The nature of the cases investigated and prosecuted by the international tribunals has implications for evidence collection and disclosure. Because of the scope of the cases, the lines between relevant and irrelevant evidence become blurred. The Prosecution often presents historical evidence, through experts or lay witnesses, to give context and background to the conflict. In the Lubanga case, for example, the prosecution called Gérard Prunier and the Chamber called Roberto Garretón to provide, among other things, evidence about the history of the conflict in the DRC.[59] On its side, the Defence in many cases focuses not on the crimes, or on not just the crimes, but instead on the larger causes of the conflict and the responsibility of the different parties.[60] In the prosecution of Radovan Karadžić, for example, the Defence called Momčilo Krajišnik to testify, in part, that the conflict in Bosnia was caused by the Bosnian Muslims and Croats. Krajišnik testified that '[t]he institutions of the Serb people were in fact formed to protect the constitutional framework and the rights of the Serb people from unconstitutional acts of Muslims and Croats'.[61] This background information makes its way into the judgments, which invariably contain sections devoted to the history and causes of the conflict. Thus, although the modern international tribunals have jurisdiction only for jus in bello crimes and not jus ad bello violations, the causes of the conflict and the 'fault' of the different sides inevitably seeps into the cases and it becomes very difficult to draw a line between these subjects and the crimes at issue.

Further, although a tu quoque defence—which focuses on the crimes committed by the 'other side'—is not legally valid, the Defence also often finds ways to argue the relevance of such information relating to the activities of the other parties. In the Lubanga case, for example, the Appeals Chamber found in its decision on the scope of Rule 77 that evidence relating to the use by 'other individuals or groups', aside from [57] A Whiting, 'In International Criminal Prosecutions, Justice Delayed Can be Justice Delivered' (2009) 50 Harvard Journal of International Law 323.

[58] P Akhavan, 'Beyond Impunity: Can International Criminal Justice Prevent Future Atrocities?' (2001) 95 American Journal of International Law 7, 11.

[59] Lubanga trial judgment (n 11) paras 67–91.

[60] Some defendants appear to focus on making appeals to their domestic constituency rather than the judges. D Rieff, 'Milošević in Retrospect' (2006) 82 Virginia Quarterly Review 8, 13 ('[Milošević's] oral and written denunciations of the entire proceeding were directed at the public back home in Serbia and Montenegro rather than at the Court itself').

[61] V Šarić, 'Karadžić Witnesss Says Serbs "Provoked" into War', Institute for War & Peace Reporting, 15 November 2013.

the accused and his group, was relevant and should be disclosed.[62] The defence in the Limaj case, a prosecution of three members of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) for crimes committed against Serbs and Albanians suspected of collaborating with Serbs, focused in part on crimes committed by Serbs. One defence counsel started his opening statement by focusing on the crimes of the other side, arguing that 'the concerted and concentrated efforts of Serb forces were bent on a campaign against both the emergent KLA and the Kosovo Albanian people as a whole'.[63] The counsel conceded that he could not assert a tu quoque defence, but contended nevertheless that the actions of the Serbs were relevant:

> In raising these facts, the Defense does not of course intend to raise a defence of tu quoque. We readily acknowledge that that defence, that is to say that the other parties committed atrocities, is not a defence to a charge of war crimes or crimes against humanity in this Tribunal. It is, however, submitted that in order to do justice in this case, your Honours must at all times bear in mind the appalling reality of the human rights situation in Kosovo during the time period alleged in the indictment.[64]

In the Kupreškić case, a prosecution of members of Bosnian-Croat forces for an attack on Ahmići, the Trial Chamber ruled that evidence that Bosnian Muslims may have also committed crimes was irrelevant to the extent it supported a tu quoque defence, but could be relevant as context evidence, to explain the behaviour of the accused, or to rebut the Prosecution's allegations that Bosnian-Croat forces committed widespread or systematic crimes.[65]

Thus, given the nature of the cases prosecuted at the international tribunals, the scope of potentially relevant information can be vast. In addition to information about the alleged crimes and perpetrators themselves, the Prosecution must consider whether evidence relating to the causes of the conflict, the social and political context and background of the alleged events, and the actions of other groups might also somehow be relevant and disclosable. In the ICC prosecution of Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain (Banda), a rebel leader in Sudan, for crimes allegedly committed on a single day in the context of an attack on an African Union Mission in Sudan, the defence sought access to nearly all of the materials confidentially submitted by the OTP in a case prosecuting the other side, namely in support of an arrest warrant for the President of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (Al Bashir). The Trial Chamber rejected the request, finding that the material was too remotely related to the charges against Banda and that disclosure would be extremely burdensome on the Prosecution, but the Appeals Chamber reversed, finding that the Trial Chamber had applied too restrictive a test under Rule 77 and should not have considered the burden on the Prosecution.[66] In the end, while the Prosecution may not have to disclose

[62] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Lubanga Dyilo against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber I of 18 January 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1433, AC, ICC, 11 July 2008, para. 82.

