonetheless perform it de facto.[29] It is necessary that such a person 'effectively acts' as a military commander and not only carries out 'similar functions'.[30]

Clearly, it is unnecessary for the entity's qualification as 'military' that it is incorporated into the regular armed forces of a state. Paramilitary and irregular armed forces as well as national liberation movements may be properly characterized as 'military' forces. Indeed, it was expressly accepted during the preparatory works that the language in the Rome Statute included persons who controlled irregular forces, such as warlords.[31] They may be appointed military commanders in accordance with the internal practices or regulations of the non-governmental military group or they may effectively act as such.

Command responsibility may attach to commanders and superiors at the highest levels of leadership as well as to commanders with only a few men under their control.[32] The superior–subordinate relationship is not limited to the immediate superior [26] B Burghardt, Die Vorgesetztenverantwortlichkeit nach Völkerstrafrecht und deutschem Recht (s. 4 VStGB), ZIS 11/2010 705, 169 et seq.; Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 209. A decision of the German Federal High Court which interpreted para. 4 of the VStGB, a provision that incorporated sections of Art 28 of the Rome Statute in the domestic law, held that military commanders are those who have the possibility, which is factually executable and eventually grounded in law, to issue binding orders and to impose compliance with these orders. Bundesgerichtshof Beschluss AK 3/10 vom 17. Juni 2010.

[27] C Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (The Hague: T M C Asser Press 2010) 155.

[28] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 408 ('Bemba Confirmation Decision').

[29] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 408 et seq.; the word 'law' in this jurisprudence must be interpreted, in context, to include the regulations or practices of a non-governmental armed group.

[30] Of a different view—Arnold (n 1) 824.

[31] United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an ICC, 22 June 1998, A/CONF.183/C.1/WGGP/L.7.

[32] See Judgment, Kunarac et al., IT-96-23-T & IT-96-23/1-T, TC, ICTY, 22 February 2001, para. 398. In addition, the commentary to Art 87 of the API spells out this idea, as follows: '3553. According to the sponsors of the proposal which was behind the rule under consideration here: "in its reference to 'commanders', the amendment was intended to refer to all those persons who had command responsibility, from commanders at the highest level to leaders with only a few men under their command". This is quite clear. There is no member of the armed forces exercising command who is not obliged to ensure the proper application of the Conventions and the API. As there is no part of the army which is not subordinated to a military commander at whatever level, this responsibility applies from the highest to the lowest level of the hierarchy, from the Commander-in-Chief down to the common soldier who takes over as head of the platoon to which he belongs at the moment his commanding officer has fallen and is no longer capable of fulfilling his task.' Y Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Geneva: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1987) <http://www.icrc.org/ihl.nsf/COM/470-750113?OpenDocument> accessed 5 April 2013. It was indicated, with regard to the statement that 'commanders' refers to all those persons 'from commanders at the highest level to leaders with only a few men under their command', that it was uncontested and some delegations would even have wished this clarification to have been included in the text of the API in order to avoid any ambiguity, as the word 'commander' is not always understood in the same way in the armies of different countries.

of a subordinate but may extend through any number of levels in the hierarchy to reach a higher-placed individual.[33] Likewise, the superior can himself be subordinate to another commander.[34] As a result, a chain of liability based on the principle of command responsibility may extend to reach all those who failed to discharge their duties.[35] At the end of the chain is the subordinate/executor of the crime. Though the superior–subordinate relationship must be established, it is unnecessary to identify the individuals who committed the crimes.[36] A superior can be liable for crimes committed by unidentified perpetrators as long as their membership of a group is referenced.[37]

It is not unusual in military settings that the authority will be delegated. However, delegation does not automatically absolve an individual of criminal responsibility—unless it is partial, precise, and specific and the delegated persons are really in a position to fulfil the delegated functions.[38] In addition, in order to absolve himself from responsibility, the delegating authority needs to have the power to confer upon the delegated authority the relevant competence and to terminate, by delegating his authority, his competence to exercise control properly over the subordinates. If this is not the case, then the 'delegating' authority may still be called to responsibility.

Important as it is, the distinction between commanders, persons effectively acting as military commanders, and other superiors may not be easy in certain cases. Not even the military rank of a person is a determinative feature in the decision on whether responsibility arises under Article 28 paragraphs (a) or (b). Indeed, a person without military rank may effectively act as a military commander. In turn, the existence of such a rank does not necessarily lead to responsibility as a military commander under paragraph (a);[39] crimes may be committed by 'subordinates' under the authority of an individual holding military status even if they do not qualify as 'forces' under his command. An individual may be held responsible both as a commander and a superior even with respect to the same base crimes if committed jointly, for instance, by forces and subordinates under his control.

[33] Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 856.

[34] Ibid., 856.

[35] This scenario may pose a number of issues with regard to the (quasi) causality determination. Indeed, as will be explored later, causality requires a finding that the crimes would not have been committed but for the superior's omission to discharge his duties. If the superiority is exercised by a collegial body, or the line of non-military authority becomes blurred in the usual confusion of war situations, there may be instances whereby the crimes would have been committed even if, among the superiors, some would have acted in accordance with their obligation. If this test were applied to each superior in isolation, none of them would be responsible for the crimes committed as a result of his failure to exercise control properly. This problem, which is well known in relation to crimes of omission, may be solved by resorting to the rules of mutual attribution when the requirements for co-perpetration are made out. The availability of such a remedy is at least unclear in relation to command responsibility, as it would result, combining Articles 25(3)(a) and 28, in some sort of 'joint command responsibility'.

[36] Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 287; Judgment, Delić, IT-04-83-T, TC I, ICTY, 15 September 2008, para. 56 ('Delić Trial Judgment); Judgment, Orić, IT-03-68-T, TC II, ICTY, 30 June 2006, para. 305 ('Orić Trial Judgment'). The Appeals Chamber held that 'notwithstanding the degree of specificity with which the culpable subordinates must be identified, in any event, their existence as such must be established. If not, individual criminal liability under Article 7(3) of the Statute cannot arise', Orić Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 35.

[37] Orić Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 35.

[38] Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 859.

[39] Karsten (n 22) 992 et seq.

Some commentators propose that guidance in deciding between 'command' or 'superior' responsibility may be found in the nature of the institution, unit, or organization in which the superior holds his position. Certain entities or units incontrovertibly belong to the military, such as the official armed forces of a state, whereas other institutions perform functions that are clearly not military by nature, such as political parties or administrative and bureaucratic organs of a state and private enterprises (like a private radio station). These examples lead to the superior responsibility of civilians.[40]

This guidance possesses some practical value. However, there remain certain examples—not unusual in the field of command responsibility—such as camp wardens and civilian police officers, which escape clear-cut categorization.[41] Relevant considerations to be taken into account, according to this thesis, are (i) whether the purpose of the unit is to participate in armed conflict; and (ii) the risk that the entity may generate international crimes.[42] The latter aspect does not possess indicative value, for if international crimes were committed, they would necessarily be preceded by a risk of commission.[43]

Military commanders are responsible for failures to prevent or repress crimes committed by 'forces', whereas, in relation to non-military commanders, the crimes are committed by 'subordinates'. The 'forces' under the command of the military commander are a subgroup within the broader notion of 'subordinates'. The term 'forces' is neither defined in the Statute nor in the Elements of Crimes. However, useful guidance can be found in the Convention (I) for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field.[44] For instance, failure to prevent crimes committed by civil members of military aircraft crews, war correspondents, supply contractors, members of labour units, or services responsible for the welfare of [40] Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 848. In relation to the superior responsibility of the leaders of a political party, see Judgment, Nahimana, ICTR-99-52-T, TC I, ICTR, 3 December 2003, para. 976.

[41] Karsten (n 22) 996 et seq. According to the Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 410, military-like commanders may generally encompass superiors who have authority and control over regular government forces such as armed police units or irregular forces (non-government forces) such as rebel groups and paramilitary units, including, inter alia, armed resistance movements and militias that follow a structure of military hierarchy or a chain of command.

[42] Y Ronen, 'Superior Responsibility of Civilian for International Crimes Committed in Civilian Settings' (2010) 43 Vanderbilt Journal of Transitional Law 313, 349, and 353; Karsten (n 22) 1002—in the view of this commentator, the purposive criterion is the most persuasive.

[43] A Kiss, El delito de peligro abstracto (Buenos Aires: Ad Hoc 2011) 60 et seq.

[44] Art 13 of that Convention, in defining the 'protected persons', includes members of the armed forces of a Party to a conflict as well as members of militias or volunteer corps forming part of such armed forces, members of other militias, and members of other volunteer corps, including those of organized resistance movements provided they (a) are commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates; (b) have a fixed distinctive sign recognizable at a distance; (c) carry arms openly; and (d) conduct their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war. The convention also provides examples of persons who accompany the armed forces 'without actually being members thereof', such as civil members of military aircraft crews, war correspondents, supply contractors, members of labour units, or services responsible for the welfare of the armed forces. Members of crews, including masters, pilots, and apprentices of the merchant marine, and the crews of civil aircraft of the parties to the conflict, as well as inhabitants of a non-occupied territory who, on the approach of the enemy, spontaneously take up arms to resist the invading forces, without having had time to form themselves into regular armed units, provided they carry arms openly and respect the laws and customs of war.

the armed forces would not trigger command responsibility according to the definition in this Convention. The same can be said in relation to crimes committed by the inhabitants of a non-occupied territory who, on the approach of the enemy, spontaneously take up arms to resist the invading forces, without having had time to form themselves into regular armed units.

Although known since the post-Second World War jurisprudence,[45] the necessary relationship between superiors and subordinates in civilian settings has never been easy to prove.[46] The ad hoc Tribunals show limited instances of convictions in such settings.[47] The jurisprudence of the ICTY has insisted that the responsibility of non-military superiors requires a degree of control similar to that of the military superiors.[48] It has been recognized that inherent to the power to issue orders is the ability to punish, and that civilians do not have the disciplinary power which is usual in the military. However, in relation to the responsibility of non-military superiors, that ability to punish has been considered unessential. Instead, the capacity to report the facts to the authorities has been considered sufficient.[49]

The most representative example has emerged from the ICTR case of Prosecutor v Nahimana. The accused was a former university lecturer, Director of the Rwandan Ministry of Information, and founder and director of a private radio station (RTLM). He was convicted to 30 years' imprisonment for failing to prevent or punish the broadcasting of criminal discourse by RTLM staff.[50] In these broadcasts, the audience was induced to take measures against the enemy.[51]

The decision on the confirmation of charges in the Bosco Ntaganda case has held him responsible as a military commander for crimes committed by civilians. Civilians accompanied members of the UPC/FPLC in almost all military operations; they transported supplies, and burned and pillaged the roofs of houses under the orders of UPC/FPLC commanders. Ntaganda provided weapons to some civilians and ordered them

[45] Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 829 and 830. Indeed, in Phol et al., one of the convicted accused was a civilian and in US v Brandt et al. it has been stated that civilians may be held responsible as superiors. The Judgment of 4 November 1948 given by the International Military Tribunal of Tokyo ('Tokyo Judgment') has confirmed the Nuremberg jurisprudence that superior responsibility may be attributed to members of the civilian government.

[46] The degree of control over subordinates in non-military setting needs to be similar to that exercised by military commanders; see Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 16 November 1998, para. 355 ('Čelebići Trial Judgment'). Moreover, especially in this context, it is important to distinguish between authority and the 'ability to convince, prompt or to influence'; see G Mettraux, The Law of Command Responsibility (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 183.

[47] The ICTY jurisprudence contains no conviction of this nature and the cases concerning persons without a military rank charged as superiors were all related to operations in military settings; see Ronen (n 42) 324 et seq. The difficulty of proving the necessary relationship is reflected in the jurisprudence of the ICTR, which has endorsed the application of superior responsibility to non-military leaders, but has in practice usually rejected it, because the superior–subordinate relationship could not be established beyond reasonable doubt; see Bonafé (n 1) 610.

[48] Čelebići Trial Judgment (n 46) para. 378; Judgment, Bagilishema, ICTR-95-1A-T, TC I, ICTR, 7 June 2001, para. 42 ('Bagilishema Trial Judgment') reversed by the Appeals Chamber, in that the control exercised by the non-military superior must be of the same degree as that exercised by a military commander, but not necessarily of the same nature; see Judgment (Reasons), Bagilishema, ICTR-95-1A-A, AC, ICTR, 3 July 2002, para. 55.

[49] Judgment, Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-T, TC I bis, ICTY, 25 June 1999, para. 78 ('Aleksovski Trial Judgment').

[50] Nahimana Appeal Judgment (n 16) para. 822.

[51] Ibid.

to kill Lendus.[52] The decision concluded that Bosco Ntaganda had effective control over the civilians, as he had the capacity to order them to take part in the hostilities.[53]

25.4 Effective Command, Authority, and Control

Pursuant to Article 28(a), the commander or the person effectively acting as such must have effective command (and control) or authority (and control). Article 28(b) prescribes that the superior must have effective authority (and control).

'Effective control' is defined as the material ability to prevent or punish the commission of the crime.[54] A lower standard such as the simple ability to exercise influence over forces or subordinates, even if such influence turned out to be substantial, has been considered insufficient.[55] A commander or a superior who is vested with de jure authority but has no effective control over his or her subordinates would not incur criminal responsibility, whereas a de facto superior who lacks a formal appointment but, in reality, has effective control over the perpetrators of offences could incur criminal responsibility.[56]

The 'control' has been considered an umbrella term, encompassing both the 'authority' and the 'command'.[57] According to the Bemba Confirmation Decision, the alternative 'effective authority and control' does not add or provide a different meaning to the text.[58] The term 'effective command' has been understood to reflect 'effective authority' not least because, in the English language, the word 'command' is defined as 'authority, especially over armed forces'.[59] The term 'effective authority' has been interpreted to refer to the modality, manner, or nature according to which a military or military-like commander exercises 'control' over his forces or subordinates.[60]

In distinguishing the notion of 'control' from 'command' and 'authority', it is useful to recall the various ways by which, in social life, a person may express his wish that someone else does or abstains from doing something, such as ordering, requesting, asking, pleading, warning, etc. For instance, the imperative sentence 'hand over the money or I will shoot you', describes a situation whereby the gunman coerces the victim and the latter is in the gunman's power. To secure compliance, the gunman threatens to do something a normal man would regard as harmful and renders keeping the money a less eligible choice. The appeal to threats to back orders is distinct from situations where the orders are given by a person occupying a

[52] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Bosco Ntaganda, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-309, PTC II, ICC, 9 June 2014, para. 18.

[53] Ibid., para. 166. [54] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 415.

[55] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 415; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 214.

[56] Čelebići Appeal Judgment (n 24) para. 197. See also Judgment, Strugar, IT-01-42-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 January 2005, para. 363 ('Strugar Trial Judgment'); Judgment of 27 October 1948, United States of America vs Wilhelm von Leeb et al., in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 (Vol. XI/1, Washington: United States Government Printing Office) 543–4 ('The High Command Case').

[57] Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 210. Ambos recalls that 'command' is said to imply a material ability to issue orders and directives backed by threats, whereas 'authority' implies a rather formal right to act legally; see also Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 857.

[58] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 412. [59] Ibid., para. 413. [60] Ibid.

position of pre-eminence—typical in the army or a body of disciples. In this second category of orders, the imperative embodies primarily an appeal not to fear but to respect the authority.[61] The relevance of this consideration becomes clear when recalling that, in defining the notion of 'commission' of a crime and distinguishing it from secondary liability, the jurisprudence of the Court has resorted invariably to the concept of 'control over the crime'; a notion that has been upheld by the ICC Appeals Chamber.[62] This is characterized as the ability to decide whether and how the crime would be committed.[63] Control over the crime can be had through control over the will of the person who executes the crime, for instance because the executor acted by mistake or under duress, or was insane.[64] If the executor of the crime happens to be a subordinate, he may have acted under the 'effective control' of the superior, who induced him to commit unlawful conduct by mistake or under duress. However, in such circumstances, compliance would not be motivated by an appeal to authority (or command).

In any event, although 'effective control' can be had through mechanisms distinct from an appeal to authority and command, when addressed specifically under Article 28 the concept is tailored by the superior–subordinate relationship between the suspect and the forces or subordinates. Hence it becomes relevant whether the superior has the power to issue orders and instructions to subordinates, the nature of the orders the superior has the capacity to issue, as well as whether or not his orders are actually followed.[65] This relationship was as decisive in the early Nuremberg jurisprudence[66] as it is today in the recent jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals and the ICC.[67]

[61] H L A Hart, The Concept of Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1961) 18 et seq.

[62] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014, para. 472. See for also instance Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, para. 291.

[63] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, para. 1003 ('Lubanga Judgment').

[64] Decision on the confirmation of charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, paras 488 and 495 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision').

[65] Judgment, Strugar, IT-01-42-C, AC, ICTY, 17 July 2008, para. 254 ('Strugar Appeal Judgment').

[66] Superiors were held not responsible in relation to crimes, because they were committed by persons outside their control or direction. For instance, in the case of Paul Rostock, a German official, Chief of the Office for Medical Science and Research under Third Reich Commissioner Karl Brandt and the Dean of the Medical Faculty of the Berlin University, the Prosecution alleged that, as he knew, camp inmates were being experimented on with Malaria, Spotted Fever, Lost (Mustard) Gas, and other diseases. In this knowledge he continued to work on research projects concerning scientific investigations, resulting in further experiments on human beings. The Prosecution alleged that he failed to exercise his authority in an attempt to stop or check criminal experiments. The Tribunal concluded that no experiments were conducted by any person or organization which was under Rostock's control or direction. The accused was therefore found not guilty and released from custody; Judgment, United States of America v Karl Brandt et al. ('The Medical Case'), in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 Vol. II (Washington: United States Government Printing Office 1946–9), case against Paul Rostock, 208–10.

[67] In a recent instance, the ICTY Appeals Chamber reversed a conviction and entered an acquittal for the reason that it could not establish the accused's 'effective control'. The ICTY Appeals Chamber acquitted the most senior officer of the Yugoslav Army, the Chief of the General Staff Mr Perišić, for the charge of failing to punish the crimes related to the shelling of Zagreb in May 1995 by the Army of the Serbian Krajina. The Appeals Chamber found that the evidence in the record on Perišić's effective control over the perpetrators was contradictory and reversed Perišić's conviction. The Perišić Appeals Chamber found some evidence suggesting that at the time Zagreb was shelled, Perišić had effective control over the

A finding that a superior had 'effective control' is eminently case-specific. According to the Bemba Confirmation Decision, factors that may indicate the existence of effective control include (i) the suspect's official position; (ii) his power to issue orders; (iii) the capacity to ensure compliance with the orders; (iv) his position within the military structure and the actual tasks that he carried out; (v) his capacity to order forces or units under his command, whether under his immediate command or at lower levels, to engage in hostilities; (vi) his capacity to re-subordinate units or make changes to the command structure; (vii) his power to promote, replace, remove, or discipline any member of the forces; and (viii) his authority to send forces to locations where hostilities take place and withdraw them at any given moment.[68]

Commentators propose that superior responsibility applies only if the 'effective control' is rooted in a hierarchical structure or organization to which the superior and the subordinate belong.[69] The 'organization' is defined as a social reality upon which the interpersonal relationships among its members are crystallized or stabilized, beyond the specific situational background.[70] Though in cases where the existence of this structure is not made out, international jurisprudence rejects the liability of superiors, holding that such superiors do not have effective control over subordinates but at most 'substantial influence'.[71] This seems to be the right approach, for although superior–subordinate relationships are ordinarily underpinned by a hierarchical organization, the determinative feature is the existence of effective control and not the existence of an organization. Effective control may, in some instances, be exercised with respect to perpetrators: he was involved in disciplinary proceedings, he could influence promotions and terminations of soldiers involved, and, more broadly, he could influence the operations of the SVK (Judgment, Perišić, IT-04-81-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2013, para. 114 ('Perišić Appeal Judgment')). However, other evidence suggested that he did not have effective control over the subordinates. Indeed, the shelling of Croatians was performed by the forces under the command of Čeleketić (para. 98). Perišić instructed Čeleketić not to shell Zagreb and the latter, instead, complied with the contrary orders of RSK President Martić (para. 116). The Appeals Chamber reasoned that, considered in isolation, this failure to obey Perišić's instruction might be dismissed as an exceptional instance of disobedience or rebellion. Yet no evidence proved beyond reasonable doubt that he ever issued a command order to a VJ soldier serving in the SVK prior to the shelling of Zagreb. Similarly, there is no conclusive evidence as to Perišić's exercise of the relevant disciplinary powers prior to the fall of the RSK. The Appeals Chamber considered that a reasonable alternative interpretation of the record is that Perišić could influence, but did not possess effective control over, the Zagreb Perpetrators at the time of the shelling of Zagreb. Thus, it was not the sole reasonable inference from the totality of the circumstantial evidence in this case that Perišić had effective control (para. 118). On this basis, the accused's conviction was reversed (para. 120).

[68] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 418. The jurisprudence of the ICTY has dealt with these factors in several decisions: Judgment, Halilović, IT-01-48-T, TC I, ICTY, 16 November 2005, para. 58 ('Halilović Trial Judgment'); Halilović Appeal Judgment (n 17) para. 207; Judgment, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, TC, ICTY, 26 February 200, paras 418 and 421 ('Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment'); Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) paras 393–7, 406, 408, 411, and 413; Strugar Appeal Judgment (n 65) para. 256; Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 16) para. 69; D Milošević Appeal Judgment (n 16) para. 280; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 199; Judgment, Muvunyi, ICTR-00-55A-T, TC III, ICTR, 11 February 2010, para. 497; Čelebići Trial Judgment (n 46) para. 767; Judgment, Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, TC II, SCSL, 20 June 2007, para. 788; Orić Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 159.

[69] Karsten (n 22) 994 argues that leaders of loosely joined or spontaneously assembled groups do not have superior responsibility, since the entity they belong to needs to have a degree of stability; see also S Sivakumaran, 'Command Responsibility in Irregular Groups' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1129, 1135, and 1137; Burghardt (n 26) 705.

[70] Burghardt (n 26) 705.

[71] Ibid., 160.

conduct not strictly covered by an organizational framework. In these circumstances, which are discussed in greater detail hereunder there is no reason to deny superior responsibility if the effective control over the subordinates is substantiated.[72]

In the military, subordinates are said to be permanently on duty and subject to internal disciplinary systems. In turn, with respect to civilians, it is submitted that they are subject to the authority and control of superiors only within work-related activities[73] and not beyond them.[74] This idea finds some support in the language of Article 28(b)(ii), which sets out that the crimes must concern activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior. However, as it seems to me, this is a formalistic reading of the superior's duties based on a narrow conceptualization of his position of guarantee. In the first place, the commission of international crimes will necessarily occur outside the framework of what may be the legitimate object of a working relationship. Moreover, there are situations in which human relationships such as employment, church, or affiliation to unions of workers may degenerate in ties of strong dependence, compatible with superior–subordinate relationships. This dependence may provide superiors with a degree of control such that they can urge employees into participating in political demonstrations or organized action, or even going as far as taking part in constitution clash forces. A context of mass violence and atrocity crimes, extreme poverty, or lack of state authority, such as in territories controlled by organized crime and drug trafficking, would be fertile to links of this type. Those who, taking advantage of this context, have the capacity to enmesh themselves and dictate aspects of their subordinates' lives outside of the strict boundaries of the work relationship may be responsible as civilian superiors, provided they had the material ability to prevent the commission of the relevant crimes.

In relation to military contexts, it has been proposed that individuals belonging to the military are permanently on duty and therefore, superiors should be considered to have effective control over their subordinates at all times. This argument is also overly formalistic and cannot be persuasive. The required control needs to be effective as opposed to formal.

Finally, two positions have been defended with regard to the timing at which the superior must have had effective control over his subordinates. According to one view, the determinative factor is the time of the commission of the crime. A different view considers that the superior must have effective control at the time he fails to exercise his powers to prevent or to punish. This issue, which was discussed at length in the [72] Leaders may rely on guerrilla groups or private subcontractors to impose their political goals. In instances where they do not pertain to the group or the subcontracted militia, the effective authority and control would not necessarily be predicated upon the organizational structure. However, there is no reason to detract from the possibility of incurring into command responsibility if they nonetheless exercised effective authority and control over the executors. See Arnold (n 1) 826 (in relation to state authorities). I believe that this notion can be expanded to non-state leaders, such as for instance cartel leaders who may rely on subcontracted militias, guerrilla, or paramilitary groups.

[73] Ronen (n 42) 340 et seq.

[74] T Wu and Y-S Kang, 'Criminal Liability for the Actions of Subordinates—The Doctrine of Command Responsibility and its Analogues in United States Law' (1997) 38 Harvard International Law Journal 272, 295; H Vest, Völkerrechtsverbrecher verfolgen. Ein abgestuftes Mehrebenenmodell systemischer Tatherrschaft (Bern: Stämpfli Verlag AG 2011) 504, 258–9; Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 212; Arnold (n 1) 841 argues that such activities undertaken by subordinates escape the sphere of the superior's competence.

jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals,[75] has found a definite answer in the wording of the Rome Statue. The effective control must have existed at least at the time the crimes were about to be committed, which means that the superior must have been already in control over the forces before the crimes were committed.[76] This means, in addition, that if he lost effective control over his subordinates at any stage prior to the point in time when the subordinates were at least about to commit the crimes, the superior cannot be held liable. This idea is addressed in further detail in the following section.

25.5 Duties on Commanders and Superiors

In the framework of the ad hoc Tribunals, superior responsibility is responsibility for a plain omission.[77] A superior's responsibility is limited to his own omission in failing to act, and in neglecting his duty with regard to crimes committed by subordinates. Causality between the superior's omission and the crimes committed by the subordinates is not required.[78] Under this model, the superior should not be understood to share the same responsibility as the subordinate who commits the crime,[79] and cannot be viewed as if he had committed the crime himself.[80]

In turn, causality is a requirement in Article 28 and this impacts on the very nature of command and superior responsibility. This feature and the consequences thereof[81] play a role in the conceptualization and differentiation of the basic forms of superior responsibility. The basic forms of command responsibility have been convincingly distinguished in the literature as follows: (i) intentional failure to prevent; (ii) negligent failure to prevent; (iii) intentional failure to punish; and (iv) negligent failure to punish.[82] The analysis in the next section, although taking this differentiation into account, proceeds by looking into the duties which are imposed on the superiors, as follows: (a) the duty to exercise control properly; (b) the duty to prevent; and (c) the duty to repress or submit.

[75] Orić Trial Judgment (n 36) para. 335; Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 446, and in Decision on Joint Challenge to Jurisdiction, Hadžihasanović et al., IT-01-47-PT, TC, ICTY, 12 November 2002, paras 37, 51, 180 et seq., 202 ('Hadžihasanović Jurisdiction Trial Decision'). It is also supported by the dissenting opinions of Appeals Judges Shahabuddeen and Hunt in Decision on interlocutory appeal challenging jurisdiction in relation to command responsibility, Hadžihasanović et al., IT-01-47-AR72, AC, ICTY, 16 July 2003 ('Hadzihasanović Jurisdiction Appeal Decision'), Partial Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, para. 1; Separate and Partially Dissenting Opinion of Judge David Hunt, paras 7 et seq.; Judgment, Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, TC I, SCSL, 2 March 2009, para. 299.

[76] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 419.

[77] Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 78.

[78] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 16) para. 77; Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 78; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 40.

[79] Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 78

[80] Orić Trial Judgment (n 36) para. 293.

[81] This needs to be reflected in a lower penalty for commanders as well as in the manner that the convictions are expressed in the relevant judgments; H Olásolo, Tratado de Autoría y Participación en Derecho Penal Internacional (Valencia: Tirant lo Blanch 2013) 825 et seq.

[82] Meloni, 'Command Responsibility, Mode of Liability for the Crimes of Subordinates or Separate Offence of the Superior?' (n 1) 633 et seq.; V Nerlich, 'Superior Responsibility under Article 28 ICC Statute, For What Exactly is the Superior Held Responsible?' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 668 et seq.; Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 197.

25.5.1 Failure to exercise control

Article 28 is structured around a two-fold set of duties on commanders and superiors which need to be carefully distinguished. A primary, more 'general' duty is infringed upon when commanders and superiors fail to exercise control properly over their forces and subordinates. Second, a more specific duty is infringed once they fail to take all necessary and reasonable measures within their powers to prevent crimes, repress the crimes, or submit the matter to the competent authorities.

As set out here, these two duties are interrelated and in some scenarios relevant to Article 28 there is a 'continuum' between them. When the superior had the required competence, capacity, and knowledge to prevent the crimes and he failed to do so, he would not have exercised control properly over his subordinates. Failure by the superior to prevent the crimes embodies the most symptomatic manifestation of the failure to control properly. Conversely, in relation to the specific duty to repress, differentiating between the general and the specific duty is crucial, for if the superior sufficiently discharged his general duty to exercise control properly, he should not be held responsible even if he subsequently failed to repress or submit the matter.[83]

The general duty to exercise control properly is operative even before subordinates are committing or about to commit the crimes. Although the content of this duty is entirely dependent on the situational background, there are a number of factors that may be found indicative in this inquiry. These include whether the superior took measures to inform, educate, supervise, and control the subordinates;[84] promote awareness of the Geneva Conventions and the additional Protocols;[85] establish the necessary lines of communication and reporting between the top and the bottom of the chain of command;[86] and establish a regime of internal discipline.[87]

25.5.2 Duty to 'prevent' the commission of the crimes

Prevent means 'to hinder or impede'.[88] Failure to fulfil the duty to prevent is not simply configured by failure to take action. An omission is not simply 'absence of action'. If, for instance, a window is closed in a room, one can logically neither close it on that occasion nor abstain from closing it. In addition, acts that are beyond human ability cannot be done by a person in as much as they cannot be abstained from.[89] Hence, an omission requires something more than the failure to take action.

[83] Nerlich (n 82) 678; for a different view, Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 166 and 175.

[84] Triffterer (n 1) 807.

[85] See Art 87(2) API (n 3) and para. 3558 of the Commentary (n 32), stating the following: 'If, as in many armies, the commander of a unit is responsible for the instruction of his men, it will be up to him to ensure, primarily through the commissioned and non-commissioned officers under his command, that his unit gets proper training. He will ensure that this is done either periodically or expressly before an engagement by drawing particular attention, where necessary, to the sort of action to be avoided, taking into account the situation or the morale of the troops (the probable presence of civilians in the neighbourhood of the military objective and the conduct to be observed towards them, the attitude towards an adversary wishing to surrender or with regard to recognized signs etc.).'

[86] Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 169 and fn. 140.

[87] Commentary to Art 87 of the API (n 32) para. 3549.

[88] See Black's Law Dictionary 9th edn (Saint Paul: West Publishing 2009).

[89] G Henrik Von Wright, Norma y acción, una investigación lógica (Madrid: Editorial Tecnos 1979) 62.

As set out in a report by the ILC, a military commander may contribute directly to the commission of crimes by his subordinates when he orders them to carry out a criminal act, such as killing an unarmed civilian. He may also order his subordinates to refrain from performing an act which the subordinates have a duty to perform, such as refraining from providing food for prisoners of war which results in their starvation.[90] Under these circumstances, the base crimes may be hindered by simply giving or not giving the relevant orders. However, contributions of this type are better captured by commission, ordering, aiding and abetting, etc. If, instead, what is attributed to the superior is no more than his failing to prevent or repress the unlawful conduct, we are in the field of superior responsibility.[91] The issue is highly controversial in the 'grey areas'. It is recognized that except for 'ordering',[92] every mode of liability can be satisfied by omission.[93] Hence, the ontological finding that the superior simply failed to take action does not predetermine the responsibility as a commander. This leads to complicated issues of delimitation, in particular between aiding and abetting by omission and command responsibility.[94] The most recent jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals rejects cumulative convictions as a participant and as a superior with relation to the same base crimes.[95] Thus, a proper differentiation is even more critical in practice.

The ICC has considered this question in the decision on the confirmation of charges against Laurent Gbagbo. The Chamber confirmed alternative legal characterizations [90] 1996 Report of the ILC on the work of its forty-eighth session on the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, A/CN.4/SER.A/1996/Add.l, 24.

[91] Ibid. [92] Judgment, Galić, IT-98-29-A, AC, ICTY, 30 November 2006, para. 176.

[93] See the analysis in Olásolo (n 81) 760 et seq.

[94] Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 216 et seq.; Olásolo (n 81) 760 et seq.; Burghardt (n 26) 698 et seq. An accused's failure to prevent the crime, or 'non-interference', can be considered to amount to tacit approval and encouragement of the crime. The tacit approval and encouragement of the crime may be considered aiding and abetting, when such conduct substantially contributed to the crime. See Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-A, AC, ICTY, 3 April 2007, para. 273. In the cases where this category was applied, the accused held a position of authority, he was physically present at the scene of the crime, and his non-intervention was seen as tacit approval and encouragement; see Aleksovski Trial Judgment (n 49) para. 87; Judgment, Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-T, TC II, ICTR, paras 201–2 ('Kayishema and Ruzindana Appeal Judgment'); Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, TC I, ICTR, 2 September 1998, para. 706 ('Akayesu Trial Judgment'). See also Judgment, Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, TC, ICTY, 10 December 1998, paras 205–7 ('Furundžija Trial Judgment'), discussing the Synagogue case. According to the Furundžija Trial Judgment, para. 232, '[w]hile any spectator can be said to be encouraging a spectacle—an audience being a necessary element of a spectacle—the spectator in these cases was only found to be complicit if his status was such that his presence had a significant legitimising or encouraging effect on the principals'. In cases where tacit approval or encouragement has been found to be the basis for criminal responsibility, it has been the authority of the accused combined with his presence at (or very near to) the crime scene, especially if considered together with his prior conduct, which all together allow the conclusion that the accused's conduct amounts to official sanction of the crime and thus substantially contributes to it.

[95] Judgment, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, AC, ICTY, 17 December 2004, paras 34 and 35; Judgment, Kajelijeli, ICTR-98-44A-A, AC, ICTR, 23 May 2005, para. 81; previously, for instance in Judgment, Kambanda, ICTR 97-23-A, AC, ICTR, 19 October 2000, cumulative convictions had been accepted. Conversely, recent jurisprudence considers command responsibility as a factor to be taken into account in the determination of the sentence. The Rome Statute, in Art 28, sets out that this article applies '[i]n addition to other grounds of criminal responsibility'. It is unclear what the purpose of this sentence is and the drafting history of this provision does not offer any clarification. In my view, given this sentence, cumulative convictions cannot be rejected ad initum in the framework of the Statute. This issue cannot be discussed here in any detail. As set out in para. 9 of the General Introduction to the Elements of Crimes, '[a] particular conduct may constitute one or more crimes'. In turn, Arts 20 and 21(3), embracing the 'ne bis in idem principle', play a significant role in this determination.

of the same facts proposed by the prosecutor.[96] It confirmed Gabgbo's responsibility under commission of, ordering of, and contribution to the crime in any other way; however, his responsibility as a military commander was not confirmed. The Judges found that the narrative of the facts did not point to Gbagbo's criminal responsibility based on his mere failure to prevent or repress the crimes committed by others pursuant to Article 28 of the Statute.[97] Even though the evidence indicated a failure on the part of Gbagbo to prevent violence or to take adequate steps to investigate and punish the authors of the crimes, this failure was seen as an inherent component of the deliberate effort to achieve the purpose of retaining power at any cost, including through the commission of crimes.[98] Given the circumstances of the case, the Chamber considered it convenient not to confirm Gbagbo's responsibility as a military commander.[99]

The intentional failure to prevent occurs when the superior knows that crimes are being committed or are about to be committed by his subordinates and fails to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his powers to prevent such crimes. It has been considered to reflect in nature (i) principal liability,[100] (ii) a separate crime of omission,[101] and (iii) complicity.[102]

[96] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges against Laurent Gbagbo, Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, PTC I, ICC, 12 June 2014, paras 227 and 228; 260 et seq.

[97] Ibid., para. 263. [98] Ibid., para. 264.

[99] Pursuant to the usual rules of 'concurrence of offences', in principle, the most serious forms of intervention displace the less serious. The forms of participation are displaced by perpetration, and 'ordering and inducing' displace 'aiding and abetting'; see G Jakobs, Derecho Penal Parte General, Fundamentos y teoría de la imputación, tr. Joaquín Cuello Contreras y José Luis Serrano González de Murillo 2nd edn (Madrid: Marcial Pons 1997) 1060; H-H Jesckeck/T Weigend, Tratado de Derecho Penal, Parte General, tr. Miguel Olmedo Calderete (Albolote: Comares 2002) 792. In relation to the concurrence between an action and an omission, see the critical remarks in Kaufmann (n 18) 239 n 363.

[100] This position has been reflected in the most remote legal precedents of command responsibility, see (n 5). The scenarios where the commander commits the crimes individually by omission (commission by omission) do not engage command responsibility. In turn, co-perpetration, as well as indirect perpetration, require elements which would not be fulfilled by the superior's plain failure to take measures to prevent the crimes. Co-perpetration requires an essential contribution to the common plan, which resulted (all contributions taken together and not each contribution in isolation) in the material elements of the crime. Typically, the superior would contribute to the crime by not preventing it and knowledge by the co-perpetrators that no measures to stop the crimes will be taken by the superior, who has effective control over the executors, may embrace a psychological contribution to the crime. These contributions alone would usually be insufficient to establish the level of contribution to the common plan that is required for co-perpetrators. The notions of indirect perpetration and 'control over the organization' as adopted in the jurisprudence of the Court include an element of control over the crime through control over those who execute the crimes, the subordinates; see Katanga and Ngudjolo Confirmation Decision (n 64) paras 497 et seq. Command responsibility, in relation to the crimes the subordinates decided to commit and the superior, having knowledge about them, failed to prevent, does not incorporate these elements.

[101] According to Ambos, the crimes committed by the subordinates are neither an element of the crime nor a pure objective condition to punish the superior. Instead, they constitute the 'point of reference' of the superior's failure of supervision—which should explain that a causal relationship must exist; Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 851. The superior commits a genuine offence of omission, based on his dereliction of a duty of supervision; Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 207. Critical, Meloni, 'Command Responsibility, Mode of Liability for the Crimes of Subordinates or Separate Offence of the Superior?' (n 1) 198 and 299. Ambos argues that although the commander is blamed for his failure to supervise, he is not only punished for this but also for the actual crimes of his subordinates—and this combines a direct and an indirect (victorious and accomplice) liability. It is difficult to reconcile this position with the wording of Rule 145 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Accordingly, any sentence of imprisonment must reflect the culpability of the convicted person. The convicted person cannot be punished beyond what is the subject of the legal judgment of blameworthiness. The interpretation that command responsibility embodies a crime of plain omission must be rejected in the framework of the Rome Statute for the reason that the law required 'causality'.

[102] Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 198; Nerlich (n 82) 673.

As interpreted by other commentators, the concept of command responsibility presents its most striking similarities with respect to the concept of assistance.[103] It is important to keep in mind that only principals, and not assistants or accomplices, should be blamed for 'the crimes'. Accomplices, as accessories to the crimes, are blamed for their participation in the crimes committed by someone else (the principal). That an assistant is blamed for the crime of the principal perpetrator suggests an 'extensive understanding' of the notion of perpetration, according to which all those who have introduced a condition for a criminal result should themselves be held responsible for the crimes, and the rules of accessory liability work to restrict the scope of liability. In the literature, however, a different interpretation known as the 'restrictive notion of perpetration' is predominant. According to this interpretation, only those individuals who commit the crimes are blamed for them. Other persons may be punished in addition to the perpetrator if the law prescribes special rules establishing such liability (ordering, instigation, aiding and abetting, etc.) and their liability may be 'accessorial', depending on whether the perpetrator acts.[104] The responsibility of superiors is also accessorial, for it depends on whether the subordinate is about to commit the crime. They are not responsible for the crimes, but they are made responsible only for their contribution to the crime committed by the principal arising from their failure to exercise control properly. The negligent failure to prevent the subordinates' crime, if it is also to be assimilated to assistance, encounters longstanding problems of legal interpretation[105] which have lead to interesting developments in the framework of command responsibility.[106]

[103] Nerlich (n 82) 673; Olásolo (n 81) 829; E van Sliedregt, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 200. A Report of the ILC sets out that in circumstances where the superior has actual knowledge that his subordinates are committing or about to commit crimes, he may be considered 'to be an accomplice to the crime under general principles of criminal law relating to complicity'. General Assembly, Official Records, Fifty-first Session, Supplement No. 0 (A/51/10) 38. It has to be noted that the Preparatory Committee and the Zutphen draft reflected the following language: 'In addition to other (types of complicity) (modes of participation) in crimes under this Statute, a commander is also criminally responsible (as an aider or abettor) for such crimes committed by forces under his command as a result of his failure to exercise proper control'; Preparatory Committee on the establishment of the ICC, A/AC.249/1 85 (UK Proposal); A/AC.249/L.4 (Canadian Proposal) 15.

[104] Lubanga Judgment (n 63) para. 998; Jakobs, Theorie der Beteiligung, Mohr Siebeck 2014, p. 11 et seq.

[105] There are at least two points that need to be considered carefully. First, a negligent failure to prevent may not contribute to the base crime to the same degree, from an objective perspective, as the intentional failure to prevent the crime. Indeed, in circumstances where the subordinates know that the superior is not preventing them from committing the crimes although he knows of their occurrence, the superior may be contributing to the crime psychologically—a factor which is absent in scenarios where the superior made a negligent omission. Second, old criminal law theories postulate that negligent contributions to crimes committed with intent should not be considered causal, since the intervention of an intentional agent breaks the causal relationship (a theory called in German/Spanish doctrine 'Regressverbot' or 'prohibición de regreso'); see reference in G Jakobs, Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil. Studienausgabe. Die Grundlagen und die Zurechnungslehre (Berlin: de Gruyter 1993) 24/7; and G Stratenwerth and L Kuhlen, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil, Die Straftat 4th edn (München: Vahlen 2000) 15/70. A person that sets out a negligent condition, for example by leaving a loaded gun on a table, should not be responsible for the murder committed by someone who steals the gun from his house; Stratenwerth and Kuhlen, 15/71. However, if the crime is committed by the person's own child, the penal response may be a different precisely because the of the person's position with respect to the legal interests protected as a guarantor.

[106] Nerlich (n 82) 672 et seq. has proposed the most innovative scientific development in this context. In his view, the superior should not be attributed the subordinates' conduct but only the results of such

As to the specific measures a superior is called to take, it has been insisted that they depend upon the particular circumstances of the case. It has been argued that they involve questions of evidence rather than substantive law.[107] The following considerations need to be taken into account when finding that a specific measure was necessary and reasonable:

i. A superior cannot be asked for more than what is possible and in his or her power;
ii. The superior's powers are informed by the degree of effective control over the conduct of subordinates at the time a superior is expected to act;
iii. Not all measures but only those which are necessary and reasonable to prevent subordinates from the prospective crime must be undertaken;
iv. The more grievous and/or imminent the potential crimes of subordinates appear to be, the more attentive and quicker the superior is expected to react.[108]

Academic literature and the case law of the ICTY offer a number of examples of specific measures that were expected from superiors, which include securing reports that military actions have been carried out in accordance with international law;[109] issuing orders aimed at bringing the relevant practices into accord with the rules of war;[110] securing the implementation of the orders issued; taking more active steps than the issuance of routine orders;[111] issuing special (as opposed to routine) orders and protesting against or criticizing criminal action;[112] taking disciplinary measures against the commission of atrocities;[113] or reporting to and/or insisting before a superior authority that immediate action be taken.[114] If there were mechanisms beyond giving orders within the superior's powers to prevent conduct. Van Sliedregt (n 103) 200 and 206 regards this scenario 'as a compromise solution', providing for a crime of plain omission; the same conclusion can be found in Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 220. In my view, whether or not isolating the subordinate's conduct really solves the issues of imputation, the language of Art 28 (a)(ii) and (b)(iii) makes it difficult to accommodate this thesis. The law uses the language: the commander or the superior failed to prevent 'their commission'; it does not say: failed to prevent 'the consequences' or even 'the crimes'.

[107] Orić Trial Judgment (n 36) para. 329; Orić Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 177.

[108] Ibid.

[109] Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 374; Judgment, Hadžihasanović and Kubura, IT-01-47-T, TC, ICTY, 15 March 2006, para. 153 ('Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment'). See also The Hostage Trial (n 20) 1290.

[110] Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) para. 153; Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 374. See also The Hostage Trial (n 20) 1311.

[111] Tokyo Judgment (n 45) 452: 'The duty of an Army commander in such circumstances is not discharged by the mere issue of routine orders.… His duty is to take such steps and issue such orders as will prevent thereafter the commission of war crimes and to satisfy himself that such orders are being carried out'; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) para. 153; Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 374.

[112] Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) para. 153; Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 374. See also High Command Case (n 56) 623.

[113] Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) para. 153; Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 374. See also Tokyo Judgment (n 45) 452.

[114] Orić Trial Judgment (n 36) para. 331; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) paras 153 et seq.; Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 374; Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 89. See also Tokyo Judgment (n 45) 447–8.

the crimes, then he should have brought them into operation. Appropriate measures might include postponing military operations, suspending, excluding, or redeploying violent subordinates, and conducting military operations in a manner such as to lower the risk of specific crimes or remove opportunities for their commission.[115]

In principle, the fact that subordinates ignore the orders received from their superiors points to a lack of effective control. However, the orders need to be 'genuine' and they need to be followed by consistent implementing practices. Particularly when the subordinates act under a culture of impunity, superiors will not have taken sufficient and reasonable measures to prevent the crimes if they issue formal orders not to commit crimes whilst openly carrying out a practice which is wholly contradictory to what is ordered.

An example of the said situation can be found in the Lubanga Judgment. Although analysing the responsibility of the accused under Article 25(3)(a), the Judgment dealt with a defence contention that the accused was opposed to the recruitment of children under the age of 15 into the UPC and took steps to ensure that children were demobilized. He formally prohibited the recruitment practice, ordered counter measures,[116] and followed up on such orders, by requesting implementation reports[117] and issuing supplementary demobilization decrees.[118] The Chamber concluded that the implementation of these orders had not been demonstrated, not even on a prima facie basis.[119] In spite of these orders, so reasoned the Chamber, children continued to be recruited and re-recruited into the FPLC throughout the period of the charges. The UPC/FPLC did not cooperate with NGOs working in the area of demobilization, and human rights workers were threatened in the field. The accused used children under the age of 15 as his bodyguards, and participated in speeches and rallies attended by conscripted and enlisted children under the age of 15.[120] The Chamber considered that these factors tended to undermine the suggestion that the accused's orders not to conscript or enlist children, and to demobilize those children present in the militias, were meant to be implemented.[121]

25.5.3 Duty to repress or submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution

The content of the duty to punish or submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution has been dealt with extensively in the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals under the statutory notion of 'duty to punish'. When there is a reasonable suspicion that a subordinate has committed a crime,[122] the superior is [115] Olásolo (n 81) 805; Sivakumaran (n 69) 1140.

[116] Lubanga Judgment (n 63) para. 1281. The 21 and 30 October 2002 demobilization instructions are discussed at para. 1292. The latter was read out by radio (para. 1299).

[117] Ibid., paras 1304 et seq. [118] Ibid., paras 1313 et seq. [119] Ibid., para. 1321.

[120] Ibid., paras 1346–8. [121] Ibid., para. 1348.

[122] Orić Trial Judgment (n 36) para. 336.

bound to investigate it (or have it investigated).[123] Once the facts are established, a superior empowered to sanction the perpetrators must do so.[124] If he is not the competent authority,[125] he must submit the matter to the competent authority.[126] The superior has the duty to take active steps to ensure that the perpetrators are brought to justice.[127]

There are certain requirements that need to be fulfilled in order for the statutory duty to repress to become operative. First, the subordinate's conduct must be a crime under the jurisdiction of the ICC. For instance, the planning of a crime is not per se punishable under the Rome Statue—save for the crime of aggression (in respect of which the ICC cannot exercise its jurisdiction yet). Thus, failure to repress the mere planning of a crime cannot lead to liability under Article 28. Second, such conduct must be punishable under the domestic law that the superior is called to apply, since if the domestic law does not criminalize the conduct, the superior would be unable to repress it.

It is accepted that the superior must have had effective control of the relevant subordinates at the time when measures of investigation and punishment are to be taken against them.[128] However, whether such a link is necessary with regard to the time at which the crime was committed has been subject to discussion. Superiors may have the power to punish crimes committed before they acquired authority over the forces.[129] If, for instance, a change of command following the commission of a crime

[123] Judgment, Boškoski and Tarčulovski, IT-04-82-T, TC II, ICTY, 10 July 2008, para. 418 ('Boškoski and Tarčulovski Trial Judgment'); see also Judgment, Mrkšić et al., IT-95-13/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 27 September 2007, para. 568 ('Mrkšić Trial Judgment'); Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 376; Judgment, Limaj et al., IT-03-66-T, TC II, ICTY, 30 November 2005, para. 529 ('Limaj Trial Judgment').

[124] The sanctions may be criminal or disciplinary in nature. The sanction cannot be disproportionality low in relation to the wrong that is the subject of the punishment. Examples of disciplinary sanctions include reprimands, warnings, confiscation of weapons, demotion, and dismissal from the group; financial sanctions including fines, suspension of pay, and compensation to victims; curtailing of movement, ranging from detention to house arrest; corporal sanctions, such as drill exercises or beatings; and criminal sanctions, including capital punishment; see Sivakumaran (n 69) 1143.

[125] In principle, a person cannot be found guilty both for having failed to punish the crime and for having failed to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution. The superior is either the competent authority to punish the crimes or he is not, and in the latter case he is required to submit the matter. However, in the unlikely scenario that aspects of the conduct fall under his authority whereas other aspects do not, he may infringe both the duty to repress and the duty to submit the matter.

[126] Halilović Appeal Judgment (n 17) para. 182, affirming Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) paras 97 and 100; Mrkšić Trial Judgment (n 123) para. 568; Limaj Trial Judgment (n 123) para. 529; Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 446. See also Boškoski and Tarčulovski Trial Judgment (n 123) para. 418; Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, TC, ICTY, 3 March 2000, para. 335 ('Blaškić Trial Judgment'); Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 376.

[127] See e.g. High Command Case (n 56) 623. The superior need not conduct the investigation or dispense the punishment in person, Judgment, Kvočka et al., IT-98-30/1-T, TC, ICTY, 2 November 2001 ('Kvočka Trial Judgment') para. 316; Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 100. He must at least ensure that the matter is investigated, Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 97, and transmit a report to the competent authorities for further investigation or sanction; see Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 16) para. 632; Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 126) paras 302, 335, and 464; Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 446; Kvočka Trial Judgment, para. 316; Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 July 2003, para. 461; Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, TC II, ICTY, 1 September 2004, para. 279 ('Brđanin Trial Judgment'); Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) paras 97 and 100.

[128] Ibid., para. 335; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) paras 194 et seq.

[129] This was the position taken in Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 446, and in Hadžihasanović Jurisdiction Trial Decision (n 75) paras 180 et seq. and 202. It is also supported by the

has taken place in a military setting, there should be no reason to tolerate the crimes to go unpunished. This situation arose in the Hadzihasanović case before the ICTY. The Trial Chamber affirmed superior responsibility and the decision was reversed on appeal. The Appeals Chamber took the view that, with regard to the duty to punish, the superior must have had control over the perpetrators of a relevant crime both at the time of its commission and at the time that measures to punish were to be taken.[130] The language of the Rome Statute endorses this same position. Indeed, according to the chapeaux of Article 28(a) and (b), the commander's and superior's responsibility for crimes committed by their subordinates requires that these are the result of the superior's failure to exercise control properly. Hence, the superior needs to have exercised effective control over subordinates at the time when the crimes were committed or about to be committed as well as at the time when the superior failed to repress those crimes. If, after the crimes were committed a new superior assumes command, he may be under the duty to punish such crimes according to domestic law or international humanitarian law. However, a breach of such a duty does not generate responsibility under the Rome Statue.[131] In other words, the scenario known as successor superior responsibility does not lead to liability under the Rome Statute.[132]

The Rome Statute refers to the superior's failure to 'repress' the crimes. According to the Bemba Confirmation Decision, the duty to 'repress' encompasses two separate duties arising at two different stages of the commission of crimes. First, the duty to repress includes a duty to stop ongoing crimes from continuing to be committed. Second, the duty to repress encompasses an obligation to punish forces after the commission of crimes.[133] In relation to the first duty, 'repress' means to interrupt a possible chain effect, which may lead to other similar events. It has been said that the stopping of crimes relates to the period between their prevention (the before aspect) and their punishment (the after aspect) and constitutes the 'during' aspect.[134] Arguably, however, the 'interruption' aspect may also be characterized as the intervention during the execution of the subordinates' crimes in order to prevent either (inchoate) crimes from evolving into completed crimes, or continuous or enduring crimes from continuing.[135] dissenting opinions of Appeals Judges Shahabuddeen and Hunt in Hadzihasanović Jurisdiction Appeal Decision (n 75), Partial Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, para. 1; Separate and Partially Dissenting Opinion of Judge David Hunt, paras 7 et seq.

[130] Hadzihasanović Jurisdiction Appeal Decision (n 75) paras 37 et seq. and 51, deciding by majority; Halilović Appeal Judgment (n 17) para. 67; Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 67) para. 87.

[131] For a different view, see Van Sliedregt (n 103) 192 et seq., suggesting that a gap in the line of responsibility does not exist, since these omissions can be punished in accordance with domestic law. However, she suggests that the superior successor scenario may be covered in Art 28 by the duty to report the matter to the competent authority, since in her view, the duty to report is incumbent upon the superior who exercised effective control at the time the report should have been made and not necessarily at the time when the crimes were committed (at 198). In my view, the requirement that the superior exercised control properly over the subordinates at the time the crimes were committed results from the language of the chapeaux of Art 28(a) and (b)—the crimes should be the result of the superior's failure to properly exercise control. The requirement is applicable to all the scenarios under the chapeau, including the failure to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.

[132] Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 219 et seq.; Olásolo (n 81) 787 et seq., analyses, and rejects, the proposition that an omission of this kind can be considered under Art 25(3)(c) and (d) of the Statute.

[133] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 439.

[134] Sivakumaran (n 69) 1143.

[135] Triffterer (n 1) 820.

The advantage of this interpretation is that it links the duty to repress to findings of 'blameworthiness' associated with the conduct of subordinates. This dissolves overlaps and clarifies the type and the scope of measures expected from the superior under the duty to repress—for instance, measures taken to cut troop supplies may not be relevant to repressing ongoing crimes but to preventing their continuance. As set out earlier, the term 'repress' does not find its source in the ICTY/R Statutes, which refer to 'prevent' and 'punish', but in Articles 86 and 87 of the API containing the terms 'prevent', 'repress', and 'suppress'. The interpretation I have suggested is closer to the interpretation that has been given to the terms 'prevent' and 'repress' in the commentary to the API, where the duty to prevent extends to crimes that are being committed and the duty to repress refers rather to 'punishment'.[136]

The notions of 'competence' and 'authority' are deeply rooted in legal philosophy. The competence to investigate and prosecute a crime must be based on a rule investing the person with the relevant powers. These rules establish that the relevant individual has the power to exercise jurisdiction over cases and issue decisions, following a set of required formalities. They are constitutive to the judicial authority, in the sense that no person can legally investigate, prosecute, or judge if not by virtue of such a norm and to the extent determined by the norm.[137] However, in the context of irregular armed groups, the question as to who is the competent authority has particular features. There is jurisprudence to the effect that if there was a disciplinary system available which could have been employed by the superior, this would provide an appropriate means of repression even in circumstances where the system is not advanced in the sense of not being properly codified and formally sanctioned by competent authorities.[138] It has been held unrealistic to suggest that these groups should summit offenders to those state's authorities against which they are fighting.[139] Indeed, under these circumstances, requiring such a course might be unreasonable or, because the state disciplinary system finds a substitute within the irregular force, it might be unnecessary.

25.5.4 Taking all necessary and reasonable measures within the commander's or superior's powers

Article 28 does not encompass an obligation to obtain a 'result', in the sense that the crimes are indeed hindered or repressed. The superior is bound to take measures to [136] Indeed, the Commentary to Art 86 of the API (n 32) refers at 3548 to the following: 'Using relatively broad language, the clause requires both preventive and repressive action. However, it reasonably restricts the obligation upon superiors to "feasible" measures, since it is not always possible to prevent a breach or punish the perpetrators.…Such responsibility continues if, while knowing that breaches are committed, [those responsible] refrain from taking the appropriate measures that are in their power to prevent further breaches in the future' (emphasis added). Hence, although Art 86 of the API refers to notions of 'prevention' and 'repression', the concept of repression is linked to 'punishment'. In addition, refraining from taking appropriate measures in circumstances where breaches are being committed is captured under failure to prevent rather than failure to repress.

[137] C Alchourrón and E Bulygin, Introducción a la metodología de las ciencias jurídicas y sociales (Buenos Aires: Editorial Astrea 1987) 239.

[138] Judgment, Brima et al., SCSL-04-16-T, TC II, SCSL, 20 June 2007, para. 1739.

[139] Sivakumaran (n 69) 1146.

prevent the crimes. He is also bound to take measures to punish the crimes; 'taking measures' not only qualifies prevention but also repression.[140] A superior is not required to perform the impossible[141] but is only required to take all measures that are necessary, reasonable, and within his powers.

The question as to what measures meet this standard is eminently case-specific.[142] Required are those measures 'appropriate for the superior to discharge his obligation (showing that he genuinely tried to prevent or punish)' and 'reasonably falling within the material powers of the superior'.[143] Whether the measures were disciplinary, criminal, or a combination of both cannot in and of itself be determinative of whether a superior has discharged his duty.[144]

There may be measures which are necessary though insufficient, in isolation, to prevent or punish the crimes. By requiring all necessary measures to be taken, the law aims at ensuring that there is a set of required conditions that, taken together, are sufficient to ensure that the crimes will not occur or that they will be repressed.

Measures would not be reasonable if requiring the superior to take them would be disproportionate. The proportionality determination should take into account at least two dimensions. First, it should account for the probability of occurrence of the anticipated crimes and the real capacity of the relevant measures to prevent or lessen the crimes. Second, it should take into account any consequences that may arise, in a conflict situation, from the execution of the required measures such as strategic disadvantages in a combat situation. Indeed, gaining military advantage in order to win battles may be a necessary step to protecting the subordinates, the civilians, or the values that lead to the armed confrontation. These factors cannot be overlooked and they should be part of this equation.

The measures that are within the superior's powers are not exclusively those which, by law, the superior is allowed to execute. It is not determinative whether the superior had the 'explicit legal capacity' to take such measures if it is proven that he had the material ability to act.[145]

25.5.5 The 'crimes committed' by forces or subordinates

The responsibility of commanders and superiors attach, as per the language of the Rome Statute, to crimes 'committed' by the subordinates. This calls into question whether command responsibility may only be applied in relation to crimes [140] Although this is not clear from Arts 86 and 87 of the API, para. 3548 of the Commentary (n 32) to these provisions insists that the clause requires both preventive and repressive action and that it reasonably restricts the obligation upon superiors to 'feasible' measures, since it is not always possible to prevent a breach or punish the perpetrators. In addition, it insists, it is a matter of common sense that the measures concerned are described as those 'within their power' and only those.

[141] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 16) para. 417, citing Čelebići Trial Judgment (n 46) para. 395.

[142] Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 142.

[143] Orić Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 177; Halilović Appeal Judgment (n 17) para. 63.

[144] Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 33.

[145] Čelebići Trial Judgment (n 46) para. 76. See also Boškoski and Tarčulovski Trial Judgment (n 123) para. 415.

attributable to subordinates under 'commission' stricto sensu, or whether, in a broader understanding of the term 'commission', the subordinate's attribution of responsibility under other modes of liability such as ordering, soliciting or inducing, aiding and abetting, or otherwise assisting, etc. can also be taken into account.

The ICTY Appeals Chamber endorsed the position that the superior can be held responsible for his subordinates' planning, instigating, ordering, committing, or otherwise aiding and abetting a crime.[146] The issue is not merely theoretical. In the Krnojelac case before the ICTY, the accused was convicted as a superior for the actions of camp guards who permitted individuals from outside the camp to enter and mistreat detainees, thereby ('at the least') aiding and abetting them in that mistreatment.[147]

Some commentators suggest that such an interpretation is acceptable in the framework of the Rome Statute;[148] other commentators indicate that Article 28 becomes operative only if the subordinates 'perpetrated' the crimes;[149] and finally, others require the subordinates to have performed an 'essential role'.[150] Admittedly, the term 'commission' is used in the framework of the Rome Statute both in a general[151] and in a restrictive manner.[152] Conceptually, in circumstances where the subordinates do not commit stricto sensu the crimes, they do not decide (control) whether and how the crimes will be committed. In circumstances where the subordinates merely induce or assist others (civilians, for instance) in the commission of crimes, the superior would either lack the material ability to prevent any such crimes[153] or his omission would not be causal to the result. Under these circumstances, to hold the superior responsible for the crimes is not convincing. However, accessories may be even essential to the crimes without becoming perpetrators. The superior of such an accessory, who is 'essential' although not a perpetrator, would have the material ability to prevent the crimes and, provided the crimes are committed or attempted, the omission may still be regarded 'causal'. With these limitations in place, I find it acceptable that the commander may be brought to accountability even if the subordinate has not committed the crime stricto sensu.

Article 28(a)(i) and (b)(i) set out, when regulating the superior's mental element, that the subordinates need to be committing or about to commit the crime. It is tempting to interpret the term 'about to commit the crime' as requiring the subordinates to [146] 'Commission' by a subordinate as used in Art 7(3) must be understood in a broad sense, to encompass all modes of liability listed in Art 7(1); see Nahimana Appeal Judgment (n 16) paras 485–6; Orić Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 21; Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgment (n 25) paras 280–2.

[147] Judgment, Krnojelac, IT-97-25-T, TC II, ICTY, 15 March 2002, para. 319 ('Krnojelac Trial Judgment').

[148] Nerlich (n 82) 669.

[149] Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 214.

[150] Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 151.

[151] In the definitions of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, the Statute uses the word 'committed'—unlike the Elements of Crimes, where mostly the word 'perpetrator' is used. Such general understanding is reflected in the exclusion of jurisdiction over persons under 18 according to Art 26; in the definition of the mental element pursuant to Art 30(1) as well as in relation to superior orders and prescription of law under Art 33. Moreover, considering the procedural law, a warrant of arrest under Art 58(1)(a) and the confirmation of charges under Art 61(7) proceed with respect to a person that 'committed' a crime under the jurisdiction of the Court; or each of the crimes charged. This reflects undoubtedly a general use of the notion of 'commission'.

[152] There is clearly a restrictive use of 'commission' throughout Art 25, save perhaps for para. (2) and arguably para. (3)(e).

[153] See the analysis made by Van Sliedregt (n 103) 189 et seq.

have started the execution of the crime by means of a substantial step, following the language of Article 25(3)(f) and the notions underpinning this provision.[154] In relation to the duty to repress, it is clear that, since the subordinate's conduct must be a crime under the jurisdiction of the Court, they should be deemed to commit at least an inchoate crime. However, the same consideration does not necessarily apply to the 'failure to prevent'.[155]

This question is important not least because if the superior lost effective control over his subordinates at any stage prior to the point in time when the subordinates were at least 'about to commit the crimes', the superior cannot be held liable. Notably, the different versions of the Statute do not reflect the same notion. In the English version, the wording 'about to commit' indicates that the commission will 'commence soon' or that it is 'imminent', thereby seemingly focusing on objective elements—either the temporal proximity or the existence of sufficient conditions (imminence) for a result (the subordinates' crimes) to occur. In its Spanish version, the Statute reads 'se proponían cometerlos'. This version stresses the mental element; the forces need to already have the intention or the purpose to commit the crimes. However, temporal proximity or imminence is not suggested. In turn, the French version does not reflect any specific objective or subjective limitations, and refers to 'allaient commettre'.

25.6 Proof of Causation

One of the most critical questions in relation to superior responsibility in the framework of the Rome Statute is whether causality between the superior's failure to control and the base crimes is a necessary requirement. According to an old principle in criminal law, a result can only be attributed to an individual if his conduct has caused that result.[156] A conduct has caused a result if this would not have occurred but for the conduct. Causality is mostly understood to require that the conduct must be 'conditio sine qua non' of the result (but for test) and that all conditions are equal in the sense of the equivalence theory.[157] When applied to omissions, the 'but for test' means that but for [154] Some commentators are of the view that the subordinate's attempt to commit a crime does not lead to the responsibility of the superior; Mettraux (n 46) 79; Arnold (n 1) 827.

[155] It is argued that two different formulations in the same law cannot have the same meaning. 'About to commit' shall be defined differently than 'attempt to commit'. See Triffterer (n 1) 820.

[156] Stratenwerth and Kuhlen (n 105) 104.

[157] F Dencker, Kausalität und Gesamttat (Berlin: Duncker and Humblot 1996) 25. Because all conditions are equal, according to this notion, even conduct that has produced a result in an extremely remote, unusual, and casual manner shall be considered a cause. However, not every factor that meets the 'but-for' causation standard should be deemed sufficient for the outer circle of attribution; see G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2000). Proposals have been made to identify, among all conditions which are necessary to cause a result, those most 'efficient', 'proximate', or 'facilitating' (as opposed to conditions that run contrary to causation) and to hold only these as 'causes'; see E Samson, Cursos causales hipotéticos en Derecho Penal, una contribución sobre la casualidad de la complicidad (Hammurabi 2003) 14 and 15. In Anglo-American Law, doctrine and jurisprudence discuss the concept of 'proximate cause', and in German law, cases of remote effects have been handled under the doctrine of 'social adequacy' or, according to modern doctrines, 'objective imputation'. The notion of 'social adequacy' negates causality when the result is the consequence of a completely extraordinary and unforeseeable course of events. However, there are instances when the law not only 'does not prohibit', the individual's failure to act, the result would not have occurred.[158] Whether causality is a requirement in crimes of omission is an issue that has been prominently discussed in academia.[159] Some believe that the result can be attributed to conduct in spite of the lack of causality—attribution is guided by normative considerations.[160] Others reformulate the notion of causality in a manner that ensures its applicability in cases where, as they trust, the attribution should be confirmed. They speak, in cases of omission, about quasi-causality, hypothetic causality, possible causality, or potential causality.[161]

Unlike the causality relationship between an act and a result, whereby in most cases it can be established with certainty whether the act caused the result, in crimes of omission the causality relationship is hypothetical. This is because the connection involves mentally figuring out an act that has not been executed, that would have set out a course of events that has not taken place which would have prevented a result that, in fact, did occur and, thus, no judgment of certainty can be predicated but only a judgment of (a higher or lower) probability.[162] The hypothetical causality is established if the conduct that the individual failed to perform would have made it possible for the unwished result not to occur, in the sense that it would have reduced the risk that the unwished result would occur.[163] Put otherwise, the agent's failure to discharge his duties shall have increased the risk of the result's occurrence.[164] As to the required level of risk, opinions are divided over whether it is sufficient that the failed conduct would have reduced the risk of the unwished result;[165] the result should not have occurred but at the same time incentivizes conduct from which it is usual and foreseeable that unwished results may result. For example, the production of vehicles is incentivized even though, admittedly, it produces numerous fatal victims in traffic accidents. This suggests that the linkage between a conduct and a result involves a balance between the interest in preserving the freedom which may be affected by a prohibition (to produce vehicles) and the interest in preserving legally protected values (life). Modern doctrine requires normative considerations for a finding on the attribution of a result, in addition to but-for causality, see H Frister, La imputación objetiva, Causalidad riesgo e imputación (Hammurabi 2009) 501 et seq.; or independently.

[158] Fletcher (n 157) 371.

[159] E Gimbernat Ordeig, La causalidad en la omisión impropia y la llamada 'omisión por comisión' vol. III (ADPCP 2000) 41 et seq. (see his references at fn 25). It has been argued that causality requires that the individual sets out real causal energy which is absent in crimes of omission. The most notorious version of this theory militated against the position that omissions do not set forth any causal energy, that the individual who omits 'actively' disables his impulses to become active, and such activity would have prevented the relevant result. This interpretation, called 'theory of interference' (K Binding, Die Normen und ihre Übertretung vol. II (Leipzig: Verlag von Wilhelm Engelmann 1872) 516 et seq.) is no longer seriously argued. Although loudly debated for more than 200 years, this discussion has been labelled amongst the most sterile in the criminal law science; see Kaufmann (n 18) 76.

[160] Jakobs, Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil. Studienausgabe. Die Grundlagen und die Zurechnungslehre (n 105) 7/26.

[161] C Roxin, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil Band II: Besondere Erscheinungsformen der Straftat (München: C H Beck 2003) 13/52.

[162] Ordeig (n 159) 50.

[163] Stratenwerth and Kuhlen (n 105) 13/54.

[164] Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 215.

[165] Stratenwerth and Kuhlen (n 105) 13/54. Against this notion it is argued that it holds against, and not in favour, of the accused the possibility that the result would have occurred anyway, even if the individual had acted in conformity with his duty. This conflicts with the in dubio pro reo principle. In addition, as a result, these crimes are transformed into endangering crimes; see Ordeig (n 159) 68 et seq.

with a degree of probability bordering to certainty;[166] or that the result should not have occurred with certainty.[167]

A plausible line of defence that rejects command responsibility based on lack of causality may be raised on the assumption that the crimes would have occurred even if the superior had taken the required action. This engages the different understandings of the notions of 'result' and 'causality'. An abstract understanding defines the 'result' from a pure conceptual legal perspective: i.e. the death of a person, or the burning of a house. Accordingly, if, in the situation, there were already enough conditions for a person to die or the house to burn, those who add conditions which complement the existing causes (they administer more poison to a dying person or add further fuel to a fire) would not have caused the result. A concrete understanding of the 'result', which reflects the predominant position in legal literature,[168] would look at the concrete circumstances, leaving out of the equation only those factors which are collateral and inessential. Accordingly, even if, in a given situation, there were already enough conditions for a result to occur, a modification in the course of events, in the causal chain leading up to the result, may be considered a 'cause'. A concrete understanding of these notions makes it unnecessary, in relation to crimes of omission, to establish that the result would have failed altogether had the individual discharged his duty. This verification, applied to Article 28, means that the superior's omission does not necessarily lack causality for the reason that, in the abstract, crimes of the same type would have occurred even if the superior had taken the required action.

There is an argument which suggests that, whatever the theoretical discussion on causality in crimes of omission may dictate, the language of Article 28 makes it a requirement. It is required that the crimes be the result of the commander's or superior's failure to exercise control properly over forces or subordinates, and hence causality appears as a requirement by law.[169] Such language is not present in the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals, and these tribunals have rejected the causality requirement—command responsibility has been interpreted as responsibility for the plain omission.[170]

[166] This is the predominant position in academia and in the German jurisprudence; see for instance Bundesgerichtshof, Neue Zeitschrift für Strafrecht 1985, 27. Arguments similar to those discussed in the previous footnote can be raised against this interpretation. In addition, this notion is criticized from the perspective that it becomes of difficult application if what is necessary in order to avoid an unwished consequence is the intervention of a third person; see Ordeig (n 159) 52. However, as has been rightly argued to the contrary, it cannot be a valid defence against the finding of quasi-causality that a third person may not have acted according to the law; I Puppe and W Schild, Nomos Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch (Baden-Baden: Nomos 2001) prior to s. 13, n 119.

[167] E Mezger, Strafrecht, ein Lehrbuch (Berlin: Duncker and Humblot 1933) 138; R Hertzberg, 'Die Kausalität beim unechten Unterlassungsdelikt' (1971) Monatsschrift für Deutsches Recht 883. Against this notion it is argued that because the causality relationship is indeed hypothetical, no judgment of certainty can be predicated but only a judgment of probability; see Ordeig (n 159) 64.

[168] Jakobs, Strafrecht. Allgemeiner Teil. Studienausgabe. Die Grundlagen und die Zurechnungslehre (n 105) 7/15.

[169] Ambos, 'Joint Criminal Enterprise and Command Responsibility' (n 19) 178; Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 215; Nerlich (n 82) 675; Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 193.

[170] Halilović Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 54; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) paras 75 and 191. See also Orić Trial Judgment (n 36) para. 293.

Another interpretation of the law, which is equally plausible from a grammatical point of view, links the term result to the superior's criminal responsibility.[171] In this interpretation, causality between the superior's omission and the subordinates' crimes is not an explicit requirement in Article 28. Instead, the law is read to indicate that the superior's criminal responsibility (and not necessarily the base crime) results from the superior's failure to exercise control properly. However, this interpretation has never been discussed or envisaged during the negotiations of the Rome Statute. In fact, the drafting development of this provision tends to reject this interpretation.[172] Hence, the interpretation according to which the expression result links the crimes and the failure to exercise control properly is preferable.

This interpretation, however, needs to take into account that, because this language is included in the chapeaus to (a) and (b) of Article 28, causality should be understood as a requirement as regards all modalities of superior responsibility. Thus, the relationship between the general duty to exercise control properly and the specific duty to prevent, to punish, and to submit the matter needs to be clarified in a manner that avoids the unacceptable conclusion that the failure to repress a crime is required to have caused that crime. Indeed, since the superior's failure to punish is necessarily subsequent to the commission of crimes, a causality relationship between the two cannot be required.[173]

As set out here, the duties to exercise control properly and the duty to take all necessary and reasonable measures to prevent, repress, and submit the matter can be and need to be clearly distinguished.[174] Importantly, the general duty to exercise control

[171] Amicus Curiae Observations on Superior Responsibility Submitted Pursuant to Rule 103 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-406, Amnesty International, 20 April 2009, para. 39.

[172] See the language used in various proposals of the Preparatory Committee and the Zutphen draft, which suggests more clearly that the 'criminally responsible' is connected to 'crimes committed by forces': 'In addition to other (types of complicity) (modes of participation) in crimes under this Statute, a commander is also criminally responsible (as an aider or abettor) for such crimes committed by forces under his command as a result of his failure to exercise proper control'; Preparatory Committee on the establishment of the ICC, A/AC.249/1 85 (UK Proposal); A/AC.249/L.4 (Canadian Proposal) 15. The Zutphen draft suggests a similar conclusion: '[In addition to other forms of responsibility for crimes under this Statute, a [commander] [superior] is criminally responsible] [A [commander] [superior] is not relieved of responsibility] for crimes under this Statute committed by [forces] [subordinates] under his or her command [or authority] and effective control as a result of the [commander's] [superior's] failure to exercise properly this control'; Report of the Inter-sessional meting from 19 to 30 January 1998 in Zutphen, the Netherlands, A/AC.249/1998/L.13 4 February 1994, 55.

[173] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 424; Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 173 and 175.

[174] The superior's 'failure to exercise control properly' has been argued to set out a sufficient causal chain that may be interrupted by necessary and reasonable measures, to be taken at the time the duties to prevent and repress become operative. Provided the former are not discharged, these second omissions would confirm and strengthen the causal connection; O Triffterer, 'Causality, a Separate Element of the Doctrine of Superior Responsibility as Expressed in Article 28 Rome Statute?' (2002) 15 Leiden Journal of International Law 176, 196 et seq. This interpretation is precisely aimed at addressing the inconsistency that arises when causality between the crimes and the dereliction of the duty to repress those crimes is considered a requirement. However, it is questionable whether a failure to repress and submit the matter can display any confirmation or strengthening effect in the causality of crimes which have already been committed; Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 173 and 174. In another attempt to make sense of the causality requirement as regards the duty to repress, it has been proposed that causality should not be established between the failure of the superior and the crimes of the properly does not relate in an equivalent parallel manner to the specific duties to prevent on the one hand, and repress on the other. Indeed, there is a continuum between the failure to exercise control properly and the failure to take measures to prevent the crimes.[175] I believe that failure to take reasonable and necessary measures within the superior's powers to prevent the crimes is the most serious manifestation of improper control.[176] This continuum is disrupted in relation to the duty to repress the crimes, which arises only after the crimes have been committed. The failure to repress is entirely inconclusive as to the existence of the previous omission, i.e. the failure to exercise control properly. Therefore, these two omissions need to be established separately and, as per the language of the law, the crimes need to be the result of the superior's failure to exercise control properly and not the result of his failure to repress.

Finally, it needs to be pointed out that commanders and superiors cannot be held responsible for having 'attempted' not to prevent the commission of crimes by subordinates. If, for instance, the superior had the wrong perception that his troops were committing crimes and did nothing to prevent them, he cannot be held responsible. In the framework of the Rome Statute, only those who attempt to 'commit' a crime can incur inchoate liability—cases of command or superior liability are not covered.

25.7 Mens Rea Requirements

In setting out the mens rea requirement applicable to commanders and superiors, Article 28 refers to three different standards whereby the individual (i) had knowledge of, (ii) should have known about, or (iii) consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated that the subordinates were committing or about to commit the crimes.

In the context of command responsibility, the acts and conduct performed by the subordinates and the results are, in relation to the superior, a 'consequence'.[177] Article 30(1) requires that the material elements of the crime be committed with intent and knowledge, and 'knowledge' is defined in Article 30(3) as awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. The same provision specifies that intent and knowledge are required 'unless otherwise provided'. Article 28 expressly provides 'otherwise' by lowering the mens rea subordinates but between the omission of the superior and the impunity of the subordinates; Mettraux (n 46) 89. However, in this interpretation, the impunity of the perpetrators and no longer the crimes would have to be demonstrated as the result of the commander's or superior's failure to exercise control properly. Thus, I am not sure this interpretation can be said to follow from an ordinary reading (see ibid., 85) of the chapeau of Art 28.

[175] Accordingly, it should be unnecessary to prove that a sufficient causal chain has been put in motion by means of a dereliction of the duty to control subordinates properly in advance of the dereliction of the specific duty to prevent the crimes.

[176] The reverse reasoning would not be acceptable. As set out here, the ability to prevent a crime is not necessarily a prerequisite to proving effective control; see Perišić Appeal Judgment (n 67) para. 88. A superior may have been unable to prevent a crime and nonetheless may still have had effective control over his subordinates.

[177] Kiss, 'La contribución en la comisión de un crimen por un grupo de personas en la jurisprudencia de la Corte Penal Internacional' (n 10) 23.

requirements in relation to one material element: the crime committed by the forces/subordinates. In this respect, it is sufficient that a commander under Article 28(a) should have known or a superior under Article 28(b) consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated that the forces or the subordinates were committing or about to commit the crimes. This necessarily implies that Article 28 also 'provides otherwise' as regards the subjective side of the 'causality' element. It would be nonsensical not to require knowledge of the crimes committed by the forces/subordinates but to require knowledge that the omission caused those crimes. Article 28 does not provide specific mens rea considerations with respect to any other material element and therefore, pursuant to Article 30(1), these elements must be committed with intent and knowledge.

It is possible that the base crime requires some kind of special intent, such as the 'intent to destroy' in the crime of genocide. However, it is unnecessary that the superior possesses any special intent or specific subjective element required in the base crime. The superior need not share the special intent to destroy the group but it is sufficient that he knew (should have known or consciously disregarded information indicating that) the subordinates were acting with this intention.[178] This is compatible with a view that will be addressed later, according to which only principals are blamed for 'the crime' and accessories are blamed for their participation in the crime—commanders and superiors are made responsible for crimes committed by their subordinates, as a result of their failure to exercise control properly.

As indicated, Article 28's distinction between military and non-military was based on the understanding that the mental requirements for liability of non-military leaders should be higher than for their military counterparts. According to a US proposal made during the negotiations of the Rome Statute,[179] military commanders could be held responsible under a negligence standard (should have known), whereas for non-military superiors, knowledge was required. A compromise counterproposal from Argentina, Canada, and Germany opened a midway between the knowledge and the negligence standards discussed for non-military superiors—they need to have consciously disregarded information which clearly enabled them to conclude in the circumstances of the time that subordinates were committing or about to commit a crime.[180] A subsequent proposal ended with what is the current language of Article 28(b)(i).[181] The interpretation below, of the notions 'should have known' and 'consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated', will take into account this drafting history.

25.7.1 Knowledge

The 'intent' requirement is defined, in Article 30, by reference to conduct, consequence, and circumstance. Pursuant to Article 30(2)(a), a person has intent if he or she 'means to engage in the conduct'. Under Article 30(2)(b), in relation to a consequence, it is sufficient that the individual 'is aware that [the consequence] will occur in the ordinary course of events'. Finally, by Article 30(3) 'knowledge' 'means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events'.[182]

[178] Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 221.
[179] Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 848. [180] Ibid.
[181] UN Doc A/CONF183/C.1/WGGP/L.7 (1998). The requirement that the information was indicated 'clearly' was introduced later in the negotiations.

As set out earlier, commanders and superiors may incur criminal liability if they knew that their forces and subordinates were committing crimes or about to commit crimes. The acts and conduct performed by the subordinates and the results thereof are, in relation to the superior, considered to be 'consequences'.[183] As such, 'knowledge' in relation to a consequence can only be predicated once it has already occurred. In relation to the superior's failure to prevent the crime, it is necessary that the crime will not have occurred, or be completed or exhausted by the time the superior failed to prevent it. At the time an individual acts, or fails to act, the law does not require more than awareness, based on her knowledge of how events ordinarily develop, that the consequence will occur in the future. The knowledge that a consequence will occur in the future involves a prognosis, based on the rules of causality and general experience, asserting the existence of a 'possibility' or a 'probability' that, if an individual acts or fails to act and the events follow their ordinary course, the consequence will occur. The ICC Appeals Chamber has clarified that absolute certainty about a future occurrence can never exist; therefore the standard for the foreseeability of events is virtual certainty.[184] Instead, it would be wrong to require certainty in this equation, for such a finding would need to take into account not only 'the ordinary course of events', but also exceptional and abnormal developments.

At the inception of this mode of liability, a finding that the commander knew about the crimes was based on two factors: (i) his official position of authority; and (ii) the notorious and widespread character of the crimes committed by the subordinates. In circumstances where a great number of offences were committed and a reasonable man could come to no other conclusion than that the accused must have known of the commission of the offences, 'constructive notice' was affirmed. This was the standard set in the Judgment of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, in the case of US v Soemu Toyoda.[185] At the time, however, the jurisprudence may have been

[182] Lubanga Judgment (n 63) para. 1007.

[183] Kiss, 'La contribución en la comisión de un crimen por un grupo de personas en la jurisprudencia de la Corte Penal Internacional' (n 10) 23.

[184] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014, para. 447; Lubanga Judgment (n 63) para. 1012.

[185] The Tribunal found that in the absence of proof beyond reasonable doubt that the accused ordered his troops to commit atrocities, command responsibility required (i) that the atrocities were actually committed; and (ii) notice of the commission thereof. Such notice may be either (i) actual notice, as in the case of an accused who actually sees the commission or who is informed about it shortly afterwards; or (ii) constructive notice, in the sense that such a great number of offences were committed within his command that a reasonable man could come to no other conclusion than that the accused must have known of the commission of the offences or the existence of a routine for their commission that was understood and acknowledged; International Military Tribunal for the Far East in the case of US v Soemu Toyoda, 6 September 1949 (vol. 39, Official Transcript of Record of Trial) 5005 et seq.

less sophisticated on whether 'knowledge' was considered presumed/established from these factors or, instead, whether they served as a factual basis for circumstantial evidence.[186] Today, constructive knowledge would not be permissible to affirm that the superior knew about the subordinate's crimes.[187] More recent jurisprudence is clear to the effect that the superior needs to possess actual knowledge with regards to all material elements of the crimes. The actual knowledge of the accused may be established by way of direct or indirect evidence.[188] However, circumstantial evidence must be distinguished from a 'presumption'.[189] The latter would not be admissible[190] to the extent that it involves a reversal of the burden of proof or imposes on the accused an onus of rebuttal.

The Bemba Confirmation Decision has listed a number of factors that may be considered indicative of the superior's knowledge, and the widespread nature of the crimes is indeed included:

> These factors include the number of illegal acts, their scope, whether their occurrence is widespread, the time during which the prohibited acts took place, the type and number of forces involved, the means of available communication, the modus operandi of similar acts, the scope and nature of the superior's position and responsibility in the hierarchal structure, the location of the commander at the time and the geographical location of the acts. Actual knowledge may be also proven if, 'a priori, [a military commander] is part of an organised structure with established reporting and monitoring systems'. Thus, the Chamber considers that these factors

[186] In NMT Case 4, USA v Pohl et al., 18 officials of the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office were charged with crimes that occurred in the concentration and labour camps of the SS in Germany and the occupied territories. According to the prosecution, approximately ten million persons were imprisoned in these camps. In addition to Pohl, a few defendants were charged with responsibility for crimes allegedly committed by their military units while they were on active military duty (see <http://nuremberg.law.harvard.edu/php/docs_swi.php?DI=1&text=pohl#trial_chronology> accessed 13 March 2015). This was the case with regard to the conviction of Karl Mummenthey, an SS Officer who was made business manager of a large establishment of brickworks, quarries, and ceramic industries. The establishment used concentration camp labour: up to 15,000 inmates at one time. Several thousand persons died in these camps as a result of inadequate work conditions, beatings, and starvation. The accused asserted that he could see nothing illegal or improper in all Hitler's doings and in all of the Gestapo's doings. He argued that he did not know about what was happening in the labour camps under his jurisdiction. The Tribunal found that this contention did not exonerate him, for he was under a 'duty to know'. However, this finding would be necessary to establish responsibility in spite of the fact that the accused did not know. The Tribunal made it clear that the accused managed enterprises based strictly on concentration camp labour force, he received reports from the managers, and he visited and inspected the camps where the poor physical condition of the inmates was obvious; on a daily basis, inmate workers passed by the very building where the accused had his office. The US NMT Tribunal asserted that he 'couldn't help knowing'; he 'could not have failed to know'; and that he 'could not but be aware'. Today, a Tribunal would probably enter a finding of knowledge based on all these facts.

[187] Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 221; Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 181.

[188] Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 368; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) para. 94; Čelebići Trial Judgment (n 46) paras 383 and 386. See also Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 127) para. 278; Krnojelac Trial Judgment (n 147) para. 94; Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 427.

[189] Kiss, El delito de peligro abstracto (n 43) 95 et seq.

[190] Strugar Trial Judgment (n 56) para. 368; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) para. 94; Čelebići Trial Judgment (n 46) para. 386. See also Brđanin Trial Judgment (n 127) para. 278; Krnojelac Trial Judgment (n 147) para. 94; Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment (n 68) para. 427.

are instructive in making a determination on a superior's knowledge within the context of article 28 of the Statute.[191]

In the jurisprudence of the Court, the idea has gained credence that a literal interpretation of the law, particularly the use of the words 'will occur' in Article 30(2)(b) as opposed to 'may occur', excludes the concept of dolus eventualis.[192] This implies that a low risk, perceived by the accused at the time he acted, that the consequence (the subordinate's crime) would occur in the ordinary course of events would be insufficient; what is required is virtual certainty.[193] These considerations, which have been developed in the framework of crimes of 'commission', are applicable to situations where the accused failed to act.

This needs to be distinguished from the (objective) question of quasi-causality in crimes of omission. The omission is quasi-causal of a result if the agent's failure to discharge his duties has increased the risk of the result's occurrence.[194] Following a majority view, there needs to be a degree of probability bordering on certainty that the result should not have occurred had the guarantor acted.[195] This describes the 'objective side' of the hypothetical link between the omission and the crime, which engages verification by an external observer and not necessarily by the suspect himself.[196] In turn, under the knowledge modality in Article 28, all material elements of the crime need to be committed with intent and knowledge and this includes the quasi-causality link. If the suspect, having a vacillating perception, attached a low probability to the assumption that the crimes may follow from his abstention, he will not have omitted with knowledge.

There is a clear degree of inconsistency in accepting the criminalization of negligent commanders but rejecting dolus eventualis. The rejection of dolus eventualis opens an unsystematic gap in the continuum between negligence, advertent negligence, dolus eventualis, and dolus directus of the second and of the first degree with respect to the material element of 'crimes committed by the subordinates'. In theory, this gap could be filled by creating an ad hoc notion of 'knowledge' in command responsibility, one that would integrate the concept of dolus eventualis. Notably, the mental element in Article 30(2) and (3) is solely defined 'for the purposes of this article'. Another option, that would privilege certainty over consistency, is to treat the relevant cases under negligence.

Finally, the individual needs to act with intent and knowledge with respect to the following material elements: his position, whether as a commander, a person acting as a military commander, or a superior; the fact that he has command, authority, or control over his forces or subordinates; and the fact that he has failed to exercise control

[191] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 434.

[192] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014, paras 447–9; Lubanga Judgment (n 63) para. 1007; Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) paras 364–9.

[193] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014, para. 447. Lubanga Judgment (n 63) para. 1012.

[194] Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 215

[195] Stratenwerth and Kuhlen (n 105) 166.

[196] The external observer will identify the existence of a general rule, of natural causality or general experience, which would explain how the act that has not taken place would have impacted on the unwished consequence.

properly. These material elements are all 'circumstances' in the sense of Article 30(3) and thus the superior needs to be aware of their existence.

If the commander, upon analysis of the information at his disposal, makes the mistaken conclusion that his forces are not committing crimes, he cannot be held liable under Article 28 for having knowingly omitted. However, such a mistake under Article 32(1) may lead to an assessment of his responsibility under the 'should have known' standard.[197]

25.7.2 Military commanders and persons effectively acting as such—'should have known'

The 'should have known' standard corresponds to a negligence standard. A person who negligently acts or omits, fails to perceive the risk associated to his actions or omissions, although he or she should have perceived it. That the commander failed to perceive a risk involves at least three scenarios: (i) the commander was in possession of information containing relevant facts upon which he should have inferred the associated risk; (ii) the commander was not in possession of such information, although in light of the information that he did possess he should have been alarmed so as to conduct additional investigations in order to ascertain whether the offences were being committed; (iii) the commander was not even in possession of alarming information.

As a preliminary point, following the Nuremberg and ICTY jurisprudence, the relevant information only needs to have been provided or available to the commander, or 'in the possession of' the commander. It is not required that he actually acquainted himself with the information.[198] This is consistent with the interpretation given to Article 86(2) of API; according to the commentary, this provision means that a superior cannot absolve himself from responsibility by pleading ignorance of reports addressed to him, or by invoking temporary absence as an excuse.[199]

In The Hostage Trial, the US Military Tribunal sentenced Wilhelm List, a military commander that performed as the highest authority of the German armed forces in the Balkans during the occupation of Yugoslavia and Greece. The occupation triggered a guerrilla resistance whose members tortured and mutilated German prisoners and organized sabotage missions that increasingly threatened the German position in the area. Lizt ordered '[r]uthless and immediate measures against the insurgents, against their accomplices and their families. (Hanging, burning down of villages involved, seizure of more hostages, deportation of relatives, etc., into concentration camps).'[200] One of his subordinates (Franz Boehme) ordered that, '(a) [f]or each killed or murdered German soldier or Volksdeutsche (men, women or children) one hundred prisoners or hostages, (b) [f]or each wounded German soldier or Volksdeutsche 50 prisoners or hostages'.[201] The Tribunal held that List knew or ought to have known

[197] Ambos, 'Superior Responsibility' (n 1) 870.

[198] Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 16) para. 61 et seq. and 406; Čelebići Appeal Judgment (n 24) para. 239; Hostages case, Trial of Wilhelm List and Others, Law Reports of Trials of Major War Criminals Vol. Viii p. 34, United States Military Tribunal, Nuremberg, 8 July 1947 to 19 February 1948.

[199] Commentary to Art 86 of the API (n 32) para. 3545 quoting 'The Hostage Trial'. Similar reasoning in the High Command Case (n 56) 603.

[200] Ibid. [201] Ibid.

that such an order was illegal and that, as the commanding general of an occupied territory, he was charged with the duty of maintaining peace, punishing crime, and protecting lives and property within the area of his command. The accused argued that he had no knowledge of many of the unlawful killings of innocent inhabitants which took place, because he was absent from the headquarters. The Tribunal found that a commanding general of occupied territory is 'charged with notice of occurrences taking place within [his territory of command]'. He has the power to require:

> adequate reports of all occurrences that come within the scope of his power and, if such reports are incomplete or otherwise inadequate, he is obliged to require supplementary reports to apprize him of all the pertinent facts. If he fails to require and obtain complete information, the dereliction of duty rests upon him and he is in no position to plead his own dereliction as a defense.[202]

According to this and other precedents in the Nuremberg jurisprudence, the commander had the duty to conduct inquiries[203] and the duty to know,[204] which implies searching for the information about possible crimes. Lack of knowledge based on his failure to search for such information would not relieve him of criminal liability.

The Nuremberg jurisprudence also contains precedents where the obligations contingent upon the commanders have been interpreted in a more 'restrictive' manner. Indeed, in the High Command case, the Tribunal insisted that there must be a personal dereliction and that the commander's failure to properly supervise his subordinates must constitute criminal negligence on his part. His negligence needs to reach a degree such that it amounts to a wanton, immoral disregard of the action of his subordinates amounting to acquiescence.[205]

Article 86(2) of API seems to have set out a threshold which is more akin to the one reflected in the quoted paragraphs of the High Command precedent than 'The Hostage Trial' jurisprudence. The provision required that the superiors at least 'had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time' that the subordinate was committing a crime.[206] A proposal of Working Group A of Committee

[202] The Hostage Trial (n 20) 1271.

[203] General Tribunal of the Military Government of the French Zone of Occupation in Germany, Judgment Rendered on 30 June 1948 in the Case versus Hermann Roechling and Others Charged with Crimes against Peace, War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 Vol. XIV (Washington: United States Government Printing Office) Appendix B, 1088.

[204] Superior Military Government Court of the French Occupation Zone in Germany, Judgment of 25 January 1949 in the Case Versus Hermann Roechling and Others Charged with Crimes against Peace, War Crimes, and Crimes against Humanity. Decision on Writ of Appeal against the Judgment of 30 June 1948, in Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10 Vol. XIV (Washington: United States Government Printing Office) Appendix B, 1106.

[205] The High Command Case (n 56) 543–4 and 603. The Tribunal also stated that any failure to acquaint themselves with the contents of such reports, or a failure to require additional reports where inadequacy appears on their face, constitutes a dereliction of duty which he cannot use on his own behalf.

[206] Whereas the English text reads 'information which should have enabled them to conclude', the latter reads 'des informations leur permettant de conclure', which literally means 'information enabling them to conclude'. Pursuant to Art 102 of API, the two texts are equally authentic. Some jurisprudence suggests that the French version is truer to the object and purpose of the text; see Blaškić Trial Judgment (n 126) para. 326.

I submitted the following wording: 'if they knew or had the possibility of knowing in the circumstances at the time'.[207] Confronting this proposal, which was not adopted, with the actual text of Article 86(2) it becomes clear that what is required is that the information enabling the superior to conclude that the crimes were being committed was in the superior's possession. He needs to have the information enabling him to conclude that crimes were being committed, as opposed to having (alarming) information enabling him to conclude that more information was needed. Indeed, the commentary to API restating the findings made in the High Command case quoted, established that 'the negligence must be so serious that it is tantamount to malicious intent'.[208]

The Statutes of the ICTY, ICTR, and SCSL contain the 'had reason to know' standard. According to the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY, it is sufficient that, at the critical time, the commander or the superior had general information in his possession which would put him on notice of possible unlawful acts committed by his subordinates.[209] The superior does not need to be aware of a 'strong risk' that his subordinates would commit crimes;[210] it is enough that he possessed information sufficiently alarming to justify further inquiry.[211] A superior would not incur criminal responsibility for neglecting to acquire knowledge of the acts of his subordinates, unless sufficiently alarming information was available to him.[212] The Tribunal provided examples of types, sources, and degrees of specificity of the required information.[213]

[207] CDDH, Official Records, Vol. X, CDDH/I/321/Rev.1, 21 April–11 June 1976, 153.

[208] The commentary to Art 86 to API expands on this notion as follows: 3541 'However, this does not mean that every case of negligence may be criminal. For this to be so, the negligence must be so serious that it is tantamount to malicious intent, (27) apart from any link between the conduct in question and the damage that took place.' The commentary adds that '[(27) p.1012] In a 1952 trial ("USA v Schultz") the United States Court of Military Appeals decided that mere negligence did not constitute a universally recognized basis for criminal responsibility (cf. B.M. Carnaham, "The Law of War in the United States Court of Military Appeals", XX 3–4, RDPMDG, 1981, 343–344). Art 15 of the Swiss Military Penal Code provides that "commet un crime ou un délit par négligence celui qui, par une imprévoyance coupable, agit sans se rendre compte ou sans tenir compte des conséquences de son acte. L'imprévoyance est coupable quand l'auteur de l'acte n'a pas usé des précautions commandées par les circonstances et par sa situation personnelle" (anyone who, as a result of criminal negligence, acts without realizing or taking into account the consequences of his act is committing an offence. Such lack of foresight is criminal when the perpetrator of the act has not used precautions required by the circumstances and by his personal situation (translated by the ICRC)).' Commentary (n 32).

[209] Čelebići Appeal Judgment (n 4) paras 235 and 238. Strugar Appeal Judgment (n 65) para. 298; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment (n 25) para. 28. The Commentary to API refers to 'reports addressed (to the superior),… the tactical situation, the level of training and instruction of subordinate officers and their troops, and their character traits' as potentially constituting the information referred to in Art 86(2) of the API. Commentary (n 32).

[210] See Strugar Appeal Judgment (n 65) para. 304.

[211] Ibid., para. 298.

[212] Čelebići Appeal Judgment (n 24) para. 232. See also Blaškić Appeal Judgment (n 16) para. 406; Hadžihasanović and Kubura Trial Judgment (n 109) para. 96.

[213] The superior's actual knowledge of crimes previously committed by subordinates and his failure to punish them is not, by itself, sufficient to conclude that the commander knew that similar offences would be committed by the same perpetrators. However, such failure may be relevant to determine whether 'a superior possessed information that was sufficiently alarming to put him on notice of the risk that similar crimes might subsequently be carried out by subordinates and justify further inquiry.' The ICTY Appeals Chamber maintained that, '[a]s to the form of the information available to him, it may be written or oral, and does not need to have the form of specific reports submitted pursuant to a monitoring system. This information does not need to provide specific information about unlawful acts committed or about to be committed. For instance, a military commander who has received information that some of the soldiers

The Rome Statute spells out the 'should have known' standard in relation to commanders. According to the Bemba Confirmation Decision, the ICTY 'had reasons to know' and Article 28 'should have known' thresholds are not identical;[214] they differ in that the latter requires more of an active duty on the part of the superior to take the necessary measures to secure knowledge of the conduct of his troops and to inquire, regardless of the availability at the time of information concerning the commission of the crime.[215] In the academic literature, opinions are divided.[216]

I believe the Rome Statue has gone further in the scope of liability than the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals. A joint reading of Article 28(a)(i) and (b)(i) suggests that the commander cannot escape responsibility for the reason that the information at his disposal did not clearly point to his force's commission of crimes (unlike non-military superiors, for whom it is required that they 'consciously disregarded information' and that the information 'clearly indicated' the commission of crimes). This means that the commanders have a duty to obtain the relevant information. It has been recognized that they are responsible for the establishment of a system of reporting and vigilance and they cannot benefit from a failure to discharge this duty that results in the unavailability of the relevant information.[217]

However, if in spite of the existence of an operational system of reporting and monitoring the alarming information is absent, there is an issue as to whether the omission can still be criminalized as negligent. This is a discussion that has been ongoing for many years, indeed more than 200, under the heading 'unconscious or inadvertent negligence'. Those who oppose the criminalization of unconscious negligence highlight the ultima ratio character of criminal law, the lack of need to punish certain infractions, and the inevitability of human mistake.[218] The arguments in favour of criminalization can also be traced to antiquity. These support the wrongdoing of under his command have a violent or unstable character, or have been drinking prior to being sent on a mission, may be considered as having the required knowledge'; Čelebići Appeals Judgment (n 24) para. 235. In addition, knowledge about past crimes does not necessarily indicate knowledge that crimes would be committed in the future. However, depending on the circumstances, knowledge about past crimes may indicate that the superior had reason to know, since it may qualify as 'alarming' information, demanding the superior's responsibility to inquire; see Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment (n 25) paras 30 et seq. In addition, a finding that a 'superior's failure to punish a crime of which he has knowledge automatically constitutes sufficiently alarming information under the "had reason to know" standard, irrespective of the circumstances of the case' would amount to an error of law. Moreover, 'a superior's failure to punish a crime of which he has actual knowledge is likely to be understood by his subordinates at least as acceptance, if not encouragement, of such conduct with the effect of increasing the risk of new crimes being committed'; see Hadžihasanović and Kubura Appeal Judgment (n 25) paras 30 and 31.

[214] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) 432. [215] Ibid., 433.

[216] The two standards ('should have known' and 'had reason to know') correspond to each other, according to Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 224. The two standards differ substantially, according to Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 184 and 185; G Vetter, 'Command Responsibility of Non-Military Superiors in the International Criminal Court' (2000) 25 Yale Journal of International Law 89.

[217] Meloni, Command Responsibility in International Criminal Law (n 27) 184 and 185.

[218] See A Koch, 'Zur Strafbarkeit unbewusster Fahrlässigkeit, Ein Streifzug durch zwei Jahrhunderte deutscher Strafrechtsdogmatik' (2010) Zeitschrift für Internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik 175 (quoting Karl Ferdinand Hommel 1722–81) 177 <http://www.zis-online.com/dat/artikel/2010_3_423.pdf> accessed 6 August 2014.

unconscious negligence in the failure to make efforts, which, where possible and necessary, prevent harm.[219] It has been even held that unconscious negligence is not per se less serious than conscious negligence. Those acting under conscious negligence do advert to the risk attached to their conduct, but they make a wrong prognosis as to the inevitability of the unwished result.[220] In turn, unconscious negligence involves an element of indifference before the legally protected interests.[221]

Throughout the drafting history of Article 28 the delegates included, as a material element of the crime in cases where the commander or the superior 'should have known' about the crimes, the requirement that the crimes were widespread 'due to the widespread commission of offences'.[222] Clearly, the text of Article 28 has not reflected this requirement.[223] The jurisprudence of the Court has, quite rightly, pointed to this factor as being an indication of knowledge[224] (or lack thereof) instead of an objective requirement.

25.7.3 Superiors—'consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated'

As set out in the previous section with respect to military commanders and persons effectively acting as such, they may be made liable even if they did not perceive the risk associated with their omissions. This standard is different from the purpose, knowledge, and recklessness standards by which it is indeed required that the suspect is aware of the risk.[225]

Article 28(b)(i) poses a higher threshold for the liability of non-military superiors compared to military commanders. Accordingly, the person must have at least consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated that the subordinates were committing or about to commit the crimes. This means that information must exist which clearly indicates the commission of crimes. General information about the commission of crimes, which may be sufficient in relation to military commanders to at least trigger the duty to conduct further investigations, would not be

[219] Ibid., 180 (quoting Ernst Ferdinand Klein 1744–1810).

[220] Ibid., 181.

[221] Stratenwerth and Kuhlen (n 105) 13/31.

[222] Preparatory Committee on the establishment of the ICC, A/AC.249/1 85 (UK Proposal); A/AC.249/L.4 (Canadian Proposal) 15; A/AC.249/1997/WG.2/CRP.3; A/AC.249/L.5, 23; A/AC.249/L.13, 55; A/CONF.183/2/Add.1 51.

[223] The Prosecution's case in the Yamashita Trial was based on the inference that 'the crimes were so extensive and widespread, both as to time and area, that they must either have been wilfully permitted by the accused, or secretly ordered by the accused'. The commission accepted the principle, as follows: 'It is absurd, however, to consider a commander a murderer or rapist because one of his soldiers commits a murder or a rape. Nevertheless, where murder and rape and vicious, revengeful actions are widespread offences, and there is no effective attempt by a commander to discover and control the criminal acts, such a commander may be held responsible, even criminally liable, for the lawless acts of his troops, depending upon their nature and the circumstances surrounding them.' Trial of General Tomoyuki Yamashita, Case No. 21, IV Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 1, United States Military Commission, Manila, 8 October–7 December 1945 <http://lawofwar.org/Yamashita%20Commission.htm> accessed 18 March 2013.

[224] Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 28) para. 434.

[225] Ambos, Treatise (n 19) 224.

sufficient under Article 28(b)(i). In addition, such information must be consciously disregarded.

Unlike with military commanders, it is insufficient that the information was available to the superior, who must have actually acquainted himself with the information.

25.8 Brief Concluding Words

Much remains to be said about the responsibility of superiors, as shown in the analysis set out above. It is too early to envisage how the Court will deal with the objective and subjective requirements of this mode of liability. However, since it is one that involves most of the more debated issues in the general part of criminal law (such as imputation, omission, causality, intention and negligence) the legal interpretations to be made will necessarily affect the system of attribution of criminal liability as a whole. This will necessarily add to the sophistication that, at the expense of simplicity, is being shown by the fair labeling-guided interpretation of the modes of liability at the ICC.

26

Rethinking the Mental Elements in the Jurisprudence of the ICC

Mohamed Elewa Badar and Sara Porro

26.1 Introductory Observations: The (Quest for) Balance between Intent, Specificity, and Proportionality

In the framework of a still lively debate on the mental element of core international crimes, Ohlin has recently made the groundbreaking remark that in consequence of the notion of intent that has been developing at the ICTY, a conflation between the international humanitarian law cardinal principles of distinction[1] and of proportionality[2] would be ongoing.[3] During the negotiations leading to the codification of these principles in the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions[4], the diplomatic delegations apparently emphasized the existence of a close link between the domain of the rule of distinction and the state of mind of the agent[5]. In this vein, the Ukrainian representative stated that to-be Article 51 Additional Protocol I 'widens the scope of protection for the civilian population and individual civilians, who under no circumstances shall be the object of the attack [and that] . . . paragraph 2 explicitly prohibits acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population'.[6] According to Ohlin, the principle of distinction would only come into play in situations of clear will to hit civilians, prescribing that this action must be considered as illegal per se.[7] Lacking such a purposive element, it would still be a violation of the principle of proportionality, yet on the additional condition that

* Associate Professor and Reader in Comparative and International Criminal Law and Islamic Law, Northumbria School of Law, Northumbria University, Newcastle.

 Sara Porro completed a joint PhD in International and Comparative Criminal Law at the Faculty of Law of the University of Hamburg in cooperation with the Faculty of Law of the University of Trento (2010–14).

[1] Generally on the principle of distinction, see J-M Henckaerts and L Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law vol. I (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 3 ff.

[2] Generally on the principle of proportionality, ibid., 46 ff.

[3] J Ohlin, 'Targeting and the Concept of Intent' (2013) Cornell Law Faculty Working Papers Paper 104.

[4] See Arts 48, 51(2), and (5)(b), 57 Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the protection of victims of international armed conflicts (Protocol I) (signed 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 3; Art 13(2) Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and relating to the protection of victims of non-international armed conflicts (Protocol II) (signed 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 659.

[5] See Ohlin (n 3) 35ff.

[6] Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, in Official Records of the Diplomatic Conference on the Reaffirmation and Development of International Humanitarian Law Applicable in Armed Conflict (1974–7) vol. 6, 201 (emphasis added).

[7] Ohlin (n 3) 20.

the collateral damage was disproportionate to the expected military advantage.[8] This latter scenario if committed in the context of international armed conflict would in turn constitute grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions if the agent carried out the strike with 'the knowledge (not only the presumption) that such attack will cause excessive losses in kind'.[9]

What in more recent years has been emerging from the ICTY jurisprudence, however, is a far different reading of the relative fields of the 'two tracks'[10] of distinction and of proportionality. Since the landmark Galić case, the Yugoslavia Tribunal has consistently applied to the war crime of 'attacks against civilians' a lower form of intent which a reader may perceive—depending on his or her own legal background—as akin to the civil law concept of dolus eventualis or to the common law concept of recklessness. In this sense, it has been held more than once that criminal responsibility for violation of the duty of distinction could be established based on a mental element satisfied in situations where the agent, without seeking to bring about the result, nonetheless foresaw it as a possibility.[11] The practical outcome of the ICTY approach has been the elision of the requirement of disproportion even in relation to scenarios of plain collateral damage where the causation of harm among civilians was considered as an undesired, and not even nearly inevitable, effect of a strike aiming at military objectives.[12]

While it can certainly have been a wish to ensure accountability in front of mass-scale human rights violations to inspire this jurisprudence of the Yugoslavia Tribunal, the text of the ICC Statute[13] does not seem at first sight to have followed the path of over-criminalization of the principle of specificity. Has this literal approach opened the door to impunity even for agents that the common collective consciousness would label as war criminals? This is the crucial question to now be investigated.

26.2 The Default Rule of Article 30 ICC Statute: A Groundbreaking Step in the History of ICL or the Source of Irresolvable Interpretative Uncertainties?

26.2.1 Anatomy of the default rule of Article 30 ICC Statute

For the first time in the history of international criminal law Article 30 ICC Statute has set out a definition of the mental element normally triggering criminal responsibility

[8] Ibid.

[9] M Bothe et al., New Rules for Victims of Armed Conflicts: Commentary on the Two 1977 Protocols Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 2nd edn (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff 2013) 586. See also the recent work by L Moir, 'Grave Breaches and Internal Armed Conflicts' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 763 (arguing that grave breaches can be committed in the context of internal armed conflict); Ohlin (n 3) 37 ff.

[10] Ohlin (n 3) 7 ff.

[11] Judgment, Galić, IT-98-29-T, TC I, ICTY, 5 December 2003, para. 54, affirmed in Judgment, Galić, IT-98-29-A, AC, 30 November 2006, para. 140. Subsequently, Judgment, Strugar, IT-01-42-A, AC, 17 July 2008, para. 270; Judgment, Martić, IT-95-11-T, TC I, 12 June 2007, para. 72; Judgment, Perišić, IT-04-81-T, TC I, 6 September 2011, para. 100.

[12] See Ohlin (n 3) 9.

[13] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

for core international crimes. This norm, which is applicable and binding within the jurisdiction of the ICC, prescribes in its paragraph (1) that:

> 1. Unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge.

Although at first glance this formulation could appear to refer to two different and cumulative types of mental element ('intent and knowledge'), one belonging to the aspect of will and the other to the sphere of cognition, it is now widely accepted that the text is meant to point to volition and awareness as both being necessary components of the (one) mental element of intent.[14] This said, it can nonetheless be underlined that the delegations in Rome could and should have come up with a more straightforward wording. Not only in criminal systems of civil law countries is the term 'knowledge' (Wissen, rappresentazione, conscience) generally understood as an element of intent alongside the requirement of volition (Wollen, volontà, volonté).[15] In criminal systems of common law countries the term 'knowledge' can even indicate a kind of intent, namely intent based on foresight of the consequence in terms of practical certainty.[16] In comparative criminal law, 'knowledge' figuratively finds its place within (and not outside) the circle of intent, either as a part (civil law) or as a form of it (common law)[17].

The meaning of Article 30(1) ICC Statute is further specified by paragraphs (2) and (3) of the same provision, which read as follows:

> 2. For the purpose of this article, a person has intent where: (a) In relation to conduct, that person means to engage in the conduct; (b) In relation to a consequence, that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.

[14] See, inter alia, Decision on the confirmation of charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo confirmation decision'), para. 529; Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009 ('Bemba confirmation decision'), para. 357; K Ambos, Der Allgemeine Teil des Völkerstrafrechts: Ansätze einer Dogmatisierung (Berlin: Duncker and Humblot 2002) 758; A Eser, 'Mental Elements—Mistake of Fact and Mistake of Law' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary vol. 1 (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 907; S Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability: Article 25(3)(b) and (c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2012) 161; S Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a Comparative Analysis' (2012) 61 International & Comparative Law Quarterly 325, 336; G Werle, Völkerstrafrecht 3rd edn (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck 2012) 431 (English edition: G Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law 2nd edn (The Hague: T M C Asser Press 2009)).

[15] See, inter alia, É-A Garçon, Code pénal annoté (Paris: Sirey 1952) Art 1 para. 77 (on France); H-H Jescheck and T Weigend, Lehrbuch des Strafrechts: allgemeiner Teil 5th edn (Berlin: Duncker and Humblot 1996) 293 (on Germany); G Fiandaca and E Musco, Diritto penale: parte generale 6th edn (Bologna: Zanichelli 2009) 354 ff. (on Italy).

[16] See s. 2.02(2)(b) MPC (on the USA); M Badar, The Concept of Mens Rea in International Criminal Law: the Case for a Unified Approach (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2013) 107–12.

[17] On this aspect see also S Porro, Risk and Mental Element. An Analysis of National and International Law on Core Crimes (Baden-Baden: Nomos 2014) 176.

3. For the purposes of this article, 'knowledge' means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. 'Know' and 'knowingly' shall be construed accordingly.

It is noteworthy that these latter paragraphs address the definition of intent in relation not to the offence as a whole, but to the material elements of conduct, result, and attendant circumstances separately (the correspondence principle).[18] This represents an important shift from an 'offence-based' to an 'element-based' approach to mens rea,[19] finding a precedent in section 2.02 of the US Model Penal Code. Historically, the move from 'offence-based' to 'element-based' analysis of culpability issues has been prompted by the will to establish 'a rational, clear, and just system of criminal law'.[20] The possibility for the legislator to assign a particular mental requirement to each material element of a given crime enhances the precision of the offence definition, thereby providing fair notice of the scope of criminal prohibitions and reducing the room for extensive interpretation.[21]

Under the ICC Statute, the correspondence principle has to be applied by taking into consideration that mental requirements are: (i) defined in Article 30 ICC Statute; (ii) set out in the definition of particular crimes (e.g. genocidal acts are those committed 'with intent to destroy'); (iii) set out in the Elements of Crimes.[22] This principle imposes that a requirement of mens rea must extend to all material elements of the offence. In other words, unless some form of culpability can be proved in regard to each material element of the offence, no valid conviction may be obtained[23].

26.2.2 The concept of dolus directus of the first degree

Article 30 ICC Statute touches upon the crucial aspect of intent in respect of the material element of result more than once. Not only letter (b) of paragraph (2) provides expressly that a person satisfies the condition of intent '[i]n relation to a consequence', if 'that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events'.[24] Due to the already mentioned conjunctive reference to 'intent and knowledge' in paragraph (1), it is of relevance to the definition of intent in [18] The correspondence principle has expressly been endorsed by the House of Lords in B v DPP [2000] 1 All ER 833.

[19] Bemba confirmation of charges (n 14) para. 356, endorsing, inter alia, M Badar, 'The Mental Element in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary from a Comparative Criminal Law Perspective' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 473, 475ff. See also K Heller, 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' in K Heller and M Dubber (eds), The Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (Stanford: Stanford Law Books 2011) 603; Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability (n 14) 161; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 337; Badar (n 16) 384ff.

[20] P Robinson and J Grall, 'Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond' (1983) 35 Stanford Law Review 681, 685. See also Model Penal Code and Commentaries (Official Draft and Revised Comments) vol. I/1, The American Law Institute (1980), 231ff. From an English law perspective see J Horder, 'A Critique of the Correspondence Principle in Criminal Law' (1999) Criminal Law Review 759; B Mitchell, 'In Defence of a Principle of Correspondence' (1999) Criminal Law Review 195.

[21] Robinson and Grall (n 20) 703 ff. [22] Badar (n 16) 385.

[23] Model Penal Code and Commentaries (n 20) 229, note 1.

[24] The term 'consequence' is to be understood in this context as a synonym of 'result'. Ambos (n 14) 765.

regard to result also the statement in paragraph (3) that '"knowledge" means awareness that . . . a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events'.

Let us consider the first alternative of Article 30(2)(b) ICC Statute addressing the state of mind of a person who 'means to cause' the result. At first sight, the level of mental element underlying this formula could seem to be equivalent to the standard of acting purposely in section 2.02 US Model Penal Code, or of Absicht as a kind of intent in German criminal law. Both purposes in the USA and Absicht in Germany are types of mental element satisfied if the agent aimed to bring about the criminal result, or to put it differently if he or she clearly wanted it to be the outcome of his or her conduct. On the other hand, the awareness of whatever degree of likelihood of the result is sufficient to attain these thresholds of purpose or of Absicht. Consequently, in the USA or in Germany even the recognition of a low criminal risk can justify a finding of intent, provided the agent consciously desired the unlawful consequence as his or her (final or intermediary) goal.[25] An example of this scenario would be an agent who, aiming to kill another person, administered to the victim a substance which he or she knew in one case out of a thousand provokes a deadly allergic reaction.

Yet, in the system of the ICC Statute could such a weak cognitive dimension establish what the early practice of the ICC has termed as dolus directus of the first degree referring to Article 30(2)(b) first alternative ICC Statute?[26] If the cumulative mention of 'intent and knowledge' in Article 30(1) ICC Statute is taken seriously, this question should without doubt receive a negative answer. Due to the interplay between the definition of knowledge in paragraph (3) of the article at stake and the definition of intent in its paragraph (2), under strict interpretation a person who purposefully aimed to bring about the result without having sufficient degree of knowledge would not satisfy this kind of mental element[27]. Finnin has illustrated the practical impact of this by inviting us to > consider the case of an accused who plants an improvised explosive device (or 'IED', which have a notoriously low success rate), which he or she intends to initiate remotely when civilians come within range. It is the perpetrator's conscious object to kill those civilians; however, unless it could be shown that he or she knew (at the time the device was initiated) that the device would explode successfully and thereby

[25] On purpose in US criminal law see s. 2.02(2)(a) MPC; United States v United States Gypsum Co., 438 US 422, 445 (US 1978); United States v Bailey, 444 US 394, 404 (US 1980). On Absicht in German criminal law see BGHSt 21, 83, para. 4; Detlev Sternberg-Lieben, 's 15 StGB' in A Schönke and H Schröder (eds), Strafgesetzbuch: Kommentar 28th edn (München: Beck 2010) para. 66; J Wessels and W Beulke, Strafrecht: allgemeiner Teil 43rd edn (Heidelberg: C F Müller 2013) para. 211; in English: M Badar, 'Mens Rea—Mistake of Law and Mistake of Fact in German Criminal Law: A Survey for International Criminal Tribunals' (2005) 5 International Criminal Law Review 203, 222ff; Badar (n 16) 136ff; Porro (n 17) 28ff.

[26] Decision on the confirmation of charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, para. 338 ('Lubanga confirmation decision'), para. 351; Katanga and Ngudjolo confirmation decision (n 14) para. 529; Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) para. 358; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, para. 411.

[27] See, inter alia, Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) para. 358; Ambos (n 14) 770; Finnin (n 14) 165; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 342 ff; Porro (n 17) 191.

result in the death of those civilians, the perpetrator would not satisfy this gradation of intent.... This obviously represents an unexpected and undesired consequence of the conjunctive 'intent and knowledge' wording of Article 30.[28]

26.2.3 The requirement of awareness that the result 'will occur in the ordinary course of events'; its (complex) relation with the area of conscious risk-taking

26.2.3.1 The terms of the debate—knowledge, dolus eventualis*, and recklessness*

Since the adoption of the ICC Statute, it has been a major dilemma confronting international legal practitioners and commentators what meaning should be ascribed to the phrasing 'aware that it [i.e., the consequence or result] will occur in the ordinary course of events' that appears in Article 30(2)(b) second alternative ICC Statute and is substantially repeated in Article 30(3) second alternative ICC Statute.

According to some voices, the formula used would not accommodate any mental standard lower than the awareness of result as a practical certainty[29] that would satisfy the condition of knowledge in section 2.02 US Model Penal Code, or of direkter Vorsatz as a kind of intent in German criminal law. Both knowledge in the USA and direkter Vorsatz in Germany are types of mental element that require the actor not to [28] Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability (n 14) 165; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 343.

[29] See, inter alia, Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka to Katanga and Ngudjolo confirmation decision (n 14) para. 22; Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) para. 359 ff; Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04–01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 ('Lubanga trial judgment'), para. 1011; A Greenawalt, 'Rethinking Genocidal Intent: the Case for a Knowledge-Based Interpretation' (1999) 99 Columbia Law Review 2259, 2269; K Ambos, 'General Principles of Criminal Law in the Rome Statute' (1999) 10 Criminal Law Forum 1, 21ff; R Clark, 'The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences' (2001) 12 Criminal Law Forum 291, 334; Ambos (n 14) 771; Eser (n 14) 915 ff, 932 ff; E van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law (The Hague: T M C Asser Press 2003) 51 ff; J van der Vyver, 'The International Criminal Court and the Concept of Mens Rea in International Criminal Law' (2004) 57 University of Miami International and Comparative Law Review 57, 70 ff; G Fletcher and J Ohlin, 'The Commission of Inquiry on Darfur and its Follow-up: A Critical View. Reclaiming Fundamental Principles of Criminal Law in the Darfur Case' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 539, 553; G Werle and F Jeßberger, 'Unless Otherwise Provided: Article 30 of the ICC Statute and the Mental Element of Crimes under International Criminal Law' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 35, 41 ff, 53; R Clark, 'Drafting a General Part to a Penal Code: Some Thoughts Inspired by the Negotiations on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and by the Court's First Substantive Law Discussion in the Lubanga Dyilo Confirmation Proceedings' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Review Forum 519, 524 ff, in particular 529; E Podgor and R Clark, Understanding International Criminal Law 2nd edn (Newark: LexisNexis 2008) 232; D Piragoff and D Robinson, 'Article 30—Mental Element' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 533–4; Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (n 14) paras 408 and 413; R Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010) 385 ff; Modes of Liability and the Mental Element: Analyzing the Early Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Court, War Crimes Research Office—American University Washington College of Law (2010), 69 ff; Heller (n 19) 604; Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability (n 14) 172 ff; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 349, 358; Badar (n 16) 392.

have pursued the unlawful consequence as his or her conscious objective, but nonetheless to have been substantially sure that his or her conduct would bring it about.[30] From a psychological point of view, it can be agreed with von Bar that a certain outcome can reasonably be described as 'wanted' not only if it is aimed at, but also if it is inevitably linked to the goal sought.[31] In relation to the default rule of Article 30 ICC Statute, Werle and Jessberger have argued that the minimum requirement for criminal responsibility would be > that in the perpetrator's perception at the time of the act, carrying out the conduct would cause the consequence, unless extraordinary circumstances intervened. Thus, it is not enough for the perpetrator to merely anticipate the possibility that his or her conduct would cause the consequence. This follows from the words 'will occur'; after all, it does not say 'may occur'.[32]

Also Ohlin appears to have shared this opinion when he stated that '[t]he reference to "ordinary course of events" neatly tracks the common law definitions of purpose and knowledge, and certainly suggests a mental state requirement far more demanding than mere recklessness'.[33]

Others, in contrast, have supported the different view that the default rule of Article 30 ICC Statute would accommodate also some forms of conscious risk-taking that in domestic criminal systems would meet the standard of dolus eventualis, or even that of recklessness.[34] In this direction, Jescheck has asserted that the requirement of awareness that the result 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' in Article 30 ICC Statute would include 'the concept of dolus eventualis used in continental European legal theory'.[35] In a similar vein, Triffterer has opined that in the system of the ICC Statute, 'in principle, dolus eventualis is sufficient'.[36] Cassese has maintained that Article 30 ICC Statute 'does not expressly refer to recklessness or culpable negligence, although recklessness (dolus eventualis) may be held to be encompassed by the definition of intent laid down in paragraph 2'.[37]

[30] On knowledge in US criminal law see s. 2.02(2)(ii) MPC; United States v United States Gypsum Co. (n 25) 445; United States v Bailey (n 25) 404. On direkter Vorsatz in German criminal law see Jescheck and Weigend (n 15) 298ff; Claus Roxin, Strafrecht: allgemeiner Teil, vol. II, 4th edn (München: C H Beck 2006) s. 12, paras 18ff; Wessels and Beulke (n 25) para. 213; in English: Badar, 'Mens Rea—Mistake of Law and Mistake of Fact in German Criminal Law' (n 25) 224 ff; Badar (n 16) 138ff; Porro (n 17) 29 ff.

[31] C von Bar, 'Dolus eventualis?' (1898) 18 Zeitschrift für die gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft 534, 536 ff.

[32] Werle and Jeßberger (n 29) 41.

[33] Ohlin (n 3) 23.

[34] See, inter alia, Lubanga confirmation decision (n 26) paras 352 ff; Katanga and Ngudjolo confirmation decision (n 14) para. 251 note 329; O Triffterer, 'Genocide, Its Particular Intent to Destroy in Whole or in Part the Group as Such' (2001) 14 Leiden Journal of International Law 399, 403 ff; F Mantovani, 'The General Principles of International Criminal Law: the Viewpoint of a National Criminal Lawyer' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 26, 32; H-H Jescheck, 'The General Principles of International Criminal Law Set Out in Nuremberg, as Mirrored in the ICC Statute' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 38, 45; Badar, 'The Mental Element in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 19) 506; T Weigend, 'Intent, Mistake of Law, and Co-Perpetration in the Lubanga Decision on the Confirmation of Charges' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 471, 484; A Cassese, International Criminal Law 3rd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 56; A Gil Gil, 'Mens Rea in Co-Perpetration and Indirect Perpetration According to Article 30 of the Rome Statute. Arguments against Punishment for Excesses Committed by the Agent or the Co-Perpetrator' (2014) 14 International Criminal Law Review 82, 86, 107.

[35] Jescheck (n 34) 45.

[36] Triffterer (n 34) 403.

[37] A Cassese, International Criminal Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 73.

Even though it cannot be concealed that the civil law notion of dolus eventualis is highly controversial, in 1955 the German Federal Supreme Court (Bundesgerichtshof) put forward a definition of this type of mental element that has since enjoyed wide acceptance.[38] The case, which later became known as 'Leather belt', concerned two individuals, Kai und Jochen, who once deliberated to stun and rob Meinhard, an acquaintance of theirs. In principle they wished to avoid a deadly outcome. However, after having drugged and then hit Meinhard with a sandbag without managing to make him unconscious, Kai and Jochen strangled him with a leather belt. They certainly recognized a risk that the victim could have died as a result, and this possible consequence was unpleasant to them. Nevertheless, in order to accomplish the robbery they were ready to put Meinhard 'out of action' at all costs. Upholding the Court of Assize's position, the Federal Supreme Court affirmed Kai und Jochen's intent to kill in form of dolus eventualis. In the opinion of the Bundesgerichtshof, dolus eventualis (German: bedingter Vorsatz) would be satisfied in situations where the agent had knowledge of the realization of the offence in terms of possibility and consented to this outcome in the legal sense (German: den Erfolg billigen, sich damit abfinden). The element of consent in the legal sense would mean that the person took into account the occurrence of the crime as a real eventuality and included it in his or her plan of action. On the other hand, it would be irrelevant how the agent inwardly felt about the offence. To put the point differently, it can be said that a crime could be considered as approved in the legal sense even if the person perceived it as undesirable.[39]

Perhaps more straightforward is the definition of the common law notion of recklessness emerging from the US Model Penal Code. Section 2.02(2)(c) of this latter text states that > [a] person acts recklessly with respect to a material element of an offense when he consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk that the material element exists or will result from his conduct. The risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature and purpose of the actor's conduct and the circumstances known to him, its disregard involves a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a law-abiding person would observe in the actor's situation.

As Fletcher has pointed out, such a formulation breaks ground in the direction of a normative theory of guilt.[40] According to this approach, the conception of blameworthiness for a wrongdoing should not be reduced to a state of intention, consciousness, or lack thereof, but should also include an evaluation by the legal system concerning the reproachability of the agent's attitude. The notion of recklessness, far from being limited to a state of mind in relation to the substantial and unjustifiable risk

[38] BGHSt 7, 363.

[39] Ibid., 368 ff. On dolus eventualis or bedingter Vorsatz in German criminal law see also Jescheck and Weigend (n 15) 299 ff; Roxin (n 30) s. 12 paras 21 ff; Sternberg-Lieben (n 25) para. 84; in English: V Krey, German Criminal Law: General Part, vol. 2 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer 2002–3) para. 358; Badar, 'Mens Rea—Mistake of Law and Mistake of Fact in German Criminal Law' (n 25) 225 ff; Badar (n 16) 139 ff; Porro (n 17) 30, 34 ff.

[40] G Fletcher, The Grammar of Criminal Law: American, Comparative, and International, vol. 1 (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2007) 326.

determining the existence of a wrongdoing, imposes that the actual risk-taking be compared with the normative ideal of the law-abiding person in the actor's situation.[41]

From the wording used in section 2.02(2)(c) US Model Penal Code it can reasonably be derived that in order to fulfil the subjective dimension of recklessness in US criminal law, the agent is only demanded to have acted in spite of the awareness of the possibility of the unlawful consequence. Unlike dolus eventualis, in other words, recklessness would not include on its face discrete elements of will such as the requirement of having consented to the offence.[42]

Yet, among legal commentators it is not uncontroversial whether the difference between dolus eventualis and recklessness should indeed be considered as one of substance. As Ohlin explains, '[t]here are two positions regarding how to translate dolus eventualis into common law terms. Either it accords with the common law concept of recklessness, or it is a distinct mental state that resides above recklessness but below knowledge'.[43] In either case, in light of the substantial proximity between these two notions it is striking to observe again with Fletcher that civil law countries, with the possible exception of France, 'draw the distinction between intentional and negligent conduct by including dolus eventualis within the contours of intending a particular result'.[44] In other words, dolus eventualis is regarded as a kind of intent satisfying the components of volition and knowledge that define the highest type of mental element. Roxin justifies the belonging of dolus eventualis to the realm of intent by explaining that an agent who included the realization of the crime as a real eventuality in his or her plan of action must also have taken a 'decision in favour of a possible violation of the legal good' (German: 'Entscheidung für die mögliche Rechtsgüterverletzung').[45] However, quite different is the position of recklessness within the doctrine of mens rea in common law countries, which consider this latter standard to be a form of negligence.[46] In the system of the ICC Statute where the normal requirement for criminality is intent, such a dogmatical divergence can give rise to obvious ambiguities relating to the general boundaries of criminal liability.

26.2.3.2 The early practice of the ICC

26.2.3.2.1 The Lubanga Decision on the confirmation of charges

Already in its first decision on the confirmation of charges in 2007 the ICC had to tackle the central issue of interpretation of the requirement of awareness that the result 'will occur in the ordinary course of events'. The case concerned the Congolese national Lubanga Dyilo, a former alleged leader of the Union des Patriotes Congolais and Commander-in-Chief of its military division, the Forces patriotiques pour la libération du Congo, accused of conscripting and enlisting children under the age of 15 and using them to actively participate in hostilities.[47]

[41] Ibid., 326 ff. [42] See Badar (n 16) 112.

[43] Ohlin (n 3) 11. See also Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability (n 14) 159 ff; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 330.

[44] G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (Boston: Little Brown 1978) 445.

[45] Roxin (n 30) s. 12 para. 23. [46] Fletcher (n 44) 443.

[47] Lubanga confirmation decision (n 26).

In Lubanga, PTC I of the ICC showed itself to be mindful of the jurisprudence on mens rea of the ICTY and the ICTR, that although pursuant to Article 21 ICC Statute is not a primary source of law before the ICC. The ad hoc ICTY and ICTR have repeatedly held that for the condition of intent to be fulfilled, it would not be necessary that the agent perceived the unlawful outcome to be an almost inevitable consequence of his or her conduct. Quite the contrary, in the view of the ICTY and the ICTR there would exist a lower form of intent called 'indirect intent', which would be satisfied in cases where the person acted despite having recognized the probability of the result occurring[48] or, according to a minority approach, even only its possibility.[49] It was seemingly in light of this case law that PTC I of the ICC asserted that the volitional element mentioned in Article 30(1) ICC Statute would encompass besides dolus directus of the first degree and dolus directus of the second degree[50] also a notion of dolus eventualis.[51] In the opinion of the Pre-Trial Chamber, dolus eventualis would pertain to 'situations in which the suspect '(a) is aware of the risk that the objective elements of the crime may result from his or her actions or omissions, and (b) accepts such an outcome by reconciling himself or herself with it or consenting to it'.[52]

It is apparent that this latter concept is built upon the idea of acceptance, a state of mind that can have various nuances and that Michaels has attempted to define as follows:

> [a] person acts acceptingly with respect to a material element of an offense when the person acts recklessly with respect to that element and … if the element involves the result of the person's conduct, the person would have so acted had he been practically certain that the conduct would cause such a result.[53]

In Michaels' view, acceptance and knowledge would 'represent the same level of culpability' as in both cases the agent's 'knowledge that she would cause the harm was not sufficient to stop him or her from acting'.[54] This description of acceptance closely resembles the so-called Frank's formula in German criminal law, developed in the 1930s in relation to the proof of intent or Vorsatz. According to the Frank's formula, the question to be answered in order to affirm or deny intent is the following:

> [h]ow would the perpetrator have behaved with sure knowledge of the circumstances of the offence? … If one comes to the result that the perpetrator would also have acted with certain knowledge, then … Vorsatz is to be affirmed; if one comes to the result that with certain knowledge he would have refrained from action, then Vorsatz is to be rejected.[55]

[48] See, inter alia, Judgment, Nahimana, Barayagwiza and Ngeze, ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2007, paras 480 and 481; Judgment, Dragomir Milošević, IT-98-29/1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 November 2009 ('D. Milošević, appeals judgment'), para. 268.

[49] See, inter alia, Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-A, AC, ICTY, 29 July 2004, para. 33; Judgment, Ntakirutimana and Ntakirutimana, ICTR-96-10-A and ICTR-96-17-A, AC, ICTR, 13 December 2004, para. 467.

[50] Lubanga confirmation decision (n 26) para. 351.

[51] Ibid., para. 352.

[52] Ibid. (emphasis added, notes omitted).

[53] A Michaels, 'Acceptance: The Missing Mental State' (1998) 71 Southern California Law Review 953, 961.

[54] Ibid., 967.

[55] R Frank, Das Strafgesetzbuch für das deutsche Reich 18th edn (Tübingen: J C B Mohr 1931) 190. German to English translation from Michaels (n 53) 1026.

Also the Egyptian Court of Cassation seems to have adopted an analogous test in regard to the concept of dolus eventualis (al qasd al ehtmali) by maintaining that:

> [t]he key issue for deciding if dolus eventualis is established or not is to ask the following question: while undertaking the intended act, did the perpetrator want to do it even if this act goes beyond its original purpose to perform another criminal consequence that actually happened and was not originally intended? If the answer is in the affirmative, dolus eventualis is established. If the answer is negative, then the whole matter is nothing more than an error that may be punishable or not depending on whether the conditions establishing an error are present.[56]

PTC I of the ICC put forward in Lubanga what appears to be an even more extensive interpretation of the element of acceptance, applicable at least on the plan of evidence and distinguishing between two different scenarios. The Pre-Trial Chamber stated:

> Firstly, if the risk of bringing about the objective elements of the crime is substantial [that is, there is a likelihood that it 'will occur in the ordinary course of events'], the fact that the suspect accepts the idea of bringing about the objective elements of the crime can be inferred from:
>
> i. the awareness by the suspect of the substantial likelihood that his or her actions or omissions would result in the realisation of the objective elements of the crime; and > ii. the decision by the suspect to carry out his actions or omissions despite such awareness.
>
> …Secondly, if the risk of bringing about the objective elements of the crime is low, the suspect must have clearly or expressly accepted the idea that such objective elements may result from his actions or omissions.[57]

This passage is noteworthy at least in a two-fold respect. On the one hand, PTC I of the ICC seems to have implied that literally interpreted, the requirement of awareness that the result 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' in Article 30 ICC Statute would not refer to a threshold of practical certainty, but a lower standard of substantial criminal risk.[58] It has remained to some extent unclear, however, what degree of likelihood below the level of nearly inevitable this element of 'substantiality' would point to. On the other hand, the Pre-Trial Chamber further expanded the notion of intent applicable within the jurisdiction of the ICC by opining that even the recognition of a low criminal risk might satisfy the default rule of Article 30 ICC Statute, provided the agent expressly accepted the unlawful consequence. Such an express acceptance would in particular be lacking in situations where the person decided to adopt a dangerous behaviour, but believing that no harmful outcome would follow thanks to his or her expertise.[59] In the words of PTC I of the ICC, '[t]his would be the case of a taxi driver taking the risk of driving at a very high speed on a local road, trusting that nothing would happen on account of his or her driving expertise'.[60]

[56] Case no. 1853 of 25 December 1930.
[57] Ibid., paras 353–4 (emphasis added, notes omitted).
[58] See also Porro (n 17) 183.
[59] Lubanga confirmation decision (n 26) para. 355 fn 437.
[60] Ibid.

26.2.3.2.2 The Katanga and Ngudjolo Decision on the confirmation of charges and subsequent jurisprudence

The interpretation of intent formulated in the Lubanga Decision on the confirmation of charges, after having been endorsed in principle at the pre-trial stage in Katanga and Ngudjolo[61] with Judge Anita Ušacka dissenting[62], was however rejected by PTC II of the ICC in 2009. The case concerned Bemba Gombo, a former Vice-President of the DRC and the President and Commander-in-Chief of the Mouvement de Libération du Congo, who has been accused of a number of crimes against humanity and of war crimes perpetrated between October 2002 and March 2003 in the CAR[63]. Declining to confirm the charges involving the alleged criminal responsibility of the defendant under the mode of liability of co-perpetration, the Pre-Trial Chamber reasoned as follows:

(i) literally interpreted, the wording '[a result] will occur' indicates an event that is 'inevitably' expected to happen.[64] Had the drafters of the ICC Statute intended to convey an idea of possibility, they could have employed the phrasing 'may occur' or 'might occur';[65]

(ii) the formula 'in the ordinary course of events' expresses that the likelihood of occurrence borders with certainty;[66]

(iii) altogether this lays down a requirement more demanding than the notion of dolus eventualis generally agreed upon, which imposes the foresight of the result in terms of simple possibility.[67]

It was based on such premises that PTC II of the ICC concluded in Bemba that in the system of the ICC Statute, the threshold of intent should only be considered as attained if the agent was aware that the material elements of the offence would have been virtually certain, or in other words an almost inevitable outcome of his or her act.[68] By so doing, the Pre-Trial Chamber excluded from the realm of Article 30 ICC the leading notion of dolus eventualis. It should nonetheless be underlined with Ambos that 'one must not overlook the fact that the "commonly agreed" standard invoked by the Chamber is by no means the only one. In fact, there are other, more [61] Katanga and Ngudjolo confirmation decision (n 14) para. 251 note 329. The interpretation of intent formulated in the Lubanga confirmation decision was endorsed in principle only, because the charges were confirmed on the basis of the higher standard of awareness that the offence would inevitably have followed from the act accomplished.

[62] Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka to Katanga and Ngudjolo confirmation decision (n 14) para. 22. This opinion stressed 'the fundamental difference between the perpetrator's cognitive awareness that the action will result with certainty and an awareness that undertaking a course of conduct carries with it an unjustifiable risk of producing harmful consequences'.

[63] Bemba confirmation decision (n 14).

[64] Ibid., para. 362. See also Werle and Jeßberger (n 29) 41; (n 16) 397.

[65] Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) para. 363. See also Badar (n 16) 398.

[66] Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) para. 362. See also Badar (n 16) 397.

[67] Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) para. 363. See also Badar (n 16) 398.

[68] Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) para. 369.

cognitive concepts of dolus eventualis (requiring awareness or certainty as to the consequence) and these may indeed be included in article 30'.[69]

In 2012 the early practice of the ICC addressed again the meaning of the requirement of awareness that the result 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' in its first trial judgment on the Lubanga case.[70] TC I of the ICC apparently declared to accept the narrow interpretation of the concept of intent proposed in Bemba Gombo,[71] adding, however, in paragraph 1012 of the judgment the following significant specification:

> [i]n the view of the Majority of the Chamber, the 'awareness that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events' means that the participants anticipate, based on their knowledge of how events ordinarily develop, that the consequence will occur in the future. This prognosis involves consideration of the concepts of 'possibility' and 'probability', which are inherent to the notions of 'risk' and 'danger'. Risk is defined as 'danger, (exposure to) the possibility of loss, injury or other adverse circumstance'. The co-perpetrators only 'know' the consequences of their conduct once they have occurred. At the time the co-perpetrators agree on a common plan and throughout its implementation, they must know the existence of a risk that the consequence will occur. As to the degree of risk, and pursuant to the wording of Article 30, it must be no less than awareness on the part of the co-perpetrator that the consequence 'will occur in the ordinary course of events'. A low risk will not be sufficient.[72]

In his separate opinion, Judge Fulford described this latter passage as 'potentially confusing'[73]. It is worth quoting his relevant statement in full:

> I consider it is unhelpful to investigate whether the requirement of awareness (on the part of the accused) that a crime will be committed 'in the ordinary course of events' is to be equated with a 'possibility', a 'probability', a 'risk', or a 'danger' (see paragraph 1012 of the Judgment). Put otherwise, the Chamber's decision as to whether the accused was aware that something will happen in the ordinary course of events is not assisted by asking the question as to whether he was aware of the possibility, the probability, the risk or the danger that it would occur. The words are plain and readily understandable.[74]

In an even more critical spirit, Judge van der Wyngaert asserted in her concurring opinion to the Ngudjolo Chui trial judgment that > reliance on 'risk' as an element under article 30 of the Statute is tantamount to accepting dolus eventualis dressed up as dolus directus second degree. Besides direct intent, article 30 of the Statute only allows for criminal responsibility when the perpetrator fully expects that the material elements of a crime 'will occur in the ordinary course

[69] K Ambos, 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision' (2009) 22 Leiden Journal of International Law 715, 718.
[70] Lubanga trial judgment (n 29). [71] Ibid., para. 1011.
[72] Ibid., para. 1012 (emphasis added, fnn omitted).
[73] Separate Opinion of Judge Adrian Fulford, Lubanga trial judgment (n 29) para. 15. [74] Ibid.