[63] Transcript, Limaj, IT-03-66-T, TC II, ICTY, 18 November 2004, 433. [64] Ibid., 435–6.

[65] Decision on Evidence of the Good Character of the Accused and the Defence of Tu Quoque, Kupreškić, IT-95-16-T, TC II, ICTY, 17 February 1999.

[66] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdallah Banda Abakeer Nurain and Mr Saleh Mohammed Jerbo Jamus against the Decision of Trial Chamber IV of 23 January 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Defence's

all of the materials sought, it will have to review the materials and disclose at least of a portion of the documents supporting the Al Bashir arrest warrant. Because the ICC will often investigate both sides of a conflict, each investigation will generate potentially relevant information for all other investigations within the situation (or even for situations in neighbouring countries), further complicating the disclosure obligation.

Moreover, the amount of information that the OTP collects or receives can be substantial. The ICTY has collected millions of documents, many of which are un-translated. Within this vast collection are entire archives of documents obtained by the ICTY. This creates enormous potential for inconsistencies among documents or statements that must be disclosed as 'exculpatory'. As noted earlier, the first Prosecutor of the ICC sought to address the difficulties of managing large amounts of information by conducting narrow and focused investigations. But the judges have repeatedly pushed the OTP to conduct broader and deeper investigations, and in many cases it is difficult for the Prosecution to control what evidence it receives. For example, before the ICC began investigating the Kenya cases, the Waki commission had already conducted an extensive investigation. It would have been impossible for the ICC to conduct its own investigation without receiving this information. In all of the investigations being conducted by the ICC, there are also parallel investigations and inquiries being conducted by governments, commissions of inquiry, international bodies, international and local NGOs, and journalists. It is in the interest of the investigations to receive materials from these groups, but the OTP must then manage security and disclosure with respect to all of these forms of information. The scope of the prosecution's disclosure obligation and the quantity of information it receives vastly complicates its task. The Defence and judges will have numerous opportunities to second-guess the prosecution's assessments about how far its disclosure obligations run and specific judgments about what information must be disclosed.

Further, what constitutes exculpatory information or information material to the Defence can be highly contentious. In the Karadžić case, the Prosecution at the end of the Defence case provided statements of three witnesses it wished to call in rebuttal.[67] The defence filed a disclosure violation motion, alleging that the statements contained exculpatory information and should have been disclosed years earlier.[68] In the end, the defence, the Prosecution, and the judges had three different assessments on whether the statements were in fact exculpatory. One of the statements was of Ramo Hodžić, a Bosnian Muslim in the Bratunac Municipality who was arrested and then exchanged for Serb prisoners.[69] The Defence claimed that this statement was entirely exculpatory because it showed that not all of the Bosnian Muslims were killed by the Serbs.[70] The Prosecution responded that nothing in the statement was exculpatory because the Prosecution's case was always that some Bosnian Muslims were killed and others were deported as part of the ethnic cleansing campaign in Bratunac, and that therefore the Request for Disclosure of Documents in the Possession of the Office of the Prosecutor', Banda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-501, TC IV, ICC, 28 August 2013.

[67] Decision on Accused's Eighty-Ninth and Ninetieth Disclosure Violation Motions, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, TC III, ICTY, 16 April 2014, para. 6.

[68] Ibid., para. 7. [69] Ibid., para. 8. [70] Id.

witness's statement was entirely inculpatory (which is why the prosecution sought to call him in rebuttal).[71] The judges agreed that the deportation of the witness was not exculpatory, but the fact that the witness was not mistreated during his detention was, even though the Prosecution alleged only that some of the prisoners were abused, but not all of them.[72] Thus there was no agreement on whether the statement was exculpatory at all and if it was, how it might be exculpatory. This illustrates nicely how determinations about disclosure can often require judgment calls, about which there will be differing views. At what point does a witness's statement or a document contradict the Prosecution's case? What if a witness is inconsistent with another witness only on minor details? If the Prosecution's case is not categorical, i.e. does not allege that all members of a particular group were targeted, then are statements showing that some members of the group were spared exculpatory? These are just some of the many difficult and highly contextual determinations that will inevitably become the subject of litigation.

The situation is even more complicated because the Prosecution's understanding of the evidence and its own case, as well as the defence case, is not static but is instead highly dynamic.[73] Accordingly, its view of what is exculpatory or relevant will inevitably evolve during the course of the case. It is not to say necessarily that fundamental questions about core criminal responsibility shift dramatically after charges are brought against a suspect. But it is in the nature of litigation, and in many ways its purpose, that as a case unfolds and heads to trial, and even during trial, issues are further refined and honed. Key witnesses must come to court to testify, rather than simply having their statements admitted into evidence, because it is thought that the process of testifying in court, under oath, in the presence of the accused, and with cross-examination will more likely result in more reliable and precise evidence. As the defence challenges evidence and presents its witnesses, the Prosecution's view of the evidence may develop. That is all true in domestic criminal litigation, but the potential for refinement in understanding over time is even greater in international criminal prosecutions. As already noted, the crimes at issue are enormously complex—often involving the participation of numerous actors and entities across time and space—and stem from complicated and layered trends in society. In addition, the access to information by international tribunals is ordinarily substantially lower than it is for domestic investigators and prosecutors, particularly in the short term.[74] The Prosecution simply does not have the powers to access information—through witness interviews, subpoenas, searches, surveillance, or electronic interception—that domestic investigators ordinarily do. Thus while it may receive lots of information, it may not always receive, at least not immediately, the best information that would allow it to gain a complete understanding of events. Moreover, the OTP is necessarily operating in 'foreign' territory, that is, in an environment that is both geographically and culturally removed from the Court itself. As the OTP investigates, it must learn how language and cultural norms affect what information means and how it should be interpreted. It may, as happened at the ICTY, receive vast amounts of information that is in a non-working language of the Court. Because of the volume of information, it may be impossible to translate all of it in its entirety, but the Prosecution will nonetheless be responsible for reviewing it for disclosure purposes, making mistakes or disputes about disclosure inevitable.

[71] Ibid., paras 10–11. [72] Ibid., para. 17.

[73] A Whiting, 'Dynamic Investigative Practice at the International Criminal Court' (2013) 76 Law & Contemporary Problems 163.

[74] See Whiting (n 57).

In addition, the defence has no obligation to disclose its case to the Prosecution before trial or even during the Prosecution's case, and in many cases it will not necessarily fully know its case until the prosecution case is developed and revealed. Although most lines of defence can be anticipated by the Prosecution, there are some defences or (more likely) aspects of defences that may be unexpected. This further hinders the Prosecution's ability to assess what it must disclose. Thus because of the nature of litigation, the complexity of the cases at the ICC, the prosecution's (evolving) access to information, and the Defence's right to remain silent about its case, the Prosecution's understanding of the information in its possession will continually be in some state of flux.

It is not difficult to see how the dynamic nature of international criminal investigations affects disclosure. As the Prosecution reviews materials before the charging decision and even after charging, it continually gains a deeper understanding of the information in its possession and the events being investigated. As it learns and focuses more, it must continually re-review information that it has already reviewed for disclosure, even as more information is coming in (from the principal investigation as well as other investigations within the situation). This continual review increases the chance for mistakes and differing judgments, particularly at the margins. In addition, the cases are all extremely high profile and politically charged in the regions from which they derive. The judges will often (quite properly) feel enormous pressure to ensure that the cases are both fair and appear fair to the accused. In some instances, this may cause them to err on the side of providing more disclosure to the defence than is strictly required, causing the potential for a fissure between the rules as written and those as applied.

Aside from the nature of the cases themselves at the ICC, there are aspects of the institution that also make disclosure challenging. First, it is well known that resources at all of the international tribunals, including the ICC, are very limited.[75] Particularly if the OTP collects large quantities of information, it can be challenging to devote sufficient resources to conduct continual, ongoing disclosure reviews (and to be clear, the disclosure obligations require the prosecution to review its vast materials again and again). Second, the tribunals by their very nature bring together lawyers, investigators, and judges from a range of jurisdictions and practices. They will inevitably have varying understandings and experiences about how disclosure should be effectuated and what kinds of evidence might be considered relevant or exculpatory. Third, disclosure can become a litigation tactic in the hands of the parties, which may be familiar to judges from certain common-law countries but less familiar to judges from elsewhere.