> of events.' Accordingly, any reference to risk-taking by the accused is out of place in this context.[75]

It is here submitted that paragraph 1012 of the Lubanga Dyilo trial judgment appears indeed to use a contradictory language. On the one hand, TC I of the ICC employed in its argument the terms 'risk' or 'danger', which—as the Trial Chamber mentioned itself—refer in general English to a dimension of mere possibility, as opposed to substantial certainty, of unwelcome events. On the other hand, however, the Trial Chamber also seemed to treat such an aspect of bare likelihood as equivalent to the standard of dolus directus of the second degree, which corresponds to the awareness of the consequence in terms of substantial certainty. Yet, in both civil law and common law countries it is widely accepted that the conscious adoption of a behaviour that the agent knew might bring about an unlawful outcome should be regarded as a state of mind less serious than awareness of the result as nearly inevitable. The difference between the two mental states is mirrored in US criminal law in the dichotomy between knowledge and recklessness, and in German criminal law in the dichotomy between direkter Vorsatz and bedingter Vorsatz or dolus eventualis. The psychological underpinning of these qualifications is that we can perceive as 'wanted' a consequence that albeit not deliberately pursued, was nonetheless surely connected with our aim. The same does not hold true in relation to a possibly undesired outcome. Taking an example of Von Bar, let us imagine that a person wishes to undertake a pleasure trip which he or she knows will cost him or her a considerable sum of money. Although the agent can consider the expense as disagreeable, he or she 'wants' it as a mean to pay for his or her holiday. In contrast, if an agent decides to climb a mountain while aware that thereby he or she could possibly get sick or injured, it is realistic to assume that he or she hopes that the adverse consequence will not occur.[76]

Nevertheless, in March 2014 also TC II of the ICC adjudicating upon Katanga affirmed to adhere to the narrow interpretation of the notion of intent put forward in Bemba.[77] In a straightforward fashion and without resorting to the concept of risk-taking, on this occasion the Court confirmed that the literal formulation of Article 30 ICC Statute does not accommodate attitudes below the threshold of awareness of the result as a substantial certainty. In the words of the Trial Chamber, > the form of this criminal intent requires the person to have known that realizing the acts will necessarily bring about the particular consequence, unless an unexpected intervention or an unforeseen event impede it. To put it differently, it is nearly impossible for him to foresee that the consequence will not occur.[78]

[75] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-4, TC II, ICC, 19 December 2012, para. 38 (notes omitted).

[76] Von Bar (n 31) 536 ff.

[77] Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07, TCII, ICC, 7 March 2014, para. 776.

[78] Ibid., para. 777 (unofficial translation by Sara Porro).

From the statement it can be inferred that the second form of intent in the ICC Statute would essentially correspond to knowledge pursuant to section 2.02 US Model Penal Code, or to direkter Vorsatz in German criminal law.

In December 2014 the Appeals Chamber of the ICC finally pronounced itself on the interpretation of the default rule of Article 30 ICC Statute, denying—implicitly and perhaps surprisingly—that whatsoever divergence would at present exist in this regard among the Trial Chambers of the ICC.[79] The Lubanga Dyilo appeals judgment confirmed the view put forward in Bemba, that in Article 30 ICC Statute 'the standard for the foreseeability of events is virtual certainty'.[80] It thus excluded the notion of dolus eventualis from the default mental element, and held that the same subjective threshold had already emerged from the Lubanga Dyilo trial judgment. Almost trivializing the use of the term 'risk' by TC I of the ICC in Lubanga Dyilo,[81] the Appeals Chamber argued that '[t]he Trial Chamber, in defining the requisite level of "risk", specified […] that this entailed an "awareness on the part of the co-perpetrators that the consequence will occur in the 'ordinary course of events' " and distinguished this from a "low risk" '. The Appeals Chamber concluded that the Trial Chamber 'did not deviate from the requirements of article 30(2)(b) and (3) of the Statute'.[82] In this reasoning, the Appeals Chamber seems to imply that the Lubanga Dyilo trial judgment did not entail an error of law on the part of TC I by using the term 'risk' in paragraph 1012. The Appeals Chamber suggests that the term was superfluously added to the fundamental holding that cases of awareness of result below the threshold of virtual certainty are to be excluded from the realm of Article 30 ICC Statute.

26.2.3.3 Liability for more serious consequences?

In the jurisprudence of the Yugoslavia Tribunal on killing it is not unusual to come across associations of intent in respect to the lesser-included offence of substantial bodily harm, and of negligence in respect to the more serious consequence of death. In Kvočka, for instance, the ICTY Appeals Chamber has asserted that 'the Prosecutor bears the onus of proving…the intent of the accused…a) to kill the victim; or b) to wilfully cause serious bodily harm which the perpetrator should reasonably have known might lead to death'.[83] To take another example, the Dragomir Milošević appeal judgment has stated that '[t]o satisfy the mens rea for murder it is further required that there was an act or omission, with the intention to kill (animus necandi) or to inflict grievous bodily harm, in the reasonable knowledge that it might lead to death'.[84]

The limitation of intent to a lesser-included offence and the application of a lower standard of mens rea to a more severe consequence lead to the expansion of the scope of criminal responsibility. A defendant can be held liable not only for those outcomes

[79] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04–01/06-A-5, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014 ('Lubanga appeal judgment') paras 441 ff.

[80] Ibid., para. 447.

[81] Lubanga trial judgment (n 29) para. 1012.

[82] Lubanga appeal judgment (n 79) para. 450.

[83] Judgment, Kvočka, Radić, Žicić, and Prcać, IT-98-30/1-A, AC, ICTY, 28 February 2005, para. 261.

[84] D Milošević, appeals judgment (n 48) para. 108.

of his or her act that he or she actually foresaw, but also for more serious events causally related to the conduct that the agent could have not anticipated at all, but that a reasonable person would have predicted. It is here agreed with Ashworth that this can be regarded as conflicting with the already mentioned principle of correspondence, according to which a requirement of mens rea must extend to all material elements of the offence.[85] However, it is also interesting to mention that the Law Reform Commission of Western Australia holds the view that > the correspondence principle 'remains very much an ideal, if anything, rather than an accurate descriptive generalisation about crimes'. …Therefore, instead of precise correspondence there should be 'close proximity' between the mental element and the harm done.…An intention to cause a permanent injury to health does not correspond with harm caused. On the other hand, an intention to cause an injury likely to endanger life corresponds closely with the resulting harm of death.[86]

Associations of intent in respect to a lesser-included offence, and of negligence in respect to a more serious consequence find an underpinning in the German category of 'erfolgsqualifizierte Delikte' or offences qualified by the result, which are numerous in the German Code of Crimes against International Law or Völkerstrafgesetzbuch. The provisions on crimes against humanity and on war crimes in this Act aggravate the sentence if certain underlying offences resulted in the victim's death, or in a few cases serious injury.[87]

It is interesting to raise the issue as to whether in the system of the ICC Statute, criminal responsibility may be attached to more serious consequences ensuing from a lesser-included offence that the agent realized intentionally. Insofar as the default rule of Article 30 ICC Statute applies, it is submitted that this question should receive a decisively negative answer. There can be no doubt that the requirement of awareness that the result 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' in Article 30(2)(b) second alternative ICC Statute imposes an element of cognition in respect of the actual outcome of the conduct accomplished.

26.2.4 The requirement of 'awareness that a circumstance exists'; the doctrine of wilful blindness

Article 30(3) first sentence first alternative ICC Statute provides that in relation to attendant circumstances, knowledge 'means awareness that a circumstance exists'. It has already been mentioned that in the article in question, the term 'knowledge' is to be understood in the sense of cognition as a necessary requirement of the mental element of intent. Furthermore, it should be underlined that concerning attendant circumstances the notion of intent consists solely in cognition, as these surrounding facts can be foreseen or recognized, but not properly 'wanted'.[88]

[85] A Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1995) 261.

[86] Review of the Law of Homicide: Final Report, Law Reform Commission of Western Australia (2007), 46 (notes omitted), citing Horder (n 20) 759, 770.

[87] See ss 7(3) and 8(4), 11(2), and 12 (2) VStGB.

[88] Porro (n 17) 189.

Under strict interpretation, Article 30(3) first sentence first alternative ICC Statute seems to suggest that the concept of intent in relation to attendant circumstances applicable and binding within the jurisdiction of the ICC should be limited to situations where the agent was actually aware of the relevant facts.[89] To put the point differently, it can be argued that the formulation of the ICC Statute appears to have excluded from the notion of intent not only cases of 'constructive knowledge', i.e. where a reasonable person would have known about the surrounding fact, but also scenarios of awareness of 'high probability' of its existence.[90] This further means that the delegations in Rome seem to have not acknowledged the common law doctrine of wilful blindness[91], which, according to a narrow interpretation that Williams has proposed, would pertain to situations

> [w]here it can almost be said that the defendant actually knew. He suspected the fact; he realized its probability; but he refrained from obtaining the final confirmation because he wanted in the event to be able to deny knowledge. This and this alone, is wilful blindness.[92]

At the level of criminal policy, however, Sullivan has observed that 'should reliable means to resolve one's suspicions be available, we are faced with something more than mere suspicion'.[93] On this basis he has maintained that 'wilful blindness is appropriately considered a form of culpability equivalent to proof of explicit knowledge. Accordingly, extension of the legal meaning of knowledge to encompass wilful blindness falls within the legitimate scope of judicial interpretation'.[94]

When addressing Article 30(3) first sentence first alternative ICC Statute, the ICC will have to decide whether to favour a rigorous respect of the principle of legality over practical considerations, or vice versa.

26.3 The Default Rule of Article 30 ICC Statute between Applicability and Non-applicability

26.3.1 The (controversial) meaning of the opening clause 'Unless otherwise provided'

In sum, the analysis in the previous section reveals that the notion of intent pursuant to Article 30 ICC Statute could be significantly narrower than the interpretation of the [89] Essentially in this sense, inter alia, Badar, 'The Mental Element in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 19) 496 ff; Heller (n 19) 604; Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability (n 14) 173 ff; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 350 ff; Badar (n 16) 399; Porro (n 17) 189 ff.

[90] See also Badar (n 16) 399.

[91] The term 'wilful' is used here, following the spelling of ICC Statute.

[92] G Williams, Criminal Law: the General Part 2nd edn (London: Stevens and Sons 1961) 159.

[93] R Sullivan, 'Knowledge, Belief, and Culpability' in S Shute and A Simester, Criminal Law Theory: Doctrines of the General Part (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 214.

[94] Ibid., 225.

homonymous concept in the ICTY jurisprudence, to which Ohlin has traced back an alleged conflation between the International Humanitarian Law cardinal principles of distinction and of proportionality.[95] Yet, it emerges as an almost natural question whether in the system of the ICC Statute this concept of intent applies to the war crimes of attack affecting civilians provided for in Articles 8(2)(b)(i) and (iv) and 8(2)(e)(i) ICC Statute.

It is generally accepted that the wording 'Unless otherwise provided' appearing at the very beginning of Article 30 ICC Statute allows the Court to derive exceptions to intent from other provisions of the Statute.[96] However, at least in the scholarship it is, on the other hand, still controversial whether diverging standards of mental element could also arise from the Elements of Crime[97], or even from customary international law.[98] The early practice of the ICC appears on its part to have embraced the view that both the ICC Statute and the Elements of Crime can provide 'otherwise' in the sense of the opening clause of Article 30 ICC Statute. The Court has relied on paragraph (2) of the General Introduction to the Elements of Crime, which in the relevant part reads as follows:

> [a]s stated in article 30, unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge. Where no reference is made in the Elements of Crime to a mental element for any particular conduct, consequence or circumstance listed, it is understood that the relevant mental element, i.e., intent, knowledge or both, set out in article 30 applies. . . .

[95] Ohlin (n 3).

[96] See, inter alia, Lubanga confirmation decision (n 26) paras 356 ff; Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) paras 136, 353; Clark, 'The Mental Element in International Criminal Law' (n 29) 321; Eser (n 14) 898, 933; Werle and Jeßberger (n 29) 43 ff; J Ohlin, 'Joint Criminal Confusion' (2009) 12 New Criminal Law Review 406, 414; Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (n 14) 416 ff; Cryer et al. (n 29) 386; W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: a Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 474; K Ambos, Internationales Strafrecht 3rd edn (München: C H Beck 2011), s. 7, para. 64; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 351 ff; Cassese et al. (n 34) 56.

[97] In the affirmative sense, inter alia, Lubanga confirmation decision (n 26) paras 356 ff; Bemba confirmation decision (n 14) paras 136 and 353; Clark, 'The Mental Element in International Criminal Law' (n 29) 321; H von Hebel and M Kelt, 'General Principles of Criminal Law and Elements of Crimes' in R Lee (ed), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 30, 36 ff; Werle and Jeßberger (n 29) 45 ff; Badar, 'The Mental Element in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 19) 501; Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (n 14) 416, 419 ff; Cryer et al. (n 29) 386; Schabas (n 92) 474 ff; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 353 ff. Against this view, inter alia, Ambos (n 14) 789; Eser (n 14) 898, 933; Ambos (n 96) s. 7, para. 64 read together with s. 6, para. 30.

[98] In the affirmative sense, inter alia, K Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Sources and Commentary (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2003) 11 ff; Werle and Jeßberger (n 29) 45ff; Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (n 14) para. 416; Finnin, Elements of Accessorial Modes of Liability (n 14) 179 ff; Finnin, 'Mental Elements under Article 30 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (n 14) 354, 359. Against this view, inter alia, Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine van der Wyngaert to Ngudjolo trial judgment (n 75) para. 9 fn 16; Cryer et al. (n 29) 386; Ohlin (n 96) 414.

26.3.2 Intent, attack against civilians, and collateral damage

Articles 8(2)(b)(i) and 8(2)(e)(i) ICC Statute criminalize the act of '[i]ntentionally directing attacks against the civilian population as such or against individual civilians not taking direct part in hostilities' (violation of the principle of distinction). Article 8(2)(b)(iv) ICC Statute considers the following as a war crime: '[i]ntentionally launching an attack in the knowledge that such attack will cause incidental loss of life or injury to civilians or damage to civilian objects or widespread, long-term and severe damage to the natural environment which would be clearly excessive in relation to the concrete and direct overall military advantage anticipated' (violation of the principle of proportionality). In order to verify whether or not the ICC Statute has reiterated the over-criminalization of the breach of the rule of distinction reproached to the jurisprudence of the Yugoslavia Tribunal[99], the key problem to be solved is how to interpret the word 'intentionally' appearing in Articles 8(2)(b)(i) and 8(2)(e)(i) ICC Statute, and substantially repeated in the third Element of Crime to the corresponding crimes.

At first glance, this adverb 'intentionally' seems to just confirm the default rule on the mental element of Article 30 ICC Statute, that is, to impose that the agent was aware that the conduct would 'in the ordinary course of events' affect civilians. However, it should also be noted that such an interpretation would create a significant overlap between the crime of attack against civilians and that of collateral damage provided for in Article 8(2)(b)(iv) ICC Statute. The latter offence explicitly pertains to cases where the person knew that the strike would have caused incidental harm among civilians, yet on the additional condition that such a loss was disproportionate to the foreseen military advantage. An alternative interpretation could thus be taken into consideration that would keep the domains of each of the crimes in question clearly distinct, while at the same time being faithful to the original limitation of the principle of distinction to situations of clear will to hit civilians. This would assign to the word 'intentionally' in Articles 8(2)(b)(i) and 8(2)(e)(i) ICC Statute the narrower meaning of 'purposefully'.[100]

26.4 Concluding Remarks

The regulation of the mental elements in the ICC Statute appears to be consistent with a narrow interpretation of the international humanitarian law cardinal principles of distinction and of proportionality. Articles 8(2)(b)(i) and 8(2)(e)(i) ICC Statute could limit the scope of the war crime of attack against civilians to situations where the agent pursued the causation of harm to civilians as his or her conscious goal. Furthermore, according to Article 8(2)(b)(iv) ICC Statute read together with Article 30 ICC Statute, the war crime of collateral damage would pertain to cases where the person was practically certain that the operation would have brought excessive losses among protected targets. The legal landscape applicable and binding within the jurisdiction of the ICC departs significantly from the broad concept of intent developed in the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals and applied by the ICTY to the war crime of attack against civilians. The Yugoslavia Tribunal has regularly held that even in scenarios where the actor merely foresaw the possibility of hitting civilians in consequence of a strike directed at military objectives, criminal responsibility for violation of the principle of distinction could be established.

[99] Ohlin (n 3).

[100] In this sense Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law (n 14) para. 1178; Porro (n 17) 204.

However, the exclusion of dolus eventualis from the realm of Article 30 ICC Statute raises some questions. How should the ICC qualify the behaviour of those agents who, without aiming to launch an attack against protected targets nor being aware that this was a virtual certainty as a result of their act, nevertheless perceived the likelihood of it occurring? To take another example, what should the ICC do with those actors who did not want to kill the people they forcibly deported, but knew there was such a risk? What should the ICC do with their claim that they did not want to kill, but merely threaten the victims to leave their municipality? If it cannot be proven that the accused either intended to cause the death of the victims or knew that death was almost inevitable, there can be no liability for dolus directus of the first degree or dolus directus of the second degree (Article 30(2)(b) first and second alternative ICC Statute). In such cases, and according to the very strict interpretation of dolus by recent decisions and judgments rendered by the ICC, there can be no liability and the perpetrators should be acquitted. Whether the Appeals Chamber of the ICC will extend the meaning of intention under Article 30 ICC Statute to include dolus eventualis is still unresolved.

27

The ICC's First Encounter with the Crime of Genocide

The Case against Al Bashir

*Claus Kreß

27.1 Introduction

On 31 March 2005 the UNSC, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, adopted Resolution 1593 referring the situation in Darfur, Sudan, since 1 July 2002, to the prosecutor of the ICC.[1] After having informed Pre-Trial Chamber I on 1 June 2005 of its decision to initiate an investigation into the Darfur situation, pursuant to Article 53 of the ICC Statute, the prosecution, on 14 July 2008, filed an application under Article 58 of the ICC Statute requesting the issuance of a warrant of arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (2008 Application), who, at that time, was (and, at the time of writing, continues to be) the Head of the State of Sudan.[2]

It is hard to overstate the importance of the situation in Darfur, in general, and that of the case against Al Bashir, in particular, for the ICC.[3] The first UNSC referral of a situation in accordance with Article 13(b) of the ICC Statute confronted the Court, which before had largely been dealing with rebel leaders at the request of the respective governments, with its core mission being to examine whether state leaders had crossed the ultimate red line drawn by international criminal law. And the Court was requested to fulfil its core mission while the underlying conflict was ongoing and the most likely suspects were still in office. Unsurprisingly, the Sudan precedent has brought to light a host of legal and policy issues, which go to the heart of the ICC's work, including, for example, the tension between the new international criminal justice system and the traditional international law immunities, the timing of the issuance of arrest warrants during ongoing conflicts, the (non-)cooperation of states with the Court in high-profile cases, and the proper role of the UNSC subsequent to a referral under Article 13(b) of the ICC Statute, including the (non-)use of its power under Article 16 of the ICC Statute. More generally, it has also revealed the

* Professor of Public International Law and Criminal Law, University of Cologne (claus.kress@uni-koeln.de). This chapter is dedicated to William A. Schabas.

[1] UNSC Res 1593 (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/RES/1593, op. para. 1.

[2] Public Redacted Version of the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58, ICC-02/05-157-AnxA, Situation in Darfur, OTP, ICC, 12 September 2008.

[3] For a brief summary of the history of the conflict, see M Kelly, 'The Debate over Genocide in Darfur, Sudan' (2011) 18 University of California Davis Journal of International Law 205, 206 et seq.

possible tension between the burning need, on the one hand, to alleviate human suffering and put an end to a bloody non-international armed conflict and, on the other hand, the global interest in the validation of fundamentally important international law rules through the new international criminal justice system. Fascinating as all these issues are, none of them will be addressed in this chapter.[4] Instead, the latter's modest ambition is to shed some light on the ICC's first substantial encounter with the crime of genocide.

This encounter was triggered by the prosecution's submission, in the 2008 Application, that Al Bashir bears criminal responsibility for the crime of genocide as a result of the killing of and the causing of serious bodily or mental harm to members of the Fur, Masalit, and Zaghawa ethnic groups, as well as the deliberate infliction on those groups of conditions of life calculated to bring about the groups' physical destruction.[5] In its 4 March 2009 Decision (2009 Decision), Pre-Trial Chamber I found that the material provided by the prosecution had failed to give reasonable grounds to believe that Al Bashir had committed the crime of genocide.[6] This finding was reversed by the Appeals Chamber[7] in its Judgment of 3 February 2010[8] (2010 Judgment) on the ground that the Pre-Trial Chamber had applied an erroneous standard of proof. In its 12 July 2010 Decision (2010 Decision), Pre-Trial Chamber I,[9] on the basis of the legal determinations made by the Appeals Chamber, decided to issue a warrant of arrest for genocide as applied for by the prosecution.[10] At the time of writing, Al Bashir remains at large.

27.2 The ICC's Al Bashir Case Law on the Crime of Genocide

To date, the 2009 Decision constitutes the most important engagement of an ICC Chamber with the definition of the crime of genocide. The analysis of this decision, therefore, is at the heart of the present chapter while references to the 2010 Judgment and to the 2010 Decision may be kept comparatively short.

[4] The literature on these issues is vast; for a few studies, see C Kreß, 'The International Criminal Court and Immunities under International Law for States not Party to the Court's Statute' in M Bergsmo and L Yan (eds), State Sovereignty and International Criminal Law (Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 223; S Nouwen, Complementarity in the Line of Fire. The Catalysing Effect of the International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2013) 244.

[5] Public Redacted Version of the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58 (n 2) paras 76–209.

[6] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, para. 206.

[7] The Chamber was composed of Judges Erkki Kourula, Sang-Hyun Song, Ekaterina Trendafilova, Daniel David Ntanda Nsereko, and Joyce Aluoch.

[8] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir', Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-73 OA, AC, ICC, 3 February 2010, para. 41.

[9] The Chamber was composed of Judges Sylvia Steiner, Sanji Mmasenono Monageng, and Cuno Tarfusser.

[10] Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-94, PTC I, ICC, 12 July 2010, p. 28.

27.2.1 The teleology behind the law against genocide

The 2009 Decision finds that 'the definition of the crime of genocide aims at protecting the existence of a specific group or people'. It accordingly determines that the fact that three different groups have been targeted must be reflected through the articulation of three distinct counts of genocide.[11] While this is not a particularly elaborate statement, it is in line with a consolidated judicial approach starting with the seminal 1998 judgment of the ICTR in the Akayesu case.[12]

By endorsing this approach, the 2009 Decision implicitly rejects the more recent suggestion made by Larry May that the prohibition of genocide exclusively protects the interests of the individual members of the protected group concerned. These individuals, so the argument runs, hold the interest in defining their (social) identity also through the belonging to their group, and the crime of genocide therefore threatens the individual members of the group with the significant harm of losing their group identity.[13]

It constitutes an intriguing question de lege ferenda whether the law against genocide should be purely 'individualistic' along the lines suggested by May. The existing law, however, cannot be convincingly explained in that way. The protective scope of the current legal definition of genocide is confined to four specific categories of groups, and it is hard to explain this limitation if the prohibition of genocide is seen through the lens of the interest of individual human beings to form a group identity. This interest has also not been at the historical roots of the recognition of genocide as a distinct crime under international law. Raphael Lemkin's seminal book Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress[14] was inspired by Johann Gottfried Herder's belief that humanity was enriched by the existence of a plurality of national cultures,[15] and it is precisely this idea that the UNGA ceremonially endorsed when it stated in its historic resolution of 11 December 1946 that genocide 'results in great losses to humanity in the form of cultural and other contributions represented by these human groups'.[16] The travaux préparatoires therefore suggest that the law against genocide protects the world's interest in 'national cosmopolitanism'.

While this collective interest has rightly been recognized in the 2009 Decision, there is no compelling reason to deny that, in addition thereto, the current law against genocide protects those individual rights of the targeted group members. The fact that

[11] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 115.

[12] Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, TC I, ICTR, 2 September 1998, para. 469.

[13] L May, Genocide. A Normative Account (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010) 88 et seq.

[14] R Lemkin, Axis Rule in Occupied Europe: Laws of Occupation, Analysis of Government, Proposals for Redress (Washington, D.C.: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace 1944).

[15] For a brilliant analysis of Lemkin's 'groupism' and the significance of thinkers other than Herder for Lemkin's writings, see A Dirk Moses, 'Raphael Lemkin, Culture, and the Concept of Genocide' in D Bloxham and A Dirk Moses (eds), The Oxford Handbook of Genocide Studies (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 22 et seq.

[16] UNGA Res 96(I) (11 December 1946) UN Doc A/RES/96(I); reprinted in H Abtahi and P Webb (eds), The Genocide Convention. The Travaux Préparatoires vol. I (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2008) 34; as Dirk Moses (n 15) 37, aptly observes: 'This is pure Lemkin.'

those individuals may not 'count' as individuals for the genocidaires is utterly irrelevant. It is the law's perspective that matters, and here the individual rights of the targeted group members count a great deal.[17] The 2009 Decision does not touch upon this aspect.

The decision does also not offer reflections about the question whether, and if yes, in what specific sense, genocide is a crime against international peace and security as the ILC's Draft Code of Crimes against Peace and Security of Mankind[18] (through its very title) and the Preamble of the ICC Statute (through its third consideration) suggest. While it would have been fascinating to learn the Chamber's view on this, it is understandable that it has refrained from digging that deep. At this moment in time international legal scholarship continues to struggle with the conceptualization of the UNSC's more recent practice to apply the concept of 'threat to international peace and security'[19] to serious forms of internal violence, and, accordingly, international criminal law scholarship continues to struggle with the conceptualization of the 'second generation of crimes under international law',[20] including genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes committed in a non-international armed conflict, in cases without direct trans-border repercussions.

27.2.2 The basic structure of the crime of genocide

27.2.2.1 The texts

Pursuant to Article 7 of the ICC Statute and customary international law, crimes against humanity require the existence (or at least the emergence) of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population.[21] It is thus clearly established that crimes against humanity will, except perhaps in the most exceptional circumstances, have a systemic character. The customary definition of genocide, as contained in Article II of the 1948 Genocide Convention[22] and as reprinted in Article 6 of the ICC Statute, reads conspicuously differently. It neither contains an explicit objective contextual element, nor does its intent requirement explicitly allude to a collective genocidal activity. As a consequence hereof, the crime of genocide, other than crimes against humanity, appears to be drafted from the perspective of the 'lone individual seeking to destroy the group as such'.[23] Yet, the ICC Elements of Crimes[24] on [17] For a more detailed argument, see C Kreß, '§ 6 VStGB' in W Joecks and K Miebach (eds), Münchener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch vol. 8, 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2013) 1088 (marginal note 2).

[18] 1996 Yearbook of the International Law Commission vol. II, part 2, 44.

[19] See e.g. E de Wet, The Chapter VII Powers of the United Nations Security Council (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2004) 138 et seq.

[20] For the distinction between a first and a second generation of substantive international criminal law, see C Kreß, 'The International Criminal Court as a Turning Point in the History of International Criminal Justice' in A Cassese (ed.), The Oxford Companion to International Criminal Justice (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2009) 146 et seq.

[21] This part of the chapter builds on and updates C Kreß, 'The Crime of Genocide and Contextual Elements: A Comment on the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber's Decision in the Al Bashir Case' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 297.

[22] Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (signed 9 December 1948, entered into force 12 January 1951) 78 UNTS 277.

[23] Judgment, Jelisić, IT-95-10-T, TC I, ICTY, 14 December 1999, para. 100 ('Jelisić Trial Judgment').

[24] Elements of Crimes, ICC/ASP/1/3, 9 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP).

the crime of genocide significantly qualify this first impression conveyed by a first reading of the crime's definition. They stipulate a common Element which reads as follows:

> The conduct (killing, causing serious bodily or mental harm etc.) took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against that group or was conduct that could itself effect such destruction.

This is complemented by the following explanations in the Introduction of the Elements of Crimes on genocide.

With respect to the last element listed for each crime:

- The term 'in the context of' would include the initial acts in an emerging pattern;
- The term 'manifest' is an objective qualification;
- Notwithstanding the normal requirement for a mental element provided for in article 30 and recognizing that knowledge of the circumstances will usually be addressed in proving genocidal intent, the appropriate requirement, if any, for a mental element regarding this circumstance will need to be decided by the Court on a case-by-case basis.

27.2.2.2 The 2009 Decision

In its 2008 Application, the prosecution takes the requirement of a genocidal context for granted and applies the first alternative of the common Element as follows:

> The Prosecution must show that, as to each genocidal actus reus, the conduct took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against each target group. The magnitude, consistency and planned nature of the crimes detailed in this Application unequivocally demonstrate that the alleged acts of genocide took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct, in furtherance of Al Bashir's plan to destroy in substantial part each of the targeted groups.[25]

The 2009 Decision takes a more scrupulous approach to the matter. It recognizes a possible departure of the common Element from the crime's definition and notes that 'there is certain controversy as to whether this contextual element should be recognised'.[26] In the end, however, the Chamber does not find the contextual Element in 'irreconcilable contradiction' to the definition. The Chamber interprets the Element as follows:

> In the view of the Majority, according to this contextual element, the crime of genocide is only completed when the relevant conduct presents a concrete threat to the existence of the targeted group, or a part thereof. In other words, the protection offered by the penal norm defining the crime of genocide—as an ultima ratio mechanism > to preserve the highest values of the international community—is only triggered when the threat against the existence of the targeted group, or part thereof, becomes concrete and real, as opposed to just being latent or hypothetical.[27]

[25] Public Redacted Version of the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58 (n 2) para. 209; cf. also para. 76 of the same document.

[26] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 125.

In the Chamber's view this is not an amendment to the crime's definition but rather the articulation of an implicit element of the latter:

> [T]he Majority considers that the definition of the crime of genocide, so as to require for its completion an actual threat to the targeted group, or part thereof, is (i) not per se contrary to article 6 of the Statute; (ii) fully respects the requirements of article 22(2) of the Statute that the definition of the crimes 'shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy' and 'in case of ambiguity, the definition shall be interpreted in favour of the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted'; and (iii) is fully consistent with the traditional consideration of the crime of genocide as the 'crime of crimes'.[28]

In her Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion, Judge Ušacka explicitly refrains from deciding on the issue and questions the Majority's reasoning to the extent that it is based on Article 22 of the ICC Statute.[29] More specifically, Judge Ušacka disagrees with the Majority's view that a 'concrete threat' is required to satisfy the contextual elements.[30]

27.2.2.3 Analysis

This commentator shares the Chamber's view that the formulation of the last (common) Element does not purport to amend the crime's definition but provides for a welcome clarification of the latter (section 27.2.2.3.1). It is respectfully submitted, though, that the contextual Element should not be seen as an addition to the crime's actus reus but as an objective point of reference of a realistic genocidal intent (section 27.2.2.3.2).[31] Finally, it is thought that the requirement of a 'concrete threat' is unfortunately worded because it suggests an unduly stringent threshold (section 27.2.2.3.3).

27.2.2.3.1 The definition of the crime and the common Element of Crimes on genocide

It should be noted at the outset that the Elements of Crimes do not exclude the scenario of the lone génocidaire altogether. The second alternative of the common Element explicitly provides for this possibility. It requires, however, that such a lone génocidaire must be in possession of the means to effect the destruction of the targeted group in whole or in part.[32] Obviously, this latter qualification is of great practical importance.

[27] Ibid., para. 124. [28] Ibid., para. 133.

[29] Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) paras 16 and 20.

[30] Ibid., para. 19, fn. 26.

[31] See already C Kreß, 'The Crime of Genocide under International Law' (2006) 6 International Criminal Law Review 461, 471 et seq.

[32] R Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010) 218; W Rückert and G Witschel, 'Genocide and Crimes against

As it is extremely difficult to conceive of a single perpetrator who is in a position to destroy a (substantial part of a) protected group on his own, the first alternative of the common Element will be applicable in practice (as in the Al Bashir case), except for the most exceptional circumstances, which William A Schabas aptly described as 'little more than a sophomoric hypothèse d'école and a distraction for judicial institutions'.[33] Yet, it is important to fully appreciate what the common Element of the crime of genocide essentially suggests: that this crime presupposes a real danger for the targeted group and that this, for all practical purposes, entails the need for a planned genocidal campaign.

(i) The significance of the principle of strict construction

Judge Ušacka is correct that it would be too easy to simply rely on Article 22(2) of the ICC Statute to resolve our question because the application of this statutory rule of interpretation requires the existence of an ambiguity. At the same time, however, Article 22(2) of the ICC Statute carries its full weight if a reasonably strong case—based on other considerations—can be made in support of the narrow construction of the crime's definition. As it will now be shown, such considerations can be formulated.

(ii) History and travaux préparatoires

The idea of a genocidal campaign is not a recent arrival. Quite to the contrary, it lies at the heart of the original concept of the crime. In his groundbreaking study on the subject, Raphael Lemkin had the following to say:

> [Genocide] is intended…to signify a coordinated plan of different actions aiming at the destruction of essential foundations of the life of national groups, with the aim of annihilating the groups themselves.[34]

As is well known, Lemkin's otherwise rather broad concept of genocide, including several forms of cultural genocide,[35] was significantly narrowed as a result of the deliberations in the UNGA's Sixth Committee. This, in itself, makes it rather unlikely that states, at the same time, decided to fundamentally broaden the crime's scope of application to cases where no real danger for (part of) a group exists. This is confirmed by a reading of the debates within the Sixth Committee. It must of course be conceded that the drafters did not wish to categorically exclude the scenario of the lone génocidaire and rejected suggestions that would have had that effect.[36] On the other hand, and crucially, at no place do the travaux préparatoires reveal that the drafters seriously contemplated the definition encompassing conduct not posing a real danger to the Humanity in the Elements of Crime' in H Fischer et al. (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes Under International Law (Berlin: Berlin Verlag Arno Spitz 2001) 66.

[33] W Schabas, 'Darfur and the "Odious Scourge": The Commission of Inquiry's Findings on Genocide' (2005) 18 Leiden Journal of International Law 871, 877.

[34] Lemkin (n 14) 79.

[35] W Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 59 et seq., 82.

[36] For such suggestions, see A/C.6/211, 1 October 1948 (France); A/C.6/217, 5 October 1948 (Belgium).

group or a part hereof.[37] Historical background and genesis thus both point to a narrow construction of the crime's definition.

(iii) Systematic considerations

While the crime of genocide received a proper definition before crimes against humanity did, the former has grown out of the latter.[38] This historic fact cautions against a disconnection of the common roots of both crimes under international law. As was highlighted earlier, there can be no doubt that crimes against humanity imply a real danger for the targeted civilian population because of the requirement of a (emerging) widespread or systematic attack. In light of the historic development, it would be rather odd if the crime of genocide had been given a fundamentally broader scope of application. It was therefore right for the 2009 Decision to emphasize that it would be hard to reconcile such a broad construction with the widely accepted consideration of the crime of genocide as the 'crime of crimes'.[39]

Construing the crime of genocide without the requirement of a real danger for the targeted group would also place this crime in a peculiar position relative to other crimes under international law. For not only crimes against humanity, but also war crimes and the crime of aggression require a real danger to the internationally protected value. In the case of war crimes, this danger stems from the fact that an armed conflict must exist. Consequently, the commission of any war crime entails the real risk of escalating already existing violence and of posing an obstacle to the conclusion of a genuine peace. Correspondingly, a crime of aggression under customary international law presupposes an actual state of use of force in contravention of the international prohibition on the use of force. This is even more than a real threat to international peace and security. All this demonstrates the need to pass a high threshold to reach the realm of the international community's jus puniendi. Indeed, the Chamber formulates a useful word of caution against tendencies to trivialize international criminal law stricto sensu when it stresses that this body of law constitutes the 'ultima ratio mechanism to preserve the highest values of the international community'. From a standpoint of systematic coherency within the existing body of international criminal law stricto sensu, it would hardly be convincing to construe the crime of genocide in a manner that would legitimize international intervention through criminal law without the need to pass a similarly high threshold.

(iv) The Elements of Crimes as evidence of the opinio juris of states

According to Article 9 of the ICC Statute, the Elements of Crimes shall assist in the interpretation of Article 6 of the ICC Statute and they shall be consistent with it. While these legal requirements cannot exclude the possibility of an irreconcilable conflict between an Element and the statutory definition, they nonetheless caution against too hasty an assumption that such a contradiction exists. The Elements of Crimes should first be evaluated as what they are, i.e. the expression of a 'consensus by the international community'[40] that a certain crime should be interpreted in a certain way. This must also apply in the case of the last common Element on the crime of genocide. There is no compelling indication that the drafters of the last common Element intended to hereby amend the well-entrenched definition of the crime of genocide. While there were differences as to the precise language and the best analytical way to capture the underlying idea, there was no fundamental disagreement on the substance. As one observer has rightly noted:

[37] For the same view, see Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 244 et seq.

[38] Cryer et al. (n 32) 205–6.

[39] The problematic consequences of this broad construction of the crime are usefully spelled out in P Mysliwiec, 'Accomplice to Genocide Liability: The Case for a Purpose Mens Rea Standard' (2009) 10 Chicago Journal of International Law 389, 402 et seq. Mysliwiec suggests a stringent standard specifically for 'accomplice liability' for genocide to avoid part of these consequences; this, however, does not strike at the root of the problem.

> Because genocide is universally recognized as an extremely serious crime, it was generally agreed that the context of the crime requires that there be a certain scale or other real threat to a group.[41]

The Elements of Crimes thus support the systematic considerations by way of subsequent practice.

(v) The prior case law

The formulation of the common Element is not without support within the case law of the ICTY. In fact, it is identical to a statement made by the Trial Chamber of the ICTY in Krstić.[42] The ICTY Appeals Chamber, however, was hostile to the Trial Chamber's view:

> The offence of extermination as a crime against humanity requires proof that the proscribed act formed a part of a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population, and that the perpetrator knew of this relationship. These two requirements are not present in the legal elements of genocide. While a perpetrator's knowing participation in an organized and extensive attack on civilians may support a finding of genocidal intent, it remains only the evidentiary basis from which the fact-finder may draw the inference. The offence of genocide, as defined in the Statute and in international customary law, does not require proof that the perpetrator of genocide participated in a widespread and systematic attack against a civilian population. In reasoning otherwise, the Trial Chamber relied on the definition of genocide in the Elements of Crimes adopted by the ICC. This definition, stated the Trial Chamber,

[40] Cryer et al. (n 32) 219 et seq.; see also S Malliaris, 'Assessing the ICTY Jurisprudence in Defining the Elements of the Crime of Genocide: The Need for a "Plan"' (2009) 5 Review of International Law and Politics 105, 116: 'Given that the Elements have been adopted by the Assembly of States, it should be inferred that the ICC approach is genuinely representing the existing customary norm'.

[41] V Oosterveld, 'The Context of Genocide' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court. Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 45; for a similar observation, see Rückert and Witschel (n 32) 66.

[42] Judgment, Krstić, IT-98-33-T, TC, ICTY, 2 August 2001, para. 682 ('Krstić Trial Judgment'); cf. also the following wise statement of the ICTY prosecution: '[I]n the interests of international justice, genocide should not be diluted or belittled by too broad an interpretation. Indeed, it should be reserved only for acts of exceptional gravity and magnitude which shock the conscience of humankind and which, therefore, justify the appellation of genocide as the "ultimate crime"' (Transcript of hearing before the Trial Chamber of 27 June 1996, Karadžić and Mladić, IT-95-5-R61 and IT-95-18-R61, TC, ICTY, 27 June 1996, 15 et seq.).

> 'indicates clearly that genocide requires that the conduct took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct'. The Trial Chamber's reliance on the definition of genocide given in the ICC's Elements of Crimes is inapposite. As already explained, the requirement that the prohibited conduct be part of a widespread or systematic attack does not appear in the Genocide Convention and was not mandated by customary international law. Because the definition adopted by the Elements of Crimes did not reflect customary law as it existed at the time Krstić committed his crimes, it cannot be used to support the Trial Chamber's conclusion.[43]

This is a rather strong judicial pronouncement on an important point of law. Deplorably, the pronouncement is not supported by equally strong reasoning.[44] The only argument contained in the cited passage is that the Genocide Convention does not contain an explicit contextual element. The further statement that the Elements of Crimes 'did not reflect customary international law' remains a mere assertion. Upon a closer look, it would appear that the drafters of the Elements of Crimes captured the prior case law more accurately than the ICTY Appeals Chamber. This is confirmed by the excellent summary of the prior practice in the leading monograph on the subject by William A Schabas:

> Although there have been convictions for crimes against humanity in the absence of a plan or policy, there is nothing similar in the case law concerning genocide. In practice, although the jurisprudence often says that it is inquiring into whether 'the perpetrator consciously desired the prohibited acts he committed to result in the destruction, in whole or in part of the group as such', judges invariably discuss the existence of the organized plan or policy, and conclude as to the existence of the 'intent' of the accused based on knowledge of the circumstances.[45]

It should also be noted that even the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Jelisić has made an important concession to the more narrow construction of the crime because it has held that, 'in the context of proving specific intent, the existence of a plan or policy may become an important factor in most cases'.[46] It was thus correct for the 2009 Decision to attribute more weight to the opinio juris that states expressed through the [43] Judgment, Krstić, IT-98-33-A, AC, ICTY, 19 April 2004, para. 223 et seq. ('Krstić Appeals Judgment').

[44] For the same view, see Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 245; the same author is also correct in criticizing the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY for a similarly poor reasoning with respect to the plan or policy requirement of crimes against humanity; the ICC Statute's retention of the policy requirement in Art 7(2)(a) is evidence for the fact that the judicial pronouncements of the ICTY advocated for a legal development too far ahead of what states were prepared to accept; see Kreß, 'The International Criminal Court as a Turning Point in the History of International Criminal Justice' (n 20) 148.

[45] Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 246 et seq.; Schabas' assessment is in line with the earlier analysis of the ICTR practice by J Jones, '"Whose Intent is it Anyway?" Genocide and the Intent to Destroy a Group' in L Vohrah et al. (eds), Man's Inhumanity to Man. Essays on International Law in Honour of Antonio Cassese (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 2003) 467, 474 et seq.

[46] Judgment, Jelisić, IT-95-10-A, AC, ICTY, 5 July 2001, para. 48; in the same case, the Trial Chamber went even further and stated that 'it will be very difficult in practice to provide proof of the genocidal intent of an individual if the crimes committed are not widespread and if the crime charged is not backed by an organisation or system'; Jelisić Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 101.

Elements of Crimes than to the view expressed by the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY in Krstić on the state of customary international law.

(vi) Summary

Taken together, the foregoing considerations support the view espoused in the 2009 Decision that the common Element of the crime of genocide correctly suggests that this crime presupposes the existence of a real danger for the targeted group and that this, for all practical purposes, entails the need for the existence of a planned genocidal campaign.[47]

27.2.2.3.2 The genocidal campaign and a realistic genocidal intent

Yet, the literal argument remains that the wording of the objective elements (the actus reus) of the crime in its statutory definition does not provide for a basis to introduce a contextual element.[48] While this argument is hard to refute, it does not affect the alternative approach to reflect the typical interplay between individual and collective conduct in the crime's definition. The key to reconcile the approach taken in the Elements of Crimes with the definition of the crime lies in the interpretation of the concept of genocidal intent. All the considerations listed in section 27.2.2.3.1 support the view that this intent must be realistic and must thus be understood to require more than the vain hope of a single perpetrator of hate crimes to destroy (a part of) the hated group. On the basis of such a realistic concept of intent, which is fully compatible with the wording of the legal term, a coherent explanation of the common Element is possible: the individual perpetrator will act with the realistic intent to destroy (a part of) the targeted group if his conduct is in itself capable to effect this destruction. In almost [47] This position remains controversial; for statements, which would appear to be (at least broadly) in agreement with it, see K Ambos, 'What Does "Intent to Destroy" in Genocide Mean?', (2009) 91 International Review of the Red Cross 833, 846; P Behrens, 'The Mens Rea of Genocide' in P Behrens and R Henham (eds), Elements of Genocide (New York: Routledge 2013) 70, 74–5; L Berster, 'Article II' in C Tams et al. (eds), Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide: A Commentary (Oxford: C H Beck/Hart/Nomos 2014) 141 (marginal note 114); Cryer et al. (n 32) 219; K Goldsmith, 'The Issue of Intent in the Genocide Convention and its Effect on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide: Toward a Knowledge-Based Approach' (2010) 5 Genocide Studies and Prevention 238, 245 et seq.; S Kirsch, 'The Social and the Legal Concept of Genocide' in P Behrens and R Henham (eds), Elements of Genocide (New York: Routledge 2013) 7, 12 et seq.; Malliaris (n 40) 105 et seq.; Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 246 et seq.; for the contrary view, see D Alonzo-Maizlish, 'In Whole or in Part: Group Rights, the Intent Element of Genocide, and the "Quantitative Criterion"' (2002) 77 New York University Law Review 1369, 1380–1; S Clearwater, 'Holding States Accountable for the Crime of Crimes: An Analysis of Direct State Responsibility for Genocide in Light of the ICJ's 2007 Decision in Bosnia v Serbia' (2009) 15 Auckland University Law Review 1, 34 et seq.; N Maitra, 'A Perpetual Possibility? The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda's Recognition of the Genocide of 1994' (2005) 5 International Criminal Law Review 573; Mysliwiec (n 39) 402; C Safferling, 'The Special Intent Requirement in the Crime of Genocide' in C Safferling and E Conze (eds), The Genocide Convention Sixty Years after its Adoption (The Hague: TMC Asser Press 2010) 163, 172; G Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law 2nd edn (The Hague: TMC Asser Press 2009) 271–2 (paras 743–6); for the—unconvincing—suggestion to distinguish between the different genocidal acts, see A Cassese, 'Is Genocidal Policy a Requirement for the Crime of Genocide?' in P Gaeta (ed.), The UN Genocide Convention (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2009) 128, 134–5.

[48] Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) para. 6 in conjunction with paras 13–17, the Pre-Trial Chamber explicitly treats the 'contextual element' as a 'material element'.

all cases, however, this will not be the case. Therefore, for all practical purposes, a perpetrator's realistic intent requires that his conduct take place 'in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against that group'. Under this approach, the common Element constitutes the objective point of reference of genocidal intent. There is only a fine analytical nuance between this construction of genocidal intent and the widespread judicial practice to regard the genocidal campaign as 'only the evidentiary basis from which the fact-finder may draw the inference'[49] that a genocidal intent exists.

While it is true that the common Element of Crimes is worded in the form of an objective circumstantial element, it is submitted that the concept of realistic intent constitutes the preferable way to capture the substance of what the drafter's of the Elements had in mind.[50] First, this concept conforms to the wording of the Genocide Convention. Second, it has the advantage of avoiding the debate about an additional mental requirement. The drafters of the Elements were aware of this problem but were unable to solve it within the short negotiation time given to them. This is readily apparent from the evasive passage in the Introduction to the Elements of Crimes on genocide.[51] If, however, a genocidal campaign is seen as the objective point of reference for a realistic genocidal intent, it is clear that the individual perpetrator must be aware of this campaign to form such an intent.

Very interestingly, when dealing with the intent requirement in its 2009 Decision, the Chamber chose an approach that comes very close to the concept of realistic intent, as outlined earlier. The Chamber draws the following distinction between what it calls the genocidal intent of the Government of Sudan, and Al Bashir's genocidal intent:

> The Prosecution highlights that it relies exclusively on proof by inference to substantiate its allegations concerning Omar Al Bashir's alleged responsibility for genocide. In particular, the Prosecution relies on inferences to prove the existence of Omar Al Bashir's dolus specialis/specific intent to destroy in whole or in part the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa groups.
>
> In this regard, the Majority observes that, according to the Prosecution, Omar Al Bashir was in full control of the 'apparatus' of the State of Sudan. . . .
>
> As a result, the Majority considers that if the materials provided by the Prosecution support the Prosecution's allegations in this regard, the existence of reasonable grounds to believe that Omar Al Bashir had a genocidal intent would automatically lead to the conclusion that there are reasonable grounds to believe that a genocidal campaign against the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa groups was a core component of the [Government of Sudan (GoS)] counter-insurgency campaign.
>
> However, the situation would be different if the materials provided by the Prosecution show reasonable grounds to believe that Omar Al Bashir shared the control over the 'apparatus' of the State of Sudan with other high-ranking Sudanese political and military leaders. In this situation, the Majority is of the view that the > existence of reasonable grounds to believe that one of the core components of the GoS counter-insurgency campaign was a genocidal campaign against the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa groups would be dependent upon the showing of reasonable grounds to believe that those who shared the control of the 'apparatus' of the State of Sudan with Omar Al Bashir agreed that the GoS counter-insurgency campaign would, inter alia, aim at the destruction, in whole or in part, of the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa groups.

[49] Krstić Appeals Judgment (n 43) para. 223.

[50] For the same view, see Ambos (n 47) 845 et seq.; Berster (n 47) 138 et seq. (marginal note 107 et seq.); Jones (n 45) 478 et seq.; Kirsch (n 47) 7; May (n 13) 120 et seq.

[51] For the citation, see section 27.2.2.1; see the formulation in the third indent.

>
> It is for this reason that the Majority refers throughout the rest of the present decision to 'the GoS's genocidal intent' as opposed to 'Omar Al Bashir's genocidal intent'.[52]

While the meaning of these considerations is not entirely clear, one very plausible explanation would be that the Majority holds the view that there is a connection between the required 'individual' genocidal intent of Al Bashir and a 'collective' genocidal intent. If 'governmental intent' is translated into a 'plan to carry out a genocidal campaign', it becomes apparent that the Chamber is of the view that the overall genocidal plan amounts to an objective point of reference for Al Bashir's individual intent which, by virtue of this point of reference, becomes a realistic one.[53] On the basis of such a concept of genocidal intent, a separate mental requirement concerning an objective contextual element is as superfluous as this objective requirement itself. The 2009 Decision has thus come halfway in adopting the concept of realistic intent as outlined in this contribution and it is suggested that the ICC should fully endorse this idea when the next opportunity arises.

27.2.2.4 No requirement of a concrete threat

In the 2009 Decision, the last common Element is understood to mean that the crime of genocide is only completed when 'the threat against the existence of the targeted group, or part thereof, becomes concrete and real, as opposed to just being latent or hypothetical'.[54] The Chamber's precise understanding of 'concrete threat' is not entirely clear, but the term risks being understood as posing too significant a hurdle to pass. As Judge Ušacka rightly observes in her dissent,[55] the precondition of a 'concrete threat' comes close to a 'result-based requirement', i.e. the requirement of a situation where the genocidal campaign has advanced to a point where actual destruction may soon result. None of the above considerations call for the introduction of so stringent a threshold and the same is true for the prior practice. Contrary to what the Chamber appears to hold, the common Element does not require the occurrence of

[52] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) paras 147–51.

[53] It is worth emphasizing that the concept of realistic intent is not prejudicial to the decision in the debate between a 'purpose-based' and a 'knowledge-based' approach to the individual intent to which we shall turn our attention in section 27.2.4.3. Analytically, these are two distinct legal issues.

[54] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 124.

[55] Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 19, fn. 26.

such an advanced threat either.[56] Under this Element's second alternative, it is sufficient that the conduct in question can effect the destructive result. Accordingly, it must suffice for the first alternative, too, that the genocidal campaign is of a nature capable of bringing about the planned destruction.[57] This interpretation is confirmed by the fact that the Introduction to the Elements of Crimes on Genocide underlines that the 'term "in the context of" would include the initial acts in an emerging pattern'. This means that the crime of genocide is completed with the initial act of a genocidal campaign. It follows that, for the typical case of genocide, no more should be required as the objective point of reference for the perpetrator's intent than the existence of a realistic collective goal to destroy the target group in whole or in part. Interestingly, the 2010 Decision does not contain any reference to the requirement of 'concrete threat'.[58] It would be good if the point were fully clarified on the next occasion.

27.2.3 The material elements

The following analysis does not offer a comprehensive commentary on the material elements, and is by and large confined to those legal questions addressed by the 2009 Decision.[59]

27.2.3.1 On the concept of 'protected group' in general and that of 'ethnical group' in particular

It was only at an advanced stage of the negotiations that, following a suggestion made by Sweden,[60] the ethnical group was included in the list of protected groups. In light of this, it may be considered as somewhat of a historical irony that the concept of ethnical group has quickly gained particular prominence. The ICC's early case law confirms this point. The 2009 Decision sheds further light on this concept and also on the more general one of 'protected group'. The pertinent passage reads as follows:

> [T]he Majority is of the view that the targeted group must have particular positive characteristics (national, ethnic, racial or religious), and not a lack thereof. . . . The Majority considers that there are no reasonable grounds to believe that nationality, race and/or religion are a distinctive feature of any of the three different groups—the Fur, the Masalit and the Zaghawa—that, according to the Prosecution, have been targeted. . . .

[56] For the same view, Berster (n 47) 138 (marginal note 107 together with fn. 453); R Cryer, 'The Definitions of International Crimes in the Al Bashir Arrest Warrant Decision' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 283, 290–1; Cryer et al. (n 32) 219, fn. 93; Werle (n 47) 272–3 (marginal note 746).

[57] For the same view, see Berster (n 47) 141 (marginal note 114).

[58] For the relevant passages, see Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) para. 6 in conjunction with paras 13–17.

[59] For the attempt of a comprehensive commentary, see Kreß, '§ 6 VStGB' (n 17) 1099–111 (marginal notes 30–69).

[60] UNGAOR, 3rd Session, 6th Committee, 115.

> As a result, the question arises as to whether any of the three groups is a distinct ethnic group. In this regard, the Majority finds that there are reasonable grounds to believe that this question must be answered in the affirmative as there are reasonable grounds to believe that each of the groups … has its own language, its own tribal customs and its own traditional links to its lands.[61]

These paragraphs contain four elements which partly consolidate and otherwise usefully complement the prior international case law in point. First of all, the Chamber considers the list of protected groups to be exhaustive. Hereby, it implicitly rejects the idea of recognizing other protected groups than those explicitly listed, provided such groups are comparably stable. This idea had been considered by the ICTR in its Akayesu judgment,[62] but without any positive echo in the subsequent case law. The implicit rejection in the 2009 Decision of the suggestion made in Akayesu is all the more important, as both Chambers faced a not altogether dissimilar difficulty to bring the targeted human group(s) in question within the confines of the genocide definition. In light of the text of the definition and of its history, the position adopted in the 2009 Decision is correct[63] and, with this judicial pronouncement, the international case law on the point in question appears to be settled.

Second, the 2009 Decision makes the attempt to distinguish between the four groups listed in the definition of the crime. This contrasts with the 'holistic' approach as developed by William A Schabas[64] and occasionally accepted by the ICTY.[65] Although the approach chosen in the 2009 Decision is more cumbersome, it must be commended because it is loyal to the text of the definition.[66] It would seem premature, though, to treat the international case law on this point as consolidated.

Third, the 2009 Decision explicitly rejects the idea that a protected group in general and an ethnical group in particular could be defined 'by negation'. Such an approach had been favourably considered by the ICTY Trial Chamber in Jelisić,[67] but was then rejected by this Tribunal's Appeals Chamber in Stakić.[68] In its 2007 Judgment in the 'Genocide Case', the ICJ[69] had endorsed the ICTY Appeals Chamber's view, and the 2009 Decision joins this line of international case law in the following words:

> [I]t is important to highlight that the drafters of the 1948 Genocide Convention gave 'close attention to the positive identification of groups with specific distinguishing

[61] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) paras 135–7.

[62] Akayesu (n 12) para. 701.

[63] A very broad majority of writers concurs; see, for example, F Martin, 'The Notion of "Protected Group" in the Genocide Convention and its Application' in P Gaeta (ed.), The UN Genocide Convention (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2009) 112, 119 et seq.; Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 152.

[64] Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 129 et seq.

[65] The most important judgment in point is Krstić Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 556.

[66] Concurring Berster (n 47) 102–3 (marginal note 36); Martin (n 63) 112, 122.

[67] Jelisić Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 71.

[68] Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-A, AC, ICTY, 22 March 2006, paras 20–1.

[69] Judgment, Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia and Montenegro) 26 February 2007, ICJ Reports 2007, 43 (paras 193–6).

> well established, some said immutable, characteristics'. It is, therefore, a matter of who the targeted people are, not who they are not. (footnotes omitted)[70]

This is correct and may now also be considered as settled international case law.

Fourth, and most importantly, the cited passage from the 2009 Decision, by highlighting each of the groups' 'own language', 'own tribal customs', and 'own traditional links to its lands', encapsulates an essentially objective starting point to the definition of the concepts 'protected group' and 'ethnical group'.[71] This contrasts with a number of statements in the prior international case law[72] and in the literature[73] which indicate a preference to define the concept of ethnical group subjectively and more specifically from the perpetrator's perspective. Yet, as Rebecca Young has usefully demonstrated,[74] the international case law prior to the 2009 Decision had never articulated an absolute departure from an objective approach and a good part of the international criminal law scholarship had, in varying nuances, moved towards a mixed 'subjective–objective' approach,[75] which seems broadly in line with the test favoured by the ICJ in its 2007 'Genocide Judgment'.[76]

While the International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur (Darfur Commission) went so far as to opine that some form of a subjective–objective approach had 'become part and parcel of international customary law'[77], it must be welcomed that the 2009 Decision insists on the objective starting point to the definition of the concepts of 'protected group' and 'ethnical group'. This is so even though the subjective approach has 'a strong initial appeal, since it is ultimately the genocidaire's view of the group's features which decides on whether an individual will be victimized as a group-member',[78] a fact famously alluded to in Jean-Paul Sartre's

[70] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 135.

[71] This is true albeit that the Chamber states in passing that it does not wish to express a view on the matter, ibid., para. 137 (fn. 152).

[72] Judgment, Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-T, TC II, ICTR, 21 May 1999, para. 98; Jelisić Trial Judgment (n 23) para. 70; Krstić Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 557; on this tendency towards a subjective definition, see G Verdirame, 'The Genocide Definition in the Jurisprudence of the Ad Hoc Tribunals' (2000) 49 International & Comparative Law Quarterly 578, 589.

[73] For a particularly clear pronouncement to that effect, see R Maison, 'Le crime de génocide dans les premiers jugements du tribunal pénal international pour le Rwanda' (1999) 103 Révue Générale de Droit International Public 129, 137; for a more recent statement pointing in the same direction, see R Young, 'How Do We Know Them When We See Them? The Subjective Evolution in the Identification of Victim Groups for the Purposes of Genocide' (2010) 10 International Criminal Law Review 1, 21.

[74] Young (n 73) 10 et seq.

[75] For a few examples, see D Demko, 'Die von der Genozidkonvention geschützten "Gruppen" als Regelungsgegenstand des "Specific Intent"' (2009) Schweizerische Zeitschrift für internationales und europäisches Recht 223, 232 et seq.; Martin (n 63) 112, 126; D Nersessian, Genocide and Political Groups (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 31; Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 128; Werle (n 47) 260 (marginal note 715).

[76] Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia and Montenegro) (n 69) para. 191; for a comment, see C Kreß, 'The International Court of Justice and the Elements of the Crime of Genocide' (2007) 18 European Journal of International Law 619, 623–4.

[77] Report of the International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur to the Secretary-General. Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 1564 of 18 September 2004, UN Doc S/2005/60 (1 February 2005) para. 501.

[78] Berster (n 47) 104 (marginal note 40).

aphorism: '…c'est l'antisémite, qui fait le juif'[79]. On a closer inspection, though, a number of—ultimately prevailing—considerations in support of an objective starting point come to light. The three most important considerations are as follows.[80] First, the teleology behind the law against genocide (section 27.2.1), i.e. to prevent conduct that 'results in great losses to humanity in the form of cultural and other contributions represented by these human groups',[81] precludes the possibility that the existence of a protected group might result from a construction in the perpetrator's mind. Allowing for such a possibility would, second, also be incompatible with the drafters' decision for an exhaustive list of protected groups. Third, only an objective starting point guards against the transformation of the crime of genocide into an unspecific crime of group destruction based on a discriminatory motive which could be distinguished from persecution as a crime against humanity only through the more limited list of individual rights at stake.[82] It should be stressed that an objective starting point to the definition of the concepts 'protected group' and 'ethnical group', as chosen in the 2009 Decision, leaves due room for considering (collective) perceptions in at least two respects. Elements such as a common culture, history, or language may give rise to a (collective) sense of group identity and this (collective) perception of the members of the group concerned is, of course, a relevant factor in establishing the existence of an ethnical group within the meaning of the genocide definition. Furthermore, the (collective) perception of the perpetrators may play a limited role when it comes to the delineation of the protected group's outer fringes.[83]

Despite these considerations and the fact that a number of commentators have recently expressed weighty words of caution against an essentially subjective approach under the lex lata,[84] the controversy is likely to receive further attention at the ICC. Judge Ušacka has challenged the 2009 Decision's objective starting point in her Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion,[85] and the Majority itself has not really argued the point and has reserved its final view on the matter.[86]

[79] J-P Sartre, Réflexions sur la question juive (Paris: Paul Morihien 1946) 89.

[80] For a number of additional arguments to the same effect, see Berster (n 47) 105 et seq. (marginal notes 41–5).

[81] UNGA Res 96(I) (n 16).

[82] The arguments set out in the text here are submitted on the basis of the lex lata; whether or not such a transformation is desirable de lege ferenda is a different matter, which cannot be explored in this chapter (for an argument in favour of a subjective approach de lege ferenda, see A Paul, Kritische Analyse und Reformvorschlag zu Art II Genozidkonvention (Berlin: Springer 2008) 160 et seq.

[83] For such a case, see Judgment and Sentence, Ndindabahizi, ICTR-07-71, TC I, ICTR, 15 July 2004, para. 68.

[84] P Akhavan, Reducing Genocide to Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2012) 150; Berster (n 47) 103–7 (paras 37–7); see also D Luban, 'Calling Genocide by its Rightful Name: Lemkin's Word, Darfur and the UN Report' (2006) 7 Chicago Journal of International Law 303, 318, who acknowledges that the subjective approach 'abandons a central idea behind Lemkin's definition of genocide' (for Luban's reform proposal, see ibid. 319).

[85] Decision on the Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) paras 25–6.

[86] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 137 (fn. 152).

27.2.3.2 The genocidal acts

In light of its rejection of reasonable grounds to believe that Al Bashir had acted with genocidal intent, the 2009 Decision does not deal with any of the five categories of genocidal acts. The 2010 Decision cannot avoid the matter, however, after having reached a different conclusion regarding the question of genocidal intent. This decision deals with those first three genocidal acts listed in the definition which have also played a dominant role in the prior international case law.[87]

27.2.3.2.1 Killing

The 2010 Decision holds as follows:

> According to the Elements of Crimes, the specific material element of the crime of genocide by killing is that the perpetrator killed one or more persons. It is worth noting that the element is common to both the crime of genocide by killing under article 6(a) and the crime against humanity of murder under article 7(1)(a) of the Statute with the exception that the former provides that the acts of killings must be directed against members of a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, while the latter requires that the acts be directed against a civilian population.[88]

This statement confirms, in particular, that despite the plural 'members' in the text of the genocide definition, it suffices for the perpetrator to cause the death of one member of a protected group. Although this interpretation does not yet go entirely unchallenged in international criminal law scholarship,[89] it now appears too firmly accepted in practice to be reversed in the future. The same applies, mutatis mutandis, to the second, fourth, and fifth genocidal acts listed in the definition.

27.2.3.2.2 Causing serious bodily or mental harm

The 2010 Decision holds as follows:

> According to the Elements of Crime the specific material element of this count of genocide is that the perpetrator caused serious bodily or mental harm to one or more persons, which may include acts of torture, rape, sexual violence, or inhuman or degrading treatment.... The underlying acts of genocide by inflicting bodily or mental harm... are identical to the underlying acts of the crimes against humanity included in the Prosecution's Application as Counts 6, 7 and 8 (forcible transfer of population, torture civilians, and rape of civilians.[90]

This is a surprisingly sweeping statement. While the footnote to the relevant Element of Crimes is worded carefully enough to say that acts of torture, rape, sexual violence, or inhuman or degrading treatment may amount to the causing of serious [87] For a reference to the potential relevance of the fourth genocidal act to explain the genocidal nature of the Srebrenica campaign, see Judgment, Popović et al., IT-05-88-T, TC II, ICTY, 10 June 2010, para. 866.

[88] Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) para. 20.

[89] For a recent argument suggesting that the perpetrator must cause the death of at least two persons, see Berster (n 47) 116 (marginal note 61); the clearly predominant scholarly view is the one espoused in the 2010 Decision; see e.g. Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 179.

[90] Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) paras 26–7.

bodily or mental harm, the cited passage appears to suggest that such acts invariably cause such harm. The latter is not the case. The prior international case law has convincingly established that the genocidal act in question requires the causing of 'a grave and long-term disadvantage to a person's ability to lead a normal and constructive life'.[91] Whether or not, say, the inhuman or degrading treatment of another person has led to such a result can only be decided in concreto.

The sweeping approach chosen in the 2010 Decision is most astonishing with respect to the 'forcible transfer of population', which is not referred to in the relevant footnote to the Element of Crime. Here again it is possible that forcibly transferred members of the targeted group may suffer the required 'grave and long-term-disadvantage', but the 2010 Decision, contrary to the much more careful approach in the 2008 Application,[92] appears to take such a result for granted. It is to be doubted whether the Pre-Trial Chamber has given full consideration to the consequences of its sweeping statement. If the forcible transfer of a person amounted to causing serious bodily or mental harm to that person, a campaign of so-called ethnic cleansing would, contrary to the prior international case law, invariably fulfil the actus reus of the crime of genocide.

27.2.3.2.3 Deliberately inflicting conditions of life calculated to bring about physical destruction

According to its description in the definition of the crime, the third genocidal act requires the infliction of certain conditions of life 'on the group'. In light of the fact that the genocidal conduct in question must be calculated to bring about the group's physical destruction 'in whole or in part', the words 'on the group' should be read so as to include the case in which the relevant conditions have been inflicted 'on a part of the group'.[93] The wording of the definition, however, excludes the idea that the infliction of certain conditions of life upon one member of the group suffices.[94] For most practical purposes, the material genocidal act in question, therefore, and contrary to the four other cases, already implies action within a genocidal context. The first Element of Crime on 'Genocide by Deliberately Inflicting Conditions of Life Calculated to Bring About Physical Destruction' ignores this fact and instead redefines this genocidal act in structural conformity with the other four categories. The Element of the Crime 'translates' the 'infliction of certain conditions of life 'on (part of) the group', as required in the crime's definition, into the 'infliction of certain conditions of life upon one or more persons'. In doing so the Element of Crimes oversteps the confines of interpretation. The 2010 Decision does not address this question directly and instead—somewhat opaquely—holds as follows:

> Unlike for the previous counts of genocide—and similar to what is required for some of the acts underlying the crime against humanity of extermination—the Elements of [91] See e.g. Krstić Trial Judgment (n 42) paras 510 and 513; concurring F Jessberger, 'The Definition and the Elements of the Crime of Genocide' in P Gaeta (ed.), The UN Genocide Convention (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2009) 87, 99.

[92] Public Redacted Version of the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58 (n 2) paras 119–71.

[93] Berster (n 47) 121–2 (marginal note 74); Jessberger (n 91) 101.

[94] Concurring Jessberger, ibid., 100 (fn. 81).

> Crimes include an additional element for this particular offense and require that the infliction of certain conditions of life upon one or more persons 'should be calculated to bring about the physical destruction of that group, in whole or in part'.[95]

Because of the definition's explicit reference to the physical destruction and the drafter's decision to exclude most forms of cultural genocide,[96] it is not sufficient for the genocidal act in question to be calculated 'merely' to bring about the dissolution of the group. Instead, the infliction of the conditions of life must be capable of (slowly) causing either the death of or serious bodily or mental harm to a number of members of the group sufficient to form a significant part thereof.[97] In line with this interpretation, the international case law prior to the 2010 Decision had settled with the position that the forcible displacement of (a part of) a(n ethnical) group—the often so-called ethnic cleansing of a territory—cannot as such be considered to be 'calculated to bring about the physical destruction of the targeted group in whole or in part'.[98]

In accordance with this case law, the prosecution, in its 2008 Application, refrained from relying on the ill-conceived reference to the 'systematic expulsion from homes' in the footnote to the fourth Element of Crime on 'Genocide by Deliberately Inflicting Conditions of Life Calculated to Bring about Physical Destruction' and instead recalled that '[d]eliberations preceding adoption of the Genocide Convention concluded that "[m]ass displacements of populations from one region to another […] do not constitute genocide […] unless the operation were attended by such circumstances as to lead to the death of the whole or part of the displaced population" '.[99] Therefore, the 2008 Application is careful not to rest its genocide case on the forcible displacement of members of the three protected groups as such, but on the 'systematic displacement from their home into inhospitable terrain where some died as a result of thirst,

[95] Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) para. 33.

[96] It is possible to regard the fifth genocidal act as an instance of cultural genocide; Kreß, '§ 6 VStGB' (n 17) 1110 (marginal note 65).

[97] This is now widely accepted in international criminal law scholarship; see e.g. Jessberger (n 91) 100; Werle (n 47) 267 (marginal note 730); contrary to what is suggested in the text, these three authors appear to confine 'physical destruction' to 'slow death measures'; this is also the starting point adopted by Berster (n 47) 124 (marginal note 78); this commentator then (ibid., marginal note 79) distinguishes between two scenarios; in the first case, so many members of the group are at risk of dying that 'the total number of remaining group members falls below the required minimum to make up a group as such'; in the second case, 'the physical elimination of members may so damage the social bonds between the remaining persons that the minimum social or cultural requirements of national, ethnical, racial or religious groups can no longer be fulfilled'; the need for this distinction is not apparent, though, as in both cases 'slow death measures' are being inflicted on (a substantial) part of a group.

[98] For the first determination to that effect, see Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-T, TC II, ICTY, 31 July 2003, para. 519 ('Stakić Trial Judgment'); this was confirmed by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Krstić Appeals Judgment (n 43) para. 33, and by the ICJ in Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia and Montenegro) (n 69) para. 190 and in Judgment, Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Croatia v Serbia), 3 February 2015, paras 161–3; concurring, for example, Jessberger (n 91) 101; Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 221 et seq.

[99] Public Redacted Version of the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58 (n 2) para. 173; the passage quoted in this paragraph is UN Doc E/447, 24; on the ill-fated Syrian proposal to list the imposition of 'measures intended to oblige members of a group to abandon their homes in order to escape the threat of subsequent ill-treatment' (UN Doc A/C.6/234), see Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 228.

starvation and disease (emphasis added)' and the 'denial and hindrance of medical and other humanitarian assistance needed to sustain life in IDP camps'.[100]

In the quoted passage, the 2010 Decision does not question the prosecution's interpretation and 'notes that acts similar to those referred to in the paragraph above are listed in the prosecution's Application under Count 5 (crimes against humanity of extermination)'.[101] The 2010 Decision goes on as follows:

> The Chamber is of the view that the acts of contamination of the wells and water pumps and the forcible transfer of hundreds of thousands of civilians belonging primarily to the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa groups coupled with the resettlement in those villages and lands they had left by members of other tribes allied with the GoS shall be analysed against the backdrop of the Chamber's previous findings that (i) thousands of civilians belonging primarily to the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa groups were subjected, throughout the Darfur region, to acts of murder by GoS forces, and over a thousand civilians, belonging primarily to the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa groups were killed in connection with the attack on the town of Kailek on or around 9 March 2004 by GoS forces, and (ii) civilians belonging to the aforementioned groups were subjected to acts of torture by the GoS forces. For these reasons, even though the assessment of the Majority in the First Decision in relation to the conditions within the IDF Camps in Darfur differs in part from what was described by the Prosecution and alleged under Count 3, the Chamber considers that one of the reasonable conclusions that can be drawn is that the acts of contamination of water pumps and forcible transfer coupled with resettlement by members of other tribes, were committed in furtherance of a genocidal policy, and that the conditions inflicted on the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa groups were calculated to bring about the physical destruction of a part of those ethnic groups.[102]

An important question mark must be placed behind the persuasiveness of the attempt, which is apparent from this passage, to play down the difference between the 2009 Decision and the 2008 Application in the assessment of the conditions within the IDP camps in Darfur. In the 2009 Decision these factual issues are being addressed within the different legal context of Al Bashir's possible genocidal intent. The Majority, after observing that 'the Prosecution relies heavily on what the Prosecution considers to be a key component of an alleged GoS genocidal campaign: the subjection of a substantial part of the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa civilian population (up to 2.700.000 individuals) to unbearable conditions of life within IDF Camps',[103] remained unconvinced by the materials submitted in the 2008 Application in support of that allegation.[104] If the subjection of a substantial part of the Fur, Masalit, and Zaghawa civilian population to unbearable conditions of life within IDF Camps is indeed a key component of [100] Public Redacted Version of the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58 (n 2) para. 172.

[101] Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) para. 35.
[102] Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) paras 37–8.
[103] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 178.
[104] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) paras 179–89.

the alleged campaign against the Fur, Masalit, and Zaghawa groups, the establishment of the infliction of conditions of life calculated to bring about the physical destruction of a substantial part of these groups depends on this conduct. Contrary to what is being suggested in the 2010 Decision, it will not be possible instead to 'analyse' the forcible transfer 'against the backdrop' of the killings and the acts of torture of other members of the protected groups.

27.2.4 The genocidal intent

As Larry May has aptly observed '[t]he mens rea element of the crime of genocide is the key to this crime. No other international crime involves such a complex intent element'.[105] The 2009 Decision approaches this key issue from the following, generally shared starting point, that the crime of genocide is comprised of two subjective elements:

i. a general subjective element that must cover any genocidal act provided for in article 6(a) to (e) of the Statute, and which consists of article 30 intent and knowledge requirement; and
ii. an additional subjective element, normally referred to as 'dolus specialis' or specific intent, according to which any genocidal acts must be carried out with the 'intent to destroy in whole or in part' the targeted group. (footnote omitted)[106]

This chapter will only address the crucial second element and will deal with its three sub-elements in turn.

27.2.4.1 The intent to destroy*, in whole or in part, a protected group as such*

While the narrow interpretation of 'physical destruction' within the context of the third genocidal act listed in the definition appears to be widely accepted,[107] the correct interpretation of the word 'destroy' within the context of genocidal intent remains a matter of scholarly debate. According to one view, the term includes the destruction of the group as a social entity.[108] The international case law prior to the 2009 Decision, however, had favoured the more limited concept of physical–biological destruction. This position goes back to the 2001 ICTY's Trial Chamber's determination in Prosecutor v Krstić, > that…customary international law limits the definition of genocide to those acts seeking the physical and biological destruction of all or part of the group.[109]

[105] May (n 13) 130.

[106] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 139.

[107] Cf. section 27.2.3.2.3.

[108] A Ahmed and I Tralmaka, 'Prosecuting Genocide at the Khmer Rouge Tribunal' (2009) 1 City University of Hong Kong Law Review 105, 111; Berster (n 47) 81 et seq. (marginal note 2, 3); Safferling (n 47) 175–6; M Sirkin, 'Expanding the Crime of Genocide to Include Ethnic Cleansing: A Return to Established Principles in Light of Contemporary Interpretations' (2010) 33 Seattle University Law Review 489, 512, 525–6; Werle (n 47) 278–9 (marginal note 760).

[109] Krstić Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 580; concurring Krstić Appeals Judgment (n 43) para. 26; Judgment, Seromba, ICTR-2001-66-I, TC, ICTY, 13 December 2006, para. 319; Report of the International

This position enjoys strong support in international criminal law scholarship.[110] The predominant view is essentially correct.[111] The starting point of the more liberal construction of the word 'destroy' is, however, readily understandable. If it is—as we have seen[112]—the primary goal of the law against genocide to protect the existence of certain groups in light of their contributions to world civilization, a campaign leading to the dissolution of the group as a social entity is directly relevant to that goal. The social concept of the term 'destroy' is thus more in line with the most basic object of the rule against genocide. It may also be wondered whether the social concept of group destruction may be supported by an argument e contrario based on the explicit use of the word 'physical' as an attribute of destruction only within the actus reus context of one of the prohibited acts. Finally, the words 'as such' could be read so as to support the social concept.[113]

However, the social concept of destruction conflicts with the deliberate decision made by the drafters of the Genocide Convention (for better or worse) not to protect the existence of the specified groups comprehensively but only against an exhaustive list of prohibited acts. Importantly, most forms of cultural genocide were deliberately not included in the definition. But if a person kills one member of a protected group or causes serious bodily or mental harm to him or her, thereby furthering an overall campaign which, as our perpetrator knows, is directed to the dissolution of the group as such 'merely' through the systematic destruction of the cultural heritage, the perpetrator would have to be convicted of genocide on the basis of the social concept of destruction. This would be contrary to the more modest aspiration which lies at the origin of the international rule against genocide and which has not been superseded by subsequent developments.[114]

However, the predominant view needs to be clarified in one respect. The meaning of the word 'destroy' cannot be reduced to the physical elimination of the members of the group as they exist at the time of the overall genocidal campaign, but it must extend to all forms of damage to the group which may result from an overall campaign which takes the form of a pattern of one or more of the prohibited genocidal

Commission of Inquiry on Darfur to the Secretary-General (n 77) paras 515, 517, 518, and 520; Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia and Montenegro) (n 69) para. 190; Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Croatia v Serbia) (n 98) para. 136.

[110] 1996 Yearbook of the International Law Commission (n 18) 46 (para. 12); Behrens (n 47) 70, 82 et seq.; Jessberger (n 91) 107–8; Kreß, 'The Crime of Genocide under International Law' (n 31) 486 et seq.; Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 221 et seq., 234.

[111] The following considerations update Kreß, 'The Crime of Genocide under International Law' (n 31) 486 et seq.

[112] Section 27.2.3.1.

[113] All these arguments are eloquently set out in Berster (n 47) 81–2 (marginal notes 2 and 3).

[114] Berster (n 47) 81 et seq. (marginal notes 2 and 3) recognizes this consideration as a 'stronger argument', but nevertheless opines as follows: '(T)he penalization of the perpetrator in this scenario appears well justified if viewed in the context of Article III lit. (c)—direct and public incitement to commit genocide, and Article III lit. (d)—attempt to commit genocide. These modes of liability especially highlight the Convention's effort to prevent genocide at a timely stage by averting potential trigger incidents. It stands to reason that, in light of a large scale campaign of "cultural genocide" and collateral hate propaganda, the first physical attacks on members of the group, if they go unpunished, would likely open the floodgates to random atrocities.' This, however, is unconvincing because it broadens the scope of the crime's definition by reference to broad considerations of prevention.

acts. This idea is expressed by the Trial Chamber in Krstić by referring to physical or biological destruction and the latter term must then be construed so as to also include the forcible transfer of children on a mass scale. This careful broadening of the concept of 'destroy' beyond physical destruction also allows us to attribute a different meaning to the word 'destroy' within the context of genocidal intent in comparison with the meaning of 'physical destruction' within the context of the third genocidal act. Hence the argument e contrario in support of the social concept of the word 'destroy' can also be refuted.

The 2009 Decision, without explicitly using the terms 'physical or biological destruction', follows the prior international case law and applies it to a campaign of forcible displacement. It endorses, in particular, the statement made by an ICTY Trial Chamber and confirmed by the ICJ that 'a clear distinction must be drawn between physical destruction and mere dissolution of a group. The expulsion of a group or part of a group does not in itself suffice for genocide'.[115] The 2010 Decision does not challenge this legal standard.[116]

While the early practice of the Pre-Trial Chamber has therefore made a contribution to the consolidation of the prevailing position, it would seem premature to consider the latter as fully settled. Following a statement made by Judge Shahabuddeen in Prosecutor v Krstić,[117] the ICTY Trial Chamber in Prosecutor v Blagojević challenged the predominant approach.[118] Judge Ušacka adopted this Chamber's 'more expansive approach in order to preserve the choice for a later (ICC) Trial Chamber'.[119] It is therefore to be expected that the interpretation of the word 'destroy' within the context of genocidal intent will be fully debated at the ICC on an appropriate future occasion.

27.2.4.2 The intent to destroy, in whole or in part*, a protected group as such*

The 2009 Decision does not deal at great length with the meaning of 'part of a group'. Instead, it refers with approval to the relevant paragraph in the ICJ's judgment in the Genocide case[120] in which an attempt is made to summarize the ICTY and ICTR case law in point. The Pre-Trial Chamber hereby lends its support to the by now generally accepted requirement that the relevant part must be substantive and joins its voice to the understanding that such 'substantiality' may be determined in a quantitative or qualitative way.[121]

[115] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 144.

[116] Cf. Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) para. 4.

[117] Partial Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, Krstić Appeals Judgment (n 43) para. 48 in conjunction with 55.

[118] Judgment Blagojević and Jokić, IT-02-60-T, TC I, ICTY, 17 January 2005, para. 666; for a critical commentary, see Kreß, 'The Crime of Genocide under International Law' (n 31) 488–9.

[119] Separate and Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 62.

[120] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 146.

[121] For a detailed explanation, see Kreß, '§ 6 VStGB' (n 17) 1111–16 (marginal notes 73–7).

The 2009 Decision's reference to the ICJ judgment includes the passage in which that Court observed that the ICTY Trial Chamber in Prosecutor v Stakić indicated the need for caution not to distort the definition of genocide by too generously accepting geographically defined parts of the protected group in accordance with the opportunity available to the alleged perpetrator.[122] While this call for caution is to be commended,[123] it is suggested to go one step further and to completely abandon the criterion of the individual perpetrator's destructive opportunities. This criterion lends itself to a dilution of genocide if applied to lower-level perpetrators and it is at odds with that crime's typical form of participation in collective action.

It is interesting to note that neither the 2009 Decision nor the 2010 Decision considers the 'at least 35.000 civilians' allegedly (directly) killed by 'Al Bashir's forces and agents'[124] as constituting per se substantial parts of the three protected groups in question. Instead, both decisions appear to (implicitly) accept the approach chosen in the 2008 Application to recognize only those individuals as forming substantial parts of the groups concerned 'upon whom conditions of life calculated to bring about their physical destruction' were allegedly imposed in the wake of their forcible displacement.[125] David Luban has drawn an enlightening comparison between the corresponding approach followed in the 2005 Darfur Commission Report, on the one hand, and the ICTY case law starting with Prosecutor v Krstić to consider the approximately 40,000 Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica to constitute a substantial part of the group of the Bosnian Muslims. Luban questions the possibility to convincingly explain the different treatment and suggests that the more restrictive application of the concept of 'part of the protected group' in the Darfur case is 'more faithful to Lemkin's uncompromised conception of genocide'.[126] While the latter suggestion is certainly correct, it is possible to defend the seemingly more liberal approach in the case of Srebrenica in light of the strategic importance of this safe area under the circumstances prevailing at the relevant time.[127]

27.2.4.3 The intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a protected group as such

The proper interpretation of the word 'intent' is often seen as the most important legal question regarding the definition of the crime of genocide. In light of the far-reaching practical consequences of the meaning given to the words 'destroy' and 'part', as discussed, this is a questionable assessment. Yet, the fact remains that the concept of genocidal 'intent' continues to be surrounded by an important controversy, and it is to this controversy that we shall now turn our attention.

[122] Stakić Trial Judgment (n 98) para. 523.
[123] Concurring Schabas, 'Darfur and the "Odious Scourge": The Commission of Inquiry's Findings on Genocide' (n 33) 874.
[124] Public Redacted Version of the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58 (n 2) para. 36.
[125] Public Redacted Version of the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58 (n 2) para. 46.
[126] Luban (n 84) 312 et seq., 316.
[127] Krstić Appeals Judgment (n 43) para. 23.

27.2.4.3.1 The predominant view: the purpose-based approach

As early as in its seminal judgment in Prosecutor v Akayesu, the ICTR decided to interpret the concept of genocidal intent in line with what has come to be referred to as the purpose-based approach. According to this approach, the individual perpetrator of the crime must act with the goal or desire to contribute to the (partial) destruction of the targeted group. The pertinent passage reads as follows:

> Genocide is distinct from other crimes inasmuch as it embodies a special intent or dolus specialis. Special intent of a crime is the specific intention, required as a constitutive element of the crime, which demands that the perpetrator clearly seeks to produce the act charged. Thus, the special intent in the crime of genocide lies in 'the intent to destroy, in whole or in part', a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such.[128]

The Chamber adduces one single consideration in support of this interpretation:

> 'Special intent is a well-known criminal law concept in the Roman-continental legal systems. It is required as a constituent element of certain offences and demands that the perpetrator have the clear intent to cause the offence charged. According to this meaning, special intent is the key element of an intentional offence, which offence is characterized by a psychological relationship between the physical result and the mental state of the perpetrator.[129]

When the ICTY addressed the matter for the first time in Prosecutor v Krstić, it embraced the purpose-based approach, but with a different reasoning and with a brief reference to the possibility of a different construction of the term:

> The preparatory work of the Genocide Convention clearly shows that the drafters envisaged genocide as an enterprise whose goal, or objective, was to destroy a human group, in whole or in part.... Some legal commentators further contend that genocide embraces those acts whose foreseeable or probable consequence is the total destruction or partial destruction of the group without any necessity of showing that the destruction was the goal of the act. Whether this interpretation can be viewed as reflecting the status of customary international law at the time of the acts involved is not clear. For the purpose of this case, the Chamber will therefore adhere to the characterisation of genocide which encompasses only acts committed with the goal of destroying all or part of the group. (footnote omitted)[130]

To the best of this writer's knowledge, at no time in the subsequent case law has the purpose-based approach received closer attention or been debated in full consideration of the arguments advanced against it. Nevertheless, at least in the abstract[131] the [128] Akayesu (n 12) para. 498; cf., however, the different formulation in para. 520 of the same judgment.

[129] Akayesu (n 12) para. 518. [130] Krstić Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 571.
[131] Whether the latter standard has been consistently applied to the facts is far less clear, however; A Greenawalt, 'Rethinking Genocidal Intent: The Case for a Knowledge-Based Interpretation' (1999) 99 Columbia Law Review 2259, 2281; Greenawalt had soon identified the judicial temptation to 'squeeze ambiguous fact patterns into the specific intent paradigm'.

international case law has ever since adhered to this legal standard. The latter is also shared by many commentators.[132]

The purpose-based approach has also been followed in the 2005 Darfur Commission Report, but with a noteworthy addition:

> …the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, the group as such. This…element is an aggravated criminal intent, or dolus specialis; it implies that the perpetrator consciously desired the prohibited acts he committed to result in the destruction, in whole or in part, of the group as such, and knew that his acts would destroy, in whole or in part, the group as such (emphasis added).[133]

The highlighted last part of this passage adds an element of foresight to the purpose-requirement which, as we shall see, paves the way to the recognition of a concept of realistic intent as suggested in this chapter. This addition has been welcomed in recent international criminal law scholarship.[134]

27.2.4.3.2 The knowledge-based approach

Only one year after the ICTR's judgment in the Akayesu case, the predominant position was challenged in Alexander K A Greenawalt's voluminous and thorough article 'Rethinking Genocidal Intent: The Case for a Knowledge-Based Interpretation'.[135] Greenawalt summarized his approach as follows:

> In cases where a perpetrator is otherwise liable for a genocidal act, the requirement of genocidal intent should be satisfied if the perpetrator acted in furtherance of a campaign targeting members of a protected group and knew that the goal or manifest effect of the campaign was the destruction of the group in whole or in part.[136]

In the same year, the Spanish author Alicia Gil Gil came up with a very similar solution[137] which made it clear that the controversy between the purpose- and knowledge-based approach is not a 'legal family affair'. In the years thereafter quite a considerable number of commentators endorsed the knowledge-based approach,[138] and since William A Schabas' adoption of this interpretation in the second edition

[132] Akhavan (n 84) 44; D Amann, 'Group Mentality, Expressivism, and Genocide' (2002) 2 International Criminal Law Review 93, 132; Cryer et al. (n 32) 227–8; Jessberger (n 91) 106; B Lüders, Die Strafbarkeit von Völkermord nach dem Römischen Statut für den Internationalen Strafgerichtshof (Berlin: Berliner Wissenschaftsverlag 2004) 125; Mysliwiec (n 39) 401–2; D Nersession, 'The Contours of Genocidal Intent: Troubling Jurisprudence from the International Criminal Tribunals' (2002) 37 Texas International Law Journal 231, 265; Safferling (n 47) 172; Werle (n 47) 274–6 (marginal notes 754–5).

[133] Report of the International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur to the Secretary-General (n 77) para. 491.

[134] Berster (n 47) 137 et seq. (marginal notes 106 et seq.).

[135] Greenawalt (n 131).

[136] Greenawalt (n 131) 2288.

[137] A Gil Gil, Derecho Penal Internacional: Especial Consideración del delito de genocidio (Editorial Tecnos 1999) 259 et seq.

[138] Ambos (n 47) 842 et seq.; C Bassiouni and P Manikas, The Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 1996) 527; Goldsmith (n 47) 245 et seq.; Jones (n 45) 478 et seq.; H van der Wilt, 'Genocide, Complicity in Genocide and International v Domestic Jurisdiction' (2006) 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice 239, 241 et seq.; H Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapprate (Baden-Baden: Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft 2002) 107 et seq.; in a similar direction May (n 13) 115 et seq.

of his leading monograph[139] it has become doubtful to characterize this position as a minority position in international criminal law scholarship.

The scholarly articulations of the knowledge-based approach differ in three respects. In its original version, as formulated by Greenawalt, there need not even be a destructive goal at the collective level, but just the knowledge of a campaign whose manifest effect is the (partial) destruction of the group.[140] Most adherents of the knowledge-based approach, however, require the existence of a collective destructive goal. Among the latter group some argue that those at the leadership level must individually share this collective goal,[141] while others are of the view that it is sufficient that a collective goal effectively exists.[142] Finally, some commentators require dolus eventualis[143] or foresight as a practical certainty[144] in respect of the occurrence of the (partial) destruction, while others[145] hold that no such additional requirement is needed if the point of reference of the perpetrator's knowledge is a realistic collective genocidal goal.

27.2.4.3.3 The 2009 Decision

This was the rather complex picture of the debate when the Pre-Trial Chamber had its first encounter with the crime of genocide. The 2009 Decision's attempt to reflect the state of the discussion reads as follows:

> A number of authors have put forward in the recent years an innovative approach to the subjective elements of the crime, known as the 'knowledge-based approach'. See also Kress, C., 'The Darfur Report and Genocidal Intent', J Int Criminal Justice, pp. 562–578, Oxford University Press, March 2005, see in particular pp. 562–572. See also Schabas, W.A., Genocide in International Law The Crime of Crimes, 2nd edition, Galway, Cambridge University Press. 2009, pp. 241–264. According to this approach, direct perpetrators and mid-level commanders can be held responsible as principals to the crime of genocide even if they act without the dolus specialis/specific intent to destroy in whole or in part the targeted group. According to these authors, as long as those senior political and/or military leaders who planned and set into motion a genocidal campaign act with the requisite dolus specialis/ulterior intent, those others below them, who pass on instructions and/or physically implement such a genocidal campaign, will commit genocide as long as they are aware that the ultimate purpose of such a campaign is to destroy in whole or in part the targeted group. The 'knowledge-based approach' does not differ from the traditional approach in relation to those senior political/military leaders who planned and set into motion a genocidal campaign: they must act with the intent to destroy in whole or in part the targeted group because, otherwise, it would be possible to qualify a campaign of violence against the members of a given group as a genocidal campaign. Moreover, when, as in the present case, those who allegedly planned and [139] Schabas, Genocide in International Law. The Crime of Crimes (n 35) 242–3.

[140] Greenawalt (n 131) 2288. [141] Ambos (n 47) 848–9; Van der Wilt (n 138) 243–4.
[142] H Vest, 'Humanitätsverbrechen—Herausforderung für das Individualstrafrecht? (2001) 113 Zeitschrift für die gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft 457, 486.
[143] Gil Gil (n 137) 259 et seq.
[144] Vest, Genozid durch organisatorische Machtapprate (n 138) 107 et seq.
[145] Jones (n 45) 479.

> set into motion a genocidal campaign are prosecuted pursuant to article 25(3)(a) of the Statute as indirect (co) perpetrators, the mental element of the direct perpetrators becomes irrelevant. As explained in the Decision on the Confirmation of the Charges in the case of The Prosecutor v Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, the reason being that, according to article 25(3)(a) of the Statute, such senior political and military leaders can be held liable as principals of the crime of genocide regardless of whether the persons through which the genocidal campaign is carried out are criminally liable (ICC-01/04-01/07-717, paras. 571–572, 573–576, 579–580). As a result, the 'knowledge-based approach' would only differ from the traditional approach to the subjective elements of the crime of genocide in those cases in which mid-level superiors and low-level perpetrators are subject to prosecution before this Court. In this regard, the literal interpretation of the definition of the crime of genocide in article 6 of the Statute and in the Elements of Crimes makes it clear that only those who act with the requisite genocidal intent can be principals to such a crime pursuant to article 25(3)(a) of the Statute. Those others, who are only aware of the genocidal nature of the campaign, but do not share the genocidal intent, can only be held liable as accessories pursuant to articles 25(3)(b) and (d) and 28 of the Statute.[146]

This is a problematic judicial pronouncement in two respects. First (and of lesser importance), the passage falls short of an accurate and comprehensive presentation of the 'knowledge-based approach'. Only one articulation of this approach is set out,[147] and it is slightly misleading to portray an approach, which, as we have seen, has existed almost as long as the Akayesu judgment, as 'innovative' in comparison with a 'traditional' approach, as espoused by the international case law. Second (and of crucial importance), the knowledge-based approach, which has been explained in the form of detailed legal arguments since Greenawalt's groundbreaking 1999 study,[148] which, over the past 15 years has been gaining a steadily growing number of adherents and which has never been fully debated in the international case law, is discarded in one single sentence and by way of an unexplained reference to 'the literal interpretation'.

27.2.4.3.4 The argument in support of a knowledge-based approach embodying the concept of realistic genocidal intent

The approach chosen in the 2009 Decision is regrettable and it is to be hoped that Trial Chambers and, most importantly, the Appeals Chamber will not treat the Pre-Trial Chamber's superficial footnote as the ICC's last word on the difficult controversy between the purpose- and knowledge-based approaches. The following argument is made in support of a knowledge-based approach which embodies the concept of realistic genocidal intent.[149] It is respectfully submitted with a view to help in preparing

[146] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (n 6) para. 139 (fn. 154).

[147] It follows from the information given in section 27.2.4.3.2 that other authors than the two cited in the 2009 Decision should have been mentioned as representatives of this articulation.

[148] Greenawalt (n 131).

[149] The argument builds on and updates C Kreß, 'The Darfur Report and Genocidal Intent' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 562, 565–77; and Kreß, 'The Crime of Genocide under International Law' (n 31) 492–8; for a somewhat more detailed exposition of the same argument, see Kreß, '§ 6 VStGB' (n 17) 1116–120 (marginal notes 78–88).

a fully informed judicial consideration of the proper construction of the concept of genocidal intent on an appropriate future occasion.

The argument is exclusively concerned with the genocide scenario that matters for all practical purposes, i.e. the commission of the crime as part of collective action. It is argued that, in such a context, a perpetrator—whatever his or her hierarchical level—acts with genocidal intent if he or she is aware that his or her conduct forms part of a realistic collective campaign directed towards the destruction of a protected group, in whole or in part. This complex legal standard requires some commentary.

As was explained earlier[150] in some detail, the existence of a realistic collective campaign as the necessary point of reference for the individual genocidal intent incorporates the 'genocidal context' and avoids the need to introduce an unwritten contextual element as part of the crime's actus reus. As was also seen earlier, the 2009 Decision makes an implicit step towards the recognition of such a requirement by acknowledging the need to determine the intent of 'the Government of Sudan' in case the latter was not, at the material time, simply identical to the individual intent of Al Bashir.

It is not sufficient for the collective campaign to have the (partial) destruction of the protected group as its manifest effect. The campaign must rather target the members of the group as such, i.e. because of this membership, and it must pursue the goal to (partially) destroy the group concerned. This collective goal does not have to take the form of a highly sophisticated plan, but a genocidal campaign may also receive its collective direction from an effective public incitement to that effect.[151]

With the awareness of such a genocidal campaign, the perpetrator knows of the real possibility that the (partial) destruction of the protected group may occur as a result of the collective action to which he or she chooses to contribute. This is sufficient. A probability standard would be impracticable, and to require that the perpetrator foresee the (partial) destruction of the group as a practical certainty would render the definition of the crime virtually inapplicable in practice.[152]

In the following, the considerations in support of this construction will be set out. Along the way, special regard will be given to the recent commentary by Lars Berster because this study presents the rare example of a sophisticated argument in support of the purpose-based approach.

(i) The 'ordinary' meaning of the term 'intent'

Contrary to what the Akayesu judgment and the 2009 Decision suggest, the 'literal interpretation' does not yield an unambiguous result. The genocidal intent to destroy complements the general intent and goes beyond the material elements of the crime. While often referred to as a specific intent requirement, it is more helpful to speak of an ulterior intent.[153] A study of comparative criminal law, as it has been conducted most thoroughly by Kai Ambos, reveals that the words 'intent', 'intention', and 'intención', particularly if used to denote an 'ulterior intent', are not invariably understood [150] Cf. section 27.2.2.3.2. [151] May (n 13) 121 et seq.; 209 et seq.

[152] For the same 'cognitive standard' (though according to him on top of a purpose-requirement) Berster (n 47) 140–1 (marginal notes 113–14).

[153] Ambos (n 47) 835.

exclusively to mean 'purposely', but may take a more cognitive meaning according to their specific legal context.[154] As far as the French concept of 'dol spécial' is concerned, to which the Akayesu judgment referred, it does also not unambiguously refer to the intensity, but rather to the object of the intent.[155] Recently, Lars Berster has introduced a new element to the debate by suggesting that the Russian and the Chinese versions of the definition support the exclusive interpretation as 'purpose'. But also Berster accepts that this 'discovery' does not lead to a conclusive result of the literal interpretation in light of the discrepancies between the different language versions.[156] It has accordingly been acknowledged also by adherents of the purpose-based approach that the latter is not required as a matter of literal interpretation.[157]

It must be conceded, though, that if one reads the word 'intent' in the definition of genocide together with the words 'as such', which imply the need for a targeting of group members because of their membership,[158] more points in the direction of the requirement of a goal or purpose to destroy. Yet, the scope of possible meanings of the word 'intent' allows for an interpretation that locates such goal or purpose at the collective level and connects the individual perpetrator's mental state with this goal through his or her knowledge of the latter's existence. Such an interpretation recognizes the fact that the definition must, for all practical purposes, capture individual conduct within a context of collective action.

(ii) The travaux préparatoires and the customary law argument

Lars Berster suggests that the travaux clearly support the interpretation of the word 'intent' as 'purpose'. He points out that the 1947 Secretariat Draft used the words 'with the purpose of destroying' (emphasis added)[159] and that the subsequent replacement of these words by 'intent to destroy' was not accompanied by a wish to alter the meaning, as numerous statements of delegates both in the Ad Hoc Committee and in the Sixth Committee confirm.[160]

While Berster's analysis is a careful one, his firm conclusion is to be doubted for three reasons. First, Greenawalt's similarly thorough perusal of the same materials 15 years ago led this author to draw the opposite conclusion that 'an investigation of the origins and drafting of the Genocide Convention only reinforces the ambiguity of the treaty's intent provision'.[161] This contradictory reading of the same materials by two learned observers in itself suggests applying a degree of caution with a view to the interpretation of the statements made by delegates in the course of the historic deliberations.

[154] Ambos (n 47) 842–5; the same is true for the concept of 'dol special', see Kreß, 'The Darfur Report and Genocidal Intent' (n 149) 567–8.

[155] Kreß, 'The Darfur Report and Genocidal Intent' (n 149) 567–8 (with reference to French scholarship in fns 24–5).

[156] Berster (n 47) 142–143 (marginal notes 119–121).

[157] Jessberger (n 91) 106.

[158] Kreß, '§ 6 VStGB' (n 17) 1120–21 (marginal notes 89–90).

[159] Secretariat Draft. First Draft of the Genocide Convention, prepared by the UN Secretariat (May 1947) UN Doc E/447, 26.6; reprinted in Abtahi and Webb (n 16) 209, 214.

[160] Berster (n 47) 93–6 (marginal notes 20–3).

[161] Greenawalt (n 131) 2270; it is difficult, for example, to disagree with Greenawalt that the statements, which he cites ibid. 2277, are ambiguous at best; see also Goldsmith (n 47) 249–50.

This impression is re-enforced by the fact that the debate about the intent-requirement was at times confusingly entangled with that about a motive-requirement.

Second, Lemkin had already proposed to cover not only those persons as génocidaires who order genocide practices, but also those who execute such orders.[162] Those belonging to the latter category, however, will often not be imbued with the personal desire that the group be (partially) destroyed. The travaux préparatoires do not reveal a clear drafter's decision to depart from Lemkin's idea. To the contrary, the debate in the Sixth Committee on how to treat those persons who act upon superior orders must be considered as inconclusive.[163]

This uncertainty confirms, third, the important general observation made by John R W D Jones, that

> [u]nlike the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the Rome Statute for an International Criminal Court, where criminal lawyers of all shades were at hand to draft precise definitions of the offences, accompanied subsequently by even more detailed 'Elements of the offences', the Genocide Convention was adopted in many ways as a political manifesto against a certain form of massive criminality and was not intended as a criminal code.[164]

While this may be a slight exaggeration in both directions, a close reading of the historic deliberations gives the reader a clear sense of the fact that the delegates in the Sixth Committee did not fully appreciate the complexity of translating a macro-criminal phenomenon with its interplay between individual and collective action into easily applicable criminal law terms. It is therefore perfectly possible—and perhaps even likely—that many of the drafters ultimately had the collective level in mind when they used words such as 'aim', 'goal', or 'purpose'. Therefore, even if the ICTY Trial Chamber's assessment in Prosecutor v Krstić is taken for granted, that '[t]he preparatory work of the Genocide Convention clearly shows that the drafters envisaged genocide as an enterprise whose goal, or objective, was to destroy a human group, in whole or in part' (emphasis added),[165] this would not be conclusive with respect to the requisite mental state of the individual perpetrator, as the genocidal 'enterprise' might have always been understood as the collective genocidal campaign.[166]

This analysis of the travaux préparatoires casts a heavy shadow of doubt about the customary law argument advanced by the ICTY Trial Chamber in Prosecutor v Krstić[167] and it should be recalled that this argument was formulated in a strikingly tentative manner. There are also serious methodological problems with this argument. It is impossible to pinpoint a consistent state practice, beginning with the Genocide Convention's entry into force, reflecting a corresponding opinio iuris in support of the [162] Lemkin (n 14) 93; this is rightly recalled by Goldsmith (n 47) 250–1.

[163] Cf. the statements by the delegates of the Soviet Union, France, Greece, and the USA in UNGAOR, 3rd session, 6th Committee, 96, 97, 306, 307, and 310.

[164] Jones (n 45) 478.

[165] Krstić Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 571.

[166] Interestingly, the pertinent paragraph in the commentary of the ILC (1996 Yearbook of the International Law Commission (n 18) 45, para. 10) clearly points in that direction so that it is incorrect to list the ILC among the adherents of the purpose-based approach (as was done in the Krstić Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 571); for a more accurate reading of the ILC's position, see Goldsmith (n 47) 251–2.

[167] Krstić Trial Judgment (n 42) para. 571.

purpose-based approach. This is unsurprising given that the controversy between this and the knowledge-based approach concerns a rather fine point of the crime's construction which primarily concerns the internal delineation between primary and secondary individual criminal responsibility, rather than the external delineation of the international criminal responsibility for genocide as such.

(iii) The particular seriousness of genocide

Robert Cryer, Håkan Friman, Darryl Robinson, and Elisabeth Wilmshurst argue that the purpose-based approach 'may be seen as correctly reflecting the need to reserve genocide convictions only for those who have the highest degree of criminal intent'.[168] This is an important consideration, but it is to be questioned whether it is indeed the desire, goal, or purpose of the individual perpetrator that characterizes the particular seriousness of the crime of genocide. In the typical genocide case, it is the formation of the realistic collective goal to (partially) destroy a protected group which poses the danger to the latter's survival. A person who knowingly contributes to the realization of such a destructive goal makes himself or herself a part of this dangerous enterprise, the occurrence of which the law against genocide is intended to prevent. Against this background, it is of secondary importance at best whether or not the person concerned desires the group's (partial) destruction.

The historic Eichmann case is a paradigm example used to illustrate this point. Eichmann's conduct was so seriously dangerous because he knowingly contributed to the realization of the Nazis' horrible destructive goal. Therefore, the answer to the question asked by the District Court of Jerusalem whether Eichmann 'was personally imbued with this (collective) intention' does not affect the seriousness of Eichmann's[169] conduct at its core. Here lies the reason for the temptation that is almost inherent in the purpose-based approach to apply the knowledge-based approach through the 'evidentiary backdoor', by inferring the individual perpetrator's purpose from the 'fact patterns' surrounding his conduct. To conclude, Cryer's, Friman's, Robinson's, and Wilmshurst's concern not to see the definition of the crime of genocide becoming diluted is more safely and convincingly served by the requirement of a realistic genocidal campaign and by an appropriately narrow interpretation of the words 'destroy' and 'in part'.

(iv) Genocide and crimes against humanity

The interpretation of genocidal intent as suggested in this text brings the crime of genocide in structural conformity with crimes against humanity. This congruity makes sense historically, as genocide is rooted in the older concept of crimes against humanity,[170] and systematically, as both crimes capture the individual participation in collective action.[171] At the same time, the specificity of the crime of genocide vis-à vis crimes

[168] Cryer et al. (n 32) 227.

[169] Judgment of 12 December 1961, Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v Eichmann (1968) 36 International Law Reports 18, 134 (para. 194).

[170] Kreß, '§ 6 VStGB' (n 17) 1096 (marginal note 22).

[171] For the same view, see Jones (n 45) 479.

against humanity remains completely safeguarded. The latter does not lie in a requirement that the individual perpetrator must act purposely, but in the nature of the campaign in which this individual takes part. While an attack against any civilian population, which may take different forms of violent action, suffices in the case of crimes against humanity, the genocidal campaign must be directed towards the destruction of a specifically protected group.

(v) Questions of consistency

As in the case of crimes against humanity, the actus reus of the crime of genocide is formulated from the perspective of the subordinate actor rather than from the leadership level.[172] The purpose-based approach combines this actus reus with what typically is a leadership mens rea standard. This in itself is not a very plausible construction; in addition, it gives rise to technical problems in a number of cases. Imagine that perpetrator A physically exterminates a pre-selected member of the targeted group with knowledge of thereby contributing to a genocidal campaign, but without any desire to help bring about the targeted group's (partial) destruction. Under the purpose-based approach, A has not committed the crime of genocide as a perpetrator for lack of genocidal intent. It is also difficult to see how A could have otherwise participated in the crime of genocide through his conduct. While A has certainly aided and abetted the collective genocidal campaign, this campaign as such does not constitute the crime's actus reus.[173] Lars Berster, who is to be commended for having turned his mind to this and similar problems[174] as a supporter of the purpose-based approach, opines that 'such lacunae should not be feared' as 'on-site executors' such as A 'would still be punishable for crimes against humanity'.[175] Quite apart from the fact that domestic criminal codes do not invariably include crimes against humanity, the resort to crimes against humanity cannot dispel the strong feeling that a convincingly construed definition of the crime should allow to hold somebody like A responsible for participation in the crime of genocide in one form or the other. The solution put forward in this text offers such a construction.

27.2.4.4 The destiny of the genocide charge in the case against Al Bashir

Whatever decision the ICC will eventually make as regards the controversy between the purpose- and knowledge-based approaches, the prospects for success of the genocide charge against Al Bashir at the trial stage must be considered as fragile at best if the Court maintains the 2009 Decision's strict line to the interpretation of the other two sub-elements of genocidal intent, 'destroy' and 'in part'. It is of course true that the 2010 Decision has found reasonable grounds to believe that Al Bashir acted with genocidal intent. However, it has not adduced any reasoning which would make it appear [172] For the same point, see Goldsmith (n 47) 252.

[173] With the exception of the third genocidal act, on the latter's particular structure see section 27.2.3.2.3.

[174] See Kreß, 'The Darfur Report and Genocidal Intent' (n 149) 574–5.

[175] Berster (n 47) 146 (marginal note 127).

likely that, despite the doubts voiced in the 2009 Decision, it could be proven beyond reasonable doubt that the Government of Sudan (be it through Al Bashir's will alone or in the form of concerted decision-making) had formed the goal not only to forcibly displace substantial parts of the three targeted groups, but to ultimately eliminate the human beings concerned or at least to cause them serious bodily or mental harm. The two brief passages in the 2010 Decision, which directly deal with Al Bashir's possible genocidal intent, are completely devoid of substance,[176] and, as we have seen,[177] the related considerations on the third genocidal act are not particularly impressive in their effort to play down the difference between the 2009 Decision and the 2008 Application in the assessment of the conditions within the IDP camps in Darfur.

27.3 An Acquittal in re Genocide—A Failure? On the Rhetorics of Genocide

If Al Bashir eventually stands trial, the genocide charge against him is rather unlikely to succeed. Would that mean that the case against Al Bashir has failed? Unhesitatingly, the answer must be negative.[178]

At this point in the development of international law, the characterization of conduct as genocidal retains considerable practical importance at the inter-state level, as the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia and Montenegro has brought to light.[179] Within the realm of international criminal law, however, the crime of genocide has lost much of its earlier importance because of the consolidation of crimes against humanity as a distinct crime under international law in times of armed conflict and peace. As the early years of the ICC make abundantly clear, crimes against humanity and not genocide dominate the practice of international criminal justice.[180]

The firm establishment of the law against crimes against humanity has led Alexander R J Murray to argue that 'the crime of genocide is now a redundant crime'.[181] This is not the position of states, which have until now treated the historical definition of genocide almost as a sacred text and have, to the best of this writer's knowledge, never seriously considered not to include the crime of genocide in a list of crimes [176] Cf. Second Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest (n 10) paras 4 and 5.

[177] Section 27.2.3.2.3.

[178] For a similar statement with respect to the case of 'Cambodia and the Khmer Rouge', see R Park, 'Proving Genocidal Intent: International Precedent and ECCC Case 002' (2010) 63 Rutgers Law Review 129, 187–8.

[179] J Quigley, 'International Court of Justice as a Forum for Genocide Cases' (2007) 40 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 243, 257; fortunately, however, the characterization of a campaign as genocidal is not decisive for the application of Chapter VII of the UN Charter or for the Responsibility to Protect; see, in particular, 2005 World Summit Outcome (15 September 2005) UN Doc A/60/L.1, paras 138–9; and W Schabas, 'Genocide in International Law and International Relations Prior to 1948' in C Safferling and E Conze (eds), The Genocide Convention Sixty Years after its Adoption (The Hague: TMC Asser Press 2010) 19, 33–4; in the ICJ case of Croatia v Serbia again the characterization of conduct as genocidal was decisive, see Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Croatia v Serbia) (n 98) para. 85.

[180] L Sadat, 'Crimes against Humanity in the Modern Age' (2013) 107 American Journal of International Law 334.

[181] A Murray, 'Does International Criminal Law Still Require a "Crime of Crimes"? A Comparative Review of Genocide and Crimes against Humanity' (2011) 3 Göttingen Journal of International Law 590.

under international law as the basis for international criminal jurisdiction. As of yet, there appears to be the widespread belief within the international community that, where the conditions of that crime's definition are met, it may be useful to single out a campaign and the individual participation therein as genocidal. Whether this belief is justified, despite the powerful criticisms that have recently been formulated against the teleology behind the existing definition of genocide[182] and the latter's internal coherency,[183] is not a matter to be discussed in this contribution.

In any event, the significance of a genocide charge must never be exaggerated in a manner that entails an inappropriate downgrading of any concurrent charge of crimes against humanity. This is precisely what happened when the 2005 Darfur Commission Report's conclusion that 'the Government of Sudan has not pursued a policy of genocide'[184] absorbed virtually all of the world public's attention.[185] Perhaps the ICTR and the ICTY have inadvertently contributed to the perception that a conviction for genocide greatly outweighs all other possible convictions by calling genocide the 'crime of crimes'[186] and by emphasizing the special stigma attached to a conviction for genocide in the pathetic terms that, 'among the grievous crimes this Tribunal has the duty to punish, the crime of genocide is singled out for special condemnation and opprobrium'.[187] Should judgment be rendered one day against Al Bashir, the ICC should avail itself of the opportunity to 'demystify' the crime of genocide and to hereby clear the way for according crimes against humanity their proper place in contemporary international criminal law.

[182] Cf. May (n 13) 23–94 and section 27.2.1.

[183] The most enlightening recent critical contribution is that by Luban (n 84); in essence, there are three problems with the definition in light of its teleology to preserve 'national cosmopolitanism': first, it is not without difficulties to justify the present list of protected groups; second, the restriction of genocidal acts to 'physical' and 'biological' assaults on group members (together with the borderline case of the transfer of children) is hard to explain; and third, through the inclusion of the words 'in part', the definition loses 'its mooring in the group–pluralist theory of value' (Luban (n 84) 313).

[184] Report of the International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur to the Secretary-General (n 77) para. 518.

[185] Kelly (n 3) 212: 'That finding—removing the label "genocide"—seriously undermined efforts to marshal international action to stop the atrocities in Darfur'; P Bechky, 'Lemkin's Situation. Toward a Rhetorical Understanding of Genocide' (2012) 77 Brooklyn Law Review 551, 553.

[186] Judgment and Sentence, Kambanda, ICTR-97-23-S, TC, ICTR, 4 September 1998, para. 16.

[187] Krstić Appeals Judgment (n 43) para. 36.

28

Crimes against Humanity

A Better Policy on 'Policy'

*Darryl Robinson

28.1 Introduction

The most interesting and controversial ICC jurisprudence on crimes against humanity revolves around the interpretation of the 'policy element'. Most of the literature has focused on the controversy over whether the organization behind a policy must be 'state-like'. This chapter will focus instead on broader problematic trends in the early jurisprudence of the ICC, as typified particularly by decisions in the Gbagbo and Mbarushimana cases.[1] Some early ICC decisions have, in an apparently inadvertent manner, elevated the policy element and infused it with exceedingly formalized requirements. As a result, some cases have already faltered despite a relative wealth of evidence. If the ICC is to be a viable forum for crimes against humanity prosecutions, it is vitally important to correct this trend.

Other jurisdictions follow one of two major approaches to the policy element. One approach rejects the policy element outright. The other approach recognizes the policy element, but regards it as a quite modest threshold. Namely, the policy element simply screens out 'ordinary' unconnected crimes of individuals acting on their own unprompted initiatives, and thus requires some link to a state or organization. A policy need not be explicit or formalized; it is satisfied by showing the improbability that the crimes were coincidental individual acts.

Unfortunately, early ICC jurisprudence shows a tendency towards a unique third path: creatively imbuing the policy element with formidable new requirements. For example, in the Gbagbo adjournment decision, a Pre-Trial Chamber majority requested direct proof of formal 'adoption' of the policy, which is precisely what past authorities have repeatedly emphasized is not required. In the Mbarushimana case, a Pre-Trial Chamber majority indicated that FDLR-organized atrocities did not satisfy the policy element because their purpose was vengeance or intimidation. This

* Associate Professor, Queen's University, Faculty of Law. This research was facilitated by a research grant from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada as well as the Antonio Cassese Prize for International Criminal Law Studies. I am grateful to Clara Milde and Hayley Pitcher for their valuable research assistance.

[1] Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-432, PTC I, ICC, 3 June 2013 ('Gbagbo Adjournment Decision'); Decision on the confirmation of charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011 ('Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision').

conclusion is perplexing, because those ulterior purposes do not undermine the fact that the FDLR had a policy to attack civilians. Several decisions conflate 'policy' with the 'systematic' test, which not only raises the bar but also creates an unnecessary contradiction within Article 7 of the ICC Statute.

In this chapter I am not presenting an expansionist, 'push the envelope' approach to the policy element. On the contrary, I am mindful of the theory of the policy element. I am arguing that ICC chambers should take deeper cognizance of (1) the purpose of the policy element, (2) the structure of Article 7, and (3) the national and international authorities on the element.

International and national courts have had little difficulty inferring policy from circumstances; it would be most unfortunate if the ICC were the anomaly. Your first reaction to the negative judicial determinations discussed here may be to assume that the problem must lie with the OTP, i.e. that it brought inadequate evidence. However, as we will see, the evidence brought in the cases was equal to or greater than the evidence from which other courts and tribunals have inferred policy.

The policy element is very controversial, and thus it will help if I state my background premises. First, I think that the policy element, or something similar, is conceptually valuable, for reasons I will explain in section 28.2. Second, I happen to think there is ample customary law authority for a policy element, if it is understood as a modest threshold. However, even if you disagree with me on these points, it will not detract from the thesis presented in this chapter. If you believe that a policy element is not required in customary law, then you are likely to agree all the more heartily that the ICC should not elevate the element beyond what the limited available authorities indicate, as doing so would bring the ICC even further away from customary law and further away from effectiveness.

The important premise for this chapter is that the policy element is a quite basic threshold that is fairly easy to satisfy. Many people, arguing against recognition of the element, have voiced perfectly cogent concerns, e.g. that it might be (mis)interpreted to require proof of secret plans or to contradict the disjunctive test.[2] My response to those understandable concerns has been that the policy element need not have these deleterious effects, provided it is interpreted in accordance with the relevant authorities. Unfortunately, however, early ICC cases are often not interpreting the element in accordance with the relevant authorities. They also seem to be disregarding the significant literature, from both supporters and opponents of the element, on the dangers of misinterpreting and overstating the policy element. They are thereby ushering in the very problems that neither supporters nor opponents of the element wanted. I will argue that correction is needed, either by the judges, or, if necessary, by an amendment to the Elements of Crimes. As I note in the conclusion, more recent trends, after the drafting of this chapter, are very encouraging. The recent Katanga trial Decision and the later Gbagbo Confirmation Decision signal a very welcome move towards a more grounded and effective jurisprudence.

[2] See e.g. M deGuzman, 'The Road From Rome: The Developing Law of Crimes against Humanity' (2000) 22 Human Rights Quarterly 335; P Hwang, 'Defining Crimes against Humanity in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (1998) 22 Fordham International Law Journal 457; G Mettraux, 'Crimes against Humanity and the Question of a "Policy" Element' in L Sadat (ed.), Forging A Convention for Crimes against Humanity (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 142.

28.2 The Theory Behind the Policy Element

28.2.1 Why a 'policy element' (or something similar) is needed

First, I would like to show, particularly for those readers who may be sceptical of the policy element, why a policy element or something like it is conceptually valuable and indeed necessary. The argument involves two steps. Step one: the concept of crimes against humanity does not include 'ordinary' patterns of crime—the random, unconnected acts of individuals carrying out their own criminal designs.[3] Step two: the policy element, or something like it, is needed to actually deliver on this assurance.

It is the second step that is most controversial. It is frequently asserted that the 'widespread or systematic' test is by itself sufficient to exclude random, isolated crime.[4] Thus, it is argued, the policy element is not needed to exclude normal random crime: it is a redundant safeguard.[5] If I can demonstrate that this is not correct, that alone would be a valuable contribution to the debate.

The 'systematic' branch certainly succeeds in excluding random criminal activity, because it requires that the crimes be 'organized'.[6] However, the other disjunctive alternative, 'widespread', simply requires scale. Serious crimes (e.g. murder) in a city or region may be 'widespread' without the crimes being connected. Thus, the 'widespread or systematic' test patently does not succeed in excluding random, unconnected crimes. Recall that an individual need only commit a single crime within the requisite context to be liable for a crime against humanity. Thus, without some additional legal filter, every serious crime committed in a context of 'widespread' crime would be a crime against humanity.

An example will illustrate the problem. Assume a state with high crime, such as South Africa today, which faces thousands of murders each year. Assume that no state or organization is actively or passively encouraging such crimes; it is simply a situation

[3] The proposition that isolated or random acts of individuals do not constitute a crime against humanity is so frequently noted that it hardly needs a citation, but a few examples include: ILC, 'Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind with commentaries', 1996 Yearbook of the International Law Commission, vol. II, Part Two, 47 ('ILC draft Code'); Judgment, Kunarac et al., IT-96-23-T & IT-96-23/1-T, TC, ICTY, 22 February 2001 ('Kunarac Trial Judgment'); Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-T, TC, ICTY, 7 May 1997, para. 648 ('Tadić Trial Judgment'). The proposition is acknowledged by opponents of the policy element; see e.g. Mettraux, 'Crimes against Humanity and the Question of a "Policy" Element' (n 2) 153–5, 160, 163.

[4] See e.g. Judgment, Bagilishema, ICTR-95-1A-T, TC I, ICTR, 7 June 2001, para. 78; Judgment, Kayishema and Ruzidana, ICTR-95-1-T, TC II, ICTR, 21 May 1999, para. 123 ('Kayishema and Ruzidana'); Mettraux, 'Crimes Against Humanity and the Question of a "Policy" Element' (n 2) 153–5; M Halling, 'Push the Envelope—Watch It Bend: Removing the Policy Element and Extending Crimes against Humanity' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 827, 840–1; M Boot et al., 'Article 7' in O Triffterer, Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 159, 179–80.

[5] Halling (n 4) 841 ('redundant check'), Mettraux, 'Crimes against Humanity and the Question of a "Policy" Element' (n 2) 153 ('redundant and unnecessary'); Boot et al. (n 4) at 179 ('superfluous').

[6] See infra, section 28.3.1.

of elevated domestic crime. Thousands of murders easily qualifies as 'widespread'. The crimes are committed against civilians. The perpetrators are aware of the surrounding context (i.e. widespread crime against civilians). Thus, if we do not have a policy element or some equivalent, and we mechanistically apply the remaining elements of a crime against humanity, we will find that all elements are met. Each serious crime committed in a context of rampant serious crime would constitute a crime against humanity.[7] The test fails to delineate crimes against humanity from ordinary crimes and fails to delineate the scope of international jurisdiction.

Most jurists will agree that the 'high crime rate' scenario is not a crime against humanity. The most typical rejoinder to this example would be that unconnected crimes are not an 'attack directed against the civilian population'. That reaction is completely correct. But then the next question is, 'Can you articulate the specific requirement within your definition of "attack" that excludes those unconnected acts?' The answer to that question is the first key to the riddle of crimes against humanity. We need some legal element to actually deliver on the promise that unconnected ordinary crime is excluded. The 'widespread or systematic' test by itself does not suffice.

28.2.2 What the policy element means

Different deliberative bodies have noticed over the years that the 'widespread or systematic' test does not suffice to exclude rampant ordinary crime. At the Rome Conference, a significant number of states, including the P-5 and many Asian and Arab states, raised precisely this concern about the disjunctive 'widespread or systematic' test.[8] Like-minded delegations responded that an aggregate of truly random, unconnected crimes would not qualify as an 'attack'. The cautious delegations indicated their readiness to accept the disjunctive 'widespread or systematic' test, provided that the assurance about random crime was included in the definition of 'attack'.

The Rome Conference was not the first time that the over-inclusiveness problem had been noticed. Both the Tadić Decision of the ICTY and the 1996 ILC draft Code of Crimes suggested a solution. The Tadić Decision employed the term 'policy' to explain the idea that an attack is not composed of 'isolated, random acts of individuals',[9] and 'cannot be the work of isolated individuals alone'.[10] The Tadić Decision equated the 'policy' element with the requirement recognized by the ILC in the 1996 draft Code of Crimes, that an attack must be 'instigated or directed by a Government or by any organization or group'.[11] Both Tadić and the ILC draft Code described this requirement as additional to the 'widespread or systematic' test. At the Rome Conference, a Canadian compromise proposal advanced Article 7(2)(a), explicitly based on and [7] There are solutions other than a policy element. For example, one could require that the population be targeted on prohibited grounds, which would exclude most random 'ordinary' crimes; however, the re-introduction of specific grounds, motives, or special intents raises difficulties; see infra, section 28.3.2.

[8] See e.g. H von Hebel and D Robinson, 'Crimes within the Jurisdiction of the Court' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 79, 92–8.

[9] Tadić Trial Judgment (n 3) para. 653.

[10] Ibid., para. 655.

[11] Ibid., para. 655; ILC draft Code (n 3) 47 (Art 18).

footnoting to these passages in Tadić and the ILC draft Code.[12] Thus, the purpose of the policy element in the Rome Statute, in the Tadić Decision, and in the ILC draft Code, was simply to exclude 'ordinary' crime, i.e. crime occurring without coordination or encouragement.

This modest purpose is reinforced by four important features of the policy element, which have been consistently emphasized in the jurisprudence (as will be elaborated in section 28.4). First, the term 'policy' is not used in a bureaucratic sense: a policy may be implicit, need not be formalized, need not be stated expressly, and need not be defined precisely.[13] Second, the requisite attributability to a state or organization is intermediate between two extremes: on the one hand, a policy need not implicate the highest levels of a state or organization, and on the other hand, the crimes cannot merely be the product of a few isolated members acting on their own.[14] Third, a policy does not require active orchestration; it can be realized by deliberate inaction to encourage crimes where a state or organization has a duty to intervene.[15] Fourth, and most importantly, a policy may be inferred from the manner in which the acts occur; in particular, by showing the improbability that the acts occurred randomly.[16] These four features are mutually connected and consistent with the purpose of the element. Numerous scholars have noted these features of the policy element.[17] Some of the jurisprudence will be reviewed later.

[12] D Robinson, 'Defining Crimes against Humanity at the Rome Conference' (1999) 93 American Journal of International Law 43.

[13] See infra, section 28.4 for authorities.

[14] See e.g. Review of the Indictment Pursuant to Rule 61 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Nikolić, IT-94-2-R61, TC, ICTY, 20 October 1995, para. 26; Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, TC, ICTY, 3 March 2000, para. 205 ('Blaškić').

[15] See e.g. ICC Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3(part II-B), 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the Assembly of States Parties), fn. 6 (the Elements, reflecting their tortuous drafting, twice declare a general need for 'action' before acknowledging the important exception of policy by inaction); Judgment, Kupreškić, IT-95-16, TC, ICTY, 14 January 2001, paras 554–5 (reviewing case law on policies of inaction) ('Kupreškić'); Final Report of the Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992), UN Doc. S/1994/674 (27 May 1994), para. 85 (unwillingness to respond may be indicative of policy); K Ambos and S Wirth, 'The Current Law of Crimes against Humanity' (2002) 13 Criminal Law Forum 1, 31–4 (logical interpretation of Art 7 requires that policy can be satisfied by inaction, which is consistent with Kupreškić and the Elements of Crimes).

[16] See infra, section 28.4.1 for authorities.

[17] Boot et al. (n 4) 236 ('policy need not be formalised, and can be deduced from the manner in which the acts occur.…In essence, the policy element only requires that the acts of individuals alone, which are isolated, uncoordinated, and haphazard, be excluded'); K Kittichaisaree, International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 97–8 (excludes individuals acting on own initiative without direction or encouragement from a state or organization, not formal, not express, not highest level, infer from circumstances); R Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 237–40 (exclude random criminality of individuals, infer from manner); Ambos and Wirth (n 15) 30–4 (policy excludes ordinary crimes, may be implicit, and may be passive); L Sadat, 'Crimes against Humanity in the Modern Age' (2013) 107 American Journal of International Law 334, 354 and 372 (exclude uncoordinated, haphazard, random acts); S Chesterman, 'An Altogether Different Order: Defining the Elements of Crimes against Humanity' (2000) 10 Duke Journal of Comparative & International Law 307, 316 ('policy requirement reiterates the position that isolated and random acts cannot amount to crimes against humanity'); Y Dinstein, 'Crimes against Humanity after Tadić' (2000) 13 Leiden Journal of International Law 373, 389 (need policy element to exclude spontaneous, fortuitous crimes).

Accordingly, I submit to you that the policy element is simply the logical corollary of the proposition that an 'attack' cannot consist of random acts of individuals acting on their own criminal initiatives. If we take that proposition, which is worded negatively (what an attack is not), and express its positive corollary (what an attack is), then we get something like: 'to be an "attack", the acts must be directed, instigated, or encouraged by some source other than individuals acting independently'. Given that the first proposition is not controversial, its logical corollary ought to be accepted as well.

Many scholars and jurists accept the need for the 'widespread or systematic' test, but seem relatively uninterested in the over-inclusiveness problem. Perhaps this is because of a sanguine reliance on prosecutorial discretion. But the law of crimes against humanity may be applied by any state; thus it is desirable to delineate it sensibly. Moreover, the states creating the ICC were certainly not sanguine about the 'unconnected crimes' problem; thus the policy element was included in the Statute and must be understood and interpreted. Understanding the purpose of the element also helps us not to elevate it beyond its purpose.

The policy element reflects part of the essence of a crime against humanity: its 'associative' dimension. As David Luban has observed, crimes against humanity concern our human nature as social and political animals. We live socially and we form organizations. Crimes against humanity are when our organizational nature turns against us and people work together to commit atrocities; they are 'politics gone cancerous'.[18] Whereas genocide focuses on the group nature of the victims, the law of crimes against humanity is engaged by the group nature of the perpetrators. The link to a state or organization reflects the minimum requisite 'associative' dimension.

28.2.3 What the policy element does not mean

In retrospect, the word 'policy', adopted from Tadić and earlier sources, is an unfortunate label for this term of art. To many ears, the word 'policy' connotes something highly formal and official, and adopted at the highest levels. On this connotation, the word implies something more than mere orders: it suggests something more special, momentous, deliberate, and sanctified, more akin to a manifesto, programme, or platform.

This popular connotation makes more understandable the early ICC decisions that assume a fairly elevated, official concept of policy (see sections 28.4 and 28.5). However, Tadić and other authorities emphasize that the term does not carry these formalized connotations, and that it is simply synonymous with the requirement of direction, instigation, or encouragement from a state or organization. While the ICC judges must have latitude to fashion their own path, the deviations from the authorities, drafting history, and purpose of the element seem to be both inadvertent and undesirable.

[18] D Luban, 'A Theory of Crimes against Humanity' (2004) 29 Yale Journal of International Law 85.

The discrepancy between the term's juridical meaning and one of its popular meanings has also aggravated the current controversy. Many scholars who oppose the policy element understand it in a restrictive manner. I agree with them on the substance: a special, deliberately adopted programme is not required by the precedents, nor is it required by any available theory of crimes against humanity. Such a requirement would be normatively undesirable, as it would frustrate many proper prosecutions. If, however, the policy element is understood as a juridical concept and interpreted in accordance with the authorities (including the four features noted), it will fulfil its simple purpose without undermining meritorious prosecutions.

28.2.4 The resulting concept of crime against humanity

The foregoing generates a concept of a crime against humanity. The hallmarks are atrocity (the prohibited acts), scale, and associativity.[19] But the interplay of the last two hallmarks, which undergird the contextual elements, is more complex than most jurists realize. The obvious level is that there must be a high degree of either scale ('widespread') or associativity ('systematic'). The more subtle, less appreciated, level is that, for the law of crimes against humanity to make sense,[20] there must also be some minimal degree of both scale and associativity to constitute an 'attack' on a civilian population.

Why must there be a minimal degree of both scale and associativity? Where there is insignificant scale, the crimes cannot be crimes against humanity, even if there is a high degree of associative coordination. For example, a governmentally orchestrated but isolated murder of one dissident is a crime and a human rights violation, but it is not a crime against humanity. Conversely, where there is no associativity, the crimes cannot be crimes against humanity even if there is a high degree of scale (i.e. 'widespread'). Unprompted, unconnected acts of individuals are simply 'a high crime rate' and not a crime against humanity.

The task of Article 7(2)(a) is to fulfil this less obvious, less recognized, yet still important function. It is an in limine test, screening out contexts that lack the minimum necessary scale or associativity. It avoids the absurdities of a purely disjunctive approach to scale and associativity. The 'multiple acts' requirement screens out crime that has no scale. The 'policy' requirement screens out crime that has no associativity. Once these minimal standards are both met, the prosecutor must then prove a high degree of either scale (widespread) or associativity (systematic).

[19] I use 'associativity' not in the mathematical sense but as a short form for the requisite associative aspect. The minimal requirement is reflected in the policy element, requiring at least some sort of active or passive encouragement from an organization of human beings. The more stringent version, 'systematic', requires more active planning and coordination, and I believe it may also require an entity with some authority or power. On the conceptual importance of this collective or 'associative' element, see Luban (n 18); K Fisher, Moral Accountability and International Criminal Law (Abingdon: Routledge 2012) 22–5; R Vernon, 'Crimes against Humanity: A Defence of the Subsidiarity View' (2013) 26 Canadian Journal of Law & Jurisprudence 229.

[20] In referring to 'making sense' I am not advancing a lex ferenda argument. Coherence is an aspiration of law itself and is a legitimate interpretational consideration. I am aiming to reveal the theory underlying the law.

28.2.5 A word on the approach of the Tribunals

For the purpose of this chapter, it does not matter whether the policy element is or is not recognized in customary law. Great arguments have been advanced on each side of the debate.[21] My own view is that there is no conclusive argument for either side on the 'ascending' analysis (induction from sources); it is therefore the 'descending' analysis (deduction from principles) that convinces me.[22] But such questions do not affect the thesis of this chapter. If the element is customary law, the ICC should take into account the relevant authorities.[23] If the element is not customary law, and instead is a legislative imposition under Article 7, the Court should still consider as guidance the authorities as to what the policy element requires.

I should also touch briefly upon the Kunarac case. In Kunarac, the ICTY Appeals Chamber declared rather sweepingly that there is 'nothing' in customary law that requires a policy element and an 'overwhelming' case against it.[24] For many scholars and jurists, this assertion seems to be dispositive of the customary law question. I agree that an assertion by the ICTY Appeals Chamber is entitled to great weight. I would, however, make three quick points. One, this particular assertion, which appeared in a thinly reasoned footnote, should be taken with a pinch of salt; as many scholars have noted, the authorities it cited are actually either silent on or even contrary to the Chamber's assertion, and many other authorities are simply ignored.[25] Two, the Tribunal's earlier jurisprudence on the policy element remains a helpful guide for the ICC and other jurisdictions that recognize the element.[26] Three, the gulf between the [21] Against the element, see Mettraux, 'Crimes against Humanity and the Question of a "Policy" Element' (n 2) and Halling (n 4). In favour, see C Kreß, 'On the Outer Limits of Crimes against Humanity: The Concept of Organization within the Policy Requirement: Some Reflections on the March 2010 ICC Kenya Decision' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 855; W Schabas, 'State Policy as an Element of International Crimes' (2008) 98 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 953; C Bassiouni, 'Revisiting the Architecture of Crimes against Humanity: Almost a Century in the Making, with Gaps and Ambiguities Remaining—the Need for a Specialized Convention' in L Sadat (ed.), Forging a Crime against Humanity (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 43. I also review some of the often-overlooked authorities in D Robinson, 'Crimes against Humanity: Reflections on State Sovereignty, Legal Precision and the Dictates of the Public Conscience' in F Lattanzi and W Schabas (eds), Essays on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, vol. I (Ripa di Fagnano Alto: il Sirente, 1999) 139, 152–64.

[22] Contrary to occasional claims that there is no support at all for a policy element, there are in fact plenty of authorities (some of which will be discussed in section 28.4). However, the authorities are far from conclusive. Thus, a good lawyer can minimize the pro-policy authorities or alternatively emphasize them. In my view, it is the strength of the 'descending' argument, deduced from principles, i.e. avoiding absurdity and reflecting the nature of the crime, which tilts the balance. See supra, section 28.2.1. This leads me to foreground rather than background the authorities in support of the element.

[23] Art 21(1)(b) Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('ICC Statute'); Art 31(3)(c) VCLT (signed 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331.

[24] Judgment, Kunarac et al., IT-96-23 & IT-96-23/1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 June 2002, para. 98 (emphasis added) ('Kunarac Appeal Judgment'). The reasoning of the Chamber is almost identical to that in G Mettraux, 'Crimes against Humanity in the Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda' (2002) 43 Harvard International Law Journal 237, 270–82.

[25] For commentary critical of the Chamber's claims, see Kreß (n 21) 870–1; Schabas (n 21); Bassiouni (n 21); C Jalloh, 'What Makes a Crime against Humanity a Crime against Humanity' (2013) 28 American University International Law Review 381, 397–40; Halling (n 4) 829–31.

[26] As was correctly noted in Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Tribunal approach and the ICC approach may not be as vast as it seems. In its actual analyses of borderline cases, ICTY cases have re-injected requirements that are functionally similar to the policy element,[27] in order to avoid absurdity. Thus, the ICTY approach is arguably one of 'crypto-policy': declaring that there is no such element but then reintroducing comparable requirements sotto voce.

28.3 Concerns about ICC Jurisprudence

The remainder of this chapter explores problematic trends in early ICC jurisprudence. Section 28.3 discusses general trends, and sections 28.4 and 28.5 will look more closely at two decisions as exemplars: Gbagbo and Mbarushimana.

28.3.1 Equating 'policy' with 'systematic'

A recurring problem in early ICC jurisprudence is to describe the policy element in the same terms as the 'systematic' threshold.[28] For example, a pre-trial decision in the Katanga case states that the policy element requires the attack to be 'thoroughly organized', follow a regular pattern, and involve public or private resources.[29] But that standard is actually the 'systematic' test from Tribunal jurisprudence.[30] Not only is it the test for a different concept, but it is also a somewhat outdated test from early jurisprudence. Nonetheless, other ICC decisions have repeated the 'thoroughly organized' standard.[31]

The confusion is somewhat understandable. Article 7 is complex, referring both to 'policy' and to 'systematic'. The concepts sound similar, and both deal with associativity. But there are two problems with equating the terms.

First, it violates contextual interpretation, because it unnecessarily creates a contradiction within Article 7. The interpretation requires 'systematic' in all cases, contradicting the disjunctive test in Article 7(1). Of course, one might simply shrug and assert that there is a contradiction in Article 7. In support of this view, one could cite a passage in the ILC commentary that equated 'policy' with 'systematic'.[32] If that passage is ICC-01/09-19-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010, para. 86. See also Sadat (n 17) 372–3. The early ICTY jurisprudence on policy was a helpful summation of other national and international jurisprudence.

[27] I will not develop the argument in this chapter but rather in a later work; for now I will simply gesture to Judgment, Haradinaj, IT-04-84, TC, ICTY, 3 April 2008 (events not an 'attack' due to insufficient scale, frequency, structure, organization, or targeting).

[28] This problem has already been noticed by other scholars, such as Leila Sadat; see Sadat (n 17).

[29] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, para. 396 ('Katanga Confirmation Decision').

[30] See e.g. Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, TC I, ICTR, 2 September 1998, para. 580 ('Akayesu').

[31] Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute of the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-14-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 3 October 2011, para. 43; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Art 58 for a Warrant of Arrest against Laurent Koudou Gbagbo (Public redacted version), Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-9-Red, 30 November 2011, para. 37 ('Gbagbo Arrest Warrant Decision').

[32] The ILC draft Code refers to 'systematic' as referring to a 'preconceived plan or policy'. ILC draft Code (n 3) 47. That understanding has been echoed in some cases; see e.g. Kayishema and Ruzidana (n 4) para. 123.

correct, then there is indeed a contradiction within Article 7.[33] However, the sanguine assumption that Article 7 is contradictory gives up on coherent interpretation far too easily. After all, the very same authorities that introduced the now-hallowed 'widespread or systematic' test also expressly coupled it with a policy element;[34] we should make the intellectual effort to interpret them coherently. Furthermore, as a matter of statutory construction, an interpretation leading to contradiction is to be avoided.

The second reason not to conflate the terms is to conform to past authorities and understandings. Indeed, the most natural and obvious way to avoid internal contradiction is simply to interpret the terms in accordance with the bulk of the authorities. 'Policy' can be inferred where the manner of commission shows some sufficient link to a state or organization (including deliberate inaction to encourage crimes).[35] 'Systematic' entails a higher threshold of associative activity and effort to coordinate crimes.[36] In numerous articles, many scholars—whether supportive or critical of the policy element—have warned that 'policy' must be a lower threshold than 'systematic', (1) in order to follow the authorities, (2) in order not to negate the disjunctive test, and (3) in order not to negate the position of the vast majority of delegations, who wanted a disjunctive test and accepted only a moderate limitation.[37] Early ICC decisions have given inadequate consideration to the structure of Article 7 and to the significant literature warning of this issue.

To conform to past authority, the structure of Article 7, and the drafting history, 'systematic' must be a stringent test, requiring a high degree of coordination and organizational activity, whereas 'policy' must be a more moderate test, satisfied by a more general link to a state or organization. That link may be demonstrated by the improbability that the crimes are coincidental unprompted acts.

[33] Because Art 7(1) would make 'systematic' a disjunctive alternative, whereas Art 7(2)(a) would effectively make it a requirement.

[34] See for example, Tadić and the ILC draft Code, discussed in section 28.2.2.

[35] See supra (n 15) and accompanying text.

[36] More recent Tribunal cases are settling on the test of the 'organized nature of the acts of violence and the improbability of their random occurrence'. See e.g. Judgment and Sentence, Nahimana, ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2008, para. 920; Kunarac Trial Judgment (n 3) para. 429. As I argue here, 'improbability of random occurrence' must be not merely part of 'systematic', but part of all crimes against humanity, since truly randomly occurring crime is not a crime against humanity. It may also be that the 'systematic' test requires a 'state-like' entity, with some power or authority; this argument will be developed elsewhere.