[75] Ibid., 174–9.

Prosecutors are under enormous pressure to bring successful cases with few tools and resources, and may at times interpret the disclosure rules in ways to limit disclosure in the hope of gaining a tactical advantage. In the prosecution of Radislav Krstić, the Prosecution did not disclose a damning intercept of the accused until using it to cross-examine him after he testified. The Trial Chamber excluded the evidence, and the Appeals Chamber agreed with the Defence that it constituted 'sharp practice' by the Prosecution but declined to impose any sanctions.[76]

As for defence counsel, they are advocates and will often be inclined by their roles to argue that nearly all information in the Prosecution's possession should be disclosed (though at the same time arguing against having too much information dumped on them), and that nearly all failures to disclose information have prejudiced the defence. Further, it can be a tactic for the defence to focus on the legitimacy of the tribunal itself and the procedures of the prosecution and the court rather than on the charges themselves.[77] In the Karadžić case, for example, the legal adviser to the accused has filed continual motions (over 92) alleging failures to disclose exculpatory information, contending each time that the accused suffered prejudice as a result of the failure to disclose. The Trial Chamber has regularly found either that the Prosecution did not violate the disclosure rules or, if it did, that the defence suffered no prejudice.[78] It can be inferred from the frequency and nature of the legal adviser's motions that they are designed primarily for their publicity value, with little expectation that they will succeed in court. For judges who are familiar with litigation, particularly in common-law countries, these tactics will be neither surprising nor difficult to manage. But judges who lack this familiarity may find it less easy to assess the arguments of the parties and their relative merits.

40.4 Conclusion

Combining the breadth of the disclosure rules, the ambiguity of these rules at the margins, the scope and nature of the cases at the ICC, and the features of the institution itself, it is easy to see how disclosure disputes and difficulties will likely be a regular feature of international criminal cases. Inevitably, particularly in cases involving large amounts of material, the Prosecution will make judgment calls that will be disputed by the defence and, in some cases, criticized by the judges. Even with respect to that material about which all parties might later agree should be disclosed, it will be difficult to achieve 100% compliance. Given the nature of the task and the institutional

[76] Judgment of the Appeals Chamber, Krstić, IT-98-33-A, AC, ICTY, 19 April 2004, paras 172–5.

[77] E Suljagić, 'Justice Squandered? The Trial of Slobodan Milošević' in E Lutz and C Reiger (eds), Prosecuting Heads of State (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2009) 176, 183.

[78] See e.g. Decision on Accused's Ninety-First Disclosure Violation Motion, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, TC III, ICTY, 7 May 2014. In their chapter, Khan and Buisman complain that in many instances the prosecution provided 'tardy' disclosure in the Karadžić case, but at the same time they concede that the Trial Chamber almost always found no prejudice to the Defence because either the Defence received the information in time to use it or the information was cumulative. Khan and Buisman, Chapter 41, this volume. Where the Defence is not prejudiced, disclosure has worked, achieving its objectives of ensuring that the Defence receives the information in time to use it. Khan and Buisman suggest that there may also be a cumulative effect, but that has not been substantiated.

limitations, some missed or late disclosure will, unfortunately, be inevitable in these complex international cases. Disclosure is not a topic that will 'go away' or be solved, but will instead be a recurring issue at the tribunals.

Where does this lead us? It does not lead to the conclusion that the prosecution may step back from its disclosure commitments or engage in 'sharp practices' with regard to these obligations. Proper disclosure is key to the fairness and legitimacy of the process and the institution, and every reasonable effort should be made to ensure that it is done. In fact, the analysis of disclosure challenges in this chapter should lead to the conclusion that more not less must be done to meet these challenges. In sum, disclosure must be made central to the work of the institution and must be better managed by all parties.