[37] Ambos and Wirth (n 15) 28 and 31–4 (policy must be less than 'systematic', can be passive); Hwang (n 2) 503 (need for future ICC judges to recall 'policy' is not 'systematic', but merely requires state or organizational involvement; not formal and can be inferred); DeGuzman, 'The Road from Rome' (n 2) 372–4 (interpreting 'policy' as 'systematic' contradicts Art 7 and erases the position of the vast majority of states); T McCormack, 'Crimes against Humanity' in D McGoldrick et al. (eds), The Permanent International Criminal Court: Legal and Policy Issues (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2004) 186–9; D Donat-Cattin, 'A General Definition of Crimes against Humanity under International Law: The Contribution of the Rome Statute' (1999) 8 Revue de Droit Pénal et des Droits de l'Homme 83; W Rückert and G Witschel, 'Genocide and Crimes against Humanity in the Elements of Crimes' in H Fischer et al. (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes under International Law (Berlin: Berlin Verlag Arno Spitz 2000) 71; Sadat (n 17) 359.

28.3.2 Re-introducing 'grounds' of targeting

Second, some early ICC decisions have adopted a proposition that a 'civilian population' should not be a 'limited and randomly selected group of individuals'.[38] That proposition originated in ICTY jurisprudence.[39] Such a requirement has some value in those jurisdictions that have rejected the policy element, because it helps provide some filter to exclude ordinary random criminal activity.

Nonetheless, it is both unnecessary and undesirable to import this requirement into ICC jurisprudence. It is unnecessary because the policy element in Article 7(2)(a) already excludes crimes that are 'random' in the sense of being unprompted, unconnected ordinary crimes.[40] It is undesirable because requiring that a population not be 'randomly selected' re-introduces disputes over why particular civilians were targeted. It is a road that eventually leads to concepts of discriminatory grounds, special intent, or specific purpose.[41] These are not appropriate in crimes against humanity.[42] When a state or organization attacks civilians, it can be a crime against humanity even if the victims are selected randomly. For example, a state or organization might have a policy of attacking civilian victims at random in order to inflict maximal terror; this is still a crime against humanity. Or consider slavery, the earliest crime against humanity.[43] If a slavery ring starts to enslave human beings, capturing whomever it can, the victims may be 'randomly selected', but this does not and should not prevent it from constituting a crime against humanity under the ICC Statute.

Of course, victims will often be an identifiable group in some way, and this can be a factor that can help prove a policy to attack a civilian population. But, apart from the crime of persecution, it is not a requirement that the victim population share characteristics. The essence of a crime against humanity lies in the scale and associative dimension of the attack, not the identity of the victims.[44] This differing focus distinguishes crimes against humanity from genocide.

[38] See e.g. Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, paras 76–7 (distinguishing features, not randomly selected) ('Bemba Confirmation Decision'); Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorisation of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya (n 26) para. 81 (must be distinguished by nationality, ethnicity, or other distinguishing features).

[39] See e.g Kunarac Appeal Judgment (n 24) para. 90; Judgment, Martić, IT-95-11-T, TC I, ICTY, 12 June 2007, para. 49; Judgment, Milutinović et al., IT-05-87-T, TC, ICTY, 26 February 2009, para. 145.

[40] Art 7(2)(a) does include the word 'population', which connotes an idea of scale. However, courts have already deduced the 'widespread or systematic' test as well as the 'policy' requirement from 'population'; thus there is no need to read still more into it. (See e.g. Tadić Trial Judgment (n 3) paras 644–6, 648, and 653.)

[41] To see where such an approach eventually leads, see the Bowoto case, discussed in section 28.5.3.

[42] A requirement of discriminatory grounds was considered and rejected in the drafting of Art 7: see e.g. Von Hebel and Robinson (n 8) 93–4; Boot et al. (n 4) 174; McCormack (n 37) 186–8. It is also rejected by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999, paras 282–305.

[43] R Clark, 'History of Efforts to Codify Crimes against Humanity' in Sadat (ed.), Forging a Convention (n 2) 10.

[44] Luban (n 18).

28.4 The Gbagbo Adjournment Decision: Direct Proof of Formal Adoption?

The case against Laurent Gbagbo, the former President of the Côte d'Ivoire, concerns large-scale killings, assaults, and rapes committed by pro-Gbagbo state forces and youth militia against civilians who were perceived to support the rival candidate to Gbagbo.[45] The case presented by the prosecutor focused on 4 incidents, involving over 294 crimes against civilians, and also referred to 41 other incidents. In June 2013 a majority of Pre-Trial Chamber I found the evidence inadequate and adjourned the confirmation hearing to allow the prosecutor to collect and present additional evidence.[46] The decision raises many important issues; this chapter concerns only the crimes against humanity analysis. Some of the types of evidence requested by the majority are cause for concern, as they are not required for a crime against humanity prosecution.

To establish the policy element, the prosecutor offered a significant amount of direct evidence (witnesses, police records, photographs, videos) as well as indirect evidence. The evidence attested to repeated attacks by pro-Gbagbo forces against civilians supportive of his political opponent; the failure of police to intervene; the participation of police in crimes; preparation for atrocities, such as policemen bringing condoms to the site where they raped female protestors; measures to identify supporters of the opposition; public statements of leaders of the pro-Gbabgo inner circle; internal instructions; prior warnings that unarmed demonstrators would be killed; and witness reports that perpetrators indicated that they were targeting victims because of their opposition to Gbagbo.[47]

Nonetheless, the majority was not satisfied of a policy based on this evidence. The majority requested additional evidence about specific meetings at which the policy was adopted and its internal promulgation; for example:

> How, when and by whom the alleged policy/plan to attack the 'pro-Outtara civilian population' was adopted, including specific information about meetings at which this policy/plan was allegedly adopted, as well as how the existence and content of this policy/plan was communicated or made known to members of the 'pro-Gbagbo forces' once it was adopted.[48]

The decision also requested additional evidence about the coordination, structure, and operating methods of the 'inner circle' of the pro-Gbagbo forces.[49]

[45] See Document amendé de notification des charges, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-184-Anx1-Red (available in French only), OTP, ICC, 13 July 2012 ('Gbagbo DCC'). The attacks overall involved over 1,300 victims; the 4 charged incidents involved over 294 crimes against civilians.

[46] See Gbagbo Adjournment Decision (n 1).

[47] See e.g. Gbagbo DCC (n 45) paras 21, 37, 40, 44, 50, and 81–4.

[48] Gbagbo Adjournment Decision (n 1) para. 44.

[49] Ibid. For the evidence that was provided on the pro-Gbagbo forces, the inner circle, its membership, its control, and its meetings, see Gbagbo DCC (n 45) paras 59–86.

In defence of the decision, it can be said that these were merely 'requests'. Nonetheless, by requesting such specific evidence, after declaring the proffered evidence to be inadequate, and not indicating any alternative way to satisfy it, the majority appears to have in mind heightened legal and evidentiary requirements for the policy element.

One problem with the majority's approach is that it reflects a formalized, bureaucratic conception of the policy element: the requests relate to specific meetings at which a policy was 'adopted', dates of such meetings,[50] inner workings, and internal transmission of the policy to the rank and file. That conception is somewhat understandable, given that one common sense definition of the word 'policy' does indeed connote something official and formally adopted, perhaps by a Cabinet or board of directors, and then promulgated to the levels below. Nonetheless, as will be explained, this is not and has never been the meaning of the term of art 'policy' in crimes against humanity authorities. Nor does the theory of crimes against humanity require a restriction to crimes that were bureaucratically endorsed at the highest level. Indeed, such a conception would not reflect the diverse types of organizations that may orchestrate crimes.

A second, related problem with the majority's approach is that it is epistemologically over-cautious and rarified. The majority indicated its reservations about the inferences it was asked to draw,[51] and requested direct evidence of formal adoption. However, the crucially important point is that a policy will almost always be a matter of inference. The request for direct evidence of formal adoption of a policy is contrary to past jurisprudence, which consistently emphasizes that a policy need not be formally adopted and can be inferred from the manner in which the acts occur. It is understandable for a diligent judge to ask, 'How can I be sure there is a state or organizational policy unless I have proof of the adoption of the policy?' The answer is that we don't need the 'smoking gun'. We can prove 'P' (policy) by proving the implausibility of 'not-P'. In other words, we can infer the policy element from the sheer absurdity of the rival hypothesis, which is that these hundreds of crimes, committed by pro-Gbagbo forces against anti-Gbagbo forces, while making statements indicative of coordination, were actually just a coincidence. It is implausible that this was a simple 'crime wave' of individual acts occurring without any state or organizational coordination.

My legal analysis will proceed in two steps. First, I will start with the authorities on the policy element, because many of them (especially domestic jurisprudence) will be unfamiliar to most readers. It will be useful to show that my claim, that the policy element is a simple threshold, is not an invention or strained reading but rather a well-established feature. Second, I will then look more methodically at the applicable law under the ICC Statute.

28.4.1 The general authorities on the policy element

The purpose of the policy element has been well explained by the Supreme Court of Peru in the Fujimori case. The policy element > requires only that the casual acts of individuals acting on their own, in isolation, and with no one coordinating them, be excluded …Such common crimes, even when committed > on a widespread scale, do not constitute crimes against humanity, unless they are at least connected in one way or another to a particular State or organizational authority: they must at least be tolerated by the latter.[52]

[50] Gbagbo Adjournment Decision (n 1) para. 44. [51] Ibid., para. 36.

This corresponds perfectly to the purpose of the element in the Rome Statute, in the Tadić Decision, and in the ILC draft Code, as noted in section 28.2.

Several features of the policy element reinforce and serve this modest purpose, and are consistently emphasized in the jurisprudence. I will review here the two features most pertinent to the Gbagbo Decision: one, policy need not be formalized, need not be stated expressly, and need not be defined precisely, and two, a policy may be inferred from the manner in which the acts occur.

Early ICTY decisions (prior to the subsequent rejection of the policy element in Kunarac[53]) provide helpful guidance on the element and affirm these features. The seminal Tadić Decision, on which Article 7(2)(a) was based, emphasized that the 'policy need not be formalized and can be deduced from the way in which the acts occur'.[54] Other cases affirm that the 'policy need not be explicitly formulated'[55] and that it need not be conceived at the highest levels.[56] The Blaškić Decision is particularly instructive. In addition to confirming that '[t]his plan…need not necessarily be declared expressly or even stated clearly and precisely',[57] the decision provides a valuable list of factors from which one may infer a policy, including, inter alia, repetition of the acts, the scale of the acts, and the overall political background.[58]

Other jurisdictions have affirmed these features. Prior to the Kunarac Decision, ICTR cases consistently held that a policy need not be adopted formally.[59] Likewise, the SCSL has had little difficulty inferring a policy from the manner in which acts occur. For example, in the Fofana (CDF) case, the SCSL held, '[i]n view of these findings of fact, taken as a whole, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that the criminal conduct against those civilians was neither random nor isolated acts but was rather perpetrated pursuant to a common pattern of targeting the civilian population'.[60]

Of course, since the Kunarac Decision, these Tribunals now hold that the policy element is not required.[61] Nonetheless, the earlier cases are helpful statements about the features of the policy element and conform with other authorities.[62]

[52] Barrios Altos, La Cantuta and Army Intelligence Service Basement Cases, Case No. AV 19-2001, Sala Penal Especial de la Corte Suprema, 7 April 2009 (Peru), para. 715 (citing Kai Ambos); translation available (2010) 25 American University International Law Review 657 (emphasis added).

[53] Kunarac Appeal Judgment (n 24) para. 98. [54] Tadić Trial Judgment (n 3) para. 653.

[55] See e.g. Kupreškić (n 15) para. 551; Judgment, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-T, TC, ICTY, 26 February 2001, para. 181.

[56] Blaškić (n 14) para. 205. [57] Ibid., para. 204. [58] Ibid.

[59] See e.g. Akayesu (n 30) para. 508; Judgment and Sentence, Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-T, TC I, ICTR, 6 December 1999, para. 68; Judgment and Sentence, Musema, ICTR-96-13-T, TC I, ICTR, 27 January 2000, para. 204. Akayesu and later cases note that a policy need not be adopted formally by a state. It is now well accepted that a policy may also be that of a non-state organization.

[60] Judgment, Fofana and Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-A, AC, SCSL, 28 May 2008, para. 307 ('CDF case Appeal Judgment').

[61] Kunarac Appeal Judgment (n 24) para. 98; Judgment and Sentence, Semanza, ICTR-97-20-T, TC III, ICTR, 15 May 2003, para. 329 (citing Kunarac); Judgment, Fofana, SCSL-04-14-T, TC I, SCSL, 2 August 2007 (citing Kunarac) para. 113.

[62] See supra, section 28.2.4, and see discussion in Sadat (n 17) 372–3.

Expert bodies have also affirmed that the policy element is not a difficult threshold. For example, the 1994 Commission of Experts on crimes in former Yugoslavia, which recognized the policy element,[63] inferred the policy from the circumstances: 'There is sufficient evidence to conclude that the practices of "ethnic cleansing" were not coincidental, sporadic or carried out by disorganized groups or bands of civilians who could not be controlled by the Bosnian-Serb leadership.'[64] Even more pertinently and valuably, the Commission noted:

> It should not be accepted at face value that the perpetrators are merely uncontrolled elements, especially not if these elements target almost exclusively groups also otherwise discriminated against and persecuted. Unwillingness to manage, prosecute and punish uncontrolled elements may be another indication that these elements are, in reality, but a useful tool for the implementation of a policy of crime against humanity.[65]

National courts have also recognized that a policy may be implicit and can be inferred from circumstances. For example, a court in Bosnia and Herzegovina, applying a provision identical to Article 7(2)(a) in a crime against humanity case, provided a helpful list of factors from which to infer policy:

> The following factual factors are considered with regard to establishing the existence of a policy to commit an attack: concerted action by members of an organization or State; distinct but similar acts by members of an organization or State; preparatory acts prior to the commencement of the attack; prepared acts or steps undertaken during or at the conclusion of the attack; the existence of political, economic or other strategic objectives of a State or organization furthered by the attack; and in the case of omissions, knowledge of an attack or attacks and willful failure to act.[66]

Similarly, in Sexual Minorities Uganda v Scott Lively,[67] a US court held, 'one ought to look at these atrocities or acts in their context and verify whether they may be regarded as part of an overall policy or a consistent pattern of inhumanity, or whether they instead constitute isolated or sporadic acts of cruelty or wickedness'.[68] While this was a civil law case, it relied on criminal law authorities, and on this point the court referred to the late Antonio Cassese.

An Argentine court in the famous Junta trial demonstrates with admirable clarity how policy is inferred from the improbability of coincidence:

> The operative system put in practice … was substantially identical in the whole territory of the Nation and prolonged over time. It having been proved that the acts were [63] Final Report of the Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992) (n 15) para. 84.

[64] Ibid., para. 142. See also para. 313, inferring policy behind ethnic cleansing, rape, and sexual assault, based on frequency of occurrence and the consistent failure to prevent or punish such crimes.

[65] Ibid., para. 85.

[66] Verdict of 28 February 2008, Mitar Rašević and Savo Todović, Case No. X-KR/06/275, Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina, 28 February 2008, available at <http://www.legal-tools.org/en/doc/6a28b5/> accessed 28 April 2014 (emphasis added).

[67] 2013 US Dist. LEXIS 114754.

[68] See also Doe v Alvaro Rafael Saravia, 348 F. Supp. 2d 1112 (E.D. Cal. 2004) para. 260 (same quote).

> committed by members of the armed and security forces, vertically and disciplinarily organized, the hypothesis that this could have occurred without express superior orders is discarded.[69]

Similarly, a more recent case against Jorge Rafael Videla held:

> It having been proved that the events were directly committed by members of the army, the State Intelligence Secretariat, the Buenos Aires Provincial Police . . . organised vertically and disciplinarily, it does not appear probable—in this stage—that they could have been committed without orders from hierarchical superiors.[70]

The same approach of inferring policy was also taken in the recent Guatemalan case against General Rios Montt.[71]

This jurisprudence is crucially important for the viability of ICC prosecutions of crimes against humanity. The policy element does not require proof of internal meetings and communications. It is satisfied when the circumstances render implausible the alternative hypothesis that the crimes against civilians were coincidental, unprompted acts of individuals on their own criminal initiatives. The authorities repeatedly draw the contrast between crimes with state or organizational support or encouragement versus crimes that are 'haphazard', 'coincidental', 'random', 'sporadic', and carried out by 'uncontrolled and uncontrollable elements'.

Some ICC chambers have correctly noted some aspects of this jurisprudential tradition, for example, that a policy need not be formalized and need not be explicitly defined.[72] Unfortunately, because of the tendency to conflate 'policy' with 'systematic', ICC chambers have not yet grappled with the differences between the two, these features of the policy element, or the structure of Article 7.

[69] Cámara Nacional de Apelaciones en lo Criminal y Correccional Federal de Buenos Aires (C.Fed), 9/12/1985, 'Causa No. 13/84 (Juicio a las Juntas Militares)', Sentencia 9 December 1985, Second Part, paragraph 3(c) available at <http://www.derechos.org/nizkor/arg/causa13/cap20.html> accessed 28 April 2014 (emphasis added).

[70] Causa No. 1.285/85, 'Videla, Jorge Rafael y otros s/presunta infracción a los arts. 146, 293 y 139, inc. 2do. del Código Penal', Juzgado Federal de San Isidro, 13 July 1998.

[71] '[T]he army carried out these massacres using the same pattern of conduct, which is verified by the actions carried out in each of the communities. This circumstance is very important because it is evidence of prior planning and the implementation of that planning. Why do we say this? It is important because, as has been shown, the violent acts against the Ixil [people] was not a spontaneous action but the concretization of previously prepared plans which formed part of a state policy towards the elimination of that group.' Tribunal de Alto Riesgo A, Sentencia C-01076-2011-00015 (Rios Montt, Rodriguez Sanchez) Of. 2o, of 2 May 2011, Folio 697 available at <http://paraqueseconozca.blogspot.com/> accessed 28 April 2014; judgment annulled pending appeal against the rejection of a defence motion to recuse two trial judges: Corte de Constitucionalidad, 20 May 2013, decision available at <http://www.right2info.org/resources/publications/constitutional-court-judgment-5.20.2013> accessed 28 April 2014.

[72] Pre-Trial Chamber II held in the Bemba confirmation decision that the 'policy need not be formalised. Indeed, an attack which is planned, directed or organized—as opposed to spontaneous or isolated acts of violence—will satisfy this criterion'. Bemba Confirmation Decision (n 38) para. 8. Pre-Trial Chamber I made the identical observation in the Katanga confirmation decision. Katanga Confirmation Decision (n 29) para. 396: 'The policy need not be explicitly defined by the organisational group. Indeed, an attack which is planned, directed or organised—as opposed to spontaneous or isolated acts of violence—will satisfy this criterion.' And Pre-Trial Chamber III held in the Gbagbo arrest warrant decision that a policy 'need not be explicitly defined or formalised'. Gbagbo Arrest Warrant Decision (n 31) para. 37.

28.4.2 The policy element under ICC applicable law

The ICC must follow its own applicable law, and thus any consideration of the interpretive tradition of other international tribunals, national courts, and expert bodies must take its proper place within that analysis. Accordingly, we will now look at the applicable law (Article 21 of the ICC Statute), starting with the Statute itself and its text, context, and object and purpose.

First, the 'ordinary meaning' of the term 'policy' does not point one way or the other, because the word itself is amenable to either the formalistic or the non-formalistic understanding. The term 'policy' can certainly be understood as referring to something official and formally adopted. Yet it can also be understood less formalistically as a 'course of action adopted as expedient'.[73] As 'policy' is a legal term with a significant interpretive history, its lay meaning will be less instructive, and other interpretive guides, such as past authorities, will be more important.[74]

Second, contextual interpretation requires us to consider the structure of Article 7. In order to avoid a contradiction between Article 7(1) and Article 7(2)(a), 'policy' must entail a threshold less demanding than 'systematic' (just as 'multiple' must be less demanding than 'widespread'). Otherwise, the disjunctive nature of the widespread or systematic test would be negated and the 'widespread' test would be redundant. Indeed, the problem with the Gbagbo Decision is significantly worse than the cases equating 'policy' with 'systematic'.[75] It is worse because requiring direct proof of formal adoption actually renders 'policy' even more demanding than 'systematic'. This not only negates the disjunctive test, but it also completely overthrows the relationship between Articles 7(1) and 7(2)(a). It makes the 'tail' (the minor test) wag the 'dog' (the major test). Instead, the coherence of Article 7 must be preserved, by recognizing the established features of the policy element, including that policy may be implicit and can be inferred from the manner of commission of the crimes.

Third, sound legal interpretation must consider the interpretation in the relevant precedents and authorities. One could try to argue that the Court should not consider other authorities because the Statute provides its own self-contained distinct regime. However, Article 7 refers to general concepts of international criminal law and was intended to reflect customary law.[76] Thus, it is appropriate to consider other authorities. Two interpretive rules tell us to look at other authorities. First, basic contextual interpretation requires it (see the principle of systemic integration in Article 31(3)(c) of the VCLT, and discussion by the ILC of the need to consider the broader legal [73] Oxford English Dictionary Vol. XII 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1989) 27, provides this as the 'chief living sense' of the term. See also DeGuzman, 'The Road from Rome' (n 2) 374, quoting an American dictionary to similar effect.

[74] As an example of the limits of 'ordinary meaning' for terms that have a jurisprudential history, one might try to argue that the ordinary meaning of 'attack' entails violence, but that argument would be overwhelmed by the long jurisprudential history of including non-violent forms of mistreatment.

[75] See supra, section 28.3.1.

[76] See e.g. Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court (1996) vol. I, UNGAOR, 51st Session (1996) Supp. No. 22 (A/51/22) paras 51–4; Von Hebel and Robinson (n 8) 91; Sadat (n 17) 372–3.

environment).[77] Second, Article 21 calls for consideration not only of treaties but also of 'principles and rules of international law', i.e. customary law.[78] As was shown in the previous section (28.4.1), the authorities show that policy may be implicit and can be inferred from the manner of commission of the acts.

Fourth, the object and purpose of the policy element also favours the standard interpretation. As was discussed in section 28.2, the purpose of the policy element is to exclude random, 'ordinary' crime, i.e. the crimes of diverse individuals acting on their own unconnected criminal designs. That purpose is fully served by the established features of the policy element. To inject additional requirements is to go beyond the purpose of the limitation and thus to undermine victim protection for no teleological reason. Nor does following the standard interpretation involve any violation of fundamental principles such as the principle of legality or culpability.

Note that I am not adopting a facile approach to teleological interpretation that assumes one single purpose (maximizing protection of victims), and then uses that presumed purpose to overrun every other interpretive guide.[79] Victim protection is of course a general purpose of the definition of crimes, but I am also grappling specifically with the purpose of the limitation (the policy element). Moreover, I am not arguing that the Court should ignore the authorities in order to better protect victims. On the contrary, I am arguing that the Court should follow the authorities, and that doing so is also supported by contextual and teleological considerations.

Fifth, the drafting history also supports the standard interpretation; however, it is unnecessary to have recourse to drafters' intent given the decisiveness of the foregoing considerations. The proposal introducing Article 7(2)(a) was accompanied by express quotes of the passages of Tadić and the ILC draft Code that highlighted the non-formality and inferability of the policy element, and the text footnoted directly to relevant paragraphs. At the Rome Conference, the policy element was quite controversial, particularly because of fears that ICC judges might over-interpret it, by equating 'policy' with 'systematic', by applying a formalistic/bureaucratic concept, or by requiring 'proof of secret plans'.[80] Delegations supporting the policy element repeatedly gave the assurance that it was a modest limitation and would not have these deleterious effects.[81] By requesting proof of internal plans, the Gbagbo Decision would bring about the scenario that no constituency wanted.

These issues were discussed again in the drafting of the Elements of Crimes. The draft Elements of Crimes at one point included a proviso that a policy may be inferred from the manner in which the acts occur, but this was removed on the grounds that it [77] ILC, 'Fragmentation of International Law: Difficulties Arising from the Diversification and Expansion of International Law. Report of the Study Group of the International Law Commission', UN Doc A/CN.4/L.682 (13 April 2006) paras 410–23, discussing Art 31(3)(c) of the VCLT and its role in reducing fragmentation.

[78] M deGuzman, 'Article 21' in Triffterrer, Commentary (n 4) 701, 707–8.

[79] D Robinson, 'The Identity Crisis of International Criminal Law' (2008) 21 Leiden Journal of International Law 925, 933–6.

[80] See Hwang (n 2) and DeGuzman, 'The Road from Rome' (n 2).

[81] The common ground between these two positions is that requiring proof of internal plans would be undesirable.

was unnecessary.[82] Similarly, the proposition that a policy need not be formally adopted 'was considered by the majority [of delegations] to be sufficiently well-established that it did not need to be repeated'.[83]

Thus, a 'drafters' intent' argument could be advanced to support the same conclusions. However, it is unnecessary to do so. Drafting history is only a subsidiary means of interpretation. In this case the 'drafters' intent' was merely that the ICC judges should follow the relevant authorities. That is already a basic principle of interpretation.

As a final observation, to require direct proof of adoption of a policy is also conceptually and practically undesirable. There is no normative reason to suggest that the law of crimes against humanity should only be concerned with organized atrocities if they are formally approved at the highest levels of an organization. The orderly, clinical vision of a formal policy being 'adopted' at specific meetings and then transmitted to implementers will often not correspond to how crimes against humanity are unleashed. When members of an organization start to direct or encourage crimes against a civilian population, they often do so in an organic, implicit, and evolving manner, and often deliberately avoid creating a record. Furthermore, the modern reality of crimes against humanity, which may involve different forms of human organization in different cultural contexts, cannot assume a bureaucratic organizational model.[84] The established features of the policy element in prior jurisprudence provide the appropriate flexibility.

28.4.3 Lessons from the Gbagbo adjournment Decision

The test for an 'attack' is not as difficult as some early ICC cases are making it. International and national courts have had little difficulty inferring policy from the circumstances surrounding crimes.[85] ICC jurisprudence should take cognizance of the well-established features of the policy element, which will conform to national and international jurisprudence, provide a coherent interpretation of Articles 7(1) and 7(2)(a), and fulfil the purpose of the policy element.

Policy can be inferred from the improbability of the competing hypothesis of coincidence, i.e. that all these crimes, committed by members of pro-Gbagbo forces against Gbagbo opponents, occurred without any state or organizational support or [82] R Lee et al. (eds), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 77. The provision was based on a proposal by Canada and Germany, which stated: 'The existence of a policy may be inferred on the basis of the available evidence as to the facts and circumstances. It is not necessary to prove that a policy has been formally adopted'. UN Doc PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.36 (23 November 1999).

[83] Lee (n 82) 77.

[84] For similar concerns see T Hansen, 'The Policy Requirement in Crimes against Humanity: Lessons from and for the Case of Kenya' (2011) 43 George Washington International Law Review 1, esp. 37; Jalloh (n 25).

[85] For some further illustrations of inference of policy from fact patterns, see Blaškić (n 14) paras 467–8; CDF case Appeal Judgment (n 60) para. 307; Sudrajat, Judgment, No. 11/PID.B/HAM.AD HOC/2002/PN.JKT.PST (HRCI, Dec. 27, 2002) (Indonesia); *B.*v Refugee Appeals Tribunal & Anor [2011] IEHC 198 (05 May 2011) (Ireland) paras 29–34; Attorney General v Tamil X [2010] NZSC 107; [2011] 1 NZLR 721 (27 August 2010) (New Zealand) para. 49; SRYYY v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [2006] AATA 320 (5 April 2006) (Administrative Appeals Tribunal of Australia) paras 100–7.

encouragement. Evidence of repeated attacks of significant scale by state forces and militia against supporters of a political rival, coupled with evidence of police participation and inaction, preparation for atrocities, public statements, prior warnings, and statements of perpetrators made during attacks, have been emphasized in national and international cases. Once 'multiple'[86] crimes have been proven as well as the policy element, the simple threshold for 'attack' under Article 7(2)(a) is met. Analysis must then move to the more exacting questions of whether the attack was 'widespread or systematic'.

28.5 Mbarushimana: Distracted by Ulterior Purposes?

Another example of a problematic approach to the policy element appears in the Mbarushimana case. Callixte Mbarushimana was a leader within the FDLR, an armed group in the DRC.[87] A majority of Pre-Trial Chamber I declined to confirm the charges against him.[88] The decision is best known for its interpretation of principles of liability under Article 25: the majority was not satisfied that the accused bore personal culpability under Article 25 for the war crimes carried out by FDLR troops.[89] More important for present purposes is the conclusion of the majority (with Presiding Judge Monageng dissenting) that crimes against humanity had not been established.[90] While the decision was in general well reasoned, I will outline here some problems with the majority's approach to the policy element.

The crimes against humanity charges were supported by evidence of a series of violent attacks by FDLR troops on villages, involving murder, rape, torture, and persecution of civilians. As in Gbagbo, the prosecutor did not merely rely on the manner of commission of the acts (from which other courts have inferred a policy). The prosecutor brought a range of direct and indirect evidence. Thus, evidence of policy included the scale and repetition of attacks on villages by FDLR troops; insider testimony from multiple witnesses attesting to orders to attack civilians; a copy of an alleged written order to attack civilians; a transcript of an alleged radio order; and a report of a Special Rapporteur on the strategy of attacking civilians.[91] The testimony of FDLR members described orders, inter alia, 'to carry out attacks that will make the civilian population suffer',[92] 'to burn houses of civilians',[93] to 'set fire to houses without regard for the civilians "because the civilians were our enemies as well" ',[94] 'to go in there and destroy everything',[95] and, that 'everything that has breath shouldn't be there at all', meaning that the place would have to be 'annihilate[d]'.[96]

[86] The term 'multiple' must be lower than 'widespread', not only to follow the ordinary meaning of the terms but also to follow the structure of Art 7. This chapter does not analyse the threshold for 'multiple', but an event involving several dozens of atrocities surely qualifies as 'multiple crimes.

[87] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 295. [88] Ibid.

[89] An appeal by the OTP, focusing on the assessment and evaluation of evidence, was dismissed by the Appeals Chamber. Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 16 December 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-514 OA 4, AC, ICC, 30 May 2012.

[90] At the confirmation stage, the requisite standard is 'substantial grounds to believe'.

[91] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 242–67. [92] Ibid., para. 248.

[93] Ibid., para. 250.

[94] Ibid., para. 254. [95] Ibid., para. 254. [96] Ibid., para. 253.

Notwithstanding this evidence, the majority was still not convinced of a policy to attack a civilian population.[97] As the following discussion will show, the majority had reasons for discounting some pieces of evidence, but nonetheless its approach was inappropriately stringent. First, its conclusions are incongruous with its own factual findings elsewhere in the decision, that the FDLR ordered and directed attacks on civilians. Second, the majority adopted an inexplicably rigorous approach to policy, assessing each piece of evidence of policy in isolation without considering the totality. Third, and most problematically, the majority focused on the ulterior purpose of the policy, and treated evidence that the FDLR deliberately targeted civilians for reasons such as vengeance or retaliation as incompatible with a policy.

28.5.1 Incongruity of legal conclusion and factual findings

The most disconcerting aspect of the decision is the incongruity of the conclusion that there was no 'attack directed against a civilian population' with the clear findings of fact made elsewhere in the same decision. For example, on its analysis of war crimes, the majority was satisfied > that the FDLR soldiers were directly ordered to take revenge on both civilians and soldiers, as the name of the operation, i.e. 'eye for eye', also suggests. The orders for the attack were clear: 'everything which has breath shouldn't be there at all'. Orders were given: 'destroy everything, because everybody who was considered as [their] enemy', 'we don't want to hear anything, anybody there, anything in Busurungi', and 'everything that moves should be killed'. The soldiers were then expected to kill anyone they met because the enemy had not shown any pity on them. They were also ordered to destroy everything in the village, and to 'annihilate the whole place…as a sign to…Congolese'.[98]

>
> …
>
> [T]he evidence demonstrates that…even after the FARDC and Mai Mai were chased away, civilians were killed by being directly fired upon, cut into pieces with hooks and machetes or burnt alive inside their homes. Witness 561 saw several corpses of civilians, including women and children. Witness 683 saw civilians being slaughtered and about forty dead bodies lying in the village; the burnt bodies were too many to count. Witness 562 saw civilians being killed with machetes or burned in houses after the Congolese soldiers had been chased away from the village…Witness 562…saw around thirty-five or forty corpses of civilians, including women and children, some of which were burnt, cut into pieces or with skulls broken…Witness 650 counted seventy-nine bodies of adults and children who had been burnt alive in their houses, had gunshot wounds or had been cut with machetes.[99]

These findings satisfy every aspect of Article 7(2)(a). As for a 'course of conduct involving multiple commission of acts referred to in paragraph 1', the Chamber found in various incidents that members of the FDLR troops carried out numerous acts of murder, rape, mutilation, and cruel treatment, among other crimes. As for a 'state or organizational policy to commit such attack', one could infer the policy from the repeated pattern of attacks on villages by FDLR forces, but it is not even necessary to do so, since the Chamber found that orders were issued to carry out the killings and attacks on civilians. Indeed, the Chamber specifically ascribed the attacks to the FDLR and held that the attacks were launched by the FDLR with the aim of targeting civilians.[100] A policy cannot be more clear.

[97] Ibid., paras 265–6. The decision is all the more striking given that the standard applicable at the confirmation stage is merely 'substantial grounds to believe'.

[98] Ibid., para. 144. [99] Ibid., para. 149.

The only way to explain this incongruity between the factual findings and the legal conclusion is that the majority must have perceived some unarticulated additional elements. There are two possibilities. One possibility is that the Mbarushimana majority was influenced by the popular understanding of 'policy' as requiring something more special, more formal, or more momentous than orders or direction, such as formal adoption at a high level (see section 28.2.3). This impression likely underlies the reasoning to some extent, because the Chamber's findings that the FDLR issued orders to kill civilians ought to have been paradigmatic proof of policy. The 'formalized policy' issue is analysed in section 28.4. The impression of policy as something special, formal, and stringent would also explain the majority's reticent approach and the conflict with its war crimes analysis. This reticence is discussed in the following section. The second possible explanation is the majority's preoccupation with the purpose of the policy. However, as I will argue in section 28.5.3, once it is shown that an organization is deliberately murdering civilians, it does not matter why the organization is doing so.

28.5.2 Reticence to find policy

As noted in the previous section, the majority found in its war crimes analysis that the FDLR had issued orders to attack civilians and carry out various atrocities, and that the FDLR directed attacks against a civilian population. Nonetheless, in its crimes against humanity analysis, the majority altered course and became much more reticent to find orders. The majority tended to look at each piece of evidence in isolation, finding each piece inadequate, without looking at all the evidence in its totality.

First, with respect to the insider statements testifying to orders to commit prohibited acts against civilians, the majority found that in many cases the statements only came after prompting from the investigator.[101] It is perfectly appropriate for a Pre-Trial Chamber to be vigilant about investigative practices and 'tunnel vision' and to discount evidence accordingly.[102] Nonetheless, as Judge Monageng argued in dissent, the witness evidence was still highly probative. The witnesses were not coached; once asked about orders, they freely furnished additional details, and the details were independently

[100] Ibid., para. 151.

[101] Ibid., paras 248, 251, 255, and 257.

[102] Of course, investigators must be able to steer discussion towards the presence or absence of particular elements of crime pertinent to a particular case. It seems that the majority was concerned that some investigators were asking questions in an aggressive style that did not reflect the principle of objectivity. Ibid., para. 51, and see also Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the "Decision corroborating.[103] Moreover, the majority had already found, in its war crimes analysis, that the FDLR had indeed issued orders to attack civilians and was directing attacks on civilian populations.

Second, a written transcript of orders 'to attack civilian populations and hospitals', reported by a member of the UN Group of Experts as read out by the radio operator, was regarded by the majority as indirect and insufficient evidence.[104] Such evidence is indeed indirect, and would be insufficient on its own. However, if assessed along with the totality of the evidence, it was further confirmation that the crimes were not spontaneous criminal initiatives of individuals.

Third, the majority found that a series of incidents and attacks by the FDLR against civilians was not a sufficient pattern to show a policy.[105] The majority was convinced of only 5 of the 25 incidents alleged by OTP, which left it with 5 incidents over a 6-month period. One could quite defensibly argue that five incidents over six months is insufficient to infer a policy, because such a pattern could also be consistent with an organization making diligent efforts to restrain crimes, which might be the spontaneous acts of a few 'bad apples'. However, such a position becomes unsustainable in the light of the majority's earlier finding that there were orders to commit the crimes.

Fourth, a report by Philip Alston, Special Rapporteur on Extra-Judicial Executions, on FDLR's strategy of deliberately attacking civilians, was further corroborating evidence. Nonetheless it was also dismissed, because '[a]t best, this report stresses that the FDLR campaign was directed towards the intimidation of and exaction of revenge on those civilians accused of supporting [the opposing side]'.[106] As will be discussed, this fits within a problematic theme of the decision, of focusing on the purpose behind the policy of the killing, and regarding a purpose of intimidation or revenge as negating the policy element.

Fifth, the majority gave great weight to formal instructions within the FDLR not to commit crimes.[107] Such instructions are certainly relevant and should be taken into account. They may indicate an organization making diligent efforts to restrain crime. However, such instructions per se are not incompatible with a criminal policy.[108] It is perfectly common for officials and organizations to proclaim a liability-averting policy for purposes of deniability, while actually carrying out a different policy. Other courts have had little difficulty disentangling ostensible policies against crime from the actual, implicit policies to commit crime.[109] on the Confirmation of Charges"', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-487, PTC I, ICC, 1 March 2012, para. 33. The majority is right to be alert to possible 'tunnel vision'. It could, however, also be said that interviewers are not required to take all statements at face value and must be able to probe witness responses and to test their credibility and testimonial factors, provided it is done in the spirit of objectivity.

[103] Dissenting opinion of Judge Sanji Mmasenono Monageng, Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1), paras 2–18.

[104] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) para. 260. [105] Ibid., para. 261.

[106] Ibid., para. 262. [107] Ibid., paras 248, 249, 250, 251, 255, 256, and 258.

[108] On this point see, Dissenting opinion of Judge Sanji Mmasenono Monageng (n 103) paras 11 and 14–16 (such directives ignored and circumvented, absence of enquiries despite notorious crimes).

[109] See e.g. Judgment, Sesay, Kallon and Gbao (RUF Case), SCSL-04-15-A, AC, SCSL, 26 October 2009, para. 723, finding declared norms of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) prohibiting rape,

The accumulation shows an unusual reluctance to declare that there was a policy. In this case, the hypothesis that the FDLR massacres were spontaneous crimes of individual members of the FDLR, acting on their own unprompted initiatives, is utterly implausible. Indeed, the Chamber found that the atrocities were ordered and directed by the FDLR.

28.5.3 The distraction of ulterior purpose

The best explanation for the majority's negative conclusion seems to be its concern with the ulterior purpose for the attacks on civilians. In presenting its case, the prosecution said that the policy of attacking civilians aimed to 'create a humanitarian catastrophe'.[110] Interestingly, wherever the majority found that the FDLR directed atrocities against civilians for other purposes, these were treated as discrepancies undermining the inference of policy. Other FDLR purposes identified by the majority included (1) attacks on civilians for revenge or retaliation, (2) attacks to make the civilian population leave the region, or (3) the legally erroneous position of the FDLR that civilians supportive of the enemy could be targeted.[111]

However, these other purposes do not undermine the policy element. Why the FDLR was deliberately murdering civilians is beside the point. When a state or organization orchestrates the mass murder of civilians, whether it be for revenge or intimidation or because they are affiliated with the opposing side, it is still a crime against humanity. On any of those variations, it was not random individual crime but rather atrocities directed or encouraged by an organization, thus satisfying the basic associative element reflected in the policy element. The ulterior purpose of the massacres does not matter; the law of crimes against humanity prohibits the means used (e.g. murder, rape, torture of civilians) and not the ends pursued. Having found that the FDLR was deliberately directing attacks against the civilian population, the majority had already made the findings needed for policy and for attack.

It is hard to discern why the majority felt that other purposes undermined the policy element. It may be because the prosecution referred to the organization's aim of 'creating a humanitarian catastrophe'. However, the task of the chamber is to assess whether the legal elements (in this case, the policy element) are proved to the requisite standard. It may be because the majority thought there should be a 'pure' purpose: a single unifying aim beneath the policy. However, a diversity of purposes does not undermine the fact that the FDLR had a policy of murdering civilians. It may be that the majority thought that purposes such as revenge or intimidation or the incorrect belief that civilians may be targeted are incompatible with crimes against humanity.[112] unauthorized looting, killings, or molestation to be 'a mere farce intended to camouflage' the planned atrocities. See also SRYYY v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs (n 85) para. 116.

[110] Mbarushimana Confirmation Decision (n 1) paras 243, 245, and 246.

[111] Ibid., paras 250–1 and 254. The majority found that crimes against civilians were 'mostly carried out in retaliation' for attacks by the other side or were 'launched with the aim of targeting both military objectives … and the civilian population … who were perceived as supporting the [opposing side]'. Ibid., para. 265.

[112] Dissenting opinion of Judge Sanji Mmasenono Monageng (n 103) para. 17 (arguing that the motive of retaliation does not alter the fact that the policy was to attack civilians).

If the judges were thinking the latter, the decision seems to reflect the growing incursion of 'purpose' or 'grounds' of selection of victims into crimes against humanity, which was touched on earlier.[113] Perhaps intellectual contamination from genocide analysis is spilling over into crimes against humanity analysis. In genocide, purpose does matter: there must be a special intent to destroy one of four groups as such. As a result, even where there is deliberate killing of civilians, a dispute can arise whether it flowed from genocidal intent or from some other purpose. It may sometimes be an answer to a genocide charge to say that one was 'merely' murdering political opponents or attacking resistance sympathizers or killing out of vengeance. But such claims are no answer to a crime against humanity charge.

Transplanting the special intent/specific grounds approach of genocide into crimes against humanity produces strange results. For example, Bowoto v Chevron, a US case, held that there was no crime against humanity, inter alia, since victims were targeted 'because they were oil protestors'[114] and not 'simply because they were civilians'.[115] But that type of specific intent is neither in law nor in theory a part of crimes against humanity. It would be exceedingly rare for anyone to attack civilians 'because they are civilians'. People coordinate, through states and organizations, to attack civilian populations for a variety of reasons. When they do, the law of crimes against humanity is engaged.

28.5.4 Lessons from Mbarushimana

In the Mbarushimana case, a range of evidence was offered showing that the FDLR deliberately directed attacks against civilian populations on a significant scale. The majority declined to find a policy element, which is at odds with its own findings that the FDLR ordered repeated atrocities against civilian villages. The majority's reticent approach departed from the authorities that policy can be inferred from the non-random manner in which the acts occur. The majority's conclusion that the massacres were not part of a policy because they were for purposes of revenge or intimidation, or because of the victims' perceived support for the other side, is particularly distressing. Such purposes in no way undermine the FDLR policy to attack civilian populations. The majority's findings easily satisfied the basic requirements of Article 7(2)(a). Analysis should have moved on to the next step, of whether the attack was 'widespread or systematic'.

28.6 Conclusion and Proposal for Reform

Early ICC jurisprudence shows some disturbing tendencies to infuse the policy element with requirements that are not required by the authorities, nor by theory of the crime, nor by fundamental principles of justice, nor by an appropriate delimitation of international jurisdiction. Some decisions draw from stray strands of jurisprudence on slightly different concepts. Some decisions seem to be inadvertently creating new formidable hurdles with a few casual strokes of the pen. Some decisions seem to be assuming and imposing idealized conceptions of the policy element, which will exclude many actual cases of crimes against humanity. Problems include conflating 'policy' with 'systematic', requiring direct proof of formal adoption and internal meetings, and getting distracted by ulterior purposes.

[113] Supra, section 28.3.2.

[114] Bowoto v Chevron Corporation, 2007 US Dist. LEXIS 59374 (US District Court, Northern California) 31–2.

[115] Ibid., 32.

If these jurisprudential threads go uncorrected, they will make the ICC a uniquely unsuitable forum for crimes against humanity cases. Some chambers have been unable to detect a policy despite being presented with a comparative wealth of evidence. In order to maintain the viability of the ICC as a forum for crimes against humanity cases, its jurisprudence must urgently take deeper cognizance of the authorities on the policy element, the purpose of the element, and the interplay of Article 7(1) (high threshold) and Article 7(2)(a) (moderate threshold).

The optimal solution would be for these matters to be judicially corrected and clarified through the Court's jurisprudence.[116] Recent trends, after the drafting of this chapter and scholarly voices raising concerns,[117] are encouraging. The recent decision in Katanga, the Court's second-ever conviction, is a most welcome development. Trial Chamber II set out the distinct steps of a crime against humanity analysis with masterful clarity.[118] The Katanga Decision rightly distinguishes 'attack' from 'widespread or systematic', and therefore also distinguishes 'policy' from 'systematic'. The decision notes that policy need not be formalized and can unfold organically, and can be inferred from circumstances. Equally encouragingly, the Pre-Trial Chamber in Gbagbo has confirmed the charges and issued new and admirably clear guidance on crimes against humanity.[119] The Chamber held that 'policy' is a lesser threshold than 'systematic', that policy excludes spontaneous or isolated acts, that proof of planning is relevant but not necessary, and that policy need not reflect a unified purpose or motive.[120] One hopes that these decisions will start to shift away from early idiosyncratic ICC interpretations and towards conformity with global jurisprudence.

An alternative solution would be to amend the Elements of Crimes to expressly affirm the established features of the policy element. Such clarifications were considered during the original drafting of the Elements, and were excluded because they [116] The Appeals Chamber did not address the Art 7 issue in the Mbarushimana appeal (n 89), nor in the appeal of the Gbagbo decision (Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 3 June 2013 entitled 'Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute', Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-572 OA5, AC, ICC, 16 December 2013).

[117] See e.g. Sadat (n 17), as well as an amicus brief by this author, Margaret deGuzman, Charles Jalloh, and Robert Cryer: Amicus Curiae Observations of Professors Robinson, deGuzman, Jalloh and Cryer, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-534, 9 October 2013.

[118] Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014, esp. paras 1094–116.

[119] Decision on the confirmation of charges against Laurent Gbagbo, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11, PTC-I, 12 June 2014. Judge Kaul joined Judge Fernández de Gurmendi to form the majority.

[120] Ibid., paras 207–18.

were thought unnecessary.[121] The Elements can provide a valuable opportunity for 'dialogue' between the judiciary and the quasi-legislative branch. Of course, the judges have the final say,[122] but a provision would help rebut arguments based on overestimations of the conservatism of drafters or States Parties. At present, the best solution would be correction within the Court's jurisprudence, with the newer trends taking root, forming an approach that is well grounded in law and principle, and effective in practice.

[121] Lee (n 82) 77.

[122] If a provision in the Elements is irreconcilable with their interpretation of the Statute, then the Statute prevails.

29

Charging War Crimes

Policy and Prognosis from a Military Perspective

*Michael A. Newton

29.1 Introduction

This chapter highlights the import of the war crimes provisions found in Article 8 of the Rome Statute[1] and describes the correlative considerations related to charging practices for the maturing institution. The expansion of the articulated war crimes in the context of both international armed conflicts (Article 8(2)(b)) and armed conflicts not of an international character (Article 8(2)(e)) culminated an evolution in the laws and customs of war. At the same time, the text of Article 8 should not be understood either as a rejection of prior practice or an evisceration of the core precepts that were widely accepted prior to 1998. When properly understood and applied in light of the Elements of Crimes, the Court's charging decisions with respect to the war crimes

* Professor of the Practice of Law, Vanderbilt University—Law School (mike.newton@vanderbilt.edu).

[1] Art 8 Rome Statute of the ICC (adopted 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('Rome Statute'). The extension of potentially unchecked international prosecutorial and judicial power over sovereign concerns is one of the primary reasons the United States was originally unwilling to go forward with the Rome Statute 'in its present form'. D Scheffer, 'The United States and the International Criminal Court' (1999) 93 American Journal of International Law 14, 21. On 31 December 2000, which was the last day permitted by the treaty, Ambassador Scheffer signed the Rome Statute at the direction of President Clinton. See Art 125(1) Rome Statute (stipulating that states may accede to the Statute at a later time, but that signature was permissible only until 31 December 2000). The White House statement clarified that President Clinton ordered the signature because the United States seeks to 'remain engaged in making the ICC an instrument of impartial and effective justice in the years to come', and reaffirmed America's 'strong support for international accountability'. 'Statement on the Rome Treaty on the International Criminal Court (31 December 2000)' (2001) 37 Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents 4, reprinted in S Cummins and D Stewart (eds), Digest of United States Practice in International Law (Washington, D.C.: International Law Institute Publishing Office 2000) 272 <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/139599.pdf> accessed 10 June 2014. Nevertheless, the President's statement made clear that he would 'not recommend that my successor submit the treaty to the Senate for ratification until our fundamental concerns are satisfied', ibid. In its operative paragraph, President Clinton, wrote that:

> In signing, however, we are not abandoning our concerns about significant flaws in the Treaty. In particular, we are concerned that when the Court comes into existence, it will not only exercise authority over personnel of States that have ratified the treaty, but also claim jurisdiction over personnel of States that have not. With signature, however, we will be in a position to influence the evolution of the Court. Without signature, we will not. Signature will enhance our ability to further protect U.S. officials from unfounded charges and to achieve the human rights and accountability objectives of the ICC. In fact, in negotiations following the Rome Conference, we have worked effectively to develop procedures that limit the likelihood of politicized prosecutions. For example, U.S. civilian and military negotiators helped to ensure greater precision in the definitions of crimes within the Court's jurisdiction.

found in Article 8 ought to reflect the paradox that its operative provisions are at once revolutionary yet broadly reflective of the actual practice of warfare. The text of Article 8 in essence baked in a complex commingling of lex lata hard law and established state practice, as informed by the much more diffuse expectations and assessments of expert practitioners. The intentional integration of hard and soft law within the structure of Article 8 is unique and, it must be noted, ubiquitous in its fabric.

The Rome Statute was designed to largely align criminal norms with actual state practice based in the realities of warfare. As the ICC (the Court) enters a second decade of actuality it faces challenges that continue to foster controversy and drive dramatic change associated with its emerging prerogatives and practices. The sustainability and long-term credibility of the Court depends in large measure upon cooperative synergy with domestic jurisdictions, both States Parties and other states. In particular, the relationship to be forged between the Court and military organizations around the world may well be the fulcrum from which its longer-term legitimacy derives. As Albert Einstein observed, '[i]n theory, theory and practice are the same. In practice, they are not'. Even as Article 8 embodied notable new refinements, the Rome Statute made such sweeping legal advances against a backdrop of pragmatic military practice. This chapter will dissect the structure of the Statute to demonstrate this deliberate intention of Article 8. The logical conclusion is that the carefully constructed Statute will have been effectively abandoned if the Court habitually overrides the permissible discretion of domestic officials by displacing the proper authority of responsible military commanders based on its own preferences or the expediency of political considerations. To be more precise, judicially superimposed preferences would effectively amend the Rome Statute contrary to the intentions of the States Parties. Furthermore, imposing judicial or prosecutorial preferences to the detriment of lawful command latitude in the field would undercut the premise of the admissibility concept in practice.

This chapter discusses the subtleties of the Rome Statute structure insofar as they facilitate a harmonious balance between the prerogatives of responsible military commanders and the vitally important role of the Court in prosecuting perpetrators of war crimes. The charging policies of the Court and its role in strengthening compliance with the fabric of the laws and customs of armed conflict must serve this end irrespective of the nature of the conflict or the identities of the warring parties. Article 21 stipulates that the Court 'shall' apply the Elements of Crimes that accompany each and every offence found in Article 8 with the precise evidence that the prosecutor must prove beyond a reasonable doubt in that order—conduct, consequences, circumstances. To be sure, the lex specialis of the Elements of Crimes is reflected in Article 9, which states merely that the Elements 'shall assist' the Court. Nevertheless, a holistic understanding of the crimes specified in Article 8 as amplified by the Elements of Crimes is the only pathway towards authoritative implementation of the text. The judges and prosecutor cannot minimize the importance of the Elements of Crimes because they represent the consensus agreements of all nations, both States Parties and non-States Parties, dating to 30 June 2000.

As the pattern of cases develops in the coming years, the Court would be well served to assess the range of potentially chargeable conduct in light of the optimal synergy between reinforcing military professionalism and the punishment of any perpetrator found to have committed the prohibited actus reus when influenced by criminal mens rea and under the circumstances prescribed by law. Section 29.2 of this chapter examines the explicitly permissive aspects of the laws and customs of war, while section 29.3 details the conformity of the Rome Statute and its constituent Elements of Crimes within that basic framework. Section 29.4 builds on these foundational principles to identify some of the most important consequences of the design of the Rome Statute. This chapter proffers a series of specific recommendations that should guide prosecutorial discretion in charging decisions as well as the range of judicial decision-making. To wit, section 29.4 of this chapter explains how the Court should 1) recognize the principle of the jurisdictional floor for war crimes charging that is embedded in the Rome Statute, 2) understand the implications of the Status of Forces agreements widely employed in international military operations, and 3) respect and reinforce the rationale behind the principles embedded in Article 28.

29.2 The Underlying Permissiveness of the jus in bello Regime

Over time, the laws of warfare have become the lodestone of professionalism and the guiding point for professional military forces the world over. The law of armed conflict (jus in bello) is the gold standard separating trained and disciplined professionals from a lawless rabble. It cannot be overemphasized that the laws and customs of warfare balance humanitarian objectives with the perfectly legitimate need to accomplish the mission. The law explicitly embeds the latitude for military commanders and lawyers alike to balance the requirements of the mission against the humanitarian imperative of the law itself. Thus, the grundnorm for the entire scope of the 'laws and customs applicable in armed conflicts' (to use the language of Article 8) is to build a careful balance between the ability of practitioners to lawfully accomplish the military mission and the need to respect to the greatest degree possible the enduring value of humanitarian considerations. Michael Waltzer is entirely correct in the conclusion that belligerent armies are 'not entitled to do anything that is or seems to them necessary to win wars. They are subject to a set of restrictions that rest in part on the agreements of states but that also have an independent foundation in moral principle'.[2] Restraint during the conduct of hostilities helps to preserve the humanity of the war-fighter even as it helps to minimize unavoidable civilian suffering and damage. Conversely, compliance with the legal and moral imperatives for waging war determines the dividing line between pride in one's service and shame that cannot be discarded like a dirty uniform. This subtle need to protect the humanity of the war-fighter was epitomized by a photograph of an American Marine in the middle of the combat zone that appeared during the early phases of the coalition drive to Baghdad in early 2003. The Marine is shown holding up a notarized letter directing him to report at a specific date and time for jury duty, and is grinning at the stark reality that the grinding normality of life in a combat zone might as well be occurring in a parallel universe from the normality of life at home.

[2] M Walzer, Just and Unjust Wars: A Moral Argument with Historical Illustrations (New York: Basic Books 1977) 131.

This reality provides one of the most foundational and enduring rationales for the body of jus in bello as it has developed over the past 150 years. In his revolutionary code of 1863, Francis Lieber stated this idea as follows: 'Men who take up arms against one another in public war do not cease on this account to be moral beings, responsible to one another and to God'.[3] In his classic text Nuremberg and Vietnam: An American Tragedy, Telford Taylor observed that participants in armed conflicts must retain a sense of honour in the midst of horrific warfare by retaining 'such respect for the value of life that unnecessary death and destruction will continue to repel them', otherwise 'they may lose the sense for that distinction for the rest of their lives'.[4] Consequently, every military expert that I know fully supports the early practice of the Court[5] in charging perpetrators for the war crime of 'conscripting or enlisting children under the age of fifteen years' into armed forces 'or using them to participate actively in hostilities' (Articles 8(2)(b)(xxvi) for international armed conflicts and 8(2)(e)(vii) for non-international conflicts). War-fighters must develop an inculcated climate of discipline to hone combat effectiveness with the result that the force has confidence in the command. The goal is to win the war as quickly as possible with the fewest casualties as possible and the most favourable peace terms that lead to a sustainable peace. This tenet helps explain why the law of occupation has never conveyed a carte blanche authority to an Occupying Power to exercise unlimited discretion over the civilians within the previously hostile territory.[6] As one distinguished scholar[7] observed to me in conversation, Hague law begins with the military mission and tempers the unfettered discretion of war-fighters based upon humanitarian considerations, whilst the body of Geneva law begins with humanitarian principles which are constrained due to the necessities of the military mission. Close examination of the Rome Statute and its constituent elements of crimes reveals that the intent of the drafters was to build upon this baseline of lex lata rather than obliterate pre-existing legal precepts and to replace them whole cloth with treaty-based constraints.

For our purposes, it is important to realize that each and every specific crime in Article 8 of the Rome Statute (which deals with the range of war crimes committed

[3] See F Lieber, Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field (originally issued as General Orders No. 100, Adjutant General's Office, 1863; Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office 1898) ('Lieber Code'), reprinted in D Schindler and J Toman (eds) The Laws of Armed Conflicts: A Collection of Conventions, Resolutions, and Other Documents (Dordrecht: Martinus Nijhoff 1988) 6, Art 15.

[4] T Taylor, 'War Crimes' in M Wakin (ed.), War, Morality and the Military Profession (Boulder: Westview Press 1986) 378.

[5] ICC website, Situations and Cases, Situation in Uganda <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/situations%20and%20cases/situations/situation%20icc%200204/related%20cases/icc%200204%200105/Pages/uganda.aspx> accessed 10 June 2014.

[6] In 2012 the ICRC completed an extensive set of discussions among experts regarding the proper latitude enjoyed by an occupying power during its temporary authority, see ICRC, 'Occupation and Other Forms of Administration of Foreign Territory' (report prepared and edited by Tristan Ferraro, 2012) <http://lgdata.s3-website-us-east-1.amazonaws.com/docs/905/474159/ICRC_expert_meeting_-_occupation.pdf> accessed 10 June 2014.

[7] Charles Garraway.

both in international and in non-international armed conflicts) requires the prosecutor to prove that the charged act was committed 'in the context of and associated with' the armed conflict. This element reflects the moral truism that the lex lata application of jus in bello norms is independent from the overarching jus ad bellum norms. All participants in armed conflict are equal before the law. In this way, even the most unlawful act of aggression that marks the onset of armed conflict operates to convey the entire range of rights, benefits, and obligations drawn from the laws and customs of warfare onto every participant in that conflict. The principled application of jus in bello concepts by the Court in all types of armed conflict as envisioned in Article 8 has the broadest support among professional military forces, because the enforcement of the laws and customs of warfare can only enhance a reciprocal recognition of the need for law and its integral relationship to military discipline. The second circumstantial element that is embedded in every Article 8 offence logically follows; the prosecutor need not prove that the perpetrator made any specific legal conclusion about the nature of the conflict. Sufficient evidence of war crimes depends upon showing that 'the perpetrator was aware of factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict'. In other words, there is a fundamental due process right that convictions only be grounded in the perpetrator's knowledge that the jus in bello is applicable and should provide the signposts for acceptable conduct. The factual awareness of the perpetrators that the laws and customs of warfare apply derives from notions of notice and fundamental fairness.

The vitally important point for jurists and practitioners to grasp is that jus in bello is properly understood as being permissive by its express terms insofar as it defines the limits of lawful authority rather than operating as an affirmative grant of authority. The permissive nature of the legal regime applicable during armed conflicts is inextricably woven into the very fabric of such conflicts. Whereas the human rights regime restricts lethal force to those circumstances where such force is absolutely necessary as a last resort in order to protect life, jus in bello permits such force whenever it is reasonably related to an acceptable military purpose; in the language of Protocol I, whenever such force is tailored to achieve a 'concrete and direct military advantage'.[8] By contrast, lethal force in armed conflicts is presumed to be permissible whenever reasonably necessary to achieve a military objective absent evidence of some prohibited purpose or unlawful tactic.[9] As early as 1863, this permissiveness was expressed in Article 14 of the Lieber Code as follows: 'Military necessity, as understood by modern civilized nations, consists of the necessity of those measures which are indispensable for securing the ends of the war, and which are lawful according to the modern law and usages of war'.[10] The human rights regime requires a statement of affirmative authority while jus in bello operates on a permissive basis subject to express limitations. As an [8] Arts 51(5)(b) and 57(2)(b) Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (signed 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 3 ('Protocol I').

[9] N Meltzer, 'Targeted Killing or Less Harmful Means? Israel's High Court Judgment on Targeted Killing and the Restrictive Function of Military Necessity' (2006) 9 Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law 109.

[10] Art 14 Lieber Code (n 3).

additive requirement, lethal force under the human rights paradigm must be proportionate to the immediate context, meaning that the force used is directly proportionate to the risk posed by the individual at the moment force is employed. In the express language of Article 8(2)(b)(iv), jus in bello proportionality by definition and accepted state practice will very likely depend upon the broader contextual set of aggregate circumstances, which in turn inform the commander's assessment of the 'overall military advantage anticipated'.

This permissive jus in bello framing empowers those in the vortex of battle to balance the legitimate military needs against larger humanitarian imperatives. Thus, 'every single norm' within the laws and customs of armed conflict operates in the memorable framing of Yoram Dinstein as 'a parallelogram of forces; it confronts an inveterate tension between the demands of military necessity and humanitarian considerations, working out a compromise formula'.[11] To be clear, jus in bello is not designed to be infinitely malleable based on the individualized will of combatants. The actions of all participants in armed conflict are constrained by considerations of lawfulness based on their relation to the conflict. The proper balance is intentionally integrated into the law itself. Individual participants cannot lawfully inject an individualized rationalization for ignoring jus in bello because doing so might permit some degree of differentiation that would erode the humanitarian objectives of the law itself. In the context of armed conflicts proportionality operates as a single principle with little variation. Otherwise, proportionality and military necessity would become interlinked and unstoppable considerations that 'would reduce the entire body of the laws of war to a code of military convenience'.[12] Thus, there is no micro-analysis of the particularized circumstances related to the relationship of the relevant actors when applying the jus in bello either in the heat of battle or retrospectively in the course of criminal prosecution or disciplinary investigation and/or criminal prosecution. In other words, there can lawfully be no rationalization for failure to comply with the laws and customs of war, hence there is no recognized defence of military necessity unless the act comports with the actor's larger jus in bello obligations.

On the other hand, the Court (here I use the collective to refer to jurists, defence counsel, and members of the OTP) cannot forget for one moment that although jus in bello contains numerous express prohibitions subject to no caveats, combatants properly exercise what the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has labelled a 'fairly broad margin of judgment'.[13] Therein lies the completely appropriate and distinctive permissiveness of the laws and customs of armed conflict. For example, medical care is due to those in military custody only 'to the fullest extent practicable and with the least possible delay'.[14] Other obligations are often couched in aspirational [11] Y Dinstein, The Conduct of Hostilities under the Law of International Armed Conflict 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010) 5.

[12] L Green, The Contemporary Law of Armed Conflict 3rd edn (Manchester: Manchester University Press 2008) 353.

[13] Sandoz et al. (eds), Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Geneva: Martinus Nijhoff 1987) Art 57, para. 2187 ('Commentary on the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions').

[14] Art 10(2) Protocol I (n 8).

terms such as 'whenever possible'[15] or 'as widely as possible'.[16] Still more duties are couched in less than strident terms such as 'shall endeavor'[17] or the duty to 'take all practical precautions'.[18] There are also numerous express exceptions permitted for reasons of 'imperative military necessity'.[19] For the purposes of the war crime in Article 8(2)(b)(iv) of intentionally directing an attack in the knowledge that it would likely inflict disproportionate damage, the most relevant permissive duties incumbent on those who order military strikes require them to 'do everything feasible to verify that the objectives to be attacked are neither civilians nor civilian objects'[20] and 'take all feasible precautions in the choice of means and methods of attack with a view to avoiding, and in any event to minimizing, incidental loss of civilian life, injury to civilians and damage to civilian objects'.[21] Jurists and prosecutors absolutely must realize that the evaluation of the actus reus under Article 8(2)(b)(iv) cannot be made in isolation from these collateral duties of the commander, notwithstanding the fact that they are nowhere specifically referenced in the Rome Statute. Even in that evaluation, it is important to note that the benchmark for what is 'feasible' is measured from the reasonable war-fighter's point of view. As a logical extension, 'effective advance warning shall be given of attacks which may affect the civilian population, unless circumstances do not permit' (emphasis added).[22] The vital point is that the parallel duties incumbent on the commander are to be drawn from the larger jus in bello and need not be restated within the contours of Article 8 itself. The commander's actions 'must be made in good faith and in view of all information that can be said to be reasonably available in the specific situation' according to the ICRC.[23]

As the next section will recount in some detail, the text of the Rome Statute implicitly imports all of these permissive aspects of the jus in bello regime, even as it expressly adds some additional charging considerations. Within the realm of charging and prosecuting war crimes, then, modern international criminal law expressly preserves broad discretionary authority. Rather than serving as a necessary basis for a positive articulation of lawful force as an exception to the norm, jus in bello delineates the outer boundaries of the commander's appropriate discretion. Aharon Barak of the Israeli Supreme Court summarized this aspect of the lex specialis perfectly with respect to the principle of proportionality as embedded in Article 8(2)(b)(iv); his thoughts provide a perfect segue to the considerations of the structure of the crimes

[15] Art 12(4) Protocol I (n 8). [16] Art 83(1) Protocol I (n 8). [17] Art 77(3) Protocol I (n 8).
[18] Art 56(3) Protocol I (n 8). [19] Art 55(5) Protocol I (n 8).
[20] Art 57(2)(a)(i) Protocol I (n 8). The expression 'feasible' is variously translated in French as 'pratique' (Art 56), 'pratiquement possible', or 'possible dans la pratique' (Arts 57, 58, 78, and 86) and 'utile' (Art 41), which in English also appears as 'practical' (Art 56(3)).
[21] Art 57(2)(a)(ii) Protocol I (n 8). The United Kingdom, for example, declared on signing the Protocol that the word '"feasible" means that which is practicable or practically possible, taking into account all circumstances at the time including those relevant to the success of military operations…'. In response to ICRC concerns, this was modified to read as follows: 'The United Kingdom understands the term "feasible" as used in the Protocol to mean that which is practicable or practically possible, taking into account all circumstances ruling at the time, including humanitarian and military considerations'.
[22] Art 57(2)(c) Protocol I (n 8).
[23] ICRC, Interpretive Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law <http://www.icrc.org/eng/assets/files/other/icrc-002-0990.pdf> accessed 15 June 2014, at 75.

articulated in Article 8 and their constituent Elements of Crimes to be detailed in the next section of this chapter:

> The court will ask itself only if a reasonable military commander could have made the decision that was made. If the answer is yes, the court will not override the military commander's security discretion within the security discretion of the court. Judicial review regarding military measures to be taken is within the regular review of reasonableness. True, 'military discretion' and 'state security' are not magic words that dismiss judicial review. However, the question is not what I would decide under the given circumstances, but rather whether the decision that the military commander made is a decision that a reasonable military commander is permitted to make. In that realm, special weight is to be granted to the military opinion of the official who bear responsibility for security. . . . Who decides on proportionality? Is it a military decision to be left to the reasonable application of the military, or a legal decision within the purview of the judiciary? Our answer is that the proportionality of military means used to fight terror is a legal question to be left to the judiciary. . . . Proportionality is not an exact science; at times there are a number of ways to fulfill its conditions so that a zone of proportionality is created; it is the boundaries of that zone that the court guards.[24]

29.3 Understanding the Underlying Structure of Article 8

29.3.1 The authoritative backdrop of jus in bello

The structure of Article 8 and its accompanying Elements of Crimes was intentionally designed to comport with the historical understandings embedded in established jus in bello. To this end, practitioners in the Court make charging decisions as informed by three time-tested considerations that mandate the unique nature of the jus in bello regime. In the first place, jus in bello is only properly applied depending on the larger context of armed conflict. This is at the heart of the ICJ characterization of the laws and customs of warfare as lex specialis. In other words, the precepts that flow from the laws and customs of warfare provide the evaluative basis for all actions undertaken when that body of law is applicable. The main question, then, does not deal with the particularities of the relationship between actors, but with the hierarchy of the choice of law rules. That is why it is intellectually indefensible to limit the use of force in a particular combat engagement to the degree of force used by the enemy. Second, jus in bello was not designed or intended to generate symmetry between the warring parties, nor to artificially inject equity into the midst of armed conflict. The asymmetric nature of modern conflicts does not require a wholly new jus in bello proportionality application because the law itself contemplates a disparity of combat power and in no way mandates some form of equity as in other areas of international law. Finally, as noted previously, the fundamentally permissive nature of jus in bello simultaneously empowers and obligates war-fighters to operate within a zone of reasonable discretion in order to achieve the essential purposes of jus in bello. The Court does not superimpose its own discretion so much as the judicial process ensures that the zone of authority is enforced appropriately.

[24] Aharon Barak, President (ret'd) Supreme Court of Israel, Address at the Jim Shasha Center of Strategic Studies of the Federmann School for Public Policy and Government of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (18 December 2007).

This framework of established jus in bello drawn from both specific treaty principles and the larger context of state practice is repeatedly referenced in the Rome Statute as 'the laws and customs of war applicable in armed conflict…within the established framework of international law'. Practitioners must recall that this same breadth of application is specifically made in both 'international armed conflict' (Article 8(2)(b)) and 'armed conflict not of an international character' (Article 8(2)(e)). Even this framing follows the categorization of conflicts established in the Geneva Conventions of 1949 because it replicates the odd but long-accepted formulation of Common Article 3, which of course is included verbatim in the Rome Statute as Article 8(2)(c). Indeed, it is worth recalling that many of the specific crimes found in Article 8 draw from the text of existing treaties while some are sui generis. Thus, Article 21(1)(b) is logically consistent and entirely predictable when it expressly mandates the Court to apply 'where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict'. When the lex specialis law of armed conflict is applicable, as it must of necessity be in the context of any prosecution under Article 8, persons who violate its precepts are individually responsible for each and every violation and accordingly liable for punishment in the appropriate criminal forum. The authority of the Court extends only insofar as its decision-making remains consonant to the larger context of the lex specialis because the laws and customs of armed conflict provide the determinative criteria for decision-making.

Furthermore, Article 22(2) mandates that the principle of strict construction is specifically included in the Court's interpretation of the substantive offences of Article 8. The text reads as follows: 'The definition of a crime shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy. In case of ambiguity, the definition shall be interpreted in favour of the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted'. This subparagraph is notable for its inclusion in the Rome Statute as an innovation over pre-existing tribunal models. This canon of strict construction operates to the benefit of an accused insofar as ambiguity is to be resolved in such a manner as to prevent the imposition of criminal liability where there is doubt about the appropriate meaning of a particular provision of Article 8. The principle of in dubio pro reo operates to protect fundamental due process on its face.[25] However, for our purposes, it is important because it implicitly draws upon and implements the broader framework of treaty law and state practice with respect to the conduct of hostilities. In fact, the strict constructionist principle of Article 22(2) could be read as one of the most express limitations on the overarching authority of the Court because the body of war crimes law is widely developed both in theory and practice. This requirement is the only concrete attempt in the Statute to limit the Court's interpretive authority, and therefore it implicitly incorporates the authoritative backdrop of the agreed-upon principles of the laws and customs of warfare.

[25] W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 410.

Finally, and most subtly, the delegates negotiating the Elements of Crimes expressly sought to preserve the interpretive force for the agreed-upon jus in bello. The Elements of Crimes were originally proposed by the United States on the basis that the principle of legality required international agreement over the scope of the substantive crimes described in the Rome Statute. Delegations in Rome initially opposed the proposal on the basis that agreements would be difficult to develop between common- and civil-law understandings of the relevant international law, but also on the basis that the effort to achieve such agreement might well entail delay in the entry into force for the Rome Statute. However, as previously noted, on 30 June 2000 all nations reached consensus on the authoritative elements for every specific crime listed in Articles 6, 7, and 8. This is particularly important in the macro because it included delegations from major non-States Parties to include the United States, China, and Russia. The Elements also provide a vitally important template in the official languages of the United Nations that can readily be exported for adoption and emulation in the domestic systems of any nation. The world may yet see Arabic judges importing the Arabic text of the ICC Elements into a sui generis tribunal created to adjudicate the egregious crimes committed in the Syrian civil war, for example.

For the purposes of properly charging offences under Article 8, the full text of the General Introduction to the Elements of Crimes is critically relevant. The General Introduction, known as the chapeau language, was the fulcrum upon which overall consensus emerged. The Elements truly are revolutionary in the sense that all states now share a common touchstone to dissect the actus reus, mens rea, and requisite circumstances for every offence included in the Rome Statute. For the purposes of charging war crimes, paragraph 6 of the General chapeau is particularly relevant. It reads as follows: 'The requirement of "unlawfulness" found in the Statute or in other parts of international law, in particular international humanitarian law, is generally not specified in the elements of crimes' (emphasis added). Read in conjunction with Article 30, this provision means that substantive crimes found in Article 8 can only be established when there is evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the perpetrator intentionally (Article 30) and unlawfully (Article 8 General Introduction, chapeau language) committed the relevant actus reus. Thus, there can be no doubt whatsoever that the provisions of Article 8 build upon the larger context of the established jus in bello rather than attempting to replace the welter of laws and customs with an ad hoc system that might be termed 'Frankenlaw'. Article 8 buttressed the established framework of jus in bello rather than obliterating its normative force.

29.3.2 Specific textual incorporation into Article 8

Given the truism that the war crimes enunciated in Article 8 largely represent an outgrowth from the pre-existing body of humanitarian law, they are riddled with references to that body of law. In some areas, the relationship is simply that the offences from previous treaty law are included whole cloth. Article 8(2)(a) thus consolidates the substantive grave breaches drawn from the respective Geneva Conventions.[26] The text is logically consistent in that it embeds the established legal principles drawn from the Conventions into the structure of the crimes and elements. For example, victims of any offence under Article 8(2)(a) must be 'protected persons' within the meaning of one or more of the Geneva Conventions, though that legal term of art is nowhere explained in the Rome Statute. Article 8(2)(b)(xxii) correspondingly prohibits the use of 'protected persons as human shields' to 'favour (sic) or impede military operations'. Similarly, the grave breach of '[e]xtensive destruction and appropriation of property not justified by military necessity and carried out wantonly and unlawfully' (Article 8(2)(a)(iv)) may only be committed against property protected under one or more of the Geneva Conventions. As noted earlier, the text of Article 8(2)(c) reproduces the language of Article 3 that is replicated in each of the four Geneva Conventions of 1949. All of these criminal provisions draw their lifeblood from the practice of states and the accumulated understandings from established understandings of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, to include the specific understandings of Common Article 3.

In a slightly more tangential reference to underlying jus in bello precepts, the fabric of Article 8 offences also contains an abundance of obvious references to the underlying body of humanitarian law. Apart from the textual reference to military necessity in the grave breach provision of Article 8(2)(a)(iv), the concept is repeatedly referenced in elements for other offences committed during both international and non-international armed conflicts. Military necessity, for example, is specifically included in the textual requirements for proving the war crime in Article 8(2)(b)(viii) of displacing the civilian population because the elements require that the perpetrator's order 'was not justified by the security of the civilians involved or by military necessity'. Similarly, the Article 8(2)(b)(v) war crime of attacking undefended places cannot be established in the absence of evidence that the 'towns, villages, dwellings, or buildings did not constitute military objectives'. The legally defined term of art 'military objective' is also included in the elements of the war crime of attacking civilian objects in both international (Article 8(2)(b)(ii) and 8(2)(b)(ix)) and non-international armed conflicts (Article 8(2)(e)(iv)). Finally, the jus in bello concept of 'hors de combat' is embedded in all of the offences under Article 8(2)(c) without any additional clarification or explanation. These obvious references to established legal precepts under pre-existing jus in bello make reference to that body of law, an essential predicate to any authoritative interpretive decisions with respect to those offences either in charging or judicial decision-making in the Court.

[26] See e.g. Art 47 Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 31 (replacing previous Geneva Wounded and Sick Conventions of 22 August 1864, 6 July 1906, and 27 July 1929 by virtue of Art 59); Art 48 Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick, and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 85 (replacing Hague Convention No. X of 18 October 1907, 36 Stat. 2371); Art 127 Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 287 (replacing the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Prisoners of War of 27 July 1929, 47 Stat. 2021); Art 144 Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilians in Time of War (signed 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 287.

Even the extensive reliance of legally specific terminology defined outside the boundaries of the Rome Statute does not exhaust the textual basis for reference by jurists and counsel to the underlying body of established jus in bello. In addition to the express and obvious references, there is a third layer of Article 8 provisions with oblique reliance on pre-existing legal precepts. Article 51(3) of Additional Protocol I in 1977,[27] for example, provides that civilians 'shall enjoy the protection afforded by this Section, unless and for such time as they take a direct part in hostilities'. The concept of civilians under jus in bello stands in contradistinction to the rights and duties that inhere to lawful combatants. The war crime of 'making improper use of a flag of truce, of the flag or of the military insignia and uniform of the enemy or of the United Nations, as well as the distinctive emblems of the Red Cross, resulting in death or serious personal injury' (Article 8(2)(b)(vii)) requires proof that the perpetrator 'made such use for combatant purposes in a manner prohibited under the international law of armed conflict'. The elements make clear that the perpetrator 'knew or should have known of the prohibited nature of such use' at the time of the actus reus. These offences are not replicated in the Article 8(2)(e) language applicable to non-international armed conflicts because the concept of combatancy is an oxymoron during armed conflicts of a non-international nature. By contrast, the war crimes provisions of the Rome Statute extended the Article 51, Protocol I, baseline protection for civilians to criminalize 'intentionally directing attacks against the civilian population as such or against individual civilians not taking a direct part in hostilities' in the context of all armed conflicts, both international (Article 8(2)(b)(i)) and non-international (Article 8(2)(e)(i)). The legal concept of direct participation is deeply rooted in current international law, yet its scope remains highly controversial. For example, in Part IX of its Interpretive Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law, the ICRC inserted an entire section addressing restraints on the lawful use of lethal force during armed conflicts. The ICRC text postulated that the 'kind and degree of force which is permissible against persons not entitled to protection against direct attack must not exceed what is actually necessary to accomplish a legitimate military purpose in the prevailing circumstances'.[28] This is the narrowest reading of the concept of necessity in military operations in the sense that necessity is a literal term drawn in the narrowest tactical terms.

Given the fact that there is no black letter law (lex lata) to support that assertion, the ICRC Interpretive Guidance relied on its assertion of moral authority (lex ferenda) and indirect application of the protections that are universally accepted as applying to persons who are not clearly combatants, in particular employing an expansive notion of the principle of necessity. According to this view, it would defy basic notions of humanity to kill an adversary or to refrain from giving him or her an opportunity to surrender where there manifestly is no necessity for the use of lethal force. In such situation, the principles of military necessity and of humanity play an important role in determining the kind and degree of permissible force against legitimate military targets.[29] To be clear, prior to the ICRC position in Part IX, there was no affirmative statement of this principle in any authoritative text, and the Interpretive Guidance did not carry with it the force of state consensus at the time of its promulgation. It is therefore lex ferenda rather than accepted lex lata. Part IX is highly controversial at the time of this writing, particularly insofar as the ICRC sought to cast its position in terms of pre-existing customary international norms.[30] Military practitioners have sharply objected to this commingling of the non-derogable right to life derived from human rights norms with the notion of military necessity and lawful targeting inherent in the jus in bello. Experienced military practitioners argue that the ICRC created a precept that embeds the right to capture in jus in bello, thereby concluding that 'the ICRC has lost sight of its role as trusted advisor and has assumed the position of international legislator'.[31] In the words of one expert that participated in several years of meetings that preceded the Interpretive Guidance, '[r]ecommendation IX deals with a matter that the experts were not asked to decide, it was raised late in the expert process, was strongly objected to by a substantial number of the experts present, was not fully discussed and so should not, in my opinion, have been included in the document'.[32]

[27] Art 10(2) Protocol I (n 8).

[28] ICRC, Interpretive Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law (n 23) 77.

For our purposes, the oblique reference to 'direct participation' imports a great deal of controversy and international debate into the fabric of the Rome Statute. It stands alongside other oblique references such as Article 8(2)(b)(vi), which rely upon the concept of combatancy and its limitations without explanation or specific reference to a particular provision of law. Similarly, the war crime of treacherously wounding or killing (Article (8)(2)(b)(xi)) relies upon the premise that the perpetrator 'invited the confidence or belief of one or more persons that they were entitled to or were obliged to accord, protection under rules of international law applicable in armed conflict'. As one final example, inter alia, of the oblique reliance on established principles, the structure of the war crime of destroying or seizing the enemy's property (Articles 8(2)(b)(xiii) and 8(2)(e)(xiii)) requires proof that 'the property was protected from that destruction or seizure under the international law of armed conflict'. Practitioners in the Court must realize that for all its sophistication and for all of its noble intentions, the Rome Statute simply cannot be implemented as a self-standing island of international law principles isolated from the larger definitional underpinnings of jus in bello.

[29] ICRC, Interpretive Guidance on the Notion of Direct Participation in Hostilities under International Humanitarian Law (n 23) 82.

[30] J Bellinger, III and W Haynes II, 'A US government response to the International Committee of the Red Cross Study Customary International Humanitarian Law' (2007) 89 International Review of the Red Cross No. 866, 443. J Kleffner, 'Section IX of the ICRC Interpretive Guidance on Direct Participation in Hostilities: The End of Jus in Bello Proportionality as We Know It?' (2012) 45 Israel Law Review 35; W Hays Parks, 'Part IX of the ICRC "Direct Participation in Hostilities" Study: No Mandate, No Expertise, and Legally Incorrect' (2010) 42 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 769, 828; D Akande, 'Clearing the Fog of War? The ICRC's Interpretive Guidance on Direct Participation in Hostilities' (2010) 59 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 180, 192.

[31] R Taylor, 'The Capture Versus Kill Debate: Is the Principle of Humanity Now Part of the Targeting Analysis When Attacking Civilians Who Are Directly Participating in Hostilities?' (2011) The Army Lawyer 103, 104.

[32] A P V Rogers, 'Direct Participation in Hostilities: Some Personal Reflections' (2009) 48 Military Law and the Law of War Review 143, 158.

29.3.3 The consensus compromises negotiated by states

In addition, the express importation of the laws and customs of warfare and the textual reliance on its precepts that is integrated into the Rome Statute, there are a number of areas where delegates exploited common understandings as an essential step to gaining consensus on the crimes and their accompanying elements. For example, Article 23 of the 1899 Hague II Convention stated that it was forbidden '[t]o destroy or seize the enemy's property, unless such destruction or seizure be imperatively demanded by the necessities of war'.[33] The Rome Statute copied that same language in Article 8(2)(b)(xiii) and 8(2)(e)(xii) (respectively applicable during international and non-international armed conflicts). Based on their belief that the concept of military necessity ought to be an unacceptable component of military decision-making, some civilian delegates sought to introduce a higher subjective threshold by which to second-guess military operations.[34] They proposed a verbal formula for the Elements of Crimes that any seizure of civilian property would be valid only if based on 'imperative military necessity'.[35] As noted, there is not a shred of evidence in the traveaux of the Rome Statute that its drafters intended to alter the pre-existing fabric of the laws and customs of war.[36] Introducing a tiered gradation of military necessity as proposed would have built a doubly high wall that would have had a paralysing effect on military operations. A double threshold for the established concept of military necessity would have clouded the decision-making of commanders and soldiers who must balance the legitimate need to accomplish the mission against the mandates of the law.

From the military practitioners' perspective, requiring 'imperative military necessity' as a necessary condition for otherwise permissible actions would have introduced a wholly subjective and unworkable formulation that would foreseeably have exposed military commanders to after the fact personal criminal liability for their good faith judgments. The ultimate formulation in the Elements of Crimes translated the poetic but impractical 1899 phrase into the simple modern formulation 'military necessity' that every commander and military attorney understands. The important point for our purposes is that the twin concepts of military necessity and feasibility preserve jus in bello as a practicable body of law that balances humanitarian and military considerations, at least when applied by reasonable, well-intentioned, and well trained forces.[37] The delegates leveraged established practice and common military understanding as the cornerstone of diplomatic consensus. In like manner, the war crime of 'transfer, directly or indirectly, by the Occupying Power of parts of its own civilian population

[33] M Newton, 'Modern Military Necessity: The Role and Relevance of Military Lawyers' (2007) 12 Roger Williams University Law Review 877, 896.

[34] M Newton, 'Humanitarian Protection in Future Wars' in H Langholtz et al. (eds), International Peacekeeping: The Yearbook of International Peace Operations vol. 8 (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff 2004) 349, 358.

[35] K Dörmann, Elements of War Crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2003) 249.

[36] Schabas, A Commentary (n 25) 240–1 (noting that the provisions of the Rome Statute referencing military necessity were 'quickly agreed to at the Rome Conference' and that the concept may be invoked only when the laws of armed conflict provide so and only to the extent provided by that body of law).

[37] See M Newton, 'The International Criminal Court Preparatory Commission: The Way It Is and the Way Ahead' (2000) 41 Virginia Journal of International Law 204, 211–12.

into the territory it occupies, or the deportation or transfer of all or parts of the population of the occupied territory within our outside this territory' (Article 8(2)(b)(viii)) presented delegates with a contentious and time-consuming dilemma. The ultimate consensus was built upon what became footnote 44 in the Elements of Crimes. This footnote was more difficult to achieve than perhaps any other single aspect of the elements, yet its formulation is deceptively simplistic. The text of (the famous) footnote 44 provides that '[t]he term "transfer" needs to be interpreted in accordance with the relevant provisions of international humanitarian law'.

In other words, the Court is simply not free to disregard existing interpretations or understandings of the body of law that developed in the implementation of Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. To be more precise, the Court could embark on an exercise of judicial creativity, but that is vastly a different proposition than arguing that it should engage in an ambitious teleology on its own authority. Such efforts, whether centred among jurists or counsel, would depart from the clearly permissible limits of the Rome Statute and its accompanying Elements of Crimes. Indeed, overly teleological experimentation would contravene the mandate of Article 21, which states that the Court 'shall' rely upon the text of the Statute, the constituent Elements as modified 'where appropriate' by 'applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict'. Simply put, the Court cannot create norms in its unfettered discretion, nor should it disregard lex lata at its convenience.

The interpretive structure of Article 8(2)(b)(iv) deserves special commentary in closing section 29.3 of this chapter because it represents one of the most important aspects of the modernization enshrined in the Rome Statute even as it exemplifies the limits of Court creationism. In his seminal work War and Law since 1945, Geoffrey Best pointed out that 'proportionality is certainly an awkward word. It is a pity that such indispensable and noble words as proportionality and humanitarian(ism) are in themselves so lumbering, unattractive and inexpressive'.[38] Proportionality has, nevertheless, been a deeply embedded and indispensable aspect of decision-making during war or armed conflict for many decades. Although the textual incarnations of proportionality came after more than a century of development within the field, that gap should not be attributed to unfamiliarity with the basic precepts of the precautions that attackers and defenders alike are expected to take. The developmentally delayed formulation of the treaty language was 'because it was thought to be too slippery and in its potential implications embarrassing to commit to a set form of words'.[39] The Rome Statute describes proportionality in a manner consistent with modern state practice following the adoption of Protocol I as:

> [i]ntentionally launching an attack in the knowledge that such attack will cause incidental loss of life or injury to civilians or damage to civilian objects or widespread, long-term severe damage to the natural environment which would be clearly excessive in relation to the concrete and direct overall military advantage anticipated. (emphasis added)

[38] G Best, War and Law since 1945 (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1994) 324.

[39] Ibid., 323.

In addition, the Elements of Crimes (adopted by consensus as mentioned earlier) included a key footnote that reads as follows:

> The expression 'concrete and direct overall military advantage' refers to a military advantage that is foreseeable by the perpetrator at the relevant time. Such advantage may or may not be temporally or geographically related to the object of the attack. The fact that this crime admits the possibility of lawful incidental injury and collateral damage does not in any way justify any violation of the law applicable in armed conflict. It does not address justifications for war or other rules related to jus ad bellum. It reflects the proportionality requirement inherent in determining the legality of any military activity undertaken in the context of an armed conflict.[40]

The inclusion of a proportionality requirement to mark off a specific war crime under the Rome Statute is significant for two reasons. In the first place, delegates omitted the consequence element required for conviction of a grave breach under Protocol I. The criminal act is committed simply by the deliberate initiation of an attack, provided that the prosecutor can produce evidence sufficient for the finder of fact to infer that the perpetrator believed that the attack would cause an anticipated disproportionate result. The actual result is not necessarily relevant. Unlike the grave breach formulation found in Protocol I, the criminal offence in the Rome Statute is completed based on the intentional initiation of a disproportionate attack. The highest possible mens rea standard implicitly concedes that some foreseeable civilian casualties are lawful. Thus, the Rome Statute standard strongly mitigates against the inference of a criminal intent just based on evidence sufficient to show that the commander might have had knowledge that a particular attack might cause some level of damage to civilians or their property.

In addition, the explicit footnote in the Elements stipulates that the perpetrator's knowledge of the foreseeably disproportionate effects of an attack requires an explicit value judgment. Nevertheless, the standard for any post hoc assessment of the action taken by an alleged perpetrator is clear: 'An evaluation of that value judgment must be based on the requisite information available to the perpetrator at the time'. In effect, the text of Article 8(2)(b)(iv) (the crime of disproportionate attack) widens the scope of the military advantage that can be considered in the proportionality analysis (through inclusion of the word 'overall') and narrows what level of collateral damage is considered excessive (by specifying that the damage needs to be clearly excessive to generate criminal liability). These revisions to the treaty terminology employed by the drafters of Protocol I could be discounted as a sui generis necessity based on diplomatic convenience. But this assumption would be inaccurate.

In fact, the text of the Rome Statute reflects the broadly accepted view of state practice. To be more precise, the text of the Rome Statute, as understood in light of the Elements footnote adopted by consensus, accurately embodies pre-existing customary international law. This is true in two equally important dimensions. In the first place, the governments of the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Spain, Italy, Australia, [40] Footnote 36 of the Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3(part II-B), 9 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP).

Belgium, New Zealand, Germany, and Canada each published a virtually identical reservation with respect to Articles 51 and 57 as they acceded to Protocol I.[41] The overwhelming weight of the reservations made clear that state practice did not intend to put the war-fighter into a straightjacket of rigid orthodoxy. The New Zealand reservation, for example, (virtually identical to those of other states already listed) reads as follows:

> In relation to paragraph 5(b) of Article 51 and to paragraph 2(a)(iii) of Article 57, the Government of New Zealand understands that the military advantage anticipated from an attack is intended to refer to the advantage anticipated from the attack considered as a whole and not only from isolated or particular parts of that attack and that the term 'military advantage' involves a variety of considerations, including the security of attacking forces. It is further the understanding of the Government of New Zealand that the term 'concrete and direct military advantage anticipated', used in Articles 51 and 57, means a bona fide expectation that the attack will make a relevant and proportional contribution to the objective of the military attack involved.

Second, in reaching the legally defensible assessment of proportionality, the perspective of the commander (or war-fighting decision-maker) is entitled to deference based on the subjective perspective reservation prevailing at the time. The Italian declaration with respect to Protocol I states that in 'relation to Articles 51 to 58 inclusive, the Italian Government understands that military commanders and others responsible for planning, deciding upon or executing attacks necessarily have to reach decisions on the basis of their assessment of the information from all sources which is available to them at the relevant time'. This understanding is replicated in a number of other state pronouncements. Another reservation from the government of Austria declares that 'Article 57, paragraph 2, of Protocol I will be applied on the understanding that, with respect to any decision taken by a military commander, the information actually available at the time of the decision is determinative'. The language of the United Kingdom Law of War Manual summarizes the state of the law which was captured in the prohibition of Article 8(2)(b)(iv) as it should be understood in light of the Elements of Crimes:

> The military advantage anticipated from the attack refers to the advantage anticipated from the attack considered as a whole and not only from isolated or particular parts of the attack. The point of this is that an attack may involve a number of co-ordinated actions, some of which might cause more incidental damage than others. In assessing whether the proportionality rule has been violated, the effect of the whole attack must be considered. That does not, however, mean that an entirely gratuitous and unnecessary action within the attack as a whole would be condoned. Generally speaking, when considering the responsibility of a commander at any level, it is necessary to look at the part of the attack for which he was responsible in the context of the attack as a whole and in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time the decision to attack was made.[42]

[41] The numerous texts of state declarations expressing similar views using almost identical language is at <http://www.icrc.org/ihl.nsf/WebSign?ReadForm&id=470&ps=P> accessed 15 June 2014.

[42] The Joint Doctrine and Concepts Centre, UK Ministry of Defence, The Joint Service Manual of the Law of Armed Conflict (2004) para. 5.33.5.

The point of these cumulative examples ought to be clear as this chapter moves into section 29.4. The text and intent of Article 8 can only be appropriately understood and applied against the realism of state practice and the larger intent of states that conduct hostilities. Phrased another way, if the Court of the future seeks to charge war crimes by ignoring the established body of jus in bello, that effort would contravene the structure of the Statute, and would predictably lead to a loss of legitimacy for the institution.

29.4 Interrelationship of the Court with Operational Realities

This chapter concludes with three specific recommendations for charging war crimes that must be preserved as the Court enters its second decade of practice. Section 29.4 builds on these foundational principles to identify some of the most important consequences of the design of the Rome Statute. Prosecutorial discretion in charging decisions as well as the range of judicial decision-making should always recognize the principle of the jurisdictional floor for war crimes charging that is embedded in the Rome Statute, understand the implications of the Status of Forces agreements widely employed in international military operations, and reinforce the rationale behind the principles embedded in Article 28.

29.4.1 Preserving the jurisdictional floor of war crimes charging

The lengthy recitation of examples in section 29.3 aptly demonstrates the manner by which the larger lex lata of the laws and customs of armed conflict are embedded into the Rome Statute. On one level, this reliance provides firm foundations for establishing liability because perpetrators simply are not at liberty to inject their own subjective preferences or rationalizations for the commission of war crimes into the law. As only one of many possible examples, consider the case of the US Marines that killed 24 unarmed Iraqi civilians in the village of Haditha by entering their homes following the death of one Marine from an improvised explosive device. What should have been a swift arc of investigative efficiency became bogged down with rationalizations and red tape that only shifted after the shock of public revelation and recrimination.

The official investigation documented a command culture that devalued the lives of Iraqi civilians, which both contributed to the incident and made the follow-up a low priority. In the official terminology of investigation conducted by General Bargewell, '[a]ll levels of command tended to view civilian casualties, even in significant numbers, as routine and as a natural and intended result of insurgent tactics'.[43] The pervasive attitude that all Iraqis were either the enemy or supporters of the enemy removed the incentive for individual Marines to follow applicable Rules of Engagement that mandate ceaseless efforts to distinguish between combatants and non-combatants. One US Marine, SSgt Frank Wuterich (who entered a plea of guilty at his court-martial but was sentenced to only 90 days' confinement, which was not served pursuant to a pre-trial agreement, reduction to the lowest enlisted rank, and forfeiture of $984.06 per month for three months), remarked that: 'As for the PID (Positive Identification of civilians versus combatants as required in the Rules of Engagement), we didn't want my Marines to check if they had weapons first. We told them to shoot first and deal with it later'.[44] His conviction resulted from the issuance of the unlawful order, which violated the Rules of Engagement and in legal terms violated the principle of distinction. In practice, the lex lata applicable to armed conflict embeds principles of military necessity, discretion, and concepts of reasonableness liberally at the precise points of friction within the law where they are relevant to the actual conduct of military operations. Thus, perpetrators cannot subjectively inject those concepts at their own convenience because they are already baked into the structure of the laws and customs where relevant.

[43] US Dep't of the Army, Major General Eldon A Bargewell, Investigation, '"Simple Failures" and "Disastrous Results"', p. 18 (15 June 2006) 25. The first investigation under US Army Major General Eldon Bargewell was notable for the simple fact that a well-regarded Army General was charged with investigating allegations of Marine misconduct. The official investigation resulted in the removal of Lieutenant Colonel Jeffrey Chessani, the commanding officer, and the company commander, Captain Luke McConnell along with another commander, Captain James Kimber, from their duties, along with a subsequent courts-martial for key Marines. General Bargewell concluded that '[s]tatements made by

Conversely, the Court is bound by the same normative structure. In other words, because the laws and customs of armed conflict are deeply suffused into the structure of the Rome Statute, prosecutorial discretion and judicial decision-making must respect those barriers. This truism has profound implications for the future of the Court. The Court should carefully analyse the specific facts and evidence in light of the applicable principles drawn from the larger lex lata of armed conflict as an essential part of preliminary investigations prior to actual charging decisions. Phrased another way, the lex lata of the laws and customs of armed conflict are so deeply integrated into the structure of the actual crimes found in Article 8 and the constituent elements as to provide the jurisdictional floor that ought to guide Court practitioners seeking to apply those precepts in good faith.

The lex lata of the laws and customs of armed conflict provides the jurisdictional floor for war crimes charging that is embedded in the very fabric of the Rome Statute. As a result, the obligatory duty to initiate an investigation under Article 53(1) is tempered by the caveat that the prosecutor may decline investigation after 'having evaluated the information made available to him or her' and concluding that there is 'no reasonable basis to believe that a crime within the jurisdiction of the court has been or is being committed'. The notion of a jurisdictional floor for Article 8 is a vitally important, but frequently overlooked dimension of its intended functionality. If the established jus in bello provides a reasonable basis for inferring that the actus reus alleged against a particular perpetrator was permissible (hence lawful under the impetus the chain of command during interviews for this investigation, taken as a whole, suggest that Iraqi civilian lives are not as important as U.S. lives, their deaths are just the cost of doing business, and that the Marines need to get "the job done" no matter what it takes. These comments had the potential to desensitize the Marines to concern for the Iraqi populace and portray them all as the enemy even if they are non-combatants'. This excerpt is from Army Major General Eldon A Bargewell's report, ' "Simple Failures" and "Disastrous Results" ' (Washington Post, 21 April 2007).

[44] Sworn Statement of SSgt Frank D Wuterich (taken 21 February 2001).

of the chapeau language), it cannot have been criminal within the meaning of the Statute. Other variations of this theme that could arise in other cases could centre on the accepted definitions of a military objective, or of the scope of protected persons, or of the concept of direct participation in hostilities, or a host of other principles. In circumstances where the conduct arguably complied with the established lex lata, there would accordingly be no reasonable basis for concluding that a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court occurred. It follows that the prosecutor should be extremely conscious of the moral and legal imperative to recognize and respect this jurisdictional floor in advance of charging decisions.

Even if the prosecutor is inclined to ignore established lex lata in favour of a firm policy of aggressive charging, there are strong pragmatic reasons for respecting the jurisdictional floor. Article 54(1)(a) requires the prosecutor to 'extend the investigation to cover all facts and evidence relevant to an assessment of whether there is criminal responsibility under this Statute, and in doing so, investigate incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally'. Such exonerating circumstances would have to include the information reasonably available to the perpetrator, the operational context for a particular discretionary decision, and an array of factual considerations that might have affected the operational decisions during a military campaign. Evidence of good faith application of the laws and customs of war or of wholly appropriate exercises of circumstantial discretion permissible under the lex lata would fall within this obligatory investigative scope. To reiterate, if the perpetrator indeed committed the actus reus of a particular offence, but did so under circumstances authorized by the laws and customs of armed conflict, the jurisdictional floor for charging was not met. Following the investigation required by Article 54, if the prosecutor establishes a factual or legal basis for concluding that the conduct was in fact permissible, then that information ought to promptly be disclosed to the Court and to defence counsel and any pending charges ought to be dismissed. Far better to undertake a careful factual and legal inquiry prior to charging in order to preserve Court resources and to enhance overall legitimacy.

Second, faced with evidence of a good faith application of jus in bello, the Pre-Trial Chamber would likely decline to issue an arrest warrant under Article 58(1)(a) on the basis of doubt whether there are 'reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'. In any event, it is predictable that uncertainty over the actual legality of the actus reus would lead the Pre-Trial Chamber to decline confirmation of charges based on the conclusion that there is not 'sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that the person committed each of the crimes charged'. The hearing envisioned in Article 61 (Confirmation of charges before trial) is adversarial in nature, and the prosecutor should carefully assess the actual charges in the light of all available information and undertake a critical analysis of the evidence in light of the established lex lata prior to seeking confirmation of charges. Most military practitioners would strongly support the pursuit of accountability against those whose conduct violated applicable professional norms; they would, nevertheless urge the prosecutor and Pre-Trial Chambers to be extremely diligent in correctly applying the precepts found in jus in bello and embedded in the Statute in order to prevent inappropriate chilling effects on the lawful conduct of hostilities.

29.4.2 Status of forces agreements

In a related jurisdictional consideration, the Court should develop a firm policy with respect to the international agreements that accompany almost any military deployment. Military practitioners around the world would appreciate the predictability in planning and conducting operations that would accompany a stated Court policy vis-à-vis status of forces agreements that are ubiquitous aspects of armed conflicts or peacetime deployments. At the international level, United Nations Security Council Resolution 1973[45] empowered nation states to 'use all necessary means' to protect civilians inside Libya and to enforce the no-fly zone over Libyan territory. This Chapter VII Security Council Decision was implemented in the shadow of its prior grant of jurisdiction to the Court over the situation in Libya by virtue of Resolution 1970. The Security Council followed widespread state practice by specifying a formula for jurisdictional allocation over potential war crimes. Paragraph 6 of Resolution 1970 specified that > nationals, current or former officials or personnel from a State outside the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya which is not a party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court shall be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of that State for all alleged acts or omissions arising out of or related to operations in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya established or authorized by the Council, unless such exclusive jurisdiction has been expressly waived by the State.

Military prosecutors would vehemently object to any attempt to characterize this provision as a grant of impunity for war crimes, as it merely serves to preserve the full panoply of prosecutorial prerogatives to the sending state.

In light of the fact that the Court's juridical authority over the situation in Libya originated in the Article 13(b) authority of the Security Council, there was no doubt expressed in international circles that the grant of exclusive jurisdiction to the nationals of non-States Parties violated international law in general or obviated the object and purpose of the Rome Statute in particular. The extension of Court-based jurisdiction operates irrespective of state consent in a particular case or against a particular perpetrator or even an express waiver of jurisdiction by virtue of that state's prior ratification of the Rome Statute. With respect to the situation in Libya, the jurisdictional allocation is uncontroversial and universally accepted. It must also be clearly understood that the limitation of Court jurisdiction in the Libya situation has no bearing whatsoever on other existing grounds for national jurisdiction derived from other sources, such as universal jurisdiction based on violations of the grave breach provisions of the Geneva Conventions.

[45] UNSC Res 1973 (17 March 2011) UN Doc S/RES/1973.

However, in the interests of intellectual consistency and operational predictability, the Court should specifically promulgate policy guidance with respect to the treaty-based allocation of jurisdiction that is a normal corollary to military deployments. Even if the actus reus of a particular offence might have been committed, the Court must make a legally defensible, completely objective assessment that 'there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court' as required by Article 58(1)(a). Under the tenets of Article 12, personal jurisdiction attaches only on the basis of territoriality or nationality; the Court has no treaty basis under the Rome Statute for claiming a universal scope of punitive authority over all potential perpetrators in all circumstances. The nationals of State Parties and non-States Parties are dissimilar in that citizens of states subjected to treaty-based duties to comply with the Rome Statute may be subject to nationality-based jurisdiction in the Court even when the receiving state had no basis for asserting territorial jurisdiction. In the author's view, any State Party to the treaty may transfer its own claim to territorial jurisdiction to the Court, or to any other entity, as a matter of its own sovereign prerogatives. There is nothing in international law that prohibits a sovereign state from transferring its own jurisdictional right to any other entity irrespective of the consent of a third-party state that might have an equally colourable claim to jurisdiction. Any state can transfer rights it possesses to any other entity in the absence of an express prohibition limiting such transfer of rights. Indeed, as a normal operating principle, in such instances where two states exercise concurrent jurisdiction, transfer of authority from the State Party to the Court does not vitiate the jurisdiction of the non-State Party insofar as jurisdiction still exists on the national level; but as a practical matter the concurrent jurisdiction of the non-State Party is displaced by the sovereign act of the State Party. The competing jurisdictional claims would then become a political rather than a legal matter.

Logically, then, the act of transferring territorial jurisdiction over a state that is not party to the Rome Statute can be done perfectly consistently with the VCLT if the territorial state has a colourable claim to jurisdiction at the time of the alleged war crime. In this sense, the territorial state would be transferring its own authority in the same manner that the co-owner of a house could choose to sell or to transfer his/her property right without the consent of the other co-owner. On the other hand, if the territorial state did not in fact have a legally cognizable claim (i.e. possessory interest) to territorial jurisdiction at the time of the alleged offence/s, then it had no power to transfer jurisdictional authority that it did not possess. In practice, almost every military operation is accompanied by a specific bilateral treaty, or at the very least by an exchange of diplomatic notes, that limits the exercise of territorial jurisdiction for the purposes of the armed conflict or military deployment. As an example of a frequently encountered provision, Afghanistan relinquished any claim to criminal jurisdiction over the nationals of the United States by accepting that they are 'accorded status equivalent to that accorded to the administrative and technical staff of the Embassy of the United States of America under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of April 18, 1961'. Such status [termed A&T P&I by military practitioners] is just one notch below full diplomatic immunity enjoyed by the Ambassador upon delivery of his full powers instrument to the sovereign government. In other words, the basic law of the Vienna Convention is absolutely clear that persons enjoying A&T P&I status are fully immune from host nation criminal law for all purposes at all times, and subject to limited civil immunity for acts undertaken in their official capacity. Thus, from 12 December 2002 the United States had exclusive jurisdiction over any US national alleged to have committed any cognizable criminal offence within Afghanistan.

The voluntary surrender of territorial jurisdiction in the context of military operations is distinct from other agreements that purport to limit the transfer of any persons to the Court as envisioned in Article 98(2). A State Party that has no existing basis for exercising territorial jurisdiction simply has no legal basis for undermining the exclusive personal jurisdiction possessed by another nation. In other words, if the State Party had no jurisdiction over crimes committed on its territory by virtue of having ceded such exclusive jurisdiction to another state, there would be no basis under the Rome Statute to transfer jurisdictional authority that it did not possess at the time. Thus, the State Party could not transfer territorial jurisdiction over the class of persons that it had already relinquished by its own sovereign authority despite the language of Article 12 that ostensibly grants such jurisdiction to the Court. In time, the ASP could amend Article 12 to specifically prohibit States Parties from entering into any agreement that curtails territorial jurisdiction that would otherwise be within the Court's purview. One thing is clear: in the absence of a Chapter VII Security Council Resolution that would override the discretion of sovereign states by virtue of Article 12(7) of the UN Charter, the Court has no articulable basis for asserting an independent claim to jurisdiction outside the scope of the Rome Statute. Court authority derives from the consent of sovereign states, and a State Party is not at liberty to disregard its grant of exclusive jurisdiction to another state absent a waiver of jurisdiction by that state. Thus, it follows that for the purposes of military deployments in which states routinely allocate exclusive jurisdiction over criminal acts, the Court cannot unilaterally assert that 'there are reasonable grounds to believe that a person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court' unless there is in fact a valid basis for such jurisdiction. Clarifying the scope of Court authority in the face of such frequently utilized treaty obligations would certainly enhance the efficiency of investigations and perhaps garner additional investigative support from military authorities, even as it would preserve the Court's overall credibility and legitimacy.

29.4.3 Protecting the precepts of command responsibility

Commanders throughout history have recognized that the humanizing influence of the norms for conducting conflict is a vital dimension of a combat effective unit that should not be ignored or devalued. An effective commander issues plans and guidance prior to the onset of operations, and sets a command climate of professionalism in which he or she empowers subordinates as the conflict unfolds.[46] The law of armed conflict developed as a restraining and humanizing necessity to facilitate commanders' ability to accomplish the military mission even in the midst of fear, fatigue, factual uncertainty, moral ambiguity, and horrific violence conducted under the dual impulses of surging adrenaline and inculcated training.[47] The historical grounding of the laws and customs of war as deriving from the unyielding demands of military discipline under the authority of the commander or king explains why the legal status of lawful combatant was reserved for the armed forces fighting for a state or to paramilitary forces incorporated into those armed forces.[48] In other words, Cicero was simply incorrect when he postulated that law was silent during war; or in the best possible light, his opinion betrayed an inaccurate appreciation for the dynamics of waging war. In fact, Seneca, also writing in the Roman period, called for significant restraint especially during times of armed conflict in his essays 'On Anger' and 'On Mercy'.[49]

[46] Commentary on the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions (n 13) Art 87, para. 3550 <http://www.icrc.org/ihl.nsf/COM/470-750001?OpenDocument> accessed 20 June 2014 ('Undoubtedly the development of a battle may not permit a commander to exercise control over his troops all the time; but in this case he must impose discipline to a sufficient degree, to enforce compliance with the rules of the Conventions and the Protocol, even when he may momentarily lose sight of his troops').

Even in the face of the powerful psychological tendencies that are the sine qua non of combat, the principles of the law of armed conflict became an embedded aspect of military professionalism. The jus in bello obligates an individualized consideration of the propriety of each and every military action against the backdrop of the established normative framework discussed earlier. Writing in 1625, Hugo Grotius documented the Roman practice that 'it is not right for one who is not a soldier to fight with an enemy' because 'one who had fought an enemy outside the ranks and without the command of the general was understood to have disobeyed orders', which offence 'should be punished with death'.[50] Grotius explained the necessity for such rigid [47] See Schindler and Toman (n 3).

[48] This statement is true subject to the linguistic oddity introduced by Art 3 of the 1907 Hague Regulations, which makes clear that the armed forces of a state can include both combatants and non-combatants (meaning chaplains and medical personnel), and that both classes of military personnel are entitled to prisoner-of-war status if captured ('[t]he armed forces of the belligerent parties may consist of combatants and non-combatants. In the case of capture by the enemy, both have a right to be treated as prisoners of war'). The Hague Regulations embodied this legal regime as follows:

> Art 1. The laws, rights, and duties of war apply not only to armies, but also to militia and volunteer corps fulfilling the following conditions:
> 1. To be commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates;
> 2. To have a fixed distinctive emblem recognizable at a distance;
> 3. To carry arms openly; and
> 4. To conduct their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war.
>
> In countries where militia or volunteer corps constitute the army, or form part of it, they are included under the denomination 'army'.

For a side-by-side comparison of the evolution from the 1899 language to the 1907 multilateral text, see J Scott (ed.), The Hague Conventions and Declarations of 1899 and 1907 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1918) 100–27. It should be noted, though, that there is a difference between the way the term 'combatant' was used in the law of the Hague Convention and the way it is used today in the law of Additional Protocol I.

[49] Seneca, 'On Anger' in J Cooper and J Procope (eds), Seneca: Moral and Political Essays (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1995) 97–8; and 'On Mercy', ibid., 132–4. Also see N Sherman, Stoic Warriors: The Ancient Philosophy behind the Military Mind (New York: Oxford University Press, 2005); J Reynolds, 'Collateral Damage on the 21st Century Battlefield: Enemy Exploitation of the Law of Armed Conflict, and the Struggle for a Moral High Ground' (2005) 56 The Air Force Law Review 1, 8.

[50] H Grotius, On the Law of War and Peace (1625) Book III, ch. XVIII, 788–9 (Francis W Kelsey tr., Oxford: Clarendon Press 1925). In this respect, Grotius is consistent with Cicero who conditioned his Just War rationale in part on the identity of the participants by declaring that only the state could properly discipline as follows: 'The reason is that, if such disobedience were rashly permitted, either the outposts might be abandoned, or, with the increase of lawlessness, the army or a part of it might even become involved in ill-considered battles, a condition which ought absolutely to be avoided'. Military doctrine admonishes that leaders must focus 'on the impropriety of the motives of vengeance, cruelty, and hatred'. Once the enemy is viewed as something less than human, atrocities are more likely to occur. A generalized hatred towards the enemy leads too quickly to events like those at Beirut or My Lai. In light of this awareness, General David Petraeus wrote[51] to 'Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen, Marines, and Coast Guardsmen serving in Multi-National Force-Iraq':

> Our values and the laws governing warfare teach us to respect human dignity, maintain our integrity, and do what is right. Adherence to our values distinguishes us from our enemy. This fight depends on securing the population, which must understand that we—not our enemies—occupy the moral high ground. This strategy has shown results in recent months. Al Qa'ida's indiscriminate attacks, for example, have finally started to turn a substantial proportion of the Iraqi population against it.

The commander is responsible both for decision-making needed to employ a disciplined force and for the sustained combat readiness and training of those whom he or she is privileged to lead. As famed historian S L A Marshall noted, 'when an officer winks at any depredation by his men, it is no different than if he had committed the act'.[52] The implicit permission given by a present authority figure by acquiescence and silent approbation has been labelled 'atrocity by connivance'.[53] This principle extends to command at all levels and in all contexts, and applies without limitation to commanders who assume control of organizations by conventional means or after the death or incapacitation of a previous leader. Each individual military actor remains an autonomous moral figure with personal responsibility. This explains the bright line principle that there is no defence of superior orders in response to allegations of war crimes.[54] At the same time, commanders have the most at stake in the success of the mission both personally and professionally. 'To command' is an active verb. The independent emergence of the principle that the commander's orders operate with the force of law to limit the application of violence in widely disparate cultures and historical periods suggests that it is more than just a legal technicality, and instead is fundamental to the nature of warfare itself. Of course, the commander does not always speak with the authority of law behind him or her. But the best commanders are those that convey the proper sense of the restraints of established jus in bello for all of those who serve under them. The bedrock of military professionalism that is inherent and indistinguishable conduct warfare and that a 'soldier not inducted by oath could not legally serve'. R Bainton, Christian Attitudes towards War and Peace: A Historical Survey and Critical Reexamination (Nashville: Abingdon Press 1960) 41.

[51] See e.g. Letter from Gen. David H Petraeus, Commanding Officer of Multi-National Force-Iraq, to Multi-National Force-Iraq (10 May 2007) (copy on file with author).

[52] Gen. S L A Marshall, The Officer as Leader (1966) 274.

[53] M Osiel, Obeying Orders (New Brunswick/London: Transaction Publishers 1999) 189.

[54] Report of the International Law Commission Covering its Second Session (5 June–29 July 1950), UN Doc A/1316, reprinted in Schindler and Toman (n 3) 1265–6.

from the exercise of effective control over military operations explains the necessity for Article 28 in the Rome Statute.

29.4.3.1 The limits of co-perpetratorship

Despite the sweeping inclusion of groundbreaking provisions related to command and superior responsibility in Article 28 of the Rome Statute, both the prosecutor and Pre-Trial Chambers have displayed a remarkable reticence to charge Article 28 as a mode of liability in early cases. In Lubanga, Pre-Trial Chamber I found that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the perpetrator founded the military organization and served as its Commander-in-Chief throughout the relevant time period. Remarkably, the provision of the Rome Statute applying the precepts of command responsibility was avoided both by the prosecution and the Pre-Trial Chamber despite its patent applicability.[55] In lieu of extending the principles of command accountability onto a non-traditional, non-linear battlefield in which the commanders utilized fluid mechanisms of control in the midst of rapidly evolving operations, the Pre-Trial Chamber resorted to a theory of individual responsibility known as 'co-perpetratorship'. Similarly, Pre-Trial Chamber I found that as the President and Commander-in Chief Omar Al Bashir 'played an essential role in coordinating, with other high-ranking Sudanese political and military leaders, the design and implementation' of the massive campaign of criminality against civilians in Darfur, but issued the warrant only on the basis that he acted as an 'indirect perpetrator' (or, in the alternative, an 'indirect co-perpetrator') within the meaning of Article 25(3)(a) of the Rome Statute.[56]

In the early cases, the prosecutor and Pre-Trial Chambers strained to avoid invocation of the precepts of command in favour of resuscitating an outmoded and arcane theory. By extrapolating Roxin's organizational analysis drawn from the 1962 trial of Adolf Eichmann, the ICC generated a wholly new category of individual responsibility in which both superiors and subordinates in military organizations are held responsible as co-perpetrators, acting through an organizational apparatus.[57] These [55] W Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007) 212–13. See also Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, paras 477–518; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, PTC III, ICC, 10 June 2008, para. 78 (incorporating Claus Roxin's interpretation of the Eichmann judgment into international jurisprudence and eschewing traditional principles of command responsibility); Warrant of Arrest for Joseph Kony Issued on 8 July 2005 as Amended on 27 September 2005, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/05-53, PTC II, ICC, 27 September 2005 (adopting the same theory of liability).

[56] See Warrant of Arrest, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-1, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009 (Chamber finds, in the alternative, that there are reasonable grounds to believe (i) that the role of Omar Al Bashir went beyond coordinating the design and implementation of the common plan; (ii) that he was in full control of all branches of the 'apparatus' of the State of Sudan, including the Sudanese Armed Forces and their allied Janjaweed Militia, the Sudanese Police Force, the National Intelligence and Security Service, and the Humanitarian Aid Commission; and (iii) that he used such control to secure the implementation of the common plan).

[57] See Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, paras 327–67.

developments are even more notable given the rejection of the theory by the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY on the basis that 'co-perpetratorship' as promulgated by the ICTY Trial Chamber did 'not have support in customary international law or in the settled jurisprudence of this Tribunal'.[58] Moreover, the Roxin theory was built on the assumption of a 'rigidly formal bureaucracy' patterned on the model of the Prussian organizational model in which authority is channelled into defined hierarchical structures in which compliance is assured based on uniformity of expectations and goals.[59]

The irony of the ICC approach is that the ICC has grafted Roxin's theory into a non-linear battlefield in which non-state actors operate in precisely the opposite manner to a Westernized military hierarchy. Second, and perhaps more ominously, the ill-fated marriage may help to ensure acquittal of the perpetrators almost by definition, because defence counsel need only demonstrate a lack of power 'to replace sullen juniors with more enthusiastic drones'.[60] The important point is that the ICC is artificially injecting its own view of the law rather than sustaining strict fidelity to the intent of States Parties. Such an approach even in cases where the evidence would otherwise support a finding of effective control is a major shift from the precepts of individual responsibility that embodies a regrettable 'recollectivation of responsibility'[61] because of the broader conception of the entire military organization as a unified criminal activity.

The current ICC approach is likely to prove irreducibly flawed in the end because any organization united under the authority of a superior will, by definition, exist with a common purpose. That is the very essence of authority and command. Overreliance of co-perpetratorship as the defining form of liability within military and para-military organizations would come dangerously close to strict liability for any perpetrator in a position of effective control, however briefly. In the abstract, the law is clear that superiors cannot be convicted on the basis of strict liability by virtue of their position alone.[62] The decision to confirm charges against warlords in the DRC on the basis of 'indirect co-perpetratorship' appeared to demonstrate a strong disinclination to rely on the core precepts of Article 28.[63] The pathway chosen by the ICC endangers the

[58] Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-A, AC, ICTY, 22 March 2006, para. 62.

[59] M Osiel, Making Sense of Mass Atrocity (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 100.

[60] Ibid., 101.

[61] See M Sassoli, 'Transnational Armed Groups and International Humanitarian Law' (Harvard University Program on Humanitarian Policy and Conflict Research, Occasional Paper No. 6, 2006) 36 (noting that a policy of imputing criminal responsibility to every member of the organization by virtue of membership in an organization that participates in crimes creates a disincentive to compliance with international humanitarian law that 'should be avoided'. Sassoli points out that it 'remains of utmost importance to be able to reward the armed group member who respects IHL in order to increase our ability to encourage compliance with IHL and, thus, protect victims').

[62] Judgment and Sentence, Semanza, TC, ICTR, ICTR-97-20-T, 15 May 2003, para. 404 ('Criminal liability based on superior responsibility will not attach on the basis of strict liability simply because an individual is in a chain of command with authority over a given geographic area. While the individual's position in the command hierarchy is considered a significant indicator that the superior knew or had reason to know about the actions of his subordinates, knowledge will not be presumed from the status alone').

[63] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 55).

foundations of individual responsibility because superimposing an extended version of joint responsibility onto a non-state organizational structure leads inexorably to a system of strict liability.

Though ad hoc readjustments of the theories of individual responsibility may provide a result-oriented mechanism for affixing criminal responsibility, they fail to understand the essence of the criminality at issue for all fighting organizations—that it is the fielding of the fighting organization without the proper safeguards that is the root of the criminal behaviour. International law places a heightened responsibility on commanders who field a fighting organization on the basis of their authoritative control of the application of violence. This principle in turn requires that accountability ensue for commanders who fail to exercise appropriate control over the operations of their subordinates on the basis of their inherent duties as commanders. Any military or para-military organization seeks to use 'deliberate, controlled, and purposeful acts of force combined and harmonized to attain what are ultimately political objectives'.[64] Indeed, the 'first basic need for an insurgent who aims at more than simply making trouble is an attractive cause' which permits supporters to be recruited and over time gives the insurgent 'a formidable, if intangible, asset that he can progressively transform into concrete strength'.[65] Thus, a 'highly articulated structure of control' is necessary to prevent purposeless and indiscriminate violence that detracts from the larger purpose of the conflict.[66]

To date, the trajectory of the Court's practice risks undermining the law of command responsibility based on the predilection of jurists. A commander, by definition, exercises operational control at the risk of personal criminal liability for the actions of subordinates. The precepts of command responsibility embedded in the Rome Statute represent the culmination of a long developmental arc supported by centuries of pragmatic professional military practice. Article 28 cannot be considered as a secondary or subordinate form of liability because its precepts are too central to the foundation of military professionalism. Command responsibility logically would have provided the strongest basis of responsibility for use by an emerging supranational institution focused on fidelity to its constitutive authorities. Though they would certainly support the independence and judicial authority of Court officials, the drafters of the Rome Statue surely did not foresee such an evisceration of the important principles of Article 28. By reducing the utility of the cornerstone concept of command responsibility that developed to constrain the application of violence during conflicts, the Court risks its own effectiveness as an institutional inhibitor of atrocities conducted by the participants in future armed conflicts.

[64] M Howard, 'Temperamenta Belli: Can War Be Controlled?' in M Howard (ed.), Restraints on War: Studies in the Limitation of Armed Conflict (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1979) 3.

[65] D Galula, Counterinsurgency Warfare: Theory and Practice (New York: Praeger 2006) 12. The first basic need for an insurgent who aims at more than simply making trouble is an attractive cause, particularly in view of the risks involved and in view of the fact that the early supporters and the active supporters—not necessarily the same—have to be recruited by persuasion. With a cause, the insurgent has a formidable, if intangible, asset that he can progressively transform into concrete strength.

[66] Ibid.

29.4.3.2 Properly applying the Article 28 standard

Given the historical context and vitally important role of command authority explained earlier, military practitioners would almost certainly be in strong concurrence that the phrase 'knew or should have known' is an essential and non-transferrable tenet of command. Any person that claims to be in effective control of a military force of any size in the context of any imaginable combat operations should be subject to the 'knew or should have known' standard of established jus in bello. The charges against Jean-Pierre Bemba were confirmed by Pre-Trial Chamber II on the basis of actual knowledge that forces under his effective control were committing or about to commit war crimes and crimes against humanity.[67] After the prosecution closed its case on 20 March 2012 and the defence opened its case in August of that year, the Trial Chamber notified the parties that it reserved the right to amend the characterization of the Article 28 liability to consider whether the perpetrator could also be accountable on the alternative ground that he 'should have known' that forces under his effective control were committing or about to commit violations.[68]

In the interest of equality of arms, the Chamber made clear that its right to recharacterize the basis of liability under Court Regulation 55 was contingent upon hearing all of the available evidence and following the submissions of the prosecution and defence. At the time of this writing, the Bemba trial is ongoing and there will likely be no definitive resolution of the basis for individual responsibility or the lack thereof until a trial judgment is issued. Setting aside the arguments postulated by the defence and prosecution teams, and acknowledging the uncertainty of predicting pending litigation, military practitioners would be little troubled to see a conflation of the distinct formulations of mens rea. That is one reason the elements for the war crime of conscripting child soldiers contain an express element that the commander either 'knew or should have known' the age of the victims. For a responsible military commander there simply is no distinction between a standard requiring actual knowledge and a broader 'should have known standard'. Regardless of the mode of liability eventually accepted, military professionals would value the reinforcement of the professional ethos of commandership.

29.5 Conclusions

Casual readers of this chapter (and perhaps the editors of this volume) may be surprised at its length, or the breadth of issues related to properly charging crimes within the purview of Article 8. Jus in bello norms are best preserved when they are understood to be an integral dimension of the mission. For example, the proportionality principle found in Article 8(2)(b)(iv) becomes an embedded aspect of war-fighting on both the horizontal level (by linking disparate units and national contingents) and on the vertical level (by binding the strategic, operational, and tactical goals of a military operation). The ICRC categorically maintains that state practice has proven the principle of proportionality to be a norm of customary law applicable in both international and non-international armed conflicts.[69] This remains true despite the omission of a parallel principle in Article 8(2)(e). Accomplishing the mission is a non-negotiable necessity which in turn breeds a military culture that prizes the selfless pursuit of duty. Correctly applying the precepts of proportionality should seldom if ever force good faith war-fighters into an absolute choice. The Israeli Supreme Court summarized this notion by noting that the authority of military commanders 'must be properly balanced against the rights, needs, and interests of the local population: the law of war usually creates a delicate balance between two poles: military necessity on one hand, and humanitarian considerations on the other'.[70]

[67] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009.

[68] Decision giving notice to the parties and participant that the legal characterization of the facts may be subject to change in accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2324, TC III, ICC, 21 September 2012.

As it expands upon its jurisprudence and practice with respect to the investigation and charging of Article 8 offences, the Court should remain mindful of Shakespeare's admonition in King Lear that 'Striving to better, oft we mar what's well'.[71] The Court would advance the cause of justice and reinforce established professional military ethos by accepting the jurisdictional floor for war crimes charging that is embedded in the Rome Statute, understanding the implications of the Status of Forces agreements widely employed in international military operations and promulgating clear guidance to states and military planners around the world, and by upholding the historic principles embedded in Article 28. Thus, the Court can serve an irreplaceable role in reinforcing the larger jus in bello context rather than ravaging the laws and customs of war by creating an artificial set of parallel jurisprudential applications.

[69] J-M Henckaerts and L Doswald-Beck, Customary International Humanitarian Law vol. I (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2005) Rule 14, 46ff ('Launching an attack which may be expected to cause incidental loss of civilian life, injury to civilians, damage to civilian objects, or a combination thereof, which would be excessive in relation to the concrete and direct military advantage anticipated, is prohibited').

[70] Beit Sourak Village Council v the Government of Israel [2004] HCJ 2056/04, para. 34 <http://elyon1.court.gov.il/files_eng/04/560/020/A28/04020560.a28.htm> accessed 20 June 2014 (quoting Y Dinstein, 'Legislative Authority in the Administered Territories' (1973) 2 Tel Aviv University Law Review 505, 509.

[71] W Shakespeare, King Lear, act 1, sc. 4.

30

The Characterization of Armed Conflict in the Jurisprudence of the ICC

*Anthony Cullen

30.1 Introduction

The existence of armed conflict is the most fundamental prerequisite for the exercise of jurisdiction over war crimes. This chapter will probe the characterization of armed conflict in the case law of the ICC and consider the prospects for its future development. It will examine the schema currently employed by the Court for the qualification of armed conflict and issues that impact on the exercise of subject-matter jurisdiction over war crimes. In doing so, it will provide a critique of the approach currently adopted and highlight issues that may, in the longer term, impact on the characterization of armed conflict by the Court.

30.2 The Exercise of Jurisdiction over War Crimes

The basis for the exercise of jurisdiction over war crimes is provided for in Articles 5 and 8 of the Rome Statute.[1] Article 8(1) of the Rome Statute states that '[t]he Court shall have jurisdiction in respect of war crimes in particular when committed as part of a plan or policy or as part of a large-scale commission of such crimes'.[2] This provision must be read in the context of Article 5(1), which places a fundamental, overarching qualification on the Court's jurisdiction: 'The jurisdiction of the Court shall be limited to the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole.' In accordance with this provision, offences that do not qualify as crimes of international concern are excluded from the Court's jurisdiction.

For the purpose of the Rome Statute, 'war crimes' are defined in Article 8(2). This provides four lists of offences that qualify as 'war crimes'. The offences listed in Articles 8(2)(a) and 8(2)(b) apply to situations of international armed conflict, while those contained in Articles 8(2)(c) and 8(2)(e) apply to armed conflict not of an international character. The war crimes enumerated for international armed conflict

* Anthony Cullen, BA, MA, LLM, PhD, FHEA, Senior Lecturer in Law, Middlesex University.

[1] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[2] According to Michael Bothe, a consequence of this provision is that 'isolated individual acts of individual members of the armed forces or, as the case may be, of individual civilians should not ordinarily be tried by the Court'. M Bothe, 'War Crimes' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 380–426, 380.

cover '[g]rave breaches of the Geneva Conventions' and '[o]ther serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in international armed conflict'. In the context of armed conflict not of an international character, war crimes are 'serious violations of Article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions' and '[o]ther serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in armed conflicts not of an international character'. The definitions contained in Article 8(2) thus require the Court to qualify situations as international armed conflict or non-international armed conflict for the exercise of its subject-matter jurisdiction. Awareness of the existence of armed conflict is required on the part of the perpetrator, but not of its character as international or non-international.[3]

In addition, in order for an act or omission to qualify as a war crime, there must be a nexus between the offence and a situation of armed conflict. It is not necessary for the existence of armed conflict to be regarded 'as the ultimate reason for the criminal conduct, nor must the conduct have taken place in the midst of the battle'.[4] However, the offence in question must have taken place in the context of an armed conflict and must be 'closely related to the hostilities'.[5] As noted by Professor William Schabas,

> Not all crimes committed during armed conflict are war crimes. Ordinary criminal acts—murder, rape, robbery, child and spousal abuse, fraud—continue to be perpetrated, but they do not become war crimes merely because there is a situation of armed conflict. Case law establishes that there must be a link or nexus between the acts of the accused and the armed conflict.[6]

The existence of armed conflict and the required nexus are evidentiary matters to be determined on the basis of case-specific analysis of facts. It is important to bear in mind that there is no definition of armed conflict in the Rome Statute or in the [3] The ICC Elements of Crimes state: (a) There is no requirement for a legal evaluation by the perpetrator as to the existence of an armed conflict or its character as international or non-international; (b) In that context there is no requirement for awareness by the perpetrator of the facts that established the character of the conflict as international or non-international; (c) There is only a requirement for the awareness of the factual circumstances that established the existence of an armed conflict that is implicit in the terms 'took place in the context of and was associated with'. See Elements of Crimes, Official Records of the ASP to the Rome Statute of the ICC, First Session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (United Nations publication, Sales No. E.03.V.2 and corrigendum), part II.B. See K Dörmann, 'War Crimes under the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, with a Special Focus on the Negotiations on the Elements of Crimes' (2003) 7 Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law 341, 359.

[4] Decision on the Confirmation of the Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, para. 380.

[5] Decision on the Confirmation of the Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007 ('Lubanga decision on the confirmation of charges'), para. 288. See also Judgment, Kunarac et al., IT-96-23&IT-96-23/1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 June 2002, para. 58: 'What ultimately distinguishes a war crime from a purely domestic offence is that a war crime is shaped by or dependent upon the environment—the armed conflict—in which it is committed. It need not have been planned or supported by some form of policy. The armed conflict need not have been causal to the commission of the crime, but the existence of an armed conflict must, at a minimum, have played a substantial part in the perpetrator's ability to commit it, his decision to commit it, the manner in which it was committed or the purpose for which it was committed. Hence, if it can be established, as in the present case, that the perpetrator acted in furtherance of or under the guise of the armed conflict, it would be sufficient to conclude that his acts were closely related to the armed conflict.'

[6] W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press) 207.

Elements of Crimes.[7] As a consequence, the basis for the qualification of situations is to be located elsewhere. In the absence of a definition, the Court has referred to 'applicable treaties and principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of international law of armed conflict' for guidance on the characterization of armed conflict.[8] In addition, reference has also been made to 'relevant jurisprudence of other tribunals which echo principles of the international law of armed conflict'.[9] The section that follows will consider the approach adopted in doing so.

30.3 The Characterization of Armed Conflict under the Rome Statute

The approach employed by the Court in its characterization of armed conflict has been shaped to a considerable extent by the jurisprudence of the ICTY. In the absence of a general definition of armed conflict in the Rome Statute or in the Elements of Crimes, the Court has on a number of occasions derived assistance from the case law of the tribunal. This section will explore the approach employed in doing so. It will examine the basis for relying on the jurisprudence of the tribunal as applicable law and will consider critically how the concept of armed conflict developed by the ICTY has been utilized by the Court.

Before scrutinizing the Court's jurisprudence on the characterization of armed conflict, it is useful to consider the scope of the applicable law. Article 21 of the Rome Statute states:

1. The Court shall apply: (a) In the first place, this Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence; (b) In the second place, where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict; (c) Failing that, general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards.
2. The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions.
3. The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3,

[7] This has been noted in a number of decisions of the Court. These include Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009 ('Bemba decision on the charges'), para. 217; Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 ('Lubanga trial judgment'), para. 531; and Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014 ('Katanga trial judgment'), para. 1172.

[8] Art 21(1)(b) ICC Statute.

[9] Bemba decision on the charges (n 7) para. 218.

> age, race, colour, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status.

As there is no general definition of armed conflict in the sources referred to in Article 21(1)(a), the Court has considered the matter 'pursuant to article 21(1)(b) of the Statute, and with due regard to article 21(3) of the Statute'.[10] Although necessary for the qualification of situations, the absence of general definition of armed conflict in the Rome Statute is not unusual. There is no such definition of armed conflict in any treaty of international law, including the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols thereto.[11] In the Geneva Conventions, the scope of armed conflict is defined by the terms of common Articles 2 and 3 which cover international and non-international armed conflict respectively. Common Article 2 refers to 'all cases of declared war or of any other armed conflict which may arise between two or more of the High Contracting Parties', while common Article 3 refers to 'armed conflict not of an international character'. As sources reflecting applicable law, these provisions have been referred to on a number of occasions by the Court in its characterization of armed conflict.

The Additional Protocols of 1977 added two additional categories of armed conflict to the schema of characterization created by the Geneva Conventions. Article 1(4) of Additional Protocol I expanded international armed conflict to include wars of national liberation:

> [A]rmed conflicts in which peoples are fighting against colonial domination and alien occupation and against racist régimes in the exercise of their right of self-determination, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations and the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.[12]

Article 1(1) of Additional Protocol II created a new category of non-international armed conflict distinct from that of common Article 3. These are conflicts 'which take place in the territory of a High Contracting Party between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups which, under responsible command, exercise such control over a part of its territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations and to implement this Protocol'.[13] Both Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols of 1977 created distinctions in international humanitarian law that had not previously existed. These distinctions emerged as a result of negotiations in the drafting of the treaties. The new categories

[10] Lubanga decision on the confirmation of charges (n 5) para. 205.

[11] Although Additional Protocol I and II contain definitions of international and non-international armed conflict, the terms of the definitions provided are peculiar to the instruments and not helpful for the characterization of situations in the contexts of the Rome Statute.

[12] Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Additional Protocol I) (signed 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 3.

[13] Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Additional Protocol II) (signed 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 609.

of armed conflict produced by the distinctions complicate and sometimes frustrate the applicability of the law. It is fortunate, therefore, that only the distinction reproduced in the Rome Statute is that created by the Geneva Conventions between international and non-international armed conflict. The distinctions created by the Additional Protocols do not feature in the Statute.

Although recognized as part of the established framework of the law of armed conflict, the appropriateness of maintaining the distinction between international and non-international armed conflict has been questioned by a number of commentators.[14] Arguments raised in this debate have been alluded to in the case law of the Court. In its Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, the Trial Chamber in the Lubanga case stated:

> It is to be observed at the outset that some academics, practitioners, and a line of jurisprudence from the ad hoc tribunals have questioned the usefulness of the distinction between international and non-international armed conflicts, particularly in light of their changing nature. In the view of the Chamber, for the purposes of the present trial the international/non-international distinction is not only an established part of the international law of armed conflict, but more importantly it is enshrined in the relevant statutory provisions of the Rome Statute framework, which under Article 21 must be applied. The Chamber does not have the power to reformulate the Court's statutory framework.[15]

The distinction between international and non-international armed conflict is thus one that will continue to be applied by the Court in the exercise of subject-matter jurisdiction over war crimes. As the alternative would require an amendment of the Rome Statute, it is anticipated that the distinction will be maintained to feature in the case law on characterization of armed conflict for the foreseeable future. The way in which the distinction will be conceptualized, however, is less predictable. This point will be returned to later when considering the test employed for internationalization of internal armed conflict. Before doing so, attention will be turned to the definition that rests at the heart of the Court's jurisprudence on the characterization of armed conflict.

As there is no formula for the characterization of armed conflict in the Statute, and as neither 'international armed conflict' nor 'armed conflict not of an international character' is defined in the sources referred to in Article 21(1)(a), the Court has relied heavily on the case law of the ICTY. In doing so, consonant with 'the established framework of the international law of armed conflict', the Court has referred to the concept of armed conflict that was first pronounced in the Tadić case.[16] In its Decision [14] Examples include the following authors: E Crawford, 'Unequal before the Law: The Case for the Elimination of the Distinction between International and Non-International Armed Conflicts' (2007) 20 Leiden Journal of International Law 441; J Stewart, 'Towards a Single Definition of Armed Conflict in International Humanitarian Law: A Critique of Internationalised Armed Conflict' (2003) 85 International Review of the Red Cross 313; G McDonald, 'The Eleventh Annual Waldemar A. Solf Lecture: The Changing Nature of the Laws of War' (1998) 156 Military Law Review 30.

[15] Lubanga trial judgment (n 7) para. 539.

[16] Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, AC, ICTY, 2 October 1995 ('Tadić jurisdiction decision'), para. 70. It is difficult to overstate the influence of this case on the Statute of the ICC. Delivered on 2 October 1995, the Appeal Chamber's Decision on on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction (Tadić Jurisdiction Decision), the Appeals Chamber stated the following definition of armed conflict as an obiter dictum:

> [A]n armed conflict exists whenever there is a resort to armed force between States or protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a State. International humanitarian law applies from the initiation of such armed conflicts and extends beyond the cessation of hostilities until a general conclusion of peace is reached; or, in the case of internal conflicts, a peaceful settlement is achieved. Until that moment, international humanitarian law continues to apply in the whole territory of the warring States or, in the case of internal conflicts, the whole territory under the control of a party, whether or not actual combat takes place there.[17]

This definition, credited to Judge Antonio Cassese,[18] has been incorporated into jurisprudence of the ICC. It represents the most authoritative contemporary standard for determining the existence of armed conflict.[19] International armed conflict is characterized as the 'resort to armed force between states', while the existence of non-international armed conflict is defined as 'protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a state'. This characterization of non-international armed conflict by the ICTY Appeals Chamber expanded significantly the applicability of international humanitarian law. According to Sonja Boelaert-Suominen,

> The seemingly innocuous description by the Appeals Chamber of what constitutes an armed conflict was innovative in various respects. First, it covers a variety of hypotheses and caters explicitly for conflicts between non-state entities. Second, whilst it sets a low threshold for the application of humanitarian law in general, it is particularly important for its consequences in relation to internal armed conflicts. The definition of armed conflict suggested by the Appeals Chamber covers not only the classic examples of (a) an armed conflict between two or more states and (b) a civil war between a state on the one hand, and a non-state entity on the other. It clearly encompasses a third situation, (c) an armed conflict in which no government party is involved, because two or more non-state entities are fighting each other.[20] the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction asserted for the first time the existence of individual criminal responsibility for violations of international humanitarian law in non-international armed conflict; it expanded the norms deemed applicable to non-international armed conflict on the basis of customary international humanitarian law, and provided a definition of armed conflict that has since become the most authoritative point of reference to establish subject-matter jurisdiction for the prosecution of war crimes. See generally, C Greenwood, 'International Humanitarian Law and the Tadic Case' (1996) 7 European Journal of International Law 265; P Rowe, 'The International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia: The Decision of the Appeals Chamber on the Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction in the Tadic Case' (1996) 45 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 691.

[17] Tadić jurisdiction decision (n 16) para. 70. [18] Rowe (n 16) 697.

[19] See A Cullen, The Concept of Non-International Armed Conflict in International Humanitarian Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010), 117–58.

[20] S Boelaert-Suominen, 'The Yugoslav Tribunal and the Common Core of Humanitarian Law Applicable to All Armed Conflicts' (2000) 13 Leiden Journal of International Law 619, 632–3.

The significance of the definition for the ICC is evident not only from its application in the case law of the Court, but also from the incorporation of text from Tadić into the Rome Statute. Article 8(2)(f) of the Rome Statute characterizes 'armed conflicts not of an international character' using similar language: 'protracted armed conflict between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups'.[21] The influence of the definition is also clear from its use in the characterization of various situations, including the DRC,[22] the CAR,[23] and Dafur, Sudan.[24] However, it is important to note that the Court's case law has not been entirely consistent: differences of interpretation are evident between decisions of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers. With regard to armed conflict not of an international character, the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Bemba case, citing the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges issued by the Lubanga Pre-Trial Chamber on 29 January 2007,[25] interpreted responsible command as a requirement for characterization of non-international armed conflict: ' "[O]rganized armed groups" must be under responsible command. In this regard, responsible command entails some degree of organization of those armed groups, including the possibility to impose discipline and the ability to plan and carry out military operations.'[26] The context of this statement by the Bemba Pre-Trial was its Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, issued on 15 June 2009.[27] On 14 March 2012 the Lubanga Trial Chamber issued its judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute which contained a different view to that of the Pre-Trial Chambers on the requirement of responsible command. In this judgment, the Trial Chamber stated:

> Article 8(2)(f) does not incorporate the requirement that the organised armed groups were 'under responsible command', as set out in Article 1(1) of Additional Protocol II. Instead, the 'organized armed groups' must have a sufficient degree of organisation, in order to enable them to carry out protracted armed violence.[28]

The inconsistency between Pre-Trial and Trial Chamber decisions raises important questions concerning the management of judicial practice and the role of Pre-Trial Chambers in the characterization of situations. This was reflected in the first report of the ICC Study Group on Governance, which states: 'A discussion is needed . . . to [21] Despite use of the word 'conflict' instead of 'violence' in Art 8(2)(f), there is evidence to suggest a threshold identical to that of Tadić. See A Cullen, 'The Definition of Non-International Armed Conflict in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: An Analysis of the Threshold of Application Contained in Article 8(2)(f)' (2008) 12 Journal of Conflict and Security Law 419.

[22] Lubanga decision on the confirmation of charges (n 5) para. 533; Katanga trial judgment (n 7) para. 1173.

[23] Bemba decision on the charges (n 7) para. 229.

[24] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, para. 59.

[25] Lubanga decision on the confirmation of charges (n 5) para. 232.

[26] Bemba decision on the charges (n 7) para. 234.

[27] A similar approach to the issue of responsible command was taken by the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Bashir case on 4 March 2009: Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, para. 59.

[28] Lubanga trial judgment (n 7) para. 536.

address the required extent of the legal interpretation made by the Pre-Trial Chamber as well as the necessary degree of precision of the legal characterization of facts and modes of liability.'[29] The issue identified by the Study Group on Governance is one that reflects the complexity of the Court as an institution and the issues of interpretation that it is required to resolve. It is foreseeable that such issues will continue to occupy the Working Group on Lessons Learnt as it reviews the working practices of the Court.[30] As an evidentiary requirement for the exercise of subject-matter jurisdiction, it is also foreseeable that the judicial practice will evolve as the Rules on Procedure and Evidence are amended, increasing consistency between Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers in the interpretation of armed conflict.

In terms of substantive law, it is clear that the distinction between international and non-international armed conflict will continue to play a fundamental role in the characterization of situations. For non-international armed conflict, the parties engaged in the conflict must possess a minimum level of organization and the hostilities must reach a certain threshold of intensity.[31] Control over territory is not required. In its Judgment pursuant to Article 74 of the Statute, the Lubanga Trial Chamber stated:

> Article 8(2)(f) of the Statute only requires the existence of a 'protracted' conflict between 'organised armed groups'. It does not include the requirement in Additional Protocol II that the armed groups need to 'exercise such control over a part of [the] territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations'. It is therefore unnecessary for the prosecution to establish that the relevant armed groups exercised control over part of the territory of the State.[32]

The level of organization required for a group to qualify as an 'organized armed group' need not imply the existence of responsible command or control over territory. It must, however, be sufficient for the purposes of engaging in armed violence of a particular intensity. The approach adopted by the Court in its interpretation of this organizational requirement has been a flexible one. The conditions associated with the level of organization required were characterized by the Lubanga Trial Chamber as follows:

> When deciding if a body was an organised armed group (for the purpose of determining whether an armed conflict was not of an international character), the following non-exhaustive list of factors is potentially relevant: the force or group's internal hierarchy; the command structure and rules; the extent to which military equipment, including firearms, are available; the force or group's ability to plan military operations and put them into effect; and the extent, seriousness, and intensity of any military involvement. None of these factors are individually determinative. The test, along with these criteria, should be applied flexibly when the Chamber is deciding [29] Study Group on Governance: Lessons Learnt: First Report of the Court to the ASP, IICC-ASP/11/31/Add.1, 23 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), 4.

[30] Study Group on Governance Working Group on Lessons Learnt: Second Report of the Court to the ASP, ICC-ASP/12/37/Add.1, 31 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP).

[31] These two related requirements for the characterization of non-international armed conflict are both derived from the Tadić case: Opinion and Judgment, Tadić, TC, ICTY, 7 May 1997, para. 561.

[32] Lubanga trial judgment (n 7) para. 536.

> whether a body was an organised armed group, given the limited requirement in Article 8(2)(f) of the Statute that the armed group was 'organized'.[33]

The Court thus explains the organizational requirement in terms of indicative criteria rather than stipulating a definitive threshold of organization. In doing so, it follows the approach employed in the case law of the ICTY and cites with approval tribunal judgments elucidating the level of organization required for the existence of armed conflict: the Limaj case, the Haradinaj case, and the Boškoski case.[34] Although the approach employed is balanced on the degree of flexibility it provides to characterize the broadest range of situations, the open-endedness of the requirement in itself does little to illuminate the parameters of non-international armed conflict. It must, therefore, always be considered in conjunction with the requirement of intensity.

The requirement relating to the intensity of hostilities is related to that of organization. According to the terms of Article 8(2)(d) and 8(2)(f), the level of armed violence must rise above that of 'internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence or other acts of a similar nature'. This language is taken from Article 1(2) of Additional Protocol II. According to the ICRC Commentary on Article 1(2),

> The concept of internal disturbances and tensions may be illustrated by giving a list of examples of such situations without any attempt to be exhaustive: riots, such as demonstrations without a concerted plan from the outset; isolated and sporadic acts of violence, as opposed to military operations carried out by armed forces or armed groups; other acts of a similar nature, including, in particular, large scale arrests of people for their activities or opinions.[35]

The exclusion of 'internal disturbances and tensions' in the Rome Statute reflects the lower threshold of non-international armed conflict under international humanitarian law.[36] This threshold determining the existence of armed conflict is fundamental to the exercise of subject-matter jurisdiction over war crimes. According to the Pre-Trial Chamber in the case of Gombo, 'this is ultimately a limitation on the jurisdiction of the Court itself, since if the required level of intensity is not reached, crimes committed in such a context would not be within the jurisdiction of the Court'.[37] In Lubanga, the Trial Chamber clarified conditions indicative of the required degree of intensity by reference to the ICTY cases of Prosecutor v Đorđević and Prosecutor v Mrkšić:

[33] Ibid., para. 537. [34] Id.

[35] International Committee of the Red Cross, Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Geneva: Martinus Nijhoff 1987) 1354, para. 4474.

[36] The Pre-Trial Chamber in the case of Bemba stated: '[I]n interpreting the concept of armed conflict not of an international character under the regime of the Statute, the Chamber concludes that an "armed conflict not of an international character" is characterized by the outbreak of armed hostilities of a certain level of intensity, exceeding that of internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence or other acts of a similar nature, and which takes place within the confines of a State territory. The hostilities may break out (i) between government authorities and organized dissident armed groups or (ii) between such groups.' See Bemba decision on the charges (n 7) para. 231.

[37] Ibid., para. 225.

> The intensity of the conflict is relevant for the purpose of determining whether an armed conflict that is not of an international character existed, because under Article 8(2)(f) the violence must be more than sporadic or isolated. The ICTY has held that the intensity of the conflict should be 'used solely as a way to distinguish an armed conflict from banditry, unorganized and short-lived insurrections, or terrorist activities, which are not subject to international humanitarian law.' In order to assess the intensity of a potential conflict, the ICTY has indicated a Chamber should take into account, inter alia, 'the seriousness of attacks and potential increase in armed clashes, their spread over territory and over a period of time, the increase in the number of government forces, the mobilisation and the distribution of weapons among both parties to the conflict, as well as whether the conflict has attracted the attention of the United Nations Security Council, and, if so, whether any resolutions on the matter have been passed.' The Chamber is of the view that this is an appropriate approach.[38]

The approach adopted is again one that mirrors the jurisprudence of the ICTY,[39] based on the concept of armed conflict developed from the Tadić case. The quotations from the Đorđević and Mrkšić cases are taken from the paragraphs which refer to the Tadić test for determining the existence of an armed conflict.[40] Both judgments note that the test has been consistently applied in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal and that there are two criteria associated with the test: (i) the intensity of the conflict and (ii) the organization of the parties.[41] According to Sylvain Vité, '[t]he ICTY's case law has not only identified the two constitutive elements of that concept, but has also put forward a wide range of indicative criteria making it possible to verify, on a case-by-case basis, whether each of these components has been achieved'.[42] Considering the depth of attention that has been given to the concept in the case law of the ICTY, and the authority that is now associated with the Tadić definition, it is foreseeable that the jurisprudence of this institution will continue to play a pivotal role in the characterization of situations by the Court.

In addition to clarifying the interpretation of 'armed conflict not of an international character', the decision of the Trial Chamber in Lubanga also illuminated the distinction between international and non-international armed conflicts.[43] In doing so, [38] Lubanga trial judgment (n 7) para. 538. This approach has also been followed in Katanga trial judgment (n 7) para. 1187.

[39] The judgment of the Trial Chamber in Limaj et al. states the following the approach employed by the ICTY in assessing intensity for the purposes of a situation as one of armed conflict: '[I]n assessing the intensity of a conflict, other Chambers have considered factors such as the seriousness of attacks and whether there has been an increase in armed clashes, the spread of clashes over territory and over a period of time, any increase in the number of government forces and mobilisation and the distribution of weapons among both parties to the conflict, as well as whether the conflict has attracted the attention of the United Nations Security Council, and, whether any resolutions on the matter have been passed.' Judgment, Limaj et al., IT-03-66-T, TC II, ICTY, 30 November 2005, para. 90.

[40] Public Judgment with Confidential Annex—Volume I of II, Đorđević, IT-05-87/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 23 February 2011, para. 1522; Judgment, Mrkšić et al., IT-95-13/1-T, TC II, ICTY, 27 September 2007, para. 407.

[41] Id.

[42] S Vité, 'Typology of Armed Conflicts in International Humanitarian Law: Legal Concepts and Actual Situations' (2009) 91 (973) International Review of the Red Cross 69, 94.

[43] Lubanga trial judgment (n 7) paras. 538–42. According to the Pre-Trial Chamber in Bemba, 'an international armed conflict exists in case of armed hostilities between States through their respective armed forces or other actors acting on behalf of the State'. Bemba decision on the charges (n 7) para. 223.

the Trial Chamber confirmed that 'international and non-international conflicts may coexist'.[44] Accordingly, the Chamber 'implicitly recognized that different legal frameworks may apply to the distinct conflicts occurring in such situations. Inter-state confrontations are governed by the law of international armed conflict, whereas other scenarios are subject to the law of non-international armed conflict'.[45]

The Lubanga Trial Chamber also confirmed the position adopted by the Pre-Trial Chamber on the conditions required for a change in status from a non-international to an international armed conflict:

> The Chamber considers an armed conflict to be international in character if it takes place between two or more States; this extends to the partial or total occupation of the territory of another State, whether or not the said occupation meets with armed resistance. In addition, an internal armed conflict that breaks out on the territory of a State may become international—or, depending upon the circumstances, be international in character alongside an internal armed conflict—if (i) another State intervenes in that conflict through its troops (direct intervention), or if (ii) some of the participants in the internal armed conflict act on behalf of that other State (indirect intervention).[46]

In the event of indirect intervention, the test for internationalization is one involving the exercise of 'overall control' by a state of an armed group. This test is derived from the Tadić Appeals Chamber judgment of 15 July 1999.[47] It is the standard employed for the qualification of prima facie internal armed conflict as either international or non-international, depending on the degree of control exercised by a state external to the armed conflict over the non-State Party to the conflict. The Lubanga Trial Chamber explained the basis for internationalization as a result of both direct and indirect intervention as follows:

> It is widely accepted that when a State enters into conflict with a nongovernmental armed group located in the territory of a neighbouring State and the armed group is acting under the control of its own State, 'the fighting falls within the definition of an international armed conflict between the two States'. However, if the armed group is not acting on behalf of a government, in the absence of two States opposing each other, there is no international armed conflict. Pre-Trial Chamber II, when considering this issue, concluded that 'an international armed conflict exists in case of armed hostilities between States through their respective armed forces or other actors acting on behalf of the State.' As regards the necessary degree of control of another State over an armed group acting on its behalf, the Trial Chamber has concluded that the 'overall control' test is the correct approach. This will determine whether an armed conflict not of an international character may have become internationalised due to the involvement of armed forces acting on behalf of another State. A State may exercise the required degree of control when it 'has a role in organising, coordinating or planning the military actions of the military group, in addition to financing, training and equipping or providing operational support to that group'.[48]

[44] Lubanga trial judgment (n 7) para. 540.
[45] S Vité, 'Between Consolidation and Innovation: The International Criminal Court's Trial Chamber Judgment in the Lubanga Case' (2012) 15 Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law 61, 64.
[46] Lubanga decision on the confirmation of charges (n 5) para. 209.
[47] Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999, para. 131.
[48] Lubanga trial judgment (n 7) para. 541. Emphasis in original.

This text describing the 'required degree of control' is taken from the Tadić Appeals Chamber judgment which sets out the test of 'overall control'. As a standard employed for the internationalization of armed conflict, the test does not require proof of instructions being issued from the authorities of state to an armed group; it is sufficient to show that the group acts as a de facto organ or agent of the state and that 'the group as a whole [is] under the overall control of the State'.[49]

Although the test of 'overall control' is employed consistently in the case law of the ICTY, and its incorporation into the jurisprudence of the ICC is unqualified, use of the test as a standard for the internationalization of armed conflict has not been uncontroversial. It has been criticized by a number of scholars for departing from the standard enunciated by the ICJ in the Nicaragua case.[50] Prior to the Tadić Appeals Chamber judgment, the test of 'effective control' pronounced in Nicaragua was applied as the standard for imputing responsibility for the acts of a non-state actor to a state external to an internal armed conflict. Use of the 'overall control' test as an alternative to the 'effective control' test has generated considerable debate over the applicable standard. As noted by Martti Koskenniemi in his report to the ILC on the Fragmentation of International Law, 'Tadic does not suggest "overall control" to exist alongside "effective control" either as an exception to the general law or as a special (local) regime governing the Yugoslav conflict. It seeks to replace that standard altogether'.[51] Considering that the test of 'effective control' has been used consistently in the jurisprudence of the ICJ since Nicaragua, the proposition that it should be replaced by a test developed by an ad hoc tribunal has been a source of considerable controversy.[52] In its judgment in the Case Concerning Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the ICJ stated:

> Insofar as the 'overall control' test is employed to determine whether or not an armed conflict is international, which was the sole question which the Appeals

[49] Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999, para. 120.

[50] Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v United States of America) (Merits) [1986] ICJ Rep 4, para. 109

[51] Fragmentation of International Law: Difficulties Arising from the Diversification and Expansion of International Law, UN Doc A/CN.4/L.682, 13 April 2006, para. 50. Emphasis in original.

[52] An example is provided in the commentary of Shane Spelliscy, who regards the approach taken by the Appeals Chamber as a danger to the cohesion of the international legal order: 'The Tadić decision by the ICTY is, perhaps, the most worrying because it involves one relatively subsidiary tribunal expressly breaking ranks with the clear, express and widely-accepted doctrine of the principal judicial arm of the United Nations, the ICJ. Now that the taboo of explicit conflicts has been overcome, the Tadić decision may signal the opening of a crack that will develop over the coming years. The Tadić decision may have opened the floodgates to explicit conflicts of jurisprudence among international tribunals.' ('The Proliferation of International Tribunals: A Chink in the Armor' (2001) 40 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 143, 169.)

See also P Rao, 'Multiple International Judicial Forums: A Reflection of the Growing Strength of International Law or its Fragmentation?' (2004) 25 Michigan Journal of International Law 929, 957; A Danner, 'When Courts Make Law: How the International Criminal Tribunals Recast the Laws of War' (2006) 59 Vanderbilt Law Review 1, 31; A Chase, 'Legal Mechanisms of the International Community and the United States Concerning State Sponsorship of Terrorism' (2004) 45 Virginia Journal of International Law Association 41, 112; M Sassoli and L Olson, 'International Decision: Prosecutor v Tadić (Judgment)' (2000) 94 American Journal of International Law 571, 575.

> Chamber was called upon to decide, it may well be that the test is applicable and suitable; the Court does not however think it appropriate to take a position on the point in the present case, as there is no need to resolve it for purposes of the present Judgment. On the other hand, the ICTY presented the 'overall control' test as equally applicable under the law of State responsibility for the purpose of determining—as the Court is required to do in the present case—when a State is responsible for acts committed by paramilitary units, armed forces which are not among its official organs. In this context, the argument in favour of that test is unpersuasive.[53]

The position expressed by the ICJ in the Bosnian Genocide case did little to settle the debate. Given the controversy that continues to surround the test of 'overall control', a more substantive elaboration by the ICC on the basis for its usage would be welcomed. Indeed, it is noteworthy that there are different views that exist within the Court concerning the merits of the test as the basis for the internationalization of armed conflict. In her Minority Opinion in the Katanga case, Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert dissented on the Trial Chamber's characterization of the situation in Ituri using the test of 'overall control', holding that 'law is far from settled'.[54] Given the significance of the test for the characterization of armed conflict, it would be helpful if the Court could provide a more detailed elucidation of the concept and an account of relevant state practice. This would clarify not only the basis for the qualification of armed conflict under the Rome Statute, but also an important aspect of one of the most fundamental distinctions in international humanitarian law: the distinction between international and non-international armed conflict. The section that follows will explore some further issues that may impact on characterization of armed conflict by the Court.

30.4 Issues Impacting on the Characterization of Armed Conflict by the ICC

As new situations continue to come before the Court, so too will challenges concerning characterization. Perhaps one of the most significant of these challenges will be to ensure the integrity of 'armed conflict' as a concept of international humanitarian law while at the same time allowing for the possibility of its future development.[55] In this context, it is instructive to recall how the meaning of the term has developed

[53] Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia and Montenegro) (Merits) [2007] ICJ Rep 43, para. 210.

[54] Minority Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436-AnxI, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014, para. 276 and note 382.

[55] The Commentary of the International Committee of the Red Cross states: 'The substitution of this much more general expression for the word "war" was deliberate. One may argue almost endlessly about the legal definition of "war". A State can always pretend, when it commits a hostile act against another State, that it is not making war, but merely engaging in a police action, or acting in legitimate self-defence. The expression "armed conflict" makes such arguments less easy.' J Pictet (ed.), Commentary I Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field (Geneva: ICRC 1952), 32.

since the drafting of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, in particular in relation to non-international armed conflict. At the time of the drafting of the Geneva Conventions, 'armed conflict not of an international character' was understood to refer to 'civil war'.[56] Since then, the term has evolved to cover situations that would never have been contemplated by the drafters of the Geneva Conventions. These include situations of guerrilla warfare and hostilities between non-state armed groups. The Geneva Conventions were designed with a view to regulating types of armed conflicts that took place in the decades preceding their adoption in 1949. Non-international armed conflict was regulated only to the extent that it resembled 'war' in the existence of 'belligerency', a concept that has now largely fallen into disuse. The interpretation of 'armed conflict' to include new kinds of situation presents significant challenges to the coherence of the law. As practice evolves, it is foreseeable that the interpretation of armed conflict may change in order to maintain its relevance, as it has done in the past. In order to protect the integrity of the concept, it would be important for such changes to be consistent with the rules of interpretation provided for under customary international law and Article 31 of the VCLT. If such rules are not adhered to, the creditability of characterization itself may be stretched to breaking point.

Another issue that may affect the Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction over war crimes is the over- or under-characterization of situations by involved parties. In the absence of an independent body to decide the applicability of international humanitarian law, questions concerning the characterization of non-international armed conflict are often extremely politicized. As noted by Sylvain Vité:

> The classification of situations of armed violence is also often linked to political considerations, as the parties involved endeavour to interpret the facts in accordance with their interests. On the basis of the margin of discretion allowed by the general terms of the legal categories, it is not unusual, for instance, for States to refuse to admit that they are involved in an armed conflict. They prefer to play down the intensity of the situation by claiming to carry out an operation to maintain public order. In so doing, they deny the applicability of humanitarian law. This tendency is encouraged by the fact that there is no independent international body authorized to decide systematically on cases that are likely to relate to one or other form of armed conflict.[57]

Considering the highly politicized nature of such situations, and the many examples of mischaracterization, it will be important for the Court to be cognizant of the various inconsistencies that exist in state practice and maintain an approach based upon objectively verifiable criteria. The establishment of an international independent body with authority to decide issues of characterization under international humanitarian law would be helpful. Although the decisions issued by such a body would not be binding on the Court, they could potentially serve as useful points of [56] The Report of the Joint Committee to the Plenary Assembly of the Diplomatic Conference states that '[i]t was clear that this referred to civil war'. 'Report drawn up by the Joint Committee and presented to the Plenary Assembly' in Final Record of the Diplomatic Conference of Geneva of 1949 vol. II-B (Berne: Federal Political Department) 129.

[57] Vité (n 42) 94.

reference. Considering the absence of a general definition of armed conflict in the statutory framework of the Court, and that the law employed in characterization includes 'applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict', it should be emphasized that an autonomous reading of the Court's jurisprudence does little to illuminate the approach employed. The context for characterization of situations is not one that is sui generis: the concepts applied by the Court are derived from case law of the ad hoc tribunals and shared with other judicial institutions that have been influenced by their jurisprudence.

A final issue that has a bearing on the Court's approach to the characterization of armed conflict concerns the development of international humanitarian law and the interpretation of 'armed conflict' by national courts and tribunals. As noted by Michael Bothe,

> Rules concerning the punishment of 'war crimes' are secondary rules in relation to the primary rules concerning behaviour which is prohibited in case of an armed conflict. Thus, the concept of war crimes is a dynamic concept, as it is bound to change with the development of the primary or substantive rules relating to that behaviour. But for that very reason, it is in the interest of the certainty of the law, which in criminal law matters is enshrined in the principle of nulla poena sine lege, that the acts which may be punished as war crimes are clearly defined. This is necessary because of the vague and general character of some of the primary rules, but also because not every breach of those rules may necessarily be characterized as a war crime.[58]

The tension that underlies the relationship between the war crimes contained in the Rome Statute and the development of international humanitarian law is one that also exists in the conceptualization of armed conflict as a basis for the exercise of subject-matter jurisdiction. The abstract nature of the concept means that each situation must be determined on a case-by-case basis. As such, there will always be a degree of uncertainty regarding the conditions that establish subject-matter jurisdiction and the awareness required on the part of the perpetrator.

The relationship between rules of international criminal law and those of international humanitarian law is complicated further when the role of state practice in the development of customary international humanitarian law is considered. Concepts such as 'proportionality', 'necessity', and 'humane treatment' are not static, but evolve as state practice contributes to the crystallization of customary law. As state practice feeds into the development of custom, the parameters of concepts of international humanitarian law have the potential to change. This has implications for the interpretation of related concepts of international criminal law, including the notion of armed conflict. In this context, it is furthermore important to bear in mind that the practice of states is also influenced by the practice of international organizations, such as the ICC. As the influence of the Court's jurisprudence becomes evident in more jurisdictions, a study of such dynamics would be a useful area for further research on the characterization of armed conflict.

[58] Bothe (n 2) 381.

30.5 Conclusion

The jurisprudence of the ICC on the characterization of armed conflict has developed through the utilization of concepts derived from case law of the ICTY. The most significant of these concerns the conceptualization of non-international armed conflict as 'protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups' and the test of 'overall control' for the internationalization of prima facie internal armed conflict. Although the incorporation of such concepts is arguably a positive development, a more detailed explanation of the basis for their use would be helpful. It would be helpful not only in illuminating the approach of the Court, but also for national courts in deciding similar issues of characterization in the domestic proceedings.

Ultimately, the legacy of the Court's jurisprudence on the characterization of armed conflict will depend on how developments in the conduct of armed conflict are dealt with in establishing subject-matter jurisdiction over war crimes. This will, to a large extent, be decided by the wisdom of the judges in their application of the rules of interpretation provided for under the VCLT and customary international law. In responding to changes in the practice of armed conflict, and the parallel evolution of international humanitarian law, it is foreseeable that the jurisprudence of the Court will influence the development of the concept beyond the sphere of the institution. A question that remains open is how the Court will build on existing jurisprudence to accommodate new kinds of armed conflict while maintaining the integrity of 'armed conflict' as a concept of international humanitarian law. This is, perhaps, the greatest challenge in the longer term facing the Court in the characterization of situations for the exercise of subject-matter jurisdiction over war crimes.

31

The Crime of Aggression

*Roger S. Clark

31.1 Introduction

Opening the case for the prosecution on the second day of the Nuremberg proceedings in 1945, Justice Robert Jackson uttered these immortal words about the crime against peace, or aggression:

> We must never forget that the record on which we judge these defendants today is the record on which history will judge us tomorrow. To pass these defendants a poisoned chalice is to put it to our own lips as well.[1]

With the trial over, this enthusiasm, perhaps never overwhelming in the capitals of the prosecuting nations, waned. None of the four Powers that undertook the Nuremberg Trial showed any enthusiasm in support of efforts at the United Nations in the immediate post-trial years to create a permanent international criminal court, whose jurisdiction would include the crime of aggression.[2] Of the four, the Soviet Union alone took action under domestic law to make it possible to penalize the crime of aggression.[3] There is no indication, however, that any prosecutions were ever brought concerning the USSR's subsequent foreign adventures. In the revitalized negotiations on the ICC in the 1990s, the Permanent Members of the Security Council were not to be found among the ranks of those pressing for the crime of aggression to be within its jurisdiction.[4] That was left to a dogged collection of

* Board of Governors Professor, Rutgers University.

[1] Nuremberg Trial Proceedings Vol. II, 21 November 1945.

[2] The depressing story is exhaustively documented by Nobel Peace Prize Nominee Ben Ferencz: B Ferencz, Defining International Aggression, The Search for World Peace: A Documentary History (Dobbs Ferry: Oceana Publications 1975).

[3] Of the 19 other Allied States adhering to the Nuremberg Charter, only Poland and Yugoslavia ultimately adopted domestic law on the crime of aggression. See numbers in A Reisinger Coracini, 'Evaluating Domestic Legislation on the Customary Crime of Aggression under the Rome Statute's Complementarity Regime' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 725, 734. The vast majority of about 25 domestic examples of legislation criminalizing aggression come from the countries emerging from Yugoslavia and the USSR.

[4] A nuanced argument against activating the Court's jurisdiction over the crime of aggression is that 'the ICC is not yet adequately experienced and established to effectively deal with the controversial and politically charged [crime of aggression]'. J Williams, 'Biting Off More Than It Can Chew? The International Criminal Court and the Crime of Aggression' (2012) 30 Australian Yearbook of International Law 201. Williams has an excellent discussion of the relevant literature. To the extent that there is any force to the argument, which I doubt, I believe that the delay until at least 2017 built into the 2010 amendments will more than compensate for 'inexperience'.

small and medium powers, including members of the Non-Aligned Movement and Germany,[5] to press the item forward. What this group of countries succeeded in getting into the Rome Statute was a statement that aggression was within the jurisdiction of the Court, but the details of making that promise operational were left to another day.

This chapter tells the story of the next round in the saga, the Amendments made to the Statute in Kampala in 2010 to fulfil the 1998 promise, albeit with some further delay. It also delineates the task of implementing them internationally and domestically. Section 31.2 of the chapter deals with the details of the Kampala Amendments and the efforts to obtain the necessary ratifications. Section 31.3 analyses what the options are for a diligent state that wishes to give practical effect to the Amendments under its domestic law. Section 31.4 draws some brief conclusions.

31.2 The Kampala Amendments on the Crime of Aggression

Activating the Court's jurisdiction over the crime of aggression was the most important piece of unfinished business from the Rome Diplomatic Conference in 1998.[6] Adding appropriate material to the Statute was the primary task of the First Review Conference on the Court which met in Kampala in June of 2010 and adopted a comprehensive set of amendments[7] aimed at allowing the Court to exercise its jurisdiction over the crime.

Article 5(1) of the Statute lists 'the crime of aggression' (along with genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes) as one of four items within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Court. However, paragraph 2 of Article 5 adds:

> The Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression once a provision is adopted in accordance with Articles 121 and 123 defining the crime and setting out the conditions under which the Court shall exercise jurisdiction with respect to this crime. Such a provision shall be consistent with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.[8]

Building on Article 5, the Final Act of the Rome Conference instructed the Preparatory Commission for the Court (PrepCom) to 'prepare proposals for a provision on aggression, including the definition and Elements of Crimes of Aggression and conditions under which the International Criminal Court shall exercise its

[5] Germany had written the following prohibition into its Basic Law in 1949: 'Acts tending to and undertaken with intent to disturb the peaceful relations between nations, especially to prepare for a war of aggression, shall be unconstitutional. They shall be made a criminal offence.' Art 26(1) Basic Law for the Federal Republic of Germany, 1949. Criminal legislation was duly adopted.

[6] The material in this section is based on and expands the discussion in R Clark, 'Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Considered at the First Review Conference on the Court, Kampala, 31 May–11 June 2010' (2010) 2 Goettingen Journal of International Law 689.

[7] The crime of aggression, ICC Resolution RC/Res.6, 11 June 2010.

[8] On the ambiguities in the reference to Arts 121 and 123 of the Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute'), see R Clark, 'Ambiguities in Arts 5(2) 121 and 123 of the Rome Statute' (2009) 41 Case Western Journal of International Law 413, 421–5.

jurisdiction with regard to this crime'.[9] 'Definition' here was understood to refer to the relevant substantive criminal law issues; 'conditions' required consideration of whether some organ of the United Nations (in particular the Security Council) could be able—or even required—to participate in the process alongside the Court and perhaps even to make a decision in respect of part of the elements of the crime that would be binding on the Court. The drafting task was not completed by the end of the life of the Preparatory Commission, and the Court's ASP created the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression (SWGCA) to carry forward the task. The SWGCA was open to participation by all states, members of the ICC, and non-members alike.[10]

The Group's ultimate effort on provisions and conditions was contained in its final Report to the Assembly in February 2009,[11] which was in front of the Review Conference. It was accompanied by some later suggestions which had been generated at a subsequent informal meeting of the ASP and by the last Chair of the Working Group, His Royal Highness Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid Al-Hussein, former President of the ASP.[12]

The essence of the SWGCA's draft comprised two Articles for addition to the Statute: 'Article 8*bis*' which contained the definition, and 'Article 15*bis*' which dealt with the conditions for exercise. Article 8*bis* did not contain any alternatives, representing a consensus that held in Kampala where this part of the SWGCA's work was adopted verbatim. Article 15*bis*, on the other hand, had offered many alternatives—notably variations on the theme of involvement vel non of the Security Council in the process by which a specific case would come before the Court. This Article was where most of the debate took place in Kampala. That difficult debate resulted in separation of the Working Group's 15*bis* into two Articles, 15*bis* and 15*ter*, covering the matters in the SWGCA's draft, but in a somewhat different manner which incorporated new proposals made in Kampala.[13]

As requested in the Final Act of Rome[14] draft Elements of Crimes had also been produced before Kampala, at the informal inter-sessional meeting of the Assembly held in June 2009.[15] While there was some doubt at the time whether these Elements would [9] Final Act of the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Annex I, Resolution F, UN Doc A/CONF.183/10 (17 July 1998), para. 7. The Final Act added the reference to Elements which is not mentioned specifically in Art 5.

[10] Continuity of work on the crime of aggression, ICC-ASP/1/Res.1, 9 September 2002.

[11] Report of the SWGCA, ICC-ASP/7/SWGCA/2, 20 February 2009.

[12] Non-paper by the Chairman on the Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/INF.2, 28 May 2009, Annex II, Informal inter-sessional meeting on the Crime of Aggression 8–10 June 2009, Liechtenstein Institute on Self-Determination, Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton Club ('Chairman's Non-Paper 2009').

[13] For good accounts of the negotiations, see J Bertram-Nothnagel, 'A Seed for World Peace Planted in Africa: The Provisions on the Crime of Aggression Adopted at the Kampala Review Conference for the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court' (2010) Africa Legal Aid Quarterly 9; N Blokker and C Kress, 'A Consensus Agreement on the Crime of Aggression: Impressions from Kampala' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 889; S Barriga and L Grover, 'A Historic Breakthrough on the Crime of Aggression' (2011) 105 American Journal of International Law 517; L Grover, 'Taking Traditional Realism Seriously—A Case Study of the Negotiations and Resolution on the Crime of Aggression' (2011) European Society of International Law Conference Paper Series, No. 7/2011; J Trahan, 'The Rome Statute's Amendment on the Crime of Aggression: Negotiations at the Kampala Review Conference' (2011) 11 International Criminal Law Review 49.

[14] See (n 9). [15] See (n 12).

be approved formally in Kampala, that was what in fact occurred, with little debate. A set of understandings, the juridical nature and effect of which has been debated,[16] was also adopted.[17]

In what follows in this section, I discuss what I believe are the most significant drafting choices that were ultimately made in Kampala in respect of the definition and the conditions for exercise of jurisdiction, as well as the relevant 'Elements of Crimes' for the crime of aggression.

31.2.1 Article 8*bis*—the definition

A major intellectual and juridical contribution of the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials after the Second World War was to take what in the past had been thought of essentially as a question of state responsibility and add to it an enforcement measure based on individual criminal responsibility. As the Nuremberg Tribunal said in a famous quotation, 'Crimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of international law be enforced'.[18] As the context of the Tribunal's discussion made plain, this is not to deny that there is still state responsibility as well.[19]

Article 8*bis* uses a drafting convention that builds on this combination of state and individual responsibility. It distinguishes between an 'act of aggression' (what a state does) and the 'crime of aggression' (what a leader does). 'Act of aggression' is defined[20] as 'the use of armed force by a State against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another State or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations'. This language, based on the United Nations Charter, is followed, in the second paragraph of the Article, by a reference to a list of 'acts' that 'shall, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974, qualify as an act of aggression'. These acts are (paraphrased): invasion, annexation, bombardment, blockade, attack on the armed forces of another state, using forces that are in a state by consent in contravention of the terms of their presence, allowing a state's territory to be used for the purposes of aggression by another, and sending by or on behalf of a state armed bands, groups, irregulars, or mercenaries, which carry out acts of armed force against another state. Resolution 3314 is the well-known effort of the General Assembly to define aggression so as to assist the Security Council in doing its work for the maintenance of peace and security[21], although the Security Council has been somewhat churlish in [16] K Heller, 'The Uncertain Status of the Aggression Understandings' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 229.

[17] Understandings regarding the amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the Crime of Aggression Annex III ('Understandings') (n 7).

[18] Judicial Decisions, 'International Military Tribunal (Nuremberg), Judgment and Sentences' (1947) 41 American Journal of International Law 172, 221.

[19] Art 25(4) ICC Statute confirms this approach: 'No provision in this Statute relating to individual criminal responsibility shall affect the responsibility of States under international law.'

[20] Art 8*bis*, para. 2, Amendments to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court on the Crime of Aggression, Annex I ('Amendments') (n 7).

[21] UNGA Res 3314 (XXIX) (14 December 1974) UN Doc A/9631.

its attitude towards accepting the 'help'. The resolution deals with state responsibility, but there was considerable support in the SWGCA for using it as the basis for a definition in the present context. Utilizing it was a significant drafting challenge. The ultimate wording of 8*bis* is aimed at avoiding the open-ended nature of Resolution 3314 which says, essentially, that the Security Council may decide that something that meets the definition is nonetheless not aggression and, on the other hand, that acts other than those on the list may be regarded by the Security Council as aggression.[22] As a political body, the Security Council may act in a completely unprincipled and arbitrary manner. A criminal Court which is constrained by the principle of legality[23] must be under more restraint. So the open textured aspects of 3314 needed some pruning and the Security Council's determination needed to be removed from the mix. The result is fairly precise. The list of 'acts' in Article 8*bis*(2), taken verbatim from Resolution 3314, may be open-ended to the extent that it does not say that no other acts can amount to aggression. However, any other potential candidates must surely be interpreted narrowly and ejusdem generis with the existing list.

So much, then, for the 'act of aggression'. For the 'crime of aggression', Article 8*bis* provides:

> For the purpose of this Statute, 'crime of aggression' means the planning, preparation, initiation or execution, by a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State, of an act of aggression which, by its character, gravity and scale, constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.[24]

The crime of aggression is thus a 'leadership' crime, a proposition captured by the element that the perpetrator has to be in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a state. There was considerable discussion in the SWGCA about how this applies to someone like an industrialist who is closely involved with the organization of the state but not formally part of its structure.[25]

Some support was shown for clarifying the matter by choosing language closer to that used in the United States Military Tribunals at Nuremberg, namely 'shape and influence',[26] rather than 'exercise control over or to direct', the words in 8*bis*.

[22] See Arts 2, 3, and 4 of the 1974 definition. [23] Art 22 ICC Statute.

[24] Art 8*bis*, para. 1 Amendments (n 20). Out of an abundance of caution, the following, underscoring the leadership quality of the crime, is added to Art 25(3) which deals with modes of criminal responsibility: 'In respect of the crime of aggression, the provisions of this Article shall apply only to persons in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State.'

[25] General Principles of Criminal Law, ICC-ASP/3/SWGCA/INF.1, 13 August 2004, para. 49, Informal inter-sessional meeting of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression 21–3 June 2004, Liechtenstein Institute on Self-Determination, Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University: '[I]t was also suggested that all persons in a position to exert decisive influence over the policies of the State should be held criminally responsible, so that political, social, business and spiritual leaders could be included within the leadership group.' See also K Heller, 'Retreat from Nuremberg: The Leadership Requirement for the Crime of Aggression' (2007) 18 European Journal of International Law 477.

[26] ICC-ASP/6/SWGCA/INF.1, 25 July 2007, para. 12, Informal inter-sessional meeting of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression 11–14 June 2007, Liechtenstein Institute on Self-Determination, Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University. The preparatory work suggests that industrialists are potentially covered by the amendments, although no formal language was added to that effect.

American and French prosecutions at the end the Second World War had made it clear that industrial leaders could potentially be responsible for the crime of aggression, although none was ultimately convicted.[27]

Note should also be taken at this point of the 'threshold' clause at the end of the definition of 'crime of aggression', indicating that not every act of aggression is the basis for criminal responsibility. It is only those which by their character, gravity, and scale constitute a 'manifest' violation of the Charter.[28] The need for such a limitation was strongly debated, but most participants finally accepted that they could live with it in return for removal of any requirements that there be a 'war of aggression' or that the list of acts in the definition of 'act of aggression' be more limited than the list in General Assembly Resolution 3314. Some speakers thought it might help in analysing a (rare) case of principled humanitarian intervention, or a case more generally in a grey area where the legality of the action was definitely in doubt. In a speech to the Conference on 4 June 2010, the Legal Adviser to the US Department of State insisted, tendentiously, that:

> If Article 8*bis* were to be adopted as a definition, understandings would need to make clear that those who undertake efforts to prevent war crimes, crimes against humanity or genocide—the very crimes the Rome Statute was designed to deter—do not commit 'manifest' violations of the U.N. Charter within the meaning of Article 8*bis*. Regardless of how states may view the legality of such efforts, those who plan them are not committing the 'crime of aggression' and should not run the risk of prosecution.[29]

Two paragraphs of the 'understandings' annexed to the Review Conference's resolution adopting the amendments on the Crime of Aggression[30] address these matters, apparently giving comfort to the United States:

> 6. It is understood that aggression is the most serious and dangerous form of the illegal use of force; and that a determination whether an act of aggression has been committed requires consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case, including the gravity of the acts concerned and their consequences, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.
> 7. It is understood that in establishing whether an act of aggression constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations, the three components of character, gravity and scale must be sufficient to justify a 'manifest' determination. No one component can be significant enough to satisfy the manifest standard by itself.[31]

With these seemingly harmless comments, the SWGCA's work on the definition part of Article 8bis was adopted in Kampala.

[27] Heller (n 25). [28] See (n 24).
[29] Statement by Harold Koh, Legal Adviser to the US Department of State, at the Review Conference on the ICC (4 June 2010).
[30] Understandings (n 17). [31] Id.

31.2.2 The Elements of Crimes

The Elements of Crimes for the crime of aggression[32] do not add anything of substance to the definition,[33] but they clarify the details significantly. They read:

1. The perpetrator planned, prepared, initiated or executed an act of aggression.
2. The perpetrator was a person[34] in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of the state which committed the act of aggression.
3. The act of aggression—the use of armed force by a state against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations—was committed.
4. The perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established that such a use of armed force was inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations.
5. The act of aggression, by its character, gravity and scale, constituted a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.
6. The perpetrator was aware of the factual circumstances that established such a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations.[35]

The Elements were drafted along the lines of the Elements completed in 2000 for the other crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes.[36] The drafters of those earlier Elements had concluded that their handiwork needed to use the scheme set forth in Article 30 of the Statute as a structure.[37] While it is headed 'mental element', the Article also suggests a framework for the 'material' or physical elements of the Rome crime also. The mental element, at least in the normal case, is intent and knowledge. This serves as a default rule which does not need to be stated unless something different applies. The material elements are conduct, consequence, and circumstance.[38] The Elements had also to take account [32] Amendments (n 20).

[33] Art 9 ICC Statute says that the Elements 'shall assist the Court in the interpretation and application' of the substantive crimes in the Statute.

[34] Amendments to the Elements of Crimes, Annex II ('Elements') (n 7): 'With respect to an act of aggression, more than one person may be in a position to meet these criteria.' (Note 1 in original.)

[35] Elements (n 7).

[36] Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3 (part II-B), 9 September 2002.

[37] An important feature of the Rome Statute, not found in previous international criminal instruments, was a comprehensive 'general part'. See R Clark, 'Drafting a General Part to a Penal Code: Some Thoughts Inspired by the Negotiations on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and by the Court's First Substantive Law Discussion in the Lubanga Dyilo Confirmation Proceedings' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 519. Making sure that the Kampala Amendments and the Elements of the Crime of Aggression 'fit' with the general part was an important part of the work of the SWGCA. For detailed discussion, see R Clark, 'General Principles of Criminal Law' in S Barriga and C Kress (eds), The Crime of Aggression—A Commentary (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, forthcoming).

[38] See generally, R Lee et al. (eds), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001); R Clark, 'The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences' (2001) 12 Criminal Law Forum 291.

of Article 32 of the Statute which deals with mistakes of fact and mistakes of law.[39] Several comments need to be made about how Articles 30 and 32 of the Statute play out here in dealing with aggression.[40]

In the first place, the default rule derived from Article 30 applies to Element 2—the perpetrator must be shown to know that he or she fitted the relevant category.[41] On the other hand, Element 4 modifies the default rule in such a way as to minimize the possible application of a 'mistake of law' defence under Article 32 of the Statute. As the Chairman's Explanatory Note points out:[42]

> [A] mental element requiring that the perpetrator positively know that the State's acts were inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations (effectively requiring knowledge of law) may have unintended consequences. For example, it may encourage a potential perpetrator to be willfully blind as to the legality of his or her actions, or to rely on disreputable advice supporting the legality of State acts, even if that advice is subsequently shown to have been incorrect.[43]

The Note gives examples of a similar type of finesse of the mistake of law issue concerning other crimes.[44] It also offers some examples of 'relevant facts', knowledge of which by the perpetrator could, in appropriate circumstances, bring him or her within the element: 'the fact that the use of force was directed against another State, the existence or absence of a Security Council resolution, the content of a Security Council resolution, the existence or absence of a prior or imminent attack by another State.'[45] The Note adds[46] that, '[i]n any event, a perpetrator could still raise a defense of mistake of fact as to this element which, if proven, would result in acquittal'.[47]

[39] Art 31 provides: '1. A mistake of fact shall be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility only if it negates the mental element required by the crime. 2. A mistake of law as to whether a particular type of conduct is a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall not be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility. A mistake of law may, however, be a ground for excluding criminal responsibility if it negates the mental element required by such a crime, or as provided for in Article 33.' (Art 33 relates to the defence of superior orders.)

[40] What follows is reflective particularly of the Explanatory Note in Appendix II of the 2009 Chairman's Non-Paper on the Elements of Crimes ('Explanatory note') (n 12).

[41] Ibid., para. 14. [42] Ibid., para. 18.

[43] Ibid., para. 21, points to a connection between the defence of mistake and the requirement that only 'manifest' violations of the Charter are made criminal. Some instances of mistake will be washed out under the manifest requirement.

[44] Ibid., note 7, which reads: For example, factual circumstances establishing the lawfulness of a person's presence in an area (Elements of Crimes, article 7(1)(d) crime against humanity of deportation or forcible transfer of population, Elements 2 and 3); the protected status of a person under the Geneva Conventions (see Elements for most of the war crimes, for example Art 8(2)(a)(i) war crime of wilful killing, Elements 2 and 3); or the existence of an armed conflict (see Elements for most of the war crimes, for example Art 8(2)(a)(i) war crime of willful killing, Element 5). On these finesses of mistake of law by re-characterizing the issue as one of fact, see Clark (n 38) 330–1. My guess is that the Court will treat this as a judgment call on the part of the drafters of the Elements which is entitled to deference. If the Court wishes to overturn this approach, it would need to find that this strategy is ultra vires the Statute—the Elements are always subservient to the Statute. See Art 9(3) ICC Statute.

[45] Explanatory note (n 40) para. 20. [46] Id.

[47] Ibid., para. 21. 'Proven' is an awkward word in this sentence in light of Art 67(1)(i) ICC Statute which says that the accused is entitled '[n]ot to have imposed on him any reversal of the burden of proof or any onus of rebuttal'. The accused may have to shoulder the burden of producing evidence on the issue, but not of establishing the matter affirmatively.

In a similar vein, Element 6 governs the mental element required for the circumstance element that the act of aggression must be a 'manifest'[48] violation of the Charter. Once again, the emphasis is on awareness of the factual circumstances, not an evaluation of them by the actor. To summarize, as the special Introduction to the Elements of the Crime of Aggression puts it, '[a]s a result of Element 4, there is no requirement to prove that the perpetrator has made a legal evaluation as to the inconsistency with the Charter of the use of armed force by the State'. Similarly, '[a]s a result of Element 6, there is no requirement to prove that the perpetrator had made a legal evaluation as to the "manifest" nature of the violation'.[49]

31.2.3 Structure of Articles 15*bis* and 15*ter*—'conditions'

The Special Working Group had been less successful in resolving the issue of conditions than that of definition. The second sentence of Article 5, paragraph 2 of the Statute, added without public debate in the last days of the Rome Conference,[50] states that the provision on aggression 'shall be consistent with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations'. By and large, the Permanent Members of the Security Council took the position in the negotiations that Article 39 of the Charter confers on them the 'exclusive' power to make determinations of the existence of an act of aggression, and thus a Security Council pre-determination of aggression is an essential precondition to exercise of the ICC's jurisdiction. Most other states pointed out that Article 24 of the Charter confers 'primary' power on the Council in respect of the maintenance of international peace and justice and that 'primary' does not mean 'exclusive'. They added that the General Assembly has made several findings of aggression and that the United States, the United Kingdom, and France were co-sponsors of the 1950 Uniting for Peace Resolution which recognizes the Assembly's powers,[51] and that all five of the Permanent Members have voted pursuant to that resolution when it suited them. Non-permanent Members tended to add that the ICJ has addressed issues where aggression is in play.[52] Like the Security Council, however, the ICJ has been leery of actually using the word 'aggression'. The draft sent to Kampala included the [48] 'Manifest', according to the special Introduction to the Chairman's Non-Paper (n 12), 'is an objective qualification'. In that report, in response to a question about what this entailed, '[i]t was suggested that the Court would apply the standard of "reasonable leader", similar to the standard of the "reasonable soldier" which was embodied in the concept of manifestly unlawful orders in article 33 of the Rome Statute'. See also the two Understandings adopted in Kampala which underscore the objective nature of the requirement that the breach be manifest (nn 30–1). For more on the 'manifest' requirement, see J Potter, 'The Threshold in the Proposed Definition of the Crime of Aggression' (2008) 6 New Zealand Yearbook of International Law 155.

[49] Chairman's Non-Paper (n 12) para. 21.

[50] See Clark (n 8) 424.

[51] UNGA Res 377 (V) A (3 November 1950) UN Doc A/1775. In that resolution, the Assembly '[r]esolves that if the Security Council, because of lack of unanimity of the permanent members, fails to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in any case where there appears to be a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression, the General assembly shall consider the matter immediately with a view to making appropriate recommendations to Members for collective measures, including in the case of a breach of the peace or act of aggression the use of armed force where necessary, to maintain or restore international peace and security'.

[52] Most recently in Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (DR Congo v Uganda) [2005] ICJ Rep 168.

General Assembly and the ICJ as alternative 'filters' for the crime of aggression in the absence of Security Council action, but these were deleted in Kampala.

The major achievement in this part of the negotiation in the period of the Special Working Group was to de-couple the definition from the conditions. In the version of the definition and conditions for aggression that was on the table at the end of the life of the Preparatory Commission,[53] the Security Council (or possibly the General Assembly or the ICJ) would make a definitive decision on the existence of the element of 'act of aggression' which was binding on the ICC. Not only would this subvert the power of the Court to decide itself on the existence or otherwise of all the elements of the crime, but it would make it extremely difficult to build a criminal offence around a structure where one of the key elements was decided elsewhere, and potentially on the basis of totally political considerations. In such circumstances, there would probably be unbearable weight placed on the mental element provisions of Article 30 of the Statute,[54] the mistake provisions of Article 32,[55] or on the 'manifest' threshold.[56] This was removed in the Special Working Group's draft[57] and in the ultimate language adopted in Kampala. Any determination elsewhere is of a preliminary nature, although it may surely have some evidentiary value. This opened the way for focusing on the various options put before the Review Conference of giving the Security Council (or other United Nations organ) a 'filter' role, providing either a 'green light' (permission to go forward) or a 'red light' (denial of right to go forward) to the ICC's proceedings. There was, however, a solid group of states strongly behind the proposition that the Court should be able to proceed even in the absence of action (positive or negative) by someone else.

The resolution of these divergent positions in Kampala was facilitated by the move to split the SWGCA's draft Article 15*bis* into two parts, one dealing with state referrals and referrals made by the prosecutor proprio motu, and the other dealing with Security Council referrals.[58] These became, respectively, Articles 15*bis* and 15*ter*. Article 15*ter* referrals are the most straightforward to describe and it will thus be helpful to discuss them first.

Paragraph 1 of Article 15*ter* is the basic provision authorizing the Court to exercise its jurisdiction under the Statute in respect of the crime of aggression, when a referral is made by the Security Council. It provides that '[t]he Court may exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with Article 13, paragraph (b), subject to the provisions of this Article'.[59]

Then follow two paragraphs designed to provide a set of conditions and a timeframe for paragraph 1 to come into play. Paragraph 2 says that the Court 'may exercise jurisdiction only with respect to crimes of aggression committed one year after the ratification or acceptance of amendments by thirty States Parties'.[60] Paragraph 3 says that

[53] Discussion Paper Proposed by the Coordinator (11 July 2002) UN Doc PCNICC/2002/WGCA/RT.1/Rev.2.

[54] See (nn 37–8). [55] See (n 39). [56] See (nn 28–31). [57] See (n 11).

[58] Under Arts 13 to 15 of the ICC Statute, action may be 'triggered' either by a referral from the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, a referral by a State Party, or by the Prosecutor acting proprio motu, on her own initiative.

[59] Art 15*ter*, para. 1 Amendments (n 20). [60] Ibid., para. 2.

the Court 'shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with this Article, subject to a decision to be taken after 1 January 2017 by the same majority of States Parties as is required for the adoption of an amendment to the Statute'.[61] The required majority at this later date is thus two-thirds of all the States Parties at the relevant time.[62] Accordingly, the earliest date on which these provisions can become operative is the date on which the decision is made by the ASP after 1 January 2017. If the 30 ratifications have been received by then (or at least a year before then, practically speaking by 31 December 2016), all is well; otherwise, there will be a further delay until one year after the 30 ratifications are obtained.

It should be noted that the requirement of 30 ratifications here is a 'procedural' hurdle to enabling the Court to exercise its jurisdiction. It does not mean that the Security Council is limited to making aggression referrals only in respect of those states that have ratified the amendment (or the Statute itself, for that matter). The nationals of any states may be the subject of a referral once the timing and ratification requirements are met.[63]

Paragraph 4 adds the important principle that '[a] determination of an act of aggression by an organ outside the Court shall be without prejudice to the Court's own findings under this Statute'.[64] Including this language in the Article dealing with Security Council referrals underscores the way the negotiation developed towards making the Court master of its own decisions in respect of the elements of a particular (alleged) crime of aggression.

So much for Security Council referrals. Article 15*bis*, as finally adopted, deals with the exercise of jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in the case of state referrals and referrals by the prosecutor proprio motu. The Court is authorized to exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression in accordance with Article 13, paragraphs (a) and (c), subject to the other provisions of the Article. Once again, there is the requirement of ratification or acceptance by 30 States Parties, the passage of a year after that, and the further vote after 1 January 2017. Then follows a strange 'opt-out'[65] provision that reads:

> The Court may, in accordance with Article 12, exercise jurisdiction over a crime of aggression, arising from an act of aggression committed by a State Party, unless that State Party has previously declared that it does not accept such jurisdiction by

[61] Ibid., para. 3.

[62] Art 121(3) ICC Statute provides that '[t]he adoption of an amendment at a meeting of the Assembly of States Parties or at a Review Conference on which consensus cannot be reached shall require a two-thirds majority of the States Parties'. This means all the parties, not just those present and voting. There are currently 123 parties, so that a majority of 82 would be appropriate. More ratifications and accessions of the Rome Statute itself are in the offing, so the numbers will increase by 2017.

[63] See Understanding 2 (n 17): 'It is understood that the Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression on the basis of a Security Council referral in accordance with Art 13, para. (b), of the Statute irrespective of whether the State concerned has accepted the Court's jurisdiction in this regard.'

[64] Art 15*ter*, para. 4 Amendments (n 20). An identical provision appears also in Art 15*bis*, para. 9.

[65] An 'opt-out' clause is more likely to result in more parties being bound than is the case with an 'opt-in' clause. For an excellent discussion of how variations on treaty architecture affect participation, see J Galbraith, 'Treaty Options: Towards a Behavioral Understanding of Treaty Design' (2013) 53 Virginia Journal of International Law 309.

lodging a declaration with the Registrar. The withdrawal of such a declaration may be effected at any time and shall be considered by the State Party within three years.[66]

Note, in particular, that this passage addresses the exercise of jurisdiction over a crime of aggression, 'arising from an act of aggression committed by a State Party'. 'State Party' must mean State Party to the Rome Statute. There is no suggestion here that the Court's jurisdiction is limited to those states that have ratified the amendment. A state which has not done so, can, on the plain language of the amendment, protect its people from the jurisdiction by utilizing the opt-out provision. Indeed, the opt-out language, on its face, seems to be coherent only on the possibility that any State Party may want to opt out.

There is a possible counter-argument to this, based on the procedure adopted for bringing the amendments into force. Article 121 of the Rome Statute deals with amendments. After providing that the 'adoption' of an amendment requires a two-thirds majority of States Parties,[67] unless a consensus can be reached, it continues:

4. Except as provided in paragraph 5, an amendment shall enter into force for all States one year after instruments of ratification have been deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations by seven-eighths of them.
5. Any amendment to Articles 5, 6, 7 and 8 of this Statute shall enter into force for those States Parties which have accepted the amendment one year after the deposit of their instruments of ratification or acceptance. In respect of a State Party that has not accepted the amendment, the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction regarding a crime covered by the amendment when committed by that State Party's nationals or on its territory.[68]

There was considerable debate in the SWGCA about how these two provisions play out in respect of the crime of aggression, and indeed, whether it was sufficient for the amendments to be 'adopted' under paragraph 3 of the Article.[69] A subsidiary argument was the question, if paragraph 5 applies, of how far the second sentence (excepting jurisdiction over the nationals and territory or non-accepting states for new crimes) applies to the 'special case' of aggression. After all, aggression is already 'within the jurisdiction' of the Court; at issue is the 'exercise' of that jurisdiction. The second sentence of paragraph 5 would certainly apply to the introduction of a new offence (say terrorism or large-scale drug trafficking) into the Court's jurisdiction, but did it have any force with respect to aggression? Some light may be shone on the question by paragraph 1 of the Kampala adopting resolution. The Conference:

[d]ecides to adopt, in accordance with Article 5, paragraph 2, of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (hereinafter: 'the Statute') the amendments to the Statute contained in annex I of the present resolution, which are subject to ratification or acceptance and shall enter into force in accordance with Article 121, paragraph 5; and notes that any State Party may lodge a declaration referred to in Article 15*bis* prior to ratification or acceptance.[70]

[66] Art 15*bis*, para. 4 Amendments (n 20).
[67] Art 121(3) ICC Statute.
[68] Art 15*ter*, paras 4 and 5.
[69] Clark (n 8) 416–17.
[70] The crime of aggression (n 7) operative para. 1.

Note the italicized clause. Does it mean that the reference to ratification and acceptance and to entry into force merely relates to the need for 30 ratifications or acceptances, and that the reference to Article 121(5) is to the first sentence of that provision and not to the second sentence? This argument emphasizes 'shall enter into force'—what the first sentence of paragraph 5 is about. Or does it mean that, while the Court cannot exercise its jurisdiction until the 30 ratifications are received[71] and the ASP adopts the necessary resolution, an aggressor state that fails to accept the amendments is never bound by them for events on its territory or the actions of its citizens (unless the Security Council acts)? Recall the language of the second sentence of 121(5): 'In respect of a State Party which has not accepted the amendment, the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction regarding the crime covered by the amendment when committed by that State Party's nationals or on its territory.'[72] The argument for applying the second sentence to the Kampala Amendments perhaps relies on the words 'in accordance with' before 'paragraph 5'. 'In accordance' possibly emphasizes the whole of the paragraph, including its second sentence. Of course, if that result is what they wanted, the drafters could have clarified matters by avoiding a vague phrase like 'in accordance with'[73] and saying something like 'subject to all the requirements of Article 121, paragraph 5'.[74]

Indeed, there were drafters present in Kampala who faced the Article 121 (5) issue head-on for amendments to Article 8 of the Statute.[75] Relevant amendments (adding provisions on proscribed weapons in the material dealing with non-international armed conflict) were deemed amendments within the meaning of Article 121, paragraph 5.[76] Accordingly, the second preambular paragraph of the Conference's adopting resolution on weapons provides:

[71] This, combined with Art 15*bis*, para. 2 and Art 15*ter*, para. 2, modifies the effect of para. 5 which, in respect of other amendments to which it relates (such as those made to Art 8 of the Statute in Kampala), applies to the first and subsequent ratifiers seriatim, one year after each deposits its instrument, with the result also that the Court may exercise jurisdiction over the offence for that State from that time on. However, for aggression, 30 parties are required before the Court exercises its jurisdiction over any of the 30. To take a simple example, Liechtenstein ratified both the aggression and Art 8 amendments on 9 May 2012. The amendments thus entered into force for Liechtenstein a year later, on 9 May 2013. The effect of this is that the Court may now exercise its jurisdiction over the Art 8 offence in respect of Liechtenstein; it may not, however, exercise jurisdiction over the Art 8*bis* offence until there are 30 acceptances and the ASP adopts the necessary resolution. In short, a classic example of the importance of contextual meaning is in play; 'in force' for the Art 8 offence means both that the State is bound by it and that the Court can exercise jurisdiction over breaches for that State; 'in force' for the aggression amendments has only a symbolic meaning until the 30 acceptances are reached and the ASP resolves to make the amendments effective.

[72] See (n 68). [73] Which, after all, helped create some of the problems with Art 5(2) itself.

[74] Note that the first paragraph of the Kampala Amendments (n 20) asserts: 'Art 5, paragraph 2, of the Statute is deleted.' How can that be squared with a literal application of Art 121(5)? How can the paragraph be deleted for some parties, but not all? Moreover, the second sentence of Art 121(5) is redundant in such a situation.

[75] Amendments of Art 8 of the Rome Statute, ICC Resolution RC/Res.5. On this amendment, see A Alamuddin and P Webb, 'Expanding Jurisdiction over War Crimes under Art 8 of the ICC Statute' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1219; Clark (n 6) 707–11.

[76] It might have been possible to draft the Art 8 amendment in such a manner as to invoke Art 121(4) and thus make the amendment effective on all, once seven-eighths of the parties accepted. This was controversial and was not the path chosen by the drafters, who clearly invoked Art 121(5). See R Clark, 'Building on Art 8(2)(b)(xx) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Weapons and Methods of Warfare' (2009) 12 New Criminal Law Review 366, 385–9.

> Noting Article 121, paragraph 5, of the Statute which states that any amendment to Articles 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the Statute shall enter into force for those States Parties which have accepted the amendment one year after the deposit of their instruments of ratification or acceptance and that in respect of a State Party which has not accepted the amendment, the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction regarding the crime covered by the amendment when committed by that State Party's nationals or on its territory, and confirming its understanding that in respect to this amendment the same principle applies in respect of a State Party which has not accepted the amendment applies also in respect of States that are not parties to the Statute.[77]

Can any indications be drawn from the obvious differences between the language here, namely the reference to not binding parties to the Statute who do not accept the amendment, and in the aggression provision with its simple reference to 'an act of aggression committed by a State Party'?

Personally, I believe that the plain language of Article 15*bis*, paragraph 4, and its reference to a 'State Party', coupled with the right to opt out and the differences in the drafting of the Article 8 amendment, override any inferences to be gleaned from the less than clear statement in the adopting resolution. If there is no requirement that a state opt in, why give it a right to opt out?[78]

The effect of the language also seems to be that a State Party may ratify the amendment and constitute one of the 30 states necessary to bring it into force, but block the application of state or proprio motu triggers of the jurisdiction with respect to itself. (Like all other states, it apparently cannot protect its nationals from being the subject of a Security Council referral.) As I have suggested elsewhere,[79] '[i]t would take some nerve to help make up the thirty and then opt out, but one should never underestimate the acrobatic ability of the diplomatic mind in construing the national interest'.

Paragraph 5 addresses the non-State Party problem. It was of particular significance for the three Permanent members of the Security Council who have not become party to the Rome Statute—China, the Russian Federation, and the United States—and for other non-parties who are wont to use force outside their own territories. It provides [77] The next preambular paragraph addresses an issue discussed inconclusively in the aggression negotiations but not mentioned ultimately in the aggression amendments: 'Confirming that, in light of the provision of Art 40(5) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, States that subsequently become States Parties to the Statute will be allowed to decide whether to accept the amendment contained in this resolution at the time of ratification, acceptance or approval of, or accession to the Statute.' Art 40(5) of the VCLT (signed 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331 is a default rule that must be subject to being set aside, expressly and perhaps impliedly. It provides: 'Any State which becomes a party to the treaty after the entry into force of the amending agreement shall, failing an expression of a different intention by that State: (a) be considered as a party to the treaty as amended; and (b) be considered as a party to the unamended treaty in relation to any party to the treaty not bound by the amending agreement.' There will no doubt be some debate in the future about whether the aggression amendments, on the other hand, apply to future parties who do not expressly accept them. Reading them as a whole, I think they do, subject to opting out. It is irrelevant whether the new member makes any specific reference to them one way or the other—the important point is to become a State Party.

[78] See also the concluding words of paragraph 1 of the Kampala adopting resolution (n 70), in which the Conference 'notes that any State Party may lodge a declaration referred to in Art 15 bis prior to ratification or acceptance'. This language makes no sense if ratification or acceptance is required to make the provisions applicable to a State Party.

[79] Clark (n 6) 704–5.

that '[i]n respect of a State that is not a party to this Statute, the Court shall not exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression when committed by that State's nationals or on its territory'.[80]

In the negotiations leading up to Kampala, there was widespread support for the proposition that where an aggression occurs against a State Party to the Statute, the Article 12 precondition of ratification by the state of territoriality should be sufficient for the Court's jurisdiction. Article 12 requires that either the state of territoriality or the state of nationality be a party. An aggression, so the argument goes, can, as a matter of territoriality, take place both in the state where the aggression is plotted, and in the place where it is executed (the 'victim state'). This is in accordance with the normal rules on 'effects' or 'objective territorial' jurisdiction[81] and seems to be the case with genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. Thus, a citizen of a non-State Party who commits genocide, war crimes, or crimes against humanity on the territory (or having effect on the territory) of a State Party is subject to ICC jurisdiction.

The present provision is aimed at upsetting this implication, specifically in respect of aggression, and preventing jurisdiction over aggression in such cases. It is probably a good example of a small but powerful minority protecting its own position in a consensus negotiation.

Paragraphs 6, 7, and 8 of Article 15*bis* resolve the various Security Council 'red light' and 'green light' options concerning state and proprio motu referrals that had been considered intensively but inconclusively before Kampala. It is important to appreciate that this is now in the context of cases where the Security Council has not made a referral to the Court and may, or may not, have adopted a resolution concerning actions by a state in respect of a situation coming before the Court.

Where the prosecutor concludes that there is a reasonable basis to proceed with an investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, proprio motu or following a state referral, he is required to first ascertain whether the Security Council has made a determination of an act of aggression committed by the state concerned. The prosecutor is to notify the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the situation before the Court, including any relevant information and documents.[82] If, in fact, the Security Council has made a determination of an act of aggression, the prosecutor may proceed with the investigation.[83] Then comes the crunch issue: what if the Security Council has not acted, and does not now act? The consensus in Kampala represented a

[80] On the literal language of this paragraph, the reverse situation is also true: consider the situation where a state that is party to the Rome Statute commits an act of aggression on the territory of a non-party. Notwithstanding the normal 'nationality' implication of Art 12(2)(b), there is arguably no jurisdiction in the Court in this situation because of the conduct on the territory of a non-party. As far as I have been able to ascertain, none of the legislation so far adopted to give effect to the Kampala amendments makes any such exception to nationality jurisdiction at the domestic level. It is illegal whatever the Rome Statute status of the victim state. A state may, if it wishes, criminalize actions by its nationals who may thus be tried domestically even if not in the ICC.

[81] As in The Case of the SS Lotus (France v Turkey) (Merits) [1927] PCIJ Rep Series A No. 10.

[82] Art 15*bis*, para. 6 Amendments (n 20).

[83] Ibid., para. 7.

strong resolution of an issue that had bedevilled the earlier negotiations. The relevant language reads:

> Where no such determination is made within six months after the date of notification, the Prosecutor may proceed with the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression, provided that the Pre-Trial Division has authorized the commencement of the investigation in respect of a crime of aggression in accordance with the procedure contained in Article 15, and the Security Council has not decided otherwise in accordance with Article 16.[84]

The 'filter' in the ordinary case is thus not the Security Council, but the Pre-Trial Division, that is to say, a majority of all six members of that Division sitting together en banc. If the Security Council wishes to enter the fray, it must put up its stop-light. Notice that, consistent with the existing Rome compromise, contained in Article 16 of the Statute,[85] a dissenting member of the Permanent Five in the Security Council cannot simply stop the process by exercising a veto. It is only where the five concur (and obtain the other necessary votes) that proceedings may be stopped in their tracks.

31.3 Implementing the Kampala Amendments Domestically

Twenty–two states had ratified the Kampala amendments by March 2015, in order, Liechtenstein, Samoa, Trinidad and Tobago, Luxembourg, Estonia, Germany, Botswana, Cyprus, Slovenia, Andorra, Uruguay, Belgium, Croatia, Slovakia, Austria, Spain, Latvia, Poland, San Marino, Georgia, Malta, and Costa Rica. Numerous other states are engaged in the process of doing so.[86] Several states have amended their penal legislation in order to incorporate the crime of aggression.[87] Some questions that are particularly relevant to states contemplating legislation will be discussed in the section that follows.[88]

[84] Ibid., para. 8.

[85] Art 16 ICC Statute provides: 'No investigation or prosecution may be commenced or proceeded with under this Statute for a period of 12 months after the Security Council, in a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, has requested the Court to that effect; that request may be renewed by the Council under the same conditions.'

[86] The website <http://www.crimeofaggression.info> accessed 13 March 2015, which is maintained by the permanent Mission of Lichtenstein to the UN and the Global Institute for the Prevention of Aggression, asserted in 2014: 'According to the information available, government or parliamentary officials in at least the following 35 States Parties are currently actively working on the ratification of the amendments on the crime of aggression: Albania, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burundi, Chile, Costa Rica, Czech Republic, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Finland, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Lesotho, Lithuania, Macedonia (FYROM), Madagascar, Malta, Mongolia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Portugal, Romania, Senegal, Switzerland and Venezuela. In 9 further States Parties the process is in its early stages: Ghana, Guatemala, Ireland, Japan, Mexico, Moldova, Republic of Korea and Tunisia.' (Austria, Costa Rica, and Malta have since ratified.)

[87] Copies of legislation adopted in Croatia, Luxembourg, Peru (soon to be a party), Samoa, and Slovenia may be found at the website referenced in the previous note.

[88] A particularly useful resource in this respect is Handbook: Ratification and Implementation of the Kampala Amendments to the Rome Statute of the ICC, Crime of Aggression, War Crimes (2012), published by the Liechtenstein Institute on Self-Determination, Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton University in conjunction with the organization mentioned in the preceding note (n 86).

31.3.1 Should a ratifying state criminalize aggression domestically?

The Rome Statute is not a 'suppression convention' like the terrorism treaties and many others, explicitly requiring states to engage penal law.[89] But that they should do so is implicit in the Statute and many thoughtful states have done so for the other crimes in the Statute. In terms of criminal law theory, I think the best explanations for so doing come from the possibilities of deterrence and the expressive view of the law—emphatically spelling out for a domestic audience the illegality of aggression and the other crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. Relevant also is preambular paragraph 5 of the Rome Statute:[90] 'Recalling that it is the duty of every State to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes'. This obligation, representing what the drafters must have regarded as a customary law norm, is read by some as contemplating universal jurisdiction;[91] at the very least a responsible state must assume territorial or nationality jurisdiction—unless there is something different about aggression from the other three Rome crimes.

Then there is Article 17 on admissibility/complementarity. The SWGCA saw no reason why the general rules on complementarity should not apply equally to aggression.[92] The Court is to defer to a state which 'has jurisdiction' over the crimes in the Statute. Obviously a state cannot 'have' jurisdiction without legislation (or some other constitutional mechanism that gives its courts competence). Complementarity is surely an invitation, an incentive even, to legislate. I believe that complementarity applies potentially regardless of the jurisdictional theory asserted by the state—including universal jurisdiction.[93] Does the general law, however, suggest some limitations on appropriate legislation, for example, on applicable jurisdictional theories?

31.3.2 Jurisdiction under international law

There is the threshold question here, the debate between the majority and dissent in the Lotus case[94] about whether it is necessary to look for a rule that says you can or one that says you cannot. I will take the majority's 'no-rule-against-it' approach here, relying particularly on the Separate Opinion of Judges Higgins, Kooijmans, and Buergenthal in DR Congo v Belgium,[95] who assert that while this approach has 'clear [89] On 'suppression conventions', see E Podgor and R Clark, Understanding International Criminal Law 3rd edn (Newark: LexisNexis 2013), para. 1.02[D].

[90] Preamble ICC Statute, para. 5

[91] See R Clark, 'Complementarity and the Crime of Aggression' in C Stahn and M El Zeidy (eds), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity vol. 2 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 721, 731. See also (n 30).

[92] Ne bis in idem with regard to the crime of aggression, ICC-ASP/3/SWGCA/INF.1, 13 August 2004, paras 28–34, Informal inter-sessional meeting of the Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression 21–23 June 2004, Liechtenstein Institute on Self-Determination, Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University.

[93] Clark (n 91) 728–30.

[94] See Lotus case (n 81).

[95] Joint Separate Opinion of Judges Rosalyn Higgins, Pieter Kooijmans, and Thomas Buergenthal in Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (DR Congo v Belgium) [2002] ICJ Rep 3.

attendant dangers in some fields', it 'represents a continuing potential in the context of jurisdiction over international crimes'.[96]

I have seen no serious suggestion that it is improper for a state to exercise jurisdiction over what its own leadership does. The ILC, however, recommended against universal or victim state jurisdiction for aggression in its scheme for Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind.[97] There is some debate about whether aggression, or Nuremberg's 'crime against peace', gives rise to universal jurisdiction in any state, although it was adjudicated in international forums in Nuremberg and Tokyo.[98] My impression was that many members of the SWGCA were comfortable with victim state ('effects' or 'objective territorial' jurisdiction). In terms of state practice, what must have been victim state jurisdiction was exercised by the Republic of China in Nanking against Japanese generals in at least three cases, notably that of Takashi Sakai.[99] Poland exercised what was either victim state or universal jurisdiction in the Greiser case.[100] The USSR convicted numerous German generals for illegal activity that included crimes against peace.[101] But practice has been somewhat thin since then, aside from some legislative assertions of power.[102] Legislative assertions of universal jurisdiction over crimes against humanity, and even genocide, were also relatively sparse until they received some impetus from the Rome Statute, so the practice may not mean much.

[96] Ibid., para. 50. The 'field' they obviously had in mind from the context was the argument from some of the nuclear powers that, since there was no clear rule against the use of nuclear weapons, they were free to use them. There is a big difference between the power to exercise criminal jurisdiction and that to wreak havoc with a weapon of mass destruction.

[97] Art 8 of the Draft Code of Crime against the Peace and Security of Mankind with commentaries, forty-eighth session, ILC (1996), 30, para. 14: 'An individual cannot incur responsibility for this crime in the absence of aggression committed by a State. Thus, a court cannot determine the question of individual criminal responsibility for this crime without considering as a preliminary matter the question of aggression by a State. The determination by a national court of one State of the question whether another State has committed aggression would be contrary to the fundamental principle of international law par in parem imperium non habet. Moreover, the exercise of jurisdiction by the national court of a State which entails consideration of the commission of aggression by another State would have serious implications for international relations and international peace and security.'

[98] See Clark (n 91) 730–5 (expressing some doubts about universal jurisdiction); M Scharf, 'Universal Jurisdiction and the Crime of Aggression' (2012) 53 Harvard International Law Journal 358 (emphatic that there is universal jurisdiction over aggression, relying primarily on the precedent of Nuremberg). It is probably the case that just because something may be tried in an international tribunal does not automatically mean that it can be tried in a domestic court on a universal jurisdiction theory, but it must surely be a strong indication.

[99] See R Clark, 'The Crime of Aggression: From the Trial of Takashi Sakai, August 1946, to the Kampla Review Conference on the ICC in 2010' in G Simpson and K Heller (eds), Untold Stories: Hidden Histories of War Crimes Trials (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013).

[100] Mark Drumbl, 'The Greiser Case', ibid.

[101] For pioneering archival research on those trials, see I Bezborodova, Generaly Vermakhta v plenu (Generals of the Wehrmacht in Captivity) (Moscow: Rossiĭskiĭ gos. gumanitarnyĭ universitet 1998), carefully reviewed in G Ginsburgs, 'Light Shed on the Story of Wehrmacht Generals in Soviet Captivity' (2000) 11 Criminal Law Forum 101.

[102] A Reisinger Coracini (n 3) found 25 States with domestic aggression provisions, many of which emerged from the former USSR and the former Yugoslavia. The jurisdictional provisions in them do not always appear to have been obvious.

Note also the impact of Kampala Understandings 4 and 5 (if any).[103] Are they just neutral on what the general law is, or do they discourage universal or victim state (or even aggressor state) jurisdiction? Again, note that the general law, reflected emphatically in the Rome preamble, may recognize a right and even an obligation to exercise jurisdiction.

31.3.3 Immunities

Notwithstanding Article 27[104] of the Rome Statute concerning cases before the ICC itself, there may be some possibilities for immunity under international (and domestic) law in domestic courts for leaders, in light of the majority decision in DRC v Belgium.[105] I doubt that in the context of aggression it proceeds further than heads of state, heads of government, foreign ministers, and defence ministers, although this is a significant hole in those potentially amenable to prosecution for the crime of aggression. There is probably no immunity for generals or industrialists who fit the leadership criteria of Article 8*bis*.[106] There is also the question of immunity of former officials. The decision of the House of Lords in the Pinochet case[107] suggests that immunity of an official for international crimes may be less absolute after that person leaves office and that there may be no immunity for at least some international crimes (torture in that instance) committed in office. On the other hand, the ICJ seemed to be more restrictive in the Arrest Warrant case.[108] Criminal immunity of officials is a work [103] These Understandings provide: '4. It is understood that the amendments that address the act of aggression and the crime of aggression do so for the purpose of this Statute only. The amendments shall, in accordance with Article 10 of the Rome Statute, not be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute. 5. It is understood that the amendments shall not be interpreted as creating the right or obligation to exercise domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by another State.' Professor Van Schaak describes these provisions as expressing a 'subtle preference that the states parties do not incorporate the crime into their domestic codes'. B Van Schaak, 'Par in Parem Imperium Non Habet: Complementarity and the Crime of Aggression' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 133 (abstract). She makes a policy argument that: 'The one circumstance on which such prosecutions might be appropriate is when a state prosecutes its own citizen(s) for launching an act of aggression pursuant to the active nationality principle of jurisdiction. For both legal and policy reasons, states other than the nationality state—including victim states, other implicated states, and third party states exercising extraordinary bases of jurisdiction—should in general refrain from such prosecutions so that cases involving the crime of aggression proceed almost exclusively before the ICC.' Ibid., 136. See also J Trahan, 'Is Complementarity the Right Approach for the International Criminal Court's Crime of Aggression? Considering the Problem of "Overzealous" National Court Prosecutions' (2012) 45 Cornell International Law Journal 569.

[104] Art 27 provides: '1. This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence. 2. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person.'

[105] See Arrest Warrant case (n 95) (holding Foreign Minister of DRC immune from arrest at behest of Belgium on charges of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and crimes against humanity).

[106] See (n 24).

[107] R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate and Others, Ex Parte Pinochet Ugarte (No. 3), [2000] 1 App. Cas. 147.

[108] At para. 61 of its Judgment in the Arrest Warrant case (n 95), the Court remarks that: '[A]fter a person ceases to hold the office of Minister of Foreign Affairs, he or she will no longer enjoy all of the in progress in the case law and statutes, and at the ILC,[109] and it is not clear where the field is heading. Most jurisdictions probably have rules applying generally rather than something ICC-specific. A state exercising aggressor state jurisdiction will no doubt want to lift potential immunity of its own officials,[110] or the exercise will be pointless. What it does in respect of officials from other countries will have significant implications for whether a case against such officials may be brought in a state other than their state of nationality or only in the ICC itself.

31.3.4 Par in parem non habet imperium/act of state

In arguing against universal or victim state jurisdiction, the ILC commented: 'The determination by a national court of one state of the question of whether another state had committed aggression would be contrary to the fundamental principle of international law par in parem imperium non habet.'[111] I have serious doubts about how 'fundamental' the maxim is. The principle that states do not judge the acts of other states certainly has some force—it undergirds the rule about state immunity in English and American law. The 'act of state' version of the principle is, at least in the common law, a fuzzy rule of comity and not one the courts regard as required by international law.[112] But the main impact seems to be in respect of what states do on their own territory—and aggression is ultimately executed elsewhere. The variant on 'act of state' that shields individuals who operate on behalf of a state was emphatically denied at Nuremberg.[113] States seem to have no qualms about judging the 'state policy' aspects of other jus cogens offences like crimes against humanity[114] or genocide[115] (and, I suspect, the 'plan or policy' aspect of Article 8 (2) of the Rome Statute).[116] Is aggression different? Or does Nuremberg settle the act of state question? If par in parem imperium non habet is really 'fundamental', one might expect substantial chapters on it in the leading works on international law, or at least an entry in the index. Alas, it does not even make an appearance in the index of most immunities accorded by international law in other States. Provided that it has jurisdiction under international law, a State may try a former Minister for Foreign Affairs of another State in respect of acts committed prior or subsequent to his or her period of office, as well as in respect of acts committed during that period of office in a private capacity.' There is not much leeway here for avoiding immunity for a senior official who was involved in an act of aggression.

[109] Preliminary report on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, Rapporteur Concepcion Escobar Hernandez, UN Doc A/CN.4/654 (31 May 2012).

[110] As states legislating for the other Rome Statute crimes have typically done.

[111] See above n 97.

[112] Banco Nacional de Cuba v Sabbatino, 376 US 398 (1964).

[113] Art 7 of the Nuremberg Charter provided: 'The official position of defendants, whether as heads of State or responsible officials in Government Departments, shall not be considered as freeing them from responsibility or mitigating punishment.'

[114] See Art 7(2)(a) ICC Statute which contains an element that a crime against humanity include an attack directed against a civilian population 'pursuant to or in furtherance of a State or organizational policy to commit such attack'.

[115] An element of genocide requires that 'the conduct took place in the context of a manifest pattern of similar conduct directed against that group or was conduct that could itself effect such destruction'. The 'pattern' will often, but not invariably, be set by a Government against its perceived enemies.

[116] Art 8(1) ICC Statute states that '[t]he Court shall have jurisdiction in respect of war crimes in particular when committed as part of a plan or policy or as part of a large-scale commission of such crimes'.

of them. One of the few to refer to it, the 1992 edition of Oppenheim's International Law,[117] uses it as a transition into a lengthy discussion of state immunity, but does not pursue it beyond that.[118] A major article by Yoram Dinstein on the maxim[119] finds its origin in ecclesiastical law, on the question whether one Pope is bound by the decisions of a previous Pope, and concludes that 'the progressive development of international law will not be furthered by this principle, just as it does not render existing law more comprehensible'.[120] In short, it is far from clear what impact this doctrine has in respect of the crime of aggression.

31.3.5 Are there any additional considerations that a state contemplating exercising victim state or universal jurisdiction might ponder?

States have considerable discretion here and I raise a number of questions rather than trying to give a definitive answer of any of them.[121]

31.3.5.1 The implications of concurrent jurisdiction

This is an area of concurrent jurisdiction where two or more states may have respectable bases of jurisdiction, and there is no clear hierarchy of jurisdictional theories established in international law (the Lotus case[122] again). Should a state whose theory is a universal one get the consent of the aggressor state (or victim state), or even defer to it? There are suggestions that a state contemplating universal jurisdiction over genocide should consider the position of states actually affected.[123] Does this make sense here? It does not if the aggressor government is still in power, but might if there has been a change of regime.

31.3.5.2 Action or inaction by the Security Council

How should a state contemplating exercising jurisdiction treat the action or inaction of the Security Council? Should the legislation forbid action unless the Security Council has spoken (and used the word aggression)? What evidentiary weight should it give to a Security Council decision or to prior findings of the ICC? At the very least, substantial but not conclusive deference to findings by either of those two bodies finding [117] Sir R Jennings and Sir A Watts (eds), Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. I, Peace (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008).

[118] Ibid., at 341–2. Van Schaak (n 103) does not offer any extended discussion of the principle.

[119] Y Dinstein, 'Par in Parem Non Habet Imperium' (1966) 1 Israel Law Review 407.

[120] Ibid., 420.

[121] Several of these issues were addressed in an interesting Bill introduced into the New Zealand Parliament by Green Party Member of Parliament (and former Secretary-General of Parliamentarians Global Action), Kennedy Graham, 'The International Non-Aggression and Lawful Use of Force Bill'.

[122] See Lotus case (n 81).

[123] See the excellent discussion, especially the examination of relevant Spanish cases, by C Ryngaert, 'Horizontal Complementarity' in C Stahn and M El-Zeidy (eds), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity vol. II (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 855.

a state act of aggression which is arguably relevant to the individual case before the domestic court?

31.3.5.3 Could the Security Council halt the domestic proceedings?

Note the other side of the coin: could the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter,[124] do a kind of 'Article-16-of-the-Rome-Statute' to a Member State of the UN instructing it to bring a halt to proceedings, temporarily or permanently? I have in mind the analogy of the PanAm Libya case in the ICJ which seems to suggest that the Council has some ability under its Chapter VII powers to direct which states are to exercise jurisdiction in cases where there is concurrent jurisdiction.[125]

31.3.5.4 Defences/grounds for the exclusion of responsibility

Should specific reference be made to defences? The negotiators on the Kampala Amendments, like their counterparts in drafting the 'special part' provisions in Articles 6, 7, and 8 of the Rome Statute and the Elements thereof, did not see fit to include specific defences. That is left to the general law which can be incorporated via Article 31 of the Rome Statute.[126] Some domestic legislation dealing generally with the Rome Statute already incorporates Article 31 of the Rome Statute and that may be sufficient, as may existing defences in domestic penal law.

31.3.5.5 Should any special consent be required?

Should the consent of some particular domestic official be required? Some common-law legislation on the Rome Statute requires the consent of the Attorney-General for a prosecution involving the Rome crimes to proceed. This may be appropriate where the Attorney-General is acting as a chief prosecutor and bound by the ethics of that position. But it may be entirely inappropriate to a prosecution of domestic leadership. Some comments in the Separate Opinion in DR Congo v Belgium, addressed generally to exercises of universal jurisdiction have some resonance here: '[s]uch charges may only be laid out by a prosecutor or juge d'instruction who acts in full independence, without links to or control by the Government of that State'.[127] In any event, this is not an area where it would be appropriate to have the executive certify that an 'act of aggression' occurred (comparable to a determination of 'terrorism' in some US

[124] And see Art 25 UN Charter: 'The Members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present Charter.'

[125] See Question of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahirya v United Kingdom) [1998] ICJ Rep 9.

[126] The draft New Zealand legislation by Kennedy Graham MP (n 121) specifically lists self-defence and authorization of the Security Council as (exclusive) defences. Note also that the requirement in Art 8bis (1) that a violation be 'manifest' may functionally provide a 'defence' in a 'grey area', such as the responsibility to protect or in cases of 'minor' incursions.

[127] See Arrest Warrant case (n 95) para. 59. Note the solution in the Graham Bill (n 121) for the appointment of a Special Prosecutor.

legislation).[128] The 'act of aggression' is an element of the crime and must be proved to the judges beyond reasonable doubt.

31.3.5.6 Triggering the prosecutorial function

Who should be able to trigger an exercise of the prosecutor's function? Again, the Separate Opinion in DR Congo v Belgium[129] suggests some relevant considerations:

> Moreover, the desired equilibrium between the battle against impunity and the promotion of good inter-State relations will only be maintained if there are some special circumstances that do require the exercise of an international criminal jurisdiction and if this has been brought to the attention of the prosecutor or juge d'instruction. For example, persons related to the victims of the case will have requested the commencement of legal proceedings.[130]

Given the world's migratory patterns in response to modern strife, countries that receive large numbers of migrants, especially asylum seekers, are likely to be sheltering people who are at best potential citizens but for whom the protective functions of the state of asylum are perfectly reasonable. A state prosecuting in such circumstances on a universal jurisdiction basis is much more than an officious bystander; it may have a genuine link of its own to the imperatives of justice.

31.4 Conclusion

Given the activity going on to foster ratification that has been noted earlier, it seems likely that the 2017 target for 30 ratifications will be met. Ratification alone is not enough; implementation is also necessary. In the author's view, a state ratifying the Kampala Amendments should domesticate Article 8*bis* and its Elements as closely as possible by penal legislation. It should avoid moving too far away from the ICC definition for domestic purposes. It should take jurisdiction at least over what its nationals do. Bolder states may wish to go further into the areas of victim state or universal jurisdiction. I do not read the Kampala Understandings or customary practice as clearly prohibiting them as a matter of law from such endeavours, although customary law is, at present, murky at best.

[128] See e.g. 18 United States Code paras 2331 and 2332 which incorporate by reference definitions of homicide and crimes against the person committed against a US national 'outside the United States', and then add: 'No prosecution for any offense described in this section shall be undertaken by the United States except on written certification by the Attorney General or the highest ranking subordinate of the Attorney General with responsibility for criminal prosecutions that, in the judgment of the certifying official, such offense was intended to coerce, intimidate, or retaliate against a government or civilian population.' The United States seldom uses passive personality jurisdiction, and this provision is pretty fundamental to the crime. It is hard to see it as anything other than a basic element of the crime and thus ought to be subject to trial by jury, as a matter of fundamental constitutional due process.

[129] See Joint Separate Opinion of Judges Rosalyn Higgins, Pieter Kooijmans, and Thomas Buergenthal in the Arrest Warrant case (n 95) para. 59.

[130] Ibid., para. 59.

32

La Lutte Continue

Investigating and Prosecuting Sexual Violence at the ICC

*Niamh Hayes

32.1 Introduction

It is a depressing but consistent fact that every international criminal tribunal has struggled to deal with crimes of sexual violence. The Nuremberg Charter did not even include such crimes within the jurisdiction of the Nuremberg Tribunal.[1] While evidence of sexual violence inevitably emerged in the course of witness testimony, it did not form part of the prosecution's case or the final judgment,[2] while the underlying facts were frequently glossed over or avoided entirely in the name of propriety.[3] Although the Charter of the Tokyo Tribunal also failed to explicitly enumerate rape as a war crime or crime against humanity,[4] evidence of rape and sexual violence was at least included within the prosecution case, although euphemistically characterized as 'inhuman treatment', 'ill treatment', or 'failure to respect family honour and rights' as war crimes.[5] Although the

* PhD candidate, Irish Centre for Human Rights, National University of Ireland, Galway; Head of Office, Institute for International Criminal Investigations; formerly Legal Consultant with Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice. All views expressed in this chapter are the author's alone and are expressed in a personal capacity.

[1] Charter of the IMT, annexed to the Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals of the European Axis and Establishing the Charter of the IMT (8 August 1945) 82 UNTS 279. Rape and sexual violence were not explicitly enumerated as either war crimes or crimes against humanity in the Charter, although Cherif Bassiouni has argued that rape could nevertheless have been prosecuted as a crime against humanity under the rubric of 'other inhumane acts' as derived from general principles of law. See C Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity in International Criminal Law (Dordrecht: Martinus Nijhoff 1992) 245–6, 320–1. Kelly Askin has likewise argued that, given the historical prohibition of sexual violence crimes under international humanitarian law, the lack of specific reference to rape or sexual violence crimes in the Charter need not have precluded the leading of evidence or inclusion of relevant facts relating to sexual violence under the heading of other enumerated war crimes such as enslavement. See K Askin, War Crimes against Women: Prosecution in International War Crimes Tribunals (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1997) 138.

[2] Kelly Askin has pointed out that, although the IMT's transcripts contain references to evidence of rape, sexual torture, forced sterilization, forced abortion, and sexual mutilation, the comprehensive 732-page index to the 42-volume text of proceedings of the Tribunal at Nuremberg does not include either 'rape' or 'crimes against women' as a search term. Askin, War Crimes against Women (n 1) 97–8.

[3] See e.g. S Brownmiller, Against our Will: Men, Women and Rape (New York: Ballantine Books 1975) 56, describing an incident where a French prosecutor at Nuremberg declined to read into evidence the report of a medical examiner who had treated numerous victims of rape in a particular region, 'gallantly' sidestepping the relevant facts by stating '[t]he Tribunal will forgive me if I avoid citing the atrocious details…I will pass on'.

[4] Charter of the IMT for the Far East (19 January 1946) as amended by General Orders No. 20 (26 April 1946), TIAS 1589.

[5] Askin, War Crimes against Women (n 2) 180. Although rape was expressly charged in the trial, no female victims of sexual violence were called to testify. Many scholars have also highlighted the failure prohibition of rape was subsequently codified in a number of international legal instruments post-Second World War,[6] at the time of the establishment of the ICTY in 1994 the status of rape and other forms of sexual violence as international crimes was far from clear.[7]

International outrage at reports of systematic sexual violence committed in the former Yugoslavia had been a significant motivating factor behind the Security Council's decision to establish an international criminal tribunal to investigate violations of international humanitarian law,[8] and the Tribunal's statute was drafted to explicitly include rape as a crime against humanity.[9] Despite the apparently marginal position of sexual violence crimes within the Tribunal's legal framework at the outset of its work, the ICTY would go on to create one of the strongest track records of any international criminal tribunal for consciously and comprehensively investigating and prosecuting sexual violence, particularly sexual violence against men, although former staff will readily admit that these achievements were more accidental than intentional in the Tribunal's early years of operation.[10] The ICTR was confronted with an equally of the Tokyo Tribunal to properly address the issue of hundreds of thousands of 'comfort women' who were forcibly abducted, mainly from the Korean peninsula and other Japanese-occupied territories, and used as sexual slaves by the Japanese military. See further R Copelon, 'Gender Crimes as War Crimes: Integrating Crimes against Women into International Criminal Law' (2000–1) 46 McGill Law Journal 217, 221–3; P Sellers, 'Wartime Female Slavery: Enslavement?' (2011) 44 Cornell International Law Journal 115, 117–21; Y Yoshiaki, Comfort Women: Sexual Slavery in the Japanese Military During World War II (English translation by S O'Brien, New York: Columbia University Press 2000).

[6] See Art 27 Geneva Convention (IV) Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (adopted 12 August 1949, entered into force 21 October 1950) 75 UNTS 287; Arts 76(1) and 85 Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I) (adopted 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 3; Art 4(2)(e) Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II) (adopted 8 June 1977, entered into force 7 December 1978) 1125 UNTS 609. See also Art II Allied Control Council Law No. 10, Punishment of Persons Guilty of War Crimes, Crimes against Peace and against Humanity (20 December 1945), published in Official Gazette of the Control Council for Germany No. 3 (1946) 50, which specifically enumerated rape as a crime against humanity.

[7] See further T Meron, 'Rape as a Crime under International Humanitarian Law' (1993) 87(3) American Journal of International Law 424. Christine Chinkin noted in 1994 that '[t]he substantive law on rape in armed conflict has now become entangled with the question of arenas for its application'; see C Chinkin, 'Rape and Sexual Abuse of Women in International Law' (1994) 5 European Journal of International Law 326, 334.

[8] See e.g. UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, which deplored the 'continuing reports of widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law occurring within the territory of the former Yugoslavia … including reports of … massive, organised and systematic detention and rape of women', and Report of the Secretary General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808, UN Doc S/25704 (3 May 1993).

[9] Art 5(g) Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993), UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex. Prior to the establishment of the Tribunal, both the ICRC and the US Department of State came out in support of a progressive interpretation of the Geneva Conventions, arguing that rape could also be prosecuted as a grave breach under the rubric of 'wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health', while Theodor Meron presciently argued that it could also potentially constitute the grave breach of 'torture or inhuman treatment' under certain circumstances. See Meron (n 7) 426–7.

[10] See e.g. K Askin, 'Prosecuting Wartime Rape and Other Gender-Related Crimes under International Law: Extraordinary Advances, Enduring Obstacles' (2003) 21 Berkeley Journal of International Law 288, 318; K Engle, 'Feminism and its (Dis)contents: Criminalising Wartime Rape in Bosnia and Herzegovina' (2005) 99 American Journal of International Law 778; K Askin, 'A Decade of the Development of Gender Crimes in International Courts and Tribunals: 1993 to 2003' (2004) 11 Human Rights Brief 16; N Hayes, 'Creating a Definition of Rape in International Law: The Contribution of the International Criminal laconic statute at the time of its establishment,[11] tasked with investigating and prosecuting those responsible for the genocidal campaign in which hundreds of thousands of rapes had taken place over a 100-day period.[12] Unfortunately, institutional dysfunction and entrenched problems with investigative and prosecutorial strategy meant that three-quarters of all ICTR charges for sexual violence crimes ultimately resulted in acquittal or were dropped in exchange for a guilty plea.[13] The SCSL, which began its work at the same time as the ICC, succeeded in leading prosecutions and producing some fascinating jurisprudence on the crime of forced marriage, but was curtailed by the disastrous exclusion of all evidence of sexual violence from one of its four cases on procedural grounds.[14]

By the time the ICC Statute was being finalized at the Rome Conference in 1998, the drafting process was already heavily influenced by the impact of both the initial investigations and jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR on sexual violence and the advocacy efforts of various feminist lobby groups, such as the Women's Caucus for Gender Justice.[15] Where the ICTY and ICTR Statutes had recognized rape only as a crime against humanity, the Rome Statute contained the broadest enumeration of sexual and gender-based crimes of any international criminal instrument to date, delineating rape, sexual slavery, forced pregnancy, forced sterilization, enforced prostitution, and other forms of sexual violence as both crimes against humanity and war crimes, in both international and non-international armed conflict.[16] A number Tribunals' in S Darcy and J Powderly (eds), Judicial Creativity at the International Criminal Tribunals (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 129.

[11] Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1994) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex. Art 3 enumerated rape as a crime against humanity, while Art 4 on grave breaches provided some further scope for the inclusion of evidence of sexual violence under the headings of 'cruel treatment' or 'outrages upon personal dignity' as war crimes.

[12] See e.g. C Bijleveld et al., 'Counting the Countless: Rape Victimization during the Rwandan Genocide' (2009) 19 International Criminal Justice Review 208 and B Nowrojee, Shattered Lives: Sexual Violence during the Rwandan Genocide and its Aftermath (New York/Washington D.C.: Human Rights Watch 1996).

[13] Rape or other forms of sexual violence were charged against 52 of the ICTR's 93 accused. Of the 43 cases that proceeded to trial, 13 have resulted in a conviction to date (pending some continuing appeals), 23 resulted in an acquittal, 1 accused died at trial, and charges were dropped in the remaining 6 cases. See ICTR, 'Best Practices Manual for the Investigation and Prosecution of Sexual Violence Crimes in Post-Conflict Regions: Lessons Learned from the Office of the Prosecutor for the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda' (30 January 2014), which examines some of the strategic and institutional factors behind this extremely disappointing record.

[14] Reasoned Majority Decision on Prosecution Motion for a Ruling on the Admissibility of Evidence, Fofana et al., SCSL-04-14-PT, TC I, SCSL, 24 May 2005, Judge Boutet of Canada dissenting: see Dissenting Opinion of Justice Pierre Boutet on Decision on Prosecution Motion for a Ruling on the Admissibility of Evidence, Fofana et al., SCSL-04-14-PT, 24 May 2005. See further S Kendall and M Staggs, 'Silencing Sexual Violence: Recent Developments in the CDF Case at the Special Court for Sierra Leone' (UC Berkeley War Crimes Studies Centre, 2005), and M Staggs Kelsall and S Stepakoff, ' "When We Wanted to Talk about Rape": Silencing Sexual Violence at the Special Court for Sierra Leone' (2007) 1 International Journal of Transitional Justice 355.

[15] See further Copelon (n 5) 233–9; R Goldstone, 'Prosecuting Rape as a War Crime' (2002) 34 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 277, 285; J Hall, 'Rape at Rome: Feminist Interventions in the Criminalization of Sex-Related Violence in Positive International Criminal Law' (2008–9) 30 Michigan Journal of International Law 1.

[16] Arts 7(1)(g), 8(2)(b)(xxii), and 8(2)(c)(vi) Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (adopted 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90 ('ICC Statute'). Art 7(1)(h) also recognizes the crime against humanity of persecution on the grounds of gender, while Art 7(1)(c) recognizes the of vital procedural and evidentiary safeguards on evidence of prior sexual conduct, inferences of consent, and in camera hearings were also introduced into the ICC's Rules of Procedure and Evidence,[17] in recognition of the equivalent measures which had been adopted by the ad hoc Tribunals during their first few years of practice.[18] The Statute also recognized the crucial importance of institutional factors in addressing this category of crime, and therefore imposed a series of strategic, staffing, and policy requirements to prioritize the investigation and prosecution of sexual and gender-based crimes within the work of the Court.[19] In addition to the explicit legal requirement on the Prosecutor to ensure the effective prosecution of sexual violence, the Statute also recognized in general terms the importance of undermining impunity for international crimes,[20] which has historically been most pronounced in relation to those who have ordered, permitted, or perpetrated sexual violence.

Unfortunately, despite such auspicious beginnings, the record of the ICC to date in relation to sexual violence has proven to be just as fraught and frustrating as its predecessors. This chapter will critically examine the practice of the OTP over its first decade of operation to assess whether it is in fact living up to its responsibilities to ensure the effective prosecution of such crimes. The chapter will first analyse the OTP's record of charging crimes of sexual and gender-based violence, as well as the outcome crime against humanity of enslavement provides for the inclusion of evidence of trafficking of persons, particularly women and children. See further C Steain, 'Gender Issues' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court—The Making of the Rome Statute: Issues, Negotiations, Results (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 357, 389.

[17] Rules 70, 71, and 72 of the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002). Rule 70 states that consent cannot be inferred from the words or conduct of a victim in situations where force, threat of force, or a coercive environment has negated their capacity for genuine and voluntary consent or where they are otherwise incapable of consenting, nor can it be inferred from their silence or lack of resistance during the incident. Rules 70(d) and 71 render evidence of the prior or subsequent sexual conduct of a victim or witness inadmissible, and emphasize that no inferences on credibility, character, or 'predisposition to sexual availability' should be drawn from such evidence. Rule 72 provides for in camera hearings to assess the appropriateness and admissibility of evidence regarding consent or other issues relating to the words or conduct of a victim or witness of sexual violence. The adoption of these rules was one of the most contentious issues in the negotiations at Rome; see further D Piragoff, 'Evidence in Cases of Sexual Violence' in R Lee et al. (eds), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (New York: Transnational Publishers 2001) 369–91.

[18] See Rule 96 of the ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence (adopted 11 February 1994, entered into force 14 March 1994) UN Doc IT/32/Rev.45, as amended on 8 December 2010; Rule 96 of the ICTR Rules of Procedure and Evidence (entered into force 29 June 1995) UN Doc ITR/3/Rev.1, as amended on 1 October 2009; Rule 96 of the SCSL Rules of Procedure and Evidence (adopted on 16 January 2002, entered into force 12 April 2002), as amended on 28 May 2010. The inclusion of these rules at the ICTY and ICTR was intended to facilitate a progressive approach to the adjudication of sexual violence, as well as merely to counteract practical investigatory issues. See further F Ní Aoláin, 'Radical Rules: The Effects of Evidential and Procedural Rules on the Regulation of Sexual Violence in War' (1996–7) 60 Albany Law Review 883.

[19] For example, Art 42(9) ICC Statute requires the Prosecutor to 'appoint advisers with legal expertise on specific issues, including, but not limited to, sexual and gender violence and violence against children', while Art 54(1)(b) imposes a duty on the Prosecutor to 'take appropriate measures to ensure the effective investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court…in particular where it involves sexual violence, gender violence or violence against children'.

[20] Preamble ICC Statute: 'Affirming that the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole must not go unpunished and that their effective prosecution must be ensured by taking measures at the national level and by enhancing international cooperation.'

of those charges. It will then examine issues relating to the conduct of investigations to assess where the problems which have dogged the OTP's evidence and case hypotheses originated. Finally, the chapter will discuss relevant issues of prosecutorial strategy and analyse the potential impact of the OTP's new Policy Paper on Crimes of Sexual and Gender-Based Violence on future prosecutions. Some of the contentious issues are unique to crimes of sexual violence, while some are emblematic of wider strategic or institutional failings. It is to be hoped that all of them, however, can and will be addressed as the ICC continues to evolve, if the Court is ever to reverse the ignominious tradition of ignoring, marginalizing, or mishandling evidence of sexual violence in international criminal prosecutions and live up to its promise to end impunity.

32.2 Charges for Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes: The OTP's Attrition Problem

Before dealing with the detail of how the OTP has characterized and charged crimes of sexual and gender-based violence, a brief word on terminology. The Rome Statute defines gender as follows: '[f]or the purpose of this Statute, it is understood that the term "gender" refers to the two sexes, male and female, within the context of society'.[21] The term 'sexual violence' is not specifically defined in the Statute, but is described in the Elements of Crimes in the following terms:

> The perpetrator committed an act of a sexual nature against one or more persons or caused such person or persons to engage in an act of a sexual nature by force, or by threat of force or coercion, such as that caused by fear of violence, duress, detention, psychological oppression or abuse of power, against such person or persons or another person, or by taking advantage of a coercive environment or such person's or persons' incapacity to give genuine consent.[22]

Somewhat unhelpfully, this definition hinges on the meaning given to the phrase 'an act of a sexual nature', which is not qualified anywhere in the Statute or the Rules. It would be a mistake, however, to assume that it refers exclusively to acts committed with a sexual motive or for the purposes of gaining sexual gratification. Any act which targets an individual's sexual integrity, sexual function, or sexual organs—such as forcible circumcision, forced castration, mutilation of sexual organs, forced public nudity, or sexualized torture—could be considered 'an act of a sexual nature' for the purposes of the Statute, despite the excessively conservative and regressive approach to the issue taken by Pre-Trial Chamber II.[23]

[21] Art 7(3) ICC Statute. The term 'sex' is not defined.

[22] ICC Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3(part II-B), 9 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP), Art 7(1)(g)-6, para. 1. The phrase 'acts of a sexual nature' is also used as one of the material elements of the crime of sexual slavery; see ICC Elements of Crimes, Art 7(1)(g)-2.

[23] The judges of Pre-Trial Chamber II (Judge Trendafilova, Judge Tarfusser, and the late Judge Kaul) have made a number of under-reasoned and legally restrictive findings on the issue of sexual violence and which forms of conduct could constitute 'an act of a sexual nature'. In the arrest warrant decision in the Bemba case, Pre-Trial Chamber III (comprised of Judge Trendafilova, Judge Kaul, and Judge Dembele-Diarra) refused to include factual allegations of women being forced to undress in public for the purpose of humiliation within the charge of 'other forms of sexual violence'; see Decision

The terms and concepts of 'sexual violence' and 'gender-based violence' are not mutually exclusive. Whenever someone is targeted for violence on the basis of their gender, or the way in which that gender is understood in that social context, that constitutes a gender-based crime (for example, killing all men of military age as presumed combatants, beating or imprisoning women for working outside the home or becoming politically active).[24] Whenever someone is targeted by or forced to engage in an act of a sexual nature without their consent, that constitutes a crime of sexual violence; it may additionally be a gender-based crime if that person was targeted for sexual violence on the basis that they were male or female (for example, 'corrective' rape of lesbians or gay men, sexual enslavement of female child soldiers, forcing male prisoners to masturbate or sexually assault another detainee).[25] Not every gender-based crime will involve sexual violence, but most crimes of sexual violence will also be gender-based crimes. For example, if a village is attacked, all the men are killed, and all the women are raped, both of those are gender-based crimes; the rape of the women is a sexual and gender-based crime. This chapter will refer to both terms where appropriate.

If one were to assess the effectiveness of the OTP on this issue purely in numerical terms, its record of including charges of sexual and gender-based violence in its investigations and cases is impressive, particularly when compared with the glaring absence of such charges in the initial indictments of the ICTY and ICTR. Charges of sexual and gender-based crimes have been brought in six of the eight Situations before the Court on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-14-tENG, PTC III, ICC, 10 June 2008. In the Muthaura case, Pre-Trial Chamber II refused to characterize the forcible circumcision of men of Luo ethnicity—involving the amateur full or partial amputation of the penis, committed in public with makeshift implements such as broken bottles—as 'other forms of sexual violence' on the basis that 'acts of forcible circumcision cannot be considered acts of a "sexual nature" as required by the Elements of Crimes but are to be more properly qualified as "other inhumane acts" … in light of the serious injury to body that the forcible circumcision causes'; see Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Summonses to Appear, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-01, PTC II, ICC, 8 March 2011, para. 27. The Chamber returned to this issue in the confirmation of charges decision, arguing that 'not every act of violence which targets parts of the body commonly associated with sexuality should be considered an act of sexual violence' and that 'the determination of whether an act is of a sexual nature is inherently a question of fact'. The Chamber came to the remarkable conclusion that 'the evidence placed before it does not establish the sexual nature of the acts of forcible circumcision and penile amputation visited upon Luo men'; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, paras 265–6. For a critique of these decisions, see N Hayes, 'Sisyphus Wept: Prosecuting Sexual Violence at the International Criminal Court' in N Hayes et al. (eds), Ashgate Research Companion to International Criminal Law: Critical Perspectives (Aldershot: Ashgate 2013).

[24] The OTP's recently released Policy Paper on Crimes of Sexual and Gender-Based Violence provides the following definition: '"Gender-based crimes" are those committed against persons, whether male or female, because of their sex and/or socially constructed gender roles. Gender-based crimes are not always manifested as a form of sexual violence. They may include non-sexual attacks on women and girls, and men and boys, because of their gender'; see ICC OTP, Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes (June 2014) 3 ('OTP Policy Paper').

[25] The OTP Policy Paper defines them as follows: '"Sexual crimes" that fall under the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC are listed under articles 7(1)(g), 8(2)(b)(xxii), and 8(2)(e)(vi) of the Statute, and described in the Elements of Crimes ("Elements"). An act of a sexual nature is not limited to physical violence, and may not involve any physical contact—for example, forced nudity. Sexual crimes, therefore, cover both physical and non-physical acts with a sexual element'; ibid.

to date,[26] with the exception of Libya and Mali.[27] Evidence of crimes of sexual and gender-based violence has been included in 14 of the 20 cases brought by the prosecutor to date, and against 18 of 31 individuals charged (including one female accused, Simone Gbagbo).[28] Significantly, allegations of sexual violence against men have been included in three cases to date: Bemba, Ntaganda, and Muthaura.[29] Sexual and gender-based violence has been charged as a war crime,[30] a crime against humanity,[31] and an act of genocide,[32] although it is significant that the specific charges chosen have largely conformed to those already successfully prosecuted by the ad hoc Tribunals, such as rape, torture, persecution, outrages upon personal dignity, and other inhumane acts.[33] As much as the expanded list of sexual crimes contained in the Rome Statute was hailed at the time of its adoption as both progressive and necessary,[34] they have not all been enforced in practice. It is worth noting that the ICC Prosecutor has never sought to bring charges of forced pregnancy, forced sterilization, or enforced prostitution against any defendant to date.

As heartening as the overall statistics on including charges of sexual violence may be, the practice of the ICC has unfortunately confirmed that this category of crime is disproportionately vulnerable to attrition at every stage of proceedings. For example, Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice conducted research on the inclusion of charges sought at the arrest warrant phase of proceedings across nine cases before the ICC,[35] and [26] Charges have been included in the cases against Ntaganda, Katanga, Ngudjolo, Mbarushimana, and Mudacumura (Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo); Bemba (Situation in the Central African Republic); Kony et al. (Situation in Uganda); Harun and Kushayb, Al Bashir, and Hussein (Situation in Darfur, Sudan); Muthaura et al. (Situation in the Republic of Kenya); and in the cases against Laurent and Simone Gbagbo and Blé Goude (Situation in Côte d'Ivoire).

[27] Although Prosecutor Bensouda highlighted preliminary evidence of the commission of rape as a war crime in Mali in her initial report on the Situation under Art 53(1), no arrest warrants or summonses to appear have been issued or made public at the time of writing. See ICC OTP, Situation in Mali Art 53(1) Report (16 January 2013) 25. Likewise, although Prosecutor Ocampo announced his intention to investigate charges for sexual violence in the Gaddafi case, no such charges have been added to date. See e.g. E Pilkington et al., 'Gaddafi Faces New ICC Charges for Using Rape as Weapon in Conflict', Guardian, 9 June 2011; Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Legal Eye on the ICC (July 2011).

[28] See Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card on the International Criminal Court 2013, 59–63 for a full overview of all charges of sexual and gender-based violence brought by the ICC to date. These figures do not include cases brought by the Prosecutor for offences against the administration of justice.

[29] See further the discussion of male sexual violence in section 32.4.

[30] Specifically, the war crimes of rape, sexual slavery, torture, inhuman treatment, outrages upon personal dignity, and mutilation.

[31] Including rape, sexual slavery, torture, persecution (including persecution based on gender), other forms of sexual violence, and other inhumane acts.

[32] The case against Omar Al Bashir includes charges of causing serious bodily or mental harm by means of sexual violence as an act of genocide; see Second Warrant of Arrest for Omar Hassan Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-95, PTC I, ICC, 12 July 2010. The Elements of Crimes specifically acknowledge that the act of genocide of 'causing serious bodily or mental harm' would be satisfied by conduct including, but not limited to, 'acts of torture, rape, sexual violence or inhuman or degrading treatment'; see ICC Elements of Crimes, Art 6(b), para. 1.

[33] The ICC has made good use of some categories of crime which were not available to prosecutors under the Statute of the ICTY or ICTR, such as rape as a war crime or sexual slavery (as distinct from the crime of enslavement) as a war crime or crime against humanity.

[34] See e.g. B Bedont and K Hall-Martinez, 'Ending Impunity for Gender Crimes under the International Criminal Court' (1999) 6 Brown Journal of World Affairs 65, 69.

[35] Namely the cases against Bemba, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Harun and Kushayb, Al Bashir, Hussein, Gbagbo, Mbarushimana, Ntaganda, and Mudacumura; see Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card on the International Criminal Court 2012, 106.

found that only seven charges out of a total of 204 sought by the prosecutor had not been included in the arrest warrants or summonses to appear, five of which were charges for sexual or gender-based violence.[36] The OTP has an indefensibly poor record at the confirmation of charges phase generally,[37] with four of the 16 individuals who have appeared before the Court for a confirmation of charges hearing being dismissed without charge and another having all charges against him withdrawn following the confirmation hearing.[38] To put that figure in some context, of the 31 individuals indicted by the ICC to date, just under half have never been brought into custody,[39] and of those that have made an appearance before the ICC, just over a quarter have had all charges against them dismissed and have been released before trial. However, when one examines the fate of individual charges at the confirmation phase, a distinct pattern emerges where charges of sexual or gender-based violence are overwhelmingly more likely not to be confirmed or to have their legal characterization amended. At the end of Prosecutor Ocampo's term of office, exactly half of all charges of sexual and gender-based violence had been rejected at the confirmation of charges phase;[40] with [36] The Pre-Trial Chamber in the Bemba case declined to include two charges of other forms of sexual violence (based on allegations of forcible public nudity for the purposes of humiliation) in the Arrest Warrant for reasons discussed in fn. 23. In the Mudacumura case, the Pre-Trial Chamber refused to include all five charges of crimes against humanity sought by the Prosecutor on the grounds that there was insufficient evidence to establish reasonable grounds to believe that there had been an organizational policy on the part of the FDLR to attack the civilian population. Of those five charges, three (rape, torture, and persecution) related to sexual and gender-based violence and two (murder and other inhumane acts) related to other categories of crime. See Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58, Mudacumura, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, PTC II, ICC, 13 July 2012.

[37] See e.g. W Schabas, 'The Banality of International Justice' (2013) 11 Journal of International Criminal Justice 545, 546–7, noting that the confirmation of charges statistics, taken together with the acquittal of Ngudjolo and the withdrawal of charges against Muthaura, leave the OTP with 'a batting average of <60% … [which] compares very poorly with acquittal rates at other international criminal trials, including the International Military Tribunal, that average about 14%'. See further A Smeulers et al., 'Sixty-Five Years of International Criminal Justice: The Facts and Figures' (2013) 13 International Criminal Law Review 7.

[38] While the cases against Lubanga, Katanga, Ngudjolo, Bemba, Banda, Jerbo, Muthaura, Kenyatta, Ruto, Sang, Laurent Gbagbo, and Ntaganda proceeded to trial, no charges were confirmed against Abu Garda, Mbarushimana, Ali, or Kosgey and they were released. See Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, PTC I, ICC, 8 February 2010; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya (n 23). The charges against Muthaura were withdrawn by Prosecutor Bensouda in March 2013, as various evidentiary problems in the case meant that the OTP no longer believed there to be a reasonable prospect of conviction. Prosecution Notification of Withdrawal of the Charges against Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-687, OTP, ICC, 11 March 2013.

[39] Namely Mudacumura, Kony, Otti, Lukwiya, Ongwen, Odhiambo, Harun, Kushayb, Al Bashir, Hussein, Muammar Gaddafi, Saif Gaddafi, Al-Senussi, Simone Gbagbo, and Blé Goude. Of those 15 individuals, 3 are believed to be dead (Vincent Otti, Raska Lukwiya, and Muammar Gaddafi) and 1 case has been deemed inadmissible (Abdullah Al-Senussi), so 11 ICC arrest warrants remain outstanding.

[40] See Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card on the International Criminal Court 2012 (n 35) 106–7. Following the confirmation of charges hearings in the Mbarushimana and Kenyan cases, 15 of a total of 30 charges of sexual and gender-based violence across 4 cases (Bemba, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Mbarushimana, and Muthaura et al.) have not been confirmed for trial. Prior to those decisions, the failure rate of charges for gender-based crimes at the confirmation of charges phase the successful confirmation hearings against Laurent Gbagbo and Bosco Ntaganda, that figure has improved under Prosecutor Bensouda's tenure, but still represents an attrition rate of over 40%.[41]

At the trial phase, there is even less cause for optimism. As the Institute for War and Peace Reporting has pointed out, over a decade after beginning its operation, the ICC has not achieved a single conviction for sexual violence crimes.[42] Of the three cases to have been the subject of a judgment under Article 74 to date, all have included some evidence of acts of sexual violence, but none has resulted in a conviction for crimes of sexual violence. While the reasons behind this have varied, the determinative issue was not, as some might expect, a failure to prove that the underlying acts of sexual violence had in fact taken place. In the Lubanga case, Prosecutor Ocampo took the infamous decision not to include charges of sexual violence crimes in the first place[43] and not to support their inclusion under Regulation 55,[44] despite the fact that 15 of the first 25 prosecution was 33%; see Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card on the International Criminal Court 2011, 125.

[41] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Against Laurent Gbagbo, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, PTC I, ICC, 12 June 2014; Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Bosco Ntaganda, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-309, PTC II, ICC, 9 June 2014. Following the confirmation of charges hearings in the cases against Laurent Gbagbo and Bosco Ntaganda, 22 of a total of 37 charges for sexual and gender-based crimes have successfully been confirmed for trial, which represents a successful confirmation rate of 59.46%. When one takes the withdrawal of charges against Francis Muthaura into consideration, the percentage of charges for sexual and gender-based violence which will proceed to trial drops to 51.35% (19 of 37 charges).

[42] See B Evans-Pritchard, 'ICC Restates Commitment on Crimes of Sexual Violence' (Institute for War and Peace Reporting, ACR Issue 392, 10 June 2014): 'Ever since the International Criminal Court began bringing suspected war criminals to The Hague, it has been criticised for not taking crimes involving sexual violence seriously enough … 12 years into its operations, the court is still to convict anyone of rape or other gender-based crimes.'

[43] Warrant of Arrest, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006, Prosecutor's Information on Further Investigation, Prosecutor v Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-170, OTP, ICC, 28 June 2006. See further Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Women's Initiatives' Letter to the Prosecutor Stating Concern about the Failure to Investigate and Charge Gender-Based Crimes in the Lubanga Case (2006, Legal Filings Submitted by the Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice to the International Criminal Court); Human Rights Watch, ICC Charges Raise Concern (1 August 2006); S Pritchett, 'Entrenched Hegemony, Efficient Procedure or Selective Justice: An Inquiry into Charges for Gender-Based Violence at the International Criminal Court' (2008) 17 Transnational Law and Contemporary Problems 265; Hayes, 'Sisyphus Wept: Prosecuting Sexual Violence at the International Criminal Court' (n 23).

[44] See Joint Application of the Legal Representatives of Victims for the Implementation of the Procedure under Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1891-tENG, TC I, ICC, 22 May 2009; Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2049, TC I, ICC, 14 July 2009; Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2074, OTP, ICC, 12 August 2009; Judgment on the Appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009.

witnesses testified about sexual and gender-based violence[45] and the Prosecutor had himself invoked the alleged rape and sexual enslavement of female child soldiers at both the opening and closing of the trial.[46] This resulted in a deeply unsatisfactory outcome in the trial judgment, where the majority held that, despite the extensive evidence of sexual violence advanced during the trial, 'given the prosecution's failure to include allegations of sexual violence in the charges…this evidence is irrelevant for the purposes of the [judgment] save as regards providing context'.[47]

In contrast, both Katanga and Ngudjolo were in fact charged with rape and sexual slavery as war crimes and crimes against humanity.[48] Following the submission of all evidence at trial and just prior to the expected issuance of a judgment in the case, the Trial Chamber (by majority) issued a controversial decision announcing the severance of the charges between the two defendants and notifying the parties of its intention to amend the legal characterization of the mode of liability against Katanga under Regulation 55.[49] In its judgment against Ngudjolo, despite concluding that there was 'a wealth of evidence to show that during and after the 24 February 2003 attack [on Bogoro]…women were raped and some were kept in captivity by the attackers',[50] the Chamber nevertheless acquitted Ngudjolo of all charges on the basis that it was not satisfied that his individual criminal responsibility had been proven under the mode of liability alleged by the prosecutor.[51]

[45] For an overview of this testimony, see Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card on the International Criminal Court 2009, 71–85.

[46] Trial Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-107-ENG ET WT, TC I, ICC, 26 January 2009, 11–13; Trial Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-356-ENG ET WT, TC I, ICC, 25 August 2011, 23–4 and 53–4.

[47] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, para. 896 ('Lubanga Trial Judgment'). The majority reasoned that '[r]egardless of whether sexual violence may properly be included within the scope of "using [children under the age of 15] to participate actively in hostilities" as a matter of law, because facts relating to sexual violence were not included in the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, it would be impermissible for the Chamber to base its [judgment] on the evidence introduced during the trial that is relevant to this issue'; ibid., para. 630. Judge Odio-Benito dissented on this point, arguing that evidence of sexual violence should have been included within the criminal conduct of using children to actively participate in hostilities. See Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute—Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Odio-Benito, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2482, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012.

[48] Warrant of Arrest for Germain Katanga, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1-US-tENG, PTC I, ICC, 2 July 2007; Warrant of Arrest for Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04/01/07-260-tENG, PTC I, ICC, 6 July 2007; Decision on the Joinder of the Cases against Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-257, PTC I, ICC, 10 March 2008.

[49] Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319-tENG/FRA, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012. See further J Easterday, 'After Case Closed, Judges Propose Changes to the Charges against Germain Katanga', International Justice Monitor, 26 November 2012; International Bar Association, Fair Trial Digest (IBA ICC Programme, September–November 2012); E Fry, 'International Criminal Court' (2013) 31 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 217.

[50] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012, para. 338 ('Ngudjolo Trial Judgment').

[51] The prosecution had alleged that Ngudjolo, as the commander of the armed rebel group Front des Nationalistes et Integristes (FNI), was responsible as an indirect co-perpetrator under Art 25(3)(a) for

Bizarrely, the Trial Chamber emphasized that its decision to acquit Ngudjolo should not be taken as a rejection of the allegations against him, stating:

> [i]t is the Chamber's position that the fact that an allegation is not, in its view, proven beyond reasonable doubt does not necessarily mean that the Chamber questions the very existence of the alleged fact. It simply means that it considers that there is insufficient reliable evidence to make a finding on the veracity of the alleged fact in light of the standard of proof. Accordingly, finding an accused person not guilty does not necessarily mean that the Chamber considers him or her to be innocent. Such a finding merely demonstrates that the evidence presented in support of the accused's guilt has not satisfied the Chamber 'beyond reasonable doubt'.[52]

The Katanga trial judgment likewise constituted a hugely disappointing outcome for the charges of sexual violence in the case.[53] Having recharacterized the mode of liability and essentially '[moved] the factual goalposts of the case in the name of pursuing the truth',[54] a majority of the Trial Chamber was willing to convict Katanga under Article 25(3)(d)(ii) for his contribution to the attack on Bogoro.[55] As this was the first case containing charges of sexual and gender-based crimes to reach trial, the judges made some significant legal findings regarding the interpretation of the crimes of rape and sexual slavery under the Statute.[56] Having reviewed the evidence seven counts of war crimes and three counts of crimes against humanity allegedly committed by FNI forces during an attack on the village of Bogoro on 24 February 2003. The Trial Chamber found that there was insufficient evidence to conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that Ngudjolo had in fact been the leader of the combatants at the time of the attack on Bogoro, but did not make any findings on the crimes themselves or who may have been responsible for them.

[52] Ngudjolo Trial Judgment (n 50) para. 36.

[53] See Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Partial Conviction of Katanga by ICC—Acquittals for Sexual Violence and Use of Child Soldiers (7 March 2014).

[54] Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319-tENG/FRA, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012, para. 36.

[55] Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014 ('Katanga Trial Judgment'). This judgment was the subject of a blistering minority dissenting opinion from Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert. See Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut—Minority Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436-AnxI, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014.

[56] Ibid., paras 961–84. For example, in dealing with the material elements of sexual slavery, the Chamber held that it is necessary to take a case-by-case approach when analysing the type of acts which would satisfy this element. In relation to deprivation of liberty, the Court noted that facts relating to detention or captivity (including its duration) would be relevant, as would information that relates to efforts to limit freedom of movement or freedom of choice, and information on measures to prevent or discourage attempts to escape. Facts that show the use of threats, force, or other forms of physical or mental coercion are relevant to proving this element, as are facts that show the exercise of psychological pressure, the vulnerability of the victim, or an obligation to engage in forced labour. Significantly, the Court also emphasized that the right of ownership over others does not automatically equate to a commercial transaction—the socio-economic conditions under which the powers of ownership are exercised is a relevant factor, but the fundamental nature of servitude comes down to the inability of the victim to amend or modify his/her situation. This finding implies that a significant enough degree of socio-economic inequality between the victim and perpetrator could potentially satisfy the element of 'exercising powers of ownership'. In relation to the material elements of the crime of rape and the reference to 'force, threat of force or coercion', the Chamber held that proving that any one of these elements was present is sufficient to prove that an act of penetration constituted the crime of rape. It is not necessary to prove the absence of

of the three witnesses who testified about having been the victims of those crimes and found them to be credible,[57] the Chamber concluded that it had been proven beyond a reasonable doubt that crimes of rape and sexual slavery had been committed during and after the attack on Bogoro.[58] However, despite finding that the acts of rape and sexual slavery had constituted part of the attack against a civilian population within the meaning of Article 7 and were committed in the context of and associated with an armed conflict within the meaning of Article 8,[59] the Chamber nonetheless concluded that these acts—and only these acts—did not form part of the common plan to attack the village of Bogoro and therefore declined to convict Katanga even under the alternative form of liability.[60] Although both the defence and prosecution had initially appealed against the decision,[61] the parties later reached an agreement to discontinue their appeals and so the trial judgment is now final.[62]

At every stage of proceedings and in relation to every applicable standard of proof, charges of sexual and gender-based violence are demonstrably more likely to be excluded, rejected, or recharacterized, while charges for non-sexual crimes such as murder, persecution, or pillage encounter no such obstacles. Why, then, are crimes of sexual violence so much more vulnerable to attrition than any other category of crime before the Court? If the terminal weakness lay in proving the specific elements of the crimes charged, one might be tempted to attribute the lamentable failure rate to the stereotypical expectation of prohibitive difficulty in eliciting credible, reliable evidence about such intimate details from severely traumatized victims and witnesses.[63] However, the experience of the ICC has shown that, in the overwhelming majority consent by the victim, except in circumstances where the perpetrator committed the act against someone 'incapable of giving genuine consent' due to age, incapacity, or other circumstances.

[57] Ibid., paras 988–1019. For a summary of this testimony, see Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card on the International Criminal Court 2010, 165–76.

[58] Ibid., paras 999 and 1023.

[59] Ibid., paras 1167 and 1234.

[60] Ibid., paras 1663–4. The Chamber inexplicably concluded that 'although the acts of rape and sexual slavery were an integral part of the project of the militia to attack the mainly Hema civilian population of Bogoro, the Chamber could nevertheless not conclude, on the basis of the evidence before it, that the criminal objective pursued on the 24 February 2003 necessarily included the commission of the specific crimes provided for in Arts 7(1)(g) and 8(2)(e)(vi) of the Statute. Therefore and for all of these reasons, the Chamber cannot hold the rapes and sexual slavery as falling within the common purpose' (translation author's own).

[61] Notice of Appeal against the Decision of Conviction 'Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut' Rendered by Trial Chamber II, 7 March 2014, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3459, Defence, ICC, 9 April 2014; Prosecution's Appeal against Trial Chamber II's 'Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3462, OTP, ICC, 9 April 2014.

[62] Defence Notice of Discontinuance of Appeal against the 'Jugement Rendu en Application de l'Article 74 du Statut' Rendered by Trial Chamber II on 7 April 2014, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3497, Defence, ICC, 25 June 2014; Notice of Discontinuance of the Prosecution's Appeal against the Art 74 Judgment of Conviction of Trial Chamber II dated 7 March 2014 in Relation to Germain Katanga, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3498, OTP, ICC, 25 June 2014; 'Defence and Prosecution Discontinue Respective Appeals against Judgment in Katanga Case', ICC Press Release, 25 June 2014.

[63] For an example of this kind of reflexive avoidance based on lazy outmoded clichés, see W Wiley, 'The Difficulties Inherent in the Investigation of Allegations of Rape before International Courts and Tribunals' in M Bergsmo et al. (eds), Understanding and Proving International Sex Crimes (Beijing: Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 367.

of cases where such charges have been excluded, the Chamber in question have pronounced themselves satisfied that the underlying acts of sexual violence did in fact take place, but have been unwilling to confirm or convict due to insufficiencies in the pleading of the mode of liability or the contextual elements of the crimes.[64] The problem, therefore, is not with the nature of the crimes themselves but with the manner in which they are understood and presented within the overall case hypothesis, which is not an issue of specialist gender-sensitive intuition but of basic professional competence. While a substantial portion of the responsibility for the Court's abject track record can be attributed to the remarkably unreceptive and conservative attitude of the judges (most particularly, it has to be said, those in Pre-Trial Chamber II),[65] it is worth examining some of the persistent strategic errors made by the first Prosecutor to understand how the structural weaknesses in ICC cases which have proven so disproportionately injurious to charges of sexual violence came about and were permitted to recur.

32.3 Ocampo and Investigations: The OTP's Evidence Problem

Dianne Luping, who worked as both an investigator and trial lawyer at the ICC, has argued that a focused approach to sexual and gender-based violence must be implemented 'from the outset, during the pre-analysis phase and before any decision is made to initiate an investigation in any country'.[66] The advantages of this strategy would seem obvious in light of the prosecutor's statutory obligation to prioritize sexual violence, even if the experience of the ad hoc Tribunals had not already provided numerous signal examples of the procedural headaches and evidential consequences resulting from a failure to identify and pursue evidence of sexual violence crimes from the earliest possible stage of proceedings.[67] However, both the ICTY and ICTR had [64] See e.g. the Katanga Trial Judgment (n 55), Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58, Mudacumura (n 36), Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 38), Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 38) and Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 23).

[65] See e.g. the confirmation of charges decision in the Bemba case, where the Pre-Trial Chamber chose to recharacterize the facts underlying a charge of torture (relating to the pain and suffering experienced by family members forced to watch the rape of a relative) into a charge of rape (relating to the rape of the relative) on the basis that, in its view, the act of torture was 'fully subsumed by the count of rape'. Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC 01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, paras 204–5. See further the findings on 'other forms of sexual violence' in the Bemba arrest warrant decision and Muthaura confirmation decision discussed in fn. 23.

[66] D Luping, 'Investigation and Prosecution of Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes before the International Criminal Court' (2009) 17 American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 431, 434.

[67] See e.g. the extraordinary outcome in the Lukić case at the ICTY, where the failure of the Prosecution's late application to amend the original indictment against the Lukić brothers to include charges of sexual violence resulted in the truly bizarre situation where testimony from a witness who had been raped by one of the defendants was introduced in court only to undermine his alibi; Decision on Prosecution Motion Seeking Leave to Amend the Second Amended Indictment and on Prosecution Motion to Include UN Security Council Resolution 1820 (2008) as Additional Supporting Material to Proposed Third Amended Indictment as well as on Milan Lukić's Request for Reconsideration on Certification of the Pre-Trial the relative advantage of a much more focused and defined mandate, particularly in terms of geographic and temporal jurisdiction, whereas for the ICC, as a permanent, treaty-based international criminal tribunal, even the decision to exercise jurisdiction in a particular situation would be viewed as constituting a deliberate strategic choice with both political and resource implications.

The Prosecutor was additionally constrained by emphasis on gravity within the statutory framework of the Court,[68] which was interpreted by his Office to contain a requirement to focus on 'those who bear the greatest responsibility for the most serious crimes… [and] those situated at the highest echelons of responsibility, including those who ordered, financed or otherwise organised the alleged crimes';[69] as distinct from the freedom to target lower-level direct perpetrators enjoyed by the ad hoc Tribunals in their initial years of operation as part of their pyramidal investigative strategy.[70] In addition, Regulation 34 of the Regulations of the OTP stipulates that, when developing a case hypothesis, the joint investigation team should aim to select incidents which reflect the most serious crimes and the main types of victimization, specifically sexual and gender-based violence, and violence against children.[71] As a result, Prosecutor Ocampo chose to adopt a policy of 'focused investigations', whereby 'incidents are selected to provide a sample that is reflective of the gravest incidents and the main types of victimisation',[72] in an effort to balance the finite resources available to the Court with the obligation to select cases and charges which are most representative of the underlying conflict. In practice, however, this strategy did not result in streamlined, expeditious capsule prosecutions but in insufficient evidence, remotely developed case hypotheses, and a fundamental disconnect from the context in the field.

International criminal investigations are the most critically important component of any international justice project, as the ability to construct a prosecution case or reach a judicial finding as to individual criminal responsibility depends entirely on the sufficiency and quality of the evidence collected. As has been emphasized by the Institute for International Criminal Investigations:

> Evidence is the essential work product of any investigation and the raw material that judges will work with in their quest to ascertain the truth. Obtaining the best and most reliable evidence in a balanced and fair manner is the objective of every investigation.… Unless an investigator is able to discover and collect evidence, he or she cannot uncover the truth regarding the event being investigated.… One of the most important principles an investigator must adopt in his or her quest is that there is always evidence in a case. It is impossible to commit wrongdoing and leave no identifiable trace. The task for the investigator is to identify it, document it and collect it. If an investigator fails to turn up evidence in a case, it is not because there was no

Judges Order of 19 June 2008, Lukić and Lukić, IT-98-32/1-PT, TC III, ICTY, 8 July 2008; see further S Jennings, 'Lukic Trial Ruling Provokes Outcry' (Institute for War and Peace Reporting, 2008).

[68] See in particular Arts 53 and 54 ICC Statute.

[69] ICC OTP, Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–12, 5–6.

[70] ICTY, Investigations <http://www.icty.org/sid/97> accessed 1 July 2014.

[71] Regulation 34(2) of the Regulations of the OTP (entered into force 23 April 2009) ICC-BD/05-01-09.

[72] ICC OTP, Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–2012 (n 69) 6.

> evidence; it simply means that the investigator could not find it. . . . An experienced investigator embarks on an unrelenting search for evidence cognisant that evidence must exist and that many different things can have evidential value.[73]

Given their foundational impact on the success or failure of any subsequent prosecution, the investigation policies and practices of international criminal tribunals have been inexplicably under-analysed within academic discourse.[74] Within the specific legal framework of the ICC, however, the issue is not just of academic significance; due to the restrictions placed on the permissible timeframe for investigations by the Statute and Appeals Chamber, mistakes or omissions made at the investigation phase may prove to be literally impossible to fix at a later stage of proceedings.[75] For both legal and practical reasons, investigators must try to get it right on their first try, because they may never get a second opportunity.[76]

The cardinal principle underlying a responsible and professional investigative strategy is that investigations must be evidence-led. This is by no means a novel insight; as 'the father of modern scientific crime detection',[77] Sherlock Holmes, noted in 1891: '[i]t is a capital mistake to theorise before one has data. Insensibly one begins to twist facts to suit theories, instead of theories to suit facts'.[78] Not only does an evidence-led approach lead to a stronger and more logical case hypothesis based on an identified fact pattern, but it also allows investigators and prosecutors to detect and recognize potential weaknesses in their own case at a sufficiently early stage in proceedings to allow for amendment or supplemental investigations.[79] In addition, the ICC

[73] Institute for International Criminal Investigations, Investigators Manual 7th edn (The Hague: IICI Foundation 2013, copy on file with author) 86–7.

[74] Some honourable exceptions include M Marcus, 'Investigation of Sexual and Gender-Based Violence under International Criminal Law' in A de Brouwer et al. (eds), Sexual Violence as an International Crime: Interdisciplinary Approaches (Cambridge: Intersentia 2013) and D Groome, The Handbook of Human Rights Investigation (Northborough: Human Rights Press 2000).

[75] See further A Whiting, 'Dynamic Investigative Practice at the International Criminal Court' (2013) 76 Law and Contemporary Problems 163; D Groome, 'No Witness, No Case: An Assessment of the Conduct and Quality of ICC Investigations' (2014) 3 Penn State Journal of Law and International Affairs 1.

[76] There are a number of potential factors which could render subsequent investigations impossible: procedural restrictions on the introduction of new evidence following a confirmation decision or the commencement of a trial; limited resources which cannot be stretched to encompass a follow-up field mission; the danger in an unstable post-conflict environment that physical evidence may degrade or be removed; the death or displacement of victims and witnesses who therefore cannot be traced or re-interviewed; the lack of cooperation of state authorities making official documentary records impossible to access through formal means. A responsible investigator will therefore seek to document or collect all relevant evidence as soon as it is encountered, providing that it is practically feasible for them to do so and will not give rise to an unacceptable risk for the information provider.

[77] For a fascinating examination of the influential contributions of the Sherlock Holmes stories to the development of modern forensic investigative methods, see S Berg, 'Sherlock Holmes: Father of Scientific Crime and Detection' (1971) 61 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 446.

[78] A Conan Doyle, 'A Scandal in Bohemia' in The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (New York: Harper and Brothers 1892) 7; first published in 7 The Strand Magazine (1891) 61.

[79] For example, former practitioners have noted that, while all prosecution activities including investigations should be based on a legal theory oriented to the elements of proof for the case as a whole, '[i]t is also important for the narrative to be allowed to unfold as the investigations develop, rather than being limited to fit a specific legal theory or framework'; R Petit et al. (eds), Prosecuting Mass Crimes: A Compendium of Lessons Learned and Suggested Practices (Offices of the Prosecutor of the ICTY, ICTR, SCSL, ECCC, and STL, International Best Practice Project, 2013, copy on file with author) para. 279.

Prosecutor, by way of a provision unique among international tribunals, is under an explicit statutory obligation imposed by Article 54(1)(a) to investigate both incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally 'in order to establish the truth',[80] essentially obliging him or her to act primarily as an organ of the Court rather than as a partial and adversarial litigant.[81]

In analysing the practice of the ICC under Prosecutor Ocampo, however, there appears to have been a distinct tendency to identify potential defendants, develop the case hypothesis in the abstract, and then seek evidence which confirmed a preferred theory of liability, rather than to doggedly establish the background fact patterns and context of a situation before pursuing any specific defendant or charges.[82] The Prosecutor was excoriated for this methodology in the strongest of terms in the Mbarushimana confirmation decision:

> [T]he Chamber wishes to highlight its concern at the technique followed in several instances by some Prosecution investigators, which seems utterly inappropriate when viewed in light of the objective, set out in article 54(1)(a) of the Statute, to establish the truth by 'investigating incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally'. The reader of the transcript of interviews is repeatedly left with the impression that the investigator is so attached to his or her theory or assumption that he or she does not refrain from putting questions in leading terms and from showing resentment, impatience or disappointment whenever the witness replies in terms which are not entirely in line with his or her expectations. Suggesting that the witness may not be 'really remembering exactly what was said', complaining about having 'to milk out' from the witness details which are of relevance to the investigation, lamenting that the witness does not 'really understand what is important' to the investigators in the case, or hinting at the fact that the witness may be 'trying to cover' for the Suspect, seem hardly reconcilable with a professional and impartial technique of witness questioning. Accordingly, the Chamber cannot refrain from deprecating such

[80] Art 54(1)(a) states that 'The Prosecutor shall … [i]n order to establish the truth, extend the investigation to cover all facts and evidence relevant to an assessment of whether there is criminal responsibility under this Statute, and, in so doing, investigate incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally' (emphasis added).

[81] See e.g. International Bar Association, The ICC under Scrutiny: Assessing Recent Developments at the International Criminal Court (IBA/ICC Monitoring and Outreach Programme, November 2008), noting that 'Successful prosecution should not be the ultimate aim of the Prosecutor when investigating—this should be "establishment of truth" '. See further A Cassese, International Criminal Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 440: '[W]ithin the ICC system, the Prosecutor, unlike his counterpart in many national law systems, is not merely a party to a trial', but instead 'acts as an "organ of justice" '.

[82] For example, in the Lubanga case, despite uncovering preliminary evidence of a range of crimes, including rape and sexual slavery, prosecution investigators were instructed to concentrate on and pursue evidence relating to the conscription and use of child soldiers only; see K Glassborow, 'ICC Investigative Strategy Under Fire' (Institute for War and Peace Reporting, 27 October 2008). The article, based on interviews with multiple OTP staff members including several investigators, identified several examples of ICC prosecutors developing a case hypothesis on the basis of preliminary open-source research, after which 'investigators are told which alleged perpetrators and particular incidents—such as specific attacks on villages, mass killings or forced transfer of civilians—to focus on'.