This effort must, of course, start with the Prosecution. There has been exhaustive discussion about why prosecutors fail in their disclosure obligations, but the focus is generally on the individual prosecutors themselves: are they intentionally or negligently failing in their disclosure obligations? Are prosecutors, as advocates, capable of effectuating fair and complete disclosure? What steps could be taken to ensure better compliance? These are important questions, but there is a systemic dimension as well. It is inevitable that, as a professional matter, disclosure will be often viewed as a secondary obligation by individual prosecutors and investigators. They will see their first task as investigating and prosecuting the crimes. Compared to this work, disclosure can feel like drudgery, often assigned to junior lawyers or shared among all the lawyers on the team who do their best to make time for the work after their investigation tasks are done. That is not to say that prosecutors do not take disclosure seriously, or think it is unimportant. Nothing could be further from the truth, and the reality is that investigators and prosecutors devote staggering resources to the process of disclosure. But there is no disclosure without there first being an investigation, and how disclosure is managed on a team can be a challenge because it is necessary to have the lawyers who are involved in the investigation (and who are the busiest because of the demands of the investigation) working on disclosure, as they will be the ones with the best ability to assess what information should be disclosed.

It is thus an office responsibility, as opposed to solely the responsibility of individual prosecutors, to ensure that disclosure is prioritized. The OTP must therefore find a way to ensure that sufficient resources are dedicated to the work of disclosure and that the core prosecution team is involved in managing and guiding the disclosure. To this end, it will be important to have a senior person focused on information management and disclosure, and lawyers whose first priority is disclosure but who also have an intimate familiarity with the workings of the case. In other words, the OTP must focus on devising an adequate disclosure system to manage all of the disclosure challenges outlined in this chapter, in addition to ensuring that individual prosecutors are properly trained and motivated to do their work. Elevating the status of the disclosure obligation within the institution and developing a systematic approach to disclosure will also ensure that there is a consistent approach to the work across all cases.

Further, the judges will need to develop a nuanced understanding of the disclosure obligations and challenges facing the prosecution. The point is not for the judges to ease up on the Prosecution, but rather to help manage the disclosure challenges to ensure that the Defence is given sufficient time, resources, and tools to fulfil its obligations (which, at the end of the day, is the whole reason disclosure is important). The pre-trial process should be structured to give the prosecution time to best meet its obligations, and then when problems do arise, the judges must be willing to consider solutions, such as granting the defence additional time or re-calling witnesses, to protect the rights of the accused. The judges will have to accept that it will be impossible to 'finish' or 'complete' disclosure by some imposed date; while the core of the disclosure can be provided in advance, it is inevitable in these cases that there will continue to be some disclosure provided on a 'rolling basis' as the Prosecution continues to refine its understanding of its case and the defence case, and continues to re-review and assess its information.[79] In other words, the judges should realize that perfection is unlikely to be achieved in these cases and that it will be a task of the court and the parties to manage the difficulties that arise. In addition, the judges should recognize that the confirmation process and the trial are distinct events, and that the prosecution's investigation will necessarily continue after confirmation.[80] Accordingly, the Prosecution should be required to provide the necessary disclosure for the confirmation hearing in advance of that event, and then the disclosure required for trial between the confirmation decision and the beginning of trial. The scheme set forth in the Rome Statute contemplates that the Prosecution may rely on different evidence at confirmation and at trial, and therefore the disclosure processes should be kept separate. Although many judges and the Defence repeatedly acknowledge that the confirmation process is not to be a 'mini-trial', more and more the push is to make it precisely that and to have the Prosecution's case finalized, fully disclosed, and fully litigated by confirmation. The impetus is contrary to the way the Statute is designed and is not in the interest of the mission of the Court.[81]

Further, the judges should avoid adding to the disclosure burdens on the prosecution. In some cases, the judges have insisted that the Prosecution produce an 'in-depth analysis chart', or 'IDAC' for short, linking each piece of evidence to each element of each crime charged. These charts, which are an invention of the ICC and did not exist at the ad hoc tribunals, are extremely burdensome on the Prosecution and are of very little use to the defence and the judges.[82] Evidence in a criminal case does not come in neat, little packets that can be simply linked to individual elements. Rather, the evidence supporting the elements of crimes charged is usually based on lots of pieces put together or inferences drawn from long transcripts or documents. Accordingly, when the Prosecution has attempted to produce an IDAC they have become extremely unwieldy and difficult to use.[83] The primary interest of the Defence in insisting on an IDAC seems to be to attempt to freeze or lock-in the evidence before the confirmation hearing or trial. But these cases and the litigation process require that there be some [79] See Prosecution's Response to Karadžić's Motion to Set Deadlines for Disclosure, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-PT, TC III, ICTY, 17 September 2009 (providing defence for practice at ICTY to allow ongoing disclosure before and during trial).

[80] Whiting (n 73). [81] Id.