> techniques and from highlighting that, as a consequence, the probative value of evidence obtained by these means may be significantly weakened.[83]

In a dissenting opinion to the confirmation of charges in the Muthaura case, the late Judge Kaul likewise emphasized the crucial evidentiary and strategic significance of respecting the requirements of Article 54(1)(a), both for the investigation itself and for any subsequent proceedings.[84] Noting that the Prosecutor was required under Article 61(5) to support each charge at the confirmation hearing with 'sufficient evidence' as gathered during the investigation, he stressed that it was 'an absolute, indispensable necessity that any such investigation must be as comprehensive, professional, expeditious and thereby as effective as possible'.[85] He warned:

> I do not find it difficult to conclude that any investigation which does not meet these standards is not in conformity with the letter and spirit of Article 54(1) of the Statute. Likewise, I do not find it difficult to assume that any investigation meeting these standards only partially and unsatisfactorily will probably lead to problems and difficulties not only for an effective and successful prosecution but also for the work of the Chamber concerned and for the Court in general.[86]

After specifically identifying insufficiency of evidence as a consequence of such a strategy, Judge Kaul implicitly rebuked Prosecutor Ocampo for what he viewed as an irresponsibly risky policy in light of Article 54(1): phased investigations.

Given the staggered procedural phases at the ICC and the gradually increasing standard of proof applied at each stage, an overwhelmed or short-sighted Prosecutor might be tempted to gather only enough evidence to satisfy the most immediate evidentiary requirements in the hope of buttressing the case with additional detail prior to the next phase of proceedings; in other words, to provide enough evidence to establish 'reasonable grounds to believe' that crimes had been committed for the purposes of an application to issue an arrest warrant or summons to appear, then find a little more to establish 'substantial grounds' in time for the confirmation hearing, then hope that additional investigations will provide credible probative evidence which could establish the crimes 'beyond a reasonable doubt' and thereby support a conviction.[87] In Judge Kaul's view, not only would this constitute an unsatisfactory investigation under Article 54(1), but:

> [s]uch an approach, as tempting as it might be for the Prosecutor, would be risky, if not irresponsible; if after the confirmation of charges it turns out as impossible to

[83] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 38) para. 51. The case against Mbarushimana had contained the broadest range of charges for sexual and gender-based crimes of any case to date—a majority 8 of 13 charges, including rape, torture, mutilation, other inhumane acts, inhuman treatment, and persecution on the basis of gender—but due to fundamental problems with the case theory and a lack of specificity in the presentation of the evidence, all charges against Mbarushimana were dismissed and he was released without charge in December 2011.

[84] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges—Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, paras 46–57.

[85] Ibid., para. 49. [86] Ibid., para. 52.

[87] The permanent representative to the ICC for the International Federation for Human Rights, Montserrat Carboni, has noted that 'the OTP had a tendency to gather just enough evidence to secure an arrest warrant. This would then be built on to confirm the charges, and then worked on again in order to clear the next hurdle in the case'. See B Evans-Pritchard, 'ICC to Unveil New Investigation Strategy' (Institute for War and Peace Reporting, ACR Issue 367, 21 October 2013).

> gather further evidence to attain the decisive threshold of 'beyond reasonable doubt', the case in question may become very difficult or may eventually collapse at trial, then with many serious consequences, including for the entire Court and the victims who have placed great hopes in this institution.[88]

Judge Kaul therefore advocated that the Prosecutor should 'conduct any investigation ab initio as effectively as possible with the unequivocal aim to assemble as expeditiously as possible relevant and convincing evidence' which could support a finding of criminal responsibility beyond reasonable doubt, before such evidence inevitably degrades or becomes more difficult to obtain with the passage of time.[89] He urged the Prosecutor to have completed the investigation by the time of the confirmation hearing if at all possible,[90] unless compelling reasons came to light to justify the pursuit of further post-confirmation investigations as envisaged and permitted by the Appeals Chamber.[91]

One of the biggest stumbling blocks to the pursuit of evidence-led investigations was the extremely risk-averse strategy employed by the first Prosecutor in relation to the conduct of field investigations.[92] Prosecutor Ocampo appears to have taken a hard-line cautionary stance in relation to the potential risks to victims, witnesses, and other actors in the field who may have been endangered as a result of their interaction with Court staff.[93] Indeed, this attitude was directly responsible for the imposition of the second stay of proceedings in the Lubanga case, when the Prosecutor cited what he construed as 'an independent statutory obligation to protect persons put at risk on account of the Prosecution's actions' to justify his repeated refusal to comply with an order for disclosure made in that case, which involved the formal notification to the Defence of the name of a prosecution intermediary which had already inadvertently been revealed in open court.[94] The Prosecutor had argued that '[the OTP] should not comply, or be asked to comply, with an Order that may require it to violate its separate

[88] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges—Dissenting Opinion by Judge Hans-Peter Kaul, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 84) para. 52.

[89] Ibid., para. 53. [90] Ibid., para. 57.

[91] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Appeal against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure Pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006.

[92] Former ICC prosecutor Andrew Cayley expressed his frustration and disappointment with this strategy, stating, 'it should be emphasized that the OTP was extremely risk averse when I worked there'; see A Cayley, 'Discussion' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 763, 779–80. Caroline Buisman, a defence lawyer at the ICC, has likewise argued that the OTP's assessment of security risks in the field had been 'an overly cautious approach, resulting in significant gaps in the investigations'; see C Buisman, 'Delegating Investigations: Lessons to be Learned from the Lubanga Judgment' (2013) 11 Northwestern Journal of Human Rights 30, 63.

[93] Art 68(1) ICC Statute obliges the Court to 'take appropriate protective measures to protect the safety, physical and psychological well-being, dignity and privacy of victims and witnesses … [having regard to] all relevant factors, including … where the crime involves sexual or gender violence or violence against children. The Prosecutor shall take such measures particularly during the investigation and prosecution of such crimes' (emphasis added); see further Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 47) para. 156.

[94] Prosecution's Urgent Provision of Further Information Following Consultation with the VWU, to Supplement the Request for Variation of the Time-Limit or Stay, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2516, OTP, ICC, 7 July 2010, para. 6.

statutory obligation by subjecting the person to foreseeable risk', before laying down the astonishing ultimatum that '[t]he Prosecutor accordingly has made a determination that the Prosecution would rather face adverse consequences in its litigation than expose a person to risk on account of prior interaction with this Office'.[95]

Such adverse consequences were only narrowly avoided in that case,[96] but it seems obvious that such an absolutist stance would ultimately paralyse the Prosecution's investigative activities entirely, as it is simply unrealistic to aspire to the complete avoidance of all risk, however remote, rather than to monitor and manage the risk to both staff and witnesses which is necessarily inherent to this kind of work. Caroline Buisman, who acted as defence counsel in the Katanga case and has conducted extensive field investigations in the DRC, has argued that 'investigations in war-torn or violent societies will always involve some level of risk no matter how much one seeks to reduce it: this cannot be allowed to reduce the quality of the investigation to the extent the OTP has done so far'.[97] Louise Arbour, speaking as a sitting UN High Commissioner for Human Rights and a former Prosecutor of the ICTY, was particularly critical of the Prosecutor's approach in the Darfur Situation, arguing that 'it is possible to conduct serious investigations of human rights violations during an armed conflict in general, and in Darfur in particular, without putting victims at unreasonable risk'.[98] This issue is of particular relevance to victims of sexual and gender-based crimes, who are frequently additionally vulnerable as a result of the stigma which attaches to such crimes and the heightened risk of family or societal rejection or even reprisals if the existence or content of their cooperation with the Court was to become known. However, I would argue that when a victim or witness is willing to voluntarily assume that risk and make the extremely courageous decision to testify in order to pursue accountability against the perpetrators of such crimes, there is an even more pronounced obligation on the Prosecutor to ensure that the overall case does not ultimately falter because a policy of remote investigations has resulted in clearly insufficient evidence.

[95] Ibid. The Trial Chamber responded furiously to this line of argument, stating that the Prosecutor had embarked on a 'profound, unacceptable and unjustified intrusion into the role of the judiciary' and concluding that he 'cannot be allowed to continue with this prosecution if he seeks to reserve to himself the right to avoid the Court's orders whenever he decides that they are inconsistent with his interpretation of his other obligations'; Redacted Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultation with the VWU, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2517-Red, TC I, ICC, 8 July 2010, paras 27–8.

[96] The stay of proceedings was ultimately lifted by the Appeals Chamber, which recommended that the Trial Chamber should have instituted proceedings for misconduct against the Prosecutor before resorting to the imposition of a stay. Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 8 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultation with the VWU', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2582, AC ICC, 8 October 2010.

[97] Buisman (n 92) 71.

[98] Observations of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Invited in Application of Rule 103 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-19, 10 October 2006, para. 64.

While it is undoubtedly challenging to conduct field investigations in situations of ongoing armed conflict or heightened insecurity, it will not be possible to collect the relevant probative evidence necessary to establish individual criminal responsibility for international crimes without conducting at least some enquiries in situ. Many of the most fundamental and recurring problems with the Prosecutor's evidence and development of a case theory can be attributed to the failure to establish a permanent (or in some cases any) field presence in the countries under investigation.[99] Prosecutor Ocampo's decision not to establish a field presence in Darfur was the subject of sharp criticism from those who had worked on the case[100] and those familiar with the investigative conditions within the country.[101] Inadequate field investigations will have consequences on the extent to which prosecutors understand the conditions on the ground at the time of the alleged crimes, the identification of relevant fact patterns, cultural contexts, and potential defendants, and the ability to critically assess the credibility and sufficiency of their own evidence. These consequences were highlighted by the Trial Chamber in the Ngudjolo case, which deprecated the Prosecution's failure to properly investigate the site of the alleged crimes in question in spite of the acknowledged security risks:

> The Chamber is mindful that [the investigations in the cases against Lubanga, and Katanga and Ngudjolo] were conducted in a region still plagued by high levels of insecurity… [and] acknowledges that the Office of the Prosecutor would have encountered difficulties in locating witnesses with sufficiently accurate recollections of the facts and able to testify without fear, as well as in the collection of reliable documentary evidence necessary for determining the truth in the absence of infrastructure, archives and publicly available information.… Yet the collection of testimonies that are as close as possible to the date of the events is particularly important. It is equally desirable, whenever practicable, to make as many factual findings as possible, in particular forensic findings which are often crucial to the identification of victims, expeditiously and in the loci in quo.[102]

[99] See C De Vos, 'Investigating from Afar: The ICC's Evidence Problem' (2013) 26 Leiden Journal of International Law (2013) 1009, noting that in the DRC, 'ICC investigators spent only an average of ten days in the field, making it difficult for them to even interview witnesses, much less to develop the sort of long-term connections that a more sustained field presence would enable'; ibid., 1016. This strategy is particularly problematic in relation to the investigators' capacity to establish a rapport and ongoing connection with sexual violence victims and witnesses, which often requires multiple interviews before they will be comfortable or confident enough to speak in detail about their experiences.

[100] Andrew Cayley, who had been the Senior Trial Attorney in the Darfur Situation, insisted that 'it was a mistake that the Court did not establish a presence on the ground in Darfur' in light of the consequences for the evidence in the case; see Cayley (n 92) 779–80.

[101] Antonio Cassese had maintained, in an amicus curiae brief submitted in his capacity as Chairman of the UN Commission of Inquiry on Darfur, that although some complex investigative activities might not be possible in light of the prevailing security situation and lack of cooperation from state authorities, 'undertaking targeted and brief interviews of victims and witnesses… could prove to be safe'; see Observations on Issues Concerning the Protection of Victims and the Preservation of Evidence in the Proceedings on Darfur Pending before the ICC, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-14, Antonio Cassese, 25 August 2006, 5 (emphasis in original).

[102] Ngudjolo Trial Judgment (n 50) paras 115 and 117.

The Chamber emphasized the importance of on-site investigations for the Prosecution's analysis of its own witness statements, noting:

> [I]t would have been beneficial for the Prosecution to visit the localities where the Accused lived and where the preparations of the attack on Bogoro allegedly took place, prior to the substantive hearings. To cite but a few good examples, a good knowledge of Zumbe; the view of Bogoro from Zumbe and Kamburso; the distances between Zumbe and Bogoro as well as between Zumbe, Aveba and Kagaba and the condition of the roads would have been useful in clarifying several witness testimonies, thereby promoting a better understanding ab ovo and a more accurate assessment of the various statements.[103]

While acknowledging that it was 'aware of the difficulties encountered by the Prosecution in conducting investigations in a region affected by recurrent conflicts and the fact that it is duty-bound to eschew any action that could result in the identification of witnesses requiring protection',[104] the Chamber advised that it would have benefited the prosecution case to have conducted interviews with certain commanders who had played a key role before and during the attack (as well as Ngudjolo himself) during the investigation phase, to have taken greater efforts to obtain corroborating civil status documents for prosecution witnesses, and to have more thoroughly investigated and understood the socio-cultural framework, local customs, and functioning of family relationships in Ituri.[105]

It is difficult to assess from the outside the extent to which such omissions were a deliberate strategy or simply a consequence of the 'efficient' investigation policy (involving short-term field deployments by small teams) pursued by the OTP in light of financial and budgetary constraints.[106] However, it is clear that one of the most significant results of the limited utilization of field investigations was the Prosecutor's debilitating over-reliance on open-source information such as reports of NGOs, media sources, UN documents, and other publicly available material.[107] In the initial years of the OTP's activities, there had been a perilous tendency to heavily rely on evidence obtained from various national and international agencies on foot of confidentiality agreements under Article 54(3)(e),[108] but after the near-fatal rupture to the Lubanga

[103] Ibid., para. 118. The Chamber had themselves conducted a field visit to Bogoro and the surrounding areas in January 2012 and drew on their findings in the trial judgment. Ibid., paras 68–70.

[104] Ibid., para. 121. [105] Ibid., paras 119–23.

[106] De Vos (n 99) 1014–15, noting that 'in practice, all investigators are Hague-based and travel "on mission", undertaking repeated, short-term trips'.

[107] For example, in the Ngudjolo judgment cited here, the Chamber acknowledged that 'in the absence of [evidence collected in the field], it was necessary to rely primarily on witness statements and reports by MONUC investigators or representatives of various NGOs'. Ngudjolo Trial Judgment (n 50) para. 117.

[108] For example, more than half the evidence in the Lubanga case had been obtained by means of Art 54(3)(e) confidentiality agreements, ultimately resulting in the imposition of a stay of proceedings when some of that evidence was found to be potentially exculpatory but could not be disclosed to the accused. See Trial Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-109-ENG ET WT, TC I, ICC, 27 January 2009 (stating that the prosecution had obtained 55% of its evidence via confidentiality agreements); Decision on the Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Art 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, Together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1401, TC I, ICC, 13 June 2008.

case and the resulting damaged relations with information providers, the Prosecutor was forced to rein in his profligate use of the provision.[109] In later investigations, it became inescapably obvious from judicial assessments of the Prosecution's evidence that open-source information was not just being relied on as part of pre-deployment planning and background research or for the purposes of corroboration, but was also being presented in bulk as a substitute for first-hand documentary or testimonial evidence as a consequence of the prosecutor's remote investigative strategy.[110]

In the Mbarushimana case, for example, the Prosecution did not advance a single insider or crime base witness to support over half of their charges, and instead relied entirely on indirect evidence provided by NGOs and other international organizations.[111] Unsurprisingly, the Pre-Trial Chamber declined to confirm any of the charges, and admonished the Prosecutor for his excessive dependence on such evidence:

> As a general principle, the Chamber finds that information based on anonymous hearsay must be given a low probative value in view of the inherent difficulties in ascertaining the truthfulness and authenticity of such information. Accordingly, such information will be used only for the purpose of corroborating other evidence.[112]

The Pre-Trial Chamber in the Kenyan confirmation decisions was even more explicit in delimiting the insufficiency of such evidence to support a finding of criminal responsibility:

> With respect to indirect evidence, the Chamber is of the view that, as a general rule, such evidence must be accorded a lower probative value than direct evidence. The Chamber highlights that, although indirect evidence is commonly accepted in the jurisprudence of the Court, the decision on the confirmation of charges cannot be based solely on one such piece of evidence.[113]

In its application for an arrest warrant in the Gbagbo case, the prosecution did not cite a single witness statement, summary, or affidavit to support the charge of rape, [109] See e.g. K Ambos, 'Confidential Investigations (Article 54(3)(e) ICC Statute) vs. Disclosure Obligations: The Lubanga Case and National Law' (2009) 12 New Criminal Law Review 543; H Stuart, 'The ICC in Trouble' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 409.

[110] The crucial problem is not the fact that open-source information has been used as evidence, but that it has been relied on to replace first-hand investigations despite the very different methodologies pursued by those documenting human rights abuses as opposed to those investigating the individual criminal responsibility of an accused person. There is nothing inherently wrong with using open-source information, particularly for corroboration, but investigators should still make every effort to independently establish its provenance and credibility as evidence.

[111] Confirmation of Charges Hearing Transcript, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-T-9-ENG CT WT, PTC I, ICC, 21 September 2011, 2–4.

[112] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 38) para. 78.

[113] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 38) para. 74; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 23) para. 86 [quote identical in both decisions]. The Pre-Trial Chamber defined 'indirect evidence' as encompassing 'hearsay evidence, reports of international and non-governmental organisations (NGOs) as well as reports from national agencies, domestic intelligence services and the media'; see Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 38) para. 69.

only open-source information.[114] In the decision postponing the confirmation of charges in that case, the Pre-Trial Chamber was unsparing in its condemnation of the Prosecutor's continuing reliance on indirect evidence:

> [T]he Chamber notes with serious concern that in this case the Prosecutor relied heavily on NGO reports and press articles with regard to key elements of the case, including the contextual elements of crimes against humanity. Such pieces of evidence cannot in any way be presented as the fruits of a full and proper investigation by the Prosecutor in accordance with Article 54(1)(a) of the Statute. Even though NGO reports and press articles may be a useful introduction to the historical context of a conflict situation, they do not usually constitute a valid substitute for the type of evidence that is required to meet the evidentiary threshold for the confirmation of charges.[115]

It seems remarkable that multiple judicial pronouncements on this issue should have been necessary, or that seasoned prosecutors could have been comfortable with presenting an investigative product which read more like a bibliography of Google search results than the outcome of a rigorous fact-finding process conducted by an international court with an obligation to establish the truth.

Of course, while investigations are a foundational component of any international prosecution, there are numerous other elements of prosecutorial strategy which need to be considered and managed carefully in order to avoid the pitfalls of evidentiary incoherence or institutional dysfunction. In this regard, thankfully, there are clear and unambiguous reasons for optimism in relation to the OTP's prospects under the tenure of Prosecutor Bensouda and Deputy Prosecutor James Stewart. As already discussed, it is clear that the first Prosecutor's strategy involved selecting high-profile charges and defendants,[116] conducting brief and 'focused' investigations pursuant to an already decided case hypothesis,[117] relying heavily on third-party sources and [114] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application Pursuant to Art 58 for a Warrant of Arrest against Laurent Koudou Gbagbo, L Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11/01/11-9-Red, PTC III, ICC, 30 November 2011.

[115] Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, L Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11/01/11-432, PTC III, ICC, 3 June 2013, para. 35.

[116] For example, the decision to publicly announce his intention to seek the arrest of sitting Sudanese President Omar Al Bashir for genocide in Darfur—committed, inter alia, by means of widespread acts of rape and sexual violence—in terms which were misleadingly absolute. 'ICC Prosecutor Presents Case against Sudanese President, Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, for Genocide, Crimes against Humanity and War Crimes in Darfur', ICC Press Release, 14 July 2008. Somewhat embarrassingly, the Pre-Trial Chamber subsequently refused to include the charge of genocide in the arrest warrant due to insufficient evidence, although this was later overturned on appeal. See Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009; Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir', Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-73, AC, ICC, 3 February 2010.

[117] An Institute for War and Peace Reporting article from 2008, based on interviews with several ICC investigators, highlighted the failure to include interviews with sexual violence victims within the investigation plan in the Darfur Situation, the exclusion of evidence relating to sexual violence in the DRC from the prosecution of Thomas Lubanga, the lack of thematic investigation of sexual violence by the LRA in Uganda, and the absence of any charges (at the time) against Bosco Ntaganda for sexual violence in the DRC despite the documentation of extensive lead evidence. One prosecutor, Christine intermediaries to collect evidence and identify potential witnesses,[118] and essentially positioning the role of ICC Prosecutor as a kind of international sheriff, swooping in at times of crisis to swiftly dispense justice and defuse conflict.[119] Beatrice le Fraper du Hellen, then Head of the Jurisdiction, Complementarity, and Cooperation Division of the OTP, stated baldly that 'the Prosecutor's policy [was] to carry out investigations in a few months, involving as few witnesses and incidents as possible'.[120] In practice, however, this approach resulted in weak evidence, stagnant proceedings, overstretched staff, insufficient resources, and, most importantly for the purposes of this chapter, the catastrophic outcome for charges of sexual and gender-based violence already described. Any effort to address that specific issue must therefore take as its starting point the underlying strategic assumptions and practices which have proven so woefully ineffective for the successful investigation and prosecution of sexual violence crimes to date.

32.4 Bensouda and the Policy Paper: The OTP's Future Strategy

The OTP, and specifically Luis Moreno Ocampo as the first Prosecutor of an independent and permanent ICC, was under a huge amount of pressure in the initial years of the Court's operations to be seen to be active and effective in undermining impunity and providing a degree of accountability (if not deterrence) in conflicts within the Court's jurisdiction.[121] Prosecutor Ocampo's strategy in this regard could be criticized for being too media-conscious, too responsive to political pressure, and too willing to opt for the immediate but short-term impact of prematurely announcing an intention to charge before the evidence had been properly analysed and before the foundations

Chung, sought to attribute the problem to the difficulty of establishing linkage evidence for crimes of sexual violence rather than the policy of focused investigations itself, arguing somewhat circularly that '[f]inding the victims who can help you link the highest commanders to the rapes and enslavement that happened at the times and places that are the focus of the investigation is very difficult' (emphasis added). See Glassborow (n 82).

[118] See further Buisman (n 92), arguing that the OTP had 'abdicate[d] their responsibility to conduct proper investigations' by 'outsourcing …evidence gathering to third-party organisations or intermediaries' in the Lubanga case, and the judges' finding in that case that 'the prosecution should not have delegated its investigative responsibilities to the intermediaries in the way set out above, notwithstanding the extensive security difficulties it faced', Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 47) para. 482.

[119] For example, in a Wall Street Journal article from 2006, Prosecutor Ocampo was quoted as saying that the ICC would be a 'sexy court' which would bring a different case each year with the goal of providing 'swift justice that is comprehensible to often-uneducated victim populations'; see J Bravin, 'For Global Court, Uganda Rebels Prove Tough Test', Wall Street Journal, 8 June 2006.

[120] Glassborow (n 82).

[121] For example, the same Institute for War and Peace Reporting article noted the impact of the pressure to produce tangible results and push for arrest warrants in the Uganda Situation ('the prosecutor wanted indictments issued within a year'), the Situation in Darfur ('former court staff say that prosecutors buckled under what was perceived as outside criticism for not moving fast enough'), and the Lubanga trial in the DRC Situation ('the investigation had already taken a long time, and prosecutors wanted something to present at court as soon as possible'). Glassborow (n 82). Even the Lubanga Trial Judgment notes that '[t]he investigative team was subject to significant pressure, including from within the OTP as well as the Court more generally, because it was felt necessary to make progress'; see Lubanga Trial Judgment (n 47) para. 134.

of a winnable case had been constructed.[122] It is worth remembering that Richard Goldstone was roundly condemned for selecting Duško Tadić as his first defendant, who as a detention camp guard was seen as too low down the pecking order to be worth focusing on when those like Karadžić and Milošević, who were perceived as bearing the greatest responsibility for the conflict, had not yet been publicly indicted. The difference, of course, is that Tadić was exposed in court as an astonishingly sadistic individual and ultimately convicted,[123] by which time the ICTY was well on its way to prosecuting more complex cases against higher-profile defendants without the crippling, unrelenting pressure to get off the starting block.

While it is only fair to note that Prosecutor Ocampo would undoubtedly have been slated from some quarters for his perceived inaction had he not pursued proceedings in certain situations in the short term,[124] particularly at such a formative point in the Court's development as a legal and political force, it should not have been difficult to realize that a record of dropped charges, insufficient evidence, and full or partial acquittals would ultimately be far more damaging to the Court's reputation and capacity for deterrence in the long term. Prosecutor Bensouda, as his successor, is not operating under the same immediate imperative to initiate proceedings in any given Situation, but nevertheless faces an arduous task with two main strands: addressing the impact of the evidentiary and institutional weaknesses that have blighted existing prosecutions, and creating a more efficient and attractive work environment within the OTP, one that emphasizes and prioritizes competence, patience, and exacting professionalism. This is vitally necessary not only to salvage the future prospects of the cases already under investigation or prosecution, but also to protect and build on the perception of the Court as a credible and sustainable actor within the international community. The fundamental job of the ICC prosecutor has evolved, in other words, from simply getting something done to ensuring that it is done right, and nowhere is an understanding of that distinction so badly needed as in relation to sexual and gender-based crimes.

First, one can look at the Prosecutors' public statements and policy announcements in relation to the issue of sexual violence and how they intended to address it. Prosecutor Ocampo asserted on numerous occasions that '[at] the ICC, girls will not be invisible'.[125] However, the fact that this statement appeared to be made by rote and always in the context of defending his Office's 'gendered approach' to a case which famously contained no charges of sexual violence is slightly less reassuring.[126] It is instructive to compare Prosecutor Ocampo's public statements about his Office's strategy and determination to provide accountability for crimes of sexual violence in the Lubanga prosecution with the blistering findings of the Trial Chamber in that case:

[122] For example, one commentator noted that 'Moreno Ocampo was criticized by some for seeking too political a role externally, preferring the bright lights of international exposure to the nitty-gritty of investigation and prosecution, but also for micro-managing his division internally, stifling initiative and orderly procedure', B Schiff, 'Managing Multiple Dilemmas: Politics, Justice, Law and Administration at the International Criminal Court' (Paper presented at the 49th Annual Meeting of the International Studies Association, 28 March 2008) 23 <http://citation.allacademic.com/meta/p250992_index.html> accessed 1 September 2014. See further J Flint and A de Waal, 'Case Closed: A Prosecutor without Borders' (2009) World Affairs.

[123] See Opinion and Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-T, TC, ICTY, 7 May 1997. Tadić was convicted of persecution, other inhumane acts, and cruel treatment in relation to his role in the rape and sexual violence committed against both male and female detainees in the Omarska, Keraterm, and Trnopolje camps.

[124] This is particularly true of Situations resulting from a Security Council referral. See e.g. J Hagan and W Rymond-Richmond, Darfur and the Crime of Genocide (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009); L Condorelli and A Ciampi, 'Comments on the Security Council Referral of the Situation in Darfur to the ICC' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 590.

> The Chamber strongly deprecates the attitude of the former Prosecutor in relation to the issue of sexual violence. He advanced extensive submissions as regards sexual violence in his opening and closing submissions at trial, and in his arguments on sentence he contended that sexual violence is an aggravating factor that should be reflected by the Chamber. However, not only did the former Prosecutor fail to apply or include sexual violence or sexual slavery at any stage during these proceedings, including in the original charges, but he actively opposed taking this step during the trial when he submitted that it would cause unfairness to the accused if he was convicted on this basis. Notwithstanding this stance on his part throughout these proceedings, he suggested that sexual violence ought to be considered for the purposes of sentencing.[127]

Although Prosecutor Ocampo could be relied on to talk a good game about the importance of addressing crimes of sexual violence, he consistently missed opportunities to learn from the fate of unsuccessful charges and to adjust his strategy accordingly.

Since taking office, Prosecutor Bensouda appears to have made a determined effort to restate her Office's commitment to preventing impunity for sexual and gender-based violence, as well as to address the underlying obstacles which have frustrated efforts to address them over the first decade of the Court's operations. Speaking only a couple of months after taking office, she mentioned the issue in general terms, stating that the OTP was 'responsible for drawing particular attention to sexual and gender-based crimes, in addition to crimes against children. Since its inception, the Office [of the Prosecutor] has sought to file charges accordingly in the great majority of its cases. This will continue to be one of my priorities over the course of my mandate.'[128] However, in another speech given while still Deputy Prosecutor (as well as the Gender Focal Point within the OTP), she had expressed a degree of frustration at the perception that prosecutions of sexual and gender-based violence were somehow exceptional within the work of the OTP:

[125] See e.g. L Moreno-Ocampo, 'The Place of Sexual Violence in the Strategy of the ICC Prosecutor' in A de Brouwer et al. (eds), Sexual Violence as an International Crime: Interdisciplinary Approaches (Cambridge: Intersentia 2013) 154; L Moreno-Ocampo, 'Keynote Address—Interdisciplinary Colloquium on Sexual Violence as International Crime: Interdisciplinary Approaches to Evidence' (2010) 35 Law & Social Inquiry 839, 846 ('In the International Criminal Court, girls will not be invisible.'); Trial Transcript, Lubanga, 26 January 2009 (n 46) 13 ('In this International Criminal Court, the girl soldiers will not be invisible.').

[126] See e.g. L Moreno-Ocampo, 'Keynote Address' (ibid., n 125): 'It is our responsibility to present the gender crimes suffered by the most vulnerable. During the course of the trial, my Office has made it its mission to ensure that Thomas Lubanga Dyilo be held criminally responsible for the atrocities committed against those little girl soldiers'; L Moreno-Ocampo, 'The Place of Sexual Violence in the Strategy of the ICC Prosecutor' (ibid., n 125): 'It is our responsibility to present the gender crimes suffered by the most vulnerable. During the course of the trial, Prosecution has made it its mission to ensure that Mr Lubanga be held criminally responsible for the atrocities committed against little girl soldiers.'; Trial Transcript, Lubanga, 26 January 2009 (n 46) 12–13: '[I]t is a responsibility of the Office of the Prosecutor to prove the crimes committed against the most vulnerable, and during the course of the trial my office will make it its mission to ensure that Thomas Lubanga is held criminally responsible for the atrocities committed against those little girl soldiers.'

[127] Decision on Sentence Pursuant to Art 76 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2901, TC I, ICC, 10 July 2012, para. 60. For a critical overview of Prosecutor Ocampo's strategy in the Lubanga case, see further Hayes, 'Sisyphus Wept: Prosecuting Sexual Violence at the International Criminal Court' (n 23).

> Allow me to emphasize this point: gender crimes are prominent in our prosecutions because they are prominent in the contexts being prosecuted. This only becomes remarkable against the backdrop of the prior, and still prevalent, norm of denying their existence, ignoring them, shaming their victims, or defining them in legally improvable ways. In other settings, it was as if there were a tacit agreement to look the other way while women and children were sexually abused—minimizing, trivializing, denigrating and silencing the victims, destroying their credibility, and further violating their dignity, so abusers could continue unimpeded. The body of the ICC's first cases, however, signals to the world that here, at least, this deal is off.[129]

Unsurprisingly, many of Prosecutor Bensouda's early public statements on the matter stressed the ICC's strong record on charging crimes of sexual violence; it took a little longer for the OTP to go on record as acknowledging the problematic outcome for such charges. When it eventually did so, it came at the launch of the OTP's new comprehensive Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes.[130] The Policy Paper was the result of an extensive and in-depth consultation process with interested parties from academia, civil society, states, and international organizations, as well as its own staff,[131] which immediately showed a degree of openness, humility, and receptiveness to criticism which had been strikingly absent from the OTP's prior interactions. This was a hugely important step in two different planes, both internally and externally. For those within the OTP, it showed that senior management were willing to accept that previous strategies and policies had clearly not succeeded and to change relevant work practices to make them more effective. For those outside the OTP, including this author, who had closely followed the work of the Court on this specific issue and occasionally despaired at its policies and prospects, it represented both a badly needed acknowledgement that mistakes had been made and a cathartic expression of determination to no longer needlessly repeat those mistakes. As Prosecutor Bensouda put it, '[w]e have learned the lessons, and we are building on those lessons to make sure that we are more efficient and effective in the investigation and prosecution of these crimes'.[132]

[128] F Bensouda, 'Reflections from the International Criminal Court Prosecutor' (2012) 45 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 505, 510.

[129] F Bensouda, 'Looking Back, Looking Ahead—Reflections from the Office of the Prosecutor of the ICC' (2012) 11 Washington University Global Studies Law Review 437, 443. See further N Palus, 'ICC Prosecutor Hails Shift in Fight against Sexual Violence', Voice of America, 13 November 2012.

[130] See OTP Policy Paper (n 24).

[131] Ibid., para. 13.

[132] See Evans-Pritchard, 'ICC Restates Commitment on Crimes of Sexual Violence' (n 42).

So what specific lessons have been learned, and how are the OTP intending to build on those lessons? If one looks to the Policy Paper itself for answers, the most striking aspect is its unrelenting emphasis on increasing the effectiveness of prosecutions for crimes of sexual and gender-based violence.[133] In the ICC context, an 'effective' prosecution for such crimes would be one where the offences in question are investigated efficiently, characterized appropriately, charged consistently, pleaded under the most suitable mode of liability, successfully confirmed for trial, and ultimately underpinned by sufficient credible evidence to prove the individual criminal responsibility of the accused and support a conviction. In that regard, the very existence of a dedicated Policy Paper on the investigation and prosecution of sexual and gender-based violence as an issue necessitating a specific focus represents a positive evolution in the strategy of the OTP. The very first policy document produced by the OTP in 2003 did not even mention sexual violence as a priority issue, despite the numerous statutory provisions within the Rome Statute imposing a positive duty on the Prosecutor to ensure that it was given due attention.[134] The first report on the activities of the OTP, covering the formative period from 2003 to 2006, identified several key challenges faced by the Office in its initial operations, none of which concerned the problems of effectively addressing sexual and gender-based violence, although the report did discuss in passing the formulation of several draft in-house guidelines on the investigation of sexual and gender-based crimes and interview practices when dealing with potential witnesses or perpetrators of sexual violence.[135] The 2006 Report on Prosecutorial Strategy mentioned sexual violence only in the most cursory of terms,[136] while the Prosecutorial Strategy document for 2009–12 again failed to explicitly prioritize sexual and gender-based crimes within the work of the OTP beyond some perfunctory references under the rubric of 'continually improving the quality of prosecutions'.[137]

It is telling that the first explicit codification of the OTP's statutory obligation to prioritize crimes of sexual and gender-based violence did not occur until after Prosecutor Bensouda had taken office. The OTP Strategic Plan for June 2012–15 identified six key strategic goals for the first three years of her tenure as part of a conscious change of overall policy 'in light of new challenges', one of which was to 'enhance the integration of a gender perspective in all areas of our work and continue to pay particular attention to sexual and gender based crimes and crimes against children'.[138] The document goes into some detail on the reasons for the strategic change, including 'a serious and systematic under-reporting of sexual and gender-based violence' and 'the many challenges that face the Office with regard to the investigation and prosecution of these crimes',[139] before setting out specific strategic targets, such as innovations in evidence [133] The word 'effective' (and variations thereof) is used 38 times in the Policy Paper, 8 times in the Executive Summary alone.

[134] See ICC OTP, Paper on Some Policy Issues before the Office of the Prosecutor (September 2003).

[135] See ICC OTP, Report on the Activities Performed during the First Three Years (June 2003–June 2006) (12 September 2006).

[136] See ICC OTP, Report on Prosecutorial Strategy (14 September 2006) 7.

[137] See ICC OTP, Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–12 (n 69) 7–8. There is no reference whatsoever to sexual violence in the discussion of investigations.

[138] See ICC OTP, Strategic Plan—June 2012–15 (11 October 2013) 4–6 and 27.

[139] Ibid, paras 58 and 59.

collection, better training for investigators dealing with victims of sexual violence, the implementation of specialist interviewing models for victims of such crimes, the utilization of both same-sex and mixed-sex investigation teams, the finalization of a specific sexual and gender-based violence policy document, the development of guidelines on novel means of proof of large-scale sexual violence, and further specialized training for investigators.[140] Crucially, the Strategic Plan also emphasized the willingness and intention of the Prosecutor not just to learn from the OTP's own experiences, but also 'to draw on the experience of the other tribunals in investigating and prosecuting sexual and gender based violence',[141] something which may seem like nothing more than a logical step or even a basic professional courtesy but which had been conspicuously resisted by the OTP up to that point.

The publication of the 2014 Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Violence was therefore not only a worthwhile achievement in and of itself, but it also represented the fulfilment of one of the specific targets set out in Prosecutor Bensouda's strategic plan. The Policy Paper analyses the OTP's general policy, regulatory framework, preliminary examinations, investigations, and prosecutions, as well as issues relating to cooperation and institutional development, in terms of their impact on the effective investigation and prosecution of sexual and gender-based violence,[142] in addition to restating the OTP's public commitment to 'integrating a gender perspective and analysis into all of its work, being innovative in the investigation and prosecution of these crimes, providing adequate training for staff, adopting a victim-responsive approach in its work, and paying special attention to staff interaction with victims and witnesses, and their families and communities'.[143] It goes on to deal in great detail with numerous procedural and practical issues requiring unique consideration in relation to sexual and gender-based violence, such as protective measures; reparations; composition of investigation teams; sentencing; pre-deployment planning; understanding of the cultural context of a situation; the use of euphemisms by witnesses; psychosocial assessment procedures for potential victims and witnesses; cooperation with national authorities; the potential for stigmatization, retraumatization, or reprisals against victims and witnesses; staff training; partnerships with NGOs and civil society actors; outreach efforts, and the use of intermediaries. In its structure and content, and by systematically identifying the factors which will require particular attention or a specialized approach at each of the different phases of proceedings in relation to sexual and gender-based violence, the Policy Paper shows the clear influence of similar codification projects at other international criminal tribunals, such as the ICTR's Best Practices Manual for the Investigation and Prosecution of Sexual Violence Crimes or the Compendium of Lessons Learned produced jointly by the Prosecutors of the ICTY, ICTR, Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, SCSL, and Special Tribunal for Lebanon as part of the International Best Practices Project.[144] While [140] Ibid., paras 60–3. [141] Ibid., para. 61. [142] See OTP Policy Paper (n 24).

[143] Ibid., para. 5.
[144] See ICTR Best Practices Manual (n 13), Petit (n 79), or the ICTY Manual on Developed Practices (ICTY—United Nations Interregional Crime and Justice Research Institute 2009). The Policy Paper states that these documents were taken into account in its drafting; see OTP Policy Paper (n 24) fn. 11.

many of its recommendations are made in general or aspirational terms, it is perhaps best understood (and should be praised) as a declaration of intent.[145] The policy and practices of the OTP in regard to the investigation and prosecution of sexual and gender-based violence are being fundamentally overhauled.

While it is instructive and worthwhile to examine the legal and practical issues which are unique to crimes of sexual and gender-based violence, the examination of the fate of charges for such crimes at the ICC to date has shown that the most common and fatal obstacles to their successful confirmation or prosecution are not exceptional to that category of crime. The charges have foundered not because of a failure to prove the specific material acts of sexual violence, but due to problems with the evidence underlying the generic elements of an international criminal prosecution, such as proving the contextual elements of international crimes or selecting the most appropriate mode of liability. It is undoubtedly true that investigators and prosecutors will face particular challenges when dealing with victims and witnesses of sexual violence,[146] but these can be offset with training, expertise, and dedicated pre-deployment planning. The conclusion of the ICTR Review Committee on sexual violence was that the low conviction rate for sexual violence at the Rwanda Tribunal was 'not because of the lack of evidence—since the rape victims and witnesses were there—but more because of the lack of understanding, know-how and training to elicit the necessary evidence that would support a conviction'.[147] The experience of all international criminal tribunals has shown time and time again that the fundamental issue is one of competence, of knowing how to recognize red flags for sexual violence, how to identify and approach witnesses respectfully and prudently, how to conduct interviews and collect evidence, how to construct a case theory and select the most appropriate mode of liability, and how to present and plead that case to the judges who will ultimately determine criminal responsibility. It is not simply a question of finding the right management policy or drafting the perfect strategy paper, because experience has shown that, unfortunately, no magical combination of standing sub-committees or organizational flowcharts can compensate for the absence of basic bricks-and-mortar professional ability.

Thankfully, this fundamental point appears to have been understood and internalized by the OTP. Some of the most important areas for reform identified in the Policy Paper relate to overall investigative and prosecutorial strategy and have the potential to positively impact the work of the Prosecutor even in cases which do not feature sexual or gender-based crimes. One crucial example is the abandonment of the policy of focused investigations in favour of pursuing 'more in-depth, open-ended investigations . . . so that more evidence from diversified sources might [145] Bizarrely, some commentators appear to have interpreted the release of the Policy Paper as evidence of a degree of activism or exceptionalism on the part of Prosecutor Bensouda. See M Simons, 'International Criminal Court to Focus on Sex Crimes', New York Times, 5 June 2014.

[146] See e.g. Marcus (n 74); Foreign and Commonwealth Office, International Protocol on the Documentation and Investigation of Sexual Violence in Conflict (June 2014); ICTR Best Practices Manual (n 13).

[147] L Bianchi, 'The Prosecution of Rape and Sexual Violence: Lessons from Prosecutions at the ICTR' in A de Brouwer et al. (eds), Sexual Violence as an International Crime: Interdisciplinary Approaches (Cambridge: Intersentia 2013) 123, 131.

be collected'.[148] The new investigations policy also seeks to address the problems caused by investigations which are phased or not evidence-led:

> Due to the requirement of higher evidentiary standards and the expectation of being trial-ready earlier, the notion of focused investigations is replaced by the principle of in-depth, open-ended investigations while maintaining focus. The Office will expand and diversify its collection of evidence so as to meet the higher evidentiary threshold. The Office will consider multiple case hypotheses throughout the investigation which will further strengthen decision-making in relation to actual prosecutions. It will aim at presenting cases at the confirmation hearing that are as trial-ready as possible. If meeting such a threshold is not possible at the moment of applying for an arrest warrant or a summons to appear, the Office intends to only proceed with the application if there are sufficient prospects to further collect evidence to be trial-ready within a reasonable timeframe.[149]

This strategy has already been implemented in the Mali Situation. Although the Government of Mali referred the situation in July 2012, and the OTP announced in January 2013 that it would be opening an investigation on the basis of prima facie evidence establishing reasonable grounds to believe that a number of war crimes, including rape, had been committed,[150] the Prosecutor has not yet publicly sought any arrest warrants or summonses to appear. According to the Head of Investigations for the OTP, Michel De Smedt, this was a deliberate decision and 'great care had been taken to make sure that the evidence would stand up to scrutiny by ICC judges before arrest warrants were requested, and before any hearing to have charges confirmed'.[151] Likewise, the Office has addressed the problems caused by rigid adherence to a predetermined case hypothesis, stating that in future, 'the initial case hypothesis and investigation plan will be regularly reviewed, and may be amended on the basis of the additional analysis of evidence collected'.[152]

The increased emphasis on the pursuit of more diverse and novel sources of evidence may be taken as a sign that the OTP is concerned about being too reliant on witness testimony.[153] Speaking at the launch of the Policy Paper, Prosecutor Bensouda stated that the OTP had 'decided to change that strategy by not only looking at witness statements but also documentary evidence such as hospital records and using forensic investigation strategies as a new way of collecting the evidence that we need'.[154] The Policy Paper itself went into more detail:

> The Office is mindful that victims of sexual and gender-based crimes may face the additional risks of discrimination, social stigma, exclusion from their family and community, physical harm, or other reprisals. In order to minimise their exposure and possible retraumatisation, the Office will enhance its efforts to collect other types of evidence, where available, including insider testimony, the statistical or

[148] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 52.
[149] See ICC OTP, Strategic Plan 2012–15 (n 138) 6.
[150] 'ICC Prosecutor Opens Investigation into War Crimes in Mali', ICC Press Release, 16 January 2013.
[151] See Evans-Pritchard, 'ICC to Unveil New Investigation Strategy' (n 87).
[152] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 64; ICC OTP, Strategic Plan 2012–15 (n 138) 14.
[153] ICC OTP, Strategic Plan 2012–15 (n 138) para. 44.
[154] Evans-Pritchard, 'ICC Restates Commitment on Crimes of Sexual Violence' (n 42).

> pattern-related evidence from relevant experts, medical and pharmaceutical records, empirical research and reports, and other credible data produced by States, organs of the United Nations, intergovernmental and non-governmental organisations, and other reliable sources.[155]

On a general analysis, it may be no bad thing for the ICC to reduce the extent of its reliance on witness testimony to prove the various elements of a case, particularly in light of its continuing concern about minimizing risks to victims and witnesses.[156] However, it is also worth noting that the OTP's oppressively risk-averse strategy has resulted in an equally unsustainable reliance on protective measures for victims and witnesses, particularly preventive relocation.[157]

Exploring the use of other forms of evidence to prove the contextual or linkage elements of a case which includes charges of sexual or gender-based violence is a worthwhile endeavour if it does in fact lead to a stronger prosecution case, although it remains to be seen how the judges at the ICC would assess such evidence;[158] however, it may not be a suitable replacement for testimonial evidence to prove the specific elements of crimes of sexual violence.[159] Rule 63(4) provides that corroboration is not required to prove crimes of sexual violence,[160] meaning that, in theory at least, all that is needed to prove the underlying acts of sexual violence is the testimony of even one credible, coherent, and reliable witness. In practice, the judges at the ICC have been satisfied with the credibility of the testimony of victims and witnesses of sexual violence to prove these elements to date, but it is by no means clear that they would be equally satisfied that the specific material elements of rape, sexual slavery,

[155] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 65.

[156] The OTP's Strategic Plan for 2012–15 noted that '[a]lthough the Office has not experienced the death of a witness to prevent testimony, there is clearly an increase in attempts to hurt or interfere with persons interacting with the Office or their relatives'; ICC OTP, Strategic Plan 2012–15 (n 138) para. 49. The International Bar Association has welcomed the ICC's move away from the 'unsustainable' reliance on in-court witness testimony and urged that '[c]reative steps need to be taken to utilize other forms of evidence to establish or refute charges in the cases'. See International Bar Association, Witnesses before the ICC (IBA ICC Perspectives, July 2013) 20.

[157] The International Bar Association report notes that, based on figures provided by the VWU, 199 witnesses have provided in-court testimony at the ICC to date across seven trials. However, over 300 witnesses have been relocated under the ICC Protection Programme. See International Bar Association, Witnesses at the ICC (n 156) 14–15 and 35. By comparison, at the ICTY, more than 4,500 witnesses testified between 1996 and 2013, but fewer than 1% were relocated to a third country as a protective measure. See ICTY, Witness Statistics <http://www.icty.org/sid/10175> accessed 1 July 2014.

[158] When one considers the degree of caution and frustration shown by ICC judges in relation to the use of open-source evidence (other than as corroboration) at the confirmation of charges phase, it appears that some degree of testimonial or documentary evidence sourced directly by the OTP will be needed to buttress overview or pattern evidence in order to establish the contextual elements of international crimes, particularly if it has been produced by a third party using different evidence-gathering and analysis methodologies. However, for a discussion of the potential of such evidence to establish broader patterns of conduct, see L Lawry et al., 'Evidence-Based Documentation of Gender-Based Violence' in A de Brouwer et al. (eds), Sexual Violence as an International Crime: Interdisciplinary Approaches (Cambridge: Intersentia 2013).

[159] The Policy Paper acknowledges this to an extent, stating that '[t]he Office notes that these types of evidence are not legally required as corroboration to prove the crimes. It will, however, endeavor to collect such evidence to strengthen the case, including to prove other aspects of the case, for example, the responsibility of the accused'; OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 51 (emphasis added).

[160] Rule 63(4) of the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

or other sexual violence crimes could be established by the use of quantitative pattern evidence, digital intercepts, or NGO reports.[161] The very logic underpinning the inclusion of Rule 63(4) was to ease the crippling practical and logistical challenges obstructing the collection of relevant forensic or documentary evidence months if not years after the commission of crimes, in situations of ongoing conflict or post-conflict dysfunction, challenges which are even more pronounced when it comes to evidence of sexual or gender-based violence.[162] It is to be hoped that Prosecutor Bensouda will not move away from the use of crime-based witness testimony entirely. While there are of course risks, particularly for victims and witnesses of this category of crime, the OTP already provides exceptional support services for vulnerable victims, including mandatory psychosocial screening in advance of any interview by OTP personnel,[163] and extensive in-court protective measures such as the use of pseudonyms, face and voice distortion, redaction of potentially identifying details, allowing for the presence of a psychologist or support person in court, or permitting testimony from behind a screen, in closed session, or via video-link.[164] The Policy Paper itself recognizes that victims and witnesses of sexual and gender-based crimes 'may want to testify in support of judicial proceedings, and may regard it as a component of their own recovery process',[165] as well as acknowledging that 'victims and witnesses of sexual and gender-based crimes may also be witnesses to other crimes, and vice versa'.[166] The testimony of expert or overview witnesses has also been very valuable.[167]

While the OTP did encounter huge difficulties with the intimidation of witnesses (including those testifying about sexual and gender-based crimes) in the Kenya cases,[168] the potential value and impact of victim testimony can be a critical factor in a case. Although the Trial Chamber in Katanga did not enter a conviction for the charges of rape or sexual violence, they did make the following remarks about their [161] For an overview of the treatment of evidence of sexual violence at the ad hoc Tribunals, see further D Buss, 'Prosecuting Mass Rape: Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic' (2002) 10 Feminist Legal Studies 91; Dissenting Opinion of Judge Arlette Ramaroson, Kajelijeli, ICTR-98-44A-T, 1 December 2003; A Danner and J Martinez, 'Guilty Associations: Joint Criminal Enterprise, Command Responsibility and the Development of International Criminal Law' (2005) 93 California Law Review 75.

[162] For an overview of the arguments underpinning the adoption of similar evidentiary concessions at the ICTY, see Ní Aoláin (n 18).

[163] Regulation 36(3) of the Regulations of the OTP; OTP Policy Paper (n 24) paras 61–3. However, this strategy presupposes that the OTP will be aware in advance when it is dealing with a victim of sexual or gender-based violence and can arrange for the psycho-social assessment, whereas in practice—particularly when dealing with male victims of sexual violence—that relevant fact may not be uncovered by investigators until well into the interview or even afterwards.

[164] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) paras 85–90. For examples of protective measures for victims and witnesses of sexual and gender-based violence from the Court's practice, see Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card 2010 (n 57) 207–13 and Gender Report Card 2011 (n 40) 314–37.

[165] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 70.

[166] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 66.

[167] For example, three expert witnesses testified in the Lubanga case about aspects of sexual and gender-based violence, and two expert psychological witnesses testified about the trauma and impact of sexual violence in the Bemba case. A summary of their testimony can be found in Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card on the International Criminal Court 2008, 87–8; Gender Report Card 2009 (n 45) 84–5; and Gender Report Card 2011 (n 40) 252–3.

[168] See e.g. 'ICC Kenya Probe "Hampered by Intimidation"' (Institute for War and Peace Reporting, ACR Issue 311, 12 January 2012) and B Evans-Pritchard, 'Action Urged on ICC Witness Protection' (Institute for War and Peace Reporting, ACR Issue 385, 28 March 2014).

assessment of the credibility of the victim witnesses in that case, which show a degree of empathy and judicial acknowledgement of the tremendous personal toll involved in testifying about such intimate and traumatic events:

> [T]he Chamber considers that the testimony that [Witness] P-132 has provided about these events, although sometimes suffering from a certain lack of consistency due … to the difficulties she encountered in reminding herself of such painful memories, is sufficient to establish that the three people who attacked her in Bogoro intentionally committed the crime of rape. … [169] [In relation to alleged contradictions in the testimony of Witness P-249] [t]hese contradictions can be explained by the reluctance she initially felt in revealing personal information. … For the Chamber, these differences, [which were] driven mainly by the sense of shame felt by the witness [who was] forced to expose her experiences as well as the desire not to take risks with her security, therefore do not affect her credibility.[170]

While no judgment has yet been handed down in the Bemba trial, it is also worth highlighting the powerful, courageous, and heart-breaking testimony of a male rape victim in that case who had been targeted by the Mouvement de libération du Congo due to his position as a community leader and raped in front of his wife and children:[171]

> You see, somebody like me, a man lying with me, that's why I consider myself to be dead because a man cannot sleep with another man. With what they did to me, I knew that I was dead. … [172] They forced me to have anal relations with them. My anus was swollen and I had to get traditional treatment, the kind of treatment that is done on women who have just had a baby, and thanks to God this traditional treatment which I received allowed me—or relieved me; helped me heal somewhat. … [173] [O]nce they had sodomised me, [my second wife] said to me, 'You are no longer a man. You are a woman like myself, so I cannot live with you. I have to leave you.' And that is why she left, until her death. … [174] [The members of my community] were aware of what had happened to me. It was serious. It's true that there are some people who would mock me, but others support me and denounce what happened to me, speak out against what happened to me. … Now I suffer. Others don't take this into consideration, but there are some who do mock me, but this doesn't matter. We are acting in the national interest. … There were many problems in my family. There were people

[169] Katanga Trial Judgment (n 55) para. 992 (translation author's own).

[170] Ibid., para. 994 (translation author's own).

[171] See Trial Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-50-Red-ENG CT WT, TC III, ICC, 20 January 2011; Trial Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-51-Red-ENG CT2 WT, TC III, ICC, 21 January 2011; Trial Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-52-Red-ENG CT2 WT, TC III, ICC, 24 January 2011. For an overview of his testimony, see Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card 2011 (n 40) 249–50.

[172] Trial Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-51-Red-ENG CT2 WT, TC III, ICC, 21 January 2011, 32. The witness became extremely distressed after this statement and the court adjourned for a brief recess. Afterwards, he apologized for having become emotional and said, 'this event offended me greatly and so I cried earlier'; ibid., 35.

[173] Ibid., 35.

[174] Ibid., 41–2.

> who died. There were cases of separation. Mr Prosecutor, your Honour, I really don't know what else to say.[175]

While there are other examples, mainly from the ICTY, of international criminal prosecutions for sexual and gender-based violence where the victims were men rather than women,[176] this is the first occasion where a male rape victim has been called to testify at an international criminal tribunal to support a charge of rape specifically.[177] The parallels between the experience of Witness 23 and the testimony of female rape victims in that and other cases are striking, whether in relation to emotional trauma, societal stigma, rejection by family members, or medical complications caused by the rape, and they underscore the central importance of investigating and prosecuting sexual violence against men and boys, an issue which has been marginalized or ignored entirely to an even greater extent than that of sexual violence against women.[178] The OTP deserves credit for having brought charges for crimes of sexual and gender-based violence committed against men in the Bemba case, the Muthaura case,[179] and the upcoming Ntaganda case,[180] although it represents a missed opportunity that this issue is not specifically addressed in the Policy Paper.[181] It is worth remembering the words of Witness 23 towards the end of his testimony, who stated simply '[w]hat I can say is thank you. Thank you. Thank you for calling me to give testimony. Thank you.'[182]

Another cross-cutting issue identified for amendment in the Policy Paper is the OTP's approach to modes of liability. This has often been a decisive factor in the fate of charges for sexual and gender-based violence to date,[183] and the difficulties of

[175] Trial Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-52-Red-ENG CT2 WT, TC III, ICC, 24 January 2011, 34–5.

[176] For a discussion of this, see e.g. S Sivakumaran, 'Sexual Violence against Men in Armed Conflict' (2007) 18 European Journal of International Law 253; P Sellers, 'Sexual Torture as a Crime under International Criminal and Humanitarian Law' (2007–8) 11 New York City Law Review 339; E Carlson, 'The Hidden Prevalence of Male Sexual Assault during War: Observations on Blunt Trauma to the Male Genitals' (2006) 46 British Journal of Criminology 16.

[177] Although sexual violence against men was charged extensively at the ICTY, particularly in relation to detention camps, it tended to be charged as the war crimes of outrages upon personal dignity, cruel or inhuman treatment, or torture. See further S Sivakumaran, 'Prosecuting Sexual Violence against Men and Boys' in A de Brouwer et al. (eds), Sexual Violence as an International Crime: Interdisciplinary Approaches (Cambridge: Intersentia 2013).

[178] For a remarkable overview of the prevalence of sexual violence against men and boys in conflict and the lack of domestic criminal provisions allowing for legal redress, see C Dolan, 'Into the Mainstream: Addressing Sexual Violence against Men and Boys in Conflict' (Briefing Paper for Overseas Development Institute Workshop, 14 May 2014).

[179] The charges against Muthaura and Kenyatta include allegations relating to the forcible circumcision of Luo men, as discussed in greater detail in fn. 23.

[180] The Ntaganda confirmation decision refers to allegations regarding both the rape of male detainees by UPC/FLPC soldiers and male detainees who were ordered to rape female detainees. See further Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Bosco Ntaganda, Ntaganda (n 41) paras 50 and 52.

[181] The Policy Paper does acknowledge that both sexual and gender-based violence can be committed against women, girls, men, and boys, see OTP Policy Paper (n 24) 3–4, 7, 12–13, and 42. However, it does not contain any specific recommendations, goals, or best practices for the investigation and prosecution of sexual and gender-based violence against men, an issue which requires careful planning and consideration.

[182] Trial Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-51-Red-ENG CT2 WT, TC III, ICC, 21 January 2011, 50.

[183] For example, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 38) paras 339–40.

establishing sufficient linkage evidence to establish the individual criminal responsibility of a remote perpetrator for acts of sexual and gender-based violence have been recognized as a significant obstacle even at the ad hoc Tribunals.[184] The OTP has been criticized for choosing an inappropriate mode of liability in a number of its cases;[185] for example, some observers have argued that Katanga could have been convicted for sexual violence if he had been charged with superior responsibility under Article 28 rather than as a perpetrator under Article 25.[186] However, it is worth noting that the OTP's flexibility in charging multiple modes of liability in the alternate was severely curtailed by the infamous finding of Pre-Trial Chamber II in the Bemba case that the practice of cumulative charging was inherently detrimental to the rights of the defence,[187] while its freedom to target lower-level perpetrators had been restricted by Prosecutor Ocampo's interpretation of the statutory requirement of gravity and the need to focus on 'those situated at the highest echelons of responsibility'.[188]

The OTP's change of strategy on modes of liability is therefore two-fold. The Prosecutor has announced her intention to shift the initial focus of investigations in order to build up the case from lower-level perpetrators to those most responsible, an approach which was explicitly intended 'to assist in addressing the challenge of establishing the individual criminal responsibility of persons at the highest levels for the commission of sexual and gender-based crimes'.[189] The Strategic Plan clarified the change in scope as follows:

> In the light of limitations in investigative possibilities and/or a lack of cooperation and the required evidentiary standards, the Office is re-thinking its approach to proving the criminal responsibility of the most responsible. In such circumstances a strategy of gradually building upwards is needed. The Office would therefore first investigate and prosecute a limited number of mid- and high-level perpetrators in order to ultimately have a reasonable chance to convict the most responsible. The Office will also consider prosecuting lower level perpetrators where their conduct has been particularly grave and has acquired extensive notoriety. Such a strategy will in the end be more cost-effective than having unsuccessful or no prosecutions against the highest placed perpetrators.[190]

[184] See further M Jarvis and E Martin Salgado, 'Future Challenges to Prosecuting Sexual Violence under International Law: Insights from ICTY Practice' in A de Brouwer et al. (eds), Sexual Violence as an International Crime: Interdisciplinary Approaches (Cambridge: Intersentia 2013); R Haffajee, 'Prosecuting Crimes of Rape and Sexual Violence at the ICTR: The Application of Joint Criminal Enterprise Theory' (2006) 29 Harvard Journal of Law and Gender 201; C MacKinnon, 'The ICTR's Legacy on Sexual Violence' (2008) 14 New England Journal of International and Comparative Law 101.

[185] See e.g. A de Waal, 'The Public Application by the Chief Prosecutor of the ICC for an Arrest Warrant against Sudanese President Omar al Bashir: A Critique' (Social Science Research Council 2009) 11–13; Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Modes of Liability: A Review of the International Criminal Court's Current Jurisprudence and Practice (November 2013).

[186] See Evans-Pritchard, 'ICC Restates Commitment on Crimes of Sexual Violence' (n 42).

[187] See Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba (n 65) para. 202.

[188] ICC OTP, Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–12 (n 69) 6.

[189] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 52: 'Where necessary, the Office will follow a strategy of gradually building cases up from mid- and high-level perpetrators, and even up from low-level notorious perpetrators, to the most responsible.'

[190] ICC OTP, Strategic Plan 2012–15 (n 138) para. 22.

The Prosecutor has also announced that the OTP will now 'charge different modes of liability and mental elements in the alternative, where appropriate'.[191] In cases of sexual and gender-based crimes, the Office will make more use of provisions for superior responsibility under Article 28 '[i]n order to encourage military commanders and non-military superiors to deal effectively with the commission of these crimes by their forces or subordinates'.[192] The OTP will also pay particular attention to the potential use of pattern evidence or evidence of specific notice to establish the accused's knowledge or awareness of crimes of sexual and gender-based violence under Article 30.[193]

The OTP also intends to make changes in relation to its staff. Under Prosecutor Ocampo, the investigations division of the OTP was under-staffed, with rotating teams of 'increasingly young personnel' conducting investigation missions without a dedicated field presence.[194] This pressure, exacerbated by persistent problems with management culture and internal staff satisfaction,[195] unsurprisingly led to the loss of numerous experienced investigators and prosecutors.[196] Prosecutor Bensouda specifically acknowledged that the practice of rotating investigators was now 'overstretched' when requesting an increase in the OTP's operational budget at the ASP in November 2013, and has since managed to secure the additional funding.[197] The Strategic Plan for 2012–15 recognizes the need for increased staffing in the investigations division, as well as greater experience among investigators,[198] stating specifically:

> The new approach to investigations requires the Office to assess whether its current mixture of level of experience, types of expertise, language, gender and nationality accords with the new requirements. These requirements can be summarised as the need to have a higher field presence, a stronger embedding of country or regional experts into the investigative teams, increased capability to deal with new forms of evidence and increasing the experience level of staff recruited in order to strengthen the traditional as well as the more specialised investigative capabilities.[199]

The Policy Paper likewise emphasizes the need for increased competence and in-house expertise on sexual and gender-based violence, as well as the importance of ongoing specialist training on relevant issues such as the impact of trauma on vulnerable witnesses and methodologies for the collection and analysis of relevant information.[200] Prosecutor Bensouda and Deputy Prosecutor James Stewart appear to

[191] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 83.
[192] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 78.
[193] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) paras 81–2.
[194] De Vos (n 99) 1014–17, citing among others a letter from Human Rights Watch to the OTP Executive Committee expressing concern about the high rate of attrition and burnout among investigators and noting that there were 'simply not enough of them to handle the rigorous demands for conducting investigations'.
[195] See G Townsend, 'Structure and Management' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 171, 290–3.
[196] See e.g. Flint and De Waal (n 122), who refer to 'a trickle of resignations [turning into] a haemorrhage' and specifically cite the senior experienced staff who left the Court under Prosecutor Ocampo's tenure.
[197] See L Ochieng and S Jennings, 'ICC Secures Budget Increase' (Institute for War and Peace Reporting, ACR Issue 376, 20 January 2014).
[198] ICC OTP, Strategic Plan 2012–2015 (n 138) 20–4.
[199] Ibid., para. 47.
[200] See e.g. OTP Policy Paper (n 24) paras 15, 21, 28, 37, 57, 114, and 117–19.

be making a concerted effort to make the OTP a more attractive and fulfilling workplace for experienced staff as part of an overall effort to increase professional standards across the board.

One final point relates to the position of the Gender Advisor within the OTP. Although the Statute explicitly requires the appointment of a specialist adviser on sexual and gender-based violence,[201] Prosecutor Ocampo did not appoint anyone to the position for the first five years of his term, until Catharine MacKinnon was announced as Special Advisor on Gender Crimes in 2008.[202] Her appointment was, unfortunately, largely symbolic; as Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice noted at the time, 'as it is a part-time position based outside The Hague, the ability of the post to influence and advise on the day-to-day decisions regarding investigation priorities, the selection of incidents and the construction of an overarching gender strategy will be extremely limited'.[203] In the absence of a dedicated in-house legal adviser on such issues, then-Deputy Prosecutor Bensouda acted as the focal point for sexual and gender-based violence within the OTP.[204] Unsurprisingly, she did not wait as long after taking office to appoint specialist advisers. Not only did she appoint Brigid Inder as the Special Gender Advisor within two months of being appointed Prosecutor,[205] but also later that same year she appointed Patricia Sellers, who spent 13 years as the Legal Advisor for Gender in the ICTY OTP, as a Special Advisor on International Criminal Law Prosecution Strategies.[206] Brigid Inder has made a much stronger contribution in the role than her predecessor, not least in her involvement in the drafting of the Policy Paper, and deserves to be commended. However, she serves in a personal and part-time capacity; as Women's Initiatives have rightly highlighted in the past, this does not allow for full immersion in or the ability to influence the minutiae of cases, charges, and day-to-day legal activities of the OTP. The experience of the ad hoc Tribunals has shown that, in order to be as effective as possible, the Gender Advisor must not only be closely involved in the work of investigation and prosecution teams, but must also be appointed at a sufficiently senior level to be able to affect policy.[207] Given that the Policy Paper recognises the need for greater in-house expertise on sexual and gender-based crimes,[208] the OTP may want to consider the appointment of an [201] Art 42(9) Rome Statute.

[202] 'ICC Prosecutor Appoints Prof. Catharine A MacKinnon as Special Adviser on Gender Crimes', ICC Press Release, 26 November 2008.

[203] See Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, Gender Report Card 2008 (n 167) 21.

[204] See Luping (n 66) 435 and 489.

[205] 'ICC Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda Appoints Brigid Inder, Executive Director of the Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice, as Special Gender Advisor', ICC Press Release, 21 August 2012. Brigid Inder is the Executive Director of Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice. She serves as Special Gender Advisor in a personal capacity and on a part-time pro bono basis.

[206] 'ICC Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda Appoints Patricia Sellers, Leila Sadat and Diane Marie Amann as Special Advisers', ICC Press Release, 12 December 2012.

[207] See e.g. P Sellers, 'Gender Strategy is Not a Luxury for International Courts' (2009) 17 American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 301; N Hayes, 'The Impact of Prosecutorial Strategy on the Investigation and Prosecution of Sexual Violence at International Criminal Tribunals' in M Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Prosecution of International Sex Crimes (Oslo: Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 409.

[208] OTP Policy Paper (n 24) para. 115.

internal gender adviser at senior management level—someone who would have the ability and authority to attend the Executive Committee meetings, scrutinize applications for arrest warrants and documents containing the charges to see if they sufficiently reflect the underlying incidents of sexual and gender-based violence, develop progressive charging strategies and generally act as a dedicated internal quality control officer with regard to this category of crime—in addition to the role of Special Gender Advisor.

32.5 Conclusion

The OTP's track record on the investigation and prosecution of sexual and gender-based violence is chequered at best. A strong charging record was undermined by severely deficient evidence and investigation strategies; a Statute containing the broadest range of sexual and gender-based crimes ever enumerated was stymied by recurring difficulties with the mode of liability and extremely conservative interpretations of crimes and legal characterizations by the Pre-Trial Chamber. However, since the appointment of Prosecutor Bensouda, there are clear signs of a change of course. The development and publication of the OTP's Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes was a very heartening development, and represented a declaration of intent to fundamentally change the underlying investigative and prosecutorial strategies which had proven so harmful to charges for such crimes at the ICC. Of course, it remains to be seen what the impact of the prosecutor's new policies will be in the long term, but there are numerous reasons for optimism when one examines the fate of charges for sexual and gender-based violence under her tenure: the issuance of an arrest warrant against Sylvestre Mudacumura;[209] the confirmation of charges against Laurent Gbagbo[210] and Bosco Ntaganda;[211] even the withdrawal of charges against Francis Kirimi Muthaura showed a degree of prosecutorial responsibility and caution which has previously been notable only by its absence.[212] One can only hope that her efforts are successful and that the OTP can shake off its initial dysfunction and teething troubles to deal with the obligation imposed on it by the Statute to prioritize and prosecute sexual and gender-based violence as progressively and effectively as possible. The OTP has always had everything it needed to live up to its statutory responsibilities to victims of sexual and gender-based crimes, except for leadership. Let us hope that last missing piece is now, finally, in place.

[209] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58, Mudacumura (n 36). The case against Mudacumura includes charges of rape, torture, and mutilation based on underlying acts of sexual and gender-based violence, but the original application for an arrest warrant, submitted by former Prosecutor Ocampo, was dismissed in its entirety due to a lack of legal specificity. See Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58, Mudacumura (n 36).

[210] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges against Laurent Gbagbo, L Gbagbo (n 41).

[211] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Bosco Ntaganda, Ntaganda (n 41).

[212] Prosecution notification of withdrawal of the charges against Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta (n 38).

33

Cumulative Charges and Cumulative Convictions

*Carl-Friedrich Stuckenberg

33.1 Introduction

It is typical for cases brought before international criminal tribunals that the defendants are accused and, if found guilty, convicted of the commission not of a single crime, but of multiple crimes under international law, often based on the same conduct. This is due to two factors: the factual characteristics of the criminal behaviour in question (macro-delinquency) and the frequent overlapping of the legal definitions of international crimes, many of which contain compound offences comprising several predicate offences as well as 'organization crimes' aimed at complex criminal enterprises. In addition, the offence definitions were not carefully crafted by a sophisticated legislator as parts of a systematically rigorous codification, but grew out of custom and uncoordinated treaties. Although of distinct origin, these crimes have over time 'grown ever closer'[1] without becoming so close that a hierarchy could be established.[2] For instance, the same act of killing may, in the right circumstances, constitute genocide, murder, or extermination as crimes against humanity, and wilful killing as a war crime.[3] The admissibility of cumulative charges and cumulative convictions has been

* Professor of Law at the University of Bonn, where the author holds a chair with a focus on criminal law, criminal procedure, and international and comparative criminal law.

[1] G Mettraux, International Crimes and the Ad Hoc Tribunals (New York: Oxford University Press 2005) 315.

[2] The ICTY has always rejected the idea of a ranking of crimes under international law according to their gravity: Judgment in Sentence Appeals, Tadić, IT-94-1-A and IT-94-1-A*bis*, AC, ICTY, 26 January 2000, para. 69; Judgment, Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-A, AC, ICTY, 21 July 2000, paras 240–3; Judgment, Kunarac, IT-96-23-T and IT-96-23/1-T, TC, ICTY, 22 February 2001, para. 851 ('Kunarac Trial Judgment'); Judgment, Krstić, IT-98-33-T, TC, ICTY, 2 August 2001, para. 700; see also Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, TC, ICTY, 3 March 2000, paras 797–9. Although proposals for a hierarchy have been made, e.g. by M C Bassiouni, 'International Crimes: The Ratione Materiae of International Criminal Law' in M C Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law, vol. I, 3rd edn (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 136–9; A Danner, 'Constructing a Hierarchy of Crimes in International Criminal Law Sentencing' (2001) 87 Virginia Law Review 415, 453–501; R May and M Wierda, 'Is There a Hierarchy of Crimes in International Law?' in L Vohrah et al. (eds), Man's Inhumanity to Man: Essays on International Law in Honour of Antonio Cassese (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 2003) 529–32; O Olusanya, Double Jeopardy without Parameters: Re-Characterisation in International Criminal Law (Antwerp: Intersentia 2004) 178–221; cf. A Bogdan, 'Cumulative Charges, Convictions and Sentencing at the Ad Hoc International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda' (2002) 3 Melbourne Journal of International Law 1, 5–9.

[3] Appeal Judgment, Kaing, 001/18-07-2007-ECCC/SC, ECCC, SCC, 3 February 2012, para. 286, fn. 633 ('Kaing Appeals Judgment').

an issue in many cases before the ad hoc Tribunals, hybrid tribunals, and, from early on, in the jurisprudence of the ICC.

Cumulative charges and cumulative convictions are, however, only two emanations of the complex legal field, which has been termed concursus delictorum,[4] and deals with all situations in which at least two offences are adjudicated at once, regardless of whether these offences refer to one and the same set of facts or to several distinct sets of facts. These situations exist in every legal order, whether national or international, and all legal systems have developed some kind of solution for it. These solutions are astoundingly similar in substance, although they vary considerably in complexity, terminology, and approach. Civil-law countries usually treat concursus delictorum or concours de qualifications ou d'infractions, concorso di reati, concurso/concurrencia de leyes/delitos, and Konkurrenzlehre as a problem of legal theory or general principles of criminal law, whereas common-law countries discuss equivalent issues in the contexts of pleading (joinder of offences, multiple counts, etc.), of substantive double jeopardy or ne bis in idem, and of sentencing.

Everywhere, concursus delictorum has two legal dimensions. The substantive dimension concerns the verdict and the sentence. If the defendant is accused of several offences, can a conviction be entered for each of them? That is, are all provisions cumulatively applicable or can the application of one offence bar the application of another, and when? If a cumulative verdict is permissible, shall only one unified sentence covering all offences be passed or a distinct sentence for each offence, and, in any event, how is the total amount of punishment to be determined? The procedural dimension relates to pleading and double jeopardy: are multiple charges always allowed, or only if multiple convictions and multiple sentences are permissible?[5] In the instance that the same act or transaction violates several offences, can these be dealt with in separate trials or is the prosecutor forced to join all potentially relevant offences? Conversely, when is a subsequent trial barred by a prior acquittal or conviction?[6] Finally, in both dimensions, two apparently trivial questions have to be solved which may turn out to be the most difficult of all: when are facts the 'same', and when are offences 'different'? All this looks fairly complicated, but concursus delictorum is much less of a legal conundrum than it seems because a functional analysis on a comparative law basis reveals that there exist only four types of concurrence situations for which legal rules have to be devised and that the number of possible solutions for each situation is extremely limited as well (section 33.2.1).[7]

[4] The Latin term derives from medieval Continental European 'common law' (ius commune) and was introduced in international criminal law by the ICTY in Judgment, Kupreškić, IT-95-16-T, TC, ICTY, 14 January 2000, paras 637–748 ('Kupreškić Trial Judgment'). The legal problems related to 'concurrence' are known since antiquity, for a historical survey see W Höpfner, Einheit und Mehrheit der Verbrechen, vol. I (München: Verlag Franz Vahlen 1901) 7–100.

[5] The question of multiple charges may be influenced by further aspects unrelated to concursus delictorum, as will be seen in section 33.3.1.

[6] The procedural aspect of ne bis in idem will be left out here. For the relationship between concursus delictorum and ne bis in idem see C-F Stuckenberg, 'Multiplicity of Offences: Concursus Delictorum' in H Fischer et al. (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes under International Law: Current Developments (Berlin: Verlag Arno Spitz 2001) 559, 560–1, fn. 4; M Bohlander, 'Ne Bis in Idem', in M C Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law, vol. III, 3rd edn (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 541, 543–6; H Friman et al., 'Charges' in G Sluiter et al. (eds), International Criminal Procedure: Principles and Rules (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 436–7.

So far, the development of rules on concursus delictorum in international criminal law has not ventured very far beyond the stage of robust yet primitive pragmatism, which still leaves a lot to be desired because many questions are left open or the answers are hidden in the fog of sentencing. At least, it seems to be uncontested that such rules are needed.[8] Hence, this area of the law presents another challenge for the future jurisprudence of the ICC.

This chapter will summarize and critically assess the current state of the law in customary international criminal law and under the Rome Statute of the ICC, and show perspectives for a principled development of the law of the ICC. The central issue of concursus delictorum concerns cumulative convictions and sentencing, and will be discussed first. Then, the admissibility of cumulative charges will be examined because, from a theoretical perspective, this is simply a consequential question.

33.2 Cumulative Convictions

33.2.1 The matrix of substantive concursus delictorum

In order to avoid confusion, a brief sketch of the underlying logical and normative structures and a few definitions are useful. As set out in more detail elsewhere,[9] all problems of concursus delictorum involve either the coincidence of several nominally distinct offences[10] or of several units of factual behaviour, or both. There are several possibilities to group these situations; for simplicity's sake, I will use a two-by-two matrix here with the coordinates 'identity of facts' and 'applicability of offences': several nominally distinct offences are either violated by the same set of facts or not (i.e. by several sets of facts); the several offences may all be applicable (i.e. each lead to a conviction) or not—tertia non dantur. In this context, the term 'offence' refers exclusively to the legal definition of an offence and neither to corresponding facts nor evidence. Thus, the resulting four classes of legal situations are analytically exhaustive; it is not implied, however, that each class exists in any legal order, nor that it should exist everywhere nor that distinct rules for each class are eo ipso appropriate. The normative relevance of the classes will be discussed in due course.

33.2.1.1 Identity of facts constituting several offences

If the same set of facts—be it the same act in the sense of a willed bodily movement or a group of acts which might be labelled the same 'transaction', 'conduct', or 'criminal episode'[11]—violates several provisions of the law, the first question to be answered

[7] Compare the analytical framework I have tried to sketch in Stuckenberg (n 6) 563–9.
[8] Cf. Stuckenberg (n 6) 561–3. [9] Stuckenberg (n 6).
[10] 'Nominally distinct' means that several of these offences have different statutory or customary definitions although they may be regarded as the same offence 'in reality'.
[11] The 'sameness' of facts is anything but trivial, see Stuckenberg (n 6) 564–66.

is whether all these provisions are applicable or not, i.e. whether a conviction may be entered for each offence or not.

33.2.1.1.1 Class 1: non-application of a concurring offence

The simplest example of this type of situation is one act which violates two criminal provisions at once but results in only one conviction. Because only one provision will be applied and not both, this type of legal consequence is known as 'apparent' or 'false concurrence' (concours apparent d'infractions; concorso apparente di norme; concurso aparente de leyes; Gesetzeskonkurrenz) in Continental European doctrine or as the situation that several nominally distinct offences are 'in reality' only one and the same offence. The reason for such a rule of non-application ultimately is a generalized assumption of legislative intent, i.e. a rule of interpretation.[12]

(i) The clearest case in this class is the situation of logical inclusion: The definition of one offence (e.g. consisting of the elements a+b) is completely contained in or subsumed under the definition of another (e.g. consisting of the elements a+b+c), so that the included offence is a logical subset of the other and both stand in a relationship of genus ad speciem. Hence, the violation of the greater offence, or lex specialis, necessarily—i.e. without exception—includes the violation of the lesser offence, or lex generalis. In domestic law, typical situations are more or less severe variations of a basic crime or compound offences combining several predicate offences. Notwithstanding terminological diversity, national legislations agree widely that only the lex specialis or greater offence shall apply ('merger of offences', 'unilateral specialty', especialidad, specialità, Spezialität, lex specialis derogat legi generali) and a conviction for the lesser-included offence must not be entered.[13]

(ii) There is considerably less agreement among national laws whether this result is appropriate in other situations as well, e.g. when two offences stand in the logical relationship of interference (or 'reciprocal specialty'). Interference means that two offence definitions overlap either logically (one offence contains the elements a+b, the other the elements b+c) or factually, so that it is not necessary but is possible that the same conduct violates these two offences. If two offences are typically although not necessarily violated at once because they are closely related so as to protect the same or cognate interests, a conviction for only one of the two offences may be considered sufficient to characterize the criminal wrong. The concept is known as 'consumption' (consunción, consunzione, Konsumtion, maius delictum absorbet minus, lex consumens derogat legi consumptae) in civil-law countries and not unknown to common-law jurisdictions.[14]

(iii) A related, not easily distinguished, and therefore controversial subgroup is known in civil-law jurisdictions as 'subsidiarity' or 'subordination' (subsidiariedad, sussidiarietà, Subsidiarität, lex primaria derogat legi subsidiariae). The basic idea here is that one of two interfering offences operates as a residual clause—either by explicit enactment or by way of construction ('tacit subsidiarity')—in relation to another, usually because one offence describes a less intensive form (e.g. attempt, accomplice liability) of the same type of criminal conduct, and is therefore assumed to apply only if the other offence does not. Obviously, many instances of subsidiarity can also be understood as cases of inclusion (specialty) or consumption.

[12] Stuckenberg (n 6) 587–8. [13] For references see Stuckenberg (n 6) 567–8, 586–7.
[14] For references see Stuckenberg (n 6) 591–4.

33.2.1.1.2 Class 2: application of all concurring offences: norm competition

If the two or more offences violated by the same behaviour are not deemed to be the 'same offence', i.e. do not represent a case of 'false concurrence', convictions may be entered for all offences. In the civil-law tradition, this situation of norm competition is traditionally known as 'ideal concurrence' (concours de qualifications/concours idéal d'infractions, concurso ideal, concorso ideale/formale di reati, Idealkonkurrenz).

In principle, there is nothing inherently unfair in the pronunciation of multiple convictions for the same conduct as long as the resulting punishment is consistent with the accepted aims of criminal law.[15] Repeatedly, the 'very real risk' of prejudice to the accused (like increased public blame, societal stigma, losing eligibility for early release under the law of the state enforcing the sentence, etc.) has been cited as a reason against allowing cumulative convictions based on the same facts.[16] This argument is correct only if the offences in question are not logically separate because a double conviction for the greater and the lesser offence is tautological, and hence unnecessary to fully describe what the accused did.[17] Consequently, the argument is fundamentally flawed if the offences concerned are logically independent. If all statutory provisions are found to be applicable, then the defendant has to be convicted for the violation of all of them. This is not unfair because he gets exactly what his deed deserves: why should he who manages to break two provisions at once be treated the same way as he who breaks only one law? On the contrary, if all provisions are applicable, then cumulative convictions are necessary in order to adequately express what the accused did.[18]

It is a separate question how to determine the sentences based on these multiple convictions, especially how to calculate the total amount of punishment. The rules on sentencing in norm competition cases differ in domestic laws in form (multiple sentences which are served either concurrently or consecutively; multiple sentences which are combined in special ways with resulting joint or unitary sentences) and substance (absorption of the lower sentences, aggravation of the severest sentences, or addition of the sentences).[19] The only common maxim appears to be that the violation of several provisions by one factual unit of behaviour ('act', etc.) is regularly punished less severely than the violation of several provisions by unrelated acts.[20] [15] But see Olusanya (n 2) 25, 50, 75. There is neither a violation of the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege) nor of the prohibition of ne bis in idem, as Bogdan (n 2) 27, 31, assumes.

[16] Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge David Hunt and Judge Mohamed Bennouna, Judgment, Delalić, IT-96-21-A, AC, ICTY, 20 February 2001, para. 23; Judgment, Kunarac, IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1A, AC, ICTY, 12 June 2002, para. 169 ('Kunarac Appeals Judgment').

[17] Stuckenberg (n 6) 589.

[18] Partial Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, Judgment, Jelisić, IT-95-10-A, AC, ICTY, 5 July 2001, para. 34: 'To record the full criminality of his conduct, it may be necessary to convict of all the crimes, overlapping in convictions being adjusted through penalty'.

[19] For references see Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) paras 713 ff; Stuckenberg (n 6) 567–9, 596–9.

[20] For references see Stuckenberg (n 6) 598–9.

Since crimes under international law do not have divergent sentencing ranges, the need for precise rules on sentencing arithmetic may seem less pressing but, in any event, justice and equal treatment require rules for the determination of the total amount of punishment,[21] be it by combination of several sentences or otherwise.

33.2.1.2 Non-identity of facts constituting several offences

In addition to situations of logical and factual coincidence, it may be mere procedural coincidence that a court has to adjudicate several offences at once. In other words, several violations, which are not committed through the same acts and may even arise out of totally unrelated incidents, are connected only by the same trial. This group can again be subdivided as before according to the type of legal consequence.

33.2.1.2.1 Class 3: non-application of a concurring offence

Even if separate acts violate separate criminal laws, considerations similar to 'false concurrence' situations may apply. Offences which are typically concomitant or ancillary to others, like separately punishable preparatory acts (conspiracy, acquisition of a weapon) or subsequent acts (securing or using stolen goods, concealing the crime, etc.) may be of lesser seriousness than the principal offence and, if no new harm is caused, be deemed irrelevant for sentencing purposes. This class is known in some legal orders as actos anteriores/posteriores impunes/copenados or mitbestrafte Vortat/Nachtat.

33.2.1.2.2 Class 4: application of all concurring offences: norm competition

If all offences violated by several acts or criminal episodes are deemed applicable, the pronunciation of several convictions seems natural. This class bears the civil-law name of 'real concurrence' (concours réel d'infractions, concurso real, concorso materiale di reati, Realkonkurrenz) and refers to the corresponding sentencing principles. As with ideal concurrence, national laws differ again in form and substance; often, the total amount of punishment for real concurrence is higher than for ideal concurrence. However, some legal orders do not distinguish between ideal and real concurrence, while others leave the determination of the overall sentence to the discretion of the judge or jury, etc.[22]

Again, although crimes under international law lack differentiated sentencing scales, rules on the combination of several sentences are necessary all the same, and these rules should be sound in light of both criminal law theory and the goals of international criminal justice.

33.2.2 Customary law

There were no rules on substantive concursus delictorum in customary international criminal law before the establishment of the ad hoc Tribunals.[23] Their statutes as well as the statutes of other tribunals are silent on the issue. Cases of multiplicity of offences are addressed only by Rule 87 (and formerly 101),[24] identical in its terms of both the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (RPE) of the ICTY[25] and the ICTR,[26] which reflects traditional[27] common-law practice but does not prescribe under which circumstances multiple sentences shall be made concurrent or cumulative.

[21] Stuckenberg (n 6) 561–3. [22] For references see Stuckenberg (n 6) 600–2.
[23] See Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) paras 673–7; Kaing Appeals Judgment (n 3) para. 290.

33.2.2.1 Class 1

The efforts of the ad hoc Tribunals to establish rules on concursus delictorum have been focused almost exclusively on the question of when cumulative convictions are admissible for crimes based on the same facts, i.e. the Class 1 situation. The earlier and more comprehensive approach in Kupreškić[28] has been subsequently watered down by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Čelebići judgment,[29] which has become the leading precedent on the issue,[30] followed also by the ICTR,[31] the SCSL,[32] and, after close [24] Rule 87(C): 'If the Trial Chamber finds the accused guilty on one or more of the charges contained in the indictment, it shall impose a sentence in respect of each finding of guilt and indicate whether such sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently, unless it decides to exercise its power to impose a single sentence reflecting the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused.' Former Rule 101(C) in the RPE of the ICTY/ICTR reads: 'The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.' Rule 101(C) remains identically retained in the RPE of the SCSL, adopted 16 January 2002, as amended on 31 May 2012.

[25] ICTY RPE (adopted 11 February 1994, as amended on 22 May 2013) UN Doc IT/32/Rev.49.

[26] ICTR RPE (adopted 29 June 1995, as amended on 13 April 2013).

[27] In comparison, the adoption of sentencing guidelines in the United States (United States Sentencing Commission, 2012 Federal Sentencing Guidelines Manual, Ch. 3 Pt. D, Multiple Counts) and England and Wales (pursuant to the Coroners and Justice Act 2009; see Sentencing Council, Definitive Guideline: Offences Taken into Consideration and Totality, 2012, 5ff), even where they are only advisory and not binding, represents a quantum leap in sentencing law by replacing nearly unfettered judicial discretion with complicated sets of detailed rules.

[28] Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) paras 637–748.

[29] Judgment, Delalić ('Čelebići'), IT-96-21-A, AC, ICTY, 20 February 2001, paras 400–13.

[30] Cf. Judgment, Jelisić, IT-95-10-A, AC, ICTY, 5 July 2001, para. 82; Appeal Judgment, Kupreškić, IT-95-16-A, AC, ICTY, 23 October 2001, para. 387 ('Kupreškić Appeals Judgment); Kunarac Appeals Judgment (n 16) paras 168–74; Judgment, Kordić, IT-95-14/2-A, AC, ICTY, 17 December 2004, paras 1032–3 ('Kordić Appeals Judgment'); Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-A, AC, ICTY, 22 March 2006, para. 356 ('Stakić Appeals Judgment'); Judgment, Naletilić, IT-98-34-A, AC, ICTY, 3 May 2006, paras 584–5 ('Naletilić Appeals Judgment'); Judgment, Galić, IT-98-29-A, AC, ICTY, 30 November 2006, para. 163; Judgment, Strugar, IT-01-42-A, AC, ICTY, 17 July 2008, paras 321–2; Judgment, Krajišnik, IT-00-39-A, AC, ICTY, 17 March 2009, para. 386; Judgment, Milošević, IT-98-29/1-A, AC, ICTY, 12 November 2009, para. 39; Judgment, Popović, IT-05-88-T, TC, ICTY, 10 June 2010, para. 2111; Judgment, Stanišić, IT-08-91-T, TC, ICTY, 27 March 2013, vol. 2, para. 905; Judgment, Prlić, IT-04-74-T, TC, ICTY, 29 May 2013, vol. 4, para. 1253; Bogdan (n 2) 9–30; N Valabhji, 'Cumulative Convictions Based on the Same Acts Under the Statute of the ICTY' (2002) 10 Tulane Journal of International and Comparative Law 185; H Azari, 'Le critère Celebici du cumul des déclarations de culpabilité en droit pénal international' (2007) Revue de science criminelle et de droit pénal comparé 1.

[31] Judgment, Musema, ICTR-96-13-A, AC, ICTR, 16 November 2001, paras 358–70 ('Musema Appeals Judgment'); Judgment and Sentence, Ndindabahizi, ICTR-2001-71-I, TC, ICTR, 15 July 2004, para. 491 ('Ndindabahizi Trial Judgment'); Judgment, Ntakirutimana, ICTR-96-10-A and ICTR-96-17-A, AC, ICTR, 13 December 2004, para. 542; Judgment, Nahimana, ICTR-99-52-A, AC, ICTR, 28 November 2007, para. 1019 ('Nahimana Appeals Judgment').

[32] Judgment, Fofana, SCSL-04-14-A, AC, SCSL, 28 May 2008, para. 220; see also Judgment, Fofana, SCSL-04-14, TC, SCSL, 2 August 2007, para. 974; Judgment, Brima ('AFRC case') SCSL-2004-16-A, AC, SCSL, 3 March 2008, para. 202; Judgment, Sesay, SCSL-04-15-A, AC, SCSL, 26 October 2009, paras 1190–3.

scrutiny, the ECCC[33]. Incompatible earlier approaches have been abandoned since.[34] The so-called Čelebići test is a true copy of the American test outlined in Blockburger v United States,[35] which allows cumulative convictions if the relationship of the offences is not one of logical inclusion:

> [M]ultiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.
>
> Where this test is not met, the Chamber must decide in relation to which offence it will enter a conviction. This should be done on the basis of the principle that the conviction under the more specific provision should be upheld. Thus, if a set of facts is regulated by two provisions, one of which contains an additional materially distinct element, then a conviction should be entered only under that provision.[36]

This restates the near-universal rule that the lex specialis bars the application of the included lex generalis. It is a question of law whether the legal definition of one offence is a logical subset of the other's definition,[37] including the chapeau elements.[38] Therefore, the procedural couching of the test is unnecessary and misleading. In fact, this confusion has, on more than one occasion, led international courts to the erroneous conclusion that cumulative convictions are forbidden if the same evidence is used in the particular case at bar to prove several offences.[39] Meanwhile, courts habitually stress that the test relates to the legal elements of the relevant statutory provisions but not to the specific facts of the case.[40]

Though the test seems simple, its application to concrete offences has proven difficult,[41] for example whether cumulative convictions may be entered for persecution

[33] Kaing Appeals Judgment (n 3) paras 291–300.

[34] Like the test developed in Judgment, Akayesu, ICTR-96-4-T, TC, ICTR, 2 September 1998, paras 468–70 (cumulative convictions are acceptable where the offences have different elements, where the provisions creating the offences protect different interests, or where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order fully to describe what the accused did); see also Judgment, Kayishema, ICTR-95-1-T, TC, ICTR, 21 May 1999, paras 627 ff; Stuckenberg (n 6) 575–6, 577–8.

[35] Blockburger v United States (1932) 284 US 299, 304: 'The applicable rule is that where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offences or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not.' Cf. Morey v Commonwealth (1871) 108 Mass. 433, 434.

[36] Čelebići (n 29) paras 412–13.

[37] Kunarac Appeals Judgment (n 16) para. 174; Kordić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 1032; Krajišnik (n 30) para. 387; Strugar (n 30) para. 322; Stakić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 356; Prlić (n 30) para. 1254; Nahimana Appeals Judgment (n 31) para. 1020; Sesay (n 32) para. 1191.

[38] Musema Appeals Judgment (n 31) para. 363; Nahimana Appeals Judgment (n 31) para. 1019; Prlić (n 30) para. 1254; Partial Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen (n 18) paras 30 ff, 35; contra Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge David Hunt and Judge Mohamed Bennouna (n 16) paras 24–33.

[39] Kayishema (n 34) paras 647–8; Judgment, Kaing, 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, TC, ECCC, 26 July 2010, para. 565 ('Kaing Trial Judgment'). The error was also made in Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) para. 707.

[40] Stakić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 356; Milošević (n 30) para. 39; Kordić Appeals Judgment (n 30) paras 1033 and 1040; Naletilić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 589; Stanišić (n 30) paras 906 and 909; Prlić (n 30) para. 1254 fn. 2340; Sesay (n 32) para. 1191; Kaing Appeals Judgment (n 3) paras 324–6.

[41] Friman et al. (n 6) 451–2; see e.g. I Hünerbein, Straftatkonkurrenzen im Völkerstrafrecht: Schuldspruch und Strafe (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot 2005) 98–179; F Palombino, 'Should Genocide Subsume Crimes against Humanity? Some Remarks in the Light of the Krstić Appeal Judgment' (2005) 3 Journal of

as a crime against humanity and murder as a crime against humanity,[42] or not.[43] It is a matter of interpretation of the offences concerned whether they are leges speciales to others and will therefore not be treated here. It may suffice to say that cases of true logical inclusion are exceedingly rare in international criminal law, in particular, if the context elements of the respective chapeaus are taken into account (and there is no way around this unless a context element is exclusively of a jurisdictional nature[44]). Therefore, other forms of 'apparent concurrence' should be given more thought.

But, unfortunately, the usual emphasis on the Čelebići test obscures the fact that there are more situations of concursus delictorum to be solved than merely specialty (inclusion). Actually, the test is applied in such a way that multiple convictions are not only permissible but mandatory if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other, thereby excluding any other form of 'apparent concurrence' like consumption and subsidiarity without further reasoning. Attempts to introduce further limitations of cumulative convictions based on considerations of consumption or subsidiarity have been made on occasion,[45] but without success. In Stakić, the Appeals Chamber made it clear that, if the Čelebići test is fulfilled, the Trial Chamber has no discretion to convict cumulatively or not, and therefore no further limitations are permissible.[46] Deplorably, the Appeals Chamber did not feel the necessity to supply substantive reasons for this view.

In contrast, the SCSL Appeals Chamber refused to enter cumulative convictions for forced marriages in the AFRC case as 'outrages upon personal dignity' (as a war crime) and as 'other inhumane acts' (as a crime against humanity), although these offences have materially distinct elements and thus:

> there is no bar to entering cumulative convictions for both offences on the basis of the same facts. However, in this case the Appeals Chamber is inclined against entering such cumulative convictions. The Appeals Chamber is convinced that society's disapproval of the forceful abduction and use of women and girls as forced conjugal partners as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population, is adequately reflected by recognising that such conduct is criminal and that it constitutes an 'Other Inhumane Act' capable of incurring individual criminal responsibility in international law.[47]

International Criminal Justice 778, 780–5; C Burchard, 'Torture in the Jurisprudence of the Ad Hoc Tribunals: A Critical Assessment' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 159, 171ff.

[42] Krajišnik (n 30) paras 388–91; Kordić Appeals Judgment (n 30) paras 1040–3; Naletilić Appeals Judgment (n 30) paras 587–90; Stakić Appeals Judgment (n 30) paras 355 ff, 359; Kaing Appeals Judgment (n 3) paras 301 ff, 316–35; see also Nahimana Appeals Judgment (n 31) paras 1026–7.

[43] Judgment, Krstić, IT-98-33-A, AC, ICTY, 19 April 2004, paras 230–3; Judgment, Vasiljević, IT-98-32-A, AC, ICTY, 25 February 2004, paras 135, 144–6; Judgment, Krnojelac, IT-97-25-A, AC, ICTY, 17 September 2003, para. 188; Stanišić (n 30) paras 909–12.

[44] Cf. Partial Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen (n 18) paras 36–44.

[45] E.g. Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-T, TC, ICTY, 31 July 2003, para. 870 ('Stakić Trial Judgment'): 'The guiding principle in these circumstances would be for the Chamber, in the exercise of its discretion, to convict only in relation to the crime that most closely and most comprehensively reflects the totality of the accused's criminal conduct'; Palombino (n 41) 786–9; see also Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) paras 686–92; Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Dolenc, Judgment and Sentence, Semanza, ICTR-97-20-T, TC, ICTR, 15 May 2003, paras 14, 17–19, 22–6.

[46] Stakić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 358; Strugar (n 30) para. 324.

[47] AFRC case (n 32) para. 202.

This reasoning appears to be based on considerations similar to consumption and subsidiarity, namely, that it may not be necessary to record a conviction of the residual category 'other inhumane act' if the wrong is already sufficiently covered by a more specific offence (albeit a war crime and not lex specialis in the technical sense). A conviction for the crime against humanity would have added to the description of what the accused did only in the circumstance where such outrages were committed 'as part of a widespread or systematic attack', which here was already evident from the adjacent convictions.

33.2.2.2 Class 2

International criminal tribunals have only rarely spelled out how they mould several sentences into a single sentence or how they determine the length of several concurrent sentences.[48] The Kupreškić Trial Chamber opined that the sentences should be served concurrently and that the sentence for the more serious offence may be aggravated if the less serious offence committed by the same conduct significantly adds to the heinous nature of the prevailing offence.[49] The Appeals Chamber, however, declined to fix any particular rules and contented itself with a reference to the English 'totality principle', stating that:

> [T]he overarching goal in sentencing must be to ensure that the final or aggregate sentence reflects the totality of the criminal conduct and overall culpability of the offender. This can be achieved through either the imposition of one sentence in respect of all offences, or several sentences ordered to run concurrently, consecutively or both. The decision as to how this should be achieved lies within the discretion of the Trial Chamber.[50]

Later, one of the ICTY Trial Chambers added that, '[t]he prejudice that an offender will or may suffer because of cumulative convictions based on the same conduct has to be taken into account when imposing the sentence'.[51]

Although it is not clear how this prejudice can be numbered, there is no doubt that the totality principle is eminently sensible and, thanks to its sweeping generality, capable of universal acceptance. Yet it is regrettable that the Appeals Chamber gave—in contrast, for example, to English law[52]—no guidance at all on how a Trial Chamber should exercise its broad discretion. Admittedly, the particularities of international criminal law—including the lack of penalty scales and extreme seriousness of the crimes—render it far more difficult to develop appropriate rules than in a domestic law context, but the effort should be made all the same.

[48] Cf. recently Prlić (n 30) paras 1294 ff, where cumulative convictions are discussed without indicating how these affect the total sentence.

[49] Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) para. 718.

[50] Čelebići (n 29) para. 430.

[51] Kunarac Trial Judgment (n 2) para. 551; Judgment, Vasiljević, IT-98-32-T, TC, ICTY, 29 November 2002, para. 266.

[52] See the Sentencing Guideline on Totality (n 27).

33.2.2.3 Class 3

Since the Čelebići test focuses on multiple crimes committed by the same acts, the question inherent in the Class 3 situation (whether multiple convictions are always permissible for offences based on distinct acts) is rarely discussed[53]—and even erroneously answered in the negative[54]—although it occurs regularly, for instance, when several forms of responsibility are affirmed,[55] for example accomplice liability and liability as a principal, or genocide and complicity in genocide,[56] conspiracy to commit genocide and genocide, an issue that has led to conflicting judgments.[57] Occasionally, chambers were even of the opinion that concurrence between modes of liability is not a problem of concursus delictorum,[58] although there is in reality no material difference.

In the early case of Akayesu, a Trial Chamber of the ICTR stated that a person cannot be guilty of both genocide and complicity to genocide because it thought that both crimes were 'mutually exclusive'.[59] Recently, a Trial Chamber of the ICTY held in Popović that entering a conviction for the substantive offence of genocide renders redundant a conviction for conspiracy, notably when proof of the substantive offence is the main piece of evidence from which an inference of a prior illegal agreement is drawn and upon which the conspiracy conviction is based,[60] and founded this result on 'the fundamental principle animating the concern regarding multiple convictions for the same act', namely 'fairness to the accused', as well as on the 'unique nature of the offence of conspiracy'.[61] While the impact of 'fairness' remains vague, it is sensible not to enter convictions for inchoate crimes and preparatory acts if the defendant later committed the substantive offence as a principal because these are merely different levels of liability for the same wrong, the result being that the fully consummated offence consumes all the others. In the same vein, superior responsibility has been considered subsidiary to other modes of liability,[62] and ordering a crime has been considered to subsume aiding and abetting;[63] commission has been held to exclude [53] Popović (n 30) paras 2118–27.

[54] AFRC case (n 32) para. 212: 'The problem of impermissibly cumulative or concurrent convictions does not arise when the alleged crimes are not based upon the same criminal conduct', citing Galić (n 30) para. 167.

[55] See B Burghardt, Die Vorgesetztenverantwortlichkeit im völkerstrafrechtlichen Straftatsystem (Berlin: Berliner Wissenschafts-Verlag 2008) 373–81, 423–8.

[56] Akayesu (n 34) para. 468.

[57] Judgment and Sentence, Musema, ICTR-96-13-A, TC, ICTR, 27 January 2000, para. 198, which refused to enter cumulative convictions in contrast to Judgment, Nahimana, ICTR-99-52-T, TC, ICTR, 3 December 2003, para. 1043.

[58] Kordić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 1030; cf. Judgment, Orić, IT-03-68-T, TC, ICTY, 30 June 2006, para. 339.

[59] Akayesu (n 34) paras 532, 700, and 734.

[60] Popović (n 30) paras 2124 and 2126.

[61] Popović (n 30) paras 2123–4.

[62] Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14/A, AC, ICTY, 29 July 2004, paras 91–2; Kordić Appeals Judgment (n 30) paras 34–5; Orić (n 58) paras 339–43; Judgment, Kajelijeli, ICTR-98-44A-A, AC, ICTR, 23 May 2005, para. 81.

[63] Judgment, Kamuhanda, ICTR-99-54A-A, AC, ICTR, 19 September 2005, para. 77; cf. the separate opinions of Judge Schomburg, paras 386–9 and Judge Shahabuddeen, paras 401–16; but see the 'alternative findings' in Ndindabahizi Trial Judgment (n 31) para. 485, understood as cumulative in Judgment, Ndindabahizi, ICTR-01-71-A, AC, ICTR, 16 January 2007, paras 122–3.

an additional conviction for planning, although this may be taken into account at the sentencing stage.[64]

33.2.2.4 Class 4

In international criminal cases, it is not easy to ascertain whether cumulative convictions for separate acts have led to stiffer sentences than cumulative convictions for the same acts. It seems that the option, where available, to impose consecutive sentences has never been used.

Although there are some good reasons to establish a sentencing differential between 'ideal' and 'real' concurrence,[65] this seems certainly more appropriate in the context of 'ordinary crimes' than in relation to massively complex crimes like those typical for international criminal law which are designed to subsume vast clusters of behaviour under one single offence. Nonetheless, there is presumably a comparable difference in blameworthiness between the situation that a crime against humanity and a war crime are committed by the same act and the situation that they are committed in independent criminal episodes. Accordingly, a more principled approach to sentencing multiple offences arising out of various distinct acts seems desirable.

33.2.3 Rome Statute

The Rome Statute, the accompanying RPE, and Regulations of the Court do not address the question of concursus delictorum, although the final drafts of the Statute contained rudimentary proposals on that matter.[66] Article 78(3) of the Rome Statute provides that the Court shall pronounce a sentence for each crime and a joint sentence specifying the total period of imprisonment, when a person has been convicted of more than one crime, and mandates a specified minimum (no less than the highest individual sentence) and maximum level (30 years' imprisonment or a sentence of life imprisonment). While the technique of concurrent versus consecutive sentences is suppressed, the provision leaves open the preceding questions: in which situations can one speak of 'more than one' crime, under which conditions multiple convictions may be entered and how is the amount of the joint sentence to be determined?[67] Equally, the introduction to the Elements of Crimes merely states that 'particular conduct may constitute one or more crimes' without more.[68]

[64] Judgment, Kordić, IT-95-14/2-T, TC, ICTY, 26 February 2001, para. 386; Judgment, Brđanin, IT-99-36-T, TC, ICTY, 1 September 2004, para. 268; cf. further Stakić Trial Judgment (n 45) paras 443 and 914.

[65] See Stuckenberg (n 6) 598–602 with further references.

[66] UN Doc A/51/22, 231–2, Art 47, Applicable penalties; Draft Statute for the ICC, UN Doc A/CONF.183/2/Add.1, 122–23, Art 77(3); cf. Stuckenberg (n 6) 571–2.

[67] Cf. S Walther, 'Cumulation of Offences' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary, vol. I (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 494.

[68] Elements of Crimes, ICC-ASP/1/3(part II-B) 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP), as amended 31 May–11 June 2010 (Review Conference of the Rome Statute of the ICC, Kampala), General Introduction, para. 9.

Thus, it is the task of the ICC to develop the rules on concursus delictorum within the framework of Article 78(3) of the Rome Statute in accordance with Article 21. The adoption of the Čelebići test, although reasonable in 'specialty' situations, alone will be insufficient because there are more concursus problems to be solved, as seen above.

The judgments and corresponding sentencing decisions pronounced so far[69] did not have to address the issue. Decisions of the Pre-Trial Chambers on the practice of cumulative charging (see section 33.3.3) either expressly referred to the Čelebići test when stating that only distinct crimes may be charged cumulatively in relation to the same conduct, namely that each statutory provision allegedly breached requires at least one additional material element not contained in the other[70]—although the test was arguably misapplied in the Bemba case—or tacitly relied on the test when accepting cumulative charges.[71] Though still unclear, it seems equally likely and advisable that the ICC will follow the trodden path and endorse the Čelebići test in order to determine the permissibility of cumulative convictions.

However, the Court should not stop there like the ad hoc Tribunals and require cumulative convictions blindly in all cases of 'reciprocal specialty' and unrelated acts but give careful consideration to other principles under discussion in this area of law, for example whether it would be wiser to omit convictions for ancillary and residual offences (like 'other inhumane acts'; cf. the AFRC case) and lesser or residual forms of liability (like conspiracy; cf. the Popović case).

33.3 Cumulative Charges

33.3.1 Principle

As a matter of principle, the rules on the cumulation of charges mirror the rules on cumulative convictions: Where cumulative convictions cannot be made, it makes no sense to permit cumulative charges.[72]

Practical considerations do not alter this principle. In the frequent case of doubt, whether the greater offence or only the lesser offence can be proved beyond reasonable [69] Cf. Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012; Decision on Sentence pursuant to Art 76 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2901, TC I, ICC, 10 July 2012; Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014; Décision relative à la peine (article 76 du Statut), Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3484, TC II, ICC, 23 May 2014.

[70] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 202 ('Bemba Confirmation of Charges Decision').

[71] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, paras 280–1.

[72] Stuckenberg (n 6) 589; accord Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) para. 728; Friman et al. (n 6) 428 fn. 402; K Ambos, 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision' (2009) 22 Leiden Journal of International Law 715, 724.

doubt at trial, a charge for the greater offence is sufficient if it permits a conviction for the lesser included crime; otherwise, alternative charges are appropriate.[73]

The same applies if the law is unclear and the prosecutor cannot predict with sufficient certainty for which crime the court would enter a conviction if the conduct were proven. In jurisdictions where—unlike most international criminal tribunals with the exception of the ICC—the court has the power and the obligation—ICC Regulation 55 leaves this to the discretion of the Chamber—to change the legal qualification of a charge in accordance with the evidence (iura novit curia),[74] even alternative charges are superfluous.

Overcharging in the sense of bringing a cumulative charge, typically a very serious one, for the sole purpose of facilitating a plea agreement on lesser charges with subsequent withdrawal of that serious charge, is an inappropriate practice and should be prohibited.[75]

33.3.2 Customary law

The prosecutors of the ad hoc Tribunals have established a practice of charging all possible crimes and modes of liability that has, not entirely without reason, been criticized as excessive.[76] This kind of practice has been widely accepted since and, apart from a few equivocal early decisions,[77] the ad hoc Tribunals[78] and the SCSL[79] agree that cumulative charges are always permissible if the Čelebići test is met. The relevant paragraph of the Čelebići Appeals Judgment does not even mention the test:

> Cumulative charging is to be allowed in light of the fact that, prior to the presentation of all of the evidence, it is not possible to determine to a certainty which of the charges brought against an accused will be proven. The Trial Chamber is better poised, after [73] Stuckenberg (n 6) 589–90 with fn. 132.

[74] See Friman et al. (n 6) 431–5.

[75] See the critique in Sentencing Judgment, Nikolić, IT-02-60/1-S, TC, ICTY, 2 December 2003, para. 65.

[76] Mettraux (n 1) 316.

[77] Decision on Defence Motion on the Form of the Indictment, Tadić, IT-94-1-T, TC II, ICTY, 14 November 1995, at 10: 'In any event, since this is a matter that will only be relevant insofar as it might affect penalty, it can best be dealt with if and when matters of penalty fall for consideration. What can, however, be said with certainty is that penalty cannot be made to depend upon whether offences arising from the same conduct are alleged cumulatively or in the alternative. What is to be punished by penalty is proven criminal conduct and that will not depend upon technicalities of pleading'; contrary Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) para. 727; reversed in Kupreškić Appeals Judgment (n 30) paras 325–6; see also Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law: Terrorism, Conspiracy, Homicide, Perpetration, Cumulative Charging, Ayyash, STL-11-01/I, AC, STL, 16 February 2011, paras 287–90 with further references ('Ayyash Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law').

[78] Čelebići (n 29) para. 400; see also Kupreškić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 385; Kunarac Appeals Judgment (n 16) para. 167; Naletilić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 103; Judgment, Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-T, TC, ICTR, 6 December 1999, paras 115–16; Decision on defence preliminary motion for defects in the form of the indictment, Kanyabashi, ICTR-96-15-I, TC II, ICTR, 31 May 2000, paras 5.5–5.7; see also Decision on Vinko Martinović's Objection to the Amended Indictment and Mladen Naletilić's Preliminary Motion to the Amended Indictment, Naletilić, IT-98-34-PT, TC, ICTY, 14 February 2001, para. B; Friman et al. (n 6) 388–9, 395–7.

[79] AFRC case (n 32) para. 212 with fn. 327.

> the parties' presentation of the evidence, to evaluate which of the charges may be retained, based upon the sufficiency of the evidence.[80]

This seems to insinuate that cumulative charges are admissible even if cumulative convictions were not,[81] and it remains unclear if this distinction was really intended. In any event, there are cases where cumulative charges have been accepted, although the respective crimes did not have at least one materially distinct element not contained in the other.[82]

The permission of cumulative charges is deemed to include alternative charges a maiore ad minus.[83] For example, different heads of responsibility may be charged alternatively.[84]

The ECCC[85] and the Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL)[86] likewise permit cumulative charges if the Čelebići test is fulfilled. The STL Appeals Chamber noted that crimes which do not meet the test may be charged in the alternative,[87] whereas different modes of liability for the same offence should always be charged in the alternative.[88] It went on to stress that:

> [t]he Pre-Trial Judge, in confirming an indictment, should be particularly careful to allow cumulative charging only when separate elements of the charged offences make these offences truly distinct. In particular, when one offence encompasses another, the Judge should always choose the former and reject pleading of the latter. Likewise, if the offences are provided for under a general provision and a special provision, the Judge should always favour the special provisions.[89]

[80] Čelebići (n 29) para. 400.

[81] Cf. Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) on the Charges against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-427, OTP, ICC, 22 June 2009, para. 16 fn. 11; see also the critical view in Ambos, 'Critical Issues' (n 72) 724, fn. 82.

[82] E.g. murder and extermination as crimes against humanity, Judgment, Kamuhanda, ICTR-95-54A-T, TC, ICTR, 22 January 2004, paras 685–8; Sesay (n 32) para. 1192. For further references see S SáCouto and K Cleary, 'Amicus Curiae Brief on the Practice of Cumulative Charging Before International Criminal Bodies Submitted to the Appeals Chamber of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon Pursuant to Rule 131 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence' (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 409, 418–22.

[83] Judgment, Naletilić, IT-98-34-T, TC, ICTY, 31 March 2003, para. 510; Naletilić, Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 102; see also Decision on Defence Preliminary Motions on the Form of the Indictment, Kvočka, IT-98-30/1-PT, TC, ICTY, 12 April 1999, para. 25; Decision on the Defence Preliminary Motion Challenging the Amended Indictment, Mpambara, ICTR-2001-65-I, TC, ICTR, 30 May 2005, para. 4.

[84] Decision on Form of the Indictment, Mrkšić, IT-95-13/1-PT, TC, ICTY, 19 June 2003, para. 62; Decision Regarding Defence Preliminary Motion on the Form of the Indictment, Rašević, IT-97-25/1-PT, TC, ICTY, 28 April 2004, para. 29.

[85] Decision on Appeal against Closing Order Indicting Kaing Guek Eav alias 'Duch', Kaing, 011/18-07-2007-ECCC/OCIJ (PTC 02), PTC, ECCC, 5 December 2008, paras 85–8; see also Kaing Appeals Judgment (n 3) paras 291–300.

[86] Ayyash Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law (n 77) paras 265–301; compare Decision Relating to the Examination of the Indictment of 10 June 2011 Issued against Mr Salim Jamil Ayyash, Mr Mustafa Amine Badreddine, Mr Hussein Hassan Oneissi, and Mr Assad Hassan Sabra, Ayyash, STL-11-01/I, PT J, STL, 28 June 2011, paras 89–95; see also M Gillett and A Schuster, 'Fast-track Justice: The Special Tribunal for Lebanon Defines Terrorism' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 989.

[87] Ayyash Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law (n 77) para. 271.

[88] Ayyash Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law (n 77) para. 298.

[89] Ayyash Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law (n 77) para. 298.

In a laudable call for clearer and shorter indictments, the STL Appeals Chamber added that:

> [t]he Pre-Trial Judge should be guided by the goal of providing the greatest clarity possible to the defence. . . . The Pre-Trial Judge may also request that the Prosecutor reconsider the submission of formally distinct offences which nonetheless do not in practical terms further the achievement of truth and justice through the criminal process. That is, additional charges should be discouraged unless the rules contemplating the offences are aimed at protecting substantially different values.[90]

The last two sentences, however, are surprising because the Appeals Chamber seems to resurrect and even expand—with a 'values test'—the obsolete view of the Kupreškić Trial Chamber.[91] Arguably, this is meant as a non-binding proposal for the exercise of prosecutorial discretion in drafting the indictment and not as a hard rule on the admissibility of charges.

33.3.3 Rome Statute

In the absence of any statutory provisions on the subject of multiple charges, one might have expected the ICC to follow the uniform practice of other international criminal tribunals. When the Pre-Trial Chamber adopted a very restrictive view on cumulative charges in Bemba, this caused a considerable stir and the question is still not finally settled.

Initially, the Bemba Pre-Trial Chamber appears to have banned cumulative charging altogether in its arrest warrant decision, stating:

> [t]he Chamber moreover recalls that in his Application the Prosecutor appears on occasion to have presented the same facts under different legal characterisations. It wishes to make it clear that the Prosecutor should choose the most appropriate characterisation. The Chamber considers that the Prosecutor is risking subjecting the Defence to the burden of responding to multiple charges for the same facts and at the same time delaying the proceedings. It is for the Chamber to characterise the facts put forward by the Prosecutor.[92]

The subsequent decision on the confirmation of charges explained that the Chamber is of the view that:

> [t]he prosecutorial practice of cumulative charging is detrimental to the rights of the Defence since it places an undue burden on the Defence. The Chamber considers that, as a matter of fairness and expeditiousness of the proceedings, only distinct crimes may justify a cumulative charging approach and, ultimately, be confirmed as charges. This is only possible if each statutory provision allegedly breached in relation > to one and the same conduct requires at least one additional material element not contained in the other.[93]

[90] Ayyash Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law (n 77) para. 299.

[91] Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) para. 727(c), see Ayyash Interlocutory Decision on the Applicable Law (n 77).

[92] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08, PTC III, ICC, 10 June 2008, para. 25.

With the citation of the Čelebići formula the Chamber seems to have returned to the established approach, although it insisted that the ICC legal framework differs from that of the ad hoc Tribunals, since Regulation 55 contains the iura novit curia principle and empowers the Trial Chamber to re-characterize a crime to give it the most appropriate legal characterization: 'Therefore, before the ICC, there is no need for the Prosecutor to adopt a cumulative charging approach and present all possible characterisations in order to ensure that at least one will be retained by the Chamber.'[94]

The Chamber held that rape as a crime against humanity is lex specialis to torture, because 'the evidence … presented reflects the same conduct which underlies the count of rape', so that, if the acts of rape are the instruments of torture, only rape can be charged,[95] and that the same applies in relation to rape as war crime and outrages against personal dignity.[96] The prosecution sought leave to appeal and contested the Chamber's authority to decline the confirmation of charges because of impermissible multiplicity,[97] and argued that, in addition, the Chamber had misapplied the Čelebići test because it based its determination on the evidence of the case and not solely on the legal elements of the offences.[98] The application was rejected and the Chamber restated its understanding of the principle governing cumulative charges as follows:

> Based on this understanding, the Chamber ruled in the 15 June 2009 Decision that where the Prosecutor relied on the same evidence pertaining to acts of rape to substantiate two or more legal characterisations, the specific elements of the crime of torture and outrages upon personal dignity were congruent with those of the crime of rape and, therefore, fully subsumed by the count of rape. However, the Chamber did not preclude the possibility that charges of rape and torture could be cumulative in the event the Prosecutor presented evidence that pertained to different specific elements not contained in the other.[99]

Obviously, the Chamber deviated from the established understanding of the Čelebići test and adopted a position known as 'concrete specialty'[100] which is considered erroneous in the jurisprudence of the ad hoc and other Tribunals.[101] In substance, this position is utterly defendable under the principle of 'consumption',[102] though not of [93] Bemba Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 70) para. 202.

[94] Bemba Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 70) para. 203.
[95] Bemba Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 70) paras 199 ff, 205 fn. 282.
[96] Bemba Confirmation of Charges Decision (n 70) paras 301 ff, 312.
[97] Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal, Bemba (n 81) paras 13–15.
[98] Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal, Bemba (n 81) paras 16–18.
[99] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-523, PTC II, ICC, 18 September 2009, para. 54.
[100] E.g. F Antolisei, Manuale di diritto penale, parte generale, 14th edn (Milano: Giuffrè 1997) para. 64 (p. 156); G Jakobs, Strafrecht Allgemeiner Teil, 2nd edn (Berlin: de Gruyter 1991) ch. 31 paras 13–15.
[101] Kayishema (n 34) paras 647–8; Kaing Trial Judgment (n 39) para. 565. The error was also made in Kupreškić Trial Judgment (n 4) para. 707.
[102] In this sense, see K Ambos, 'Sexuelle Gewalt in bewaffneten Konflikten und Völkerstrafrecht' (2011) Zeitschrift für internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik 287, 296.

'specialty' in the sense of 'logical inclusion'. Yet, the Chamber's reasoning is too imprecise to permit a definitive assessment of whether the decision represents a deliberate departure from the Čelebići rule—like the SCSL Appeals Chamber's in the AFRC case—or rather a misunderstanding of that rule.[103]

The same Pre-Trial Chamber recently allowed cumulative charges of murder, persecution, and deportation or forcible transfer based on the same underlying acts in the Ruto case because the respective offence definitions contained materially distinct elements not present in the definition of the other offences, citing ICTY cases which expressly rejected an approach that takes into account the actual conduct of the accused as determinative of whether multiple convictions for that conduct are permissible.[104] Likewise, this Pre-Trial Chamber allowed cumulative charges of rape and torture in the subsequent decision on the arrest warrant against Mudacumura,[105] so that commentators already felt that it might have given up the Bemba approach.[106] In a decision on the arrest warrant in the Al Bashir case which was rendered after the Bemba arrest warrant ruling, a different Pre-Trial Chamber had accepted cumulative charges of murder and extermination based on the same conduct without comment.[107]

So far, there has been no decision by the Appeals Chamber that settles the issue. Nonetheless, it appears unlikely that the ICC wishes to replace the Čelebići test by some other criterion. The Court's discretion to modify the legal qualification of the conduct charged could affect the pleading practice only insofar as cautionary alternative charges may become unnecessary if, in the future,[108] the prosecutor can unfailingly rely upon the Court to exercise its discretion to re-characterize facts in order to correct any legal errors that might be found in the document containing the charges.[109] Otherwise, the authority granted by Regulation 55—which still raises many practical questions[110]—has [103] Cf. Friman et al. (n 6) 434; SáCouto and Cleary (n 82) 428–32.

[104] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 71) paras 280–1, quoting Kordić Appeals Judgment (n 30) paras 1040–2; Judgment, Blagojević, IT-02-60-T, TC, ICTY, 17 January 2005, paras 807–10; Stakić Appeals Judgment (n 30) para. 358.

[105] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Art 58, Mudacumura, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/12-1-Red, PTC II, ICC, 13 July 2012, para. 50.

[106] E Chaitidou, 'Recent Developments in the Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Court' (2013) Zeitschrift für internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik 130, 142.

[107] Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-3, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, paras 95–6.

[108] More optimistic K Ambos and D Miller, 'Structure and Function of the Confirmation Procedure before the ICC from a Comparative Perspective' (2007) 7 International Criminal Law Review 335, 360; Ambos, 'Critical Issues' (n 72) 724.

[109] Currently, the practice seems to prefer the opposite course of charging a multitude of modes of liability in the alternative, Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Bosco Ntaganda, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-309, PTC II, ICC, 9 June 2014, paras 99–100; Decision on the confirmation of charges against Laurent Gbagbo, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-656-Red, PTC I, ICC, 12 June 2014, paras 227–9; but see Decision on applications for notice of possibility of variation of legal characterization, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1122, TC V, ICC, 12 December 2013, paras 32–44, where notice pursuant to Regulation 55(2) on alternative modes of liability was given even though the Pre-Trial Chamber had dismissed the prosecutor's attempt to bring alternative modes of liability in this case.

[110] Compare Judgment on the appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts may be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation no bearing on the question of cumulative charges. Furthermore, cumulative charges are always desirable in the interests of fairness to the defendant if cumulative convictions are permissible, so as to inform him as soon as possible about the legal consequences at issue.

Hopefully the ICC will not content itself with the Čelebići rule but will acknowledge the need to develop the law on cumulative charges further by, for example, taking into consideration the slightly more progressive stance of the STL Appeals Chamber set out earlier.

33.4 Conclusion

Fifteen years after the first judicial decisions on the matter of cumulative charges and cumulative convictions, a robust albeit primitive set of judge-made rules has emerged, though many questions remain. The ICTY Appeals Judgment in the Čelebići case seemed to stifle attempts of further elaboration of the law for quite a while, but more recent decisions like those of the SCSL Appeals Chamber in the AFRC case, of the STL Appeals Chamber in Ayyash, and of the ICTY Trial Chamber in Popović demonstrate that there are many more questions in this area of the law to be addressed beyond the 'logical inclusion' theory, to which the Blockburger and Čelebići tests solely refer. The ICC still has to find its way in the maze of concursus delictorum but has the benefit of the views and insights of the other international criminal jurisdictions which should, if appropriate, be carefully revised.

55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009, paras 64–100; see also e.g. Décision relative à la mise en oeuvre de la norme 55 du Règlement de la Cour et prononçant la disjonction des charges portées contre les accuses, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012; Judgment on the appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the decision of Trial Chamber II of 21 November 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3363, AC, ICC, 27 March 2013; for the negotiating history see G Bitti, 'Two Bones of Contention between Civil and Common Law: The Record of the Proceedings and the Treatment of a Concursus Delictorum' in H Fischer et al. (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes under International Law: Current Developments (Berlin: Verlag Arno Spitz 2001) 273, 279; cf. also C Stahn, 'Modification of the Legal Characterisation of Facts in the ICC System: A Portrayal of Regulation 55' (2005) 16 Criminal Law Forum 1.

PART V

FAIRNESS AND EXPEDITIOUSNESS OF ICC PROCEEDINGS

34

The International Criminal Standard of Proof at the ICC—Beyond Reasonable Doubt or Beyond Reason?

*Simon De Smet

> A judicial proof must be capable of dissection, element by element, so that it becomes completely clear what are the premises, what are the conclusions, why the latter are supposed to follow from the former, and with roughly how much probability they so follow.[1]

34.1 Introduction

Standards of proof are a common and essential feature of modern systems of adjudication. Most judicial decisions involving facts can only be made on the basis of a standard of proof in one form or another. Because of the double requirement of diligence and finality, courts cannot postpone judgment indefinitely because they feel dubious about the evidence and want more time to investigate. Nor can they withhold judgment or declare a non liquet each time they believe that the available evidence is insufficient to indicate with enough certainty where the truth lies. Standards of proof provide the way out of such situations by telling the court how much uncertainty may remain in its final factual conclusion. If this level is not reached, then the court must deny entering the relevant finding and rule against the party with the burden of proof. In other words, standards of proof allocate the risk of error.

The concept of standards of proof is thus relatively simple and readily understood. What has proved exceedingly difficult and highly controversial, however, is how and where to set the standard of proof. Article 66(3) of the Rome Statute provides that 'in order to convict the accused, the Court must be convinced of the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt'. This language is very familiar from the common law standard of proof, which has also been adopted by other international criminal tribunals.[2] As will be seen, however, the meaning of the beyond reasonable doubt standard is far from clear even in those jurisdictions.[3] Moreover, the ICC was intended to be a hybrid legal

* Legal Officer, ICC; PhD Cambridge University; LLM Columbia University School of Law.

[1] J Cohen, The Probable and the Provable (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1977) 285.

[2] D Jacobs, 'Standard of Proof and Burden of Proof' in Sluiter et al. (eds), International Criminal Procedure—Principles and Rules (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 1146–7.

[3] According to G Boas et al., International Criminal Law Practitioner Library—Volume III—International Criminal Procedure (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 385: 'a precise definition … of what constitutes a "reasonable doubt" has proven elusive'.

system, where influences from all legal traditions were intended to play a role. It therefore comes as no surprise that the definition of the criminal standard of proof before the Court has not been a straightforward matter. So far, the jurisprudence of the Trial Chambers has not provided much insight into how the international criminal standard of proof is conceptualized at the ICC. On the contrary, the latest judgment of the Court[4] shows deep divisions among the judges[5] on how to interpret the international criminal standard of proof.[6] In relation to the applicable standard of proof, the Majority declared:

> We merely recall that the evidentiary standard based on a proof beyond reasonable doubt cannot imply that judges have reached 'certainty'. Moreover, the approach whereby the probative value of each piece of evidence is evaluated in a fragmentary manner or one which would lead to the application of the beyond reasonable doubt standard to all the facts in the case, and even to those not indispensable for entering a conviction, would not, in our view, be consistent with the requirements of the Statute.[7]

Without wishing to enter the specific debate between the judges of the Majority and the dissenting judge, it is interesting to note two points: first, despite the fact that there was strong disagreement among the judges of Trial Chamber II as to the definition of the criminal standard of proof, still a verdict beyond reasonable doubt was reached by the Majority. Second, whatever doubts the dissenting judge may have had about the guilt of Germain Katanga were not deemed sufficiently 'reasonable' by the Majority to sway their opinion.[8]

[4] Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014. Full disclosure: the author worked for Trial Chamber II on the Katanga case. It would be inappropriate to comment or state any opinion on this specific case. The remainder of this chapter should thus in no way be considered as a commentary on any of the positions expressed by either the majority or the dissenting judge.

[5] It may be noteworthy that all three judges of Trial Chamber II hailed from the Civil Law tradition.

[6] See, Minority Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436-AnxI, 7 March 2014, para. 172; and especially the Majority's Concurring opinion of Judges Fatoumata Diarra and Bruno Cotte', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436-AnxII, 7 March 2014.

[7] Concurring opinion of Judges Fatoumata Diarra and Bruno Cotte (n 6) para. 4. It is interesting to note that the prosecutor had earlier accused this same Chamber of having misapplied the standard of proof in its judgment in the sister case Prosecutor v Mathieu Ngudjolo, where the accused was acquitted of all charges: 'A number of key findings in the Judgment demonstrate a pattern whereby the Trial Chamber concluded that facts alleged by the Prosecution had not been established beyond reasonable doubt based on a possible alternative or competing inference or on other grounds. But, neither the competing inferences nor the other grounds purportedly establishing a reasonable doubt are based on evidence, logic, reason or common sense. At best, they establish a hypothetical alternative reading of the evidence. This demonstrates that the Trial Chamber, rather than applying the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt, effectively required proof of the relevant facts to a degree of absolute certainty (i.e. beyond any doubt).' Prosecution's Document in Support of Appeal against the 'Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut', Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-39-Red2, OTP, ICC, 3April 2013, para. 38.

[8] See, for a general discussion, R Pruitt, 'Guilt by Majority in the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: Does This Meet the Standard of Proof "Beyond Reasonable Doubt"?' (1997) 10 Leiden Journal of International Law 557; and a short response by M Klamberg, Evidence in International Criminal Trials (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2013) 130, who concludes that 'if one judge of a three-judge panel finds that there is reasonable doubt, the minority judge may simply be wrong'. It is not clear

The only indication the Appeals Chamber has given so far, albeit in dictum, suggests a very high standard. In the Al Bashir case, the Appeals Chamber, in reaction to the definition and application of the standard of proof for issuance of a warrant of arrest by the Pre-Trial Chamber, stated that:

> At [the arrest stage] it does not have to be certain that [the suspect] committed the alleged offence. Certainty as to the commission of the crime is required only at the trial stage of the proceedings (see article 66(3) of the Statute) when the Prosecutor has had a chance to submit more evidence.[9]

Considering that the Appeals Chamber was discussing standards of proof and that it made an express reference to Article 66(3) of the Statute, it is unlikely that this was a mere slip of the tongue. At the same time, it is unlikely that the Appeals Chamber literally meant that convictions before the ICC are only possible if the judges are certain about the guilt of the accused. Certainty, by definition, does not tolerate any doubt, whether reasonable or not. Yet, as the OTP pointed out in its appeal brief against Trial Chamber II's judgment in the case against Mathieu Ngudjolo:

> the 'beyond reasonable doubt' standard (a) does not require that guilt be established beyond any conceivable doubt; and (b) only leads to an acquittal if the doubt in question is a truly 'reasonable' one that is supported by the trial record and consistent with logic and common sense.[10]

Perhaps the Appeals Chamber intended its reference to 'certainty' in the same aspirational manner as certain civil-law systems require their adjudicators to establish the 'truth'.[11] Yet, terminologically and substantively, the two concepts are clearly distinct.[12] Whatever the true intention of the Appeals Chamber might have been, it may safely be concluded that the criminal standard of proof before the ICC is still uncertain and it remains to be seen if and when the Appeals Chamber will clarify matters.

In this chapter, attention will be focused on the theoretical choices involved in setting the standard of proof. Any meaningful discussion of standards of proof must involve two different elements: first, it must be determined which model of judicial fact-finding will be adopted in order to determine how the standard of proof will be whether Klamberg is of the view that being 'wrong' also automatically means that the judge in question is 'unreasonable'.

[9] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir', Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-73, AC, ICC, 3 February 2010, para. 31.

[10] Prosecution's Document in Support of Appeal against the 'Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut', Ngudjolo (n 7) para. 50. It is hard to disagree with the Prosecutor's position from a textual or methodological point of view. Unfortunately, however, the Prosecutor did not offer any specific argument about how and where the standard of proof should be set. The addition of the adjective 'truly' does not do much to clarify the standard of reasonableness. Indeed, it is unlikely for any adjudicator to qualify his or her doubts as reasonable without considering this to be truly the case. Moreover, what is 'truly reasonable' is at least as subjective as what is 'reasonable' as such.

[11] M Taruffo, 'Rethinking the Standards of Proof' (2003) 51 American Journal of Comparative Law 667.

[12] 'Truth' is an absolute and categorical concept (something either is true or it is not), whereas 'certainty' is the highest level on a scale of probability. Significantly, it is possible to establish the truth without being certain of this (or vice versa). See generally, N Lemos, An Introduction to the Theory of Knowledge (New York: Cambridge University Press 2007) 14.

defined. Second, one must engage in a complex balancing exercise of all the relevant interests in order to determine where to set the applicable standard. In relation to the last point, the question also arises whether the appropriate level of the standard of proof may vary, depending on the nature of the case.

For most legal systems, asking such fundamental questions may appear somewhat artificial, given that they have been in operation for decades if not centuries. However, the ICC is a new jurisdiction, which should be unencumbered by old customs and traditions. On the contrary, despite having been in operation for over a decade now, the ICC still represents an ambitious fresh start and offers an opportunity to address the many theoretical, moral, and policy challenges with a clear and open mind. Indeed, at the time of writing, the ICC's jurisprudence with regard to standards of proof is still in its infancy. This thus seems an opportune moment to take a step back and reflect upon the way ahead.

34.2 Some Theoretical Considerations

It is a truism that judicial fact-finding is imperfect. Despite all best efforts, sooner or later findings will be made that do not correspond with the actual truth. There is nothing shocking about this. Perfect truths only exist in the abstract realm of formal logic. Judicial fact-finding relies on inferential reasoning on the basis of imperfect and incomplete evidence. Uncertainty is thus inherent in judicial fact-finding. How to deal with this uncertainty lies at the heart of the concept of standards of proof.

Two general approaches are possible in this regard. First, it may be considered that judicial fact-finders should be unencumbered by philosophical or other considerations. Under this subjective approach, fact-finders are asked to rely on their—presumed—innate ability and common sense to weigh evidence and draw correct inferences from it. Fact-finders are also presumed capable of evaluating the strength of the findings they make without needing any specific criteria. The second approach may be called formal, in the sense that it relies on fully developed models of inductive reasoning, which are thought to offer rational justification for conclusions reached in this manner.[13] Under this approach, judicial fact-finders are expected to follow more or less strict rules or at least to reason in a particular manner in order to arrive at valid findings.[14]

The field which studies the principles and rules of judicial fact-finding, from which the different formal approaches derive, can be loosely referred to as legal epistemology. In essence, this discipline is concerned with applied inductive reasoning in a judicial context. However, as general epistemology offers no clear and unified theory of induction, legal epistemology cannot provide easy solutions to the problem of uncertainty.

[13] It should be stressed from the outset that the formal approach in no way claims to be objective. Indeed, it is perfectly possible for two individuals to come to different conclusions, even though they have both applied the same formal model. It would lead too far to explain the reasons for this. In essence, the reason is that even under formal models of reasoning, fact-finders still draw heavily on their own background knowledge, which may differ considerably from one individual to another. See, for a discussion of the importance of generalizations based on background knowledge in fact-finding, T Anderson et al., Analysis of Evidence 2nd edn (New York: Cambridge University Press 2005) 262.

[14] A distinction should be made between valid findings and true findings. A finding is valid if it is made in accordance with the applicable model of reasoning. However, validity does not guarantee accuracy. Indeed, a finding may be valid but not true, just like a true finding may be invalid.

All that can realistically be expected from legal epistemology is that it gives us a handle on uncertainty in the sense that it allows us to have more clarity about how to reason with and about evidence, and especially how to evaluate the strength of inferences that are based upon it. In other words, legal epistemology may help us to understand how strong or defeasible our findings are. As will be explained, there is no single theory in this regard, but different models about how to reason inferentially about evidence are on offer.

In what follows, a brief overview of the two general approaches will be given. Starting with the subjective approach, a brief discussion of how most domestic systems have dealt with the criminal standard of proof will illustrate how the subjective approach works in practice and what its potential pitfalls are. After that, four different formal approaches towards decision under uncertainty will be highlighted.[15] Under any of these views, the criminal standard is not merely an indicator of a mental state to be reached by the adjudicator, but a reasoning procedure.[16] In other words, whereas the subjective approach is concerned mainly with the mental 'end-state',[17] formal approaches also describe the mental process leading there. First, the 'classic' probability theory will be presented, which is probably most familiar to many readers, but not always very well understood. Second, an interesting alternative to classic probability theory offered by the late Oxford scholar L Jonathan Cohen will be briefly explained. Third, we will introduce 'Inference to the Best Explanation' or 'IBE' and what it has to say about standards of proof. Finally, we will introduce interesting developments from argumentation theory and how they may provide a useful theoretical framework for thinking about standards of proof. This chapter will end with a few brief thoughts about where to set the standard of proof. Given that this question involves more political and moral considerations, about which this author has no particular claim of authority, this section will be kept short.

34.3 Subjective Standard of Proof

A standard of proof is said to be subjective when it leaves the adjudicator free to decide where to set the evidentiary threshold or simply describes the state of mind which the adjudicator must attain in order to make a factual finding, without giving a formal definition. Examples of the first kind can be found in Germany[18] and Spain,[19]

[15] Given the limitations of this chapter, these introductions will be very succinct. For a more in-depth treatment, see S De Smet, Rethinking Fact-Finding by International Courts (forthcoming, Cambridge University Press).

[16] See, P Roberts and A Zuckerman, Criminal Evidence (New York: Oxford University Press 2004) 366.

[17] H Ho, A Philosophy of Evidence Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 174.

[18] Section 261 of the German Strafprozessordnung (i.e. Criminal Procedure Code) reads as follows: 'Über das Ergebnis der Beweisaufahme entscheidet dat Gericht nach seiner freien, aus dem Inbegriff der Verhandlung geschöpften Überzeugung.' According to German jurisprudence, the adjudicator must attain 'subjective certainty'. Although the jurisprudence clearly requires this level of certainty to be based on rational, 'intersubjectively comprehensible' considerations, it expressly deems a very high probability estimate as insufficient. See e.g. G Sander, '§ 261' in Löwe-Rosenberg, Die Strafprozessordnung und das Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz vol. 6(2), 26th edn (Berlin: De Gruyter 2013) 198; U Eisenberg, Beweisrecht der StPO—Spezialkommentar 7th edn (München, C H Beck 2011) 372; L Meyer-Gossner and B Schmitt, Beckische Kurz-Kommentare, Band 6, Strafprozessordning 55th edn (München: C H Beck 2012) 1118.

[19] Art 741 of the Spanish Ley de Enjuicamiento Criminal (i.e. Criminal Procedure Code) reads as follows: 'El Tribunal, apreciando, según su conciencia las pruebas practicadas en el juicio, las razones where the law defines no particular criterion but leaves the evaluation of the evidence entirely free. At the same time, these procedural systems proclaim that the goal of criminal proceedings is to establish the truth[20] and give courts wide-ranging powers to that end. There is thus no standard of proof in the real sense of the word. Instead, courts have to determine when they have found the truth themselves in each case. As Taruffo points out, however, the conception of truth referred to is not an absolute epistemic truth but rather an idealized or 'wishful-thinking' way of defining the desired final outcome of the decision on the facts.[21] How this idealized state is attained is left open and adjudicators are presumably at liberty to adopt whatever epistemic method they see fit.

In France the situation is similar to the German/Spanish model, although there the Code de procédure pénale expressly requires adjudicators to take a purely subjective approach. In particular, Article 353 of the Code de Procédure Pénale states that:

> la loi . . . ne . . . prescrit pas de règles desquelles [les jurés] doivent faire particulièrement dépendre la plénitude et la suffisance d'une preuve; elle leur prescrit de s'interroger eux-mêmes dans le silence et le recueillement et de chercher, dans la sincérité de leur conscience, quelle impression ont faite, sur leur raison, les preuves rapportées contre l'accusé, et les moyens de sa défense. La loi ne leur fait que cette seule question, qui renferme toute la mesure de leurs devoirs: 'Avez-vous une intime conviction?'

For all its poetic elegance, it does not appear that the 'intime conviction' standard offers any specific guidance to the adjudicator. It merely describes the reflective, introspective, attitude the fact-finder is required to adopt.[22] It is therefore unclear whether, as argued by Spencer and others,[23] the French criminal standard of proof is equal or similar to the beyond reasonable doubt standard. Although it may well be that in practice French courts arrive at similar levels of certainty before reaching a guilty verdict, it is difficult to maintain that the law formulates any specific requirements in this regard.

expuestas por la acusación y la dfensa y lo manifestado por los mismosprocesados, dictará sentencia dentro del término fijado en esta ley'.

[20] Section 244(2) of the German Strafprozessordnung (i.e. Criminal Procedure Code) reads as follows: 'Das Gericht hat zur Eforschung der Wahrheit die Beweisaufnahme von Amts wegen auf alle Tatsachen und Beweismittel zu erstrecken, die für die Entscheidung von Bedeutung sind.' Arts 683, 701, 713, and 726 Ley de Enjuicamiento Criminal (i.e. Criminal Procedure Code).

[21] Taruffo (n 11).

[22] This does not mean that French courts can do whatever they like, for they are subject to a duty to motivate their opinions adequately. See e.g. F Desportes and L Lazerges-Cousquer, Traité de Procédure Pénale (Paris: Economica, 2009) 424. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the adjudicator in the French system does not have to demonstrate on what basis he or she has concluded that his/her factual conclusions reach a specific level of certainty.

[23] J Spencer, 'Evidence' in M Delmas-Marty and J Spencer (eds), European Criminal Procedures (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2002) 600–2. It has been suggested that the fact that most Continental civil-law systems adhere to the principle of in dubeo pro reo implies that civil-law judges are not free to do as they please. See e.g. J Jackson and S Summers, The Internationalisation of Criminal Evidence (New York: Cambridge University Press 2012) 212. Whilst it is not argued here that the subjective standard means that judges are entitled to convict anyone on a whim, it is hard to see how the rule that the defendant should enjoy the benefit of the doubt clarifies the standard if it does not also explain when a sufficient doubt exists. In other words, unless the legal system gives a more or less precise definition of what constitutes a sufficient doubt to trigger the in dubio pro reo principle, adjudicators can easily avoid its application by stating that, according to their subjective definition, the doubt was not sufficiently strong/reasonable, etc.

At a superficial level, then, the situation in most civil-law countries may appear quite different from the common law, where we find the well-known beyond reasonable doubt standard.[24] However, when one probes for a definition of the reasonable doubt standard, it transpires that there is very little specific indication as to what level of certainty the adjudicator must attain for conviction. On the contrary, the common-law criminal standard of proof is also rather opaque and leaves considerable freedom of interpretation to the adjudicator. Moreover, different jurisdictions have dealt with the question of whether and how to define the beyond reasonable doubt standard differently.

At one end, there are those jurisdictions which deem it inappropriate to give any definition of the beyond reasonable doubt standard. This is the case, for example, in Australia and the United States' 7th Federal Circuit.[25] The reasoning behind this approach seems to be that any attempt at explaining the meaning of beyond reasonable doubt is doomed to fail and can only lead to more confusion.[26] Another rationale for not defining the criminal standard of proof is that it is the juries' responsibility to define what constitutes a reasonable doubt in each case, thereby acknowledging the inherent subjectivity of the criminal standard of proof. This attitude is reflected very clearly in the Australian High Court's decision in Green v The Queen, where the High Court said:

> A reasonable doubt is a doubt which the particular jury entertain in the circumstances. Jurymen themselves set the standard of what is reasonable in the circumstances. It is that ability which is attributed to them which is one of the virtues of our [24] For a historical perspective on the beyond reasonable doubt standard, see e.g. B Shapiro, Beyond Reasonable Doubt and Probable Cause: Historical Perspectives on the Anglo-American Law of Evidence (Berkeley/Los Angeles: University of California Press 1991); B Shapiro, 'Changing Language, Unchanging Standard: From Satisfied Conscience to Moral Certainty and Beyond Reasonable Doubt' (2009) 17 Cardozo Journal of International and Comparative Law 511. Shapiro writes: 'Judicial terminology changed over time. The terms, in roughly chronological order, were "a satisfied conscience", "a satisfied understanding", "moral certainty", and finally "beyond reasonable doubt". All were meant to convey the same level of certainty in the minds of the jurors and all expected jurors to exercise their rational faculties.' It is interesting to note, in this regard, that the concept of 'moral certainty'—the immediate precursor of the beyond reasonable doubt standard—was originally used to describe the kind of unshakeable belief (but not physical or mathematical certainty) in the truth of Holy Scripture (Shapiro, 'Changing Language, Unchanging Standard', 268). See also J Whitman, The Origins of Reasonable Doubt: Theological Roots of the Criminal Trial (New Haven: Yale University Press 2008), who argues that the beyond reasonable doubt standard was originally intended to protect the salvation of the adjudicator (which would be in jeopardy if adjudicators were to have the blood of innocent defendants on their hands); but see B Shapiro, 'The Beyond Reasonable Doubt Doctrine: "Moral Comfort" or Standard of Proof?' (2008) 2 Law and Humanities 149.

[25] United States, 7th Circuit, Pattern Criminal Jury Instructions of the Seventh Circuit 2012 edn, s. 1.04, at 5.

[26] See e.g. United States v Glass (7th Circuit 1988) 846 F.2d 386, 387: 'This case illustrates all too well that "[a]ttempts to explain the term 'reasonable doubt' do not usually result in making it any clearer to the minds of the jury." Holland v United States, 348 U.S. 121, 140 (1954). And that is precisely why this circuit's criminal jury instructions forbid them. See Federal Criminal Instructions of the Seventh Circuit 2.07 (1980). "Reasonable doubt" must speak for itself. Jurors know what is "reasonable" and are quite familiar with the meaning of "doubt." Judges' and lawyers' attempts to inject other amorphous catch-phrases into the "reasonable doubt" standard, such as "matter of the highest importance," only muddy the water.' See also Australian High Court, Brown v The King (1913) 17 CLR 570, 584 (Barton ACJ). See also Dawson v The Queen (1961) 106 CLR 1, 18 (Dixon CJ).

> mode of trial: to their task of deciding facts they bring to bear their experience and judgment. They are both unaccustomed and not required to submit their processes of mind to objective analysis [of the kind proposed in the summing up in that case].[27]

Other jurisdictions provide some minimal guidance to juries but disfavour elaborate definitions. For example, in England and Wales, the 2010 Bench Book of the Judicial Studies Board recommends judges to direct the jury regarding the criminal standard of proof in the following manner:

> The prosecution proves its case if the jury, having considered all the evidence relevant to the charge they are considering, are sure that the defendant is guilty. If the jury are not sure they must find the defendant not guilty.[28]

This obviously begs the question as to what it means to be 'sure'. This has proved to present quite a challenge, as was acknowledged in R v Majid, where the Court of Appeal stated that:

> [a]ny question from the jury dealing with the standard of proof is one that most judges dread. To have to define what is meant by 'reasonable doubt' or what is meant by 'being sure' requires an answer difficult to articulate and likely to confuse.[29]

The Judicial Studies Board seems to have taken this concern to heart and now states that '[f]urther explanation is unwise'. Interestingly, the standard direction is followed by a rather elliptic note, which 'clarifies' that '[b]eing sure is the same as entertaining no reasonable doubt'. One may thus wonder what the proposed jury direction adds to the definition of the criminal standard of proof. In fact, the simple abstraction of the Judicial Studies Board jury instruction seems to have been a reaction against previous efforts at defining beyond reasonable doubt. Given the extreme difficulty of providing a definition that is clear and comprehensible for lay jurors, it was thought that it might be better to use an 'ordinary' concept that most people are familiar with. What is clear, however, is that appellate courts do not favour attempts at distinguishing between 'being sure' and 'being certain'.[30]

A third category of jurisdictions takes the position that there is a need to provide juries with some form of definition or explanation of the criminal standard of proof. For example, in the United States, Justice Ginsburg of the US Supreme Court has noted that:

> the argument for defining the concept is strong. While judges and lawyers are familiar with the reasonable doubt standard, the words 'beyond a reasonable doubt' are not self-defining for jurors. Several studies of jury behavior have concluded that 'jurors are often confused about the meaning of reasonable doubt,' when that term is left undefined.[31]

[27] Green v The Queen (1971) 126 CLR 28, 32–3.

[28] England and Wales, Judicial Studies Board, Crown Court Bench Book—Directing the Jury, March 2010.

[29] Court of Appeal, R v Majid [2009] EWCA Crim 2563.

[30] See e.g. Court of Appeal, R v Alan Edwards Stephens [2002] EWCA Crim 1529; R v Majid [2009] EWCA Crim 2563.

[31] Victor v Nebraska (1994) 511 US 1, 26.

Significantly, although the beyond reasonable doubt standard is supposed to have constitutional status,[32] there is no single definition that is applied uniformly in all criminal trials. Indeed, although the Supreme Court generally disfavours particular phrases such as 'moral evidence' or 'moral certainty',[33] or 'grave uncertainty',[34] its current position is that the Constitution does not mandate any particular form of words.[35] Accordingly, we find that even within the Federal system different Circuits use different definitions of beyond reasonable doubt.[36] However, the following elements recur frequently.

First, it is often stated that the beyond reasonable doubt standard does not require the prosecution to show guilt 'beyond all possible doubt'[37] or to establish a 'mathematical certainty'[38] or 'absolute certainty'.[39] On the other hand, it is sometimes emphasized that the standard is quite high.[40] In Canada, for example, the standard direction for the jury states that 'the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt falls much closer to absolute certainty than to probable guilt' and that '[e]ven if you believe that [the accused] is probably guilty or likely guilty, that is not sufficient'.[41] This last point is echoed in New Zealand where it is stated that 'it is not enough for the Crown to persuade you that the accused is probably guilty or even that he or she is very likely guilty'.[42]

When it comes to defining the concept of 'reasonable doubt' as such, many jurisdictions emphasize that doubts based purely on conjecture or speculation are not reasonable doubts.[43] Instead, it is said that a reasonable doubt must be a 'fair doubt',[44] a 'real doubt',[45] a 'real possibility [that the defendant is not guilty]' or 'an honest and [32] In re Winship (1970) 397 US 358, 364, 90 S. Ct. 1068, 1073, 25 L. Ed. 2d 368 (The due process clause protects all criminal defendants 'against conviction except upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged').

[33] Sandoval v California (1994) 511 US 1101. [34] Cage v Louisiana (1990) 498 US 39, 40.

[35] In dictum, the Supreme Court has described the state of mind the jurors must reach as 'a subjective state of near certitude'. Jackson v Virginia (1979) 443 US 307, 315. See also Johnson v Louisiana (1972) 406 US 356, 360. However, this was not proposed as an instruction to the jury and can therefore not be considered as a definition of the standard of proof.

[36] It is noteworthy that the latest edition of the Federal Justice Centre's model bench book no longer contains a definition of the beyond a reasonable doubt standard. The most recent edition of which this author is aware that contained a definition stated that the criminal standard of proof requires 'Proof that leaves you firmly convinced' is [US Federal Justice Centre, 1988].

[37] See e.g. United States, 1st Circuit, Pattern Criminal Jury Instructions for the District Courts of the First Circuit, 2013, at 61; United States, 3rd Circuit, Criminal Pattern Jury Instructions, 2012, s. 1.13; United States, 5th Circuit, Pattern Jury Instructions (Criminal Cases), 2012, s. 1.05, at 12; United States, 6th Circuit, Pattern Criminal Jury Instructions, 2013, s. 1.03; the Sixth Circuit explains that 'Possible doubts or doubts based purely on speculation are not reasonable doubts'; United States, 8th Circuit, Manual of Model Criminal Jury Instructions, 2013 Revised Edition, s. 3.11, at 76; United States, 9th Circuit, Manual of Model Criminal Jury Instructions, 2010 Edition, s. 3.5, p. 39; United States, 10th Circuit, Criminal Pattern Jury Instructions, 2011 Edition, s. 1.05, at 10; United States, 11th Circuit, Patten Jury Instructions (Criminal Cases), 2010.

[38] See e.g. United States, 3rd Circuit (n 37).

[39] See e.g. New Zealand, R v Wanhalla [2006] NZCA 229; [2007] 2 NZLR 573 [49]. This formulation is also adopted in the New Zealand Bench Book, NZ, Institute of Judicial Studies, Criminal Jury Trials Bench Book (2006) s. 6.5. Canada, Canadian Judicial Council, Preliminary Instructions, June 2012 version, at 41.

[40] See e.g. United States, 5th Circuit (n 37): 'the government's burden of proof is a strict or heavy burden'. R v Wanhalla (n 39): 'beyond reasonable doubt is a very high standard of proof'.

[41] Canadian Judicial Council (n 39). [42] R v Wanhalla (n 39).

[43] See e.g. United States, 3rd Circuit (n 37); United States, 6th Circuit (n 37); United States, 9th Circuit (n 37).

[44] United States, 3rd Circuit (n 37). [45] United States, 11th Circuit (n 37).

reasonable uncertainty left in [the mind of the fact-finder]'.[46] Such doubts may be based on reason, logic, common sense, or experience,[47] after carefully and impartially considering all the evidence (or lack thereof) in the case,[48] including the nature of the evidence.[49] This language is also echoed by the Appeals Chamber of the UN ICTR, which ruled that 'the reasonable doubt standard in criminal law . . . must be based on logic and common sense, and have a rational link to the evidence, lack of evidence or inconsistencies in the evidence'.[50]

In terms of the subjective mindset juries are expected to attain before entering a conviction, several jurisdictions state that fact-finders must be 'sure' or[51] 'firmly convinced'.[52] In a number of United States jurisdictions, reference is also made to a level of certainty that would leave the fact-finder so convinced that he or she would be willing to rely and act on the factual finding 'without hesitation in the most important of his or her own affairs'.[53]

It will be clear from this short overview that the criminal standard of proof remains a largely elusive concept in most domestic legal systems. At the very least, it seems correct to say that there is no generally accepted approach towards defining the criminal standard of proof throughout different legal systems. More importantly, all legal systems surveyed here leave a considerable margin of appreciation for the fact-finders and allow them to rely to a large extent on their personal appreciation.

Regardless of whether one thinks that so much faith in the epistemic acumen of the average fact-finder in legal proceedings is justified,[54] it seems hard to deny that the subjective approach towards defining the criminal standard of proof involves a number of serious problems. First, there is the inevitable uncertainty that it entails.

[46] R v Wanhalla (n 39). This formulation is also adopted in the New Zealand Bench Book, NZ, Institute of Judicial Studies, Criminal Jury Trials Bench Book (2006) s. 6.5.

[47] United States, 3rd Circuit (n 37); United States, 5th Circuit (n 37); United States, 6th Circuit (n 37); United States, 9th Circuit (n 37); United States, 10th Circuit (n 37); United States, 11th Circuit (n 37).

[48] United States, 5th Circuit (n 37); United States, 9th Circuit (n 37); United States, 11th Circuit (n 37); United States, 10th Circuit (n 37); R v Wanhalla (n 39). This formulation is also adopted in the New Zealand Bench Book (n 46).

[49] United States, 3rd Circuit (n 37); United States, 6th Circuit (n 37).

[50] Judgment, Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-A, AC, ICTR, 26 May 2003, para. 488. It is probably fair to say that the ad hoc tribunals have by and large followed the common-law approach towards the criminal standard of proof. This is illustrated, inter alia, by the fact that the Trial Chamber in Prosecutor v Delalić simply adopted Lord Denning's celebrated formula from Miller v Minister on Pensions (1947) 1 All ER 373 (quoted in Judgment, Delalić, IT-96-21, TC, ICTY, 16 November 1998, para. 601): 'It need not reach certainty but it must carry a high degree of probability. Proof beyond a reasonable doubt does not mean proof beyond the shadow of a doubt. The law would fail to protect the community if it admitted fanciful possibilities to deflect the course of justice. If the evidence is so strong against a man as to leave only a remote possibility in his favour, which can be dismissed with the sentence, "of course it is possible, but not in the least probable", the case is proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but nothing short of that will suffice.'

[51] R v Wanhalla (n 39). This formulation is also adopted in the New Zealand Bench Book (n 46). Canadian Judicial Council (n 39). The term 'sure' was introduced by the Canadian Supreme Court in 1997 in R v Lichtfus [1997] 3 SCR 320, 39.

[52] United States, 10th Circuit (n 37); United States, 8th Circuit (n 37).

[53] See e.g. United States, 1st Circuit (n 37); 3rd Circuit (n 37); 5th Circuit (n 37); 6th Circuit (n 37); 8th Circuit (n 37); or 11th Circuit (n 37).

[54] It might be objected that the picture painted here is unfair, because most domestic systems surveyed rely (wholly or partially) on lay juries to determine the facts. Accordingly, it might be argued, the legal systems have to 'dumb it down' for the benefit of the average juror, who lacks any specific fact-finding

Since each individual will have a different conception of what it means, for example, to be 'sure', parties do not know by which standard they will be judged. This is a considerable problem for both prosecuting and defending counsel, who remain oblivious of the expectations of the adjudicator until after the trial has finished and a verdict is returned. Second, a subjective and open-ended standard of proof inevitably leads to inequality among criminal defendants. Indeed, if the precise meaning of the criminal standard of proof varies depending on each individual adjudicator, some criminal defendants may find their cases to be treated more leniently than others. Finally, a standard of proof that is defined in terms of the subjective mindset of the adjudicator, offers very little assurance that the adjudicator will come to his or her conclusion in a fair and objective manner. Indeed, as Larry Laudan has poignantly stated: 'The firmness of a belief—that is, the depth of one's conviction in it—does nothing to settle whether the belief is rational or founded on the evidence.'[55]

One important corollary of the subjective approach is that it is exceedingly difficult for appeals courts to review whether the standard of proof has been correctly applied.[56] The subjective approach also explains how it is possible that a chamber can convict someone beyond reasonable doubt by majority without this having to imply that the minority judge is considered unreasonable by the majority. Indeed, if each adjudicator is free to determine in his or her own mind what proof beyond reasonable doubt means, the individual judgment of each adjudicator becomes almost immune to criticism. However, this also implies that it is hard to have any rational discussion about whether or not a particular adjudicator has perhaps misunderstood or misapplied the standard of proof. In particular, parties will find it extremely difficult to challenge the correctness of the application of a subjective standard of proof, because fact-finders do not have to explain how they have interpreted the standard, let alone justify how they arrived at this interpretation. A radical subjective approach may thus end up watering down the concept of a standard of proof as a decisional criterion. What is more, in such a scenario, it will be the adjudicator who decides in each case how to allocate the risk of error between the parties. It is questionable whether in such cases the standard of proof still exerts any regulatory influence as an external benchmark against which the adjudicator must measure her degree of confidence in the accuracy of her findings.[57] expertise. This argument is based on the assumption that professional judges are experts in fact-finding. However, it is highly questionable that this is actually the case. See e.g. F Schauer, 'On the Supposed Jury-Dependence of Evidence Law' (2006) 155 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 165; and, especially, B Spellman, 'On the Supposed Expertise of Judges in Evaluating Evidence' (2007) 156 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 1, who argues that '[t]here is no good reason to conclude that, by virtue of qualities, training, or experience, trial judges should be considered experts at weighing evidence or at fact-finding', id., 6. Whatever the case may be with regard to domestic judges, it suffices to consider the professional background of many international judges, many of whom join the international bench after very distinguished careers in diplomacy or academia, to realize that they have no particular training or experience in fact-finding.

[55] L Laudan, Truth, Error, and Criminal Law (New York: Cambridge University Press 2006) 39.

[56] See e.g. Judgment, Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-A, AC, ICTY, 21 July 2000, para. 37, where the Appeals Chamber remarked that it was perfectly possible for two judges, 'both acting reasonably, [to] come to different conclusions on the basis of the same evidence'.

[57] See G Krishnamirthi et al., 'Bad Romance: The Uncertain Promise of Modeling Legal Standards of Proof with Inference to the Best Explanation' (2012) 31 The Review of Litigation 81 argue that: 'The linkage of the standards to subjective mental states belies the very purpose of the standards.' In any event, to

34.4 Formal Standard of Proof

Given the vagueness and ambiguity as well as the serious problems involved in subjective standards of proof, one may wonder whether the ICC should follow the example of most domestic legal systems, or whether it should endeavour to provide the parties appearing before it with something more in terms of guidance and guarantees of objectivity and rationality. The question, then, is how the standard of proof can be defined in a more formal manner.

Fact-finding in the judicial context is a formalized legal process, but the underlying principles are not legal. Indeed, fact-finding in the judicial context is an essentially inductive process. In order to define the standard of proof, it is therefore important to understand the workings and limitations of induction. For this, we need to turn to the field of epistemology. Induction is a notoriously complex matter and there is, as yet, no generally accepted explanation of how induction works. In what follows, four different models will be introduced. Given the limitations of this chapter, these introductions will be necessarily brief. It is thus not possible to do justice to the complexity and sophistication of each of the models which will be presented in a strongly simplified form. It is also important to point out that it is not claimed that these four models are the only available choices or indeed that the correct model is necessarily contained among them. However, it is hoped that what follows can serve as a first step in the reflection about the appropriate approach towards the criminal standard of proof before the ICC.

34.4.1 Quantitative Standard of Proof

Often when people are asked to express how (un)certain they are about something, they do so by giving a percentage. Expressing uncertainty quantitatively has the advantage of great clarity and precision. However, when people are asked to explain how they arrived at the percentage they gave, they are often at pains to do so.

Probability theory offers a sophisticated theoretical framework for assessing uncertainty about factual propositions quantitatively. This field is often referred to as Bayesian epistemology, after the eighteenth-century English Reverend Thomas Bayes, who developed a formula for updating one's probabilistic beliefs in light of (new) evidence.[58] Space does not permit to give even a basic explanation of how Bayesian epistemology works,[59] but suffice it to say that it offers the tremendous advantage of clear algorithms and maximum precision. Although the mathematics involved may be the extent that there is any policy behind a purely subjective standard of proof, it is the personal policy of the adjudicator which may or may not correspond with the preferences of society. Some scholars, like Alex Stein, would argue that this gives adjudicators powers that go far beyond their domain and that the only proper body for making the moral and political choices involved in determining the appropriate distribution of error is the legislator. See A Stein, Foundations of Evidence Law (New York: Oxford University Press 2005).

[58] T Bayes, 'An Essay towards Solving a Problem in the Doctrine of Chances', published (posthumously) originally in (1763) 53 Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society of London 370.

[59] For a concrete example of a Bayesian analysis of a criminal case, see P Dawid and I Evett, 'Using a Graphical Method to Assist the Evaluation of Complicated Patterns of Evidence' (1997) 42 Journal of Forensic Sciences 226.

rather daunting to many lawyers, modern computer programs can offer assistance with this.[60] Using such programs for real court cases would require a lot of getting used to and would constitute nothing less than a revolution in the way in which most courts actually operate. However, there is no principled reason why courts could not apply Bayesian epistemology if they so wanted. In fact, the great rigour and perfect transparency of the model are two attributes that advocate strongly in its favour.

The main difficulty with this model is where adjudicators are supposed to get their individual probability estimates from. Probability theory is most easily applied when the input data can be measured and quantified. For example, the relative frequency of increased risk of lung cancer in people who have smoked for a certain period can be measured by looking at epidemiological studies. Closer to home, a lot of forensic evidence, including DNA evidence, is also frequentist in nature. Cognitive psychology offers frequentist insights into human behaviour, based on extrapolations from experiments with more or less statistically relevant samples from the population. However, for many relevant facts it is simply impossible to measure frequency because they are unique and happen only once.

These difficulties do not, however, suggest that Bayesian epistemology is therefore doomed as far as judicial fact-finding is concerned. In fact, there are different forms of probability. The type of measureable probability is often referred to as 'objective' or 'frequentist' probability. Opposed to this are so-called subjective probabilities,[61] which are not based on measurements of the outside world but on the subjective state of belief of the relevant epistemic actor. Being subjective, it is thus perfectly possible that two people estimate the probability of a certain factual proposition differently. For example, A may believe that there is a 60% chance that team X will win a particular game, whereas B may be convinced on the basis of the same information, that the chance is only 20%. Once the initial subjective probabilities have been established, however, the regular rules of probability apply to both of them in relation to how they reason about the proposition in question.

The main challenge with subjective probability is to find ways for how an epistemic agent is supposed to determine his or her state of belief.[62] Several sophisticated models have been proposed which are designed to allow an individual to quantify his or her beliefs. Many of them are based on imaginary bets or expected utility for the believer.[63] Such heuristics are intended to 'rationalize' the process as much as possible. Whatever method is applied, however, it will never be possible to objectively quantify one's personal beliefs. Yet, this criticism should not necessarily dissuade anyone from relying on Bayesian epistemology. Although it admittedly has to fall back upon the fact-finder's personal conception of the world, this is true of any model of inductive reasoning that is not based purely on quantifiable variables. At least Bayesian

[60] For commercially available software to assist with Bayesian networks, see e.g. <http://www.hugin.com/> accessed 22 July 2014.

[61] For a thorough exposition of this stand of probability theory, see R Jeffrey, Subjective Probability—The Real Thing (New York: Cambridge University Press 2004).

[62] Unless one accepts radical subjectivism, in which case anything goes.

[63] See, for a general introduction, I Hacking, An Introduction to Probability and Inductive Logic (New York: Cambridge University Press 2001) 151.

epistemology has the advantage of offering a rigorous framework within which these intuitions can be processed. Indeed, Bayesian networks have the great merit of exposing every step in the reasoning and are therefore the opposite of the allegorical 'black box' that is the human mind when left to its own devices.

Regardless of what one may think about the validity and/or viability of Bayesian epistemology for judicial fact-finding, it has to be admitted that it offers the perfect framework for fine-tuning standards of proof in terms of the appropriate level of risk of error.[64] Because uncertainty is expressed as a degree of probability, it is possible to be extremely precise when defining the standard of proof. In theory it also allows the appropriate standard to be calculated in light of the different goals and values of the legal system.[65]

34.4.2 Model of Relevant Variables—Inductive Probability

L Jonathan Cohen proposed a different conception of probability, which he called inductive or 'Baconian' (as opposed to 'Pascalian') probability. Whilst not denying the validity and usefulness of quantitative probability in relation to particular circumstances, Cohen's point of departure is that Bayesian probability calculus is not suitable for the legal–forensic domain.

According to Cohen's account of judicial fact-finding,[66] all factual findings depend on inferences. Inferences, in turn, depend on generalizations and it is finding the correct generalization which lies at the heart of fact-finding and his notion of probability. Under this conception of litigation, parties propose generalizations which, if shown to be correct, would prove their case. They do so by pointing to evidence which supports the generalization and by appealing to general background information about how the world works. However, if they are to have any probative value, the generalizations in question are usually highly specific and involve a complex conjunction of propositions.[67] For example, in a murder case, the hypothesis that the defendant killed the victim may be supported by the following generalization: 'Anyone, if s/he was present [64] Contra, see e.g. Roberts and Zuckerman (n 16) 365, who argue that: 'Very precise quantification, seeking to differentiate 90 per cent from 95 per cent certain, for example, is obviously ruled out on pragmatic grounds: such precision could never be achieved in practice, given the inherent subjectivity of individual jurors' confidence levels.' Although Bayesians might be willing to admit that the probability estimates are subjective, they would probably dispute that it is not possible to reach such levels of precision. Moreover, it is not entirely clear why subjectivity is a problem when levels of certainty are expressed numerically. Indeed, all expressions of confidence levels in the judicial context are, to some extent, based on subjective assessments. Indeed, it would be a fundamental misunderstanding to think that Bayesian epistemologists claim that their method offers absolute, mathematically certain, results. In other words, the proposition 'I am convinced beyond reasonable doubt that X is guilty' and the proposition 'I believe there is a 0.92 probability that X is guilty' can be equally subjective. The main difference is that the second proposition should be based on Bayesian reasoning if it wants to merit the claim of being rational.

[65] See, for just one example of an attempt to propose a formula to calculate standards of proof, F Vars, 'Toward a General Theory of Standards of Proof' (2010) 60 Catholic University Law Review 1.

[66] What follows is a grossly simplified summary of a highly sophisticated theory developed in Cohen (n 1).

[67] Cohen (n 1) 207. This issue is familiar in relation to frequentist probability as well, where it is usually referred to as the 'reference class problem'. For example, the very general generalization 'smoking kills' provides virtually no inductive support, because it is clearly not true in all cases. The generalization at the scene of the crime, and conscious, and had a motive to kill the victim, and carried a gun, and fired the gun, and aimed the gun in the direction of the victim, and the victim was still alive when the shot was fired, and the shot hit the victim, and no one else fired at the victim, etc., then the defendant [almost certainly] killed the victim.' Each of these propositions presents a variable, which may or may not be true. Each variable is a potential falsifier, in the sense that it may cast doubt on the applicability of the generalization to the case in question. Some variables will be more important than others.

Although Cohen apparently saw his work more as an extension of the ideas of Francis Bacon and John Stuart Mill, he explicitly modelled his account of inductive probability on the 'scientific method',[68] which is often associated with the work of Karl Popper.[69] The basic idea behind this method is that the validity of a scientific theory is measured on the basis of experiments that could prove it to be wrong. As long as the experiments continue to confirm the theory, it becomes stronger and stronger. However, if an experiment fails to confirm the predictions of the theory, the theory must either be revised to accommodate the inconsistent data or—if this is not possible—abandoned altogether. The job of scientists is thus to devise more and more specific experiments to test the validity of theories that are more and more refined, until no further experiments can be thought of that could falsify the theory.

Cohen envisages a fairly similar role for adjudicators. When they consider the question of guilt or innocence, it is their responsibility to think of everything that could potentially refute the generalization behind the guilt hypothesis. The prosecutor's job is thus to defend this generalization by showing that all the evidence confirms the generalization and, crucially, that there is nothing in the case that could falsify it. The accused may decide to limit her defence to simply challenging the validity of the prosecution's generalization, or she may present an alternative hypothesis of innocence, which will be based on a different generalization. In order to determine which hypothesis has the strongest inductive support, the adjudicator has to evaluate which hypothesis 'survives' most potential falsifiers. The assumption is that an untrue hypothesis will sooner or later fail to satisfy a falsifier and will therefore have zero probability.[70]

The beyond reasonable doubt standard is defined by Cohen as 'inductive probability that amounts to virtual certainty', which is achieved by eliminating every possible 'let-out', either by oral, documentary, or other evidence, or by reference to facts that

'smoking increases the risk for lung cancer in men by 23 times' is already more specific, but still far from establishing an absolute causal link. Moreover, the applicability of the generalization has been reduced by half, as it only applies to men and not to women (whose risk-increase is only 13 times).

[68] Cohen (n 1) 126.

[69] K Popper, The Logic of Scientific Discovery (1959, reprinted London: Routledge 2009); Conjectures and Refutations (1963, reprinted London: Routledge 2009). However, Cohen does not rely on Popper, presumably because Popper famously denied that induction was possible. Popper also denied that scientific theories could ever be validated, which would be problematic for any theory dealing with legal proof.

[70] It is to be noted that Cohen's account differs fundamentally from the quantitative conception of probability, which explicitly posits that the probability of proposition P tells us exactly how probable not-P is. In the forensic context, if there is an 80% probability that the bullet killed the victim, this implies that there is a 20% probability that the bullet did not kill the victim (i.e. that there is another cause of death).

the defence admits to or the court is prepared to notice.[71] In this conception, reasonable doubts are thus potential falsifiers. Accordingly, as long as there still are variables that could act as potential falsifiers that have not been duly 'tested', there is still room for reasonable doubt.[72]

This raises certain challenges. First, as Cohen notes, '[t]he inductive support-function we judge best from an epistemological point of view may nevertheless not be the ontologically correct one… In particular, we may not know all the inductively relevant variables. So what seems inductively certain may not be inductively certain.'[73] In other words, we may be missing certain information without being aware of it. However, Cohen pragmatically points out that criminal courts are only required to exclude reasonable doubt and that 'reasonableness is to be determined by the best prevailing standards of evidence'.[74] In other words, we cannot fault our courts for not being omniscient, just like we would not consider scientists were wrong to rely on Isaac Newton's laws of motion before Albert Einstein proved them wrong. Nevertheless, the difficulty of knowing what all the relevant variables are is not to be underestimated, especially in relation to complex fact patterns.

The second serious challenge which follows from Cohen's account is that in order to satisfy the beyond reasonable doubt standard, the adjudicator must in principle have all the potentially relevant evidence at her disposal. Indeed, as long as not all the evidence is in, the only way in which the proposed generalization can be applied is by assuming that for each variable for which we lack information, the variant will be favourable to the generalization.[75] As long as such assumptions still have to be made—i.e. as long as it is possible to point to variables about which we have no conclusive evidence—this implies that the available evidence is not complete.[76] This is a key feature of Cohen's theory: the inductive probability function he proposes incorporates the question of the completeness of the evidential data set. Whereas many other epistemic models allow adjudicators to come to factual conclusions on the basis of the available evidence, regardless how incomplete, Cohen's account requires adjudicators to factor in the theoretically relevant evidence[77] when determining the probability of a particular hypothesis. In other words, whenever there is missing evidence, this will have an immediate impact on the inductive probability of the hypothesis in question.

It is easy to imagine that such a rigorous position may lead to immense practical challenges in terms of gathering all the theoretically relevant evidence. Cohen accepts that having all the theoretically relevant evidence will not always be possible and that, if we ever want to be able to come to any conclusion in the real world, 'there must be some stage at which we take sufficient evidence to be already available'.[78] For that reason, Cohen proposes to set a certain inductive probability threshold, above which one is entitled to accept the hypothesis, even without having all the evidence. If this threshold is set sufficiently high, it will presumably guarantee that at least most of the [71] Cohen (n 1) 249. [72] Cohen (n 1) 272. [73] Cohen (n 1) 273. [74] Cohen (n 1) 273.

[75] Cohen (n 1) 212. [76] Cohen (n 1) 213.
[77] Cohen refers to this as 'the totality of inductively relevant facts', Cohen (n 1) 320.
[78] Cohen (n 1) 215.

relevant evidence is available. Unfortunately, Cohen does not say where that probability threshold would have to lie for the beyond reasonable doubt standard, but seems to suggest a variable standard, where the precise level 'is to be determined in accordance with the nature of the subject-matter and the best available list of relevant variables for tests on generalisations about that subject-matter'.[79]

34.4.3 Inference to the Best Explanation

The basic principle behind 'Inference to the Best Explanation' (IBE), or relative plausibility theory as it is also sometimes referred to, is very simple: when confronted with a collection of evidence, which can be reasonably explained by several different hypotheses, the fact-finder is instructed to accept the hypothesis that provides the best explanation of the evidence.[80] IBE therefore involves two main stages: first, the generation of hypotheses that provide a plausible explanation of as much of the evidence as possible; this is followed by the selection of the best hypothesis by eliminating all others.[81] The essence of IBE is thus a competition of different hypotheses which all claim to offer the best explanation of the evidence.

Whereas the basic principle is generally agreed upon by all those who support IBE, there is no uniformly accepted list of criteria that make one explanation better than another.[82] Philosophers who discuss IBE more from a scientific standpoint[83] seem to put most emphasis on the explanatory value of an explanation. The better explanation is then the one that provides us with the most understanding.[84] One of the key criteria proposed by Paul Thagard, a leading IBE scholar, is consilience. Put simply, consilience is a measure of how much of the data a theory explains.[85] Henderson recently argued that what matters most in simple cases is that the hypothesis makes the data more

[79] Cohen (n 1) 319.

[80] P Thagard, 'The Best Explanation: Criteria for Theory Choice' (1978) 75 The Journal of Philosophy 76, 77. 'To put it briefly, inference to the best explanation consists in accepting a hypothesis on the grounds that it provides a better explanation of the evidence than is provided by alternative hypotheses.'

[81] IBE is mostly concerned with the second stage of hypothesis selection. Peter Lipton argues that the stage of hypothesis generation is driven by different considerations, which give us a limited list of the most plausible, i.e. the most likely, explanations. P Lipton, Inference to the Best Explanation 2nd edn (London and New York: Routledge 2004) 149. To the extent that we make likelihood judgments based on our general background knowledge, there is a real possibility that the hypothesis generation process will be skewed, because we are usually not inclined to come up with explanations which would, if true, require us to reject much of our background beliefs. There is thus no reason to think that the process of generating hypotheses will systematically include the true explanation; Lipton, at 151–2. This is one of the reasons Josephson instructs us to always consider what he calls the NEW hypothesis, which is that we must always seriously consider the possibility that we simply might not have thought of the true explanation, because it is unprecedented or because it does not fit within our existing background knowledge. J Josephson, 'On the Proof Dynamics of Inference to the Best Explanation' (2001) 22 Cardozo Law Review 1621. As Peter Lipton points out, there is no way of judging how likely it is that we are in fact ignorant about the true explanation; Lipton, at 152.

[82] Peter Lipton remarks that IBE 'still remains more of a slogan than an articulated account of induction'; ibid., 57.

[83] I.e. they treat IBE as model to infer valid scientific theories.

[84] Lipton (n 81) 61; 'the explanation that would, if true, provide the deepest understanding is the explanation that is likeliest to be true'.

[85] Thagard, 'The Best Explanation' (n 80) 79–80; 'Consilience is intended to serve as a measure of how much a theory explains, so that we can use it to tell when one theory explains more of the evidence than expected.[86] For example, when there is a question about what caused a building to catch fire, and the three competing explanations are: (i) a soldier lit the fire using petrol, (ii) the fire was caused incidentally by using a white phosphorus grenade, or (iii) the fire was caused by a mortar shell, we would probably favour the last explanation if we have evidence of an impact crater, but we would disfavour this as the best explanation if there is no such evidence. One of the difficulties with the consilience criterion is that it is perfectly possible that one explanation will explain one subset of the evidence whereas another explanation will explain a different subset of the evidence. In such cases, one has to make judgments about which facts in evidence are more important, or fall back on other criteria.

A different version of IBE, which has been specifically proposed for judicial fact-finding, is what is sometimes referred to as 'naturalized epistemology'. This form of IBE is based upon the work of, among others, cognitive psychologists Nancy Pennington and Reid Hastie, who argue that the way in which jurors decide cases is by constructing stories on the basis of the evidence and by selecting the story that best fits within their background knowledge as the most plausible one. Stories in this sense are described as a '"causal chain" of events in which events are connected by causal relationships of necessity and sufficiency'.[87] Stories are thus composed of different 'episodes' which are all causally linked into a coherent whole. The fact-finder uses his or her knowledge about what makes a story structurally complete to evaluate the comprehensiveness of the evidence and to make the necessary inferences to fill in gaps where the evidence does not cover all the necessary episodes of the story structure.[88] In order to judge how well the story explains the evidence, fact-finders are said to consider the following criteria. First, fact-finders are said to consider the story's so-called coverage of the evidence, which refers to the extent to which the story accounts for the evidence presented at trial.[89] Second, the fact-finder will consider the story's coherence, a concept which is divided into three categories: consistency, which evaluates whether there are any internal contradictions in the story or with evidence believed to be true; plausibility, which measures the extent to which the story corresponds to the fact-finder's background knowledge; and completeness, which measures the extent to which the story is composed of all the necessary episodes, based on the fact-finder's knowledge of the story structure.[90] What is important for the purposes of standards of proof is that if more than one story meets all these criteria, belief in any one of them over the others will be less strong.[91] In other words, the level of confidence in the best another theory.... we show one theory to be more consilient than another by pointing to a class or classes of facts which it explains but which another theory does not.... it is possible that T_1 explains many more classes of facts than T_2, but that there are still some facts that only T_2 explains. In cases where these two definitions do not coincide, decisions concerning the best explanation must be made according to what theory explains the most important facts, or on the basis of other criteria.'

[86] L Henderson, 'Bayesianism and Inference to the Best Explanation' (2013) 64 British Journal for the Philosophy of Science 1, 14.

[87] N Pennington and R Hastie, 'A Cognitive Theory of Juror Decision Making: the Story Model' (1991) 13 Cardozo Law Review 519, 525.

[88] Ibid., 527.

[89] Ibid. This seems similar to Paul Thagard's 'consilience' criterion discussed earlier.

[90] Ibid., 527–8.

[91] Ibid., 528.

explanation will be lower if there is more than one coherent explanation than when there is only one such explanation.

A number of evidence scholars have picked up on this research and have transformed it into a normative account for judicial fact-finding. In particular, Ronald Allen and others have promoted the idea of what they call 'naturalized epistemology' in the legal context.[92] According to this view, trials of fact always come down to a comparison of competing claims[93] and fact-finders are supposed to decide cases by determining which of these claims is the best. However, no matter how well this approach may correspond to how people actually think about evidence, it does not sit very easily with the criminal standard of proof. For example, it is not difficult to imagine a case where both the prosecutor and the defence have presented explanations that are reasonably good. According to IBE, the prosecutor should win if her explanation of the evidence is best. However, the best explanation may still not be good enough, because it may still involve an unacceptably high risk of a false conviction.[94] To get around this problem, a number of additions to IBE have been proposed. Paul Thagard, for example, argued that the beyond reasonable doubt standard requires that the guilt hypothesis must be 'substantially more plausible' than the innocence hypothesis.[95] Ronald Allen has proposed that under IBE the criminal standard would require that the prosecutor must demonstrate a plausible case of guilt and that there may be no plausible case of innocence.[96] In other words, even if the prosecutor's explanation of the evidence is the best one on offer, it still cannot lead to a conviction as long as the defence's explanation is not wholly implausible.[97] The reasoning behind this approach is that 'when there is a plausible explanation of the evidence consistent with innocence, then there is a concomitant likelihood that this explanation is correct and thus that the defendant is innocent, which in turn creates a reasonable doubt (and should thus prevent the fact-finder from inferring guilt'.[98] Pardo and Allen acknowledge that this is quite vague, but argue that this is inherent in the legal standard of proof.[99] Josephson has tried to be a little more specific and has suggested that an explanation of innocence is plausible if it is 'internally consistent, consistent with known facts, not highly implausible, and it must represent a "real possibility" rather than a mere logical possibility. A real possibility does not suppose the violation of any known law of nature, nor does it suppose any behaviour that is completely unique and unprecedented, nor any extremely improbable chain of coincidences.'[100] Whether this adds a lot of clarity is [92] R Allen and B Leiter, 'Naturalized Epistemology and the Law of Evidence' (2001) 87 Virginia Law Review 1491; R Allen, 'The Nature of Juridical Proof' (2001) 13 Cardozo Law Review 373; M Pardo and R Allen, 'Juridical Proof and the Best Explanation' (2008) 27 Law and Philosophy 223; R Allen and A Stein, 'Evidence, Probability, and the Burden of Proof' (2013) 55 Arizona Law Review 557.

[93] Allen and Leiter (n 92) 1529.

[94] L Laudan, 'Strange Bedfellows: Inference to the Best Explanation and the Criminal Standard of Proof' (2007) 11 International Journal on Evidence and Proof 292.

[95] P Thagard, 'Why wasn't O J Convicted? Emotional Coherence in Legal Inference' (2003) 17 Cognition and Emotion 361, 366–7.

[96] R Allen, 'Rationality, Algorithms and Juridical Proof: A Preliminary Inquiry' (1997) 1 International Journal of Evidence and Proof 254, 273. For a similar account, see Josephson (n 81) 1642.

[97] For a criticism of this approach as being in contradiction with the essence of IBE, see Laudan, 'Strange Bedfellows' (n 94) 302.

[98] Pardo and Allen (n 92).

[99] Pardo and Allen (n 92).

[100] Josephson (n 81) 1642.

open to discussion, but it does confirm that a plausible hypothesis of innocence must also meet some minimum threshold of the standard criteria for IBE.

34.4.4 Qualitative Probability—Argumentation Theory

The last model of inductive fact-finding that will be discussed is based on argumentation theory. Just as with Cohen's relevant variables model and IBE, the qualitative uncertainty model is a response to the concern that quantitative probability theory does not offer a workable model in many situations because human ability to estimate probabilities is thought to be severely limited.[101] The idea is to offer a model which allows one to be equally rigorous in one's reasoning about and assessment of uncertain evidence, but without requiring quantification.[102]

The basic idea is that people make decisions on the basis of arguments in favour and arguments against a certain claim or proposition.[103] The assumption is that it is always possible to determine whether something constitutes an argument for or against a particular proposition, even if it is not possible to indicate how strongly the argument supports or undermines the proposition.[104] In order to know which proposition to believe, one must simply determine which proposition has the most independent lines or arguments in favour and the least against.[105] Significantly, these different lines of argument do not have to be consistent with each other.[106] This is because arguments can be based on different background assumptions.[107]

Another key feature of qualitative probability is that it explicitly promotes arguing at different levels. On the one hand, there are arguments that pertain directly to the proposition under investigation. On the other hand, it is possible to argue about these first-level arguments; i.e. to find arguments for a why a particular argument is valid or not.[108] It is by doing the balancing exercise (identifying arguments for and against) at the meta-level that one is able to determine the relative strength of the first-level arguments.[109]

It is thus possible to attack a particular claim in two ways: one may try to defeat the argument by attempting to rebut the claim by directly contradicting it with a competing claim (e.g. the raising of an alibi against the allegation that the accused was present at the scene of the crime) or by pointing out weaknesses in the proposition (e.g. internal contradictions); or one may attempt to defeat the argument by challenging some or all of the information used to construct it (e.g. attacking the credibility of the witness who puts the accused at the scene of the crime).[110] On this basis it is possible to [101] J Fox et al., 'Quantitative and Qualitative Approaches to Reasoning under Uncertainty in Medical Decision Making' in S Quaglini et al. (eds), AIME 2001, LNAI 2101 (Berlin: Springer 2001) 272.

[102] J Fox, 'Arguing about the Evidence: a Logical Approach', in P Dawid et al. (eds), Evidence, Inference and Enquiry (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011) 153.

[103] Fox et al. (n 101) 275. [104] Fox et al. (n 101) 276. [105] Fox (n 102) 162.

[106] This is an important point of distinction with IBE, where consistency is a key factor in determining which the best explanation is.

[107] Fox (n 102) 159.

[108] P Krause et al., 'A Logic of Argumentation for Reasoning under Uncertainty' (1995) 11 Computational Intelligence 113.

[109] Ibid.

[110] Ibid., 126. For example, John Fox lists the following strategies for arguing at the meta-level: 'buttressing', 'corroboration', 'undermining', 'weakening', and 'equivocation'; Fox (n 102) 174–5.

define so-called acceptability classes, which reflect the extent to which the argument can be challenged.[111]

Open Claim—Referring to any well-formed proposition in the language of the logic. This is intended to confer a notion of having no information at all, of being completely agnostic.

Supported Claim—Referring to propositions for which an argument can be constructed, although this argument may be based on inconsistent data.

Plausible Claim—Referring to propositions for which a consistent argument can be made, but against which a consistent counterargument can also be constructed on the basis of contradictory information.

Probable Claim—Referring to propositions for which a consistent argument can be made and against which no consistent counterargument can be constructed. However, one or more steps in the argument can be challenged (i.e. the argument is vulnerable at the meta-level).

Confirmed Claim—Referring to propositions that cannot be consistently attacked at either the first level or the meta-level.

Certain Claim—Referring to propositions that are logically valid and which do not depend on evidence.

These acceptability classes express successively increasing degrees of 'acceptability' of the arguments which support the propositions of interest. Each step up represents a decreased level of tension between arguments for and against the proposition in question.[112]

However, it should be stressed that, like quantitative probability and IBE (but unlike Cohen's 'inductive probability'), the acceptability classes can, in principle, be applied to any evidential dataset no matter how incomplete. Even when a proposition is 'confirmed', it is thus still defeasible by new evidence. To account for this, it has been proposed to also adopt a so-called commitment rule, which is intended to express the fact-finder's confidence that the list of arguments is more or less final and that no further arguments could change the classification of the claim(s). In ideal circumstances, fact-finders should withhold committing to a classification until they are confident that there are no further unknown items of evidence that could generate arguments that might change the classification of the proposition.[113] However, this proposal is somewhat idealistic because (i) often the fact-finder will not have the time or resources to gather all the necessary information to meet the commitment rule and (ii) it is often difficult to know whether information is still missing and, if so, how significant it is. It is thus often difficult to satisfy the commitment rule.[114]

[111] M Elvang-Gøransson et al., 'Acceptability of Arguments as "Logical Uncertainty"', in M Clarke et al. (eds.), Symbolic and Quantitative Approaches to Reasoning and Uncertainty (Berlin: Springer 1993) 85–90; Krause et al., 'A Logic of Argumentation for Reasoning under Uncertainty' (n 108) 224; Fox (n 102) 177.

[112] P Krause et al., 'Qualitative Risk Assessment Fulfils a Need' in A Hunter and S Parsons (eds), Applications of Uncertainty Formalisms (Berlin: Springer 1998) 144.

[113] Fox (n 102) 178.

[114] Fox (n 102) 178–9.

Although I am not aware of any formal proposal to translate acceptability classes into different standards of proof, it is relatively easy to see how this might be done. For example, it is suggested that a finding beyond reasonable doubt would have to correspond to a confirmed claim to which the fact-finder should be able to commit rather firmly.

34.5 Which Model for the ICC?

Choosing the right model for the ICC is not an easy task. Each of the models discussed has advantages and disadvantages. None of them can prove theoretical superiority over the others, and the fact that there are different accounts implies that none of them is universally accepted. It is also not self-evident which of these models is most suitable for judicial fact-finding in the context of international criminal trials.

However, perhaps it is not necessary to make stark choices. Indeed, although each of the accounts purports to offer a sufficient theory of induction, they are not inherently incompatible with each other.[115] This is not to suggest that it is possible to spin two or more models together into a coherent hybrid model. However, it may be possible, for practical purposes, to rely on elements from different systems in order to define the international criminal standard of proof. Each of these elements would then have to be assessed in accordance with the methodology of the epistemic model from which it originates.

For example, it might be possible to start with an IBE analysis of which hypothesis offers the best explanation of the available evidence and to ascertain that there is no 'reasonable' alternative innocent explanation. Once this hypothesis has been identified, it would then be assessed in terms of quantitative, qualitative, or 'inductive' probability in order to ascertain whether the best explanation is indeed good enough. For example, if the best explanation only amounts to a 'probable claim' in terms of qualitative probability, it might be held that this is insufficient to meet the beyond reasonable doubt standard.

No specific proposal is made here. The main purpose of this chapter is limited to pointing out that there are a number of viable options to choose from and that the ICC is not bound to blindly follow the subjective approach that is prevalent in most domestic systems. It may be useful to point out, in this regard, that even if the subjective approach is adopted, nothing prevents Trial Chambers from relying on any of the formal models presented here. What is more, without formal guidance from the standard of proof, different judges within the same Chamber may choose to rely on different epistemic models, even in the context of a single case.

34.6 Where to Set the Standard of Proof?

Once it has been determined which model to adopt for the international criminal standard of proof, it becomes possible to start thinking about where to set the threshold. Setting the standard of proof at the appropriate level is a delicate and complex task. It is good to remember, in this regard, that standards of proof are primarily tools to distribute the risk of error between the parties. It would be a mistake to think that setting the standard of proof very high will increase the likelihood that the court will establish the truth. Indeed, setting the standard very high does not mean that the court will necessarily make fewer factually wrong decisions. On the contrary, a very high standard may lead to proportionally more factually wrong decisions being made, in the sense that more truly guilty people get acquitted. For example, assuming the standard of proof is set at 90% and the fact-finder comes to the conclusion that the evidence only establishes guilt with 80% certainty, this implies that there is an 80% chance that the court acquits a guilty person and therefore fails to establish the truth.[116] In other words, the truth-tropic effect of the criminal standard of proof is asymmetrical.[117] It requires high levels of certainty when persons are convicted, but it tolerates severe doubts about the accuracy of the verdict when persons are acquitted.[118] In other words, standards of proof are not so much tools to create greater accuracy, but rather mechanisms for minimizing expected losses in case the decision turns out to be wrong.

[115] For example, most advocates of IBE, qualitative probability, and the relevant variables theory admit that quantitative probability has a role to play in their model as well. See e.g. Lipton (n 81) 107–17.

The main challenge is thus to identify arguments about whether the defendant should run more or less risk of being convicted erroneously. It is often suggested, at least in the common-law tradition, that the criminal standard of proof should reflect the strength of society's aversion against the conviction of innocent persons. The level of risk-aversion is often expressed as a ratio of 1 in 10 or 1 in 100, whereby it is considered acceptable for a judicial system to convict one innocent person once in every 10 or 100 cases.[119] However, such considerations quickly lead to very high probability thresholds. The concern about protecting the truly innocent may thus make it exceedingly difficult for the prosecution to obtain convictions against the truly guilty.

This is why more sophisticated models[120] suggest that the correct threshold can only be determined on the basis of the social cost of convicting the innocent as well as [116] As Lillquist points out, 'guilty defendants are nine times more likely to benefit from an error than an innocent defendant is likely to be harmed by an error'. E Lillquist, 'Recasting Reasonable Doubt: Decision Theory and the Virtues of Variability' (2002) 36 University of California Davis Law Review 85, 98.

[117] This is true to the extent that we assume there is a roughly equal number of guilty and innocent accused. If most accused are in fact guilty, then a lower standard of proof would not have a particularly detrimental effect on the accuracy of judgments. See Laudan, Truth, Error, and Criminal Law (n 55) 66–74. However, as we do not empirically know the relative number of innocent accused, we must base the standard of proof on the—perhaps slightly unrealistic—assumption that the distribution is roughly equal.

[118] Perhaps this is what Trial Chamber II had in mind when it stated that an acquittal did not mean that the acquitted person was innocent; Jugement rendu en application de l' article 74 du Statut, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012, para. 36. To the extent that an acquittal is not an affirmation of actual innocence, but merely a finding that the prosecutor did not meet the standard of proof, this statement is correct.

[119] The 'one in ten' ratio is traditionally attributed to Blackstone. However, as Larry Laudan has pointed out, taken literally it makes little sense, as it would condone that in a hundred cases 9 innocent persons are convicted and 90 guilty persons are acquitted, leaving only one case to be decided correctly. See L Laudan, 'The Elementary Epistemic Arithmetic of Criminal Justice' (2008) Episteme 282.

[120] See e.g. L Laudan and H Saunders, 'Re-Thinking the Criminal Standard of Proof: Seeking Consensus about the Utilities of Trial Outcomes' (2009) 7 International Commentary on Evidence 1; Laudan, 'The Elementary Epistemic Arithmetic of Criminal Justice' (n 119), in which Laudan argues

acquitting the guilty, on the one hand, whilst also factoring in the utility of convictions. The main factors to determine these costs and utilities are usually said to be the nature of the crime charged and the characteristics of the accused. For example, if the crime charged carries a very heavy sentence, it may be expected that the cost of convicting an innocent person will be considered higher than when only a small fine is in play. Conversely, the utility of convicting a defendant who has openly called for terrorism is said to be higher than locking up a retired grandmother. Other utilities, such as the deterrent effect of the criminal law, the desire to be 'tough on crime', or any other rationale one may think of as relevant in the context of international criminal justice,[121] may also play a role.

For example, Nancy Combs, who did much to expose the dismal quality of fact-finding by certain international tribunals, has tried to come up with a rational argument for why the beyond reasonable doubt standard should not be interpreted as strictly at the international level as before domestic courts. The starting point for her analysis is that standards of proof are inherently variable and that the characteristics of the defendant greatly influence how fact-finders understand the beyond reasonable doubt standard.[122] She argues that, since the former official position or institutional affiliation of international defendants will often suggest that they must have been involved with the commission of some crime, international fact-finders are 'apt to undervalue the harm associated with his wrongful conviction and overvalue the harm associated with his wrongful acquittal'.[123] In particular, she suggests that:

> [w]e may be justifiably less concerned about preventing the wrongful conviction of a defendant accused of an international crime because the nature of international crimes, their perpetration, and their subsequent investigation are apt to put the defendant's innocence in a different light from the innocence of a typical domestic defendant.[124]

Apart from invoking inferences from the official position of the accused, Combs identifies four other reasons for why it might be justifiable to convict international defendants despite the fact that the evidence does not show guilt to a high level of certainty.

First, Combs argues that the likelihood that the evidence is insufficient because the investigation was inadequate is greater in international cases than in domestic cases. In other words, the fact that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding of guilt that the relevant ratio is not how many innocent persons are falsely convicted, but rather the relation between the risk that an innocent person runs of being falsely convicted and the risk of being the victim of a crime committed by a person who was falsely acquitted. Given that international criminal justice is—at least in aspiration—exercised globally, it stands to reason that both the risk run by a random person of being falsely convicted of an international crime by the ICC is infinitesimally low. The more interesting question is how likely it is that the average global citizen will become the victim of an international crime committed by someone who has been falsely acquitted by an international court or tribunal. In other words, without information about how often acquitted international defendants go back to commit international crimes, it seems difficult to apply Laudan's formula in this context.

[121] See e.g. M Damaška, 'What is the Point of International Criminal Justice?' (2008) 83 Chicago-Kent Law Review 329; Jacobs (n 2) 1146–7.

[122] N Combs, Fact-Finding without Facts (New York: Cambridge University Press 2010) 351.

[123] Ibid. [124] Ibid., 353.

to a high level of certainty is assumed to be due to the inherent difficulties associated with international investigations and not due to the fact that the evidence simply does not exist.[125]

Second, Combs claims that even if the evidence is insufficient to prove that an international defendant committed a particular crime in the particular way alleged in the indictment, there is greater likelihood that he (as opposed to a domestic defendant) committed the same crime but in a different way.[126]

Third, Combs asserts that even if the international defendant did not commit the international crime he is charged with, there is a greater likelihood than in the domestic context that he committed some other crime.[127]

Fourth, Combs maintains that even if the international defendant did not personally commit a crime, there is still a high likelihood that he may still bear some moral culpability for acquiescing in crimes being committed or by benefiting from them ideologically.[128]

It is unclear what Combs' empirical basis is for making such sweeping claims. Judging by the context in which her study is set, i.e. the Rwandan genocide and events in Sierra Leone and East Timor, it may be asked to what extent the generalizations she proposes (assuming they are valid for these specific contexts) can be extrapolated to all international criminal cases. One may wonder, for example, whether the assumptions underlying her arguments would still be valid in a 'simple' war crimes case involving the prosecution of a British soldier for the mistreatment of prisoners in Iraq. Accordingly, it is probably wise not to take Combs' claim that wrongful convictions are always less costly in the international context for granted, let alone as universally applicable to all international cases.

However, apart from these 'substantive' arguments, Combs also offers reasons why wrongful acquittals of international defendants are more costly in the international context. Combs raises three arguments to support this claim.

First, she argues that international acquittals are likely to affect victims more profoundly than victims in the domestic context. The purported reason for this is that international victims often view acquittals through an ideological lens. Accordingly, when international defendants are acquitted on the basis of what are perceived as 'technicalities', the victim community is more likely to suspect the international jurisdiction of partiality.[129]

Second, Combs states that the cost of international acquittals is particularly high because it is very difficult to obtain the arrest and surrender of international criminals.[130]

Third, Combs worries that too many acquittals undermine international tribunals' 'very mission'. Accordingly, given the great financial, political, and diplomatic cost of international prosecutions, 'a substantial number of international acquittals—whether rightful or wrongful—could doom international justice entirely'.[131]

[125] Ibid. [126] Ibid., 355. [127] Ibid. [128] Ibid., 353–5.

[129] Ibid., 358. It is not entirely clear why this argument could not also work in the opposite direction, i.e. it is quite plausible that the supporters of someone who is convicted on the basis of a lowered standard of proof will consider this as proof of partiality on the part of the Court.

[130] Ibid. [131] Ibid., 357–8.

Whereas it is easy to see the merit of some of these arguments, one may ask whether they are really so important that they can justify putting potentially innocent defendants at higher risk of being falsely convicted. Conspicuously absent from Combs' argument is any serious consideration of the rights and interests of the accused. This betrays a rather utilitarian or consequentialist conception of criminal proceedings, whereby the interests of individual defendants is subordinated to the presumed greater good of having a 'well-functioning' system of criminal justice.[132] Indeed, regardless of the validity of Combs' arguments at the institutional level, the individual defendant will always be able to say that they do not concern her and that she should not become a 'martyr' for the institutional problems faced by international courts.[133] In the end, the question of how much risk the accused should bear will thus always come down to how much importance is attached to the presumption of innocence, the plight of individual innocent defendants and the possibility of a miscarriage of justice. To put matters in simpler terms: where to set the standard of proof reflects how seriously the system takes the individual and her rights and interests.[134] As H L Ho points out: 'The conviction of an innocent person, however unintentional, whatever the supposed social benefits, is intrinsically unjust. Any argument that ignores this moral fact is dangerously flawed.'[135]

This raises the following question: the Appeals Chamber has repeatedly held that 'ending impunity' is one of the overriding objectives of the ICC,[136] so if 'impunity' is seen as something to be avoided, it follows that the Appeals Chamber in all likelihood considers that the cost of false acquittals is high; must it therefore be expected that the Appeals Chamber will set the beyond reasonable doubt standard relatively low? After all, from a purely pragmatic point of view, impunity can be more efficiently addressed if it is easier to convict the guilty, even if this means that more innocent accused will be condemned as well.[137] In any case, it will be interesting to see how the Appeals [132] For a discussion and critique of this type of argument, see Roberts and Zuckerman (n 16) 344–60.

[133] In the eighteenth century, William Paley famously argued that jurors were too meek in the fight against crime and that 'he who falls by a mistaken sentence, may be considered as falling for his country'. W Paley, The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (Exshaw et al. 1785) 318, quoted in Ho (n 17) 183. However, as many have since pointed out, the military analogy is deeply flawed, as fallen soldiers are usually honoured for their sacrifice, whereas convicted criminals generally do not enjoy such respect from society.

[134] See Roberts and Zuckerman (n 16) 345. It also reflects the commitment to the social contract that the public authorities will not condemn and punish someone who has not herself breached the social contract. See Jackson and Summers (n 23) 203.

[135] Ho (n 17) 184.

[136] See e.g. Judgment on the appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009, para. 77.

[137] It can never be said, of course, that the convictions of those who were innocent contributed to the fight against impunity, as, by definition, there must be something punishable before there can be an impunity gap. This shows that arguments invoking the fight against impunity and similar slogans should be used with great caution. As a battle cry for more international justice, in the sense for bigger and stronger institutions, it may be entirely justified. However, justice is done one case at a time and it would be highly perilous if the call for more institutional capacity to tackle international crime were to be translated into a blunt call for more convictions. After all, ending impunity is only a meaningful endeavour if it is done in a just and fair manner.

Chamber will balance its unease about false acquittals against the concern for the plight of individual defendants and how it will fit all this with its earlier dictum that, at trial, 'certainty' of guilt is required.[138]

34.7 A Fixed or Variable Standard of Proof?

As the previous section has hopefully made clear, setting the criminal standard of proof at the right level depends on a number of factors, which represent as many variables. When the standard is set at a particular level, this is done on the basis of the typical or average value of these variables across all cases. For example, when determining the cost of false acquittals, a number of scenarios will be considered (e.g. the accused is an active commander in an ongoing conflict versus the accused has been apprehended ten years after the fact and no longer has any meaningful influence). In order to determine how important it is to avoid false acquittals in general, the decision-maker can either decide to rely on what she considers to be the most representative scenario, or she can attempt to define some average value. In any case, it will be clear that these typical/average values may differ considerably from the actual cost of false acquittals in specific cases. When that happens, the standard of proof is not attuned to the real interests of the case and may thus lead to unsatisfactory results. At the same time, it has been famously argued by Lord Denning, albeit in a discussion about the civil standard of proof, that 'in proportion as the crime is enormous, so ought the proof to be clear',[139] indicating that a higher standard of proof is required for more serious allegations. This is, in a nutshell, why it is argued by a number of scholars commenting at the national level[140] that the standard of proof should be variable, depending on the nature of the case or facts to be adjudicated.

Unfortunately, there is not enough space to explore the many empirical and theoretical issues related to this question in any depth. Nevertheless, two general points can be made. First, the wording of the standard of proof provides no indication that beyond reasonable doubt is intended to mean something different depending on the type of case or facts involved.[141] Yet, to the extent that the subjective approach is followed, variability of the standard of proof is built in. As adjudicators are free to set the standard of proof at a level which they deem appropriate,[142] they can adjust this in function of the gravity of the charges or the nature of the facts involved. Second, there are indications that other international courts do apply a variable standard of proof. For example, the ICJ has clearly indicated that it will be more demanding when the [138] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir', Al Bashir (n 9) para. 31.

[139] Court of Appeals, Bater v Bater [1951] P 35, 37.

[140] See e.g. Lillquist (n 116); Ho (n 17) 213–23.

[141] Although Ho notes that 'the language in which the criminal standard is expressed is open-textured. What standard is imported by the phrase "beyond reasonable doubt" depends on what is meant by reasonable, and it is only rational to determine what is reasonable with reference to the context'; Ho (n 17) 215–16.

[142] Cf., Australian Supreme Court, 'Jurymen themselves set the standard of what is reasonable in the circumstances'; Green v The Queen (n 27) 32–3.

facts are more serious.[143] Similarly, the ECtHR has remarked that 'the level of persuasion necessary for reaching a particular conclusion… [is] intrinsically linked to the specificity of the facts, the nature of the allegation made and the Convention right at stake'.[144] There are equally indications that before international criminal courts and tribunals the standard of proof is applied differently depending on the nature of the facts concerned. For example, when one analyses the type of evidence which is deemed sufficient to enter findings beyond reasonable doubt concerning facts pertaining to the contextual elements of the crimes charged, it is fairly obvious that a lower standard is applied than for facts pertaining directly to the criminal responsibility of the accused. And although the type of evidence admitted is as such not determinative of the stringency of the standard of proof applied, it is rather suggestive that both the ad hoc tribunals and the ICC significantly relax the requirements for testimonial evidence when the evidence is proffered in relation to facts that do not pertain directly to the acts and conduct of the accused.[145]

Assuming for the moment that the law permits the standard of proof to be applied in a flexible manner, the question arises whether there are any limitations in this regard. One important limitation appears to be that of non-discrimination. Indeed, it is one of the most fundamental precepts of procedural justice that like cases be treated alike, so it would be unacceptable to apply a different standard of proof to two persons who are accused of the same type of crime,[146] regardless of whether they are charged jointly or separately. Another basic limitation is that the beyond reasonable doubt standard may not be varied to such an extent that it overlaps with other standards. Indeed, varying the standard of proof may not result in applying a different standard of proof. As the drafters of the Rome Statute have introduced a number of different standards of proof in the Statute for different procedural stages,[147] it is not permissible to apply a different standard at trial than the one provided in Article 66(3). Any variation of the standard of proof must thus occur within the proper 'bandwidth' of the beyond reasonable doubt standard.

Whether or not it is appropriate to apply a variable standard of proof, and, if so, how flexible the standard should be and to which categories of facts it should apply, is a policy question. This chapter takes no position on this issue. Nevertheless, it is argued that, if a variable criminal standard of proof is permitted, it is of the utmost importance that there is maximum clarity and transparency about the scope and degree of permissible variation in the standard of proof.

[143] Judgment, Corfu Channel (United Kingdom v Albania), ICJ Reports 1949, at 17; Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v Serbia), ICJ Reports 2007, paras 209 and 422; A Riddell and B Plant, Evidence before the International Court of Justice (London: British Institute of International and Comparative Law 2009) 123–37.

[144] Nachova v Bulgaria, Application nos 43577/98 and 43579/98, European Court of Human Rights (Grand Chamber) 6 July 2005, para. 147.

[145] Rule 92 bis, ter, and quarter ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence, IT/32/Rev. 49 (as adopted on 11 February 1994, last amended on 22 May 2013); Rule 68 (as recently amended at the request of the Court) of the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, part II.A, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP).

[146] See e.g. R Dworkin, A Matter of Principle (New York: Oxford University Press 1985) 93.

[147] The most notable ones are contained in Arts 58, 61, and 66(3) of the Statute.

34.8 Conclusion

It is not the ambition of this contribution to offer a concrete suggestion about how the ICC should define the criminal standard of proof as laid down in Article 66(3) of the Statute. Rather, it is hoped that it has at least been demonstrated that, contrary to what is generally assumed, it is possible to define the criminal standard of proof relatively precisely. However, doing so requires a definition of the standard of proof to encompass not just a mental 'end-state' but also a reasoning process. The question is thus not whether the Court can define the criminal standard of proof, but rather whether it should do so.

As was seen, most domestic systems have adopted the subjective approach. However, it was shown that this approach presents a number of profound difficulties, not least that it makes rational discussion—and therefore meaningful appellate review—all but impossible. Yet, adopting the subjective approach may prove to be irresistible for the Court, because it offers the path of least resistance. Indeed, if the principled decision is made to go for a formal approach, it is no longer possible to hide behind vague concepts and general phrases. Instead, a number of difficult choices impose themselves. In the first place, it will be necessary to determine which method(s) of inductive reasoning must be applied by the fact-finder. Next, it will be necessary to determine whether beyond reasonable doubt should be a singular, uniform, standard that applies to all facts in issue or rather whether some variation is preferable. In the latter case, it is necessary to specify for which types of cases/facts such variation is allowed. Last but not least, it will be necessary to determine the level of certainty (either a single value or, in case variation is allowed, a bandwidth) that is required in order to satisfy the standard of proof. These are complex questions, which require a solid understanding of the epistemic models involved. As many lawyers are not trained in this field, they may find it challenging to navigate this unfamiliar and complex terrain and may prefer to seek refuge in the comfort of subjectivity.

However, the factor that is perhaps most likely to steer the ICC towards the subjective approach is that it gives judges maximum freedom to do what they think is right and just. Indeed, some may be wary of the perceived rigour that formal models impose. To the extent that formal methods of fact-finding eliminate purely impressionistic and intuitive fact-finding, they do limit the adjudicator's freedom. In particular, formal methods of fact-finding make it much harder for adjudicators to engage in 'holistic' fact-finding, a process whereby adjudicators contemplate the evidence 'as a whole' and draw overall conclusions from this,[148] which are then subsequently 'motivated' by accepting all evidence that is thought to confirm the overall conclusion and rejecting or explaining away anything that contradicts it.[149]

[148] Klamberg (n 8) 159 argues that 'the Court should not base its judgment on an "intuitive holistic evaluation" of the evidence submitted. Methods of evaluation may provide a check against the judge's intuition. It is a safeguard against cognitive bias, negligence and arbitrariness'.

[149] D Simon, 'A Third View of the Black Box: Cognitive Coherence in Legal Decision Making' (2004) 71 University of Chicago Law Review 511, whose research has shown that humans engage in a process of

This is not to suggest that the subjective approach systematically leads to incorrect or irrational decisions. Nevertheless, it is hard to deny that the subjective approach makes it much harder to identify and correct mistakes, simply because it offers no yardstick for what is reasonable and what is not in the context of fact-finding. Whereas judges and adjudicators should generally be trusted to carry out their mandate honourably and conscientiously, it may still seem rather odd for a modern judicial system to entrust one of its key tasks—the establishment of facts—to what is essentially a conceptual black box.

If one agrees with the quote from the late Professor Cohen at the very beginning of this chapter, it will be clear that such an approach is not suitable for the ICC. In the end, however, the Court is free to define the criminal standard as it sees fit. All options are still open in this regard. However, whatever model or definition of beyond reasonable doubt the Court may adopt, it will be a reflection of how the judges see themselves and how they conceive their role. Ultimately, the choice between a subjective or objective approach boils down to a question of trust. Do we trust the judges to act as rational agents, free from subconscious biases and immune to unreliable cognitive processes, or do we prefer them to explain their findings on the basis of a particular model of inductive reasoning? Justice is supposed to be blind. Does this mean that we must trust those who are elected to dispense it on behalf of the international community blindly as well?

what he calls 'reversed induction', whereby fact-finders seek to maximize the coherence of their findings by shifting their evaluation of the evidence, so that the elements that support the preferred finding are strongly endorsed and the elements that support an alternative finding are dismissed, rejected, or ignored. Crucially, this is a gradual process, in which the fact-finder changes her initial opinion about the strength of particular evidence in order to provide better support for the conclusion reached. Under this view, fact-finding is thus a bi-directional process, whereby the evidence influences the conclusion but the conclusion also influences the way the evidence is assessed.

35

Confirmation of Charges

*Ignaz Stegmiller

35.1 Introduction

The confirmation of charges procedure is a novelty that was introduced under the Rome Statute. The idea of a preliminary chamber dealing with the confirmation of the charges goes back to a French proposal and an Argentine proposal of 1996.[1] Predecessors, such as the ICTY and the ICTR, did not foresee a similar procedure.[2] The procedural systems at the ICTY and ICTR are more simplified and the confirmation of an indictment takes place 'in an ex parte hearing before a single judge, without any involvement of the Defence and is based only on the Prosecutor's allegations'.[3] However, as Ambos and Miller stated elsewhere, the ICTY and ICTR included some measures in their Rules of Procedure and Evidence (RPE) to streamline the time-consuming disclosure procedure.[4] The ICC, taking the experience of the ad hoc tribunals into consideration, combines confirmation and disclosure procedures and therefore regulates an intermediary phase between the investigation phase and the trial phase—the confirmation of charges hearing according to Article 61 of the Rome Statute.

In this chapter, I will shed some light on the relationship between pre-trial and trial proceedings. I will outline the proceedings regarding the newly introduced confirmation phase before addressing the different legal avenues for the Pre-Trial Chamber (PTC) in more detail (sections 35.2 and 35.3). Out of eight situations and 21 cases which have been brought before the ICC, the Court has issued confirmation of charges decisions against 15 individuals to date. Thereby, the Chambers have confirmed charges

* Ignaz Stegmiller is a post-doctoral researcher at the Franz von Liszt-Institute of the Justus Liebig University Giessen. He holds a doctoral degree in International Criminal Law from the Georg August University Göttingen. I would like to thank Alexander Koll and Christopher Giogios for their assistance.

[1] War Crimes Research Office ('WCRO'), The Confirmation of Charges Process at the ICC (October 2008) at 51 et seq., referring to the Draft Statute of the ICC: Working Paper submitted by France to the Preparatory Committee, A/AC.249/L.3, 6 August 1996, Art 10, and Working Paper submitted by Argentina on the Rules of Procedure to the Preparatory Committee, A/AC.249/L.6, 13 August 1996, R.61.

[2] R Cryer at al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure 2nd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2010) 460. The ICC uses the term 'charges' rather than indictment, C Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 319. For the drafting history of the provisions concerning the confirmation hearing, see K Shibahara and W Schabas, 'Article 61' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) paras 1 et seq.; WCRO, The Confirmation of Charges Process (n 1) 6–7, 44 et seq.

[3] M Miraglia, 'Admissibility of Evidence, Standard of Proof, and Nature of the Decision in the ICC Confirmation of Charges in Lubanga' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 489, 490.

[4] K Ambos and D Miller, 'Structure and Function of the Confirmation Procedure before the ICC from a Comparative Perspective' (2007) 7 International Criminal Law Review 335, 336 et seq.

against ten individuals and rejected charges against four.[5] In Gbagbo, the confirmation of charges hearing commenced in February 2013, but was later adjourned and the prosecutor was asked to provide further evidence.[6] The most important findings of mentioned decisions are taken into account when addressing sections 35.2 and 35.3, but issues of particular importance are dealt with separately. Section 35.4 covers the modification of legal findings by the Trial Chamber if it disagrees with the PTC's characterization during the confirmation hearing. Section 35.5 stretches the bow from the descriptive chapters on the confirmation procedure to the most pertinent question of the necessity and legitimacy of such an intermediary phase.

One view states that the confirmation hearing's principle aim is to prepare, streamline, and shorten the trial procedure.[7] However, in practice, the anticipated function as a preparation mechanism shows limited success and trial preparation is rather prolonged than shortened. In such a vein, Nerlich claims mixed success of the confirmation hearing and he calls for amendments of the Regulations of the Court.[8] The confirmation of charges hearing allegedly constitutes a 'mini-trial' with evidence being heard before the actual trial starts.[9] In accordance with this view, the confirmation hearing would need a refinement, giving more competencies to the PTC and allowing for a streamlined preparation of trial proceedings during and shortly after the confirmation decision.

Another view emphasizes the purpose of the confirmation of charges hearing as a control mechanism, so-called checks and balances, separating those cases and charges which should go to trial from those which should not.[10] Clearly unfounded charges

[5] Charges were confirmed in the Situation of the DRC against Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui (on trial, Ngudjolo's verdict was not guilty; an appeal by the OTP is pending), Germain Katanga; in the Situation of Darfur, Sudan, against Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain and Saleh Mohammed Jerbo Jamus (Jamus was declared dead and proceedings were terminated); in the Situation of the CAR, against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo; and in the Situation in Kenya, against William Samoei Ruto, Joshua Arap Sang, Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta, and Francis Kirimi Muthaura (the charges against Muthaura were later withdrawn by the prosecution). Charges were declined against Callixte Mbarushimana (DRC), Bahar Idriss Abu Garda (Darfur, Sudan), Henry Kiprono Kosgey, and Mohammed Hussein Ali (both Kenya).

[6] Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(i) Rome Statute, Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-432, PTC I, ICC, 3 June 2013. The decision was upheld by the Appeals Chamber in Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 3 June 2013 entitled 'Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(c)(i) Rome Statute', Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-572, AC, ICC, 16 December 2013.

[7] E Chaitidou, Initiative zu verfahrensrechtlichen Reformen des Internationalen Strafgerichtshofs, Expertentreffen am 14/15 Februara 2014, Berlin (copy on file with the author).

[8] V Nerlich, 'The Confirmation of Charges Procedure at the International Criminal Court, Advance or Failure?' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1339, 1354 et seq.

[9] Arguing against such allegations of a 'trial before the trial', Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red, PTC I, ICC, 8 February 2010, para. 39: 'The Chamber recalls that the confirmation hearing is neither a trial before the trial nor a mini-trial, and that "[t]he purpose of the confirmation hearing is limited to committing to trial only those persons against whom sufficiently compelling charges going beyond mere theory or suspicion have been brought. This mechanism is designed to protect the rights of the Defence against wrongful and unfounded charges"' (footnotes omitted); also, Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, para. 63.

[10] E Withopf, 'Confirmation of Charges, The Law and Practice of the International Criminal Court: Achievements, Impact and Challenges', 26 September 2012, The Hague (copy on file with the author).

by the prosecution should not proceed to trial and result in long-lasting proceedings, infringing upon the Defendants' rights and wasting resources. If this perception prevails, the confirmation hearing should be shortened and discharged of any time-consuming determinations.

The two views are not entirely antipodal. They just stress a different focal point for the confirmation hearing. Nevertheless, there is an inherent danger of anticipating trial proceedings in conducting a confirmation hearing, and the function of the procedure must be purified. Either way, the development of the confirmation hearing depends upon crystallizing its core and clarifying the PTCs' competencies.

35.2 Proceedings during the Confirmation of Charges Phase

Any time after the initiation of an investigation in accordance with Article 53 (1) of the Rome Statute, the prosecutor may seek a warrant of arrest if there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court, and if grounds for detention (to ensure appearance at trial, etc.) under Article 58 (1) of the Rome Statute are given. If the OTP concludes that there is a sufficient basis for prosecution in accordance with Article 53(2) of the Rome Statute and as soon as the person appears before the Court, the PTC sets a date for the confirmation hearing pursuant to Article 60(1) of the Rome Statute and Rule 121(1) of the RPE. The OTP must prepare a document containing the charges (DCC) in accordance with Regulation 52, provide a copy of this document to the named person and the PTC, and give information on the evidence for the purpose of the hearing no later than 30 days before the confirmation hearing takes place (Article 61(3) of the Rome Statute and Rule 121(3) of the RPE).[11] The document must set out (i) the name of the person and other relevant identifying information; (ii) a statement of facts; (iii) a legal characterization.[12] In other words, it is constituted of the facts and circumstances as well as their legal characterization. In accordance with Article 63(3) of the Rome Statute, disclosure obligations must further be fulfilled and the PTC shall hold status conferences to ensure a satisfactory disclosure of evidence that the prosecution intends to rely on at the hearing (Rule 121(2) of the RPE). This disclosure obligation entails exonerating evidence,[13] and most of the potentially exculpatory evidence ('the bulk') must be disclosed as soon as practicable before the hearing takes place:

> Therefore, except for exceptional circumstances which might justify subsequent isolated acts of investigation, the investigation must be completed by the time the [11] Shibahara and Schabas (n 2) paras 11–12; Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 320. The person must also be informed of the right to apply for interim release, cf. K Calvo-Goller, The Trial Proceedings of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2006) 170.

[12] Regulation 52 of the Regulations of the Court, ICC-BD/01-01-04. All regulations without further reference are those of the ICC Regulations of the Court.

[13] Art 67 (2) Rome Statute; Rules 76 and 77 RPE. In accordance with Art 54 (3) (e) Rome Statute, the Prosecutor may enter into agreements of confidentiality and not disclose certain evidence. However, this provision has to be interpreted narrowly and the excessive use of this provision has led to controversies in the Lubanga case, resulting in a provisional stay of proceedings. As the Chamber states, 'disclosure of exculpatory evidence in the possession of the prosecution is a fundamental aspect of the accused's right > confirmation hearing starts, and the Prosecution must be in possession or control of most, if not all, the potentially exculpatory materials which it must disclose under article 67(2) of the Statute before the start of the confirmation hearing.[14]

The broad disclosure obligations, in particular the 'bulk' rule and the necessity of so-called Evidence Charts, unnecessarily prolongs confirmation proceedings, it is not in conformity with the limited purpose of the hearing, and, most of all, it finds no basis in ICC law.[15]

The presiding judge of the Chamber determines how the hearing will be conducted, establishing the order and conditions for the presentation of evidence (Rule 122(1) of the RPE). In Lubanga, the following procedure was introduced: (i) reading out of the charges; (ii) opening statement by the prosecution, victims' representatives, and the defence; (iii) consideration of any matters relating to jurisdiction, admissibility, and other procedural matters; (iv) presentation by the prosecution of evidence; (v) presentation by the defence of evidence; (vi) closing statements by the prosecution, victims' representatives, and the defence.[16] For the presentation of evidence, the Chamber might also have to rule on the admissibility of evidence on a case-by-case basis.[17] It is worth noting that the confirmation hearing can take place without the person concerned being present. Under Rule 124(1) of the RPE, the person may waive this right and the PTC shall decide whether the hearing can be held in the absence of the person (Rules 124(2) and 125(1) of the RPE). In Banda Abakaer Nourain and Mohammed Jerbo Jamus, for example, both suspects waived their right to attend the

to a fair trial', see Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, TC I, ICC, 01/04-01/06-1401, 13 June 2008, para. 92.

[14] Decision on the final system of disclosure and the establishment of a timetable, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-102, PTC I, ICC, 15 May 2006, para. 131. The OTP is under an obligation to disclose all evidence it intends to rely on before the confirmation hearing and only the disclosure of a 'fraction of the overall potentially exculpatory materials in the possession or control of the Prosecution' might be delayed (ibid., para. 127). On the obligations to disclose exculpatory material, see also Decision Rejecting the Prosecution Urgent Request and Establishing a Calendar for the Disclosure of the Supporting Materials of the Prosecution Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Germain Katanga, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-5, PTC I, ICC, 6 July 2007, 10–11. However, this disclosure obligation relates only to the bulk of evidence ('the bulk rule') as stated by ICC case law and amounts to core evidence only, see, inter alia, Decision on Art 54(3)(e) Documents Identified as Potentially Exculpatory or Otherwise Material to the Defence's Preparation for the Confirmation Hearing, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-621, PTC I, ICC, 20 June 2008, paras 8 and 124. See further, WCRO, The Confirmation of Charges Process (n 1) 9–10, 26–7, 39 et seq.; Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 370; Ambos and Miller (n 4) 343–4.

[15] Withopf (n 10) 5–7.

[16] Decision on the schedule and conduct of the confirmation hearing, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-678, PTC I, ICC, 7 November 2006, Annex I; similarly Decision on the Schedule for the Confirmation Hearing, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-587, PTC I, ICC, 13 June 2008, Annex I. Pictures in the courtroom can only be taken at the beginning, cf. Order authorizing Photographs at the Hearing of 29 January 2007, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-795, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007.

[17] For the Lubanga hearing and the application of Art 69(7) Rome Statute, Rule 122 (9) RPE see Miraglia (n 3) 491 et seq.

confirmation hearing and the PTC was 'satisfied that the suspects [understood] their right to be present at the confirmation hearing as well as the consequences of waiving this right' under Rule 124(2) of the RPE.[18] In accordance with Regulation 53, the PTC shall deliver its decision within 60 days after the confirmation hearings ends. The trial phase can only begin once the charges are confirmed. Documents are maintained in a record of all proceedings by the Registry.[19]

Interlocutory appeals under Article 81(2)(d) of the Rome Statute against the confirmation decision are handled very reluctantly. Only in the case of Mbarushimana a leave to appeal by the prosecution was granted with regard to possible errors of law,[20] but the (negative) confirmation of charges decision was later upheld by the Appeals Chamber.[21] In other cases, appeals were not granted.[22] It is established practice by the Chambers that there is no direct right to appeal a confirmation of charges decision, as (i) the drafters intentionally excluded the decision from the categories of decisions which may be directly appealed before the Appeals Chamber; (ii) by its very nature, the decision is predicated upon an assessment of the evidence; and (iii) an appeal can only be granted under the requirements of Article 81(2)(d) of the Rome Statute and the existence of an error of law.[23] If one takes the purpose of judicial efficiency into account, the denial of a direct appeal appears consequential. Yet, if confirmation hearings rise to the level of a pre-'mini'-trial, setting the path for trial, and involve broad disclosure obligations and witness testimony, the denial of an appeal infringes upon the rights of the prosecution and defence. This shows how practice has deviated from the idea of the drafters, leading to broader confirmation hearings than expected. The law of the ICC might emerge differently than anticipated and that is inevitable to some extent. However, the purpose of confirmation hearings should be construed narrowly, primarily focusing on an efficient and timely control of charges. Therefore, a direct appeal is rightly denied and should not be included in the Rome Statute, but, in turn, judges need to exercise judicial self-restraint and issue brief confirmation decisions based on a very low evidentiary threshold.

[18] Decision on issues related to the hearing on the confirmation of charges, Banda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-103, PTC I, ICC, 17 November 2010, para.4. On the presence of the person concerned, Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 322 et seq.; Shibahara and Schabas (n 2) paras 7 et seq.; Ambos and Miller (n 4) 346 et seq.

[19] Rule 121 (10) RPE.

[20] Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the "Decision on the Confirmation of Charges"', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-487, PTC I, ICC, 1 March 2012.

[21] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 16 December 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-514, AC, ICC, 30 May 2012.

[22] Chaitidou (n 7) 5–6.

[23] Decision on the Defences' Applications for Leave to Appeal the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-399, PTC II, ICC, 9 March 2012, para. 16; Decision on the Prosecution and Defence applications for leave to appeal the Decision on the confirmation of charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-915, PTC I, ICC, 24 May 2007, paras 19–21; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor Against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-532, PTC II, ICC, 18 September 2009, paras 12 et seq.

35.3 Procedural Avenues for the Pre-Trial Chamber

At the hearing, the prosecutor must establish 'substantial grounds' to support each of his charges according to Article 61(5) of the Rome Statute. The Rome Statue contains different levels of suspicion: first, 'reasonable basis to believe' (Articles 15(3), (4), and 53(1)(a) of the Rome Statute), followed by 'sufficient basis' (Article 53(2) of the Rome Statute), 'reasonable grounds' (Article 58(1)(a) of the Rome Statute), and the already mentioned 'substantial grounds' (Article 61(5) of the Rome Statute). The highest standard is finally contained in Article 66(3) of the Rome Statute, which refers to 'beyond reasonable doubt' in order to secure a conviction. The drafters of the Rome Statute thus established progressively higher evidentiary thresholds in Articles 15, 58(1), 61(7), and 66(3) of the Rome Statute.[24] In fact, the 'reasonable basis' can be described as the first step of a five-stage stairway, which becomes stricter with every step taken towards trial and requires more profound evidence on each level.[25] In consequence, the threshold of 'substantial grounds to believe' is higher than the threshold required for the issuance of a warrant of arrest, but lower than the threshold required for the conviction of an accused.[26]

The standard of proof for the confirmation of charges hearing can be divided into 'sufficient evidence' and 'substantial grounds'.[27] It differs from the ad hoc tribunals, which mention the existence of a prima facie case,[28] and therefore, a comparison is unhelpful because the procedures are so disparate from each other.[29] However, the test should not be higher than a prima facie standard,[30] and, as outlined here, case law is ambiguous when it comes to exact determination of the definitions of the test.

On the one hand, in Lubanga, the PTC held that the 'purpose of the confirmation of charges hearing is limited to committing for trial only those persons against whom sufficiently compelling charges going beyond mere theory or suspicion have been brought' and, relying on internationally recognized human rights jurisprudence, [24] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, para. 40.

[25] See the figure at Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 339. In addition, the two stages of Art 53 must be taken into account.

[26] Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges, Gbagbo (n 6) para. 17; C Safferling, Internationales Strafrecht (Berlin: Springer 2011) 309.

[27] Miraglia (n 3) 494.

[28] Arts 18(4) and 19(1) Statute of the ICTY (adopted 25 May 1993 by UNSC Res 827, as amended on 7 July 2009 by Res 1877); Arts 17(4) and 18(1) Statute of the ICTR (adopted 8 November 1994 by UNSC Res 955, as amended on 16 December 2009 by Res 1901).

[29] Miraglia (n 3) 498; Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 21) para. 43: 'The confirmation of an indictment at the ICTY/ICTR is an ex parte procedure conducted in the absence of the defence by one judge. The confirmation of charges hearing, in comparison, was deliberately established as a hearing before a Pre-Trial Chamber of three judges at which the person charged has the right to be present and to contest the evidence and following which the Pre-Trial Chamber must assess the evidence. Such a process clearly requires the Pre-Trial Chamber to go beyond looking at the Prosecutor's allegations "on their face" as is done in confirming an indictment at the ICTY or ICTR.'

[30] Withopf (n 10) 9. Contrary, Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 21) para. 43, stating that the test goes beyond looking at allegations 'on their face'.

defined the evidentiary burden for the prosecution as 'concrete and tangible proof demonstrating a clear line of reasoning underpinning its specific allegations'.[31] The judges, in making this determination, refer to the principle of in dubio pro reo, which 'as a general principle in criminal procedure applies, mutatis mutandis, to all stages of the proceedings, including the pre-trial stage'.[32] However, the wording of 'concrete and tangible proof' suggests that the test is rather high.

On the other hand, PTCs pointed out that the standard of 'substantial grounds' is significantly lower in comparison to the trial stage and, as explicitly stated in Article 61(5) of the Rome Statute, the prosecutor 'may rely on documentary or summary evidence and need not call the witnesses expected to testify at the trial'.[33] But summary evidence is given a lower probative value, and statements of anonymous witnesses, for example, are 'evaluated on a case-by-case basis, according to whether the information contained therein is corroborated or supported by other evidence tendered into the case file'.[34] Due to the adversary nature of the procedure, the PTC's analysis must also consider the defence's allegations and evaluate their weight and persuasiveness.[35] In Withopf's view, the lack of clarity does not encourage the prosecutor to rely on summary evidence and almost forces the OTP to call witnesses, transforming the confirmation hearing into a 'mini-trial'.[36]

In conclusion, and reiterating the purpose of the confirmation of charges hearing, the suspect should be protected against wrongful prosecution, and judicial economy is to be ensured by distinguishing cases that should go to trial from those that should not.[37] Rather than becoming actively involved in the investigation, the PTC monitors the prosecutor's activities.[38] The test should thus amount to a very low threshold, minimize disclosure obligations for the purpose of what is necessary at this stage, and avoid delays.

On the basis of Article 61(7) of the Rome Statute and based on an evaluation of the submitted evidence, the PTC has three possibilities to conclude a confirmation of charges hearing: (i) confirm the charges; (ii) decline to confirm the charges; or

[31] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, paras 37–9; see also Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 9) para. 65; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011, paras 40–1; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009, para. 29; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda (n 9) paras 36–7; Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges, Gbagbo (n 6) para. 17; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 24) para. 40; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-382-Red, PTC II, ICC, 31 January 2012, para. 52. On the standards of proof, see further Miraglia (n 3) 494 et seq.; Nerlich (n 8) 1343.

[32] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 31) para. 53.

[33] In the same vein, see Corrigendum of the 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-121-Corr-Red, 8 March 2011, para. 40.

[34] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda (n 9) para. 52.

[35] Miraglia (n 3) 495; Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 21) para. 40.

[36] Withopf (n 10) 8.

[37] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 24) para. 40.

[38] WCRO, The Confirmation of Charges Process (n 1) 58.

(iii) adjourn the hearing and request the prosecutor to consider providing further evidence or conducting further investigations, or, alternatively, amending a charge if the evidence points towards a different crime within the jurisdiction of the Court. Furthermore, the OTP might decide to withdraw charges.

35.3.1 Confirm the charges

For confirmation of charges, the prosecution presents evidence that the PTC must find sufficient to establish substantial grounds to believe that the person committed the alleged crime(s). During this hearing, the Chamber also declares specific evidence to be admissible or inadmissible, and values the probative value for the confirmation hearing.[39] If the charges are confirmed, the record of proceedings is transmitted to the Presidency of the Court and the case is assigned to a Trial Chamber.[40] Appeal is, in principle, not allowed.[41] As common practice, the prosecution must further draft a post-confirmation DCC.[42] This updated, and if the case may be, amended document shall be read out at the beginning of the trial.[43] One danger inherent to the confirmation of charges hearing can be seen in the 'strong presumption of the person's guilt even before the trial began',[44] which would violate Article 66 of the Rome Statute. However, as discussed in the following section,[45] safeguards exist to prevent a 'trial before the trial' and the confirmation of charges hearing offers an additional filter for unfounded charges.[46] This notwithstanding, the signal of a confirmed charge points in the direction of conviction and endangers shifting the burden from the prosecutor to the accused to prove his/her innocence.[47]

35.3.2 Decline the charges

The PTC may also confirm charges that reach the required threshold, but decline other charges of the DCC that do not.[48] In particular, the PTC in Bemba rejected the [39] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 31) paras 154 et seq.; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 9) paras 72 et seq.; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 24) paras 54 et seq.

[40] Art 61 (11) Rome Statute, Rules 130, 131 RPE; see, for example, Decision constituting Trial Chamber I and referring to it the case of The Prosecutor v Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-842, Presidency, ICC, 6 February 2007.

[41] Shibahara and Schabas (n 2) para. 18. Appeals under Art 82 (1) (d) Rome Statute are allowed for errors in law, but the review is corrective in nature and not de novo, Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 21) para. 15.

[42] See, inter alia, Order for the prosecution to file an amended document containing the charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1548, TC I, ICC, 9 December 2008; Order for the prosecution to file an updated document containing the charges, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-450, TC V, ICC, 5 July 2012. These orders are based on Arts 64 (8) (a), 67 (1), 64 (2), and 64 (6) (f) Rome Statute.

[43] Art 64 (8) (a) Rome Statute.

[44] Calvo-Goller (n 11) 171 with fn. 780.

[45] See section 35.5.

[46] Ambos and Miller (n 4) mention two important safeguards: (i) the summary character and low threshold of the proceedings; and (ii) the different composition of the PTC and the Trial Chamber.

[47] In contradiction to Art 66 (2) Rome Statute.

[48] In Katanga and Ngudjolo, for example, most charges were confirmed, but some were declined, cf. Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 9) 207 et seq.

practice of cumulative accusations and therefore dismissed some charges.[49] To date, charges against four persons were declined entirely because there was no sufficient evidential basis for the attribution of criminal conduct to these suspects and thus no individual criminal responsibility.[50] If charges are not confirmed, any previous arrest warrant also ceases to have effect.[51]

35.3.3 Adjourn the hearing

The PTC may adjourn the hearing and request the prosecutor to either (i) provide further evidence or conduct further investigations, or (ii) amend the charges because submitted evidence appears to establish a different crime.

In Gbagbo, the PTC made use of the first option under Article 61(1)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute and adjourned the hearing. The Chamber particularly discussed the difficulty of reliance on anonymous hearsay evidence in documentary evidence, its lower probative value,[52] as well as the problematic and heavy reliance on NGO reports and press articles with regard to key elements:

> Such pieces of evidence cannot in any way be presented as the fruits of a full and proper investigation by the Prosecutor in accordance with article 54 (1) (a) of the Statute. Even though NGO reports and press articles may be a useful introduction to the historical context of a conflict situation, they do not usually constitute a valid substitute for the type of evidence that is required to meet the evidentiary threshold for the confirmation of charges.[53]

Due to the evidence submitted, the Chamber was not in a position to make a definite finding about the threshold element of crimes against humanity (existence of an attack and the policy requirement).[54] When summary evidence is insufficient, though, the Chamber needs to reject the charges, but may adjourn the hearing and give the prosecutor more time to provide further evidence.[55]

The Chambers may further use Article 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Rome Statute to request the prosecutor to amend the charges. An amendment can take place before or after the [49] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Bemba (n 31) paras 72, 190, 200 et seq., 302. The appeal by the OTP was rejected, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Leave to Appeal, Bemba (n 23) para. 54 (on the practice of cumulative charges). Critical and favouring cumulative charging, WCRO, The Practice of Cumulative Charging at the ICC (May 2010) 11 et seq. See further Cryer et al. (n 2) 458 et seq.

[50] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 31) 149 (Judge Monageng dissenting); Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda (n 9) 97; Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 24) paras 293 et seq. (charges against Kosgey declined, at 138); Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali (n 31) paras 420 et seq. (charges against Ali declined, at 154).

[51] Art 61 (10) Rome Statute.

[52] Note, however, that rules regarding orality in the pre-trial phase are more relaxed, Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 21) para. 45.

[53] Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges, Gbagbo (n 6) paras 28 et seq.

[54] Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges, Gbagbo (n 6) paras 22 and 36.

[55] Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges, Gbagbo (n 6) para. 37, referring to Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 21), para. 48.

hearing in accordance with Article 61(4) and 61(9) of the Rome Statute respectively.[56] The OTP may amend the charges up to 15 days before the hearing and must inform the person thereof (Article 61(4) of the Rome Statute and Rule 121(5) of the RPE). On its own initiative, the prosecutor may also amend the charges after they have been confirmed, but only before the trial has begun and with the permission of the PTC (Article 61(9) of the Rome Statute and Rule 128 of the RPE).[57] The amendment under Article 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Rome Statute is initiated by the PTC, but it must be borne in mind that the PTC cannot modify the charges by itself. The PTC 'may request the prosecution to consider amending a charge. Importantly, it is the prosecution which would then amend such a charge, not the Pre-Trial Chamber'.[58] On the other hand, the OTP needs the permission of the PTC to amend charges after confirmation has taken place:

> Before the confirmation hearing, the Prosecutor may continue his investigation, amend or withdraw charges without the permission of the Pre-Trial Chamber. This flexibility of the Prosecutor is more limited after the confirmation of the charges with respect to the amendment, addition or withdrawal of charges: pursuant to article 61 (9) of the Statute the Prosecutor may amend the charges after their confirmation only with the permission of the Pre-Trial Chamber; in order to add additional charges or substitute charges with more serious charges, a new confirmation hearing must be held; withdrawal of charges after the commencement of the trial is only possible with the permission of the Trial Chamber.[59]

Ambos argues that the Chamber circumvented asking the OTP for an amendment in the Bemba case and avoided an adjournment by amending the mode of liability proprio motu and by judicial fiat.[60] From a formalistic point of view, and, moreover, taking the previous adjournment by PTC III[61] and the OTP's second version of the charges

[56] These two stages must be distinguished carefully, Corrigendum to 'Decision on the "Prosecution's Request to Amend the Final Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute"', Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-700-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 21 March 2013, para. 19.

[57] Decision on the 'Prosecution's Request to Amend the Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-859, PTC II, ICC, 16 August 2013.

[58] Decision on the content of the updated document containing the charges, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-584, TC V, ICC, 28 December 2012, para. 19.

[59] Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81 (2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006, para. 53; similarly, Corrigendum to Decision on the Prosecution's Request to Amend the Final Updated Document Containing the Charges, Muthaura and Kenyatta (n 56) para. 19: 'The insertion of the phrase "with permission of the Pre-Trial Chamber" in paragraph 9 makes clear that the Prosecutor is not allowed to proceed with an amendment of one or more of the charges confirmed, without a prior approval from the Chamber. Thus, the Chamber's permission is conditio sine qua non for any amendment to the charges at this stage.'

[60] K Ambos, 'Critical Issues in the Bemba Confirmation Decision' (2009) 22 Leiden Journal of International Law 715, 724.

[61] PTC III had already made use of Art 61(1)(c)(ii) Rome Statute before and adjourned the hearing for addressing Art 28 Rome Statute, cf. Decision Adjourning the Hearing pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(ii) Rome Statute, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-388, PTC III, ICC, 3 March 2009.

into consideration, which contains both co-perpetration and command responsibility,[62] this is not the case. The PTC confirmed some charges and declined other charges within its competence of Article 61(7) of the Rome Statute. The judges might yet show a general tendency to avoid the time-consuming amendment of charges by adjournment. Similarly to the mentioned Bemba case, the question of whether the Chamber is required to adjourn the hearing and request the OTP to amend charges arose in the Lubanga case.[63] In that case, the Chamber addressed the legal question of an adjournment in the context of qualifying the armed conflict (non-international as considered by the OTP in the DCC, or international as the PTC later concluded with regard to Uganda's involvement in Ituri from July 2002 to June 2003).[64] Since, in the view of the Chamber, the same conduct was criminalised under both provisions (Article 8(2)(b)(xvi) and Article 8(2)(e)(vii) of the Rome Statute), whether committed in a non-international or international conflict, the judges came to the conclusion that an adjournment and request for amendment were unnecessary.[65] After the confirmation of charges, the Trial Chamber instructed both parties to prepare their cases on the basis of both possibilities, an international or non-international armed conflict:

> The parties and the participants are on notice that this is an issue that may arise and they should prepare their cases on the basis that the Bench may decide that the first group of three charges encompass both international and internal armed conflicts.[66]

The Trial Chamber, applying Regulation 55 of the Court Regulations, later changed the legal characterization of the facts to the extent that the armed conflict was deemed non-international in character.[67] Rather than amending the charges to one particular legal qualification at the early confirmation hearing, a flexible approach is possible due to Regulation 55, which allows for a different legal characterization of facts as long as the rights of the defence are protected.[68] It gives the ICC judges a necessary tool for correctives. However, they should not overuse the mechanism and should bear its exceptional nature in mind.[69]

[62] Prosecution's Submission of Amended Document Containing the Charges, Amended List of Evidence and Amended In-Depth Analysis Chart of Incriminatory Evidence, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-395, OTP, ICC, 30 March 2009.

[63] Shibahara and Schabas (n 2) para. 19; WCRO, The Confirmation of Charges Process (n 1) 73 et seq.

[64] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 31) paras 200 et seq., and para. 220.

[65] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga (n 31) para. 204.

[66] Decision on the status before the Trial Chamber of the evidence heard by the Pre-Trial Chamber and the decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber in trial proceedings, and the manner in which evidence shall be submitted, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1084, TC I, ICC, 13 December 2007, para. 49.

[67] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, 14 March 2012, paras 566–7, and para. 1359.

[68] Regulation 55 is further addressed in section 35.4. On the difference between amendment and notice under Regulation 55, see Decision on applications for notice of possibility of variation of legal characterization, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1122, TC V(a), ICC, 12 December 2013, para. 39.

[69] See, the overly restrictive, but rightly recalling the exceptional nature of Regulation 55, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Cuno Tarfusser, Judgment on the appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the decision of Trial Chamber II of 21 November 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3363, 27 March 2013, 40 et seq., and para. 21 ('Judgment on the appeal with regard to Regulation 55, Katanga').

35.3.4 Withdrawal of charges

Proceedings can also be terminated by a withdrawal of charges, either before the confirmation hearing pursuant to Article 61(4) of the Rome Statute, or after the commencement of trial pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Rome Statute. If a trial has already started, the latter alternative foresees permission of the Trial Chamber. Neither provision explicitly addresses the withdrawal of charges after the decision to confirm charges, but before the actual commencement of trial. This intermediate time period might take several years, and the question of a withdrawal became practically relevant in the Muthaura case in which the prosecution lost its key witness and therefore stated:

> While the evidence presented during the 2011 confirmation hearing was sufficient for the Pre-Trial Chamber to commit Mr Muthaura to trial under the article 61(7) 'substantial grounds' standard, the evidence has since evolved, and the Prosecution does not consider that there is sufficient evidence at present to prove the charges against Mr Muthaura beyond a reasonable doubt.[70]

The Trial Chamber endorsed the interpretation of 'commencement of trial' as stated in Lubanga in the sense that it refers to the 'true opening of the trial when the opening statements, if any, are made prior to the calling of witnesses'.[71] It thus identified the problem that, at the present stage, the case was in a transition phase not squarely addressed by the relevant provisions. The judges granted the withdrawal pursuant to Article 64(2) of the Rome Statute because the defence did not contest the withdrawal.[72]

35.4 Subsequent Modification of the Legal Characterization

The determination of the underlying facts and the legal characterization thereof is of particular importance for trial. By issuing the confirmation decision, the PTC already frames the outer limits of the factual basis and, moreover, it provides a first authoritative legal characterization. While Regulation 55 of the Court Regulations allows the Trial Chamber to alter previous legal findings, the factual basis may not be changed in the same manner: 'Regulation 55 (2) and (3) of the Regulations of the Court may not be used to exceed the facts and circumstances described in the charges or any amendment thereto.'[73]

[70] Prosecution notification of withdrawal of the charges against Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-687, OTP, ICC, 11 March 2013, para. 10.

[71] Decision on the withdrawal of charges against Mr Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-696, TC V, ICC, 18 March 2013, para. 10; see also Decision on the status before the Trial Chamber of the evidence, Lubanga (n 66) paras 39–40.

[72] Decision on the withdrawal of charges, Muthaura and Kenyatta (n 71) para. 11.

[73] Judgment on the appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts may be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, TC I, ICC, 8 December 2009, para. 1 ('Judgment on the appeals with regard to Regulation 55, Lubanga'). The question arose as victims applied for the inclusion of sexual slavery into the charges, cf. Joint Application of the Legal Representatives of the Victims for the Implementation of the Procedure under Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1891, Legal Representatives of Victims, ICC, 22 May 2009.

In accordance with Regulation 55, the Trial Chamber may modify the legal characterization of facts in its final verdict (paragraph 1), or at any time during trial upon notification of the participants (paragraphs 2 and 3).[74] However, under Article 74(2) of the Rome Statute, the Trial Chamber 'shall not exceed the facts and circumstances described in the charges and any amendments of the charges'. Thus, the document containing the charges and the decision to confirm the charges limit the factual basis for trial.[75] Other facts can only be added by the procedure under Article 61(9) of the Rome Statute.[76] Facts that were not charged can evidently not lead to a conviction of the accused.[77] A modification of the legal characterization is, however, based on an argumentum e contrario reading of Article 74(2) of the Rome Statute, not ruled out.[78] To what extent a legal re-characterization alters the facts and circumstances must be decided on a case-by-case basis, because any change in characterization results in a change of narrative to a certain extent.[79]

In the ICC's first verdict in Lubanga, the Trial Chamber made use of Regulation 55 and changed the legal characterization of the context element for war crimes.[80] Complex modification procedures based on this regulation were also initiated in the cases Bemba, Katanga and Chui, Ruto and Sang, and Kenyatta.[81] Mostly in these cases the form of participation (Articles 25 and 28 of the Rome Statute) was in question and alternative modes of liability were then proposed by the judges. It must be noted that, under Regulation 55, the judges can also sever the charges. If they do so, the notice should be given at the earliest opportunity, but a re-characterization at the deliberations stage after the evidence has been heard is not incompatible with Regulation 55(2) ('at any time during the trial').[82] Moreover, the stringent safeguards of Regulation [74] For the drafting history of Rule 55 and Art 74(2), see Judgment on the appeals with regard to Regulation 55, Lubanga (n 73) paras 70–1, and 91; C Stahn, 'Modification of the Legal Characterisation of Facts in the ICC System: A Portrayal of Regulation 55' (2005) 16 Criminal Law Forum 1, 2 et seq.

[75] See, inter alia, Decision on the temporary suspension of the proceedings pursuant to Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court and related procedural deadlines, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2480, TC III, ICC, 13 December 2012, para. 10.

[76] Judgment on the appeals with regard to Regulation 55, Lubanga (n 73) para. 94.

[77] Nerlich (n 8) 1348.

[78] Judgment on the appeals with regard to Regulation 55, Lubanga (n 73) para. 93.

[79] A change in the narrative does not per se exceed the facts and circumstances described in the charges, see Judgment on the appeal with regard to Regulation 55, Katanga (n 69) para. 58. The issue will, most certainly, be revisited after the final verdict. For the Trial Chamber, see further the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Decision on the implementation of regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and severing the charges against the accused persons, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012, 33 et seq., paras 18 et seq., para. 20: 'Charges therefore constitute a narrative in which each material fact has a particular place. . . . Taking an isolated material fact and fundamentally changing its relevance by using it as part of a different narrative would therefore amount to a "change in the statement of facts" ' (footnote omitted).

[80] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga (n 67) paras 523 et seq, para. 1359: 'Pursuant to Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, the Chamber modifies the legal characterisation of the facts to the extent that the armed conflict relevant to the charges was non-international in character from early September 2002 to 13 August 2003.' Thereto, K Ambos, 'The First Judgment of the International Criminal Court (Prosecutor v Lubanga): A Comprehensive Analysis of Legal Issues' (2012) 12 International Criminal Law Review 115, 128–31.

[81] For an analysis see WCRO, Regulation 55 and the Rights of the Accused at the ICC (October 2013).

[82] Judgment on the appeal with regard to Regulation 55, Katanga (n 69) paras 14–24; see also the Trial Chamber's position, Decision on the implementation of regulation 55, Katanga (n 79) paras 15 et seq.

55(2) and (3) for the protection of the rights of the accused must be adhered to and the Chamber must implement safeguards depending on the circumstances of the case.[83] It is too restrictive to interpret Regulation 55 in such a narrow way—as the dissenting opinion of Judge Cuno Tarfusser argues—that it allows only for changes for the form of participation from Article 25 to Article 28 of the Rome Statute and vice versa.[84] The question of altering the modes of participation emerged because the PTCs do not generally confirm charges on alternative modes of liability, a practice which the ad hoc tribunals approached differently.[85]

The interplay between narrowing a case at the confirmation hearing and correcting the practice of limited charges by using Regulation 55 requires careful attention. The provision is based on the iura noverit curia principle and the ICC departs from the model followed by the ad hoc tribunals where legal characterizations are mostly binding upon the Trial Chamber.[86] It has been claimed that Regulation 55 should not be overused and should be limited to exceptional circumstances, and, in turn, confirmation decisions should leave more flexibility to charging.[87] It is self-evident that a legal characterization by the PTC cannot bind the Trial Chamber, taking Article 74 of the Rome Statute and the judges' impartial evaluation into consideration. Detailed legal discussions by the PTC have been criticized as exceeding its competence,[88] bearing in mind that profound reasoning might sometimes be necessary to determine 'substantial grounds'. However, the limits of the PTC are framed by exactly this standard of 'substantial grounds' and should therefore not enter into a fundamental legal discourse, this being the domain of the Trial Chamber and Appeals Chamber.[89] The PTC has to determine whether the presented charges can proceed on trial—nothing less, but nothing more. While, as a matter of fact, a reasoned decision by the PTC for the confirmation of charges influences further trial proceedings simply because of its existence, one should not go as far as Miraglia, who questions whether a reasoned statement of findings by the PTC is necessary at all and wants to protect the 'virginity' of the trial judge.[90] For the sake of transparency and checks and balances, the PTC should issue a well-reasoned decision to the public. Regulation 55 safeguards the impartiality of the trial judges and ensures that the legal determination of the [83] Judgment on the appeal with regard to Regulation 55, Katanga (n 69) paras 87 et seq. On the safeguards see also the Dissenting opinion by Judge Van den Wyngaert, Decision on the implementation of regulation 55, Katanga (n 79) paras 8, 27 et seq.

[84] Dissenting Opinion Judge Tarfusser, Judgment on the appeal with regard to Regulation 55, Katanga (n 69) paras 10 et seq.

[85] See e.g. Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Bemba (n 31) 184 et seq. Further Dissenting Opinion by Judge Van den Wyngaert, Decision on the implementation of regulation 55, Katanga (n 79) para. 5; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Summons to Appear for William Samoei Ruto, Henry Kiprono Kosgey, and Joshua Arap Sang, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1, PTC II, ICC, 8 March 2011, para. 36: 'In particular, the Chamber is not persuaded that it is best practice to make simultaneous findings on modes of liability presented in the alternative. A person cannot be deemed concurrently as a principal and an accessory to the same crime.'

[86] Cryer et al. (n 2) 457–8.

[87] WCRO, Regulation 55 (n 81) 2.

[88] Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 343.

[89] Similarly, Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 343.

[90] Miraglia (n 3) 498 et seq.; similarly, but more differentiated Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 337.

PTC does not prejudice trial proceedings. It is an important new procedural tool and truly 'reflects specific structural developments within the international criminal law system'.[91]

The re-characterization of legal determinations is inherent to the function of the Trial Chamber. The trial judges are obliged to base their evaluation only on the evidence submitted and discussed at the trial stage,[92] thus the factual evidence must be re-submitted at the trial stage and cannot be anticipated by the confirmation hearing, and the same applies to the legal findings. The judges are thus not bound to the legal evaluation either by the OTP or the PTC. With regard to an early modification of charges by the PTC itself, applying the iura noverit curia principle to the confirmation stage is worthy of discussion,[93] but, in the view of the author, circumvents the carefully drafted system of Article 67(7) of the Rome Statute. The PTC must adjourn and ask the prosecutor for an amendment.[94] A functional approach rules out a transfer of Regulation 55 to the confirmation hearing.[95] Nevertheless, the question addressed by Ambos and Miller as well as Safferling goes to the very heart of the problematic modification of charges: the balance between crystal-clear charges for the defendant and legal re-determinations by the judges. The interplay between the confirmation of charges hearing, amendments of the charging document, and subsequent re-characterizations under Regulation 55 needs further fine-tuning by case law, and Chambers should carefully learn from the delays in Lubanga, Bemba, and most obviously in Katanga.

35.5 Conclusion: The Necessity of an Intermediary Filter Mechanism for Complex International Criminal Trials

Confirmation of charges proceedings are complex and require resources. The track record of the ICC shows nine proceedings with 21 persons having been conducted to date,[96] with more cases, especially Gbagbo, in the docks. Proceedings from the first appearance before the Court until the actual decision after the confirmation hearing last on average ten months.[97] It is interesting to note that proceedings after the decision [91] Stahn (n 74) 28. [92] Art 74 (2) Rome Statute. [93] Ambos and Miller (n 4) 360.

[94] See section 35.3.3.
[95] Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 344 with fns 138 and 139.
[96] See (n 5); also Nerlich (n 8) 1345 et seq.
[97] About ten months (20 March 2006–29 January 2007) in Lubanga, Case Information Sheet, 13 March 2012 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-DRC-01-006/12); almost one year (22 October 2007–26 September 2008) in Katanga, Case Information Sheet, 25 January 2013 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-DRC2-03-005/13); 8 months (11 February 2008–26 September 2008) in Ngudjolo, Case Information Sheet, 25 January 2013 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-DRC2-06-002/13); almost one year (4 July 2008–15 June 2009) in Bemba, Case Information Sheet, 15 June 2012 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-CAR-01-009/12); 11 months (18 January 2011–16 December 2011) in Mbarushimana, Case Information Sheet, 27 March 2012 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-DRC-04-003/11); almost one year (26 March 2013–February 2014) in Ntaganda, Case Information Sheet, 6 February 2014 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-DRC-02-004/14). The time period was just slightly shorter in cases of summons to appear/voluntary appearances: nine months (17 June 2010–7 March 2011) in Banda, Case Information Sheet, 18 October 2013 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-SUD-04-003/13); ten months (7 April 2011–23 January 2012) in Ruto and Sang, Case Information Sheet, 18 September 2013 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-KEN-01-012/13); ten months (8 April 2011–23 January 2012) in Kenyatta, Case Information Sheet, 4 February 2014 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-KEN-02-010/14); 9 months (18 May 2009–8 February 2010) in Abu Garda, Case has been rendered until the trial finally commences are significantly longer (more than a year and a half).[98] Taking pending cases into consideration, the time period will increase rather than decrease, as the commencement of the trial in Kenyatta is rather unclear.[99] Moreover, the trial date for Abakaer Nourain was scheduled for 5 May 2014, and by that date more than three years since the decision to confirm the charges would have elapsed.[100] In the latter case, particularly issues of disclosure (handling of confidential information; adequate defence preparation; and disclosure of potentially exculpatory evidence) and finding interpreters into Zaghawa for trial have led to an extraordinary long pre-trial phase,[101] but legality and efficiency concerns with regard to such a long process remain.

The first question is whether the confirmation hearing as such prolongs the whole process due to its inefficiency, or whether it is a necessary, additional procedural filter mechanism that assists in the preparation of trials and ensures due process rights. Nerlich holds the view that the success of confirmation hearings is a mixed one: the objective to filter out cases of weak evidence and protecting suspects from unnecessary exposure to trial is mostly achieved, but the 'linkage' phase contributes very little to the preparation of trial.[102] As shown earlier, Trial Chambers consume more than one and a half years on average to commence trials even after and in addition to the confirmation of charges hearing. The contribution by the PTCs to prepare a smooth trial, to streamline, and to shorten the length of further proceedings may therefore rightly be questioned. Benefits with regard to disclosure of evidence and participation of victims are not as significant as one would wish them to be.[103] When it comes to the question of necessity of the confirmation hearing, the author thus agrees that the process is a useful tool that contributes to upholding the rights of the suspect. Abolishing the confirmation phase is not an option and is rather unrealistic.[104] In any event, a new procedure of checks and balances for the DCC would have to be developed.

Information Sheet, 15 June 2012 (ICC-PIDS-CIS-SUD-03-002/10); this finding does not take the Gbagbo case into consideration, where a final decision has not yet been issued. Because of the adjournment in the latter case, the time period will be significantly longer.

[98] Nerlich (n 8) 1346, who observes Lubanga, Katanga, Ngudjolo, and Bemba. The same applies to the case Ruto and Sang, were it took one year and eight months (23 January 2012–10 September 2013) to commence the trial, cf. Ruto and Sang, Case Information Sheet (n 97).

[99] In the Kenyatta case, the opening of the trial has been vacated after two years have passed since the decision confirming the charges, cf. Order vacating trial date of 5 February 2014, convening a status conference, and addressing other procedural matters, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-886, TC V(b), ICC, 23 January 2014.

[100] Decision concerning the trial commencement date, the date for final prosecution disclosure, and summonses to appear for trial and further hearings, Banda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-455, TC IV, ICC, 6 March 2013, para. 25.

[101] Ibid., paras 11–20; see also Public redacted 'Decision on the Defence request for termination of proceedings', Banda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-535-Red, TC IV, ICC, 30 January 2014.

[102] Nerlich (n 8) 1354.

[103] Nerlich (n 8) 1354. With regard to disclosure, the exact timing and comprehensiveness at the pre-trial stage was disputed during the drafting process, cf. WCRO, The Confirmation of Charges Process (n 1) 59. The obligations at the pre-confirmation stage vis-à-vis disclosure after the hearing remains undecided by case law and, to some extent, contradictory, see Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 370.

[104] Nerlich (n 8) 1355.

The second, follow-up question relates to the application and timing of the confirmation of charges hearing. In this regard, Nerlich's view to hold the hearing at a very late stage, as the first chapter of a trial proper, and mainly for trial preparation is not entirely convincing.[105] The WCRO's criticism, calling for an acceleration of disclosure, also does not cover the whole picture.[106] While the aim to achieve a better trial preparation is noteworthy,[107] this, in the author's view, is not the main objective of the confirmation hearing. Moreover, disclosure obligations take place at the pre-confirmation stage and after the confirmation hearing has taken place for the preparation of trial proceedings.[108] The pre-trial judges primarily review the prosecutor's charges vis-à-vis the existing evidence, and they do not arrange for the subsequent trial. They can assist in the preparation by streamlining further proceedings, but should under no circumstances anticipate trial proceedings. While the confirmation hearing is not meant to constitute a 'mini-trial' or pre-adjudicate guilt or innocence,[109] the detailed decisions of PTCs have already been criticized as potentially affecting the impartiality of the trial judges.[110] A late timing of the hearing entails inherent dangers of impartiality and interference. The confirmation hearing would be downgraded to a status conference for the preparation of trial, and the evidentiary basis would be upgraded from a very low threshold of 'substantial grounds to believe' to something that already screens all the available evidence vis-à-vis its value at trial. The line of a full trial and the confirmation of charges might be further blurred; a tendency that has already found its way into the ICC's practice if one takes into consideration the detailed legal discussions during confirmation hearings.[111] Moreover, the argument that the confirmation hearing should be held after the investigation is fully concluded[112] does not support a late timing of the hearing. Certainly, investigations might not automatically end with the confirmation of charges,[113] but should ideally be concluded by the time the hearing takes place,[114] which only implies that the prosecution should follow a regular pattern of proceedings: after initiating a formal investigation (Article 53(1) of the Rome Statute), the prosecution arrives at a decision to prosecute a certain person (Article 53(2) of the Rome Statute). This might coincide with, or follow up on, an arrest warrant and the initial appearance. From the wording 'to initiate a prosecution' ('upon investigation'), it is clear that under ordinary circumstances, the main part of the investigation should be concluded. The prosecutor then issues the documents containing the charges in accordance with [105] Nerlich (n 8) 1356.

[106] WCRO, The Confirmation of Charges Process (n 1) 62 et seq.

[107] Time-consuming discussions about disclosure might be avoided at the trial stage, Ambos and Miller (n 4) 348 with fn. 58; see also Chaitidou (n 7) 1–6.

[108] The past-confirmation preparation of the trial consumes significantly more time and delays proceedings.

[109] Withopf (n 10) 1.

[110] Cryer et al. (n 2) 461 with fn. 270; Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 337.

[111] See above section 35.4. [112] Nerlich (n 8) 1356.

[113] Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81 (2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga (n 59) para. 54.

[114] Ibid.; Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana (n 21) para. 44; Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges, Gbagbo (n 6) para. 25.

Regulation 52. The confirmation of charges hearing succeeds the DCC and is linked to it as 'checks and balances'. If the prosecutor needs more time to conduct investigations, he or she may ask the Chamber to postpone the hearing (Rule 121(7) of the RPE), or request a confirmation based on additional evidence at a later stage (Article 61(8) of the Rome Statute). After the confirmation decision, further disclosure obligations might arise, and the preparation and scheduling of the trial are the main focus. The preparation of the trial is, however, within the competence of the Trial Chamber, and the PTC ceases its activities with the decision to confirm the charges and then transfers the case to the newly constituted Trial Chamber by the Presidency.[115]

The main purpose of the confirmation decision is thus to determine whether a case should be sent to trial and to filter the prosecution's allegations.[116] Important objectives such as trial preparation, disclosure obligations, and procedural economy also play an important role at the confirmation hearing, but if conflicts arise, the objective 'checks and balances' of charges prevail. Future confirmation hearings and amendments should focus on judicial efficiency and the limited purpose of the hearing, which is submitting charges on trial or denying a confirmation on the basis of a considerably low legal threshold.

[115] Decision constituting Trial Chamber I and referring to it the case of The Prosecutor v Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Lubanga (n 40).

[116] Safferling, International Criminal Procedure (n 2) 341; Ambos and Miller (n 4) 341 ('check and balance the Prosecutor'); Withopf (n 10) 1–2.

36

Trial Procedures—With a Particular Focus on the Relationship between the Proceedings of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers

*Håkan Friman

36.1 Introduction

The first instance trials in two cases, Lubanga and Katanga and Ngudjolo, have concluded and verdicts have been handed down against the three accused. At the time of writing, two trials are running, in Bemba and in Ruto and Sang, and the date for the commencement of the trial has been set in Ntaganda (2 June 2015)[1] and Gbagbo (7 July 2015).[2] In Banda, the trial date was vacated and an arrest warrant was issued against the accused.[3] The trial in Kenyatta was postponed repeatedly, and after the Trial Chamber had rejected the prosecutor's request for further adjournment and the Defence's request for termination of the case,[4] on 5 December 2014 the Prosecutor withdrew the charges against Kenyatta without prejudice to the possibility of bringing new charges against Mr Kenyatta 'at a later date, based on the same or similar factual circumstances, should [the prosecution] obtain sufficient evidence to support such a course of action'.[5] No other case concerning core crimes is yet in the trial phase.[6]

In light of the drawn-out proceedings to date, this review will focus on the procedural scheme of two different Chambers—Pre-Trial and Trial—both of which are

* Former Visiting Professor, University College London; Deputy Director-General at the Swedish Ministry of Justice. The author has served as a member of the Swedish ICC delegation since 1996, including to the Rome Conference where he chaired informal sessions of the working group on procedural law. Opinions expressed are those of the author and cannot be attributed to any institution.

[1] Corrigendum of 'Order Scheduling a Status Conference and Setting the Commencement Date for the Trial', Ntaganda, Situation in the Republic of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-382-Corr, TC VI, ICC, 28 November 2014.

[2] Order setting the commencement date for the trial and the time limit for disclosure, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-723, TC I, ICC, 17 November 2014.

[3] Warrant of arrest for Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain, Banda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-606, TC IV, ICC, 11 September 2014.

[4] Decision on Prosecution's application for a further adjournment, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-981,TC V(B), ICC, 3 December 2014.

[5] Ibid., para. 56.

[6] However, the confirmation hearing was held in another case and the decision is pending, Decision on the schedule for the confirmation of charges hearing, Blé Goudé, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-02/11-165, PTC I, ICC, 22 September 2014. Moreover, charges have been confirmed regarding offences against the administration of justice (Art 70 ICC Statute) in one case, Decision pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Bemba, Kilolo, Mangenda, Babala and Arido, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-749,PTC II, ICC, 22 November 2014.

engaged in trial preparations. The Pre-Trial Chamber was an international novelty when it was established by the ICC procedures and was seen as a bridge between civil- and common-law traditions.[7] Another new feature was the contested confirmation process, in which the Pre-Trial Chamber decides whether to commit the suspect to a Trial Chamber for trial.[8] The Pre-Trial Chamber and its functions may be described as having inquisitorial elements in a criminal process that is basically adversarial in nature, particularly at the trial stage. Unprecedented in the international context,[9] however, the ICC confirmation process and its relationship to the trial proceedings ought to be assessed. This chapter reflects developments until the beginning of 2014, but sections 36.1 and 36.2 have been updated as of 5 December 2014.

36.2 Trial Experiences

The road towards the verdict in the first trial, in Lubanga, has been long and lined with numerous preliminary issues and decisions. Nearly six years passed between the arrival of the accused at the Court (17 March 2006) and the verdict (14 March 2012), during which time the accused has been deprived of his liberty. Trial preparations before the Trial Chamber lasted two years, between the confirmation of charges (29 January 2007) and the commencement of the trial hearing (26 January 2009). During that time, 54 status conferences were held. The trial hearing required 204 trial days over almost two and a half years, during which 36 witnesses for the prosecution, 24 for the defence, and three victims at the request of their legal representatives were heard, as well as 4 expert witnesses called by the Chamber. In addition, the prosecution presented 368 items of evidence, the defence 992 items, and the victims 13 items.

Before and during the Lubanga trial, 275 written and 347 oral decisions were rendered by the Trial Chamber, some of which were subject to interlocutory appeals and resolution by the Appeals Chamber. Issues relating to the disclosure of evidence generated by far the most decisions. A good number of decisions addressed victim participation, witness protection, admissibility of evidence, or other evidentiary matters. A total of 129 victims (34 female and 95 male) were authorized to participate in the trial proceedings.

A similar picture emerges with respect to the trial in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case, in which the two accused were jointly charged and tried.[10] An important difference, however, is that the time for trial preparation was considerably shorter for these two defendants, who were also detained. The time between the arrival of the accused at the Court and the confirmation of charges was less than a year (about 11 months for Katanga and 7.5 months for Ngudjolo) and the trial hearing commenced 14 months

[7] S Fernández de Gurmendi and H Friman, 'The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Court' (2000) 3 Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law 289, 296.

[8] Art 61 ICC Statute.

[9] Nonetheless, one should note that domestic criminal proceedings exist with mixed adversarial and inquisitorial features.

[10] Decision on the Joinder of the Cases against Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-257, PTC I, ICC, 10 March 2008.

after the charges were confirmed. Here too the trial hearing ran for almost two and a half years, and 265 trial days were required. The prosecution called 24 witnesses and the defence 28, two victims were heard, and two expert witnesses were called by the Chamber. The judgment against Ngudjolo noted the extensive written evidence (261 items presented by the prosecution, 372 items presented by the 2 defendants, 5 items introduced by victims, and 5 by the Chamber) as well as 168 oral and 387 written decisions by the Trial Chamber. The trial against Katanga continued with further written submissions on discrete issues. In this trial, 366 victims were authorized to participate.

The trial in Bemba commenced on 22 November 2010, about 17 months after the confirmation of charges (15 June 2009) and almost two and a half years after the transfer of the accused to The Hague (3 July 2008). During that time, the accused has been deprived of his liberty.[11] The trial hearing ended with closing oral statements on 12–13 November 2014. Reportedly, the Trial Chamber has granted 5,229 victims the right to participate in the trial proceedings.

The decision on confirmation of charges in Ruto and Sang and Kenyatta were issued on 23 January 2012. In the former case, the preparations before the Trial Chamber lasted close to 18 months, while in the latter, they continued until the withdrawal of the charges. The accused in these cases have not been deprived of their liberty. Reportedly, 628 and 233 victims have been authorized to participate in the respective cases, although some victims have subsequently withdrawn from the proceedings.[12]

According to the current plan, the trial in Gbagbo will commence about one year after the decision on the confirmation of charges,[13] but three years and seven months after the defendant's transfer to the Court on 30 November 2011. The accused is detained. The Pre-Trial Chamber authorized 199 victims to participate in the proceedings. In Ntaganda, 20 months passed between the accused's voluntary surrender to ICC custody (22 March 2013) and the confirmation decision,[14] and one more year is scheduled until the trial is planned to begin.

In Banda, five and a half years have passed since the first appearance (7 May 2009), and three years and nine months since the confirmation decision,[15] but no trial is in sight. In [11] However, the Pre-Trial Chamber ordered interim release in a decision that was subsequently reversed by the Appeals Chamber; see Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-475, PTC II, ICC, 14 August 2009, and Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against Pre-Trial Chamber II's 'Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa', ICC-01/05-01/08-631, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, AC, ICC, 2 December 2009.

[12] E.g. Decision on the Legal Representative's Report on the Withdrawal of Victims, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1098, TC V(A), ICC, 14 November 2013.

[13] Decision on the confirmation of charges against Laurent Gbagbo, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-656, PTC I, ICC, 12 June 2014.

[14] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Bosco Ntaganda, Ntaganda, Situation in the Republic of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-309, PTC II, ICC, 9 June 2014.

[15] Corrigendum of the 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Banda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-121, PTC I, ICC, 7 March 2011.

Blé Goudé, on the other hand, the pre-confirmation process has been much faster and the hearing was held six months after his surrender to ICC custody on 22 March 2014.

The trial in Lubanga resulted in a three-part verdict. First, Trial Chamber I ruled on the criminal charges and convicted Thomas Lubanga of war crimes (conscripting and enlisting children under the age of 15 and using them to participate actively in hostilities).[16] Second, after written submissions by the parties and the legal representatives for victims, and a separate hearing, the Trial Chamber handed down a decision sentencing the accused to 14 years of imprisonment.[17] Lubanga brought appeals against both decisions and the prosecution against the sentence. Third, the Trial Chamber separately addressed the question of reparations in a decision[18] which is also subject to appeals.[19] On 1 December 2014 the Appeals Chamber confirmed the conviction and the sentence.[20]

Upon completion of the trial in Katanga and Ngudjolo, the cases were severed because the question of re-characterization of charges emerged regarding one of the accused, Germain Katanga.[21] The verdict against Mathieu Ngudjolo was issued separately. He was acquitted of all charges[22] more than four years and ten months after his arrest. The prosecution has appealed the judgment. The verdict in the case against Katanga was handed down on 7 March 2014, more than five years and four months after his transfer to the Court, and the sentence two and a half months later.[23] On 25 June 2014 the defendant and the prosecution discontinued their appeals against the judgment in the Katanga case.

These are not merely boring facts and statistics. Instead, the experiences expose a need for reform. While bearing in mind that these first cases are conducted under a new and previously untested procedural scheme, and that the crimes and surrounding

[16] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 (with one separate opinion and one separate and dissenting opinion).

[17] Decision on Sentence pursuant to Art 76 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2901, TC I, ICC, 10 July 2012 (one judge dissenting and arguing, inter alia, for a 15-year sentence).

[18] Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2904, TC I, ICC, 7 August 2012.

[19] The appeals have been declared admissible in part by the Appeals Chamber; Decision on the admissibility of the appeals against Trial Chamber I's 'Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations' and directions on the further conduct of proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2953, AC, ICC, 14 December 2012.

[20] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Lubanga, Situation in the Republic of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3121, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014, and Judgment on the appeals of the Prosecutor and Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the 'Decision on Sentence pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute', Lubanga, Situation in the Republic of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3122, AC, ICC, 1 December 2014.

[21] Decision on the implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and severing the charges against the accused persons, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012.

[22] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012.

[23] Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Republic of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014, and Décision relative à la peine (article 76 du Statut), Katanga, Situation in the Republic of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3484, TC II, ICC, 23 May 2014. See C. Stahn, 'Justice Delivered or Justice Denied?: The Legacy of the Katanga Judgment' (2014) 12 Journal of International Criminal Justice 809–834.

practical circumstances are complex and challenging, it is clear that processes have been slow and can be improved. A modest case like Lubanga should not require six years between the first appearance at the Court and the first instance verdict, as well as additional time (about two and a half years) for the appeals process. Some areas of the procedural scheme that deserve closer review are highlighted in the following section, with a particular focus on the consistency and coordination between the pre-trial and trial process.

Another issue that deserves further scrutiny is the Prosecutor's policy to expedite the process by 'focused investigations and prosecutions', which includes being selective with respect to the incidents, but also regarding the number of witnesses who are called to testify.[24] While essentially a sound policy, the track record, including declined confirmations and the acquittal of Ngudjolo due to insufficient evidence, is mixed. As a response, the Prosecutor has introduced a new policy described as 'the principle of in-depth, open-ended investigations while maintaining focus', which is geared towards a higher level of trial-readiness at the time of the confirmation hearing.[25] Although this issue will not be further addressed in this chapter, it should be noted that the shift may result in more witnesses and greater reliance upon 'live testimony', which could extend the length of the proceedings. Even if using mechanisms such as conducting proceedings in the state concerned and using modern technology might mitigate some problems, the dependence upon the cooperation of states and others, combined with the largely traditional cooperation regime envisaged for the Court, is in itself cumbersome and time-consuming. In this context, issues concerning witness protection and the question of sufficient resources for the gathering of evidence must also be taken into account.[26]

Additionally, one should keep in mind that the requirements concerning translations and interpretation in these international proceedings will always be time-consuming and often cause delays, due to the scarcity of competent translators and interpreters, or otherwise. While the Court is working towards simplifications and improvements, proper services of this kind are key to fair proceedings[27] and should be factored in when assessing the length of the process. Needless to say, this too requires adequate resources.

36.3 Relationship between the Pre-Trial and Trial Process

Unlike the ad hoc Tribunals, the ICC procedures envisage two preparatory stages before the trial hearing to be conducted by different judicial chambers: (i) the pre-trial

[24] See OTP, Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–12, The Hague, 1 February 2010, para. 20.

[25] See OTP, Strategic Plan June 2012–15, The Hague, 11 October 2013, para. 23 ('OTP Strategic Plan').

[26] See H Hansberry, 'Too Much of a Good Thing in Lubanga and Haradinaj: The Danger of Expediency in International Criminal Trials' (2011) 9 Northwestern Journal of International Human Rights 357.

[27] E.g. Judgment on the appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Defence Request Concerning Languages', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-522, AC, ICC, 27 May 2008, and Decision on the interpretation of the court proceedings, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1473, TC II, 15 September 2009. See also K Giridhar, 'Justice for All: Protecting the Translation Rights of Defendants in International War Crimes Tribunals' (2011) 43 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 799.

stage before the Pre-Trial Chamber, which ends with the decision on the confirmation of charges, and (ii) the trial preparations, which are conducted by the Trial Chamber. Main objectives of the process before the Pre-Trial Chamber are to secure the presence of the suspect, conclude the criminal investigation and formalize the charges, and conduct a judicial assessment (a confirmation process) as to whether the case should go to trial. The evidentiary threshold for an arrest warrant, confirmation of charges, and a conviction are different and increasingly onerous for the prosecution to meet. The threshold for confirmation of a charge is that 'there is sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe' that the person committed the crime charged,[28] as compared to the 'guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt' standard which is required for a conviction.[29] Moreover, relaxed requirements concerning the means of evidence are provided for the confirmation process and the disclosure obligations are reduced, including the possibility of withholding evidence prior to the commencement of the trial (hearing) due to security concerns.[30]

Obviously, the confirmation of charges and the trial form part of a process, and both mechanisms aim at preparing the case for adjudication by the Court. Hence, the pre-confirmation and post-confirmation activities ought to be coordinated, to the extent possible, in order to avoid duplications and reduce the time required for the preparations for trial.

During the negotiations concerning the Rules of Procedure and Evidence there was a broad agreement that effective rules should be provided for the preparations and thus, that less time would be required for the trial itself.[31] Nevertheless, there were strongly diverging views as to whether most of the preparations should take place pre-confirmation (by the Pre-Trial Chamber) or post-confirmation (by the Trial Chamber). Put differently, some argued that the case should be trial-ready at the confirmation hearing, or at least soon thereafter, while others claimed that the confirmation and trial processes are different in nature and scope and should be prepared separately. The primary battleground was the rules on disclosure.[32] The Rules of Procedure and Evidence provide for both pre-confirmation and pre-trial disclosure, but do not unambiguously settle the question of when the 'bulk of the disclosure' should take place.

In practice, the Chambers of the Court have required quite extensive disclosure and other preparations, including settling preliminary matters, both pre-confirmation and pre-trial. The Pre-Trial Chambers have interpreted their mandate as requiring a rigorous confirmation process and decisions that go into great detail with respect to [28] Art 61(7) ICC Statute. [29] Art 66(3) ICC Statute. [30] Arts 61(5) and 68(5) ICC Statute.

[31] H Friman, 'Investigation and Prosecution' in R Lee et al. (eds), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 531.

[32] E.g. H Brady, 'Disclosure of Evidence' in R Lee et al. (eds), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 422–4. See also the opposing views presented by H Brady, 'Setting the Record Straight: A Short Note on Disclosure and "the Record of the Proceedings"', and G Bitti, 'Two Bones of Contention between Civil Law and Common Law: The Record of the Proceedings and the Treatment of a Concursus Delictorum', both in H Fisher et al. (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes under International Law: Current Developments (Berlin: Berlin Verlag, Arno Spitz GmbH 2001) 261 and 273, respectively.

various legal and evidentiary matters.[33] Although consistently upheld by the Pre-Trial Chambers so far, this is not an inevitable interpretation considering, in particular, the scope of the confirmation process according to the ICC Statute and the swift pre-confirmation process contemplated in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[34] Once the case has been confirmed, however, the Trial Chambers have understandably been cautious to take charge of the preparations of the case for the trial that the Chamber is to conduct. Consequently, extensive and time-consuming preparations have taken place twice, albeit for different procedural purposes. In addition, the practice among different Chambers, Pre-Trial Chambers as well as Trial Chambers, departs in some respects.

This illustrates that the relationship between the confirmation of charges and the trial processes is far from seamless, and should be further developed and standardized. Two basic solutions are available in order to avoid unnecessary duplications: (i) a more limited and swift confirmation process followed by more thorough trial preparations, or (ii) a thorough and (almost) complete pre-confirmation process whereby the case is trial-ready very soon after the confirmation decision. Arguably, the former approach reflects the current statutory regime better than the latter.[35] Moreover, it leaves the trial preparations in the hands of the Chamber that is responsible for the trial and counteracts the risk of the confirmation process turning into a 'mini-trial'. Nonetheless, there are clear advantages to a prosecutorial practice aimed at completed investigations and, in that sense, cases that are 'trial-ready' at the time of the confirmation.[36] This is also acknowledged by the Appeals Chamber and in the new prosecutorial policy.[37]

Apart from coordination with respect to disclosure of evidence, other preliminary issues that relate to the preparations for trial should also be considered. One such issue, which generates much work for the Court, is victim participation in the proceedings. The scheme developed so far requires separate decisions for the various stages of the proceedings. As will be further discussed in Chapter 45, the entire question of victim participation in the proceedings has proven to be burdensome and difficult to manage and, as noted earlier, the cases tend to involve large numbers of victims. A quite radical departure from previous practice was made by the Trial Chamber in the Ruto and Sang and Kenyatta cases, with the main model being participation through a common legal representative and an almost automatic transfer of victims from the confirmation to the trial stage as long as they accepted participation [33] See further Stegmiller, Chapter 35, this volume.

[34] Rule 121 ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002).

[35] For a different view, see e.g. V Nerlich, 'The Confirmation of Charges Procedure at the International Criminal Court: Advance or Failure?' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1339.

[36] Ibid., 1355. See also American University, Washington College of Law, 'Investigative Management, Strategies, and Techniques of the International Criminal Court's Office of the Prosecutor' (War Crimes Research Office, Washington D.C., October 2012) 61–72.

[37] See Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 16 December 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-514 (OA 4), AC, ICC, 30 May 2012, para. 44. See also OTP Strategic Plan (n 25) para. 23.

through the representative.[38] It remains to be seen what will be the prevailing practice in this respect.[39]

These issues have also been identified by the Court in the so-called Lessons Learnt process.[40] One area for discussion, and possibly for statutory amendments, relates to 'the best format and content of the confirmation of charges decision for the purpose of framing the trial proceedings'.[41] Another area is a system of disclosure where, inter alia, 'the possibility of establishing a standard system of disclosure' is raised.[42]

36.4 Charges—From Confirmation to Adjudication

A novel feature of the ICC procedures is the authority of the Chamber to modify the legal characterization of the charges as presented by the prosecution. This is a mechanism known to some domestic jurisdictions (civil law) but foreign to others (common law) which the judges agreed upon (Regulation 55 in the Regulations of the Court), although the negotiating states had failed to do so.[43]

In practice, the Chambers have made extensive use of Regulation 55. After being misapplied by (the majority of) the Trial Chamber in Lubanga,[44] the Appeals Chamber clarified the correct application of the regulation.[45] In Katanga and Ngudjolo, the Trial Chamber opted to give notice of the application of Regulation 55 during the deliberations after the conclusion of the trial hearing, a decision that was upheld by the Appeals Chamber.[46] However, one judge of the Appeals Chamber dissented and argued that the [38] Decision on victims' representation and participation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-460, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012, and Decision on victims' representation and participation, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-498, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012.