[82] Transcript, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-T-18-ENG CT WT, TC V, ICC, 12 June 2012, 38–42 (setting forth objections to IDAC).

[83] Ibid., 40.

flexibility in how the evidence develops and is analysed, so long as the Defence has sufficient notice of the case against the accused and the core of the evidence supporting the charges. Rather than the charts, the judges should request a pre-confirmation or pre-trial brief (or a footnoted document containing the charges) in which the prosecution sets forth its theory of the case with the key evidence supporting the charges. The focus, therefore, should be on providing sufficient notice to the Defence, not trying to lock the Prosecution in on each single piece of evidence that might support each element in the case.

At the end of the day, there is no question that the prosecution can always do better when it comes to disclosure, and making it a priority within the institution will go a long way towards accomplishing that goal. But, given the challenges of the cases and the institution, it must also be understood that disclosure is a problem that will likely always be with us and must be managed by the parties and the judges.

41

Sitting on Evidence?

Systemic Failings in the ICC Disclosure Regime—Time for Reform

Karim A A Khan QC and Caroline Buisman

41.1 Introduction

After three years of battling charges levelled against him by the Prosecutor of the ICC, 11 March 2013 was a good day for Ambassador Francis Kirimi Muthaura. This was the day the Prosecutor of the ICC, Fatou Bensouda, sought leave of the Trial Chamber to withdraw the charges against him.[1] The principal reason for withdrawing that case was the Prosecutor's decision to drop the key Prosecution witness (witness 4) in its case against Ambassador Muthaura because the witness had recanted a crucial part of his evidence and, in other key respects, the Prosecutor accepted that he had lied.[2]

This information was not new to the Prosecution. The asylum application became available to the Prosecution more than one year before the confirmation hearing. If this information had been disclosed to the Defence, as it ought to have been, there was every prospect that the Prosecution's case would never have been confirmed.[3] Witness 4 had been the only Prosecution witness supporting key meetings alleged by the Prosecution upon which the charges were based. In addition, the Defence had

* Karim A A Khan QC is a barrister and member of Temple Garden Chambers (London, UK). Karim's specializations include international criminal law and human rights law. He has been involved in cases before the ICC, ICTY, SCSL, ICTR, ECCC, and STL. At the ICC he has been appointed or is currently serving as lead counsel for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo (CAR); Bahar Idriss Abu Garda, Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain, and Saleh Mohammed Jerbo Jamus (Darfur, Sudan); and Ambassador Francis Kirimi Muthaura and H E William S Ruto (Republic of Kenya).

 Dr Caroline Buisman is specialized in international criminal law and human rights law. She has been involved in cases before the ICC, ICTY, SCSL, and ICTR. She is currently serving as associate counsel for Joshua Arap Sang (Kenya I) and Germain Katanga (DRC), both tried before the ICC. She has various publications, as well as a PhD in international criminal law. She is a member of the New York Bar (USA).

[1] Statement by ICC Prosecutor on the Notice to withdraw charges against Mr Muthaura (11 March 2013) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/Pages/OTP-statement-11-03-2013.aspx> accessed 22 June 2014; Prosecution notification of withdrawal of the charges against Francis Kirimi Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-687, OTP, ICC, 11 March 2013, para. 1.

[2] Ibid. See also Public redacted version of the 25 February 2013 Consolidated Prosecution response to the Defence applications under Art 64 of the Statute to refer the confirmation decision back to the Pre-Trial Chamber, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-664-Red2, OTP, ICC, 26 February 2013, para. 41.

[3] Ibid., paras 7–9, 41, and 44–6.

been vociferous in maintaining that the account of witness 4 was riddled with contradictions and was wholly unreliable.

This case illustrates that late, inadequate, or non-disclosure of relevant material can have catastrophic consequences for a suspect or accused. A case that should not have passed first muster, never mind confirmation, was committed for trial. This case ended well for Ambassador Muthaura, because the Trial Chamber granted the Prosecutor's request for withdrawal of the charges against him.[4] However, this cannot disguise serious flaws and inadequacies in the OTP's internal mechanisms—and in fundamentally deficient reviewing decisions that had an obviously detrimental impact on the rights of an accused. The withdrawal before the Trial Chamber was more than a year after the Pre-Trial Chamber had rendered its confirmation decision.[5] Even more notably, it came two years after key material, upon which withdrawal was predicated, had come into the hands of the Prosecution. During this time, Ambassador Muthaura and his family had suffered significant mental stress and wasted considerable time and resources on preparing a defence against the allegations made against him—allegations that turned out to be false. On any fair review, the case discloses significant weaknesses that, if left unresolved, could eventually lead to a miscarriage of justice before the ICC. Indeed, if to bring a false case based upon false witnesses is the litmus test, a miscarriage of justice occurred, despite the eventual withdrawal of charges. An innocent man was put through the hassle, inconvenience, and expense of defending himself at confirmation and on, well into the trial stage at the ICC. This speaks nothing of the opprobrium and acute anguish the accused faced due to the nature of the charges. All stakeholders—victims, accused persons, and the international community-at-large—have a right to expect better from the OTP.