[39] More recently, another Pre-Trial Chamber devised a different application model, see Decision Establishing Principles on the Victims' Application Process, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-67, PTC II, ICC, 28 May 2013.

[40] Study Group on Governance: Lessons learnt: First report of the Court to the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/11/31/Add.1, Annex. See also Ambach, Chapter 50, in this volume.

[41] Ibid., point A.1. [42] Ibid., point B.1.

[43] S Fernández de Gurmendi and H Friman, 'The Rules of Procedure and Evidence and the Regulations of the Court' in J Doria et al. (eds), The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court: Essays in Honour of Professor Igor Blischenko (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 807. See also C Stahn, 'Modification of the Legal Characterization of Facts in the ICC System: A Portrayal of Regulation 55' (2005) 16 Criminal Law Forum 1.

[44] Decision giving notice to the parties and participants that the legal characterization of the facts may be subject to change in accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2049, TC I, ICC, 14 July 2009 (with Minority Opinion of Judge Fulford, ICC-01/04-01/06-2054, 17 July 2009).

[45] Judgment on the appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts may be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009. See also Decision on the Legal Representatives' Joint Submissions concerning the Appeals Chamber's Decision on 8 December 2009 on Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2223, TC I, ICC, 8 January 2010.

[46] Decision on the implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and severing the charges against the accused persons, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 21) (Judge Van den Wyngaert dissenting), modification raised by the Trial Chamber—from one ground to incur individual criminal responsibility to another—did not qualify to trigger the application of the regulation and, further, that the decision would violate the defendant's right to a fair trial (i.e. his right to be informed in detail of the nature, cause, and content of the charges).

Regulation 55 has also been applied by the Trial Chamber in Bemba. After giving notice to the parties that the Trial Chamber might modify the legal characterization of the facts so as to consider 'in the same mode of responsibility the alternate form of knowledge contained in Article 28(a)(i) of the Statute' (i.e. 'should have known' instead of 'knew' as a requirement for command responsibility),[47] the trial was temporarily suspended in order to allow the defence to reconsider its evidence.[48] An application by the defence for leave to appeal the decision was rejected,[49] and the trial subsequently resumed.[50] More than four months were largely spent on the question of re-characterization of the charges and the issue will most likely be raised again in an appeal against the forthcoming judgment.

This followed an earlier assessment in the confirmation process where the Pre-Trial Chamber, by application of its power to request the prosecutor to consider 'amending a charge because the evidence submitted appears to establish a different crime within the jurisdiction of the Court',[51] had intervened with respect to the mode of liability.[52] In the amended document containing the charges (DCC), the prosecutor referred to criminal responsibility both under Article 25 and Article 28 of the Statute, but the Pre-Trial Chamber decided to confirm only one of the modes of liability—responsibility as a military commander under Article 28(a)—and declined to confirm the other modes charged.[53] In the confirmation decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber addressed only the mens rea requirement that the accused 'knew' of the crimes.[54] Consequently, the Trial Chamber, at the request of the defendant, ordered and Judgment on the appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the decision of Trial Chamber II of 21 November 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons', ICC-01/04-01/07-3363, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, AC, ICC, 27 March 2013 (Judge Tarfusser dissenting).

[47] Decision giving notice to the parties and participants that the legal characterization of the facts may be subject to change in accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2324, TC III, ICC, 21 September 2012.

[48] Decision on the temporary suspension of the proceedings pursuant to Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court and related procedural deadlines, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2480, TC III, ICC, 13 December 2012.

[49] Public Redacted Version of 'Decision on "Defence Request for Leave to Appeal the Decision on the Temporary Suspension of the Proceedings Pursuant to Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court and related Procedural Deadlines" ' of 11 January 2013, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2487-Red, TC III, ICC, 16 January 2013.

[50] Decision lifting the temporary suspension of the trial proceedings and addressing additional issues raised in defence submissions ICC-01/05-01/08-2490-Red and ICC-01/05-01/08-2497, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2500, TC III, ICC, 6 February 2013.

[51] Art 61(7)(c)(ii) ICC Statute.

[52] Decision Adjourning the Hearing pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Rome Statute, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-388, PTC III, ICC, 3 March 2009.

[53] Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009.

[54] Ibid., para. 478.

in a subsequent decision that the DCC should be amended by deleting a reference to the 'should have known' standard.[55] Leaving aside the question of whether the choice between alternatives for a particular mode of liability really constitutes a modification of the 'legal characterization of facts',[56] the Pre-Trial Chamber in effect restricted the charges with respect to the modes of liability in a way that the Trial Chamber found reason to reverse in order to apply something that the prosecutor had alleged (command responsibility based on a 'should have known' standard) in the DCC upon which the confirmation was based.[57] Such a risk is intrinsic in a detailed and opinionated confirmation review.

Even more challenging, however, is the fact that the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga applied Regulation 55 in the context of the confirmation of charges and substituted charges of war crimes in a non-international armed conflict for the same offence in an international armed conflict.[58] While the Trial Chamber did not consider itself competent to annul or amend the confirmed charges, it allowed the parties to present evidence for both classifications of the conflict[59] and, finally, by applying Regulation 55, convicted the accused of war crimes committed in a non-international armed conflict.[60] However, the practice of re-qualifying charges at the confirmation stage, which arguably conflicts with the roles and powers of the prosecutor as well as the Trial Chamber, has not been repeated. In fact, one Pre-Trial Chamber has explicitly rejected the approach.[61] The method envisaged in the Statute, as applied in Bemba,[62] is to request the prosecutor to consider amending the charges or to refuse confirmation.

Nonetheless, this raises the broader issue of the substantive relationship between the Pre-Trial Chamber's confirmation decision and the boundaries for the Trial Chamber's adjudication; or to what extent is the confirmation decision binding on the Trial Chamber? Obviously, the confirmation process is meant to define 'the [55] Decision on the defence application for corrections to the Document Containing the Charges and for the prosecution to file a Second Amended Document Containing the Charges, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-836, 20 July 2010, TC III, para. 121.

[56] Cf. Judgment on the appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the decision of Trial Chamber II of 21 November 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons', Katanga (n 46) paras 46–7, 55–8, and Judge Tarfusser's dissenting opinion to this decision.

[57] See Public Redacted Version of the Amended Document containing the charges filed on 30 March 2009, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-395-Anx3, OTP, ICC, 30 March 2009, para. 86.

[58] Decision on the confirmation of charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007.

[59] Decision on the status before the Trial Chamber of the evidence heard by the Pre-Trial Chamber and the decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber in trial proceedings, and the manner in which evidence shall be submitted, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1084, TC I, ICC, 13 December 2007.

[60] Ibid., para. 49, and Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga (n 16) paras 527–30, 566, and 1358–9.

[61] Decision on the 'Request by the Victims' Representative for authorization by the Chamber to make written submissions on specific issues of law and/or fact', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-274, PTC II, 19 August 2011, paras 7–8.

[62] Art 61(7)(c) ICC Statute. See Decision Adjourning the Hearing pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Rome Statute, Bemba (n 52).

subject matter of the proceedings' so that 'the parameters set forth in the charges define the issues to be determined at trial and limit the Trial Chamber's authority to the determination of those issues'.[63] But arguably, the legal and factual findings at the confirmation stage can only be preliminary in nature and cannot prevent different conclusions at trial.[64] So far, however, most comments on this issue have focused on the relationship between the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Prosecutor with respect to the power to frame the charges; indeed, this is an important and interesting question, but one that falls outside of the scope of the current review.

The approach taken by the Pre-Trial Chambers, including the very elaborate and detailed confirmation decisions, has also given rise to disputes in the trial proceedings. Generally, the confirmation decisions have prompted the drafting and submission of amended DCCs. According to Article 74(2) of the ICC Statute, the Trial Chamber's verdict 'shall not exceed the facts and circumstances described in the charges and any amendments to the charges'. While the Appeals Chamber has explained the terms 'facts and circumstances' and clarified that they do not cover evidence,[65] some ambiguity still remains. In Lubanga, for example, the Prosecutor added references to instances of enlistment or conscription of children in the amended DCC, which were not included in the DCC upon which the confirmation decision was based.[66] Hence, the question becomes whether the individual instances form part of the 'facts and circumstances', which are defined by the confirmation decision, or whether they should be considered as something else. Although explicitly being cautious to 'not exceed the facts and circumstances established by the Pre-Trial Chamber',[67] the Lubanga Trial Chamber did not (visibly) address this issue. The approach seems to be to consider such instances, or individual cases, as evidence and not as 'facts and circumstances'. Similarly, in subsequent confirmation decisions a distinction has been made with respect to 'subsidiary facts' which may also be included in the DCC or confirmation decision, i.e. 'facts or evidence that are subsidiary to the facts described in the charges, serving the purpose of demonstrating or supporting their existence'.[68] Although this approach is foreign to domestic jurisdictions that require a higher degree [63] E.g. Judgment on the appeals of the Prosecutor and the Defence against Trial Chamber I's Decision on Victims' Participation of 18 January 2008', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1432, AC, ICC, 11 July 2008, paras 62–3.

[64] E.g. R Cryer et al., An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure 3rd edn (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2014) 464.

[65] Judgment on the appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision giving notice to the parties and participants that the legal characterisation of the facts may be subject to change in accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga (n 45) para. 90 (note 163).

[66] Compare Amended Document Containing the Charges, Art 61(3)(a), Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1573-Anx1, OTP, ICC, 23 December 2008, with Document Containing the Charges, Art 61(3)(a), Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-356-Anx2, OTP, ICC, 28 August 2006. See also Nerlich (n 35) 1349–50.

[67] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga (n 16) para. 8.

[68] E.g. Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-373, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012, para. 47.

of specificity in the actual charges, it is reasonable considering the nature of the international crimes in question.[69]

Further, while the Trial Chambers have often taken the view that the confirmation decision should be authoritative with respect to setting out the factual allegations for the trial,[70] the prosecution has insisted that the DCC should be authoritative. A more recent, and arguably correct, view is that the confirmation decision 'cannot be expected to serve as the only authoritative statement of the charges for the trial' and instead that 'the description of the charges in the DCC, amended to harmonize it with the findings made in the confirmation decision, rather than the confirmation decision itself, provides a sufficiently authoritative statement of the charges relevant to the trial proceedings'.[71] Indeed, why should the Trial Chamber relinquish its freedom to interpret and apply the law to the evidence that it is to assess, within, of course, the confirmed charges? Additionally, Article 74(2) of the ICC Statute clearly stipulates that the judgment shall be based (only) on evidence submitted and discussed before it at trial, which speaks against reliance upon the legal and evidentiary findings in the confirmation decision.

The Lubanga Trial Chamber concluded that 'the power to frame the charges lies at the heart of the Pre-Trial Chamber's functions' and that the result is binding on the Trial Chamber.[72] But this general statement does not clarify the extent of the binding effect. Subsequently, however, Judge Fulford indicated that the Trial Chamber is bound by the legal findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber, even when the trial judge disagrees with the finding, if a departure from it would be prejudicial to the accused.[73] This approach has been criticized.[74] Indeed, if the legal findings of the confirmation decision are afforded a binding effect on the trial court, the latter's latitude to adjudicate the case would be unduly restricted.

Interestingly, the Trial Chamber in Ruto and Sang and in Muthaura and Kenyatta has expressed a quite different, and arguably more correct understanding, and has underlined that 'it is the prosecution's responsibility to articulate the charges'; the [69] Moreover, the approach is consistent with the requirements of the DCC's content, Regulation 52 of the ICC Regulations.

[70] E.g. Decision on the Filing of a Summary of the Charges by the Prosecutor, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1547, TC II, ICC, 29 October 2009, paras 14–17; Decision on the defence application for corrections to the Document Containing the Charges and for the prosecution to file a Second Amended Document Containing the Charges, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-836, TC III, 20 July 2010, para. 37.

[71] Decision on the content of the updated document containing the charges, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-522, TC V, ICC, 28 December 2012, para. 18, and Decision on the content of the updated document containing the charges, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-584, TC V, 28 December 2012, para. 21.

[72] Decision on the status before the Trial Chamber of the evidence heard by the Pre-Trial Chamber and the decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber in trial proceedings, and the manner in which evidence shall be submitted, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1084, TC I, ICC, 13 December 2007, paras 39–43.

[73] Separate Opinion by Judge Fulford, Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga (n 16) para. 2.

[74] E.g. J Ohlin, 'Lubanga Decision Roundtable: Lubanga and the Control Theory' (Opinio Juris, 15 March 2012) <http://opiniojuris.org/2012/03/15/lubanga-and-the-control-theory-2/> accessed 25 August 2014, and T Liefländer, 'The Lubanga Judgment of the ICC: More than Just the First Step?' (2012) 1 Cambridge Journal of International and Comparative Law 191, 210–11.

Pre-Trial Chamber may not add or modify the charges in the confirmation process, which is instead the prosecution's task, and post-confirmation amendments or withdrawal of the charges also rest with the prosecution.[75] Moreover, the Trial Chamber has held that a factual allegation is considered rejected only if the Pre-Trial Chamber explicitly said so in the confirmation decision; silence is not sufficient as a rejection.[76] Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber, as well as the parties, had to conduct a detailed and tedious process for analysing the DCC and the confirmation decision in order to determine the content in the updated DCC. Regardless of these efforts, however, there have been further calls for amendments to the charges in both cases.[77] In Ruto and Sang, a 'notice of possibility of variation of legal characterisation' has been issued with respect to the applicable mode of criminal liability (indirect co-perpetration, ordering or soliciting, etc.).[78]

The confirmation practice has in fact created much confusion and additional work in the later preparations for trial. With a closer adherence to the confirmation process as devised in Article 61 of the ICC Statute—essentially a 'thumbs up or thumbs down' to each charge as presented by the Prosecutor (before or after an invitation to provide further evidence or to amend the charges)—and leaving determinations on issues such as re-characterization of charges, or cumulative or alternative charges to the trial, problems of this kind would be diminished.[79]

Hence, establishing the nature and function of the confirmation process has a direct impact not only on the process itself, but also on the subsequent trial proceedings and the scope of the Trial Chamber's adjudication. Again, the Court has identified the relationship between the findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Trial Chamber as an issue for potential reform, stating that 'the discussion needs to address the required extent of the legal interpretation made by the Pre-Trial Chamber [75] Order regarding the content of the charges, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-475, TC V, ICC, 20 November 2012, para. 4, and Order regarding the content of the charges, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-536, TC V, ICC, 20 November 2012, para. 4.

[76] Decision on the content of the updated document containing the charges, Ruto and Sang (n 71) para. 19, and Decision on the content of the updated document containing the charges, Muthaura and Kenyatta, ICC-01/09-02/11-584 (n 71) para. 23.

[77] The Prosecution's request that the Pre-Trial Chamber authorize an amendment to the charges was denied; Decision on the 'Prosecution's Request to Amend the Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-859, PTC II, ICC, 16 August 2013. The Appeals Chamber (majority), applying a very narrow interpretation of Art 61(9), dismissed the Prosecutor's appeal; Decision on the Prosecutor's appeal against the 'Decision on the Prosecution's Request to Amend the Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1123, AC, ICC, 13 December 2013. In Kenyatta, however, amendments to the charges were granted; Corrigendum to 'Decision on the "Prosecution's Request to Amend the Final Updated Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Article 61(9) of the Statute" ', Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-700, PTC II, ICC, 21 March 2013.

[78] Decision on Applications for Notice of Possibility of Variation of Legal Characterisation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1122, TC V(A), ICC, 12 December 2013.

[79] For the opposite view, see K Ambos and D Miller, 'Structure and Function of the Confirmation Procedure before the ICC from a Comparative Perspective' (2007) 7 International Criminal Law Review 335, 359–60.

as well as the necessary degree of precision of the legal characterization of facts and modes of liability'.[80]

36.5 Proper Disclosure of Evidence

As already noted, numerous preliminary issues have arisen concerning the disclosure of evidence, and the disclosure measures taken pre-confirmation and post-confirmation need better coordination. But there is also reason to briefly touch upon the disclosure system as such since it has, just like in the ad hoc Tribunals, generated so much work, debate, and criticism. Since a fuller discussion is provided in other chapters of this volume (see below Chapters 40 and 41), the focus here will primarily be on the relationship between pre-confirmation and post-confirmation disclosure.

While a scheme for making evidence available to the parties and the Court exists in all criminal justice systems, the particular 'disclosure' scheme that is devised for the ICC points towards an adversarial trial model where each party presents a separate case to the Court. The disclosure process has proven to be inherently problematic in practice, both at the ICC and the ad hoc Tribunals. In line with the earlier discussion, it could be argued that pre-confirmation disclosure should be limited to the requirements of the confirmation process and that the full disclosure for trial should take place post-confirmation. The prosecutor's obligations with respect to exonerating evidence are continuous throughout the entire process, both pre- and post-confirmation, but with the caveat set forth in Article 67(2), namely 'as soon as practicable'.

The Pre-Trial Chambers initially followed the outlined approach by requiring pre-confirmation disclosure by the prosecution of the bulk of potentially exonerating material and evidence to the preparation of the defence; called 'the bulk rule'.[81] However, in more recent decisions this approach has given way to a more onerous pre-confirmation disclosure, 'the totality rule', as well as a requirement of summaries to assist the defence (and the judges).[82] The prosecutor was denied leave to appeal the later decisions.[83]

In addition, the practice differs with respect to whether all the evidence that is disclosed inter partes, and not only the evidence intended to be presented at the confirmation

[80] See Study Group on Governance: Lessons learnt (n 40) point A.1.

[81] Decision on the Final System of Disclosure and the Establishment of a Time Table, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-102, PTC I, ICC, 15 May 2006, and Decision on the confirmation of charges, Lubanga (n 58) para. 154; Decision on Art 54(3)(e) Documents Identified as Potentially Exculpatory or Otherwise Material to the Defence's Preparation for the Confirmation Hearing, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-621, PTC I, ICC, 20 June 2008, para. 8.

[82] E.g. Decision on issues relating to disclosure, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-87, PTC I, ICC, 30 March 2011; Decision Setting the Regime for Evidence Disclosure and Other Related Matters, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-44, PTC II, ICC, 6 April 2011.

[83] Decision on the 'Prosecution's application for leave to Appeal the "Decision on issues relating to disclosure" (ICC-01/04-01/10-87)', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-116, PTC I, ICC, 21 April 2011; Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application for leave to Appeal the "Decision Setting the Regime for Evidence Disclosure and Other Related Matters" (ICC-01/09-01/11-44)', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-74, PTC II, ICC, 2 May 2011.

hearing, must also be communicated to the Chamber.[84] Making all the disclosed evidence available to the Pre-Trial Chamber means that it is put on record and, thus, that a more complete court record can be transferred to the Trial Chamber upon the confirmation of charges.[85] This system, which was applied in Bemba, the Kenyan cases (Ruto et al. and Muthaura et al.) and Ntaganda, creates a form of civil-law-style 'dossier', albeit one that is incomplete with respect to incriminating evidence. However, in other cases, the pre-confirmation disclosure has been inter partes and, with a varying degree of required detail, included disclosure notes submitted by the prosecution concerning, inter alia, potentially exculpatory evidence, and pre-inspection reports.[86]

Moreover, in Gbagbo the majority of the Pre-Trial Chamber (against one judge's strong dissent) has concluded that the Prosecutor, for confirmation purposes, must 'present all her evidence' and that 'the Chamber must assume that the prosecutor has presented her strongest possible case based on a largely complete investigation'.[87] Of course, such an approach will also have an impact on pre-confirmation disclosure. Since the pre-confirmation disclosure regime originally established in this case was of a more limited nature, which was also supported by both parties,[88] additional disclosure had to be ordered.[89]

Quite apart from the concerns that may be raised with respect to the nature of the confirmation process and the role of the Pre-Trial Chamber, the more extensive approach to pre-confirmation disclosure can hardly be considered a success from an efficiency perspective. Regardless, the post-confirmation (pre-trial) disclosure under the auspices of the Trial Chamber has been considerable.

In Lubanga, the Trial Chamber concluded that 'evidence before the Pre-Trial Chamber cannot be introduced automatically into the trial process simply by virtue of having been included in the List of Evidence admitted by the Pre-Trial Chamber, but instead it must be introduced, if necessary, de novo'.[90] Even in Bemba, where all evidence disclosed between the parties pre-confirmation was also communicated to the Pre-Trial Chamber and was thus, part of the Court record, the Trial Chamber subsequently ordered additional disclosure of Prosecution evidence for the purpose of the trial.[91] This is due to the different [84] Compare, e.g., Decision on the Evidence Disclosure System and Setting a Timetable for Disclosure between the Parties, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-55, PTC II, ICC, 31 July 2008 (extensive access), with Second Decision on issues relating to Disclosure, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-35, PTC I, ICC, 15 July 2009, para. 8 (limited access).

[85] Rule 130 ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[86] E.g. Decision establishing a disclosure system and a calendar for disclosure, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-30, PTC I, ICC, 24 January 2012.

[87] Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-432, PTC I, 3 June 2013, paras 25 and 37 (Judge Fernández de Gurmendi dissenting). The Appeals Chamber did not address these issues since they fell outside of the Pre-Trial Chamber's leave to appeal, Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 3 June 2013 entitled 'Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute', Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-572, AC, 16 December 2013, paras 60–4.

[88] Decision establishing a disclosure system and a calendar for disclosure, Gbagbo (n 86).

[89] Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges pursuant to article 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, Gbagbo (n 87).

[90] Decision on the status before the Trial Chamber of the evidence heard by the Pre-Trial Chamber and the decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber in trial proceedings, and the manner in which evidence shall be submitted, Lubanga (n 72) para. 8.

[91] E.g. Order on disclosure of evidence by the OTP, Bemba, Situation in Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-590, TC III, ICC, 4 November 2009.

nature of the processes, but was also done in order to allow the Trial Chamber to independently fulfil its obligations vis-à-vis the admissibility of evidence, which is addressed in the following.

A particular challenge is to balance the need to protect witnesses, by redactions and other measures, against the defendant's right to adequate time and facilities to prepare for trial. In fact, the need to protect witnesses, as has been apparent for example in the Kenya cases,[92] appears to be one of the major obstacles to full disclosure of evidence at the ICC. These needs are exacerbated by the fact that many prosecutions relate to ongoing conflicts. Non-disclosure with reference to 'grave endangerment of the security of a witness or his or her family' is possible 'prior to the commencement of the trial', i.e. until the trial hearing begins.[93] The time required to assess and implement relocation through the ICC's Protection Programme (ICCPP), managed by the Victims and Witnesses Unit within the Registry, is an additional source of delays,[94] since such protection may be required before redactions can safely be withdrawn. The Appeals Chamber (majority) has ruled that the law as it currently stands does not allow the prosecution to unilaterally 'preventively relocate' witnesses,[95] a measure that could have expedited the lifting of redactions.

A complication with respect to protective redactions is that they require coordination not only between the different procedural stages in the same case, but also between different cases. Again, the Chambers have taken different approaches. Most Pre-Trial Chambers and the Katanga and Ngudjolo Trial Chamber have insisted on strict judicial supervision and pre-authorization of any redaction.[96] Other Chambers, such as the Trial Chamber in Lubanga,[97] have opted for a similar approach, but later amended the system to be based on post-disclosure authorization. An alternative approach, taken in Muthaura and Kenyatta and in Ruto and Sang, is the adoption of a protocol with a pre-approved set of categories of redactions that are allowed without further judicial authorization and individual assessment primarily in instances when a redaction is contested.[98] This system also permitted redactions granted by the Pre-Trial Chamber to stand without a new application, but the protocol required the disclosing party to review such material and lift redactions in accordance with the timelines provided [92] E.g. Prosecution notification of withdrawal of the charges against Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-687, OTP, ICC, 11 March 2013, para. 11.

[93] Art 68(5) ICC Statute. [94] American University (n 36) 63–7.

[95] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the 'Decision on Evidentiary Scope of the Confirmation Hearing, Preventive Relocation and Disclosure under Article 67(2) of the Statute and Rule 77 of the Rules' of Pre-Trial Chamber I, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-776, AC, ICC, 26 November 2008 (Judges Pikis and Song dissenting).

[96] E.g. Decision on the Redaction Process, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-819, TC II, ICC, 12 January 2009.

[97] Decision Regarding the Timing and Manner of Disclosure and the Date of Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1019, TC I, ICC, 9 November 2007, para. 27 (pre-authorization), and Decision on the Prosecution's Request for Non-Disclosure of Information in Six Documents, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2763-Red, TC I, ICC, 25 July 2011.

[98] E.g. Decision on the protocol establishing a redaction regime, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-458, TC V, ICC, 27 September 2012.

therein.[99] In Banda and Jerbo, the Pre-Trial Chamber allowed disclosure with the same redactions as in another case without further pre-authorization.[100]

Additionally, numerous challenges have been made and decisions rendered in all cases with respect to the prosecutor's duty to disclose exculpatory evidence. This includes the stay of proceedings in Lubanga,[101] which at its core related to the interpretation of the relationship between two statutory provisions: the obligation to disclose exculpatory evidence (Article 67(2) of the ICC Statute) and the prosecutor's power to agree to non-disclosure in order to obtain confidential information (Article 54(3)(e) of the ICC Statute).

As already mentioned, the Court's 'Lessons Learnt' process has identified disclosure of evidence as a reform area. A key issue is to establish the function and nature of the confirmation process and then adapt the requirements for pre-confirmation disclosure. Since the functions and standards of the confirmation and trial processes are different, additional disclosure by the Prosecution can be expected post-confirmation. The Court has also explicitly acknowledged that 'the statutory framework and case law permit the Prosecution to alter its evidentiary presentation between confirmation and trial'.[102]

Hence, the approach should be to standardize the system of disclosure, as well as the system for redactions, so that pre-confirmation and post-confirmation disclosure is designed with the function and nature of the respective process in mind. Of course, the disclosure regime must ensure the rights of the accused, which does not necessarily require judicial involvement or complete disclosure pre-confirmation. Although a 'dossier'-approach may reduce some of the problems connected with a more adversarial 'disclosure' process, this does raise difficult issues with respect to the limited nature of the confirmation process and, if available to the Trial Chamber, the risk of prejudice or bias that may affect the arbiter of facts (even a professional one). Additionally, the differences between the confirmation and trial processes limit the usefulness of a 'dossier'.[103] A more confined confirmation process, as argued here, points towards a simplified scheme for disclosure and redactions pre-confirmation, to [100] Decision on issues relating to Disclosure, Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-49, PTC I, ICC, 29 June 2010, paras 11–12 (Judge Tarfusser partly dissenting).

[99] Ibid., para. 23.

[101] See Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01704-01/06-140, TC I, ICC, 13 June 2008, and Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Consequences of Non-disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Article 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, Together with Certain other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1486, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008.

[102] Public redacted version of the 25 February 2013 Consolidated Prosecution response to the Defence applications under Art 64 of the Statue to refer the confirmation decision back to the Pre-Trial Chamber, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-664-Red2, TC V, 25 February 2013, para. 21; see also paras 18–20 with further references.

[103] See also V Lindsay, 'A Review of International Criminal Court Proceedings under Part V of the Rome Statute (Investigation and Prosecution) and Proposals for Amendments' (2010) Revue québécoise de droit international (Hors série) 165, 195.

be followed by a more elaborated, yet standardized, scheme for disclosure and redactions post-confirmation.

The 'Lessons Learnt' process has also identified the relationship between Chambers, the OTP, and the Victims and Witness Unit in relation to witness protection, as an area for further discussion.[104]

36.6 The Role of the Trial Chamber

In spite of the suggestion that a clear distinction between a Prosecution case and a defence case is 'unnecessary' at the ICC,[105] the practice has been an adversarial organization of the trials. As it is also the prevailing practice of most international criminal tribunals,[106] this scheme is likely to continue, which in turn impacts on matters such as trial preparations and the role of the Trial Chamber. However, there can be considerable differences within the boundaries of a trial scheme that is basically adversarial in nature.

In the trials so far, a bifurcated trial with a separate sentencing phase (post-conviction) has been applied or is anticipated.[107] Notwithstanding the distinction between distinct prosecution and defence cases, the procedural mechanism of a 'no-case-to-answer' submission, or 'half way determination', has not been employed. Although there is no explicit provision authorizing the ICC Trial Chamber to apply such a mechanism, which may lead to a full or partial acquittal without the presentation of the defence case, it has been argued that the mechanism, if cautiously applied, could promote fairness to the defence and trial efficiency, and thus should be considered by the Court.[108] The Ruto and Sang Trial Chamber has indicated its preparedness to consider such a request at the end of the prosecution case.[109]

Generally speaking, the Trial Chamber has broad powers with respect to the preparations for and the conduct of the trial.[110] Fairness, impartiality, and expeditiousness are explicitly set forth as specific objectives, as well as full respect of the rights of the accused and due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses. Considerable discretion applies also with respect to evidence. A recent amendment to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, originating from the judges, allows a single judge of the Trial Chamber to be designated for the preparation of the trial,[111] which has the potential of expediting the proceedings.

In practice, the ICC Trial Chambers have taken a rather active managerial role and aimed to steer the proceedings by, inter alia, issuing guidelines, scheduling orders, [104] See Study Group on Governance: Lessons Learnt (n 40) point B.7.

[105] E.g. S Kirsch, 'The Trial Proceedings before the ICC' (2006) 6 International Criminal Law Review 275, 287.

[106] For a thorough survey, see G Sluiter et al. (eds), International Criminal Procedure: Principles and Rules (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013).

[107] See Art 76 ICC Statute.

[108] See H Friman et al., 'Charges' in Sluiter et al. (n 106) 475.

[109] Decision on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (General Directions), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-847, TC V(A), ICC, 9 August 2013, para. 32.

[110] In particular, Art 64(3) and (8) ICC Statute.

[111] Rule 132*bis* ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence, as amended by Resolution ICC-ASP/11/Res.2.

etc. For example, the Lubanga Trial Chamber held 54 status conferences prior to the commencement of the trial hearing. This is fully in line with the broad powers of the Chamber according to Article 64 of the ICC Statute, and is not per se controversial. Certain measures, in particular requiring the prosecution to provide in advance a clear linkage between each piece of evidence and the allegations in the charges ('in-depth analysis chart'),[112] have been challenged, albeit unsuccessfully, but they have arguably been beneficial for the preparations and conduct of the trial. However, in Muthaura and Kenyatta and Ruto and Sang, the Trial Chamber considered an 'in-depth-analysis-chart' to be unnecessary and was satisfied with an updated DCC, that reflected the charges as confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber, and a Prosecution pre-trial brief 'explaining its case with reference to the witnesses it intends to call and the other incriminating evidence it intends to rely on'.[113]

Calling witnesses to appear in person, or even by means of audio or video technology, generally requires the cooperation of states and others, which often involves a cumbersome and time-consuming process. While live evidence is the preferred option,[114] there is room for other means of evidence that could be further explored and could expedite the trial.[115] In addition, certain practices adopted by the Trial Chambers, such as the prohibition on 'witness proofing',[116] albeit welcomed by many commentators for principled and other reasons,[117] and the antipathy towards leading questions even on cross-examination in Bemba,[118] may also have added to the length of the trial.

With respect to admissibility of evidence, the Pre-Trial Chambers have generally declined to decide at the time of the submission of each piece of evidence and instead placed the emphasis on assessing the weight of the evidence in the confirmation decision. The Trial Chambers, on the contrary, have considered the question already at the time of the submission of the evidence. However, although the Katanga and Ngudjolo Trial Chamber found the admissibility test to be mandatory, i.e. that the relevance and probative value of each piece of evidence must be assessed before being admitted into evidence,[119] the Bemba Trial Chamber (majority) decided that witness statements

[112] E.g. Decision on the 'Prosecution's Submissions on the Trial Chamber's 8 December 2009 Oral Order Requesting Updating of the In-Depth Analysis Chart', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-682, TC III, ICC, 29 January 2010.

[113] Decision on the schedule leading up to trial, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-440, TC V, ICC, 9 July 2012, para. 6; Decision on the schedule leading up to trial, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-451, TC V, 9 July 2012, para. 11.

[114] Art 69(2) ICC Statute.

[115] See American University (n 36) 35–45. See also A Fulford, 'The Reflections of a Trial Judge', speech to the ICC ASP (6 December 2010).

[116] E.g. Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1049, TC I, ICC, 30 November 2007.

[117] E.g. K Ambos, '"Witness proofing" before the ICC: Neither legally admissible nor necessary' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden/Boston: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2009) 599.

[118] Decision on Directions for the Conduct of the Proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1023, TC III, ICC, 19 November 2010, para. 15, and Transcript of Hearing, Bemba, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-34-ENG, TC III, ICC, 24 November 2010, 36–7.

[119] Decision on the Prosecutor's Bar Table Motions, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2635, TC II, ICC, 17 December 2010, para. 13.

could be admitted prima facie, before the start of the presentation of evidence, without an admissibility ruling.[120] The Appeals Chamber reversed the decision in Bemba and explained that 'the Trial Chamber may rule on the relevance and/or admissibility of each item of evidence when it is submitted, and then determine the weight to be attached to the evidence at the end of the trial', or alternatively 'the Chamber may defer its consideration of these criteria until the end of the proceedings, making it part of its assessment of the evidence when it is evaluating the guilt or innocence of the accused person'.[121] Hence, the Trial Chamber 'will have to consider the relevance, probative value and the potential prejudice of each item of evidence at some point in the proceedings—when evidence is submitted, during the trial, or at the end of the trial'.[122]

Of more importance, however, is the substantive role of the Trial Chamber vis-à-vis the parties (and participants). In this sense, the activities are more fundamental in nature and go beyond setting rules and ensuring the orderly conduct of the proceedings. The Lubanga Trial Chamber explained that the parties (and participants) are responsible for identifying the relevant evidence, but that the Chamber has broad powers to intervene.[123] In practice, this approach goes further than the traditionally more passive role in common-law jurisdictions, but falls short of the active 'truth-finding' role of the judge in civil-law jurisdictions.[124] Nonetheless, the truth-finding function has been given priority concerning the Trial Chamber's power to call additional evidence and the Appeals Chamber has confirmed that this authority covers both exculpatory and mitigating evidence; a civil-law feature that would be unthinkable or at least controversial in adversarial systems.[125]

The Trial Chambers have used the power to call witnesses in addition to the evidence submitted by the parties. In Lubanga, the Chamber did so at different stages of the trial hearing: after the prosecution's evidence[126] and after the close of the parties' presentations of evidence.[127] The Chamber left the questions of whether and when to call [120] Decision on the admission into evidence of materials contained in the prosecution's list of evidence, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1022, TC III, ICC, 19 November 2010, para. 8 (Judge Ozaki dissenting).

[121] Judgment on the appeals of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber III entitled 'Decision on the Admission into Evidence of Materials Contained in the Prosecution's List of Evidence', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1386, AC, ICC, 3 May 2011, para. 37.

[122] Ibid.

[123] See Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga (n 16) para. 95 (with reference to oral directions).

[124] See K Ambos, 'The First Judgment of the International Criminal Court (Prosecutor v Lubanga): A Comprehensive Analysis of Legal Issues' (2012) 12 International Criminal Law Review 115, 121–4.

[125] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Katanga against the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 22 January 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Modalities of Victim Participation at Trial', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2288, AC, ICC, 16 July 2010, para. 86. The Appeals Chamber also found that victims may be requested to submit incriminating evidence, ibid., para. 37.

[126] E.g. Transcript of Status Conference, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-222-ENG, TC I, ICC, 9 December 2009.

[127] Redacted Decision on the Prosecution's Application to Admit Rebuttal Evidence from Witness DRC-OTP-WWWW-000528, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2727, TC I, 28 April 2011, paras 62–6.

court evidence to be determined in light of the development of the case.[128] In Katanga and Ngudjolo, however, the sequencing was pre-determined, but the Chamber underlined its power to 'intervene at all times and order the production of all evidence necessary for the determination of the truth'.[129] A similar approach was taken in Bemba and Ruto and Sang, although the directions were less comprehensive.[130] Moreover, the Katanga and Ngudjolo Trial Chamber adopted a stronger managerial role, inter alia, by imposing time limits,[131] an approach that may well have contributed to the shorter time for preparations between confirmation and trial in this case. Another practice that can save time is reliance upon oral decisions.

The Trial Chambers also employed the power to put questions to witnesses.[132] The scope and mode of judicial questioning, which is unregulated, expose the Chamber's view of its competence concerning fact-finding and trial-management. The subject matter and form of judicial questioning were raised by the defence in Lubanga, claiming that 'a significant number of questions put by the Bench to the witnesses called by the prosecutor, the Court and the participating victims could "seriously affect" the "appearance of impartially" if they are repeated during the examination of witnesses called by the accused'.[133] The Trial Chamber concluded that it may ask questions relating to criminal acts and charges falling beyond the scope of the confirmed charges insofar as the information is relevant for sentencing or reparations to victims, and questions that may assist in 'establishing the true context of, and background to, the facts and circumstances described in the charges'.[134] Further, the Chamber allowed itself to ask leading questions.[135] Similar defence objections raised in Katanga and Ngudjolo were also rejected.[136]

While the trial proceedings have broadly been similar in the different cases, certain differences exist. The first few cases have been used for developing the procedures, and testing different alternatives, which is natural in a new institution. However, the differences also create uncertainty and may cause delays. Instead of reflecting the preferences of each bench, it is now time to take stock of the practices and further [128] E.g. Redacted version of 'Preliminary and Final Decisions on the Group of Potential Court Witnesses', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2033, TC I, ICC, 25 June 2009, para. 16.

[129] Directions for the conduct of the proceedings and testimony in accordance with rule 140, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1665, TC II, ICC, 20 November 2009, Annex para. 3.

[130] Decision on Directions for the Conduct of the Proceedings, Bemba (n 118); Decision on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (General Directions), Ruto and Sang (n 109).

[131] E.g. Directions for the conduct of the proceedings and testimony in accordance with rule 140, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 129) Annex. See also Decision No. 2 on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (General Directions), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-900, TC V(A), ICC, 3 September 2013, paras 27–8. See further, S Vasiliev, 'Trial Process: Structure of Contested Trial' in Sluiter et al. (n 106) 605–6.

[132] Rule 140(2)(c) ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[133] See Decision on judicial questioning, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2360, TC I, ICC, 18 March 2010, para. 1.

[134] Ibid., paras 33–40.

[135] Ibid., paras 43–7.

[136] Transcript of Hearing, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-112-Red, TC II, ICC, 4 March 2010, 7–13.

standardize the trial proceedings, which in turn requires a common understanding among the judges of the role of the Trial Chamber. With respect to the format and procedure for the presentation of evidence, the need for reform has been identified in the 'Lessons Learnt' process.[137]

36.7 Concluding Remarks

Much of what has now been discussed relates to the confirmation process conducted by the Pre-Trial Chamber. Clearly, this part of the process must be consistent with the following pre-trial phase, conducted by the Trial Chamber, and the proceedings should be regarded as a whole. Otherwise there will be unnecessary overlaps and delays in the process. But the current confirmation practice has caused complications in the trial process, which affects the length of the proceedings and, thus, the accused's right to be tried without undue delay. Arguably, the centre of gravity in criminal proceedings should be the first-instance trial, and the confirmation should be seen as a supplementary process.

Assuming that the focus should be on optimal conditions for a fair and well-prepared trial, and that the confirmation should serve a more limited screening function, the current combination of the two procedural stages must be considered dysfunctional. Part of the problem appears to stem from the opinion that the Pre-Trial Chamber should exercise an active truth-finding role in the confirmation process. Of course, any judicial process should be as precise in substance as possible, but it is quite another matter to actively seek to ascertain 'the truth'. In any case, such a function can only be performed at a procedural stage where all relevant material can and should be available to the adjudicator. At the ICC, this occurs at trial, while the confirmation process is deliberately circumscribed by limitations concerning the evidence which accords with the applicable evidentiary standard and indeed the functions of these proceedings. Clear indications of this in the ICC Statute are, inter alia, the explicit reference to lesser means of providing evidence for the purpose of confirmation (Article 61(5)) and the power to withhold disclosure of evidence for security reasons until the commencement of the trial (Article 68(5)).

It is also important to note that it is not a function of the confirmation process to assess whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain a future conviction.[138] Again, this is a task for the trial and the Trial Chamber, applying a different and higher evidentiary standard.

The Trial Chamber should be the 'master of its own proceedings', which necessarily includes crucial parts of the preparations for trial. With this view, the room for coordinating the two processes, in the sense of tasking the Pre-Trial Chamber with resolving issues of disclosure, redactions, admissibility of evidence, etc. for the purpose of the trial, is rather limited.[139]

[137] See Study Group on Governance: Lessons Learnt (n 40) point B.3.

[138] See also Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-243-Red., PTC I, ICC, 8 February 2010, para. 40.

[139] Cf. Nerlich (n 35) 1354–6, also noting that the contribution of the confirmation process to the preparations for trial has been limited, but arguing that this could change if the confirmation hearing is held later in the process and at a time when the Prosecutor's investigation is concluded. Contrary to the

Obviously this view is not shared by all, and many a Pre-Trial Chamber has interpreted its confirmation mandate, including the disclosure of evidence, to go much further. One troubling consequence is the resulting ambiguity concerning the legal limits for the Trial Chamber's adjudication of the confirmed case. Another consequence is the diverging practice and duplications with respect to pre-confirmation and post-confirmation disclosure, resulting in additional work and delays. The problems have been identified in the Court's 'Lessons Learnt' process, and a point of departure should be to clarify the nature and function of the confirmation process. The review may result in statutory amendments to various legal instruments. In this process it may also be considered whether the current scheme of contested confirmation really has an added value, or if it almost inevitably results in an incomplete 'mini-trial' which, in turn, complicates rather than assists a subsequent trial.[140] Indeed, the screening function of the confirmation process might be sufficiently discharged with an adjusted mechanism that does not entail the aforementioned complications for the trial.

approach advocated now, however, Nerlich would rather see the Trial Chamber 'focus on the trial itself and . . . spend less time on trial preparation'.

[140] See W Schabas, 'The International Criminal Court at Ten' (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 493, 497–9 (arguing for the elimination of the confirmation hearing).

37

Proportionate Sentencing at the ICC

*Margaret M. deGuzman

37.1 Introduction

The ICC is just beginning to develop a sentencing practice. The Court issued its first sentence in July 2012, ordering Thomas Lubanga to spend 14 years in prison for the widespread recruitment and use of children in armed conflict. In reaching this sentence, the Trial Chamber invoked various factors including, in particular, the gravity of the crimes. The Chamber made no attempt, however, to explain the sentence in terms of the purposes of punishing people convicted at the international level. The Appeals Chamber affirmed the sentence, again with little discussion of the purposes of punishment. The ICC's second sentencing judgment in the Katanga case likewise lacks substantial engagement with the purposes of punishment. These omissions are understandable. Debates concerning the morally appropriate distribution of punishment have occupied philosophers and legal scholars for centuries, and there is no resolution in sight. National systems employ vastly different approaches to the allocation of punishment, and the ICC's predecessor international tribunals have struggled rather ineffectively with the task. The drafters of the Rome Statute largely eschewed inquiry into the purposes of punishment. The ICC's judges can therefore be forgiven for their reticence to explain in detail how the sentences they inflict serve to effectuate the purposes of ICC punishment.

Nonetheless, it is important that the ICC begin to develop philosophically coherent justifications for the amounts of punishment it inflicts. As a new institution representing an amorphous 'international community', one of the ICC's most pressing tasks is to build its own legitimacy.[1] Institutional legitimacy hinges on the perceptions of relevant audiences that the institution employs appropriate processes and produces correct outcomes.[2] Currently, there is limited agreement at the international level on

* Associate Professor, Temple University Beasley School of Law; PhD, National University of Ireland Galway; JD Yale Law School; MALD Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy; BSFS Georgetown University School of Foreign Service. I am grateful to Jean Galbraith, Adil Haque, and William Schabas for their helpful comments on earlier drafts. I also thank David Layne for his excellent research assistance.

[1] Legitimacy in this context refers to sociological, as opposed to moral or legal, legitimacy. Sociological legitimacy considers the perceptions of relevant audiences that a regime or decision is justified. See R Fallon Jr., 'Legitimacy and the Constitution' (2005) 118 Harvard Law Review 1787, 1796–7.

[2] D Luban, 'Fairness to Rightness: Jurisdiction, Legality, and the Legitimacy of International Criminal Law' in S Besson and J Tasioulas (eds), The Philosophy of International Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 579–80. See also A Hole, 'The Sentencing Provisions of the International Criminal Court' (2005) 1 International Journal of Punishment and Sentencing 37, 68–9 (arguing that the extent to which the ICC is perceived to promote justice is dependent on the articulation of clear sentencing purposes and a principled approach to determining sentences).

either the appropriate considerations for sentencing or the correct allocation of punishment. Without a punishment philosophy, the ICC's sentencing practice is therefore likely to be procedurally incoherent and to produce inconsistent outcomes. Indeed, the sentencing practice of the ad hoc international tribunals has been criticized on these grounds.

Adopting a punishment philosophy will not immunize ICC sentences against such criticisms. No philosophy can explain punishment allocations perfectly, nor will all constituents approve whatever philosophy the ICC adopts. Nonetheless, consistent adherence to a punishment philosophy should enhance the coherence of ICC sentencing practice. Such increased coherence will promote positive perceptions of the ICC's legitimacy. Coherent sentencing decisions will also contribute to the ICC's central mission of building a community of shared criminal law norms at the global level.

This chapter seeks to contribute to that endeavour by proposing a theory of proportionality for the ICC. The concept of proportionality is often understood in purely retributive terms—punishment should accord with the desert of the perpetrator. Indeed, the few scholars who have written about proportionality at international courts have advocated a retributive approach. This chapter argues that the ICC should reject this focus on retribution, using the concept at most as a limiting principle. That is, the judges should not inflict more punishment than they believe an offender deserves.

The focus of ICC proportionality analysis should instead be the preventive utility of international punishment. The ICC's core mission is to prevent international crimes. Crime prevention can be accomplished in various ways including through specific and general deterrence, incapacitation, and restorative justice. The most important component of prevention for the ICC, however, is norm expression. The ICC's primary purpose is to express condemnation of international crimes and thereby to build a community of shared norms at the global level. In seeking to identify proportionate punishment, therefore, ICC judges should focus primarily on the need for appropriate norm expression and secondarily on other aspects of prevention such as deterrence, incapacitation, and restorative justice. They should apply the principle of parsimony to identify the least severe punishment they believe will contribute to the prevention of future international crimes.

The chapter begins with a brief critique of the ICC's first sentencing judgment. Next, it provides an overview of the dominant theories of proportionality and some of their implications for sentencing practice. Third, the chapter examines the sources of law available to the ICC as it seeks to develop its approach to proportionality analysis, demonstrating that they support a focus on crime prevention. Fourth, the chapter explains why retributive proportionality would be both impracticable and dangerous for the ICC. Finally, the chapter proposes a preventive theory of proportionate punishment and discusses some of the theory's consequences for the ICC sentencing procedure.

37.2 The ICC's First Sentencing Judgment

In the ICC's first sentencing judgment, a divided Trial Chamber gives almost no indication of how the 14-year sentence it inflicts effectuates the purposes of ICC punishment. Indeed, parts of the majority opinion suggest that the judges have yet to determine what justifies such punishment. For instance, at the outset of the opinion, the Trial Chamber notes that the only other international court to have sentenced offenders for recruiting or using child soldiers is the SCSL.[3] The SCSL sentenced two offenders to 50 and 35 years respectively for these crimes. The Chamber considers the sentences the SCSL inflicted relevant because 'the ad hoc tribunals are in a comparable position to the Court in the context of sentencing'.[4] The Chamber does not explain what it means by 'a comparable position'. The statement implies, however, that the judges view the two institutions as sharing punishment purposes. This is a highly debatable proposition. The ad hoc tribunals were established in response to conflicts in particular countries and are aimed in significant part at addressing the needs of those populations. Indeed, their statutes permit, and in some cases require, reference to local sentencing practices.[5] Since the ICC, in contrast, aims to prevent international crimes at the global level,[6] its sentencing goals are arguably quite different from those of the ad hoc tribunals.

The remainder of the Trial Chamber's judgment does little to clarify the purposes guiding the sentence selected. The Chamber notes that the ICC was established to end impunity and thus to prevent future crimes.[7] It then reviews the statutory provisions and rules governing sentencing. These include the requirement that Chamber take into account the gravity of the crime, the individual circumstances of the convicted person, and any aggravating and mitigating circumstances.[8] The Chamber is required to balance all the relevant factors and to identify a sentence that reflects the culpability of the convicted person.[9] Lastly, the Chamber notes that the statute requires 'that the sentence is in proportion to the crime'.[10] After listing the various requirements, the Chamber proceeds to discuss the relevant factors and to pronounce a sentence without, however, explaining the connections between the factors and the outcome. The separate opinion of Judge Odio Benito adopts a similar strategy, concluding that the sentence should be one year longer, but without justifying the claim in terms of the purposes of punishment.[11]

Nowhere in either opinion do the judges attempt to explain how they understand the concept of proportionality or the role that culpability plays in ensuring proportionality. The principle of proportionality makes an appearance in the majority opinion when the judges cite it to reject the prosecutor's argument that all ICC crimes should be subject to

[3] Decision on the Sentence pursuant to Art 76 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2901, TC I, ICC, 10 July 2012 ('Lubanga Decision on sentence'), para. 12.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Art 19 of the Statute of the SCSL, Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000 (signed 16 January 2002, entered into force 12 April 2002) 2178 UNTS 137('SCSL Statute'). See also Art 24 of the Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute'); Art 24 of the Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute')

[6] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[7] Lubanga Decision on sentence (n 3) para. 16. [8] Ibid., para. 23. [9] Ibid., para. 25.

[10] Ibid., para. 26.

[11] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Odio Benito, Lubanga Decision on sentence (n 3) paras 26 and 27.

a 24-year baseline sentence based on their gravity.[12] But the judges fail to explain whether 24 years would be disproportionate to some ICC crimes in terms of the offender's desert, the utility of punishment, or some combination. Indeed, neither the majority nor the dissenting opinion mentions the traditional purposes of punishment of retribution, deterrence, incapacitation, and rehabilitation. Yet, as the next section explains, the concept of proportionality cannot be understood in isolation from the purposes of punishment.[13]

The Appeals Chamber Decision affirming Lubanga's sentence also omits any explicit discussion of the purposes of punishment. However, the Appeals Chamber seems implicitly to adopt a retributive theory of proportionality when it states that '[p]roportionality is generally measured by the degree of harm caused by the crime and the culpability of the perpetrator.'[14] While this statement is not on its face incompatible with the more utilitarian approach to proportionality advocated herein, the law review article that the judges cite in support of the statement treats proportionality as an entirely retributive inquiry.[15] For the reasons explained in the next section, a strictly retributive approach to proportionality at the ICC would be a mistake.

37.3 Proportionality Theories

The Rome Statute's requirement that punishment be proportionate to the crime reflects a principle common to most criminal justice systems around the world. Implementation of the principle varies greatly, however. Such variation results from different beliefs and priorities regarding the purposes of punishment.[16] Broadly, justifications for punishment fall into two categories: retributive theories that justify punishment, as well as its distribution, by reference to the offender's desert; and utilitarian theories that seek justification in the beneficial consequences of punishment, in particular, crime prevention. These theories and the tensions among them are the subject of an enormous body of scholarship and jurisprudence.[17]

Proportionality is most often discussed in retributive terms: those who commit more serious offences deserve more severe punishments.[18] Indeed, many writers assume that [12] Lubanga decision on sentence (n 3) para. 93.

[13] K Huigens, 'Rethinking the Penalty Phase' (2000) 32 Arizona State Law Journal 1195, 1204 ('Proportionality in punishment is a substantive criminal law value that is impossible to understand…without resort to the theory of punishment').

[14] Judgment on the appeals of the Prosecutor and Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the 'Decision on Sentence pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06 A 4 A 6, TC I, ICC, 1 December 2014, para. 40 ('Lubanga Appeals Chamber Decision on Sentencing').

[15] Ibid., n 69, citing A M Danner, 'Constructing a Hierarchy of Crimes in International Criminal Law Sentencing', 87, Virginia Law Review 415 (May 2001) 437–8.

[16] For a good overview of how justifications for punishment impact sentencing theory and the concept of proportionality see A von Hirsch, 'Proportionality in the Philosophy of Punishment: From 'Why Punish?' to 'How Much?' (1990) 1 Criminal Law Forum 259.

[17] See generally G Newman, The Punishment Response 2nd edn (New Brunswick: Transaction Publishers 2008) (providing an overview of punishment theories, their history, and the interactions between punishment principles).

[18] See e.g. I Kant, The Philosophy of Law: An Exposition of the Fundamental Principles of Jurisprudence as the Science of Right (W Hastie tr., Edinburgh: T & T Clark 1887; K Greenawalt, 'Punishment' (1983) 74 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 343, 347; P Robinson, 'Competing Conceptions of Modern Desert: Vengeful, Deontological, and Empirical' (2008) 67 The Cambridge Law Journal 145.

the term 'proportionality' inherently refers to a retributive approach to distributing punishment.[19] Utilitarian theorists also endorse proportionality, however, albeit a different version. For utilitarian theorists, punishment is justified only to the extent that it serves to promote social goods, in particular, crime prevention.[20] Proportionality therefore requires sentences that are sufficient but not excessive in relation to the expected social goods.[21] Without attempting to summarize the vast literature developing variations on these theories, what follows sets forth the basic arguments as they pertain to the quest for a theory of international sentencing proportionality.

37.3.1 Retributive proportionality

Retributive theories justify punishment entirely based on the desert of the perpetrator. A rich literature exists invoking moral principles to explain the concept of 'desert'. For some retributivists, for example, punishment is deserved because the offender has violated the social contract,[22] while for others desert derives from the devaluation of the victim inherent in the criminal act.[23] Retributive proportionality holds that punishment should be calibrated to the perpetrator's desert. While retributive theories differ in their emphases, all measure desert in terms of the harm the offender caused and the offender's culpability in relation to that harm. The more serious the offender's crime along these axes, the more punishment is deserved.

An important divide in theories of retributive proportionality concerns whether proportionality is conceived as a cardinal or ordinal principle. Early retributive theorists, most famously Immanuel Kant, believed that punishment must be cardinally proportionate to desert.[24] To be morally justified, the seriousness of the punishment must precisely match the extent of the offender's desert. An early formulation of this idea is the principle of lex talionis, which holds that a murderer deserves to be killed, a batterer deserves to be beaten, and so on.[25] Although modern retributivists reject lex talionis as the appropriate principle of proportionality, some continue to understand proportionality in cardinal terms.[26] For them, proportionality requires sentences that reflect adequately the absolute gravity of the crime in terms of desert.

[19] See e.g. A Hoel, 'The Sentencing Provisions of the International Criminal Court: Common Law, Civil Law, or Both?' (2007) 33 Monash University Law Review 264, 288 ('Given that the sentencing provisions of the ICC have endorsed proportionality, it would seem to be uncontentious that retribution will be endorsed as the primary sentencing purpose'); M Tonry, 'Selective Incapacitation: The Debate Over its Ethics' in A von Hirsch and A Ashworth (eds), Principled Sentencing (Boston: Northeastern University Press 1992) 166 (implying a definition of proportionality that is entirely retributive and stating that proportionality is relatively unimportant to utilitarians theorists).

[20] Greenawalt (n 18) 352.

[21] See J Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation (New York: Dover 2007).

[22] See e.g. H Morris, 'Persons and Punishment' (1968) 52 Monist 475, 476–9.

[23] See e.g. J Hampton, 'The Retributive Idea' in J Murphy and J Hampton (eds), Forgiveness and Mercy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1988) 124–8; J Hampton, 'An Expressive Theory of Retribution' in W Cragg (ed.), Retributivism and its Critics (Stuttgart: Franz Steiner 1992) 5–11.

[24] Kant (n 18) 196.

[25] See A von Hirsch, Censure and Sanctions (Oxford: Clarendon Press 1993).

[26] See e.g. (n 108) for a discussion of Jens Ohlin's cardinally retributive approach to international proportionality.

Many modern retributivists, however, reject the idea that cardinally proportionate punishment can be identified.[27] Theorists have responded to this problem in two ways. Some, most notably Norval Morris, have retreated from the notion of desert as the basis for proportionality, advocating instead the use of desert as a limiting principle.[28] In Morris' 'limiting retributivism', desert remains a cardinal principle, but functions only as an upper, and, more controversially, a lower limit on just punishment.[29] Within the broad range of punishments that are 'not undeserved', proportionate punishment is that which advances the utilitarian goals of punishment at the lowest cost.[30] Morris' limiting retributivism thus privileges the utilitarian goal of parsimony over the principle of equality.[31] Other scholars have endorsed Morris' limiting retributivism with modifications. Richard Frase, for instance, argues that proportionality should largely be a matter of retributive considerations, with utilitarian concerns applicable only within a narrow range of deserved sentences.[32]

Other retributive theorists, such as Andrew von Hirsh, respond to the incommensurability of crime and punishment by treating desert not as a cardinal concept but as an ordinal one.[33] Rather than seeking to identify deserved punishment in absolute terms, ordinal proportionality merely aspires to impose punishment that places the defendant's sentence in appropriate relationship to other sentences on a spectrum of seriousness.[34] Without claiming to know the right punishment for murder, for example, an ordinal theory of retributive proportionality posits that murderers generally deserve greater punishment than thieves.

This version of retributive proportionality is difficult to justify in terms of moral principle. Ordinal retributive proportionality does not assure that the offender receives the punishment he or she deserves but merely that the punishment is in the [27] M Tonry, 'Individualizing Punishments' in A Ashworth et al. (eds), Principled Sentencing: Readings on Theory and Policy (Oxford: Hart Publishing Limited 2009) 356 (stating that while 'rigid retributivists' advocate cardinal proportionality, 'subtler retributivists . . . admit that in the abstract we can never agree on the single ideally appropriate punishment for any crime . . .'). For a discussion of this problem from a utilitarian perspective see A Ristroph, 'Desert, Democracy, and Sentencing Reform' (2006) 96 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 1293, 1308–13 (arguing that the concept of desert is too elastic to provide meaningful guidance for sentencing policies).

[28] See N Morris, 'Punishment, Desert and Rehabilitation' in H Gross and A von Hirsch (eds), Sentencing (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1981) 268–9.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Ibid., 267. See also R Frase, 'Excessive Prison Sentences, Punishment Goals, and the Eighth Amendment: "Proportionality" Relative to What?' (2005) 89 Minnesota Law Review 571, 591 (elaborating on the theory of limited retributivism, which 'allows all traditional punishment purposes to play a role but places retributive outer limits both on who may be punished (only those who are blameworthy), and how hard they may be punished (within a range of penalties which would be widely viewed as neither unfairly severe or unduly lenient).'). The most recent proposed sentencing provision for the US Model Penal Code adopts this theory of proportional sentencing. Model Penal Code: Sentencing xxiv (Tentative Draft No. 2, 2011).

[31] R Frase, 'Limiting Retributivism' in M Tonry (ed.), The Future of Imprisonment (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2006) 83 (discussing Morris' theory).

[32] Ibid., 83–119. [33] Von Hirsch (n 25) 18–19.

[34] See e.g. A von Hirsch, 'Proportionality in the Philosophy of Punishment' (1992) 16 Crime and Justice 55, 79–83; P Robinson, 'A Sentencing System for the 21st Century?' (1987) 66 Texas Law Review 1, 7. Notably, the United States Supreme Court has employed both relative and absolute conceptions of desert in its sentencing jurisprudence. See Y Lee, 'Why Proportionality Matters' (2012) 160 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 1835, 1840.

appropriate relationship to the punishments inflicted on other offenders. Without principles anchoring the entire punishment scale, all offenders could be receiving more or less punishment than they deserve. Proponents of ordinal retributive proportionality have generally failed to supply such anchoring principles.[35]

Rather than seeking moral principles to anchor the punishment scale, some advocates of ordinally retributive proportionality turn to utilitarian justifications for this way of distributing punishment. Professor Paul Robinson and others argue that an ordinally retributive approach to the allocation of punishment is required because (i) people share a high level of agreement about how certain 'core' crimes rank in terms of seriousness; and (ii) sentences that fail to accord with these shared intuitions will be considered illegitimate.[36] Proponents of this 'empirical desert' approach to retributive proportionality sometimes hint at a moral basis for its adoption by arguing that shared intuitions about relative seriousness are based in human biology.[37] More frequently, however, the claim is that, whatever the source of the intuitions, they must be followed in order to ensure respect for the system—a consequentialist argument.[38]

In sum, retributive proportionality comes in ordinal and cardinal varieties and is variously justified by reference to moral principles and utilitarian considerations.

37.3.2 Utilitarian proportionality

Utilitarian theories justify punishment according to the social benefits it produces, in particular, the prevention of crime through general and specific deterrence, rehabilitation, and incapacitation, as well as through the expression and diffusion of social norms. Punishment is justified only to the extent that it produces such benefits. Utilitarian proportionality thus requires that punishment be sufficiently severe, but no more severe than necessary, to prevent future crimes. As Cesare Beccaria wrote in 1764, '[p]unishments . . . and the method of inflicting them, should be chosen in due proportion to the crime so as to make the most efficacious and lasting impression on the minds of men, and the least painful impressions on the body of the criminal'.[39]

[35] See e.g. Von Hirsch, 1990 (n 16) 288 ('Desert tells us more about comparative punishment than it does about setting the penalty scale's anchoring points'); ibid., 282–3 (describing the anchoring points of the punishment scale as a 'convention').

[36] P Robinson and R Kurzban, 'Concordance and Conflict in Intuitions of Justice' (2007) 91 Minnesota Law Review 1829, 1892; P Robinson et al., 'The Origins of Shared Intuitions of Justice' (2007) 60 Vanderbilt Law Review 1633, 1687; P Robinson and J Darley, 'Intuitions of Justice: Implications for Criminal Law and Justice Policy' (2007) 81 Southern California Law Review 1, 1; but see D Braman et al., 'Some Realism about Punishment Naturalism' (2010) 77 The University of Chicago Law Review 1531, 1532 (challenging the idea of shared intuitions of deserved punishment); C Slobogin and L Brinkley-Rubinstein, 'Putting Desert in its Place' (2013) 65 Stanford Law Review 77 passim.

[37] See e.g. J Darley, 'Realism on Change in Moral Intuitions' (2010) 77 University of Chicago Law Review 1643, 1643 (discussing perspective that people's judgments regarding punishment and justice are due in part to evolution of cognitive biases); Braman et al. (n 34) 1532–3 (explaining that 'Punishment Naturalists' believe 'highly nuanced intuitions about most forms of crime and punishment are broadly shared because they are innate'); J Mackie, 'Morality and the Retributive Emotions' (1982) 1 Criminal Justice Ethics 3, 8 (suggesting biological explanation for human desire for retributive justice).

[38] See Robinson and Darley (n 36) 1–2.

[39] See Cesare di Beccaria, Of Crimes and Punishments (J Grigson tr., New York: Marsilio Publishers 1996) 49.

Drawing on Beccaria's work, Jeremy Bentham elaborated a number of rules of utilitarian proportionality.[40] Professor Richard Frase classifies such rules as concerning either 'ends proportionality' or 'means proportionality'.[41] Ends proportionality reflects the basic utilitarian insight that the cost of punishment should not outweigh its benefits.[42] According to ends proportionality, more serious crimes should be punished more severely because the benefits derived from punishing them are likely greater. Ends proportionality therefore shares with retributive proportionality the view that punishment should be calibrated to the seriousness of the crime.[43] However, while retributive proportionality calculates the severity of crime in relation to both harm and culpability, ends proportionality focuses on harm, considering culpability only to the extent that it is related to the likely benefits of punishment, such as the prevention of future crimes.[44] Means proportionality, or what others have called the principle of parsimony,[45] seeks to ensure that the least burdensome punishment necessary to achieve the desired consequences is employed.[46]

Thus, while a retributivist punishes purely in accordance with the offender's desert, for a utilitarian, punishment should be no greater than necessary to promote the expected social goods, in particular the prevention of future crimes.

37.3.3 Expressive proportionality?

A third category of punishment theories is often labelled 'expressive' theories.[47] Expressive theories view punishment as warranted when it appropriately expresses moral condemnation of the offender's conduct.[48] Expressive theories differ as to the purpose of such condemnation, however. Some expressive theories are deontological and thus closely linked with retributive theories. For them, expression is considered a good in itself because of its value to the offender, to the victim, to society at large, or to some combination.[49] Other expressive theories are utilitarian, valuing denunciation as a means of achieving social goods such as crime prevention or reformation of the offender.[50]

[40] See Bentham (n 21) 83–4. [41] Frase (n 31) 592–7. [42] Ibid., 592. [43] Ibid., 594.

[44] Ibid.

[45] Bentham (n 21) 401; N Morris, The Future of Imprisonment (Chicago: University of Chicago Press 1974) 60–2.

[46] Frase (n 31) 595.

[47] Included in this category are what some have called 'moral-educative' theories. M Tonry, 'Rethinking Unthinkable Punishment Policies in America' (1999) 46 UCLA Law Review 1751, 1764.

[48] See e.g. J Feinberg, 'An Expressive Theory of Punishment' in J Feinberg (ed.), Doing and Deserving: Essays in the Theory of Responsibility (Princeton: Princeton University Press 1970) 101–5; D Kahan, 'What Do Alternative Sanctions Mean?' (1996) 63 University of Chicago Law Review 591, 598; H Hart, Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law 2nd edn (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 169–70 (discussing the expressive or denunciatory theory of punishment of James Fitzjames Stephen and the related views of Lord Denning).

[49] See e.g. A Duff, 'Punishment, Retribution and Communication' in Ashworth et al. (n 25) 127 (endorsing a theory based on the communication of censure 'to the offender and to a wider audience that includes the victim'); J Hampton, 'Correcting Harms Versus Righting Wrongs: The Goal of Retribution' (1992) 39 UCLA Law Review 1659, 1686 (arguing that expression vindicates the value of the victim); Kahan (n 48) 598 (punishment expresses to the offender that his assessment of the victim's value is wrong); Huigens (n 13) 1246 (arguing for an expressive theory of punishment based in virtue).

[50] H Hart rejected the notion that expression alone could justify punishment and opined that such an approach would come 'uncomfortably close to human sacrifice as an expression of religious worship'.

An important example of the latter type is the theory of 'positive general prevention' popular in Germany and parts of Scandinavia.[51] The theory builds on the work of Emile Durkheim, who posited that criminal law's function is to maintain social cohesion.[52] Although there are many varieties of positive general prevention, the central claim is that criminal law's purpose is to project and reinforce norms against criminal behaviour.[53] Norm projection prevents crime because people internalize the norms and comply with them. Such 'positive' prevention is distinguished from 'negative' efforts to discourage violations of those norms, for example through incapacitation and deterrence.[54]

Unlike retributive and utilitarian theorists, expressive theorists have not articulated a unique theory of proportionate punishment,[55] and thus there is no concept of 'expressive proportionality' in the literature. To the extent such theorists address proportionality, they rely on retribution (ordinal or cardinal) or a combination of retribution and utility as the grounds for distributing punishment. Among retributive expressivists, some, like Andrew von Hirsch, argue that only punishment that is ordinally retributive can adequately express the correct degree of moral condemnation of an offence.[56] On this view, the central task in sentencing is to identify the punishment that accurately reflects the offenders' desert in relation to the desert of other offenders.[57] Other retributive expressivists give desert a less prominent role in sentencing. For instance, Anthony Duff takes the following view of the role of retributive proportionality in sentencing:

> What matters is to find a sentence that will be communicatively adequate to the offence and the offender. This will be possible only if the sentencers have some

H Hart, Law, Liberty, and Morality (Stanford: Stanford University Press 1963) 53–4 (describing deontological expressive theories as the 'extreme thesis' and the utilitarian versions as the 'moderate thesis').

[51] See e.g. M Dubber, 'Theories of Crime and Punishment in German Criminal Law' (2005) 53 American Journal of Comparative Law 679 passim (providing an overview of Roxin and his theory); Tonry (n 47) 1765–6. The theory is sometimes cast as an attempt to reconcile retribution and utility. See Dubber, 'Theories' (n 51) 699; G Fletcher, The Grammar of Criminal Law: American, Comparative, and International vol. I (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2007) 254 (stating that positive general prevention has linkages with deontology and noting that this idea is also found in the work of Feinberg, Murphy, and others).

[52] E Durkheim, The Division of Labor in Society (G Simpson tr., New York: Free Press 1933) 102; Tonry (n 47) 1764.

[53] See Tonry (n 47) 1764; Fletcher (n 51) 254; J Andenaes, Punishment and Deterrence (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press 1974) passim; P Törnudd, 'Sentencing and Punishment in Finland' in M Tonry and K Hatlestad (eds), Sentencing Reform in Overcrowded Times: A Comparative Perspective (Oxford: Oxford University Press 1997) 189–94.

[54] Tonry (n 47) 1765.

[55] See e.g. H Bedau, 'Feinberg's Liberal Theory of Punishment' (2001) 5 Buffalo Criminal Law Review 103, 136 (criticizing Joel Feinberg for failing to articulate a theory of proportionality). Indeed, some scholars assert that expressive theories fail to supply a normative justification for punishment and are instead descriptive. See e.g. M Adler, 'Expressive Theories of Law: A Skeptical Overview' (200) 148 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 1363, 1414 ('[T]he fact that the institution we call "punishment" is essentially expressive hardly makes out the normative claim that punishment is justified in virtue of its expressive cast').

[56] See e.g. Von Hirsch (n 16) 279. For an expressive retributivist who seems to take a cardinal approach to proportionality see Hampton (n 49) 1690 ('The more awful the wrong, the larger the purported gulf between wrongdoer and victim, and thus the more substantial and severe the punishment must be in order to defeat the wrongdoer and thereby deny his claim to superiority').

[57] Duff (n 49) 132 (commenting on von Hirsch's approach to proportionality).

> substantial discretion as to the kind of sentence they impose: sentences must not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the crime, but, within the limits set by this looser demand for negative proportionality, sentencers need not try to find the proportionate kind or severity of sentence.[58]

Likewise, theories focused on the utility of expression, such as positive general prevention, tend to advocate a limiting role for retributive proportionality in sentencing.[59] Desert provides the upper and, more arguably, the lower bounds of appropriate punishment. Within these limits, utilitarian proportionality principles govern, in particular the principle of parsimony. A proportionate sentence inflicts the least punishment necessary to express the appropriate degree of condemnation of the offence. More serious crimes will generally be punished more strongly in order to maintain the proper respect for the norms.[60] That said, it is not necessary for sentences to be strictly ordered according to desert or to reflect desert in an absolute sense.

37.3.4 Implications of proportionality theory for sentencing practice

The theories of proportionality have important implications for sentencing practice. First, while each of the theories requires punishment decision-makers (whether legislators or judges) to calibrate punishment in some sense to the gravity of the offence committed, the theories differ in terms of the factors that contribute to the gravity determination. In a sense, therefore, the concept of gravity itself is given different meanings under the different philosophical perspectives. A decision-maker seeking to gauge culpability will understand gravity differently from one seeking to prevent future crimes.

The theories approach the gravity determination differently both in terms of focus and emphasis. With regard to focus, retributive theories, whether rooted in expression or otherwise, are generally backward-looking. The gravity of an offence for the purposes of proportionate punishment is a function of the harm committed and the culpability of the offender for that harm. Gauging harm is a complex task that involves considering both the quantity and quality of suffering the offence caused.[61] Culpability is a function of the offender's role, mental state, and so on at the time of the offence. Retributive proportionality analysis does not consider the potential for future harm—whether from the particular offender or from others. Nor does it usually consider the offender's mental state or actions after the offence.[62]

[58] Ibid., 132.

[59] T Lappi-Seppälä, 'Penal Policy in Scandinavia' (2007) 36 Crime and Justice 217, 233 ('The main function of the proportionality principle—as seen in the Finnish theory—was thus to define the upper limit that the punishment may never exceed').

[60] Tonry (n 47) 1766.

[61] See generally A von Hirsch and N Jareborg, 'Gauging Criminal Harm: A Living-Standard Analysis' (1991) 11 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 1.

[62] Some retributivists do consider post-crime actions relevant to proportionality. For instance Jean Galbraith argues that a defendant's good deeds, including those done after the offence was committed, should affect the desert calculation. 'The Good Deeds of International Criminal Defendants' (2012) 25 Leiden Journal of International Law 799, 811–12.

In contrast, utilitarian proportionality analysis requires decision-makers to look both backward and forward. The extent of harm caused and the offender's culpability are relevant inasmuch as they help the decision-maker to understand the amount of punishment necessary to prevent future crimes, achieve rehabilitation, and so on. Other factors that contribute to the likelihood of future crimes are also part of the gravity determination, however. These might include, for example, the offender's reputation or past good works unrelated to the crime, as well as actions taken after the crime such as guilty pleas, cooperation, apologies, and restitution, none of which would normally be relevant to a purely retributive proportionality analysis.[63]

The theories also approach the gravity determination differently in terms of the emphases given to harm and culpability. For many retributivists, culpability is the primary focus—punishment should take harm into account but should principally strive to reflect culpability.[64] In contrast, utilitarian theorists consider culpability only to the extent that it relates to the possibility of future harm.[65] Moreover, while retributive theories consider harm in an undifferentiated manner, utilitarian theories necessarily prioritize among harms. A theory based on norm promotion, for example, such as positive general prevention, focuses on harms that can be prevented through general moral education, rather than on the particular harms an individual offender has inflicted or may inflict in the future.

These differences in focus and emphasis have implications for sentencing procedure. For example, proponents of retributive proportionality tend to favour ex ante determinations of the gravity of crimes, for instance through sentencing guidelines.[66] This is particularly true of those who advocate ordinally retributive proportionality.[67] For them, fairness through equal punishment is paramount and such fairness is best ensured through mandatory or at least strictly applied guidelines.[68] Utilitarian theorists, particularly those who advocate general prevention, tend to be more comfortable affording judges broad discretion to allocate punishment according to the social gains expected from punishment in particular cases.[69]

[63] See e.g. Frase (n 31) 45 (noting that while many forms of cooperation are not seen as reducing a defendant's deserts, some are—at least under a broad definition of desert); Tonry (n 27) 357 (criticizing retributivists such as von Hirsch for limiting culpability determinations to the offenders' crimes and criminal records); B Grey, 'Neuroscience, PTSD, and Sentencing Mitigation' (2012) 34 Cardozo Law Review 53, 78–84 (explaining why retributivists only allow culpability-reducing circumstances to mitigate sentences, not expressions of remorse or personal circumstances that have no effect on responsibility); R Christopher, 'The Prosecutor's Dilemma: Bargains and Punishments' (2003) 72 Fordham Law Review passim (comparing the difficulties of prisoner-initiated plea bargains in a retributivist system to the same difficulties of prosecutor-initiated plea deals in consequentialist systems).

[64] M Moore, 'Victims and Retribution: A Reply to Professor Fletcher' (1999) 3 Buffalo Criminal Law Review 65, 66 (discussing retributivists who believe that 'what deserves punishment are the inner thoughts of an individual').

[65] Frase (n 31) 595.

[66] See e.g. J Ohlin, 'Towards a Unique Theory of International Criminal Sentencing' in G Sluiter and S Vasiliev (eds), International Criminal Procedure: Towards a Coherent Body of Law (London: Cameron May International Law and Policy 2009) 381–413.

[67] See e.g. A von Hirsch, 'Criminology: Commensurability and Crime Prevention: Evaluating Formal Sentencing Structures and their Rationale' (1983) 74 Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 209, passim (explaining that sentencing guidelines are necessary to eliminate subjectivity in deciding sentences and to 'specify the quantum of punishment that is deemed deserved').

[68] Tonry (n 19) 167.

[69] See Lappi-Seppälä (n 59) 283.

The theoretical differences also suggest different roles for victims in the sentencing process. Some retributivists consider that retribution is in some sense 'due' to the victims of crimes.[70] Such a view mitigates in favour of a substantial role for victims at sentencing in order to ensure that their needs are satisfied through the punishment inflicted. A utilitarian approach focused on community rehabilitation might also afford a significant role to the victim. On the other hand, a theory focused on general norm promotion would accord little or no role to the victim in determining proportionate punishment since the victim has no greater insight than the judge into what punishment will adequately express the relevant norms.

Additionally, where retributive proportionality tends to counsel against sentence-based plea bargains, preventive proportionality suggests such deals can be productive at least when the sentence remains adequate to convey the requisite condemnation. The admission of wrongdoing confirms the condemnatory message and reduces the need for punishment.

In sum, a court's theory of proportionality can affect sentencing procedures and outcomes, at least in some cases. What theory, then, should the ICC judges adopt? The following section considers whether anything in the ICC's sources of law supports adopting a particular approach to proportionality.

37.4 Proportionality Principles in the ICC's Applicable Law

In seeking to understand the concept of proportionality for sentencing, the ICC judges must look to the applicable law. The Court's sources of law are, in the first place, the Statute, Elements of Crimes, and Rules of Procedure and Evidence; second, applicable treaties, and principles and rules of international law; and third, general principles of law derived from national legal systems.[71] Although these sources provide no clear answers, they suggest that the ICC should privilege utilitarian sentencing goals, particularly the goal of crime prevention, and adopt an understanding of proportionality compatible with that goal.

37.4.1 The Rome Statute and Rules of Procedure and Evidence

The Rome Statute requires that sentences be proportionate to the crimes committed, permitting either the prosecutor or the defendant to appeal disproportionate sentences.[72] Neither the Statute nor the Rules of Procedures and Evidence ('Rules') explain what proportionality requires, however. Indeed, neither document mentions retribution or goals such as crime prevention in connection with sentencing.[73]

The Statute's provision regarding sentencing is succinct. It simply requires the judges to 'take into account such factors as the gravity of the crime and the individual [70] See e.g. Galbraith (n 62) 810–11. [71] Art 21 ICC Statute. [72] Art 81(2)(a) ICC Statute.

[73] One commentator claims that the 'ICC framework…clearly favours retribution' but does not justify this claim. Hoel (n 19) 276. See also ibid., 288 ('Given that the sentencing provisions of the ICC have endorsed proportionality, it would seem to be uncontentious that retribution will be endorsed as the primary sentencing purpose').

circumstances of the convicted person'.[74] If a life sentence is awarded, it must be 'justified by the extreme gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the person'.[75] An examination of the drafting history of the Statute's sentencing provisions does not clarify whether the drafters envisioned a retributive or utilitarian approach to proportionate sentencing.[76] Indeed, it seems likely that the question was purposely left unresolved because reaching philosophical agreement would have been very difficult.

The statutory provision most relevant to the Court's understanding of the proportionality principle is the preamble's assertion that the purpose of the ICC is 'to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of [international] crimes and thus to contribute to the prevention of such crimes'.[77] Some commentators cite the goal of ending impunity as evidence of the Court's retributive agenda.[78] In light of the rest of the sentence, however, a better interpretation is that ending impunity is not a goal in itself but is rather a means of preventing future crimes. Read this way, the language supports a utilitarian justification for the Court's work. Although the Court's general justifying aim does not necessarily dictate its approach to proportionate sentencing,[79] in the absence of a sentencing philosophy, this utilitarian language provides some indication of the general orientation of the drafters.

The Rules, on the other hand, contain language that more clearly suggests a retributive approach to proportionality. Rule 145 instructs the judges to '[b]ear in mind that the totality of any sentence of imprisonment and fine . . . must reflect the culpability of the accused person'.[80] The idea that a sentence should 'reflect' the offender's culpability is usually associated with retributive proportionality. As such, the use of the word 'reflect' can be read to imply a strictly retributive approach to proportionality. Indeed, as already mentioned, the Appeals Chamber seems to adopt such a reading in its decision affirming Lubanga's sentence.[81] However, the wording is also compatible with a limiting role for retribution in proportionality determinations. A sentence need not capture an offender's culpability 100% in order to 'reflect' that culpability. Instead, a sentence within the range of 'not underserved' punishment, to use Morris' wording, also reflects the offender's culpability. A limiting approach to culpability (as well as desert more generally) is compatible with a predominantly utilitarian approach to proportionality. At least according to expressive theories of prevention, a sentence

[74] Art 78 ICC Statute. [75] Art 77(1)(b) ICC Statute.

[76] M Bassiouni, The Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Documentary History (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 1998) 286.

[77] Preamble ICC Statute.

[78] See e.g. A Woods, 'Moral Judgments and International Crimes: The Disutility of Desert' (2012) 52 Virginia Journal of International Law 633, 640 (claiming that the Statute's goal of ending impunity may be 'suggestive of the retributive impulse'); M Pensky, 'Amnesty on Trial: Impunity, Accountability, and the Norms of International Law' (2008) 1 Ethics & Global Politics 1, 1 (arguing that the anti-impunity norm is based on a retributivist conception of criminal justice).

[79] For example, the purpose of establishing the Court could be general prevention, but sentencing could nonetheless be conducted according to retributive principles.

[80] Rule 145(1)(a) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Official Records of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE').

[81] Supra n 4 and accompanying text.

that is within the range of deserved punishments is more likely to contribute to crime prevention.[82]

The remainder of Rule 145 confirms that harm and culpability should be considered relevant factors in sentencing, without clarifying which considerations should be given priority. The Rule contains a non-exhaustive list of factors the judges must consider in addition to the gravity of the crime and individual circumstances listed in the Statute. While these purport to be 'additional' factors, they should be understood as fleshing out the notions of gravity of crime and individual circumstances.[83] With regard to the gravity of the crime, the Rule mentions the following factors: 'the extent of the damage caused, in particular the harm caused to the victims and their families, the nature of the unlawful behaviour and the means employed to execute the crime'.[84] With regard to the circumstances of the individual, the Rule includes 'the degree of participation of the convicted person; the degree of intent; the circumstances of manner, time and location; and the age, education, social and economic condition of the convicted person'.[85] The Rule goes on to list as 'aggravating factors' a number of considerations that could also be subsumed under the gravity and individual circumstances, including relevant prior convictions, abuse of power, and number and vulnerability of victims.[86]

All of these factors are equally relevant to retributive and utilitarian versions of proportionality. One aspect of the Rule is suggestive of a utilitarian approach to proportionality, however. The list of mitigating circumstances includes, '[t]he convicted person's conduct after the act, including any efforts by the person to compensate the victims and any cooperation with the Court'.[87] Socially beneficial post-crime conduct, including cooperation with the court, is not generally considered relevant to retributive proportionality.[88] The inclusion of such considerations therefore suggests that ICC sentencing should aim, at least in part, to achieve socially beneficial consequences such as restoring victims and fostering justice beyond the case at hand.

37.4.2 Proportionality principles in treaties and customary international law

The next sources of law for the ICC to consider are applicable treaties and principles and rules of international law. Potentially applicable treaties include those concerning human rights.[89] Although some international and regional human rights treaties have [82] See supra nn 57–8 and accompanying text.

[83] The Lubanga Sentencing Judgment treats them this way. See Lubanga Decision on sentence (n 3) paras 36–91. The Appeals Chamber Decision, in contrast, asserts that there are several ways of interpreting the relationship between the factors listed in the statute and those listed in the rules, and declines to resolve the issue. 'Lubanga Appeals Chamber Decision on Sentencing', paras 62–6. One judge dissented from this aspect of the decision, arguing that the factors in the rules should be interpreted as elaborating upon the factors in the statute. Ibid., Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Sang-Hyn Song, ICC-01/04-01/06-3122-Anx1, January 12, 2014, paras 2–3.

[84] Rule 145(1)(c) ICC RPE. [85] Ibid. [86] Rule 145(2)(b) ICC RPE.

[87] Rule 145(2)(a) ICC RPE.

[88] See supra Implications of proportionality theory for sentencing practice.

[89] Art 21 ICC Statute ('The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights.').

been interpreted to require proportionate sentencing, they do not clearly mandate a retributive or utilitarian approach to the concept.[90] Indeed, some commentators consider a retributive approach to punishment to be a violation of human rights law,[91] while others suggest that the right to human dignity requires that desert function as the upper limit to punishment.[92]

The Statute's reference to 'principles and rules of international law' amounts to an invocation of customary international law.[93] It is beyond the purview of this chapter to engage in a thorough investigation of whether any customary international law principles or rules of proportionality exist. It is instructive, however, that the ICC's predecessor tribunals have not clearly identified such principles or rules. Indeed, the sentencing jurisprudence of these tribunals fails to identify a consistent theory of proportionality, whether based in customary international law or otherwise.

Although the judgment of the IMT is sometimes cited as evidence of a retributive approach to punishment,[94] in fact the judgment does not specify whether the punishment imposed was calibrated to desert, prevention, or both.[95] The ICTY and ICTR sentencing judgments, in contrast, virtually all discuss or at least mention the purposes of punishment in relation to the determination of sentences. Nonetheless, despite having sentenced more than a hundred defendants collectively over the course of almost two decades, the ICTY and ICTR have not reached a consensus on the principles of proportionate punishment.[96] In virtually all of their sentencing judgments the tribunals affirm the importance of both retribution and deterrence;[97] they also sometimes mention rehabilitation.[98] Yet the judgments are unclear about how these goals relate to the sentences handed down and do not consistently identify priorities among the goals. Some judgments state that deterrence [90] See generally D van Zyl Smit and A Ashworth, 'Disproportionate Sentences as Human Rights Violations' (2004) 67 Modern Law Review 541; but see R Sloane, 'The Expressive Capacity of International Punishment: the Limits of the National Law Analogy and the Potential of International Criminal Law' (2007) 43 Stanford Journal of International Law 39, 82 (arguing that human rights law implicitly adopts the Kantian principles that underpin modern retributivism).

[91] See e.g. M Aukerman, 'Extraordinary Evil, Ordinary Crime: A Framework for Understanding Transitional Justice' (2002) 15 Harvard Human Rights Journal 39, 58 ('Adequate retribution is impossible unless those inflicting punishment violate the rights of human rights violators').

[92] Van Zyl Smit and Ashworth (n 90) 542; Frase (n 31) 17 ('Maximum allowable desert is a human rights issue').

[93] For a discussion of this assertion see M deGuzman, 'Article 21 Applicable Law' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (Münich: C H Beck 2008).

[94] Sloane (n 90) 66; Ohlin (n 66) 388.

[95] Judgment of the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal 1946 (1947) 41 American Journal of International Law 172, 175.

[96] See Sloane (n 90) 68 (stating that 'confusion about the justifications for punishment and its distribution among different kinds of defendants plagues the jurisprudence'); S D'Ascoli, Sentencing in International Criminal Law: The UN Ad Hoc Tribunals and Future Perspectives for the ICC (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2011) 34 ('Although the "traditional" purposes of sentencing have been upheld in different ways by international tribunals, the question of which rationale(s) international sentencing should pursue still remains open').

[97] See e.g. Sentencing Judgment, Tadić, ICTY-94-1-T*bis*-R117, TC, ICTY, 11 November 1999, para. 9.

[98] See e.g. Judgment, Stakić, IT-97-24-A, AC, ICTY, 22 March 2006, para. 402 (the Appeals Chambers 'notes that the jurisprudence of the Tribunal and the ICTR consistently points out that the two main purposes of sentencing are deterrence and retribution. Other factors, such as rehabilitation, should be considered but should not be given undue weight').

should be given less weight than retribution,[99] while others highlight deterrence as most important.[100] Another category emphasizes the stigma associated with international convictions.[101] Scholars who have studied the sentencing decisions disagree on the tribunals' priorities, with some arguing that the judges give pride of place to retribution[102] and others seeing the decisions as emphasizing deterrence.[103]

37.4.3 General principles derived from national systems

An examination of national systems for the purpose of deriving general principles is also inconclusive. While national systems generally accept the principle of proportionality,[104] there is significant diversity in their approaches to implementing that principle.[105] Indeed, national criminal laws rarely address explicitly the appropriate theoretical approach to proportionate sentencing. Evidence of proportionality principles therefore, to the extent it exists, must be deduced from general statements about the goals of sentencing. While a comprehensive review of such statements is beyond the purview of this chapter, the surveys others have conducted support the conclusion that many national systems pursue utilitarian objectives in sentencing, while retribution is a focus in a more limited number.

Professors Kevin Heller and Markus Dubber collected information regarding 16 national systems in their Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law. In all of these systems, utilitarian aims such as crime prevention and offender rehabilitation are considered important purposes of punishment.[106] Silvia D'Ascoli's survey of six national [99] See e.g. Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999, para. 48; Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-A, AC, ICTY, 20 February 2001, para. 801. See also M Harmon and F Gaynor, 'Ordinary Sentences for Extraordinary Crimes' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 683, 694 (citing ICTY decisions stating that deterrence should not be given undue prominence).

[100] See e.g. Judgment, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 16 November 1998, para. 1234 ('Deterrence is probably the most important factor in the assessment of appropriate sentences for violations of international humanitarian law').

[101] See e.g. Sentencing Judgment, Erdemović, IT-96-22-T, TC, ICTY, 29 November 1996, para. 64 (holding that the purpose of punishing crimes against humanity 'lies precisely in stigmatizing criminal conduct which has infringed a value fundamental not merely to a given society, but to humanity as a whole').

[102] M Drumbl, 'Collective Violence and Individual Punishment: The Criminality of Mass Atrocity' (2005) 99 Northwestern University Law Review 539, 560–1; M Bassett, 'Defending International Sentencing: Past Criticism to the Promise of the ICC' (2009) 16 Human Rights Brief 22 (stating the tribunals' emphasis on gravity suggests retribution is the underpinning of international punishment); R Henham, 'The Philosophical Foundation of International Sentencing' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 64, 66 (stating that retribution is the predominant justification in ICL sentencing and arguing against this approach).

[103] See e.g. J Meernik and K King, 'The Sentencing Determinants of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: An Empirical and Doctrinal Analysis' (2003) 16 Leiden Journal of International Law 717, 723; S Dana, 'Genocide, Reconciliation and Sentencing Jurisprudence in the ICTY' in R Henham and P Behrens (eds), The Criminal Law of Genocide: International, Comparative and Contextual Aspects (Aldershot: Ashgate Publishing 2007) 261.

[104] D'Ascoli (n 96) 75.

[105] G Newman, 'Punishment Philosophies and Practices around the World' in M Natarajan (ed.), International Crime and Justice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 80 ('The scale by which punishments are matched to crimes remains a particularly difficult puzzle').

[106] See K Heller and M Dubber (eds), The Handbook of Comparative Criminal Law (Stanford: Stanford University Press 2011).

systems yielded similar results, with several adopting a mix of utilitarian and retributive objectives and a few focusing exclusively on achieving social goods.[107] Islamic systems in particular tend to focus on retribution, although some scholars of Islamic law argue that deterrence is also a permissible consideration.[108] With a few exceptions, even national systems that consider retribution to be an appropriate role of sentencing do not privilege that goal over utilitarian considerations. Indeed, as Richard Frase has written, most Western nations employ a version of limiting retributivism wherein retribution's role is to provide rough boundaries for appropriate punishment but utilitarian objectives largely drive sentence determinations.[109]

In sum, the sources of law applicable to the work of the ICC do not provide a clear answer to the principles of proportionality the Court should employ in sentencing. However, to the extent those sources suggest a relevant principle, it is that the Court should privilege utilitarian concerns over retribution.[110]

37.5 Rejecting International Retributivism

Despite the dominance of utility—in particular, prevention—as the guiding principle in the Rome Statute and in most national systems of criminal justice, the limited scholarship addressing international proportionality mostly advocates a retributive approach. This section reviews that scholarship and offers a critique of retributive international proportionality. It argues that the international community lacks shared norms of desert, that judgments of desert are particularly complex in the international context, and that the rhetoric and narratives of international criminal law enhance the risk that undeserved punishment will be inflicted. As such, a retributive approach to proportionality at the ICC would be both impracticable and dangerous.

37.5.1 The dominance of retributivism in international proportionality scholarship

The few scholars who have considered the appropriate proportionality theory for international courts have virtually all advocated a retributive approach. Professor Jens Ohlin is a particularly vocal advocate of cardinally retributive proportionality

[107] D'Ascoli (n 96) 75–6.

[108] Newman (n 105) 80; R Peters, Crime and Punishment in Islamic Law: Theory and Practice from the Sixteenth to the Twenty-First Century (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2005) 30–1.

[109] Frase (n 31) 21. The US Model Penal Code, for example, adopts retribution as a limiting principle but requires that sentences be driven primarily by utilitarian considerations. See generally A Ristroph, 'How (Not) to Think Like a Punisher' (2009) 61 Florida Law Review 727 (critiquing the Model Penal Code's limiting retributivism). The European Union has made some efforts to achieve consensus on the question of sentencing purposes to promote uniformity, but has failed. See e.g. Hoel (n 19) 277.

[110] In addition to deriving general principles from an overview of national jurisdictions, the ICC is permitted, when appropriate, to consider the laws of the national system that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime. Art 21(c) ICC Statute. This formulation is rather awkward, because the idea of consulting the laws of particular jurisdictions seems antithetical to the project of identifying 'general principles'. See deGuzman (n 93). In rare cases, this source of law could lead the Court to adopt a retributive approach to proportionality.

in international punishment.[111] According to Professor Ohlin, international sentences have often been inappropriately lenient because judges have understood proportionality in terms of relative desert rather than seeking to capture the absolute gravity of the offence.[112] Professor Ohlin does not explain how judges should assess such absolute gravity, and thus determine which punishments fit which international crimes. He asserts, however, that international crimes are generally so grave as to require harsh punishment including, in some cases, the death penalty.[113] Several other scholars implicitly endorse a cardinally retributive approach to international proportionality.[114]

In contrast to these cardinal international retributivists, a few scholars have implicitly and, less frequently, explicitly, called for an ordinally retributive approach to proportionality in international punishment. Most notably, Professor Robert Sloane has argued for ordinally retributive proportionality in international sentencing to support his expressive theory of international punishment.[115] Indeed, Professor Sloane labels his approach 'expressive proportionality', although his proportionality theory (as opposed to his justification for international punishment) is entirely retributive.[116] Professor Sloane rejects cardinal proportionality for international punishment on the grounds that international crimes are so severe that cardinally proportionate punishment would often require sentences prohibited by human rights law, including the death penalty.[117] Instead, he argues that international punishment should reflect ordinal retributive proportionality in order to express appropriate condemnation of international crimes. According to Professor Sloane, '[p]unishments should convey the right degree of international condemnation relative to other defendants within the jurisdiction of the relevant tribunals. To maintain its legitimacy, an international [111] Professor Ohlin has written four pieces of scholarship advocating a cardinally retributive approach to proportionality in international sentencing: Ohlin, 'Towards a Unique Theory' (n 64) 399; J Ohlin, 'Proportional Sentences at the ICTY' in B Swart et al. (eds), The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011) 323 (Ohlin, 'Proportional Sentences'); J Ohlin, 'Applying the Death Penalty to Crimes of Genocide' (2005) 99 American Journal of International Law 747 (Ohlin, 'Applying the Death Penalty'); J Ohlin, 'Commentary: Hassan Ngeze v Prosecutor' in A Klip and G Sluiter (eds), Annotated Leading Cases of International Tribunals vol. XXIV (Antwerp: Intersentia 2009) 938 (critiquing ICTR defendant's argument that his sentence was ordinally disproportionate on the grounds that only cardinal proportionality is required).

[112] Ohlin, 'Proportional Sentences' (n 111) 328; Ohlin, 'Towards a Unique Theory' (n 66) 398–9.

[113] Ohlin, 'Applying the Death Penalty' (n 111).

[114] See Galbraith (n 62) 810–11 (arguing that a certain amount of retribution is 'due' both to the individual victims of international crimes and the groups to which they belong); S Dana, 'The Limits of Judicial Idealism: Should the International Criminal Court Engage with Consequentialist Aspirations?' (2014) 3 Penn State Journal of Law & International Affairs 30 (arguing that the punishment international courts have inflicted has often been too low to reflect adequately the offenders' culpability; S Glickman, 'Note: Victims' Justice: Legitimizing the Sentencing Regime of the International Criminal Court' (2004) 43 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 229, 247–8 ('A review of the sentences issued by the ICTY and ICTR reveals that, although the Trial Chambers of both Tribunals stressed retribution as a primary justification for punishment, most of the sentences handed down by the ICTY were far too lenient to actually reflect this rationale'); K Fisher, Moral Accountability and International Criminal Law: Holding Agents of Atrocity Accountable to the World (London: Routledge 2012) 55 (stating, with limited discussion, that retribution 'sets the severity limits' for international sentences).

[115] Sloane (n 90) 83.

[116] Ibid.; see also ibid., 44 (claiming that 'international human rights law…insists on a 'just deserts' concept of proportionality in sentencing').

[117] Ibid., 82.

tribunal must express censure, disapproval, and condemnation equally across disparate local circumstances.'[118]

Professor Sloane admits that 'a coherent ICL sentencing scheme requires some account of cardinal proportionality', but declines to offer such an account.[119] Instead, he states that in light of the incommensurability of international crimes and punishment, '[t]he arbitrary establishment, but consistent application, of cardinal guidelines may be the best we can expect'.[120] Other international criminal law scholars have implicitly endorsed an ordinal approach to proportionality without acknowledging, let alone resolving, the anchoring problem.[121]

In sum, the few scholars who have written about international proportionality endorse either ordinally or cardinally retributive versions of the concept. Although some authors mention utilitarian goals as relevant to the allocation of international punishment,[122] none has advanced a utilitarian theory of international proportionality. As the next section elaborates, the retributive approach to proportionality advocated in the scholarship is impracticable because the international community lacks shared norms to guide determinations of desert in either the cardinal or ordinal senses.

37.5.2 The absence of shared norms of retribution

Retributive proportionality requires judges to determine what punishment an offender deserves either in an absolute sense or relative to other offenders. The most common criticism of such theories is that this task is impossible—crimes and punishments are incommensurable.[123] The criticism has even greater force at the international level. While philosophers have attempted to identify principled ways of measuring desert and punishment, such efforts remain incomplete at best.[124] Absent such justification, judgments about appropriate punishment remain largely, if not entirely, a matter of community norms. Whether norms concerning cardinal or ordinal desert are sufficiently strong at the national level to form the basis for punishment's allocation is a [118] Ibid., 83. [119] Ibid. [120] Ibid.

[121] P Chifflet and G Boas, 'Sentencing Coherence in International Criminal Law: The Cases of Biljana Plasvic and Miroslav Bralo' (2012) 23 Criminal Law Forum 135, 158–9 (suggesting that the refusal of international courts to adopt sentencing guidelines and crime hierarchies indicates that they are not sentencing according to the gravity of the crimes); V Baghi and T Maruthi, 'The Principle of Proportionality in International Criminal Law' (2011) 7 Acta Universitatis Danubius 11 (equating proportionality with retribution).

[122] See e.g. Harmon and Gaynor (n 99) 711–12 ('Low sentences, however well intentioned, not only weaken respect for human dignity and the rule of law, but may frustrate and impede reconciliation in the areas in which the crimes were committed'); A Keller, 'Punishment for Violations of International Criminal Law' (2001) 12 Indiana International & Comparative Law Review 53, 65–6 (criticizing ICTY sentences as inadequate for deterrence).

[123] See e.g. Ristroph (n 27) 1308–13 (arguing that the concept of desert is too elastic to provide meaningful guidance for sentencing policies).

[124] M Thorburn and A Manson, 'The Sentencing Theory Debate': Convergence in Outcomes, Divergence in Reasoning' in A von Hirsch and A Ashworth (eds), Proportionate Sentencing: Exploring the Principles (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2005) 285 (describing the efforts of von Hirsch and others as well as criticisms of those efforts as incomplete and ineffective).

matter of much debate.[125] It is clear, however, that no such norms are available at the international level to dictate punishment at international criminal courts.

37.5.2.1 Absence of norms regarding cardinal desert

As noted in the previous section, many modern retributive theorists have rejected cardinal retributivism,[126] but the theory has been revived in the international criminal law literature.[127] Proponents of cardinally retributive international punishment have not identified principles or norms to govern judgments of desert, nor can they. When punishment was largely a matter of doing to the offender what the offender did to the victim, the idea of cardinal proportionality made a certain amount of sense.[128] Now that punishment is almost entirely a question of time in prison, however, it has become highly questionable if not ludicrous to suppose that we can identify the 'right' amount of time for each crime. A quantity of years is simply too crude a metric for such subtle moral judgments. Moreover, as some scholars have noted, people have different levels of tolerance for incarceration, so that even equal sentences do not necessarily impose equal suffering.[129]

The impracticability of seeking to identify absolutely deserved punishment for particular crimes is reflected in the diversity of sentencing norms around the world. If humans shared intuitions about absolutely deserved punishments, presumably those intuitions would be reflected in consistent punishments across different cultures—at least those that claim to pay attention to desert. Instead, punishment norms vary greatly around the world. Some countries, such as the United States, are known for their harsh punishment cultures, while others, such as the Scandinavian countries, punish much more leniently for the same crimes. The Anders Breivik is instructive. Breivik, a Norwegian man convicted of killing 77 people, received a sentence of 21 years in prison. Norwegians, including families of the victims, generally expressed satisfaction with this sentence.[130] In contrast, in the United States the sentence was viewed as drastically lower than what Mr Breivik deserved.[131] The absence of international consensus on [125] Proponents of empirical desert claim that community norms concerning desert must form the basis for distributing punishment, while critics argue that such norms are inadequate to the task. Compare Robinson and Darley (n 36) 24 (arguing that failure to abide by community norms will decrease respect for the system) with Slobogin and Brinkley-Rubinstein (n 34) passim (presenting results of studies finding that agreement about appropriate punishment is weak). See also M Ryan, 'Proximate Retribution' (2012) 48 Houston Law Review 1049, 1064–5 (discussing empirical studies that show little agreement among cultures as to cardinal ranking, or sequencing of offences for the purposes of retribution).

[126] See (nn 25, 31, 112), and accompanying text; see also Robinson and Kurzban (n 36) 1835 ('[m]odern notions of desert are ordinal rather than cardinal').

[127] See (nn 108, 109), and accompanying text.

[128] See (nn 22, 23), and accompanying text.

[129] See A Kolber, 'The Subjective Experience of Punishment' (2009) 109 Columbia Law Review 182, 213 (discussing how prison sentences will affect different people in different ways); Thorburn and Manson (n 121) 291–2 (discussing the extent to which von Hirsch and Ashworth take such issues into account in their work advocating a just deserts approach to proportionality).

[130] See M Lews and S Lyall, 'Norway Mass Killer Gets the Maximum: 21 Years', The New York Times, 24 August 2012; L Bevanger, 'Anders Behring Breivik: Norway Court Finds Him Sane', BBC News: Europe, 24 August 2012.

[131] See e.g. J Sager, 'Mass Murderer Anders Breivik's Insanely Short Prison "Sentence" Puts No Value on Life' (The Stir, 24 August 2012) <http://thestir.cafemom.com/in_the_news/142485/mass_ what criminals deserve is also evidenced in the widely divergent sentences handed down by the various international criminal tribunals.[132]

37.5.2.2 Absence of norms to anchor the desert scale

Advocates of an ordinal approach to retributive proportionality argue that absolute judgments of desert are unnecessary. What matters is that each offender receives the 'right' punishment in relation to the punishment awarded to all other offenders.[133] They acknowledge, however, that punishment scales must be anchored somehow. Proponents of ordinal retributive proportionality tend to look to community norms to supply the upper, and perhaps lower, limits of acceptable punishment for particular crimes and for the system as a whole.[134] In many national systems, such anchoring norms are contained in statutorily mandated maximum and sometimes minimum punishments for particular crimes.[135] Some systems also provide judges with guidance regarding such norms through sentencing guidelines.

As explained, sentencing norms, including anchoring norms, vary widely across cultures. Moreover, the drafters of the ICC statute declined to supply the Court with guidance in this regard, with two possible exceptions: (i) the 30-year maximum term of incarceration for most crimes; and (ii) the option of life imprisonment for crimes of exceptional gravity.[136] Whether these provisions should be viewed as anchors for judgments of desert is debatable. Does the 30-year maximum imply that most international criminals deserve no more than 30 years in prison? Some retributivists, including Professor Ohlin, would certainly reject this proposition. The 30-year cap can just as plausibly be read as a limit on the cost of international justice rather than as an anchor for judgments of desert. Moreover, the availability of life imprisonment cannot be viewed as reflecting a consensus that such punishment is sometimes deserved because some of the Statute's negotiators view life imprisonment as a human rights violation.[137] Instead, the inclusion of this option alongside the 30-year limit represents a compromise between negotiators from different sentencing cultures.[138] Finally, even if these two provisions are read as anchors murderer_anders_breiviks_insanely> accessed 30 March 2014 (claiming the sentence is 'insanely short' and sends the message that 'life in Norway isn't worth the time it takes to create it'); 'Norwegian Killer of 77 Gets 21 Years' (The Right Handed Cowboy 25 August 2012) <http://www.texasbrady.com/archives/2292> accessed 30 March 2014 (an American blogger calling it 'the most ridiculous sentence I have ever heard of'); The Associated Press, 'Breivik Deemed Sane, Sent to Prison for Massacre in Norway', The Washington Times, 24 August 2012.

[132] See D'Ascoli (n 96) 236.

[133] See (nn 32, 34), and accompanying text.

[134] Von Hirsch (n 34) 77–9.

[135] See Frase (n 31) 97–103.

[136] Art 77(1)(a)–(b) ICC Statute.

[137] Many states are parties to treaties prohibiting the death penalty, including the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (74 States Parties), the Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty (13 States Parties), Protocol No. 6 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (46 States Parties), and Protocol No. 13 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (43 States Parties). See also 'Death Penalty: Ratification of International Treaties', Amnesty International <http://www.amnesty.org/en/death-penalty/ratification-of-international-treaties> accessed 27 February 2013.

[138] R Fife, 'Article 77: Applicable Penalties' in Triffterer (n 93) 986.

for judgments of desert at the ICC, they provide the judges with only very limited guidance regarding ordinal retributive proportionality.

37.5.2.3 Absence of shared intuitions of relative desert

Even assuming anchoring norms could be identified for international sentences, ordinal retributive proportionality would also require that each case be placed in the retributively appropriate rank order. Proponents of 'empirical desert' suggest that such ordering is achievable even in the absence of guiding moral principles because all humans share intuitions about relative desert for certain core crimes.[139] Identifying these shared intuitions is simply a matter of conducting empirical studies to reveal which crimes people consider more and less serious.

Although no international criminal law scholar has endorsed the empirical desert thesis, Andrew Woods claims that the approach is at the core of the international criminal regime.[140] While this assertion is debatable, Woods correctly rejects the approach for international sentencing. As Woods points out, whatever its merits in the national context, empirical desert cannot justify international retributive proportionality.[141] First, the evidence that proponents of empirical desert marshal in favour of the thesis is highly context- and community-specific, supporting the existence of contingent community norms, rather than universal intuitions.[142] Indeed, a series of studies calls into question the validity of the empirical desert claims even in the national context.[143] Second, even assuming the persuasiveness of the studies, they do not encompass complex international crimes but are instead limited to a very small set of 'core' crimes such as theft, rape, and murder.[144]

37.5.3 The particular complexity of international judgments of desert

The difficulty of identifying deserved punishment is magnified at the international level for at least two reasons. First, international judges are both physically and culturally distant from the offenders and the crimes they commit. While the crimes largely take place in armed conflict, and thus far all in Africa, the judges hail from around the world and work in The Hague. Even assuming some principles or norms could be identified to guide judges, applying them consistently under such circumstances would be extremely challenging.

Second, international crimes are usually considerably more complex than most 'ordinary' crimes. Genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes are comprised not only of constitutive acts, such as rape and murder, but also of contextual

[139] See (n 34) and accompanying text. [140] Woods (n 78) 635. [141] Ibid., 681.
[142] Ibid., 648.
[143] Slobogin and Brinkley-Rubinstein (n 36) 80. Cf. C Berdejo and N Yuchtman, 'Crime, Punishment, and Politics: An Analysis of Political Cycles in Criminal Sentencing' (2013) 95 The Review of Economics and Statistics 741, 742 (concluding that, rather than adhering to community norms to decide sentencing, judges succumb to political pressure and give higher sentences towards the end of their terms in the hope of re-election).
[144] Slobogin and Brinkley-Rubinstein (n 36) 80.

elements such as a nexus with armed conflict for war crimes and a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population for crimes against humanity. The more complex structure of these crimes makes it more difficult to quantify and qualify the harm the crimes cause and the degree of the offenders' culpability. For example, an assessment of culpability for rape as a crime against humanity must take into account not only the harm and culpability associated with the rape, but also the harm and culpability inherent in the connection between the rape and the broader attack against a population of which the rape is part. The harm to be measured, then, is not just the harm to the immediate victims and his or her family, but rather to the entire 'population' that is the subject of the attack.[145] The offender's culpability relates not only to his or her mental state with regard to the rape, but also to the extent of his or her awareness or intent with regard to the rape's connection to the broader attack.

Indeed, the contexts in which international crimes are often committed themselves makes judgments about desert particularly problematic. Unlike national-level offenders, perpetrators of international crimes often act in compliance with prevailing social norms.[146] Whether punishing those who comply with social norms is morally appropriate is itself a matter of debate.[147] Assuming punishment is appropriate, there is nothing approaching consensus as to the appropriate amount of punishment under such circumstances. Moreover, those involved in international crimes often play multiple roles, further complicating assessments of culpability. For instance, many child soldiers have both suffered and perpetrated terrible crimes. No agreement exists as to whether child soldiers deserve punishment at all, let alone to what extent.[148] Finally, the group nature of international crimes often obscures questions of individual culpability. Indeed, some commentators question whether this feature of international crimes renders them incompatible with the principle of individual culpability.[149]

In sum, efforts to judge an offender's desert, which are already highly complex and controversial for national crimes, become even more complex and contested at the international level.

[145] One author argues that indirect harms should play a greater role in judgments of desert at the national level as well. See Ryan (n 125) 1049 (arguing that indirect harms, such as the effect of the wrongdoing on the victims' families or the effects on society in general, should play a role in sentencing).

[146] See Woods (n 76) 654–6; D Wippman, 'Atrocities, Deterrence, and the Limits of International Justice' (1999) 23 Fordham International Law Journal 473, 477 (discussing a survey conducted by the ICRC that demonstrated that war criminals and civilians in Bosnia did not view their attacks on other civilians as wrongful, as they viewed the situation as 'total war'); Sloane (n 87) 81 (internationally criminal conduct often conforms 'to a norm that prevails within the criminal's literal community, be it national, ethnic, racial or martial').

[147] See e.g. Z Bohrer, 'Is the Prosecution of War Crimes Just and Effective? Rethinking the Lessons from Sociology and Psychology' (2012) 33 Michigan Journal of International Law 749, 783–6 (discussing whether acts committed under 'sociopsychological coercive conditions' should be punished).

[148] M Drumbl, Reimagining Child Soldiers in International Law and Policy (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 2.

[149] See e.g. E van Sliedregt, 'The Curious Case of International Criminal Liability' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 1171, 1173 (arguing that the unique features of international criminality 'put pressure' on the principle of individual culpability).

37.5.4 Rhetoric, narrative, and the danger of undeserved international punishment

While retributivist commentators have lamented what they perceive as the under-punishment of many international offenders,[150] a significant and underappreciated risk exists that judges intent on retribution will inflict more punishment than offenders deserve. This risk stems from international criminal law's dominant rhetoric of extreme gravity as well as the political narratives that tend to divide conflict participants into good and evil. Such rhetoric and narratives risk exaggerating the perceived culpability of at least some international offenders.

Rhetorics serve to frame contested issues in law as in other aspects of human interaction.[151] The most critical contested issue in international criminal law is the justification for international jurisdiction in criminal law, an area typically reserved to states. The rhetoric that has developed to justify international intervention is that of the extreme gravity of the crimes at issue. International crimes are universally labelled 'the most serious crimes'. Indeed, a common critique of retributive justifications for punishment in international criminal law is that no punishment can capture adequately the desert of those who perpetrate such crimes.[152] Yet, as I have argued elsewhere, many international crimes are not as serious as is often supposed, and the current trend is towards an expansive understanding of international criminality.[153] For instance, the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICC extends to isolated war crimes committed by individual soldiers.[154] For some such crimes, both the harms inflicted and the offender's culpability may be relatively low.[155] The disconnect between the actual seriousness of many international crimes in terms of harm and culpability and the dramatic rhetoric that prosecutors, judges, and civil society employ to describe them renders a retributive approach to proportionality particularly troubling at the international level. The influence of gravity rhetoric on sentencing decision-makers may lead to inflated sentences that violate principles of both retributive fairness and of utilitarian parsimony.

Relatedly, judgments of desert in international criminal law are complicated by the role that international politics often plays in shaping the narratives of blame in conflict situations. The international community, and by extension international courts, sometimes 'takes sides' in complex intra- and international conflicts. One side is painted as evil and prosecuted, while the other side is painted as good, or at least far less evil, and its crimes are largely ignored.[156] This can foster a narrative of blame that [150] See e.g. Ohlin (n 64) 382; Dana (n 111).

[151] A Amsterdam and J Bruner, Minding the Law: How Courts Rely on Storytelling, and How their Stories Change the Way We Understand the Law—and Ourselves (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press 2000) 1–18.

[152] H Arendt, Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil (New York: Penguin Books 2006) 287–8; Woods (n 78) 653–4.

[153] M deGuzman, 'How Serious Are International Crimes? The Gravity Problem in International Criminal Law' (2012) 51 Columbia Journal of International Law 18.

[154] Art 8 ICC Statute.

[155] This may be the case, for example, with regard to the abuse of a flag of truce. Art 8(2) ICC Statute.

[156] S Nouwen and W Werner, 'Doing Justice to the Political: The International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan' (2010) 21 European Journal of International Law 941, 951 (showing how ICC fails to account for the wrongs done by the other side and thus magnifies the apparent desert of those prosecuted. Indeed, the 'evil' side is painted as extremely evil, even monstrous, helping to forge solidarity around the international response, but also potentially exaggerating perceptions of blameworthiness.[157]

In sum, a retributive approach to proportionality is unworkable at the ICC. Retributive international proportionality would require judges to make determinations of 'just deserts' in a community—the international community—that lacks common punishment norms. Such judgments would be particularly difficult in light of the physical and cultural distances between international judges and the crimes they adjudicate as well as the complex nature of the crimes. Finally, a retributive approach would risk over-punishing at least some defendants in light of international criminal law's dominant rhetoric and narratives.

37.6 Preventive International Proportionality

Rather than seeking to inflict the right amount of retribution, proportionality analysis at the ICC should be driven by the institution's central goal of crime prevention guided by the principle of parsimony.[158] That is, ICC judges should impose the least severe punishments that they believe will serve to prevent international crimes. This approach to proportionality comports with the Rome Statute's focus on prevention as well as with the prevalence of utilitarian justifications for punishment among the world's criminal justice systems. It also avoids a retributive emphasis that at least some of the Court's constituents would consider a violation of human rights.[159]

The concept of retribution need not be completely excluded from ICC proportionality determinations. Indeed, Rule 145's focus on culpability, as well as the sentencing practices of other international courts, suggest that retribution will be a factor in ICC proportionality determinations. But retribution's role should be to limit rather than determine appropriate sentences. The judges should never inflict more punishment than they believe an offender deserves. Beyond this loose restriction, however, punishment should be a function of preventive utility.

The ICC's preventive mission has several dimensions, including specific and general deterrence, incapacitation, and restorative justice. The most important preventive function of ICC punishment, however, is its moral educative, or norm-promoting, prosecutions have facilitated a dichotomous good–evil narrative in Uganda and Sudan); C Mahony, 'Prioritising International Sex Crimes before the Special Court for Sierra Leone: Another Instrument of Political Manipulation?' in M Bergsmo (ed.), Thematic Prosecution of International Sex Crimes vol. XIII (Oslo: Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2012) 59, 75 (arguing that the SCSL adopted a politically driven one-sided narrative of the conflict in Sierra Leone).

[157] J Kennedy, 'Monstrous Offenders and the Search for Solidarity through Modern Punishment' (2000) 51 Hastings Law Journal 829, 845 (arguing that narratives of monstrosity evoke emotions like anger and hatred that help forge solidarity and encourage harsh punishment).

[158] Preamble ICC Statute. While not in the context of sentencing, one ICC Pre-Trial Chamber has stated that prevention should be privileged over 'retributory effects' of the Court's work. Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Art 58, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07, PTC I, ICC, 10 February 2006, para. 49.

[159] See (n 88).

effect. This section first sets forth how the ICC judges should understand the goal of crime prevention in determining appropriate sentences, and then discusses some of the implications of the proposed proportionality analysis for sentencing procedure.

37.6.1 Components of prevention

Although prevention is often used synonymously with deterrence, the latter is just one component of the former. Criminal punishment has the potential to prevent future crime not only by impacting the decision-making of potential offenders (deterrence), but also by incapacitating and rehabilitating offenders, restoring communities, and impacting the normative environment in which all community members make decisions (norm expression). Of these, norm expression is the most important function of ICC punishment. As such, ICC judges should be most mindful of the communicative aspects of the sentences they impose, while also bearing in mind the other components of prevention to the extent appropriate in particular cases.

37.6.1.1 Norm expression

The ICC's central goal, and thus the most important objective of the punishments it inflicts, is to express global condemnation of international crimes. Through such condemnation, the ICC aims to change norms around the world that permit, or even encourage, such crimes. Preventive proportionality at the ICC therefore principally aims to identify sentences that are adequate, but no more than adequate, to promote relevant norms. The question of how the ICC should determine the amount of punishment necessary for effective norm expression is one that requires additional scholarly and judicial attention; only a few preliminary thoughts can be offered here.

First, the judges should recognize that they have the opportunity, particularly with their early sentencing decisions, to establish the ICC's sentencing norms. As an institution of the global legal order, the ICC's actions should reflect global norms to the extent they exist, but the Court also plays an important role in forging such norms. Sentencing is one area where the ICC's work must be significantly creative, at least in the Court's early years.

Norm creation through institutional action is an iterative process: the ICC acts, constituents respond, and the ICC adjusts accordingly. If the global community disagrees strongly enough with the ICC's sentences, it will react, either through representatives, such as the ICC's ASP, or through more direct forms of communication including public and social media.

Second, the judges should bear in mind that unless ICC sentences are drastically out of line with minimum or maximum standards around the world (e.g. one month for genocide or a life sentence for a minor war crime), they are unlikely to draw widespread negative reactions. As a general matter, the global community's attention regarding ICC actions focuses principally on decisions about which situations to investigate, cases to prosecute, and defendants to convict. It is through these decisions that the ICC largely effectuates its expressive function. While sentencing decisions matter greatly to individual offenders and sometimes to particular communities, they are less critical to the global community.

Moreover, as discussed, there are no global metrics against which to judge ICC sentences, except perhaps at the extremes. The absence of global norms reduces the persuasive force of any criticisms of ICC sentences raised in particular communities. The communities most likely to criticize ICC sentences are those most affected by the crimes in the cases adjudicated. If the ICC adopts the approach suggested herein it will sometimes impose sentences out of line with the norms in those communities and will be criticized on that basis. The ICC should not heed such criticisms, reminding those communities instead that its role is to enforce global rather than local norms.[160]

Third, in light of the absence of established norms and the minor role sentencing plays in international norm expression, the principle of parsimony will generally dictate sentences on the lenient end of the severity spectrum. Harsh punishment is unnecessary to promote the norms against international crimes and would even be counterproductive with respect to communities that reject harsh punishment as a matter of national norms. Moreover, as I have argued elsewhere, such leniency comports with the ICC's foundational identification with the human rights movement.[161]

At the same time, adequate norm expression requires that the ICC gauge the severity of punishment according to the gravity of the crimes. In conducting gravity determinations for this purpose, the judges should privilege considerations related to harm over those related to culpability. Although culpability is also relevant to such determinations (and is important in ensuring that punishment does not exceed desert), the aspect of the crime that is most visible to the global community is the harm the crime caused. In exceptional cases, particularly those involving high leadership, culpability may also be quite visible and should be emphasized. In cases involving mid- or lower-level participants, however, it is primarily the harm of the crime that concerns the global community rather than the particular individual's culpability for that harm. Indeed, to the extent that leadership role is relevant in determinations of gravity for expressive proportionality, it is less due to culpability than to the leader's greater potential for inflicting harm.

Moreover, the ICC judges should privilege general considerations of harm related to the type of crime committed over the specific harm caused in the particular case. Again, it is the general harm that is most relevant to norm expression. Thus, for example, in the Lubanga case, assessing gravity for purposes of determining proportionate punishment is largely a matter of measuring the harms associated with the large-scale recruitment and use of child soldiers, rather than assessing Lubanga's role or the particular harms he caused. Lubanga's sentence will be proportionate with respect to the goal of norm expression if it inflicts the least punishment necessary to express the international community's condemnation of such crimes.

[160] Space constraints preclude a fuller discussion of the extent to which the ICC should consider the norms and preferences of the national communities most affected by the crimes it adjudicates. For a fuller discussion see deGuzman (n 153).

[161] M deGuzman, 'Harsh Justice for International Crimes?' (2014) 39 Yale Journal of International Law 1.

37.6.1.2 General deterrence

The next, most important aspect of ICC prevention is general deterrence. Deterrence theory posits that punishment affects future decisions about whether or not to commit crimes by the offender (specific deterrence) and by the public at large (general deterrence). The theory assumes that such decisions are based on rational cost/benefit calculations that take account of the likelihood and severity of punishment. A great deal of scholarship has been devoted to debating the soundness of these assumptions.[162]

With regard to the ICC specifically, many scholars have expressed doubts regarding the potential for deterrence in light of the low likelihood of ICC punishment and the irrationality of many of those who commit international crimes.[163] Such doubts are justified and indeed explain the primacy of norm expression over deterrence as the ICC's core preventive function. Nonetheless, general deterrence remains a key aspiration of the ICC and thus a component of preventive proportionality.

Again, the precise manner in which the ICC should factor general deterrence into proportionality determinations requires further study. At a minimum, however, the judges should ensure that ICC punishments are not so insignificant that potential future offenders will consider them irrelevant to any cost/benefit calculations about whether to commit international crimes. The principle of parsimony should guide such judgments so that sentences should be no higher than the minimum the judges believe adequate for norm promotion and general deterrence. Moreover, as for the goal of norm expression, general deterrence counsels place greater emphasis on harm than on culpability in the proportionality analysis.[164]

37.6.1.3 Specific deterrence and incapacitation

In some cases, the need for specific deterrence and incapacitation will also factor into the ICC's proportionality analysis. Often, once an international offender is apprehended, the offender loses the political power necessary to commit future international crimes. In such cases, specific deterrence and incapacitation will not be important aspects of the ICC's proportionality analysis. Many of the ICC's cases, however, take [162] See e.g. P Robinson and J Darley, 'Does the Criminal Law Deter? A Social Science Investigation' (2004) 24 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 173, 205 (arguing that the deterrence theory in the criminal law is 'wildly misguided').

[163] See e.g. M Drumbl, 'Punishment, Post-genocide: From Guilt to Shame to Civis in Rwanda' (2000) 75 NYU Law Review 1221, 1254–5 (questioning the effectiveness of the ICTR and ICTY in deterring crimes against humanity); J Ku and J Nzelibe, 'Do International Criminal Tribunals Deter or Exacerbate Humanitarian Atrocities?' (2006) 84 Washington University Law Review 777, 832 (arguing that the threat of international prosecution may exacerbate the risk of atrocities); but see P Akhavan, 'Beyond Impunity: Can International Criminal Justice Prevent Future Atrocities?' (2001) 95 American Journal of International Law 7, 10 (arguing that international criminal law has a deterrent effect); J Charney, 'Editorial Comment: Progress in International Law Criminal Law?' (1999) 93 American Journal of International Law 452, 462 (arguing that consistent prosecution of leaders may eventually deter those who provoke the circumstances that encourage international crimes); T Meron, 'From Nuremburg to The Hague' (1995) 149 Military Law Review 107, 110–11 (arguing that international criminal law would have a greater deterrent effect if prosecutions were more consistent and national legal systems prosecuted similar offences in a similar way).

[164] See (n 63) and accompanying text.

place in the context of ongoing conflicts. Sometimes, therefore, individuals may have the opportunity to regain power and reoffend after serving their ICC sentences. In such cases, the ICC should consider the need for specific deterrence and incapacitation in determining proportionate punishment. Of course, such punishment should never exceed the offender's desert and should be limited by the principle of parsimony.

37.6.1.4 Restorative justice

Restorative justice, in its broadest sense, connotes efforts to restore victims, perpetrators, and communities so that they can live harmoniously together.[165] Like specific deterrence and incapacitation, restorative justice is not a primary aim of ICC punishment.[166] Given the small number of cases the ICC can prosecute in each situation, it is ill-equipped effectively to restore individuals, let alone whole communities. For that reason, the ICC's primary responsibility in sentencing is not to the victim communities but to the global community.[167]

Nonetheless, in some situations there may be reason to believe that the ICC can promote restoration in relevant communities through sentencing. In such circumstances, preventive proportionality suggests the Court should take account of the impact of punishment on restoration in deciding sentence lengths, at least when this goal does not conflict with the goals of norm expression and general deterrence. For instance, when a defendant is willing to apologise, engage in community service, or otherwise make amends in the relevant victim communities in exchange for a shorter sentence, the ICC may take such restorative actions into account in determining the appropriate sentence.

In fact, such actions will also be relevant to norm expression since the offender's acknowledgement of wrongdoing reduces the need for condemnation through punishment. The judges should be careful, however, not to reduce punishment below that necessary to express adequate condemnation of the crimes at issue. The ICTY's sentence of Biljana Plavšić is instructive in this regard. Plavšić, a high-ranking politician responsible for very widespread and devastating crimes in the former Yugoslavia, was sentenced to 11 years in prison.[168] The judges justified this relatively lenient sentence by stating that Plavšić's decision to plead guilty to the charges against her contributed to reconciliation in former Yugoslavia.[169] The sentence has been widely criticized as overly lenient. While some scholars have opined that the sentence was inadequately retributive,[170] its real flaw may have been that it failed to express sufficient condemnation of Plavšić's crimes.

[165] See C Menkel-Meadow, 'Restorative Justice: What Is It and Does It Work?' (2007) 3 Annual Review of Law & Social Science 161, 163.

[166] The ICC's efforts at restorative justice instead focus on victim participation in proceedings and reparations. See Arts 68 and 75 ICC Statute.

[167] The extent to which the ICC should aim to satisfy victim communities is the subject of a substantial debate that is beyond the scope of this chapter.

[168] Sentencing Judgment, Plavšić, IT-00-39&40/1, TC, ICTY, 27 February 2003, para. 132.

[169] Ibid., para. 73.

[170] See e.g. Chifflet and Boas (n 121) 148.

In sum, ICC proportionality analysis should focus largely on ensuring that sentences adequately express global norms and, to a lesser extent, promote general deterrence. Judges should also take account of specific deterrence, incapacitation, and restorative justice in relevant cases, but only to the extent that such goals do not conflict with norm expression.

37.6.2 Implications of preventive proportionality for sentencing procedure

Adopting a predominantly utilitarian approach to proportionality will have important implications for sentencing procedure at the ICC. For instance, preventive proportionality mitigates the adoption of sentencing guidelines, which a number of scholars have urged upon the Court.[171] Retributive proportionality, particularly of the ordinal variety, is greatly assisted by guidelines or even mandatory rankings that enhance consistency. In contrast, preventive proportionality is better achieved by affording judges discretion to take account of the various components of prevention according to the dictates of particular cases. Rather than requiring that judges impose more severe punishments for crimes against humanity than for war crimes, for example, preventive proportionality suggests that judges should have discretion to impose harsher punishment whenever they believe the need for condemnation is particularly strong. This may be the case, for example, with respect to crimes involving sexual or gender violence. Because such crimes are under-punished in many parts of the world, the need to express global condemnation of them is particularly strong. As such, preventive proportionality may require more punishment for a war crime committed on the basis of sex or gender than for a crime against humanity involving more widespread harm that was not inflicted on a discriminatory basis.

Second, preventive proportionality will require ICC judges to provide substantial explanations of the grounds for their decisions in sentencing judgments. Justifications for retributive proportionality are relatively straightforward: judges (or legislators) are expressing their views as to the amount of punishment deserved in particular cases. While the criteria they use to determine desert in each case may require justification, the basic rationale remains the same. In contrast, determinations of preventive proportionality will be more complex, at least some of the time. In some cases, for instance, the judges will consider incapacitation or restorative justice relevant to the proportionality analysis, while in others they will not. The resulting inconsistencies may strike observers as unjust unless the judges offer persuasive justifications.

Moreover, by providing substantial explanations for their sentencing decisions ICC judges can moderate the effects of any criticism of those decisions on perceptions of the ICC's legitimacy. In light of divergent sentencing norms around the world, ICC sentences will likely appear insufficiently severe to some audiences and perhaps overly severe to others. Criticisms based on inconsistencies with local norms are particularly likely in the communities most affected by the crimes already noted. To enhance the perceived legitimacy of their decisions, ICC judges should explain why they are not sentencing offenders in accordance with the local norms of the communities where they committed their crimes. That is, that their sentences aim at global crime prevention rather than at local justice objectives. Such objectives are better pursued in national systems, which, it is hoped, will be encouraged to act by ICC involvement. For the same reason, victims should not play a substantial role in ICC sentencing determinations.

[171] See e.g. Ohlin (n 66) 382, 397.

37.7 Conclusion

To ensure the perceived legitimacy of its sentencing judgments, the ICC must identify and articulate a theory of proportionate punishment. The ICC should explain that its sentences do not seek to capture the full extent of each offender's desert. Instead, without inflicting more punishment than an offender deserves, ICC sentences seek to prevent international crimes at the lowest cost to the international community. Such prevention is effectuated in particular through the expression of global condemnation of such crimes but also through general deterrence as well as, in some cases, specific deterrence, incapacitation, and restorative justice. The ICC's judges should not only set forth a general philosophy of proportionate punishment but also explain in each case why they believe the punishment chosen is adequate, and no more than adequate, to promote the relevant aspects of the Court's preventive mission. The international community will then have the information required to react and, if it disagrees, to change the ICC's approach to proportionate punishment.

38

The Role of the Appeals Chamber

*Volker Nerlich

38.1 Introduction

While domestic judiciaries are usually hierarchically structured and allow for one or more levels of appeal from a first-instance court's decision, this is not necessarily the case on the international plane. Neither of the two post-Second World War International Military Tribunals provided for the possibility of an appeal; the ICJ, the IACHR, and the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights are all single-instance jurisdictions. In contrast, the judicial system of the European Union consists, since 1988, of two instances: the General Court (formerly: European Court of First Instance) and the European Court of Justice. The ad hoc ICTY and ICTR also comprise two instances: judgments and certain interlocutory decisions of the trial chambers may be appealed to the tribunals' appeals chambers. Similarly, under certain conditions, judgments of the Sections of the European Court of Human Rights may be referred to that court's Grand Chamber.

The ICC (or the Court) also belongs to the category of international courts that have more than one instance: under certain conditions, interlocutory and final decisions of the ICC's Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers may be appealed to the Appeals Chamber. Given that the ICC is a criminal jurisdiction, the existence of an appellate level is easily explained: modern human rights law provides that a person convicted of a criminal offence must have the right to have the conviction and sentence reviewed by a higher court.[1] Accordingly, the drafters of the Rome Statute of the ICC provided, from early on in the drafting process, for an Appeals Chamber and the right to appeal.[2]

* Legal Adviser, ICC; Doctor juris, Humboldt-University of Berlin; LLM, University of the Western Cape. The views expressed are those of the author and cannot be attributed to the ICC.

[1] Art 14(5) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (adopted 16 December 1966, entered into force 23 March 1976) 999 UNTS 171; Art 2 Protocol No. 7 to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (adopted 22 November 1984, entered into force 1 November 1988) ETS No. 117; Art 8(2)(h) American Convention on Human Rights (adopted 22 November 1969, entered into force 18 July 1978) 1144 UNTS 123. See also Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-168 (OA3), AC, ICC, 13 July 2007, para. 38; G Boas et al., 'Appeals, Reviews, and Reconsideration' in G Sluiter et al. (eds), International Criminal Procedure: Principles and Rules (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2013) 939, 1002.

[2] See Art 5(b) of the 1994 Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court (1994) Yearbook of the International Law Commission 27. In contrast, the (Revised) Draft Statute for an international criminal court that the United Nations Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction put forward specifically excluded the right to appeal (see Report of the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction, UN Doc A/2136 (1952) Annex 1, Art 50; Report of the 1953 Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction, UN Doc A/2645 (1953) Annex, Art 49). The question of whether an international criminal court should provide for the right of appeal was, however, discussed in the Committee: while some members considered that there should be a right to appeal to avoid potential miscarriages of justice,

It should be noted, however, that the right to appeal under the Rome Statute goes beyond what is mandated by human rights law: not only is the convicted person entitled to appeal, but also the Court's prosecutor and, in certain circumstances, victims participating in the proceedings, states, etc. Furthermore, as mentioned earlier, not only may the conviction or sentence be appealed, but also acquittals, reparation orders, and certain interlocutory decisions of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers of the Court.

In the following sections, the role and function of the ICC's Appeals Chamber will be analysed. In particular, the first jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber will be assessed with a view to ascertaining the Appeals Chamber's conceptual relationship with the other Chambers of the Court.

38.2 The Appeals Chamber in the Context of the ICC

In domestic legal systems, judges of appellate courts are often more experienced than their colleagues at first-instance courts and have been promoted or specifically appointed to sit at the appellate level. Thus, while the power to reverse or amend decisions of the first-instance courts is often based on specific provisions in the law, it is usually accompanied by a sense of hierarchy within the judiciary and the expectation—rightly or wrongly—that judges at the appellate level may have a better understanding of the law. This gives decisions of appellate courts importance and relevance beyond the specific cases in which they were made—be it in the form of binding precedent or as guidance for future cases.

In contrast to the hierarchical structure of domestic judiciaries, all judges of the ICC are elected in the same way, irrespective of whether they will serve in the Pre-Trial, Trial, or Appeals Chambers[3] of the Court: following a complicated voting procedure, candidates for judicial office must obtain a two-thirds majority in the ASP and are elected for a non-renewable term of office of nine years.[4] In the election process, it is unknown whether others were of the view that this could undermine the Court's authority (see Report of the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction, para. 159). It should be noted, however, that the draft Statute provided for a court consisting of nine judges, sitting en banc. It appears that the size of the Court was an important factor in deciding against a right of appeal (ibid., para. 159). On the drafting process of Art 81 of the Rome Statute, see H Brady and M Jennings, 'Appeal and Revision' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 294; W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 931–2. On the drafting of the relevant provisions of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence see H Brady, 'Appeal' in R Lee, The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley, New York: Transnational Publishers 2001) 575.

[3] Pursuant to Art 34(b) of the Statute, the judiciary comprises the Appeals Division, the Trial Division, and the Pre-Trial Division. Pursuant to Art 39(2)(a), the judicial functions in each Division are exercised by Chambers, which, in case of the Appeals Chamber, comprises all five judges of the Appeals Division, and, in case of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers, by three judges of the respective Divisions or, in the case of the Pre-Trial Chamber, by a single judge. Note that certain functions of the Trial Chamber for the purpose of the preparation of the trial may be exercised by a judge designated by that Chamber, see Rule 132*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002). It could be argued that this provision is, pursuant to Rule 149 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, also applicable mutatis mutandis to proceedings before the Appeals Chamber.

[4] See Art 36(3)–(8) of the Statute. Exceptionally, a judge may stand for re-election under the conditions set forth in Art 37(2) of the Statute.

candidates, if elected, will serve in the Appeals Chamber (which comprises five judges) or any of the other Chambers of the Court (which comprise three judges each), and the ASP has no influence on their assignment. Rather, it is for the Presidency of the Court (previously the plenary of judges) to assign, after consultation, the judges to the three judicial Divisions.[5] Article 39(1) of the Statute provides some guidance for the Presidency's decision. First, the President of the Court is ex officio a member of the Appeals Division. Second, '[t]he assignment of judges to divisions shall be based on the nature of the functions to be performed by each division and the qualification and experience of the judges elected to the Court, in such a way that each division shall contain an appropriate combination of expertise in criminal law and procedure and in international law'.[6] Article 39(1) also provides that the Pre-Trial and Trial Divisions should 'be composed predominantly of judges with criminal trial experience'.[7] Thus, while there are criteria for the assignment of judges to the Appeals Chamber, they are based on the specific functions of the Chamber, but not in the sense that the Appeals Chamber is hierarchically superior to the other Chambers of the Court. In this regard, it is also noteworthy that Article 39(3)(b) and (4) of the Statute has been interpreted so as to allow judges who were previously assigned to a Pre-Trial or Trial Division to be reassigned to the Appeals Division. Furthermore, judges of the Appeals Chamber who previously sat on a given case at the Pre-Trial or Trial level are usually recused from sitting on appeals arising from that case. Thus, judges from the Pre-Trial and Trial Divisions will be temporarily assigned to the Appeals Chamber to sit on certain appeals. This transferability of judges from first-instance Chambers to the Appeals Chamber further underlines the equal status of each judge of the Court, irrespective of the Chamber to which he or she is assigned.

In sum, the judges of the Appeals Chamber are coming from the same pool of judges as those of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers. There is no hierarchy in status between the judges of the Appeals Chamber on one hand and the judges of the other Chambers on the other hand.[8] Nevertheless, there is a functional difference: despite the equal status of all judges, the Statute vests the Appeals Chamber with the power to review, within certain limits, the decisions of the other Chambers of the Court. This contrasts with domestic systems, where there is usually both a hierarchical and a functional difference between first-instance and appellate courts. It is arguably for that reason that [5] See Rule 4*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Rule 4*bis* was introduced and Rule 4, which previously vested the power to assign judges to the judicial Divisions in the plenary, amended by the ASP with Resolution ICC-ASP/10/Res1 (20 December 2011).

[6] Art 39(1), third sentence, of the Statute.

[7] This, however, does not necessarily mean that international lawyers will be in the majority in the Appeals Division: the minimum voting requirements for the elections of judges make it likely that, in any event, a majority of the 18 judges has a criminal law background. Under Art 36(3)(b) of the Statute, each candidate must either have 'established competence in criminal law and procedure' or 'established experience in relevant areas of international law'. At the first election, at least nine judges with criminal law experience had to be elected, compared to only five judges with an international law background (see Art 36(5) of the Statute). This proportion is to be maintained in subsequent elections.

[8] Wryly, it could be argued that the difference between the Appeals Chamber and the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers is purely numerical: there are five judges in the former, while only three in the latter. However, in a given case, there may even be no numerical majority: if a unanimous decision of, say, a Trial Chamber, is overturned on appeal by a two-to-three majority of the Appeals Chamber, a total of five judges would have been in favour of the Trial Chamber's original decision that is reversed.

the Appeals Chamber has held that the other Chambers of the Court are not 'inferior courts' vis-à-vis the Appeals Chamber.[9] As will be further expanded, it is submitted that this peculiarity has an impact generally on the role of the Appeals Chamber and may explain the Chamber's approach, for instance, in relation to the giving of 'guidance' on questions of law that are related to, but not decisive for, the appeal at hand.

38.3 Jurisdiction of the Appeals Chamber

Broadly speaking, the jurisdiction of the Appeals Chamber covers appeals against final decisions of the Trial Chamber at the end of a trial, including reparation orders (hereinafter referred to as 'final appeals'), and appeals against certain interlocutory decisions of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers rendered in the course of the proceedings (hereinafter referred to as 'interlocutory appeals'). Naturally, the first appeals that reached the Appeals Chamber were in the latter category, and the jurisprudence in that field is more developed.[10] For that reason, interlocutory appeals will be discussed first.

38.3.1 Interlocutory appeals

As mentioned previously, there is no human rights requirement that interlocutory decisions of first-instance courts, taken in the preparation or in the course of a trial, must be subject to appeal. Even in respect of detention, human rights law requires only that the detained person must be able to seek judicial review of his or her detention, but not that the first-instance court's decision on detention must be subject to further appellate review. Thus, the legislator in each jurisdiction is faced with the question of whether, and to what extent, interlocutory appeals in criminal proceedings should be permitted. Clearly, there is a tension between, on one hand, the desire to resolve important issues early on in a trial by allowing for interlocutory appeals, and, on the other hand, the delay that interlocutory appeals inevitably cause.[11] As will be seen later in the chapter, the drafters of the Rome Statute, when setting out the framework for interlocutory appeals, sought to address this tension by carefully delineating the conditions under which interlocutory appeals may be brought. In line with this approach, the first jurisprudence of the Court has interpreted this framework restrictively and circumscribed closely which decisions may be appealed.

The central provision in respect of interlocutory appeals is Article 82(1) of the Statute, which sets out the decisions that are subject to interlocutory appeal. Nevertheless, this list is not complete: Article 82(2) provides for an appeal against a Pre-Trial Chamber's decision under Article 57(3)(d) (authorization to take specific investigative steps on the territory of a state without having secured that state's cooperation under Part 9 of the Rome Statute). Furthermore, Article 81(3)(c)(ii) provides for an appeal against a decision of a Trial Chamber exceptionally to maintain the detention of an acquitted person, pending the outcome of the appeal against his or her acquittal.

[9] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review (n 1) para. 30.

[10] On the first jurisprudence on interlocutory appeals see also F Eckelmans, 'The First Jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber of the ICC' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 527; H Friman, 'Interlocutory Appeals in the Early Practice of the International Criminal Court' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 553.

[11] See also Boas et al. (n 1) 968; Friman (n 10) 555–6.

The appeals provided for in Article 82(1) and (2) and Article 81(3)(c)(ii) fall into two broad categories: those directed against decisions that are appealable as of right (Article 82(1)(a) to (c), and Article 81(3)(c)(ii) of the Statute) and those that are appealable only with the leave of the Chamber that issued the impugned decision (Article 82(1)(d) and Article 82(2) of the Statute). This dichotomy is taken up in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and in the Regulations of the Court: Rule 154 and Regulation 64 regulate the procedure for appeals as of right, while Rule 155 and Regulation 65 regulate for appeals that require leave of the first-instance Chamber.[12]

38.3.1.1 Appeals under Article 82(1)(a)

Under Article 82(1)(a) of the Statute, decisions 'with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility' may be appealed. This provision corresponds to the final sentence of Article 19(6) of the Statute, which provides for a right to appeal. Article 19, which governs the procedure for admissibility proceedings, is also relevant for determining the potential appellants against decisions with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility. The chapeau of Article 82(1) provides that 'either party' may raise an appeal, which, in a criminal law context, would usually be understood as referring to the accused person or suspect and the prosecution. Nevertheless, Article 19(2)(b) and (c) also grants states the right to challenge, under certain conditions, the Court's jurisdiction or the admissibility of a case. It follows that states must also be entitled to bring an appeal against a decision in respect of jurisdiction or admissibility. Thus, in the context of appeals under Article 82(1)(a), 'either party' must be understood as including not only the suspect and the prosecution, but also states.[13] This is expressly set out in Article 18, which governs preliminary rulings regarding admissibility: its paragraph 4 specifically provides that the 'State concerned or the Prosecutor may appeal to the Appeals Chamber against a ruling of the Pre-Trial Chamber'. Interestingly, this formulation suggests that potential suspects do not have a right to appeal against preliminary admissibility rulings, even though it is conceivable that they will have been identified by the prosecutor at the early stages of an investigation.

[12] The procedural scheme for the two categories of appeals differs slightly: for the former category, the appellant has to file a notice of appeal before the Appeals Chamber, followed by the document in support of the appeal, to which the other participant(s) respond; for the latter category, the potential appellant has to apply for leave to appeal before the first instance Chamber that rendered the decision at issue; if leave to appeal is granted, the appellant files immediately the document in support of the appeal, followed by the responses of the other participant(s).

[13] See Boas et al. (n 1) 967; for a differing view see R Roth and M Henzelin, 'The Appeal Procedure of the ICC' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary vol. II (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 1551.

The Appeals Chamber has interpreted the term 'decision with respect to jurisdiction or admissibility' restrictively. In a decision rendered in the Kenya situation, the Appeals Chamber explained that > the operative part of the decision itself must pertain directly to a question on the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case. It is not sufficient that there is an indirect or tangential link between the underlying decision and questions of jurisdiction or admissibility.[14]

On that basis, the Appeals Chamber rejected as inadmissible[15] an appeal brought by the Republic of Kenya against a decision of a Pre-Trial Chamber that had rejected Kenya's request that the Court and the prosecutor should provide assistance to Kenya in respect of its own investigations into the post-election violence.[16] The Appeals Chamber found as unpersuasive Kenya's argument that the assistance sought must be seen in the context of the admissibility challenge that Kenya had brought; regardless of this context, the decision under appeal was, in the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, not a decision in respect of admissibility.[17]

Similarly, in a decision rendered in the Ruto et al. case, the Appeals Chamber dismissed as inadmissible an appeal brought by the two accused that was directed against the Pre-Trial Chamber's interpretation of the term 'organizational policy' as a component of the contextual element of crimes against humanity (see Article 7(2)(a) of the Statute).[18] Before the Pre-Trial Chamber, the accused had challenged the Court's jurisdiction on the basis that the Pre-Trial Chamber's interpretation of the term was flawed; the Pre-Trial Chamber disposed of the challenge to jurisdiction as part of its decision on the confirmation of the charges. This decision became the subject of an appeal, which was brought under Article 82(1)(a) of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber noted that the two accused did not question the Court's temporal, territorial, or personal jurisdiction over the case, nor did they challenge that the Court had jurisdiction over crimes against humanity, and that the 'organizational policy' element was part of the definition of those crimes.[19] The Appeals Chamber found that the interpretation of the term 'organizational policy' and whether there was sufficient evidence to find that there was such a policy was not a question of the jurisdiction of the Court, but one [14] Decision on the admissibility of the 'Appeal of the Government of Kenya against the "Decision on the Request for Assistance Submitted on Behalf of the Government of the Republic of Kenya Pursuant to Article 93(10) of the Statute and Rule 194 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence"', Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-78 (OA), AC, ICC, 10 August 2011, para. 15.

[15] The Appeals Chamber developed the concept of 'inadmissibility' of appeals through its jurisprudence. An appeal is dismissed as inadmissible if it does not fall under the Appeals Chamber's jurisdiction or is otherwise not properly before it. In that case, the Appeals Chamber does not consider the merits of the appeal and does not specifically confirm the impugned decision. Furthermore, instead of rendering a 'judgment' on the interlocutory appeal, the Appeals Chamber usually issues a 'decision' to dismiss an inadmissible appeal. On the concept of 'inadmissibility' see Eckelmans (n 10) 538 et seq.

[16] Ibid., paras 1–2. [17] Ibid., paras 18–21.

[18] Decision on the appeals of Mr William Samoei Ruto and Mr Joshua Arap Sang against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 23 January 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-414 (OA3, OA4), AC, ICC, 24 May 2012.

[19] Ibid., para. 23.

of whether or not the charges against the accused could be confirmed. The Appeals Chamber noted that if it were to consider the merits of the submissions of the accused any further, 'it would, in fact, be assessing the correctness of the decision to confirm the charges against them, insofar as it related to the existence of an "organizational policy"', and this notwithstanding the fact that the accused had neither sought nor obtained leave to appeal the confirmation decision.[20]

38.3.1.2 Appeals under Article 82(1)(b) and Article 81(3)(c)(ii)

Under Article 82(1)(b) of the Statute, decisions 'granting or denying release of the person being investigated or prosecuted' may be appealed as of right. A large number of interlocutory appeals heard by the Appeals Chamber thus far were brought under this provision, which is hardly surprising, given the fundamental character of the right to liberty. The Appeals Chamber has developed a specific jurisprudence on appeals relating to interim release. Notably, the Appeals Chamber has adopted a relatively deferential standard of review, in particular in view of the fact that whether the (continued) detention of an individual appears necessary for one or more of the grounds listed in Article 58(1)(b) of the Statute involves 'an element of prediction'.[21]

As with respect to appeals against decisions on jurisdiction or admissibility, the Appeals Chamber has interpreted the right to appeal decisions under Article 82(1)(b) of the Statute narrowly: in Lubanga, it found that a decision confirming the charges against an accused was not a decision denying his release.[22] The Appeals Chamber found that '[t]he decision confirming the charges neither grants nor denies release. The effect or implications of a decision confirming or denying the charges do not qualify or alter the character of the decision'.[23] Similarly, in the Mbarushimana case, the Appeals Chamber found that a decision denying the confirmation of charges did not amount to a decision granting the suspect release.[24] The Appeals Chamber found that even though, under Article 61(10) of the Statute, any warrant ceases to have effect if charges are not confirmed, and notwithstanding the fact that the Pre-Trial Chamber specifically ordered Mr Mbarushimana's release, this did not change the character of the decision on the confirmation of charges.[25] In the same decision, the Appeals Chamber dismissed the prosecutor's appeal—also brought under Article 82(1)(b)

[20] Ibid., para. 29.

[21] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-824 (OA7), AC, ICC, 13 February 2007, para. 137.

[22] Decision on the admissibility of the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Décision sur la confirmation des charges' of 29 January 2007, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-926 (OA8), AC, ICC, 13 June 2007.

[23] Ibid., para. 15 (footnote omitted).

[24] Reasons for 'Decision on the appeal of the Prosecutor of 19 December 2011 against the "Decision on the confirmation of the charges" and, in the alternative, against the "Decision on the Prosecution's Request for stay of order to release Callixte Mbarushimana" and on the victims' request for participation' of 20 December 2011, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-483 (OA3), AC, ICC, 24 January 2012.

[25] Ibid., paras 21–2.

of the Statute—against the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision rejecting the prosecutor's request to stay the release of Mr Mbarushimana pending the determination of the prosecutor's application for leave to appeal the confirmation decision. The Appeals Chamber found that, even though the granting of a stay would have affected Mr Mbarushimana's release, it was merely 'a procedural decision that did not address the substance of whether release should be granted or whether Mr Mbarushimana should remain in detention'.[26]

Appeals brought under Article 81(3)(c)(ii) also relate to the detention of an accused. As a rule, if an accused person is acquitted at the end of the trial, he or she shall be released immediately (Article 81(3)(c) of the Statute). Nevertheless, the prosecutor may request that the Trial Chamber exceptionally order the continued detention of the acquitted person, pending the resolution of the prosecutor's appeal against the acquittal. The Trial Chamber's decision on such a request by the prosecutor is liable to direct appeal. In the Ngudjolo case, following Mr Ngudjolo's acquittal by the Trial Chamber, the prosecutor requested the Trial Chamber to order his continued detention, which, however, was rejected. The prosecutor appealed against this decision, but subsequently discontinued the appeal,[27] in light of the fact that the Appeals Chamber had dismissed the prosecutor's request that the Appeals Chamber order suspensive effect[28] and that Mr Ngudjolo had been released.

It is interesting to note that the specific appeals procedure foreseen in Article 81(3)(c)(ii) of the Statute could have lent itself to an analogous application in case of release of a suspect following the non-confirmation of the charges. The situation is arguably comparable: in case of an acquittal as well as in case of the non-confirmation of charges, the first-instance Chamber takes a decision that leads, as a rule, to the release of the person concerned. In case of an acquittal, the immediate release may be prevented by an order of the Trial Chamber under Article 81(3)(c)(i) of the Statute; arguably, in case of non-confirmation of the charges, a Pre-Trial Chamber may reach the same result by ordering a stay of the implementation of the confirmation decision.[29] Nevertheless, according to the cited jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber, such a decision cannot be appealed as of right, whereas a decision under Article 81(3)(c)(i) is liable to direct appeal.

38.3.1.3 Appeals under Article 82(1)(c)

Article 82(1)(c) of the Statute provides for an appeal against a Pre-Trial Chamber's decision to act on its own initiative pursuant to Article 56(3) of the Statute and to take investigative steps in case of a unique investigative opportunity. Pursuant to Article

[26] Ibid., para. 31.

[27] See Prosecution's Notice to the Registrar of its Discontinuance of its Appeal against Trial Chamber II's oral decision to release Mathieu Ngudjolo, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-18 (OA), OTP, ICC, 9 January 2013.

[28] See Decision on the request of the Prosecutor of 19 December 2012 for suspensive effect, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-12 (OA), AC, ICC, 20 December 2012.

[29] Note, however, that in the case against Callixte Mbarushimana, the Pre-Trial Chamber found that it had no power to order such a stay; see Decision on the Prosecution's Request for stay of order to release Callixte Mbarushimana, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-469, PCT I, ICC, 19 December 2011.

56(3)(b), the right to appeal lies with the prosecutor only, which highlights the 'constitutional' character of the appeals procedure—it is the prosecutor who, under the Rome Statute, is vested with the power to investigate crimes under the Court's jurisdiction;[30] only under the narrow exception of Article 56(3)(a) is the Pre-Trial Chamber entitled to investigate itself—and its decision is liable to immediate review by the Appeals Chamber upon appeal by the prosecutor. Thus far, no appeals have been brought under this provision (and, indeed, it appears that no decision under Article 56(3)(a) has been taken by any of the Pre-Trial Chambers).

38.3.1.4 Appeals under Article 82(1)(d) and Article 82(2)

The second category of interlocutory appeals includes those that do not lie as of right, but require the leave of the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber that issued the impugned decision. The central provision in this regard is Article 82(1)(d), which provides for an appeal against '[a] decision that involves an issue that would significantly affect the fair and expeditious conduct of the proceedings or the outcome of the trial, and for which, in the opinion of the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber, an immediate resolution by the Appeals Chamber may materially advance the proceedings'.[31]

This provision, which was the basis for the majority of the appeals that the Appeals Chamber has considered thus far, has some peculiarities. First, it is noteworthy that it is the first-instance Chamber, and not the Appeals Chamber itself, that decides whether a given decision may be appealed. The argument against such a procedure is obvious: the first-instance Chamber could be perceived to be 'biased', as it could seek to 'protect' its 'own' decisions against appellate review by not granting leave to appeal.[32] This 'problem' could be seen as being exacerbated by the Appeals Chamber's jurisprudence that refuses the review of decision of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers that reject applications for leave to appeal.[33] Upon closer analysis, however, the wisdom of Article 82(1)(d) of the Statute becomes apparent: proceedings before the Appeals Chamber take some time and, for that reason, any interlocutory appeal has the potential of delaying the proceedings before the first-instance Chamber. Therefore, the first-instance Chambers are best placed to assess the impact of the delay on its proceedings and to balance it against the advantage that clarifying the issue at hand by Appeals Chamber would have. In this regard, it is noteworthy that the Appeals Chamber, in one of its early decisions, clarified that the 'material advance of the proceedings' referred to in Article 82(1)(d) must not be understood as a reference to time-saving. Rather, it refers to 'moving forward' the judicial process by 'ensuring that the proceedings follow the right course'.[34] It must also be highlighted that, even if a Chamber declines to grant leave to appeal, the party concerned will, if necessary, often have the opportunity to [30] See Art 54 of the Statute.

[31] On these criteria see C Staker, 'Article 81: Appeal against Decision of Acquittal or Conviction or against Sentence' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 1449, margin number 11.

[32] See also Boas et al. (n 1) 964 and 1005–6 on the experience at the ICTY and ICTR.

[33] See Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review (n 1).

[34] Ibid., para. 15.

raise the issue in the context of an eventual final appeal at the end of the trial. Against this background, it appears convincing that it is the first-instance Chamber, and not the Appeals Chamber, that decides on applications for leave to appeal.

The other question relating to Article 82(1)(d) of the Statute arises in respect of what is actually the object of the appeal. The provision lends itself to two possible interpretations. First, it could be said that it is the 'issue' certified for appeal that is brought before the Appeals Chamber. The Appeals Chamber has defined 'issue' as > an identifiable subject or topic requiring a decision for its resolution [...] An issue is constituted by a subject the resolution of which is essential for the resolution of a matter arising in the judicial cause under examination. The issue may be legal or factual or a mixed one.[35]

This would imply that, on appeal, it is the task of the Appeals Chamber to decide the issue and to determine, for instance, whether the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber's interpretation of the law, as applied in the decision under review, was correct. This would also mean that, at least in the normal course of events, the Appeals Chamber's jurisdiction is limited to the issue on appeal and that it cannot address—either on its own motion or at the request of the appellant—other matters arising from the decision that are not encompassed by the issue in relation to which leave to appeal was granted.

An alternative approach would be to assume that, once leave to appeal has been granted by the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber, the entire decision is put before the Appeals Chamber. The Appeals Chamber would decide whether the decision was erroneous, based on the grounds of appeal put forward by the appellant. The 'issue' would only be relevant and potentially limit the Appeals Chamber's jurisdiction if a decision contains rulings on several, distinguishable subject matters (e.g. on disclosure and on victim participation), and leave to appeal was not granted in respect of all of those 'issues'. In such situation, an appellant could arguably not raise grounds of appeal in respect of those rulings in relation to which leave to appeal has not been granted.

This distinction appears to be merely semantical at first sight. It has, however, a potentially significant impact on the conduct of interlocutory appeals and the relationship between the Appeals Chamber and the other Chambers of the Court. Under the former approach, it is in the hands of the first-instance Chamber to define to a large extent the subject matter of an appeal, including the grounds of appeal that the appellant may raise before the Appeals Chamber. Indeed, the exact formulation of the issues in relation to which leave to appeal is granted is often a bone of contention between the parties in the first-instance Chamber, and Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers occasionally have reformulated the issues in their decisions granting leave to appeal, thereby directly impacting on the appellate process. In contrast, the second approach leads to a clearer distinction between the 'issue' and the grounds raised on appeal. Under this approach, the potential appellant would have to convince the first-instance Chamber that the decision in relation to which leave to appeal is sought involves an 'issue'. The question of the existence of an 'issue' would be primarily about the importance of the decision for the overall proceedings. For instance, it could be said that a decision on disclosure of potentially important exculpatory evidence would involve an 'issue' in terms of Article 82(1)(d), because whether the evidence ought to be disclosed could have significant impact on the further case. Whether the first-instance Chamber's decision was correct or not would, however, not be part of the 'issue', but would be addressed in the arguments of the appellant before the Appeals Chamber.

[35] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review (n 1) para. 9.

Arguably, the latter approach is preferable because it allows for a clearer distinction between the functions of the first-instance Chamber in the granting of leave to appeal and the actual appellate process. In particular, the first-instance Chamber would not be put in a position where it has to decide whether certain arguments should be raised before the Appeals Chamber. Nevertheless, the practice of the Court thus far, while arguably not entirely consistent, appears to be leaning in the other direction: the 'issue' in relation to which leave to appeal has been granted determines and delineates the jurisdiction of the Appeals Chamber. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber has refused to consider arguments on appeal that fall outside the 'issue', in particular, if the first-instance Chamber has rejected leave to appeal in that regard.[36] This practice has led parties to discontinue appeals. In the Banda and Jerbo case, the defence, having been granted leave to appeal in relation only to one of two issues for which leave to appeal had been sought, decided not to pursue the appeal. It stated that denying leave to appeal the second issues 'prevented [it] from proceeding to explore the adequacy of the Trial Chamber's decision to proceed to trial and keep the Defence complaints in mind'.[37] This case would have lent itself to an alternative understanding of the relationship between the 'issue' and the arguments on appeal. At issue was a decision denying a request for a stay of proceedings in the case. Given the character of such a decision, it could be said that it clearly involved an 'issue' in terms of Article 82(1)(d) of the Statute and that, once leave to appeal has been granted, the appellants should be free to raise any ground of appeal against that decision they saw fit.

It must, however, be noted that the Appeals Chamber does not accept a first-instance Chamber's decision granting leave to appeal at face value. In the Lubanga case, the Trial Chamber granted leave to appeal in respect of a decision ordering that three detained witnesses, who had concluded their testimony and should have been returned to the DRC, could not be returned because of their pending applications for political asylum in the Netherlands.[38] Nevertheless, the Appeals Chamber rejected the appeal as inadmissible, noting that the Trial Chamber had granted leave to appeal, notwithstanding the fact that the conditions for the granting of leave [36] See the references cited in Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 3 June 2013 entitled 'Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute', Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-572 (OA5), AC, ICC, 16 December 2013, fn. 142.

[37] Defence Notice to the Registrar of the Discontinuance of the Defence appeal against the Decision on the defence request for a temporary stay of proceedings (ICC-02/05-03/09-410), Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-435 (OA3), 21 December 2012, para. 11.

[38] Decision on two requests for leave to appeal the 'Decision on the request by DRC-D01-WWWW-0019 for special protective measures relating to his asylum application', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2779, TC I, ICC, 4 August 2011.

to appeal under Article 82(1)(d) had not been fulfilled, 'on an exceptional basis' pursuant to Article 64(6) of the Statute.[39] Also in the Lubanga case, the Appeals Chamber rejected an appeal as inadmissible even though the Trial Chamber had granted leave to appeal under Article 82(1)(d). It found that, contrary to the Trial Chamber's own characterization of the decision, the 'Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations'[40] was appealable under Article 83(4) because it was deemed to be a reparations order. Therefore, the appeal brought under Article 82(1)(d), which was brought following a decision granting leave to appeal, was inadmissible.[41] The Appeals Chamber found that '[w]here necessary, the Appeals Chamber itself has to establish the true nature of an impugned decision, in order to ensure that the decision in question is appropriately before it, and that the appeal is determined pursuant to the correct legal basis'.[42] This shows that the Appeals Chamber considers that it is for itself to determine whether or not it has jurisdiction over a given case, and that the first-instance Chamber cannot modify the Appeals Chamber's jurisdiction.

38.3.2 Appeals against final decisions of the Trial Chamber

As noted in the previous section, the Appeals Chamber also has jurisdiction to hear appeals against the final decisions rendered by a Trial Chamber at the end of a trial: decisions of conviction, and sentence, as well as reparations orders may be appealed as of right. Furthermore, the prosecutor may appeal against decisions of acquittal. In addition, the prosecutor may also appeal against convictions or sentences on behalf of the convicted person.[43]

At the time of writing, the Appeals Chamber has rendered judgments only in respect of the appeals against the conviction and sentencing decisions in the Lubanga case. Nevertheless, fundamental questions—such as the standard of review[44] and the criteria for the admission of additional evidence on appeal—have been resolved in these judgments. In relation to the standard of review for appeals against conviction decisions, the Appeals Chamber has essentially adopted the same standards as those [39] Decision on the 'Urgent Request for Directions' of the Kingdom of the Netherlands of 17 August 2011, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2799 (OA19), AC, ICC, 26 August 2011.

[40] Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2904, TC I, ICC, 7 August 2012.

[41] Decision on the admissibility of the appeals against Trial Chamber I's 'Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations' and directions on the further conduct of proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2953 (A1, A2, A3, OA21), AC, ICC, 14 December 2012, paras 51 et seq.

[42] Ibid., para. 50.

[43] Note that according to Regulation 70 of the Regulations of the OTP, before lodging an appeal on behalf of a convicted person the prosecutor shall consult with the convicted person or his or her counsel.

[44] On the standard of review see J Doria, 'Standards of Appeals and Standards of Revision' in J Doria, H Gasser, and C Bassiouni, The Legal Regime of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 945; C Staker, 'Article 83: Proceedings on Appeal' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 1481, margin number 7.

developed in respect of interlocutory appeals.[45] Notably, in relation to alleged factual errors, the Appeals Chamber applies a deferential standard of review and will not assess the evidence de novo.[46] In respect of appeals against a Trial Chamber's sentence, the Appeals Chamber has highlighted the discretionary character of sentencing decision and has applied its deferential standard of review for discretionary decision to such appeals.[47]

In relation to admission of additional evidence on appeal, Regulation 62 of the Regulations of the Court, which sets out the procedure for requests for the admission of additional evidence on appeal, provides for two possible approaches to the admission of additional evidence: the Appeals Chamber may decide first on the admissibility of the additional evidence (Regulation 62(2)(a)), or it may decide to rule on that question together with the other issues arising in the appeal. These two possible ways of proceeding reflect broadly the different approaches to the admission of evidence in common-law jurisdictions and in jurisdictions following the Romano-Germanic tradition. In the Lubanga case, the Appeals Chamber followed the latter approach. It noted that it had discretion to choose between the two procedures and found that, in the circumstances of that case, it was 'more efficient to hear the prosecutor's submissions also in relation to those arguments of Mr Lubanga that are based on the proposed additional evidence, even if the Appeals Chamber has not yet ruled on the admissibility of that evidence'.[48]

In the Lubanga case, the Appeals Chamber also clarified under which criteria it would admit additional evidence on appeal. Underlining that the evaluation of the evidence is the primary responsibility of the relevant Trial Chamber and that the admission of additional evidence on appeal must therefore be the exception, the Appeals Chamber found that it 'will generally not admit additional evidence on appeal unless there are convincing reasons why such evidence was not presented at trial, including whether there was lack of due diligence'.[49] In addition, 'it must be demonstrated that the additional evidence could have led the Trial Chamber to enter a different verdict, in whole or in part'.[50] These criteria are in keeping with the fact that appeals are not conceptualized as de novo trials, but as being corrective in nature.[51] In that regard, the somewhat opaque norm of Article 83(2) must be noted.

[45] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, paras 16 et seq.

[46] Ibid., para. 27.

[47] Judgment on the appeals of the Prosecutor and Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the 'Decision on Sentence pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3122, paras 36 et seq.

[48] Directions under Regulation 62 of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2958 (A5, A6), AC, ICC, 21 December 2012, para. 8.

[49] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against his conviction, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-3121-Red, paras 57–8.

[50] Ibid., para. 59. The Appeals Chamber has, however, also highlighted that even if the criteria for the admission of additional evidence on appeal are not fufilled, 'it is within its discretion to admit additional evidence on appeal […] if there are compelling reasons for doing so' (ibid., para. 62).

[51] See Staker, 'Article 81' (n 31) margin numbers 31 et seq.

Article 83(2) states, first of all, that on appeal, the Appeals Chamber has the power to '[r]everse or amend the decision or sentence', or to '[o]rder a new trial before a different Trial Chamber', if the Appeals Chamber finds that the 'proceedings appealed from were unfair in a way that affected the reliability of the decision or sentence, or that decision or sentence was materially affected by an error of fact or law or procedural error'.[52] The provision continues: '[f]or these purposes, the Appeals Chamber may remand a factual issue to the original Trial Chamber for it to determine the issue and to report back accordingly, or may itself call evidence to determine the issue'. It is unclear whether this power may be exercised only in situations where the Appeals Chamber has already found an error in the decision under review and now must determine whether to reverse or amend it or to order a new trial, or whether this provision recognizes the power of the Appeals Chamber to call additional evidence in order to determine whether the decision under review was erroneous.

As regards appeals against orders for reparations, some issues have already been addressed. In the decision on the admissibility of appeals brought against the reparations order rendered in the Lubanga case,[53] the Appeals Chamber clarified, in particular, who the parties to such an appeal are. It found that the convicted person has a right to appeal, irrespective of whether or not the reparations order specifically ordered him to pay reparations.[54] The Appeals Chamber found furthermore that the term 'victim' in Article 82(4) included individuals who had not participated as victims in the trial proceedings, but only now claimed reparations.[55] This includes individuals whose requests for participation were rejected at trial, given that 'reparations proceedings are a distinct stage of the proceedings and it is conceivable that different evidentiary standards and procedural rules apply to the question of who is a victim for the purposes of those proceedings'.[56] The Appeals Chamber also clarified that, despite the formulation of Article 82(4), the right to appeal lies with the victims, not their legal representatives, although an appeal may only be brought with the assistance of a legal representative.[57] Finally, the Appeals Chamber found that the prosecutor was not a party to an appeal against a reparations order and therefore was not entitled to make submissions on it.[58] In contrast, under Article 82(4), bona fide owners of property affected by a reparations order are entitled to appeal; this has not yet arisen in practice.

38.3.3 Revision of conviction/sentence

Article 84 of the Statute provides for the possibility of the revision of the conviction or sentence.[59] The procedure is in two steps: first, the applicant—the convicted person, or,

[52] It is noteworthy that there is some inconsistency between the language used in Art 83(2) and in Art 81(1)(b), which lists the grounds of appeal that may be raised by the convicted person or on behalf on that person, including '[a]ny other ground that affects the fairness or reliability of the proceedings or decision' (emphasis added).

[53] Decision on the admissibility of the appeals against Trial Chamber I's 'Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations' and directions on the further conduct of proceedings (n 41).

[54] Ibid., para. 66. [55] Ibid., paras 69–70. [56] Ibid., para. 70.

[57] Ibid., para. 67; for a differing view see Roth and Henzelin (n 13). [58] Ibid., para. 74.

[59] See C Staker, 'Article 84: Revision of Conviction or Sentence' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 1487.

in case of the convicted person's death, close family members or individuals specifically authorized to bring such an application—or the prosecutor on the convicted person's behalf must apply to the Appeals Chamber, seeking revision of the conviction or sentence. For that purpose, it must be demonstrated that decisive new evidence has been discovered, that decisive evidence relied upon at trial was false, forged, or falsified, or that one or more of the judges who participated in the conviction decision or the confirmation decision were guilty of misconduct of sufficient gravity to justify their removal from office.[60] Second, and only if the Appeals Chamber considers the application to be founded, will a decision be made as to whether the conviction or sentence should be revised. The decision on the revision itself is taken either by the Appeals Chamber, by the original Trial Chamber, or by a newly constituted Trial Chamber. There have been no revision proceedings in the practice of the Court thus far.

38.3.4 Review of sentence

Article 110 of the Statute provides for the review of the sentence of a convicted person. Such a review is carried out once the convicted person has served two-thirds of the sentence or, in case of life imprisonment, 25 years. The review proceedings are automatic and not dependent on an application by the convicted person. This appears appropriate, given that, while serving the sentence, it is likely that the convicted person will not be represented by a lawyer who could assist in the formulation of a request for review. According to Rule 224 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, review proceedings are conducted before a panel of three judges of the Appeals Chamber. This is somewhat peculiar, given that, according to Article 39(2) of the Statute, the judicial functions of the Appeals Chamber are carried out by the Chamber sitting en banc of five judges. Thus far, no review proceedings have been carried out.

38.3.5 Disqualification of the Prosecutor or Deputy Prosecutor

Finally, the Appeals Chamber has jurisdiction to hear requests for the disqualification of the prosecutor or deputy prosecutor.[61] This is, apart from the review of sentence proceedings, the only case of original jurisdiction of the Appeals Chamber. In the practice of the Court so far, requests for the disqualification of the prosecutor have been brought in three cases.[62] Interestingly, two of these cases concerned investigations for [60] Art 84(1)(a), (b), (c), respectively. That the conviction or sentence should be subject to revision if one or more of the judges who participated in the confirmation of charges were guilty of misconduct is somewhat peculiar: the confirmation of charges is a prerequisite for the trial, but the guilt of the accused is determined exclusively by the Trial Chamber, subject to the powers of the Appeals Chamber on appeal. Thus, it could be argued that any misconduct in the confirmation process would be inconsequential for a subsequent conviction and there is therefore no need to disturb the conviction or sentence. It is also peculiar that Art 84(1)(c) does not expressly refer to misconduct of any of the judges of the Appeals Chamber (though it could be argued that the judges of the Appeals Chamber also 'participate in the conviction' if a conviction is upheld on appeal).

[61] See Art 42(8) of the Statute.

[62] See Request to Disqualify the Prosecutor from Participating in the Case against Mr Saif Al Islam Gaddafi, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-133 (OA3), 3 May 2012; alleged offences against the administration of justice (Article 70 of the Statute), and thus not the 'core' jurisdiction of the Court. The Appeals Chamber found that the right to seek the disqualification of the prosecutor extends to suspects of such offences.[63]

38.4 Early Jurisprudence: Cautious Exercise of its Powers

As summarized in the previous section, the Appeals Chamber of the ICC has jurisdiction over a broad variety of subject matters and wide-ranging powers to influence the proceedings before the first-instance Chambers. The early jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber, however, reflects a rather cautious approach to the exercise of these powers.

Generally, the Appeals Chamber has refused to address issues that go beyond what is required for reaching a decision on the appeal at hand. In particular, the Appeals Chamber has adopted a stringent approach to the 'material effect' requirement under Article 83(2) of the Statute. Under this provision, which the Appeals Chamber has found to be applicable in interlocutory appeals as well, the Appeals Chamber will reverse a decision under review only if it is 'materially affected' by an error. According to the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber, this requires a showing that the decision would have been 'substantially different' without the error.[64] In determining whether this test is met, the Appeals Chamber considers the outcome or operative part of the decision under review; whether the reasoning may have been different is irrelevant. If an alleged error does not have the potential to materially affect the impugned decision, the Appeals Chamber often does not even consider the arguments raised. For instance, in the appeal against the Trial Chamber's decision on the admissibility of the Katanga case, the Appeals Chamber decided not to address the appellant's argument that the Trial Chamber had erred when it found that the admissibility challenge had been brought out of time. The Trial Chamber had considered the merits of the admissibility challenge regardless of its timing, and thus the issue of whether the challenge had been filed out of time had no impact on the Trial Chamber's eventual decision, finding that the case was admissible.[65] The Appeals Chamber noted that if it were to address the correctness of the Trial Chamber's Confidential Ex Parte Application with Confidential Annexes of Dr David Nyekorach-Matsanga for the Disqualification of the Prosecutor Pursuant to Article 42 (8) of the Statute (public redacted version), Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-89-Anx1-Red (OA2), 28 May 2012, referred to in the Decision on the Request for Disqualification of the Prosecutor in the Investigation against Mr David Nyekorach-Matsanga, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-96-Red (OA2), AC, ICC, 11 July 2012; Requête aux fins de récusation de l'Accusation dans le cadre de l'enquête et des poursuites visant M. Aimé Kilolo Musamba, Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-233 (OA), 3 March 2014.

[63] Decision on the Request for Disqualification of the Prosecutor in the Investigation against Mr David Nyekorach-Matsanga (n 62) para. 17.

[64] Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58', Situation in the Democratic Republic in the Congo, ICC-01/04-169 (OA), AC, ICC, 13 July 2006, paras 83–4.

[65] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1497 (OA8), AC, ICC, 25 September 2009, paras 37–8.

interpretation of the law in respect of the timing of the admissibility challenge, it would, in fact, be giving an advisory opinion on an obiter dictum; this, however, was not the Appeals Chamber's role.[66] Indeed, the reluctance to give 'advisory opinions' is a recurring theme in the Appeals Chamber's jurisprudence both prior to and after the Katanga admissibility judgment.[67] Recently, in the Gbagbo case, the Appeals Chamber declined to consider the arguments raised by the prosecutor against certain statements of the Pre-Trial Chamber as to the evidentiary standard to be applied in relation to the decision on the confirmation of the charges.[68] The Appeals Chamber noted that the Pre-Trial Chamber had refused to grant leave to appeal in respect of this issue, as it did not arise from the decision under review, which was merely a decision on the adjournment of the confirmation hearing, and that any findings by the Appeals Chamber would therefore be merely of an advisory character.[69]

Thus, contrary to the practice of the Appeals Chambers of the ICTY and ICTR, which have used their first cases to clarify and develop the law,[70] the Appeals Chamber of the ICC has taken an approach of judicial restraint.[71] Unless a matter is decisive for the outcome of the appeal, the Appeals Chamber usually does not rule on it. The first jurisprudence of the ICC Appeals Chamber also lacks the almost textbook-like approach of some early judgments of the ICTY and ICTR Appeals Chambers. The ICC Appeals Chamber's judgments are generally 'minimalist' and provide only as much reasoning and explanation as is strictly necessary.

There may be several explanations for such an approach. While the applicable legal instruments of ICTY and ICTR often lacked in detail and the tribunals therefore often had to 'identify' the applicable law in their first cases, the density of legal regulation at the ICC is much higher. In addition, in respect of the procedural law, the Rome Statute allows for much flexibility and differing approaches. By adopting an [66] Ibid., para. 38. The judgment on the appeal on the admissibility decision in Katanga illustrates also another aspect of the Appeals Chamber's approach: the Appeals Chamber found that the Trial Chamber's approach to determining the admissibility of the case was flawed: in the words of the Appeals Chamber, the Trial Chamber had put 'the cart before the horse' by determining that the DRC was 'unwilling' or 'unable' to prosecute the case against Mr Katanga, without first considering whether there actually were investigations ongoing in the DRC that related to the same case. Nevertheless, for the Appeals Chamber, this was not a reason to reverse the impugned decision; rather, it considered that the result—namely that the case was admissible before the Court—was correct, although based on alternative reasoning.

[67] For references to prior jurisprudence, see fn. 62 of the Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber II of 12 June 2009 on the Admissibility of the Case (n 65).

[68] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 3 June 2013 entitled 'Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Article 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute' (n 36).

[69] Ibid., para. 65.

[70] Perhaps the best example of this is the Tadić case before the ICTY: in the interlocutory appeal on jurisdiction, the ICTY Appeals Chamber provided an extensive analysis of the scope of war crimes committed in non-international armed conflict (see Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, AC, ICTY, 2 October 1995, paras 96 et seq.). In the Tadić final appeal, the Appeals Chamber set the ground for, inter alia, the future understanding of the modes of liability before the ICTY and ICTR, in particular, in respect of the three forms of 'joint criminal enterprise' (see Judgment, Tadić, IT-94-1-A, AC, ICTY, 15 July 1999, paras 185 et seq.).

[71] See also B Batros, 'The Judgment on the Katanga Admissibility Appeal: Judicial Restraint at the ICC' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 343.

approach of judicial restraint, the Appeals Chamber has given room for growth and for a step-by-step development of the law. Arguably, although this means that many important issues have not yet been the subject of Appeals Chamber jurisprudence, this is a prudent approach in the context of the Rome Statute. The 'judicial restraint' approach may also be explained by the Appeals Chamber's role in the ICC framework—as it is not a higher court vis-à-vis the other Chambers, it would be of limited value to provide 'guidance' on matters that are not truly before the Appeals Chamber.

In such circumstances, the question could be raised as to whether there is actually any added value in having an Appeals Chamber, or whether a single-level jurisdiction would be more efficient. Leaving aside the argument that, in any event, human rights law demands the provision for a right to appeal of the convicted person,[72] it is suggested that the ICC's Appeals Chamber does have an important function to play. The various Chambers of the Court have issued and will continue to issue numerous and sometimes contradictory decisions on a variety of issues. The particular significance of the Appeals Chamber in this context is its ability to ensure coherence and consistency of the law. Admittedly, the legal framework for such a task is challenging: under Article 21(2) of the Statute, the Court 'may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions', but it is not obliged to do so. Even if the Appeals Chamber were to establish a system of binding precedent—either in relation to the first-instance Chambers or the Appeals Chamber itself (as the ICTY Appeals Chamber did in its Aleksovski judgment[73]), the legal value of such a decision would be doubtful. Arguably, and particularly in light of Article 21(2) of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber cannot issue a decision that would limit its rights and powers in the future (or indeed the rights and powers of the Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers in future cases).[74] Nevertheless, the Appeals Chamber arguably will be able to fulfil a meaningful role beyond its intervention in specific cases only if it follows, as a matter of policy, its own precedent. The adoption of such an approach is made more challenging and at the same time more necessary by the fact that the composition of the Appeals Chamber changes frequently. At least every three years new judges will join the Appeals Chamber while others leave. In addition, the assignment of judges who previously sat in Pre-Trial or Trial Chambers may make the recusal of such judges and the temporary assignment of other judges to specific appeals necessary. Clearly, frequent changes in the composition of the Appeals Chamber bear the inherent risk of inconsistent and conflicting decisions. Nevertheless, if the Appeals Chamber is to achieve more than justice in respect of individual cases and contribute to establishing a coherent jurisprudence of the Court more generally, its judges are arguably well advised to follow, as a rule, the Chamber's own precedent.

In light of this, the development of the law in small steps rather than in sweeping leaps and the exercise of judicial self-restraint may be the most effective approach to building a lasting and meaningful role of the Appeals Chamber in the ICC system, as understandable as calls for a less 'minimalist' role of the Appeals Chamber may be.

[72] See (n 1) and accompanying text.

[73] Judgment, Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-A, AC, ICTY, 24 March 2000, paras 89 et seq.

[74] On the use of precedent in international jurisdictions see G Guillaume, 'The Use of Precedent by International Judges and Arbitrators' (2011) 2 Journal of International Dispute Settlement 5.

39

'A Stick to Hit the Accused With'

The Legal Recharacterization of Facts under Regulation 55

*Kevin Jon Heller

39.1 Introduction

Regulation 55 was one of 126 regulations[1] adopted by the judges of the ICC on 26 May 2004.[2] Entitled 'Authority of the Chamber to Modify the Legal Characterisation of Facts', it provides as follows:

1. In its decision under article 74, the Chamber may change the legal characterisation of facts to accord with the crimes under articles 6, 7 or 8, or to accord with the form of participation of the accused under articles 25 and 28, without exceeding the facts and circumstances described in the charges and any amendments to the charges.
2. If, at any time during the trial, it appears to the Chamber that the legal characterisation of facts may be subject to change, the Chamber shall give notice to the participants of such a possibility and having heard the evidence, shall, at an appropriate stage of the proceedings, give the participants the opportunity to make oral or written submissions. The Chamber may suspend the hearing to ensure that the participants have adequate time and facilities for effective preparation or, if necessary, it may order a hearing to consider all matters relevant to the proposed change.
3. For the purposes of sub-regulation 2, the Chamber shall, in particular, ensure that the accused shall: (a) Have adequate time and facilities for the effective preparation of his or her defence in accordance with article 67, paragraph 1 (b); and (b) If necessary, be given the opportunity to examine again, or have examined

* Professor of Criminal Law, SOAS, University of London. My thanks to Sophie Rigney for her comments and to Julian Chant and Martin Clark for their research assistance. The title of chapter draws on Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319-tENG, TC II, ICC, 21 November 2012 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo Regulation 55 decision'), para. 8.

[1] Regulations of the Court, adopted by the judges of the Court on 26 May 2004, Fifth Plenary Session The Hague, 17–28 May 2004, Official documents of the International Criminal Court, ICC-BD/01-01-04.

[2] Judgment on the Appeals of Mr Lubanga Dyilo and the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2205, AC, ICC, 8 December 2009 ('Lubanga appeals judgment'), para. 71.

> again, a previous witness, to call a new witness or to present other evidence admissible under the Statute in accordance with article 67, paragraph 1 (e).

Regulation 55 has already had a significant effect on a number of ICC cases. In Lubanga, the Pre-Trial Chamber used the Regulation to recharacterize the conflict in the DRC from non-international to international, while the Trial Chamber considered (but ultimately rejected) adding five additional charges involving sexual violence and inhuman treatment. In Bemba, the Pre-Trial Chamber relied on the Regulation to decline to confirm charges brought by the OTP that it considered unnecessarily cumulative, while the Trial Chamber recharacterized the mental element of command responsibility adopted by the Pre-Trial Chamber from knowledge to negligence. And most dramatically, in Katanga, the Trial Chamber invoked the Regulation more than six months after the end of the trial to recharacterize the applicable mode of participation from indirect co-perpetration to common-purpose liability and then convicted the accused on the basis of the recharacterized mode.

The impact of Regulation 55 is, moreover, only likely to increase. The OTP has asked the Trial Chamber to give notice in both Ruto and Kenyatta that the charged mode of participation is subject to recharacterization. Ruto and Kenyatta are alleged to be responsible for a variety of crimes against humanity as indirect co-perpetrators. In both cases, the OTP wants the Trial Chamber to also consider convicting them on the basis of any of the forms of complicity listed in Article 25(b)–(d) of the Rome Statute—from ordering to aiding and abetting.[3] The Trial Chamber has already granted the OTP's request in Ruto.

This chapter provides a comprehensive critique of Regulation 55. Section 39.2 argues that the judges' adoption of Regulation 55 was ultra vires, because the Regulation does not involve a 'routine function' of the Court and is inconsistent with the Rome Statute's procedures for amending charges. Section 39.3 explains why, contrary to the practice of the Pre-Trial Chamber and Trial Chamber, Regulation 55 cannot be applied either prior to the trial or after the trial has ended. Finally, section 39.4 demonstrates that the Pre-Trial Chamber and Trial Chamber have consistently applied Regulation 55 in ways that undermine both prosecutorial independence and the accused's right to a fair trial.

39.2 Is Regulation 55 Ultra Vires?

Regulation 55 is ultra vires in two respects. First, it does not involve a 'routine function' of the Court. Second, it conflicts with the Rome Statute's provisions for amending the charges against the accused.

39.2.1 Routine function

Article 52(1) of the Rome Statute provides that '[t]he judges shall, in accordance with this Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, adopt, by an absolute majority,

[3] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

the Regulations of the Court necessary for its routine functioning'.[4] In Lubanga, the accused challenged Regulation 55 as ultra vires, arguing that 'it affects directly the substance of the trial and the rights of the accused and therefore goes beyond the "routine functioning" of the Court'.[5] The Appeals Chamber, however, disagreed:

> The Appeals Chamber notes that the term 'routine functioning' is not defined any further in the Statute or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. However, the term has been described as a 'broad concept' and it has been observed that 'routine functioning' also concerns matters of 'practice and procedure'. The Appeals Chamber notes furthermore that the Regulations of the Court contain several important provisions that affect the rights of the accused person, inter alia, on detention and on the scope of legal assistance paid by the Court. Thus, while the Appeals Chamber acknowledges that the question of modification of the legal characterisation of facts is an important question that directly impacts on the trial, it is not persuaded that for that reason alone, it cannot be part of the routine functioning of the Court.[6]

The Appeals Chamber's defence of Regulation 55 is unconvincing. As noted, the various Chambers have relied on Regulation 55 to refuse to confirm evidentiarily adequate charges brought by the OTP, to consider adding multiple new and more serious charges against an accused in the middle of a trial, and to recast the applicable mode of participation in a case long after the trial was over. It is difficult to see how such changes, which fundamentally alter the relationship between the Chambers, the OTP, and the Defence, can be considered 'routine'[7]—particularly in comparison to other regulations adopted by the judges. Indeed, it is revealing that the scholar the Appeals Chamber cites in support of the supposed ordinariness of the Regulation, Claus Kress, notes dryly in the same article that '[t]his rather important provision is found in a spot within the house of international criminal procedure where not everybody would have bothered to search'.[8] Even Carsten Stahn, the most prominent academic supporter of Regulation 55, acknowledges that the provision serves 'primarily as a substitute, rather than a complement, of the concept of the amendment of the charges within the context of the ICC system'.[9] At least as interpreted by the various Chambers, therefore, Regulation 55 clearly violates Article 52(1).

That said, it is not surprising that the Appeals Chamber considers Regulation 55 to be routine, despite how aggressively it has been used by the Pre-Trial Chamber and Trial Chamber. After all, the judges themselves wrote and adopted the Regulation. That conflict of interest is both obvious and problematic, counselling in favour of a

[4] Art 52(1) ICC Statute.

[5] Lubanga appeals judgment (n 2) para. 67.

[6] Ibid., para. 69; see also C Stahn, 'Modification of the Legal Characterization of Facts in the ICC System: A Portrayal of Regulation 55' (2005) 16 Criminal Law Forum 1, 12 (arguing that 'Art 52 is broad enough to allow for the adoption of regulations which clarify elements of the trial procedure or provide the capacity to function effectively as a Court, including a norm on the treatment of the legal characterization of facts').

[7] See S SáCouto and K Cleary, 'Defining the Case against an Accused before the International Criminal Court: Whose Responsibility Is It?', War Crimes Research Office (2009) 50.

[8] C Kress, 'The Procedural Texts of the International Criminal Court' (2007) 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice 537, 540.

[9] Stahn (n 6) 29.

very restrictive understanding of the concept of 'routine'. As Dov Jacobs notes, 'the legitimacy of the international criminal law system rests on a clear separation of roles between those who create the rules and those who apply them'.[10] Unfortunately, when given the choice between judicial modesty and expanding the scope of their own power, the Appeals Chamber chose the latter.

39.2.2 Amending charges

In addition to limiting the Regulations to 'routine functions' of the Court, Article 52(1) also provides that all regulations must be 'in accordance' with the Rome Statute. That limitation is echoed by Regulation 1, which provides that the Regulations 'shall be read subject to the Statute'.[11] Regulation 55, however, directly conflicts with the Rome Statute's provisions for amending the charges against an accused.[12] In particular, because it permits the Trial Chamber to alter the charges confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber—with regard to both crimes and modes of participation—Regulation 55 is inconsistent with paragraphs 9 and 11 of Article 61, which provide as follows:

> Article 61: Confirmation of the Charges Before Trial
>
> 9. After the charges are confirmed and before the trial has begun, the Prosecutor may, with the permission of the Pre-Trial Chamber and after notice to the accused, amend the charges. If the Prosecutor seeks to add additional charges or to substitute more serious charges, a hearing under this article to confirm those charges must be held. After commencement of the trial, the Prosecutor may, with the permission of the Trial Chamber, withdraw the charges.
> 11. Once the charges have been confirmed in accordance with this article, the Presidency shall constitute a Trial Chamber which, subject to paragraph 9 and to article 64, paragraph 4, shall be responsible for the conduct of subsequent proceedings and may exercise any function of the Pre-Trial Chamber that is relevant and capable of application in those proceedings.

Article 61(9) makes clear that only the OTP has the authority to amend the charges against the accused post-confirmation. And Article 61(11) explicitly binds the Trial Chamber to the charges as confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber. As Stahn notes, the reference to paragraph 9 in Article 61(11) 'can only be reasonably interpreted as an exclusion of amendments of the charges at the trial stage. Otherwise the third sentence of Article 61(9) would be pointless'.[13]

Two solutions have been offered to the conflict between Regulation 55 and Article 61. First, the Appeals Chamber has simply held that Article 61 does not prohibit the Trial

[10] D Jacobs, 'A Shifting Scale of Power: Who is in Charge of the Charges at the International Criminal Court?' in W Schabas et al. (eds), The Ashgate Research Companion to International Criminal Law: Critical Perspectives (Surrey: Ashgate 2013) 222.

[11] Regulation 1 of the Regulations of the Court, ICC-BD/01-01-04, 26 May 2004 ('ICC Regulations').

[12] Jacobs (n 10) 215 ('In light of the absence of any provision relating to an amendment of the charge after the commencement of trial, it is difficult to imagine how Regulation 55 can in fact be reconciled with the Statute as it stands'); see also SáCouto and Cleary (n 7) 48.

[13] Stahn (n 6) 15.

Chamber from amending the charges during trial. Second, Stahn and Sienna Merope argue that recharacterizing a charged crime and/or mode of participation does not, in fact, qualify as an 'amendment' to the charges. Neither solution, however, is tenable.

39.2.2.1 Does Article 61(9) permit amendments?

In Lubanga, the Appeals Chamber rejected the accused's claim that adding multiple new and more serious charges during trial would violate Article 61. In its view, nothing in Article 61(9) prohibits a Trial Chamber from using Regulation 55 to amend the confirmed charges during trial:

> First, the Appeals Chamber recalls that article 61(9) addresses primarily the powers of the Prosecutor to seek an amendment, addition or substitution of the charges, at his or her own initiative and prior to the commencement of the trial; the terms of the provision do not exclude the possibility that a Trial Chamber modifies the legal characterisation of the facts on its own motion once the trial has commenced. Regulation 55 fits within the procedural framework because at the confirmation hearing, the Prosecutor needs only to 'support each charge with sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe', whereas during trial, the onus is on the Prosecutor to prove 'guilt beyond reasonable doubt'. Thus, in the Appeals Chamber's view, article 61(9) of the Statute and Regulation 55 address different powers of different entities at different stages of the procedure, and the two provisions are therefore not inherently incompatible.[14]

There are a number of problems with the Appeals Chamber's reliance on Article 61(9)'s alleged silence concerning the use of recharacterization to amend the charges. To begin with, it sits uneasily with Article 61(7), which contemplates recharacterizing the charges during confirmation, but specifically prohibits the Pre-Trial Chamber from doing so itself. According to Article 61(7)(c)(ii), if the Pre-Trial Chamber believes that the 'evidence submitted appears to establish a different crime within the jurisdiction of the Court', the proper response is to '[a]djourn the hearing and request the Prosecutor to consider… [a]mending a charge'. As Jacobs notes, the Pre-Trial Chamber's limited power reflects the fact that, under the Rome Statute, the OTP is 'the primary organ responsible for determining the content of the charges and their amendment'.[15]

To be sure, Article 61(7) does not explicitly prohibit the Trial Chamber from amending the charges confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber. But Article 61(11) does, which is another significant problem with the Appeals Chamber's position. As noted, Article 61(11) entitles the Trial Chamber to exercise 'any function of the Pre-Trial Chamber that is relevant and capable of application in [subsequent] proceedings', with one notable exception: the power to amend the charges against the accused. Only the OTP has the authority to alter the charges once the trial has begun, as the third sentence of Article 61(9) makes clear.[16]

[14] Lubanga appeals judgment (n 2) para. 77. [15] Jacobs (n 10) 208.

[16] See Minority Opinion on the 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties that the Legal Characterisation of Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2054, TC I, ICC, 17 July

Remarkably, the Appeals Chamber did not even mention Article 61(11) in the Lubanga judgment. Even worse, it completely undermined its own position when it concluded that although Article 61(9) permits the Trial Chamber to legally recharacterize the 'facts and circumstances' in the charges, it prohibits the Trial Chamber from modifying those facts and circumstances itself:

> [N]ew facts and circumstances not described in the charges may only be added under the procedure of article 61(9) of the Statute. The Trial Chamber's interpretation of Regulation 55 would circumvent article 61(9) of the Statute and would blur the distinction between the two provisions. As the Prosecutor notes, the incorporation of new facts and circumstances into the subject matter of the trial would alter the fundamental scope of the trial. The Appeals Chamber observes that it is the Prosecutor who, pursuant to article 54(1) of the Statute, is tasked with the investigation of crimes under the jurisdiction of the Court and who, pursuant to article 61(1) and (3) of the Statute, proffers charges against suspects. To give the Trial Chamber the power to extend proprio motu the scope of a trial to facts and circumstances not alleged by the Prosecutor would be contrary to the distribution of powers under the Statute.[17]

Every consideration cited by the Appeals Chamber applies equally to the legal characterization of facts. Introducing new crimes and different modes of participation in media res 'alter[s] the fundamental scope of the trial' no less than introducing new facts and circumstances; as discussed in detail below, both the prosecutorial and defence strategy are influenced as much (if not more so) by the legal characterization of facts than by the facts themselves. Moreover, and relatedly, Article 54(1) does not distinguish between the Prosecutor's investigation of facts and her determination of charges. On the contrary, subparagraph (b) specifically instructs the Prosecutor to '[t]ake appropriate measures to ensure the effective investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court'.[18]

The Appeals Chamber's reference to the Prosecutor's authority under Article 61 to proffer charges is the most baffling of all. Although the Rome Statute does not define 'charge', Regulation 51—adopted by the judges at the same time as Regulation 55—specifically provides that '[t]he document containing the charges referred to in article 61 shall include' not only '[a] statement of facts', but also '[a] legal characterisation of the facts to accord both with the crimes under articles 6, 7 or 8 and the precise form of participation under articles 25 and 28'. By the judges' own reckoning, therefore, the prosecutor's right to 'proffer charges against suspects' necessarily includes the right to specify both the relevant facts and the relevant legal characterization of those facts.[19] So what justifies distinguishing between facts and legal characterization for the purposes of Article 61(9)? On that critical question, the Appeals Chamber's judgment is revealingly silent.

2009 ('Lubanga Regulation 55 dissent'), para. 16 ('To recapitulate, the Statute, in explicit terms, left control over framing and effecting any changes to the charges … exclusively to the Pre-Trial Chamber. The scheme was clearly designed to ensure that once the trial has begun the charges are not subject to any further amendment, addition or substitution').

[17] Lubanga appeals judgment (n 2) para. 94.

[18] Art 54(1)(b) ICC Statute (emphasis added).

[19] See Lubanga Regulation 55 dissent (n 16) para. 11 ('Regulation 52 describes what constitutes a criminal charge for the purpose of trials before the ICC'); Jacobs (n 10) 217.

39.2.2.2 Is recharacterization an amendment?

As Judge Fulford noted in his Lubanga dissent, '[i]nevitably, it follows that a modification to the legal characterisation of the facts under Regulation 55 must not constitute an amendment to the charges, an additional charge, a substitute charge or a withdrawal of a charge, because these are each governed by Article 61(9)'.[20] Even Stahn accepts that conclusion.[21] In his view, though, a Trial Chamber does not actually amend the charges against an accused when it relies on Regulation 55 to legally recharacterize the facts:

> It is possible to change the legal characterization of a crime without changing the charges. The charges are composed of two elements: a factual element, the 'statement of the facts, including the time and place of the alleged crime', and a legal element, the 'legal characterization of facts'. If a Chamber modifies only the second component, the legal characterization of facts, while basing its assumptions on the facts set out in the charges, it does not automatically amend the charges.[22]

Stahn's belief that a charge is amended only if the facts and circumstances are modified is irreconcilable with Article 61, which repeatedly privileges the legal characterization of facts over the facts themselves with regard to the nature of a 'charge'. Paragraph 5 provides that '[a]t the hearing, the Prosecutor shall support each charge with sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that the person committed the crime charged'—a formulation that not only distinguishes between the 'charge' and the supporting facts, but also equates the charge with the specific crime the accused is alleged to have committed. Paragraph 6 similarly distinguishes between charges and facts, providing that, at the confirmation hearing, the accused may either '(a) Object to the charges' or '(b) Challenge the evidence presented by the Prosecutor'. Paragraph 8, in turn, provides that '[w]here the Pre-Trial Chamber declines to confirm a charge, the Prosecutor shall not be precluded from subsequently requesting its confirmation if the request is supported by additional evidence'—making clear that declination reflects the OTP's failure to establish the accused's (potential) responsibility for a particular crime, not its failure to establish its factual allegations (hence the paragraph's focus on 'additional evidence'). Even more revealingly, paragraph 9 provides that, post-confirmation, '[i]f the Prosecutor seeks to add additional charges or to substitute more serious charges, a hearing under this article to confirm those charges must be held'. If the legal characterization of facts is not an essential element of a charge, paragraph 9's reference to 'more serious charges' makes no sense: in the context of a criminal trial, the seriousness of a charge is signalled by the nature of the alleged crime, not by the kind of facts the prosecution uses to prove that crime.[23]

[20] Lubanga Regulation 55 dissent (n 16) para. 17.

[21] Stahn (n 6) 25 n 79 (noting that 'an amendment of the charge after the beginning of the trial … [is] prohibited by Art 61(9)').

[22] Ibid., 17.

[23] See e.g. A Danner, 'Constructing a Hierarchy of Crimes in International Criminal Law Sentencing' (2001) 87 Virginia Law Review 415, 463–4.

This laundry list of provisions obviously skips paragraph 7 of Article 61, and for good reason: that paragraph alone suffices to call into question Stahn's argument. To begin with, like the other paragraphs, paragraph 7 equates 'the charges' with the 'crimes charged'—'[t]he Pre-Trial Chamber shall, on the basis of the hearing, determine whether there is sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that the person committed each of the crimes charged'. More importantly, though, subparagraph (c) specifically provides that it is necessary to amend a charge when 'the evidence submitted appears to establish a different crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'. If legally recharacterizing facts at the confirmation stage requires a formal amendment to the charges, it is impossible to plausibly maintain that legally recharacterizing facts during trial does not.

This interpretation of the nature of a charge, it is important to note, is supported by the ICC's (admittedly limited) jurisprudence.[24] In Bemba, the Pre-Trial Chamber held that Article 61(7)(c)(ii) requires the OTP to formally amend the charges whenever the evidence establishes either a different crime under Articles 6, 7, and 8 or a different mode of participation under Articles 25 and 28.[25] Similarly, in Katanga, the Trial Chamber not only specifically distinguished between 'the charges' confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber and the 'alleged facts underpinning the charges',[26] it also described the 'constituent elements' of a 'confirmed charge' as the 'contextual circumstances as well as the material and mental elements' of the crime in question.[27] Indeed, the Trial Chamber viewed the legal characterization of facts as so central to the concept of a charge that it required the OTP—over its strenuous objection—to prepare an 'analytical table' specifying the precise items of evidence the prosecution intended to use at trial to prove the elements of both the charged crime and the applicable mode of participation.[28]

Finally, the idea that recharacterizing facts to establish an unconfirmed crime does not amend the charges is simply 'at odds with any common sense idea of what "change" means'.[29] The 'recharacterization of facts' requested by the victims in Lubanga, for example, would have resulted in the accused facing conviction not only for the war crimes of enlisting, conscripting, and using child soldiers, but also for the crimes against humanity of sexual slavery, inhuman treatment, and cruel treatment—a difference that would have resulted in a far longer sentence than the one the accused [24] It is also worth noting that the OTP took the position in Lubanga that recharacterizing facts to add new charges constituted an amendment. See Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2074, TC I, ICC, 12 August 2009 ('Lubanga leave to appeal'), para. 24.

[25] Decision Adjourning the Hearing Pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(ii) of the Rome Statute, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-388, PTC III, ICC, 3 March 2009, para. 26.

[26] Order Concerning the Presentation of Incriminating Evidence and the E-Court Protocol, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-956, TC II, ICC, 13 March 2009, para. 5.

[27] Ibid., para. 13. [28] Ibid., para. 11. [29] Jacobs (n 10) 215.

actually received.[30] Given that possibility, it is difficult to disagree with Judge Fulford's conclusion that 'the proposals advanced by the victims [did] not raise the possibility that the legal characterisation of the facts may change. Instead, the victims [sought] to add five additional charges'.[31]

39.3 Has the Judiciary Correctly Interpreted Regulation 55?

The fundamental problem with Regulation 55, in short, is that it is ultra vires. Even if we accept the general legitimacy of the Regulation, though, it is clear that the judges have wrongly applied it both prior to the trial and after the trial has ended.

39.3.1 Lubanga

In Lubanga, the Pre-Trial Chamber invoked Regulation 55 to recharacterize the qualification of the conflict in the DRC.[32] In its Document Containing the Charges, the OTP alleged that the accused was responsible for the war crime of conscripting, enlisting, and using children to participate actively in non-international armed conflict, a violation of Article 8(2)(e)(vii) of the Rome Statute.[33] After the confirmation hearing, however, the Pre-Trial Chamber held that the accused should be tried for the war crime of conscripting, enlisting, and using children to participate actively in international armed conflict instead, a violation of Article 8(2)(b)(xxvi).[34] The Pre-Trial Chamber recognized that Article 61(7)(c)(ii) required it to adjourn the hearing and ask the prosecutor to amend the charges if 'the evidence before it appear[ed] to establish that a crime other than those detailed in the Document Containing the Charges has been committed'.[35] But it nevertheless insisted that it did not have to comply with the provision, because the provision was intended 'to prevent the Chamber from committing a person for trial for crimes which would be materially different from those set out in the Document Containing the Charges'[36] and Articles 8(2)(e)(vii) and 8(2)(b)(xxvi) criminalized the same conduct.[37] The OTP immediately sought leave to appeal the Pre-Trial Chamber's recharacterization of the conflict,[38] but the Pre-Trial Chamber refused, pointing out that if it had, in fact, exceeded its authority under Article 61(7), the Trial [30] See e.g. B Holá et al., 'Consistency of International Sentencing: ICTY and ICTR Case Study' (2012) 9 European Journal of Criminology 539, 547.

[31] Lubanga Regulation 55 dissent (n 16) para. 34.

[32] The case also involved a dispute between the OTP, defence, and Trial Chamber concerning the use of Regulation 55 to add additional charges against the accused. That dispute is discussed in the next section.

[33] Submission of the Document Containing the Charges Pursuant to Art 61(3)(a) and of the List of Evidence Pursuant to Rule 121(3), Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-356, PTC I, ICC, 28 August 2006, para. 12.

[34] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-803-tENG, PTC I, ICC, 29 January 2007, 156.

[35] Ibid., para. 202. [36] Ibid., para. 203. [37] Ibid., para. 204.

[38] Decision on the Prosecution and Defence Applications for Leave to Appeal the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-915, PTC I, ICC, 24 May 2007, para. 41.

Chamber could simply re-recharacterize the facts back to non-international armed conflict.[39] Indeed, that is precisely what the Trial Chamber did at the end of the trial.[40]

The Pre-Trial Chamber's casual disregard of Article 61(7)(c)(ii) is troubling. To begin with, the Pre-Trial Chamber made no attempt to defend its assertion that the purpose of the provision 'is to prevent the Chamber from committing a person for trial for crimes which would be materially different from those set out in the Document Containing the Charges'. Some sort of defence was clearly necessary, given that the subparagraph requires adjournment whenever the evidence appears to establish 'a different crime'—not 'a materially different crime'. In fact, not only are Articles 8(2)(e)(vii) and 8(2)(b)(xxvi) different crimes,[41] they are materially different crimes, because the Trial Chamber specifically held in Lubanga that the nature of the armed conflict in question is a material element of every war crime that the prosecution is required to prove.[42]

The Pre-Trial Chamber's position is also inconsistent with the drafting history of Article 61(7). France proposed a version of the Article during PrepComm that would have permitted the Pre-Trial Chamber to amend the indictment sua sponte 'by giving some facts another characterization',[43] but that proposal was opposed by a number of common-law states, 'who feared the excessive judicial interference at the stage of investigation and prosecution would undermine the independence of the Prosecutor'.[44] Similarly, states ultimately rejected a more limited proposal in the Zutphen Draft of the Rome Statute that would have permitted the Pre-Trial Chamber to 'confirm only part of the indictment [and amend it], giving a different qualification to the facts'.[45]

39.3.2 Bemba

The Pre-Trial Chamber applied Regulation 55 even more aggressively in Bemba. In the Document Containing the Charges, the OTP alleged that the accused was responsible for the crimes against humanity of murder, rape, and torture, and the war crimes of murder, rape, torture, outrages upon personal dignity, and pillaging.[46] Following the confirmation hearing, the Pre-Trial Chamber concluded that the OTP had presented sufficient evidence in support of the crimes against humanity charges and all of the war crimes charges other than torture.[47] But it nevertheless refused to confirm the charges of torture as a crime against humanity and outrages upon personal dignity as

[39] Ibid., para. 48.

[40] See Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 ('Lubanga trial judgment'), para. 566.

[41] Jacobs (n 10) 210.

[42] Lubanga trial judgment (n 40) para. 504.

[43] Art 48(5) of the Draft Statute for the ICC: Working Paper Submitted by France to the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an ICC, UN Doc A/AC.249/L.3 (6 August 1996).

[44] F Guariglia, 'Art 56' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 736–7.

[45] Report of the Inter-Sessional Meeting from 19 to 30 January 1998 in Zutphen, the Netherlands, UN Doc A/AC.249/1998/L.13 (4 February 1998) 96.

[46] Decision Pursuant to Article 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-424, PTC II, ICC, 15 June 2009 ('Bemba decision on charges'), para. 71.

[47] SáCouto and Cleary (n 7) 20–2.

a war crime, because it concluded that those charges were 'cumulative' with the crime against humanity of rape and the war crime of rape, respectively.[48] In its view, because permitting the OTP to engage in cumulative charging 'places an undue burden on the Defence', as 'a matter of fairness and expeditiousness of the proceedings, only distinct crimes may justify a cumulative charging approach and, ultimately, be confirmed as charges'.[49]

The OTP sought leave to appeal, arguing that the Pre-Trial Chamber did not have the authority under Article 61(7) to decline to confirm charges for any reason other than evidentiary insufficiency.[50] The Pre-Trial Chamber rejected the request, justifying its rejection of cumulative charging on the following grounds:

> [T]he Pre-Trial Chamber must carefully filter the cases to be sent to trial and detect deficiencies which would otherwise flaw the entire proceedings. Hence, the Chamber's role cannot be that of merely accepting whatever charge is presented to it. To restrict the competences of the Pre-Trial Chamber to a literal understanding of article 61(7) of the Statute, to merely confirm or decline to confirm the charges, does not correspond to the inherent powers of any judicial body vested with the task to conduct fair and expeditious proceedings while at the same time paying due regard to the rights of the Defence.[51]

This interpretation of Article 61(7) is indefensible. The Pre-Trial Chamber is not entitled to ignore an interpretation of the Rome Statute it admits is 'literal' simply because it prefers a different interpretation. Article 21 specifically requires the Court to apply '[i]n the first place, this Statute', and the sources of 'applicable law' specified in Article 21 do not include the Court's 'inherent powers'. At most, therefore, the judges are entitled to invoke their inherent powers only when all of the sources of applicable law are silent—which the Pre-Trial Chamber openly admitted was not the case here.

The Pre-Trial Chamber's claim to be protecting the right of the defence also rings hollow, because it acknowledged—in response to complaints by the Office of Public Counsel for the Victims (OPCV)—that its rejection of cumulative charging would not prevent the Trial Chamber from using Regulation 55 to legally recharacterize the facts at trial if it concluded that a different characterization was more appropriate.[52] In other words, as Susana SáCouto and Katherine Cleary note, the Pre-Trial Chamber 'rejected the victims' claims, in part, by using an argument that is contrary to efficiency and the rights of the Defence, since if the Trial Chamber can later re-characterize the charges, neither party can be absolutely certain what the relevant charges will be, even after the case moves to trial'.[53]

Finally, it is worth noting that the Pre-Trial Chamber's rejection of cumulative charging was inconsistent with its earlier approach to the recharacterization

[48] Bemba decision on charges (n 46) para. 202. [49] Id.

[50] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute on the Charges of the Prosecutor against Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-532, PTC II, ICC, 18 September 2009, para. 5.

[51] Ibid., para. 52. [52] Bemba decision on charges (n 46) para. 203.

[53] SáCouto and Cleary (n 7) 26–7.

of the accused's mode of participation. The original Document Containing the Charges alleged that the accused was responsible for the charged crimes against humanity and war crimes as an indirect co-perpetrator. According to the Pre-Trial Chamber, however, the evidence presented at the confirmation hearing indicated that the accused could also be responsible for the charged crimes as a superior. It thus adjourned the hearing and requested the OTP to amend the charges to include superior responsibility,[54] which it did.[55] At no point during the litigation over cumulative charging did the Pre-Trial Chamber acknowledge its earlier practice—much less explain why it felt obligated to comply with Article 61(7)(c)(ii) in one situation but not the other.

39.3.3 Katanga

Unlike Lubanga and Bemba, Katanga involved recharacterization by the Trial Chamber. The OTP charged the accused with a variety of war crimes against humanity under Article 25(3)(a) of the Rome Statute, which holds a person criminally responsible if he 'commits such a crime, whether as an individual or jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible'. The Pre-Trial Chamber confirmed nearly all of the charged crimes, holding that there was sufficient evidence to conclude that the accused was responsible for them as an indirect co-perpetrator.[56] The trial began in November 2009 and ended in May 2012.[57]

Six months later, the Trial Chamber notified the parties that it intended to consider the accused's criminal responsibility not only as an indirect co-perpetrator under Article 25(3)(a), but also as a person who 'contributes to the commission . . . [of] a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose' under Article 25(3)(d).[58] The accused immediately sought leave to appeal, arguing, inter alia, that Regulation 55 did not permit a Trial Chamber to legally recharacterize facts during deliberations.[59] The Trial Chamber granted leave, but the Appeals Chamber rejected the accused's argument, holding that recharacterization during deliberations was consistent with Regulation 55(2)'s 'at any time during the trial' requirement:

> The Appeals Chamber observes that, at the time the Impugned Decision was rendered, the trial was at the deliberations stage and that no decision under article 74 of the Statute had yet been rendered. Furthermore, nothing in the Statute, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence or the Regulations of the Court prevents the Trial Chamber from re-opening the hearing of evidence at the deliberations stage of the proceedings.

[54] Bemba decision on charges (n 46) para. 15. [55] SáCouto and Cleary (n 7) 20.

[56] Decision on the Confirmation of the Charges, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, 210–12.

[57] S SáCouto and K Cleary, 'Regulation 55 and the Rights of the Accused at the International Criminal Court', War Crimes Research Office (2013), 28.

[58] Katanga and Ngudjolo Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 7.

[59] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 21 November 2012 entitled 'Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3363, AC, ICC, 27 March 2013, para. 9.

> The Appeals Chamber therefore concludes that, for the purposes of regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, the trial is ongoing at the present time. The timing of the Impugned Decision was therefore not incompatible with regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court.

The Appeals Chamber's argument is unconvincing. The question was not whether the Trial Chamber is entitled to hear additional evidence during deliberations, but whether deliberations fall within Regulation 55's requirement that recharacterization take place 'during the trial'. Nothing in the Rome Statute or Rules of Procedure and Evidence clearly specifies when the 'trial' is over. Nevertheless, the Appeals Chamber's insistence that the trial does not end until judgment has been rendered under Article 74 is inconsistent with a number of provisions in the Rome Statute. Paragraph 1 of Article 63, for example, provides that '[t]he accused shall be present during the trial'. The accused obviously has no right to be present during deliberations, indicating that 'the trial' in Article 63 refers to the proceedings that end with closing arguments.

The Appeals Chamber's interpretation of 'during the trial' also conflicts with Article 64(7)'s insistence that '[t]he trial shall be held in public'. If the trial includes deliberations, deliberations must also be public—which is specifically prohibited by Article 74(4), which provides that '[t]he deliberations of the Trial Chamber shall remain secret'. Similarly, including deliberations within the trial creates a direct conflict between Article 74(4)'s secrecy requirement and Article 64(10), which requires the Trial Chamber to 'ensure that a complete record of the trial…is made and that it is maintained and preserved by the Registrar'.

Finally, and most importantly, it is impossible to reconcile the Appeals Chamber's position with Article 74(1), which provides that '[a]ll of the judges of the Trial Chamber shall be present at each stage of the trial and throughout their deliberations'. Article 74 explicitly distinguishes between the trial phase and the deliberation phase of a case—and has so distinguished since PrepComm.[60]

39.4 Is Regulation 55 Consistent with the Rights of the Prosecution and the Defence?

In addition to being ultra vires and improperly interpreted by the judiciary, Regulation 55 has also consistently been applied by the Pre-Trial Chamber and Trial Chamber in ways that undermine both prosecutorial independence and the accused's right to a fair trial.

[60] See e.g. Art 72(1) of the Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, UN Doc A/Conf.183/2/add.1 (14 April 1988) ('A quorum consists of [at least four] [all] members of the Trial Chamber. The judgement shall be given only by judges who have been present at each stage of the trial before the Trial Chamber and throughout its deliberations'); see also O Triffterer, 'Art 74' in Triffterer (n 44) 1392 (noting that unlike at the trial phase, all of the members of the Trial Chamber only need to be present for 'the decisive parts of the deliberations').

39.4.1 Prosecutorial independence

Prosecutorial independence is at the heart of the ICC's institutional structure.[61] That independence is at its apex prior to trial, where the OTP has nearly exclusive authority regarding whom to charge, what charges to bring, and whether to amend or withdraw charges.[62] But it remains critical at trial as well, where the adversarial nature of the proceedings means that the prosecution controls the presentation of the inculpatory case—deciding which witnesses to call, what questions to ask them, which documents to introduce into evidence, how to conduct cross-examination, etc.[63]

Legal recharacterization prior to trial has consistently undermined prosecutorial independence. That effect is most obvious in Bemba, where the Pre-Trial Chamber refused to confirm the charges of torture as a crime against humanity and outrages upon person dignity as a war crime, despite acknowledging that the prosecution had established substantial grounds to believe the accused had committed them. The decision meant that the prosecution had to go to trial on the Pre-Trial Chamber's preferred charges, not on its own—a serious violation of the OTP's rights under Article 67 of the Rome Statute. Moreover, the non-confirmation had a negative impact on the prosecution's trial strategy; as the OTP noted in its (rejected) application for leave to appeal, rape and torture as crimes against humanity have different elements, requiring different proof:

> For instance, the Prosecution need not prove to secure a conviction for rape a certain quantum of pain or suffering endured by the victim, and a torture victim need not have endured 'a physical invasion of a sexual nature' as a distinctive element of rape. Not all rape that is validly so charged will meet the legal standards for torture, but that which does should be able to be charged as such, notwithstanding that it is torture committed through rape. Moreover, the man forced to watch his wife being raped repeatedly and viciously is not himself a victim of rape, but he can be properly viewed as a torture victim.[64]

The OTP also noted that the logic of the Pre-Trial Chamber's rejection of cumulative charging could be extended to prevent it from charging both multiple categories of international crime—war crimes and crimes against humanity, or crimes against humanity and genocide—based on the same acts.[65] That is a disturbing possibility, given that such charges have long been an accepted part of international criminal practice.[66]

The Pre-Trial Chamber's recharacterization of the conflict in Lubanga from non-international to international also undermined the OTP's right to determine how to present its case at trial. Simply put, the Prosecution did not believe that the [61] See Art 42(1) ICC Statute ('The Office of the Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Court').

[62] Art 67 ICC Statute.

[63] See S Vasiliev, 'Trial' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 714.

[64] Lubanga leave to appeal (n 24) para. 18.

[65] Id.

[66] See e.g. K Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011) 91.

evidence indicated the conflict was international and was concerned that the Pre-Trial Chamber's recharacterization threatened the viability of its case.[67] Fortunately for the OTP—and unfortunately for the defence—the Trial Chamber simply re-recharacterized the conflict back to non-international at the end of the trial.

The other recharacterization dispute in Lubanga provides an even more striking example of the tension between Regulation 55 and prosecutorial independence. As noted earlier, had the Trial Chamber ultimately granted the OPCV's request for recharacterization, the accused would have faced five additional charges involving sexual violence. Such recharacterization would have undermined the OTP's charging practice in the case—which is why the OTP protested the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision in no uncertain terms.[68] Rightly or wrongly,[69] the OTP made a conscious choice to restrict the charges against Lubanga to the conscription, enlistment, and use of child soldiers—as it noted in its 2003–6 activities report, including sexual violence charges would have required additional investigation, and the OTP needed to begin trial before Lubanga was released from custody in the DRC.[70]

Adding five additional sexual violence charges through recharacterization would also have significantly complicated the OTP's plan for the trial. In part, that would have reflected the timing of the Trial Chamber's notice of the recharacterization, which was issued on the final day of the prosecution's case in chief.[71] As the OTP noted in its request for leave to appeal, such a significant change to the charges against the accused would have required it 'to investigate, prepare and address incidents and events that were not pleaded' in the original Document Containing the Charges.[72] More fundamentally, though, adding sexual-slavery charges would have upended the OTP's entire trial strategy, which was to prove Lubanga's responsibility for using child soldiers and then use sexual violence as an aggravating factor to justify 'an appropriately severe sentence'.[73] The OTP thus insisted that recharacterizing the facts would not only be unnecessary, but would actually be counterproductive:

> [T]he aggravating (or mitigating) factors and the 'circumstances of the crime' which will be relevant under Rule 145(1)(b) for sentencing are not the same as or limited to the 'circumstances described in the charges'. Just because a factor or circumstance is appropriate for consideration at sentencing under Rule 145(1)(c) or (2)(b) does not

[67] Decision on the Status before the Trial Chamber of the Evidence Heard by the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber in Trial Proceedings, and the Manner in which Evidence Shall be Submitted, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1084, TC I, ICC, 13 December 2007, para. 28.

[68] Lubanga leave to appeal (n 24) para. 24 ('[T]he Majority Decision intrudes on the Prosecutor's role and ability "to exercise the powers and fulfil the duties" allocated in the Statute, including seeking an amendment of the charges').

[69] See e.g. S Merope, 'Recharacterizing the Lubanga Case: Regulation 55 and the Consequences for Gender Justice at the ICC' (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 311–46.

[70] Report of the Activities Performed during the First Three Years (June 2003–June 2006), OTP, 12 Sept 2006, 8.

[71] SáCouto and Cleary (n 7) 29.

[72] Lubanga leave to appeal (n 24) para. 25.

[73] Prosecution's Observations on the Consequences of the Appeal Judgment of 8 December 2009, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2215, TC I, ICC, 22 December 2009, para. 19.

> necessarily make it one of the 'circumstances described in the charges' to be considered for the purposes of a recharacterisation under Regulation 55. There will be factors or circumstances relevant for sentencing that will not have been described in the charges; and it is entirely appropriate for the Chamber to take into consideration for sentencing the full range of factors regarding the crime and the damage to victims details of the commission of the crimes and their particular impact on the victims which emerge during the trial.[74]

In retrospect, the OTP's strategy was seriously mistaken: the Trial Chamber ultimately refused to consider sexual violence an aggravating factor, concluding that 'the link between Mr Lubanga and sexual violence, in the context of the charges, ha[d] not been established beyond a reasonable doubt'.[75] Indeed, the Trial Chamber 'strongly deprecate[d] the attitude of the former Prosecutor'—Luis Moreno-Ocampo—'in relation to the issue of sexual violence', specifically citing his failure to charge the accused with sexual slavery.[76] The OTP's failure, however, does not justify the Trial Chamber's interference with its trial strategy in Lubanga: an integral aspect of prosecutorial independence is the right to be wrong.

39.4.2 The right to a fair trial

Article 64(2) of the Rome Statute requires the Court to 'ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and is conducted with full respect for the rights of the accused'. One of the most important rights of the accused is the right '[t]o have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of the defence'.[77] Indeed, as noted by Judge Van den Wyngaert in her Regulation 55 dissent in Katanga, that right 'is of such significance in the [recharacterization] context that it is recapitulated with additional language in Regulation 55(3)(a), which provides that the accused must be given "adequate time and facilities for the effective preparation of his or her defence" '.[78]

The central assumption of Regulation 55 is that the effective preparation of a defence requires little more than rebutting the facts in the Document Containing the Charges. That assumption is what justifies permitting the Trial Chamber to legally recharacterize the facts to support new crimes and different modes of participation in the middle of the trial—or after it. If the core of an effective defence is simply rebutting the facts, it does not matter how those facts are legally characterized; the defence will remain the same.

This view of criminal defence is openly embraced by both judges and scholars. Here is the Trial Chamber in Katanga, explaining its belief that recharacterizing the accused's mode of production and reopening the trial after the defence had presented its entire case-in-chief would not prejudice the accused: 'In this case, all the facts likely

[74] Ibid., para. 20.

[75] Decision on Sentence Pursuant to Art 76 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2901, TC I, ICC, 10 July 2012, para. 75.

[76] Ibid., para. 60. [77] Art 67(1)(b) ICC Statute.

[78] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 48 (emphasis in original).

to be considered for recharacterization on the basis of article 25(3)(d) of the Statute were already discussed at the trial and the Accused had the opportunity to defend himself and did so.'[79]

And here is Stahn, explaining why the accused would not be prejudiced by recharacterizing facts during or after the trial to support a crime not originally charged:

> [A] qualification of conduct as a different legal crime does not constitute an 'additional charge' or a 'more serious charge' within the meaning of Article 61(9). The qualification of facts by the Trial Chamber is not an amendment of the charge after the beginning of the trial (as prohibited by Article 61(9), third sentence), but a technique of legal interpretation of the Chamber, which must be exclusively based on the facts and circumstances described in the original charge. This safeguard excludes any possibility that the accused is convicted on the basis of factual elements or conduct that was not made available to him/her.[80]

This is a desiccated understanding of Defence strategy. In some cases, the Defence will indeed focus solely on rebutting the facts—attacking the credibility of a witness or establishing an alibi, for example. In most cases, though, the Defence will not only attempt to rebut the facts, it will also focus on rebutting the Prosecution's legal characterization of those facts—its claim that the facts, if proven, establish that the accused was responsible for the charged crime. Indeed, it is a time-honored Defence strategy to concede certain facts (and in some cases, even uncharged crimes) to highlight their inability to prove the accused's responsibility for the charged crime. After all, an accused is convicted of crimes, not acts.

Because effective criminal defence focuses on rebutting facts and rebutting legal characterizations, recharacterizing facts to support new legal characterizations during or after trial will almost always substantially undermine the accused's right to effectively prepare his defence. Indeed, to see the truth of that claim, we have to look no further than the five cases in which the Trial Chamber has recharacterized facts, considered recharacterizing facts, or been asked to recharacterize facts.

39.4.2.1 Lubanga

Although the Trial Chamber ultimately decided not to use Regulation 55 to add new charges in the middle of the trial, the Appeals Chamber quite pointedly refused to rule out such additions. On the contrary, as noted earlier, it simply noted 'that the text of Regulation 55 does not stipulate, beyond what is contained in sub-regulation 1, what changes in the legal characterisation may be permissible'.[81] It is thus highly likely that either the OTP or the victims will attempt to add charges in a future case.

Lubanga serves as an object lesson for why such additions are inconsistent with the accused's right to prepare an effective defence. The accused's entire defence strategy—investigation, opening argument, cross-examination of the Prosecution's witnesses, [79] Katanga Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 33.

[80] Stahn (n 6) 25, note 79.
[81] Lubanga appeals judgment (n 2) para. 100.

direct testimony of the witnesses for the Defence, closing argument—was designed to accomplish two things: (i) rebut the facts on which the child-soldier charges were based; and (ii) counter the Prosecution's argument that those facts legally constituted the 'conscription', 'enlistment', or 'use' of child soldiers. Had the Trial Chamber added new sexual violence and inhuman treatment charges in the middle of the trial, that defence would have been fatally undermined—and that would have been true even if the facts underlying the child-soldier charges were capable of supporting the sexual-violence and inhuman-treatment charges, an idea that the Trial Chamber ultimately rejected.[82] As the Defence pointed out, the war crime of conscripting, enlisting, or using child soldiers has only one material element in common with the war crimes of sexual slavery, cruel treatment, and inhuman treatment: the existence of armed conflict.[83] And, of course, the war crime of conscripting, enlisting, or using child soldiers does not even have that contextual element in common with the crime against humanity of sexual slavery—which would have required the defence to develop a legal strategy for rebutting the idea that the accused's actions were part of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population. In short, had the Trial Chamber granted the victims' request for recharacterization, the Defence would have needed to develop a completely new legal strategy in the middle of the trial. How that would have been possible, even if the Trial Chamber had granted the Defence a liberal amount of time to prepare, is difficult to imagine.

39.4.2.2 Bemba

As noted earlier, the Pre-Trial Chamber complied with Article 67(1)(c)(ii) when it adjourned the confirmation hearing and successfully requested the OTP allege that the accused was responsible for the charged crimes not only as an indirect co-perpetrator, but also as a superior under Article 28 of the Rome Statute. Strangely, after the restarted confirmation hearing was over, the Pre-Trial Chamber did not analyse whether the OTP had introduced sufficient evidence to establish that the accused 'should have known' that the forces under his control were committing crimes, because it concluded that the evidence indicated he had actual knowledge of those crimes.[84] Moreover, when the OTP's subsequently filed Amended Document Containing the Charges included the 'should have known' language, the Pre-Trial Chamber struck the allegation at the Defence's request.[85]

[82] Decision on the Legal Representatives' Joint Submissions Concerning the Appeals Chamber's Decision on 8 December 2009 on Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2223, TC I, ICC, 8 January 2010, paras 33–6.

[83] Defence Appeal against the Decision of 14 July 2009 entitled 'Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2112-tENG, AC, ICC, 10 September 2009, para. 53.

[84] Decision Giving Notice to the Parties and Participants that the Legal Characterisation of the Facts May Be Subject to Change in Accordance with Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2324, TC III, ICC, 21 September 2008 ('Bemba Regulation 55 notice'), para. 1. Either mental state suffices for the responsibility of a military commander. See Art 28(a)(i) ICC Statute.

[85] See SáCouto and Cleary (n 57) 16–17.

That was, however, only the beginning of the story. Five weeks into the Defence's case-in-chief, and two years after the beginning of trial, the Trial Chamber gave notice that it might invoke Regulation 55 to recharacterize the mental element of superior responsibility to include whether the accused should have known that his forces were committing crimes.[86] The defence, not surprisingly, was outraged, pointing out that the contemplated recharacterization was completely inconsistent with how the Pre-Trial Chamber had framed the issue and would undermine the strategy it had been pursuing since the investigation phase of the case:

> Mr Bemba was charged with one theory of liability; the alternative now proposed was rejected by the Chamber competent to set the framework of charges; Defence preparations were made on that basis; the Trial Chamber heard that case and the evidence relevant to it and let the Prosecution proceed and close its case on that basis; like the Defence (and Prosecutor), the Chamber asked questions based on that case; the Defence investigated and decided to present evidence relevant to that case, and no other; the Defence never prepared for or sought to meet an alternative theory of liability (nor was it required to); the witnesses which it now intends to call have been interviewed and they are being called in relation to that case.[87]

The OTP argued, by contrast, that the recharacterization would not prejudice the accused, because '(a) the proposed change is not a substantial departure from the findings in the confirmation decision', and '(b) the evidence offered to establish the Accused's knowledge would also necessarily prove that he should have known of the crimes'.[88]

The Defence clearly had the better argument. To begin with, it is difficult to describe an objective mental state (negligence) as 'not a substantial departure' from a subjective mental state—and a high one at that (knowledge). It is obviously considerably easier to prove that a reasonable person would have known a particular fact than that the accused actually knew it. Indeed, to see the folly of the OTP's position, we need only consider a scenario in which the Trial Chamber recharacterized the mental state of a crime from negligence to knowledge. In that situation, would the OTP dismiss the difference as 'not a substantial departure'? To ask the question is to answer it.

The OTP's second claim was even weaker. It is true that, if the prosecution proved that the accused knew his forces were committing crimes, it would necessarily prove that he should have known they were. But that assumes the prosecution could prove knowledge. If the Prosecution cannot prove knowledge, the Trial Chamber's recharacterization could easily mean the difference between conviction and acquittal: whereas the accused would have to be acquitted under the charges as confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber, he could still be convicted under the charges as recharacterized by the Trial Chamber (because the prosecution might still be able to prove negligence).

[86] Bemba Regulation 55 notice (n 84) para. 5.

[87] Defence Submission on the Trial Chamber's Notification under Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2365-Red, TC III, ICC, 18 October 2012, para. 43.

[88] Prosecution's Submissions on the Procedural Impact of Trial Chamber's Notification Pursuant to Regulation 55(2) of the Regulations of the Court, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2334, TC III, ICC, 8 October 2012, para. 3.

Predictably, the Trial Chamber went ahead with the recharacterization, thereby making it easier in the middle of the trial for the prosecution to obtain a conviction. That action not only undermined the accused's right to prepare an effective defence, it also violated his right under Article 67(1) of the Rome Statute 'to a fair hearing conducted impartially'—an issue discussed in more detail in the following section.

39.4.2.3 Katanga

As discussed previously, the Trial Chamber notified the parties well after the trial had ended that it intended to consider whether the accused could be convicted of the charged crimes on the basis of an uncharged mode of participation—common-purpose liability. Judge Van den Wyngaert dissented from the majority's decision, arguing that its application of Rule 55 went 'well beyond any reasonable application of the provision and fundamentally encroaches upon the accused's right to a fair trial'.[89] And she reiterated that complaint after the Trial Chamber convicted Katanga on the basis of the recharacterized mode of participation.[90]

It is difficult to disagree with Judge Van den Wyngaert, because the recharacterization undermined the defence's entire trial strategy, which focused solely on rebutting the Prosecution's claim that the accused was responsible for the charged crimes as an indirect co-perpetrator—the mode of participation that the Pre-Trial Chamber had confirmed. The Defence did not need to address the very different idea that Katanga was liable for the charged crimes as a contributor to a group crime, and not simply because that mode of participation was not confirmed. More importantly—and more troubling—the Pre-Trial Chamber had specifically noted in its Confirmation Decision that its findings on indirect co-perpetration 'render[ed] moot further questions of accessorial liability'.[91]

Had Katanga known—or even been able to foresee—that the Trial Chamber would consider convicting him as a contributor to a group crime, the Defence would have pursued a very different strategy.[92] To begin with, the two modes of participation have very different mental elements: indirect co-perpetration requires proof that the accused intended to commit the charged crimes; common-purpose liability simply requires proof that the accused knew that the group intended to commit those crimes. The Defence not only had no reason to deny that the accused knew his (unidentified) former subordinates intended to engage in criminal activity—because doing so would not incriminate him as an indirect co-perpetrator—but Katanga himself conceded that knowledge during his testimony.[93] As any good defence attorney knows, [89] Dissenting Opinion Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 1.

[90] Minority Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436-AnxI, TC II, ICC, 17 March 2014 ('Katanga trial dissent'), para. 1.

[91] Dissenting Opinion Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga and Ngudjolo Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 30.

[92] Ibid., para. 39.

[93] See J Easterday, 'Germain Katanga Completes Testimony before ICC', International Justice Monitor, 31 October 2011. Decision on Victims' Representation and Participation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-460, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012, para. 14.

making non-inculpatory factual admissions is often an effective legal strategy. The Trial Chamber's decision to recharacterize the charged mode of participation thus relied, at least in part, on Katanga's own testimony—a troubling situation, as Judge Van den Wyngaert pointed out in her Regulation 55 dissent.[94]

The two modes of participation also have different physical elements: whereas indirect co-perpetration requires the accused to have 'control' over the charged crimes, common-purpose liability simply requires the accused to 'contribute' to the charged crimes. As with the mental element, therefore, the defence could freely admit that Katanga contributed to the charged crimes without running the risk of being held responsible for them as an indirect co-perpetrator. Indeed, that is precisely what Katanga did.[95] The Trial Chamber's decision to recharacterize thus meant, as Judge Van den Wyngaert explains in her dissent to the trial judgment, that a sound strategic decision by the defence ultimately helped convict Katanga:

> 57. [T]he Chamber questioned Germain Katanga extensively on his role as coordinator between the APC and the fighters of Walendu- Bindi. It should come as no surprise that Germain Katanga enthusiastically answered the many questions about his role as coordinator. Undoubtedly, he was under the impression that the Chamber was interested in his defence against the Prosecutor's allegation that he was the top commander of the Ngiti fighters of Walendu-Bindi and that he had total control over their actions. This allegation was crucial for him to be considered an indirect perpetrator under the control theory interpretation of article 25(3)(a). The facts concerning his role as coordinator, about which Germain Katanga testified, were, viewed in this context, purely exculpatory as they undermined the Prosecutor's thesis that he had 'control over the crimes' committed by his subordinates.
>
> 58. However, now the Majority relies heavily on Germain Katanga's role as a coordinator for its finding that he made a 'significant contribution' in the sense of article 25(3)(d). In other words, the Majority has turned a perfectly legitimate defence against the confirmed charges into a major point of self-incrimination under a different form of criminal responsibility.[96]

Judge Van den Wyngaert is right: this is 'nothing short of the Chamber co-opting a valid defence and turning it against the accused'.[97]

39.4.2.4 Ruto and Kenyatta

In Ruto and Kenyatta, the Trial Chamber faced the problem whether to consider Ruto and Kenyatta's guilt not only as indirect co-perpetrators, but also on the basis of any of the accessorial modes of participation in Article 25(3)—ordering, soliciting, inducing, aiding or abetting, or contributing to a group crime. Unfortunately, it has granted the [94] Dissenting Opinion Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga and Ngudjolo Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 45.

[95] Ibid., para. 5.

[96] Katanga trial dissent (n 90) paras 57 and 58.

[97] Ibid., para. 40.

OTP's request in Ruto to give notice that it may do so.[98] The danger of such 'recharacterization', even when the accused has notice of it (unlike in Katanga), is evident: the Defence will now have to rebut each and every possible form of complicity during trial, because it cannot be sure which one(s) the Trial Chamber will ultimately deem to be the proper legal characterization of the facts. Having to defend against such ambiguous charges is not only manifestly unfair, it will also make Ruto's trial far more complicated and time-consuming than necessary.

39.4.3 Practical implications

Regulation 55, in short, significantly complicates the accused's ability to prepare an effective defence. Most fundamentally, as Ruto and Kenyatta illustrate in stark detail, the constant threat of recharacterization forces the Defence to rebut every factual allegation in the Document Containing the Charges—even those that can, in light of the charged crimes and mode of participation, be safely ignored or conceded. The Defence cannot safely ignore or concede any facts in favor of challenging the Prosecution's legal argument, because those facts could end up being legally recharacterized to support uncharged crimes or uncharged modes of participation during or after the trial.[99]

Regulation 55 is thus also likely to frustrate efficient trial management. In order to promote shorter, more streamlined trials, Rule 69 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence permits the Trial Chamber to consider proven any 'alleged fact . . . contained in the charges, the contents of a document, the expected testimony of a witness or other evidence' that is not contested. Trial Chambers have routinely relied on Rule 69; in Lubanga, for example, the Chamber used it to justify ordering the parties 'to prepare a draft schedule of agreed facts to be considered by the Chamber eight weeks before the commencement of the trial'.[100] In light of the ongoing possibility of recharacterization, no rational Defence team will agree to any fact that is even remotely contested—thus rendering Rule 69 a virtual nullity.

Moreover, contrary to Stahn's argument that Regulation 55 encourages 'a precise charging practice from the very beginning of the proceedings',[101] the never-ending threat of recharacterization actually does precisely the opposite. First, it encourages the OTP to 'draft the document containing the charges as broadly as possible, leaving the facts and circumstances at a level of generality that will then allow for evidence that emerges at trial to easily fit within them and thus allow legal recharacterization'.[102] The broader the factual allegations, the greater the possibility of recharacterization. Second, the Regulation reduces the OTP's incentive to be precise concerning the legal characterization of the facts in the Document Containing the Charges, 'because any "mistake" in the legal characterisation could be "corrected" at trial'.[103]

[98] Decision on Applications for Notice of Possibility of Variation of Legal Characterization, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1122, TC V(A), ICC, 12 December 2013, para. 44.

[99] See e.g. Merope (n 69) 344 (noting that the result of a broad interpretation of Regulation 55 requires 'a hyper vigilant defence that closely curtailed any statement made by a witness, lest it be used as a basis for new charges').

[100] Decision on Agreements between the Parties, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1179, TC I, ICC, 8 January 2010, para. 11.

[101] Stahn (n 6) 30. [102] Merope (n 69) 343. [103] Jacobs (n 10) 218.

Even worse, the possibility of recharacterization after trial, explicitly countenanced by the Appeals Chamber in Katanga, undermines another essential component of the right to a fair trial: the accused's right 'not to be compelled to testify or confess guilt and remain silent'.[104] Because Regulation 55 permits post-trial recharacterization of the charges, the accused cannot make an informed determination about whether he should testify in his own defence—if the charges change after he has testified, his testimony could end up being inculpatory instead of exculpatory, especially if part of his defence strategy is to concede the existence of facts that are harmless relative to the charged crimes and mode of participation.

Indeed, as discussed, that is precisely what happened in Katanga. The accused chose to testify on the assumption that the prosecution had to prove that he was guilty of the charged crimes as an indirect co-perpetrator. As part of his defence strategy, he effectively conceded both the mental and physical elements of contributing to a group crime—a rational decision, given that the Pre-Trial Chamber had assured him that 'further questions of accessorial liability' were moot. The Trial Chamber then recharacterized the mode of participation to include common-purpose liability—relying heavily on Katanga's own testimony to do so—and convicted him on the basis of the recharacterized mode. The Trial Chamber thus directly penalized the accused for exercising his right to testify on his own behalf, as Judge Van den Wyngaert notes in her dissent to the trial judgment.[105]

Although the majority in the Regulation 55 decision acknowledged that 'the Accused might have expressed himself differently had he known beforehand that his statements would be used under article 25(3)(d)', it insisted that Katanga 'elected of his own free will to testify' and 'was fully aware of the existence of Regulation 55'.[106] Judge Van den Wyngaert rightly mocks this position in her trial dissent, noting that the majority's hyper-formalism 'begs the question why the Chamber did not think of this possibility itself at the time and, if it did so, why it did not find it necessary to inform the accused of [that] fact'.[107] More fundamentally, however, the majority's exceedingly narrow view of 'free will'—which reduces it to the absence of physical coercion—simply underscores how dramatically Regulation 55 undermines the right to silence enshrined in Article 67(1)(g) of the Rome Statute: no rational accused will ever testify on his own behalf if the mere existence of Regulation 55 puts him on notice that anything he says can be used—even long after the trial has ended—to convict him of any charge that might be supported by the 'facts and circumstances' in the Confirmation Decision.

39.4.4 The 'impunity' rationale and judicial impartiality

The Appeals Chamber has consistently taken the position that Regulation 55 is necessary to avoid impunity. Its statement in Lubanga is typical:

> [T]he Appeals Chamber notes that Mr Lubanga Dyilo's interpretation of article 61(9) of the Statute bears the risk of acquittals that are merely the result of legal [104] Art 67(1)(g) ICC Statute.

[105] Katanga trial dissent (n 90) para. 58.
[106] Katanga and Ngudjolo Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 52.
[107] Katanga trial dissent (n 90) para. 56.

> qualifications confirmed in the pre-trial phase that turn out to be incorrect, in particular based on the evidence presented at the trial. This would be contrary to the aim of the Statute to 'put an end to impunity' (fifth paragraph of the Preamble). The Appeals Chamber is of the view that a principal purpose of Regulation 55 is to close accountability gaps, a purpose that is fully consistent with the Statute.[108]

There are two fundamental problems with this defence of Regulation 55. First, even if the impunity rationale provided a compelling normative argument for recharacterization, that rationale would not justify the Regulation itself. The ultra vires issue is not whether the ICC functions better with Regulation 55 than without it, but whether the Regulation is a routine function and consistent with the Rome Statute.[109] And as discussed in section 39.1, Regulation 55 is neither.

Second, the impunity rationale does not, in fact, provide a compelling normative argument for recharacterization—at least not in the manner that the Appeals Chamber has suggested. To see why, it is important to distinguish between the two phases of Regulation 55 recharacterization: pre-recharacterization, when the Trial Chamber is deciding whether to invoke subregulation 2; and post-recharacterization, when the Trial Chamber adopts measures under subregulation 3 designed to ensure that the accused has the time and resources necessary to effectively prepare a defence to the recharacterized charges.

The Appeals Chamber's defence of Regulation 55 focuses on the pre-recharacterization phase. Its impunity rationale imagines and depends upon the following sequence of events: (1) the OTP brings charges against an accused; (2) the Pre-Trial Chamber confirms those charges; (3) the Prosecution fails to prove the confirmed charges at trial; but (4) the evidence introduced at trial proves different and unconfirmed charges. In such a situation, according to the Appeals Chamber, it would create an 'accountability gap' to require the Trial Chamber to acquit the accused even though—to quote Katanga—'the evidence presented clearly established his or her guilt based upon the appropriate legal characterisation of the facts'.[110]

The problem with the Appeals Chamber's argument is the assumption that the accused's guilt regarding an uncharged crime[111] can be 'clearly established' by the evidence presented at trial. That confident assumption overlooks a critical fact: the evidence of the accused's guilt for the uncharged crime will never have been adversarially tested prior to recharacterization. The Prosecution and Defence will have focused their attention on the charged crime; they will not have argued for and against the uncharged crime. Recharacterization pursuant to Regulation 55, therefore, is actually based on the Trial Chamber's belief that the evidence presented at trial 'clearly [108] Lubanga appeals judgment (n 5) para. 77; see also Katanga appeals judgment (n 59) para. 21. Scholars have also defended the impunity rationale. See Stahn (n 6) 3; G Bitti, 'Two Bones of Contention between Civil and Common Law: the Record of the Proceedings and the Treatment of a Concursus Delictorum' in H Fischer et al. (eds), International and National Prosecution of Crimes under International Law: Current Developments (Berlin: Berlin Verlag 2001) 287.

[109] See Jacobs (n 10) 217 ('One can wonder whether this broad teleological policy approach can be an adequate legal justification for a statutory provision').

[110] Katanga appeals judgment (n 59) para. 21.

[111] Or the charged crime on the basis of a different mode of participation, as in Katanga.

establishes' the accused's guilt for an uncharged crime, not on the Prosecution's belief. In Katanga, for example, 'the prosecution made no effort to charge under Article 25(3)(d), even in the alternative'.[112]

The existence of the adversarial post-recharacterization phase does not change this basic flaw in the impunity rationale. Although subregulation 3 is designed to provide the accused with sufficient time to prepare an effective defence to the new charge, it is far from clear whether that is possible in the middle of the trial—much less long after it has ended. In Bemba, for example, the Defence ultimately asked for the trial to be restarted early, because it concluded that additional investigation was impossible in light of its lack of resources, the absence of cooperation from the DRC and CAR, and the accused's ongoing detention.[113] Even more obviously, the Trial Chamber's decision to recharacterize in Katanga was motivated, at least in part, by the accused's own testimony. All the time in the world to prepare a new trial strategy could not undo that damage.

More importantly, though, the existence of the post-recharacterization phase does not compensate for the fact that the impetus to recharacterize comes from the Trial Chamber, not from the prosecution.[114] Simply put, when the Trial Chamber decides to recharacterize, the judges are functioning as advocates, not as neutral umpires[115]—they are intervening in the case to ensure that the accused is convicted despite the Prosecution's failure to prove the charged crimes beyond a reasonable doubt. Such activism may be appropriate in an inquisitorial system, but it is not appropriate at the ICC, whose trials are—for all their inquisitorial elements—still fundamentally adversarial.[116] Indeed, as Judge Van den Wyngaert noted in her Regulation 55 dissent in Katanga, the Rome Statute specifically imposes the duty 'to establish the truth … of whether there is criminal responsibility under this Statute' on the Prosecution[117]; the Trial Chamber has no equivalent duty.[118]

A decision by the Trial Chamber to recharacterize sua sponte, therefore, is inconsistent with Article 67(1) of the Rome Statute, which guarantees the accused 'a fair hearing conducted impartially'. A Trial Chamber does not act impartially when it intervenes during or after a trial to save the prosecution from itself—especially in light of Article 64(8)(b), which gives the Trial Chamber the right to conduct trial proceedings in a non-adversarial manner if it so chooses.[119] If a Trial Chamber wants to assume primary responsibility for determining the accused's guilt, it should adopt an inquisitorial trial structure ex ante, not in media res or ex post.

[112] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga and Ngudjolo Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 30.

[113] SáCouto and Cleary (n 57) 23.

[114] This is the case even where, as in Lubanga, the OPCV asks for recharacterization. Victims are not parties to the proceedings. See Decision on Victims' Representation and Participation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-460, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012, para. 14.

[115] Jacobs (n 10) 219.

[116] See Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga and Ngudjolo Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 34; Jacobs (n 10) 219.

[117] See Rome Statute, Art 54(1)(a).

[118] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, Katanga and Ngudjolo Regulation 55 decision (n 1) para. 34.

[119] A fact that Judge Van den Wyngaert noted in her Katanga Regulation 55 dissent. See ibid., para. 54.

39.5 Conclusion

Regulation 55 is deeply problematic. The most damning criticism is that the judges lacked the authority to adopt the Regulation in the first place, because recharacterization is not a 'routine function' and cannot be reconciled with the Rome Statute's well-defined procedures for amending the charges against an accused. The Regulation has also been consistently misinterpreted and wrongly invoked to recharacterize facts both before and after trial. And finally, both the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Trial Chamber have routinely applied the Regulation in a manner that undermines both prosecutorial independence and the accused's right to a fair trial.

An impartial judiciary concerned with maintaining the Rome Statute's distribution of authority between the judges, the OTP, the victims, and the Defence would invalidate Regulation 55. Unfortunately, with regard to the Regulation, the judiciary is anything but impartial. After all, the judges themselves wrote it. Regulation 55 thus represents the most indefensible form of judicial law-making—particularly aggressive and particularly self-interested all at once.

40

Disclosure Challenges at the ICC

*Alex Whiting

40.1 Introduction

It is a familiar dynamic. The Defence complains that the Prosecution failed to make timely or complete disclosure of inculpatory or exculpatory evidence in its possession. The Prosecution responds, either disputing the claim or acknowledging error. The judges assess whether the materials should have been disclosed and whether there was malfeasance or inadvertence, but in any case they (usually) urge the Prosecution to do a better job going forward in fulfilling its disclosure obligations.

Versions of this litigation have played out again and again at the ICC, and at the ad hoc international criminal tribunals as well.[1] Commentators echo the complaints of the Defence and judges, deplore the Prosecution's repeated failures to meet its disclosure obligations, and urge reforms.[2] It is a subject that seems never to go away, never seems to be resolved, and is replayed over and over in an endless loop. As David Scheffer has written, 'one of the most reliable constants of criminal procedure—domestic or international—is the discord between the Prosecutor, defence counsel, and judges over the timing and manner of disclosure of evidence to each of them. This is, and will be, no less true for the ICC'.[3] But why is that so? Why is disclosure so difficult? Why can the Prosecution not just get it right—not just mostly right, but always and consistently right? Why does disclosure seem so hard?

It is not to say that the Prosecution always fails in its disclosure responsibilities. The truth is in fact otherwise. Generally the prosecution is diligent and thorough in fulfilling its obligations. But at the same time, the Prosecution seems unable to 'solve' the disclosure challenge once and for all. Complaints invariably arise from the Defence

* Professor of Practice, From 2010 until 2013, Investigation Coordinator and then Prosecution Coordinator with the OTP, ICC. From 2002 until 2007, Trial Attorney and then Senior Trial Attorney with the ICTY. From 1991 until 2002, federal prosecutor in the United States.

[1] See e.g. Decision on Accused's Ninety-First Disclosure Violation Motion, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, TC III, ICTY, 7 May 2014; Decision on Defence Interlocutory Appeal against the Trial Chamber's Decision on EDS Disclosure Methods, Mladić, IT-09-92-AR73.2, TC I, ICTY, 28 November 2013; Decision on Defence Application Pursuant to Art 64(4) and Related Requests, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-728, TC V, ICC, 26 April 2013.

[2] See also Khan and Buisman, Chapter 41, this volume; K Gibson and C Lussiaà-Berdou, 'Disclosure of Evidence' in K Khan et al. (eds), Principles of Evidence in International Criminal Justice (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 306; S SáCouto and K Cleary, 'Expediting Proceedings at the International Criminal Court', War Crimes Research Office, Washington College of Law at American University (2011), 61 ('Late disclosure of material by the Prosecution to the Defense has been one of the principal causes of delay at the ICC').

[3] D Scheffer, 'A Review of the Experiences of the Pre-Trial and Appeals Chambers of the International Criminal Court Regarding the Disclosure of Evidence' (2008) 21 Leiden Journal of International Law 151.

about disclosure, and while these complaints are not always justified, or are often overblown, there is nonetheless the sense that the prosecution continues to fall short in achieving 100% compliance.

In fact, disclosure is a problem that will likely never be solved. It can be managed—and better management is in fact critical to better compliance—but it will never be completely solved in the sense of disappearing as a source of contention between the parties or being perfectly achieved. It is a subject that will always produce some complaint, conflict, and litigation because it is embedded in the challenges that are central to the cases themselves at the ICC. Although disclosure is a precondition to fair adversarial proceedings[4], it does not sit outside and apart from those proceedings, but is instead subject to the difficulties that are largely inherent to the cases prosecuted at the ICC. In other words, there are distinctive features of international criminal prosecutions that will invariably create conflicts at the margins of the disclosure regime.

The ICC, like the ad hoc international criminal tribunals before it, prosecutes complex cases of mass atrocity arising out of complete political and social upheaval. It does so with relatively few resources, relying on cooperation from States Parties and other investigative bodies. As a permanent institution, the ICC is designed to move quickly when atrocities occur. Often the prosecution must navigate unfamiliar cultures and confront language and translations issues. The cases are sprawling and layered, even when the allegations are relatively focused. They are unlike national cases in important ways. In most domestic criminal cases, the alleged criminality sits outside the norm and is aberrational. The lines of relevance are therefore more distinct. In cases of mass atrocity, often the reverse is true: the criminality has become the norm, and determining what is relevant to the case becomes significantly more challenging. Witnesses and evidence are particularly fragile, and security issues are often paramount.

All of these particular dynamics of international criminal cases pose special challenges for the conduct of the case and for disclosure. In addition to these substantive challenges, disclosure can become a litigation tactic in the hands of the parties. The prosecution can have incentives to interpret its obligations as narrowly as possible, while the defence can be motivated to shift the focus away from the accused and the substance of the alleged crimes to the prosecution and the 'conduct' of the proceedings. These tendencies exist in national cases as well, but may be more pronounced in international prosecutions because of the stakes and the lack of a common tradition and practice. These aspects make it difficult for the judges, who often lack experience managing complex cases and may be unfamiliar with the litigation tactics and practices of the parties, to evaluate the conduct or claims of the two sides. Finally, international criminal trials are highly public and scrutinized events, and therefore the judges will be particularly mindful to ensure that the proceedings appear fair, which may push the judges to grant broader disclosure rights than substantive fairness in fact requires.

All of these factors mean that disclosure disputes at the ICC are not likely to disappear anytime soon. From the side of the prosecution, disclosure is primarily a management problem that must be prioritized alongside its other work. For their part, the judges will need to sort through the challenges and the claims to determine how to ensure that the goals of disclosure are fully realized while also making sure that the cases continue to move forward.

[4] Gibson and Lussiaà-Berdou (n 2) 306.

This chapter will proceed in two parts. The first part will sketch out the disclosure regime at the ICC, the second will seek to identify the challenges that the prosecution faces in managing disclosure; the conclusion will seek to suggest approaches for the way forward.

40.2 The Framework

The Rome Statute,[5] and the accompanying Rules of Procedure and Evidence[6], set forth the 'what' and the 'when' of disclosure by the prosecution. The theory of disclosure is that it underpins a fair trial. The Prosecution is considered to have superior investigative resources, and is therefore required to share the core of its investigation with the Defence in order to redress the assumed imbalance.[7] The logic is derived from the model of a state (with vast resources and access to evidence) prosecuting an individual or group of individuals. In the international criminal prosecution world, however, this premise does not always hold true. In some cases, the underlying politics of the situation mean the Defence has better access to the evidence and at times even superior resources (as when the defence is supported by a state).[8] The disclosure rules do not, however, adjust to these circumstances.

Furthermore, in the background of the ICC disclosure regime is the Article 54(1)(a) requirement that the Prosecution 'extend the investigation to cover all facts and evidence relevant to an assessment of whether there is criminal responsibility under this Statute, and, in doing so, investigate incriminating and exonerating circumstances equally'. Thus in principle the Prosecution will gather both incriminating and exonerating information and evidence, both of which must be disclosed (pursuant to different rules) to the accused.[9] In the early days of the ICC, the OTP sought to keep its investigations narrow, which in turn should have made disclosure more manageable. Reacting in part to criticisms that the trials at the ad hoc tribunals were too expansive and too long, the first prosecutor of the ICC adopted a policy of 'focused investigations'.[10] In several instances, however, the judges have criticized the Prosecution's investigations as being insufficiently thorough.[11] The Prosecution has already announced

[5] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[6] Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Official Records of the ASP to the Rome Statute of the ICC, First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002).

[7] Gibson and Lussiaà-Berdou (n 2) 306; L Büngener, 'Disclosure of Evidence' in C Safferling (ed.), International Criminal Procedure (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 346–7.

[8] For example, defence counsel were well supported and resourced in the Croatia and KLA cases at the ICTY and continue to be so in the Kenya cases at the ICC.

[9] Büngener (n 7) 345 (linking the Prosecutor's obligation to investigate both sides to stronger inquisitorial approach at ICC).

[10] Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–12, OTP, 1 February 2010, 4ff.

[11] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012, paras 115–23; Judgment Pursuant that it will adjust its practices and conduct more in-depth investigations while trying to maintain focus.[12] There may not be a return to the broad investigations of the ad hoc tribunals, but the ICC's investigations are likely to be more extensive than they have been to date. These broader investigations will invariably give rise to additional challenging questions regarding the scope of disclosure.

40.2.1 Incriminating evidence

On the side of incriminating evidence, the rules are relatively straightforward. In advance of the confirmation hearing and the trial, the Prosecution must disclose all of the incriminating information it will offer at that stage of the proceedings. Specifically, Article 61(3) requires that prior to the confirmation hearing the prosecution must provide the defence with 'the document containing the charges' and 'the evidence on which the Prosecution intends to rely at the hearing'. Rule 76(1) states that '[t]he Prosecutor shall provide the defence with the names of witnesses whom the Prosecutor intends to call to testify and copies of any prior statements made by those witnesses'. Although the Rule is entitled 'Pre-trial disclosure relating to prosecution witnesses', it has been interpreted to require disclosure of all statements of witnesses upon which the Prosecution intends to rely at the confirmation stage, regardless of whether the Prosecution intends to call the witnesses to testify.[13]

Further, Rule 77 requires the prosecution to provide to the Defence any 'books, documents, photographs and other tangible objects' that the Prosecutor intends to use as evidence at the confirmation hearing or trial. Rule 121 further specifies that these materials must be provided no later than 30 days before the confirmation hearing. Article 64(3)(c) then requires the disclosure before trial of any evidence not previously disclosed, i.e. incriminating evidence not relied upon at the confirmation hearing but to be used at trial.

40.2.2 Exonerating evidence and information material to the preparation of the defence

The rules governing the disclosure of exonerating evidence or information are more complicated. Article 67(2) requires the prosecution to 'disclose to the defence evidence to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 ('Lubanga trial judgment'), paras 178–484; Decision Adjourning the Hearing on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-432, PTC I, ICC, 3 June 2013; C Buisman, 'The Prosecutor's Obligation to Investigate Incriminating and Exonerating Circumstances Equally: Illusion or Reality?' (2014) 27 Leiden Journal of International Law 205.

[12] Strategic Plan: June 2012–15, OTP, 11 October 2013, 6.

[13] See e.g. Decision Setting the Regime for Evidence Disclosure and Other Related Matters, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-47, PTC II, ICC, 12 April 2013, para. 12. Rule 76(3) also requires the prosecution to provide the statements in their original language as well as in 'a language which the accused fully understands and speaks'. In the Ntaganda case, however, the Pre-Trial Chamber sought to minimize the translation burden and therefore required the Defence to identify which statements needed to be translated into Kinyarawanda, the language of the accused. Ibid., paras 21–2.

in the Prosecutor's possession or control which he or she believes shows or tends to show the innocence of the accused, or to mitigate the guilt of the accused, or which may affect the credibility of prosecution evidence'. Although this provision refers only to 'evidence', it has been interpreted broadly as applying to any 'material' that falls within its definition.[14]

Rule 77 is potentially even broader in its application with respect to the disclosure of information useful to the defence. In addition to requiring the prosecution to disclose material that it intends to use at trial, Rule 77 also mandates that the prosecution turn over all 'books, documents, photographs and other tangible objects . . . which are material to the preparation of the defence'. This provision has a surprising provenance for the ICC, as it derives originally from US law. When the ICTY was first being established, the US proposed a comprehensive set of Rules of Procedure and Evidence ('ICTY Rules'), largely based on US procedure.[15] Many of these proposed provisions became a part of the ICTY Rules, including Rule 66(B), which requires the prosecutor to disclose 'any books, documents, photographs and tangible objects . . . which are material to the preparation of the defence'. This rule was derived from Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 16(a)(1)(E) in the US, which similarly requires the government to disclose items that are 'material' to the preparation of the defence. When the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence were adopted, Rule 66(B) from the ICTY then migrated over and became Rule 77 in the ICC Rules.

The same rule has been interpreted differently, however, in the US, at the ICTY, and at the ICC. The central question is whether the rule requires only a showing of relevance to the case, which is an extremely low threshold and could apply to any information that has any connection at all with the issues in the case, or whether 'material' requires something more than relevance.

In the US, the term 'material' has force. It is not enough to argue that the information at issue is 'relevant'. Rather, there must be a showing that it is 'material' to the Defence, which has been defined as requiring a showing not just that the information might be relevant to the case, but that it will be specifically helpful to the Defence. Cases in the US have held that 'the requested information must have more than an abstract relationship to the issue presented; there must be some indication that the requested discovery will have a significant effect on the defence'.[16]

The ICTY adopted a similar approach to its version of the rule, interpreting 'material to the preparation of the Defence' to mean information that is 'significantly helpful to an understanding of important inculpatory or exculpatory evidence; it is material if there is a strong indication that . . . it will play an important role in uncovering

[14] Decision on the Consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1401, TC I, ICC, 13 June 2008, paras 88–9.

[15] G Boas and W Schabas, International Criminal Law Developments in the Case Law of the ICTY (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2003) 3–4.

[16] United States v Dzhokhar Tsarnaev, Order (D. Ma., 27 November 2013). See also United States v Zhen Zhou Wu, 680 F.Supp.2d 287, 290 (D. Ma. 2010) ('Evidence "material to preparing a defense" includes any evidence that could significantly refute the Government's case in chief').

admissible evidence, aiding witness preparation, corroborating testimony, or assisting impeachment or rebuttal'.[17] One commentator described this interpretation as 'broad',[18] and perhaps it is in comparison to the US approach, but it nonetheless requires more than a showing of 'relevance'.

The ICC has interpreted its version of the rule much more expansively. While citing the ICTY jurisprudence, the ICC Appeals Chamber in the Lubanga case significantly broadened the scope of what falls into material for the preparation of the defence under Rule 77. The accused in the case was charged with enlisting and conscripting child soldiers and using them in hostilities. The Defence requested material 'relating to the use of child soldiers by other individuals or groups' aside from the accused's group itself.[19] The Defence acknowledged that 'the use by other armed groups of child soldiers' could not be a basis for 'excluding criminal responsibility' of the accused, but nonetheless argued that the information would be 'useful…and even necessary…to be able to understand the situation in Ituri at that time'.[20] The Trial Chamber rejected this argument as follows:

> [T]he Chamber is unpersuaded, on the basis of the material before it, that the evidence relating to the use of child soldiers by other individuals or groups is relevant to the charges the accused faces. Any evidence on this subject will not undermine the Prosecution case and on the basis of what has been revealed by the Defence (following an invitation from the Bench for assistance on this issue), it does not support any defence or line of argument to be relied on by the accused. Put otherwise, this area of evidence has not been demonstrated to relate to a live issue in the case and it is not one that could assist the accused.[21]

This approach of the Trial Chamber was very much in keeping with that of the US and at the ICTY, but the Appeals Chamber at the ICC rejected this analysis and broadened considerably the scope of disclosure required by Rule 77. Although the Appeals Chamber cited positively to the ICTY and US jurisprudence, it concluded that Rule 77 'should be understood as referring to all objects that are relevant for the preparation of the defence'.[22] In other words, it found that the Rule covers all 'relevant' information to the defence without any additional qualification, and thus without any showing that it could have a 'significant effect' on the defence or could be 'significantly helpful' to the Defence.

[17] Decision on the Motion by the accused Zejnil Delalić for the disclosure of evidence, Delalić, IT-96-21-T, TC II quater, ICTY, 26 September 1996, para. 7.

[18] H Brady, 'Disclosure of Evidence' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 411.

[19] Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-71-ENG ET WT, TC I, ICC, 18 January 2008, 8.

[20] Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-69-ENG ET WT, TC I, ICC, 10 January 2008, 62.

[21] Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-71-ENG ET WT, TC I, ICC, 18 January 2008, 8.

[22] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Lubanga Dyilo against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber I of 18 January 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1433, AC, ICC, 11 July 2008, para. 77.

'Relevance' is of course an expansive term, as was demonstrated by the outcome of the decision itself. The Appeals Chamber concluded that the Defence had sufficiently justified its entitlement to the information under Rule 77 because the information about the use of child soldiers by other groups was 'useful' and 'even necessary . . . to understand the situation in Ituri at the time'.[23] The Appeals Chamber further noted that the information might also be relevant 'to understand the phenomenon of the use of child soldiers and their demobilization in the DRC' and to the sentencing phase of the proceedings, if any.[24] On this view, one could argue that any contextual or background information related to the conflict or events in question could be 'relevant', and therefore subject to disclosure. This approach might be manageable in national criminal investigations, but given the kinds of cases investigated by the ICC—complex cases arising out of broad societal conflict and breakdown—this interpretation of Rule 77 potentially requires the disclosure of vast amounts of information without a meaningful showing that it could be helpful to the Defence. The consequences are significant burdens on the Prosecution, potential conflicts with security concerns with witnesses and governments, and large volumes of information that the Defence must process.[25]

40.2.3 Limits on disclosure

There are five relatively narrow grounds under which disclosure can be limited or postponed: internal documents of the prosecution, witness security, ongoing investigation, confidential lead evidence, and national security.

First, Rule 81(1) states that '[r]eports, memoranda or other internal documents prepared by a party . . . in connection with the investigation or preparation of the case are not subject to disclosure'. As the judges have interpreted this provision, however, it does not in fact limit any disclosure that the Prosecution is otherwise obligated to provide under the Statute or Rules. If an 'internal document' of the prosecution contains any information that falls under Article 67 or Rule 77, then the prosecution must disclose that information to the defence, even if it is not required to disclose the entire document. In the Lubanga case, the prosecution contended that it was not required to disclose an internal investigator report containing an assessment of a potential witness's credibility, but only any information contained within the document falling under the disclosure rules.[26] The Chamber agreed:

> The prosecution is correct in its contention that the evaluations or assessments of its investigators are not ordinarily disclosable; instead, it is the information and material that led to any relevant evaluations or assessments that, depending on the [23] Ibid., para. 82. [24] Id. [25] See Gibson and Lussiaà-Berdou (n 2) 330.

[26] Redacted Decision on the Prosecution's Disclosure Obligations arising out of an Issue Concerning Witness DRC-WWWW-0031, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2656-Red, TC I, ICC, 20 January 2011, para. 12 ('the prosecution has determined that although material may be subject to restrictions on disclosure (e.g. Rules 81 and 82 of the Rules), it is appropriate to "isolate information that ought to be disclosed from that which constitutes non-disclosable internal work product" in order to provide it to the accused').

> circumstances, should be provided to the defence under Article 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules.[27]

Similarly, in the Bemba case, the Pre-Trial Chamber ruled that while the Prosecution was not required to disclose screening notes in their entirety, as they do not constitute 'statements' under Rule 76, it does have an obligation to disclose any Article 67(2) or Rule 77 material contained within the notes.[28] Therefore, Rule 81(1) excludes from disclosure no information that falls within Article 67(2) or Rule 77, but only subjective conclusions or analysis of the Prosecution or investigative staff of the OTP.

Second, pursuant to Article 68(5) and Rule 81(4), the prosecution can withhold disclosure required for any proceeding that takes place before trial if the disclosure would lead to the 'grave endangerment of the security of a witness or his or her family'.[29] The Appeals Chamber has held that there exists a presumption of disclosure, that non-disclosure must be justified on a case-by-case basis, and that the Court should select the least restrictive protective measures available.[30] Since the provision applies only to proceedings before trial, it allows only for the delay of disclosure through the confirmation and up to trial, but not the ultimate denial of disclosure required under the Statute and Rules. And the Prosecution must disclose as much as it can in the meantime, consistent with protecting the security of witnesses. In other words, the Prosecution must consider whether specific redactions to the disclosure will be sufficient to meet the protection concerns before seeking to delay the disclosure of an entire document.

Although witness protection only allows for delayed disclosure, it shapes both the conduct of the investigation and the disclosure process. If a witness is put into danger as a result of his or her interaction with the Court, the Court is obligated to take whatever steps are necessary, including the relocation of the witness and his or her family out of the situation country, to ensure their safety.[31] But given the costs of witness protection and the limited resources of the Court, it must be a last resort option.[32] Accordingly, during the investigation phase, the OTP must consider the disclosure and security implications of each piece of evidence it collects. Although it has an obligation to conduct a balanced investigation that is sufficiently broad 'to establish the truth',[33] it must also try to minimize its witness protection obligations as much as

[27] Ibid., para. 16.

[28] Public Redacted Version of 'Decision on the Defence Request for Disclosure of Pre-Interview Assessments and the Consequences of Non-Disclosure', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-750-Red, TC III, ICC, 9 April 2010, paras 33–4.

[29] Art 68(5) ICC Statute.

[30] Judgment on the Prosecutor's Appeal against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure Pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006, paras 36–7.

[31] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statements', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-475, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008, paras 1 and 44.

[32] D Chaikel and L Smith van Lin, 'Witnesses before the International Criminal Court, International Bar Association Report' (2013), 27 ('Protection and witness support come at a massive cost to the Court').

[33] Art 54(1)(a) ICC Statute.

possible by collecting only evidence that is truly pertinent. But this is a challenge, because it can be difficult to know in advance whether a witness's evidence will be significant or not, and once the OTP interviews a witness, then disclosure obligations are triggered. So the Prosecution has developed a mechanism to 'screen' witnesses before interviewing them in order to determine if they are in a position to provide truly pertinent evidence for the investigation.[34]

Witness protection also has implications in the disclosure phase. It requires the Prosecution to assess not just whether investigative material must be disclosed pursuant to the Statute and Rules, but whether disclosure could put any witnesses at risk and if so, what steps must be taken to protect the witnesses. This can be a complex assessment, and an ongoing one. Consideration must be given not just to the witness making the statement, but also to what the witness might reveal about other witnesses or potential witnesses that could put them in danger. So, if two people witness an event and both would be endangered if it were known that they were witnesses, then the Prosecution must consider redacting not just the name of each person from that person's own statement, but also the name of the other witness if it is contained within the statement. In other words, the Prosecution must consider how information could directly affect the security of witnesses and how information that is connected to other information that has been disclosed or is otherwise known could have that effect. Moreover, this assessment will change as the security circumstances evolve and as security measures are put into place for individual witnesses. The Prosecution might disclose a heavily redacted witness statement at the beginning of the disclosure process, a less redacted version later on if witnesses mentioned within the statement are protected, and a fully unredacted version even later if the witness is protected. At each stage, the prosecution must make what can be very nuanced judgments about what must and can be disclosed.[35]

The third basis for withholding disclosure is to protect an ongoing investigation. Rule 81(2) allows the prosecution to apply to the Chamber ex parte if disclosure 'may prejudice further or ongoing investigations'. The rule further specifies that if the Prosecution subsequently wishes to use the information at the confirmation hearing or trial, it must provide adequate disclosure. The Appeals Chamber has held that a chamber considering an application under Rule 81(2) must consider similar factors as when reviewing proposed measures to protect the security of witnesses.[36] In particular, the Prosecution has the burden 'to establish that the potential prejudice to investigations is objectively justifiable, would result from disclosure to the Defence (as opposed to the general public) and could be overcome or reduced by redactions'.[37] Presumably, if the information withheld is exculpatory, then disclosure could be withheld but not ultimately denied.[38]

[34] Public Redacted Version of 'Decision on the Defence Request for Disclosure of Pre-Interview Assessments and the Consequences of Non-Disclosure', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-750-Red, TC III, ICC, 9 April 2010, para. 3 (describing screenings as an assessment of whether a witness can provide relevant information).

[35] The suggestion made by Khan and Buisman in Chapter 41 of this volume that the Prosecution uses witness security for strategic purposes is unfounded. First, as they themselves acknowledge, any redactions or delayed disclosure based on witness security must be approved by the judges. Second, managing witness security and its impact on disclosure is a burden for the Prosecution, and its interest is not to increase this burden but rather to minimize as much as possible its witness security obligations.

[36] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statements', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-475, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008, para. 97.

Fourth, the Prosecution can withhold the disclosure of lead information that it collects pursuant to Article 54(3)(e) which allows the prosecutor to '[a]gree not to disclose, at any stage of the proceedings, documents or information that the Prosecutor obtains on the condition of confidentiality and solely for the purpose of generating new evidence, unless the provider of the information consents. . . .' This provision was the subject of considerable litigation during the ICC's first case, almost brought the proceedings to an end, and has been the subject of considerable discussion and writing.[39] The problem arose because the prosecution collected potentially exculpatory information pursuant to Article 54(3)(e) and therefore found itself caught between the dictates of disclosure contained in Article 67(2) and the confidentiality promised pursuant to Article 54(3)(e). The Appeals Chamber ultimately held that only a chamber, and not the prosecution acting on its own, can decide if potentially exculpatory information may be withheld from the Defence and what remedy, if any, will be available if disclosure is withheld.[40] The Appeals Chamber found that if the prosecution is unable to disclose potentially exculpatory information because it has been collected pursuant to Article 54(3)(e), then the chamber should consider whether 'counter-balancing measures can be taken to ensure that the rights of the accused are protected and that the trial is fair, in spite of the non-disclosure of the information'.[41] If adequate counterbalancing measures cannot be identified, then dismissal of some or all of the counts may be required.

After playing a major part in the ICC's first case, Article 54(3)(e) is unlikely to have a starring role in future litigation. The Lubanga case made it clear that disclosure obligations will largely trump any guarantees provided under Article 54(3)(e), and that even when there is a clash between these provisions, the judges will interpret the prosecution's disclosure duties very broadly. This decision has had the effect of dramatically diminishing the value of Article 54(3)(e). If the prosecution and information providers cannot be certain that confidentiality will be maintained while preserving the integrity of the case, there will be reluctance on all sides to provide or collect such confidential information. Since the Prosecution cannot know in advance what kinds of [38] Given the time that generally elapses between charging and trial, it is difficult to imagine a scenario where exculpatory information would still pose a danger of prejudicing an ongoing investigation at the time of trial.

[37] Ibid., para. 98.

[39] A Whiting, 'Lead Evidence and Discovery before the International Criminal Court: The Lubanga Case' (2009) 14 UCLA Journal of International Law & Foreign Affairs 207.

[40] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against the Decision of Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision on the Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Article 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, Together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1486, AC, ICC, 21 October 2008, paras 46–7.

[41] Ibid., para. 48.

information it will collect before it gives Article 54(3)(e) guarantees, it will always take a risk if it relies on that provision to gather lead information that it will collect potentially exculpatory information that it will be unable to disclose. For this reason, the OTP signalled after the Lubanga case that it would limit its collection of confidential information.[42] As the US Supreme Court stated in a different context, '[a]n uncertain privilege, or one which purports to be certain but results in widely varying applications by the courts, is little better than no privilege at all'.[43]

Finally, as something of a corollary to Article 54(3)(e), Article 72 allows a state to intervene if it learns that information is about to be disclosed that it believes would 'prejudice its national security interests'. The Government of Kenya sought to rely on this provision to support its request to be present during the confirmation hearing of Francis Muthaura, Uhuru Kenyatta, and Mohammed Ali, arguing that 'certain allegations may involve information impinging on the national security interests of the State of Kenya' within the meaning of Article 72.[44] The Pre-Trial Chamber rejected Kenya's request, finding that Article 72 narrowly allows a state to intervene only to block disclosure that might prejudice its national security interests and does not provide standing to states to raise broad and generalized national security concerns.[45] To date, there is no public information available that this provision has ever been invoked by a state. That is not surprising, since states will generally be proactive in taking steps to ensure that the Prosecution does not receive information in the first place that could jeopardize its national security interests.

In sum, the various limitations on disclosure are narrow. In most cases, they allow for delayed but not denied disclosure. When there is a conflict between disclosure and another imperative, disclosure will largely prevail. So not only are the prosecution's disclosure obligations broad, they are largely absolute. Nonetheless, they do not appear on their face to be impossible to administer. What, then, makes them difficult? The next section attempts to answer that question.

40.3 The Challenges

Although the ICC combines common-law and civil-law aspects, the investigation phases and the management of disclosure follows closely the common-law model. The prosecution gathers the evidence and has the responsibility, pursuant to the rules set forth here, to disclose to the defence. The drafters of the Rome Statute could have, but did not, adopt a model whereby an investigative judge manages the investigation and creates a dossier available to both parties.[46]

[42] Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–12, OTP, 1 February 2012, para. 34(b).

[43] Upjohn Co. v United States, 449 US 383, 393 (1981).

[44] Decision on the 'Request by the Government of Kenya in Respect of the Confirmation of Charges Proceeding', Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-340, PTC II, ICC, 20 September 2011, para. 4.

[45] Ibid., para. 11.

[46] Gibson and Lussiaà-Berdou (n 2) 311–12 (comparing civil-law to common-law system regarding disclosure).

Could the OTP mimic the function of an investigative judge, create a dossier, and simply disclose all of the investigative materials to the Defence? This is not a plausible solution for three reasons. First, the challenges of witness security require the prosecution to be selective in its disclosure. Threats to witnesses will be a feature of many if not all ICC investigations and prosecutions because the ICC is poised to act quickly when atrocities occur, by nature the cases emerge from enormous social and political disruption, and the stakes for high-level suspects are high, providing strong incentives to interfere with witnesses.[47] If the Prosecution need not disclose information that could jeopardize the security of a witness, then it should not.

Second, aside from security concerns, witnesses may have legitimate privacy interests in keeping their statements from being widely disseminated. Witnesses may speak about events that are traumatic or alternatively embarrassing to them. Their statements should not simply be disclosed if there is no affirmative requirement for the OTP to do so.

Third, the Defence will complain if the Prosecution simply discloses masses of documents without any filtering or specific identification of exculpatory material.[48] At the ICTY, following an amendment to the exculpatory disclosure rule (Rule 68) allowing electronic disclosure, the Prosecution sought to satisfy its duty of disclosure by placing all non-confidential materials on a searchable system called the Electronic Disclosure Suite (EDS). The Prosecution contended that the Defence was better situated than the prosecution to search the materials for exculpatory information. The defence appealed in the Karemera case, and the Appeals Chamber held that 'the Prosecution's Rule 68 obligation to disclose extends beyond simply making available its entire collection in a searchable format. A search engine cannot serve as a surrogate for the Prosecution's individualized consideration of the material in its possession'.[49] Thus the Prosecution risks complaint from the Defence, and rebuke from the judges, both if it discloses too little information and if it discloses too much.

For all of these reasons, therefore, the Prosecution will be obliged to make decisions about what information in its possession must be disclosed pursuant to the Statute and the Rules. It is this process of disclosure that has bedevilled all of the international tribunals. Even in national systems, disclosure can be a chronic problem. In the United States, for example, which has disclosure rules that are similar to those at the international tribunals, disclosure disputes are a regular feature of criminal litigation, and judges and commentators routinely deplore the failure of prosecutors in some [47] R Goldstone and G Bass, 'Lessons from the International Criminal Tribunals' in S Sewall and C Kaysen (eds), The United States and the International Criminal Court (Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield 2000) 51, 52–3 ('By having a court [the ICC] already set up, the world can make the timely delivery of justice more likely'); Gibson and Lussiaà-Berdou (n 2) 313 (witness protection and disclosure).

[48] S Zappalà, 'The Prosecutor's Duty to Disclose Exculpatory Materials and the Recent Amendment to Rule 68 ICTY RPE' (2004) 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice 620, 625–6 ('…the core of the provision does not lie in the disclosure of materials per se, but rather in the duty of the Prosecutor to enable the defence to effectively use those materials to prepare its case. The very heart of disclosure of exculpatory materials is their identification and characterization as exculpatory').

[49] Gibson and Lussiaà-Berdou (n 2) 331 (quoting Decision on Joseph Nzirorera's 21st Notice of Rule 66 Violation and Motion for Remedial and Punitive Measures: Théophile Urikumwenimana), Karemera, ICTR-98-44-T, TC III, ICTR, 22 April 2009.

cases to provide full and proper disclosure.[50] Chief Judge Alex Kozinski of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals wrote last year in United States v Olsen that '[t]here is an epidemic of Brady [US Supreme Court decision requiring prosecutors to disclose exculpatory information] violations abroad in the land'.[51] Similar complaints have arisen in other national systems, like in the UK.[52] The disclosure cases that become prominent tend to be on the extreme end of a range of disclosure battles that occur routinely in criminal cases.[53] Some of the disputes across the range arise from clear failings by Prosecutors (through malfeasance, incompetence, or inadvertence), others from systemic factors or good faith disagreements about the scope of disclosure obligations in a particular case, and still others from strategic decisions by defence counsel to divert attention from the substance of the case to the conduct of the investigation and prosecution.[54] Many disclosure fights combine several of these elements, and often there will be disagreement even among the judges about how a dispute should be resolved. For example, in the Olsen case in which Judge Kozinski spoke of an 'epidemic' of disclosure violations, the majority of judges of the Ninth Circuit concluded that the exculpatory information that the government had not disclosed was not material, and therefore there was no violation of the Prosecutor's duties, while Chief Judge Kozinski and four other judges thought otherwise.[55]

For all of the disclosure disputes that arise in domestic cases, it can be expected that there will be even more such disputes at the international tribunals, including at the ICC, and that disclosure battles will continue to be a regular feature of international criminal prosecutions. That is not to say that there should be tolerance for prosecutorial failures to comply with disclosure obligations.[56] Just the opposite is true. The possibility of prosecutorial malfeasance or incompetence resulting in a failure to abide by the disclosure requirements could, with the proper combination of training, management, and oversight, be reduced or even eliminated. But even putting aside these extreme cases, there will still remain a vast number of contentious fights surrounding disclosure because of the nature both of the cases at the international tribunals and the courts themselves as institutions.

The cases that are prosecuted at the ICC and other international courts are unlike domestic criminal cases in ways that complicate every stage of investigation and [50] See K McMunigal, 'The (Lack of) Enforcement of Prosecutor Disclosure Rules' (2010) 38 Hofstra Law Review 847, 847 ('Criminal defense lawyers and academics have long complained of failures by prosecutors to honor their constitutional and ethical obligations to disclose exculpatory information').

[51] United States v Olsen, Ordering denying petition for rehearing, No. 10-36063 (9th Circuit, 10 December 2013) (Kozinski, C J, dissenting).

[52] See e.g. B Emmerson, 'Prosecution in the Dock', The Guardian, 14 November 1999 ('The reputation of the criminal justice system has been badly damaged over the last 10 years by a series of miscarriages of justice, many arising out of non-disclosure of evidence to the defence').

[53] J Moore, 'Democracy and Criminal Discovery Reform after Connick and Garcetti' (2012) 77 Brooklyn Law Review 1329, 1345–6.

[54] See K McMunigal, 'Prosecutorial Disclosure Violations: Punishment vs. Treatment' (2013) 64 Mercer Law Review 711.

[55] United States v Olsen, Ordering denying petition for rehearing, No. 10-36063 (9th Circuit, 10 December 2013).

[56] For example, there was no excuse for the disclosure failure discussed in the opening paragraphs of Khan and Buisman, Chapter 41, this volume.

adjudication. They erupt out of massive societal disruption and involve widespread and significant violence across space and time. They emerge from conflict on a large scale that usually has deep roots in ethnic, religious, nationalist, or political strife. Further, the crimes during such times become normalized rather than aberrational.[57] As one commentator has put it, '[i]n this delusional context, criminal conduct that is normally characterized as "deviance" is transformed into acceptable, even desirable, behavior"'.[58] While the tribunals generally focus on those most responsible, the crimes themselves are only possible because of the participation of many actors at all levels.