The case against Ambassador Muthaura clearly demonstrates the importance of full and timely disclosure to the Defence of all information relevant to the case. More specifically, the Defence is entitled to receive, in a timely manner, all items available to the Prosecution that are incriminatory, potentially exculpatory, or material to the preparation of the Defence. The right to full and timely disclosure is one of the most fundamental rights of suspects and accused persons before the ICC. It is embodied in multiple provisions in the Rome Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, most notably Article 67 of the Rome Statute. Regrettably, this is also the most violated right of suspects and accused persons. The weaknesses identified in the case of Ambassador Muthaura are, unfortunately, not an isolated incident at the ICC. Complaints about late, inadequate, or non-disclosure are a recurrent theme in cases before the ICC, and very often these complaints are shown to be absolutely valid.

This chapter will examine the difficulties the defence has encountered as a result of late, inadequate, or non-disclosure of material relevant to the case. It will illustrate

[4] Decision on the withdrawal of charges against Mr Muthaura, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-696, TC V, ICC, 18 March 2013.

[5] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges Pursuant to Art 61(7)(a) and (b) of the Rome Statute, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-383-Red, PTC II, ICC, 23 January 2012.

these difficulties by citing multiple examples of disclosure irregularities, often experienced first-hand by one or both of the authors, having been involved in the defence of multiple defendants before the ICC. Drawing heavily on the authors' own experience before the ICC, this chapter will argue that the current disclosure regime of the ICC places an inordinate burden on limited Defence resources and improperly and unnecessarily constrains the ability of Defence teams to effectively and efficiently prepare for, and conduct the defence of the client. The authors make a number of proposals for improvement, which in their view would help resolve many of the problems faced today.

41.2 General Legal Principles

Disclosure is at the core of any criminal trial. Provided it is done properly, disclosure is one of the most important methods of guaranteeing a fair trial. Disclosure obligations on the Prosecution are intended to rectify the imbalance between the Prosecution and defence in terms of time and resources to investigate the case.

The right to full and timely disclosure follows from a number of fair trial rights explicitly incorporated in Article 67 of the Rome Statute, which embodies the rights of the accused. Apart from the general right to a fair trial, the most relevant provisions are Articles 67(1)(a) and 67(1)(b). Pursuant to Article 67(1)(a), an accused must 'be informed promptly and in detail of the nature, cause and content of the charge[s]' against him or her. Article 67(1)(b) embodies the right of an accused to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his or her defence. These rights can be respected only if the accused receives full and timely disclosure of all material that is relevant to the charges laid against him/her. There is no exact time by which such disclosure must take place to comply with these provisions. Nor does Article 67 provide any guidance on how many details must be disclosed to the Defence, although it does set out minimum key standards that must be observed. However, whether a violation of such rights has occurred is a fact-specific determination and will depend on the overall circumstances of the case, the importance and type of information concerned, as well as the stage of the proceedings.[6]

Two main categories of disclosure material can be distinguished: incriminatory information, on the one hand; and information which is exculpatory, or material to the preparation of the defence, on the other.

41.3 Incriminatory Information

The scope of the Prosecutor's duty to disclose incriminatory information depends on the stage of the proceedings. At the ICC, there are two stages of disclosure: pre-confirmation disclosure and post-confirmation disclosure.

[6] See e.g. Decision on Art 54(3)(e) Documents Identified as Potentially Exculpatory or Otherwise Material to the Defence's Preparation for the Confirmation Hearing, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-621, PTC I, ICC, 20 June 2008, paras 8, 65–6, 70, and 124–5.

41.3.1 Pre-confirmation disclosure

Pursuant to Article 61(3), within a reasonable time prior to the confirmation hearing, the Prosecution is required to provide the suspect with a copy of the document containing the charges (DCC), and to inform him or her of the evidence upon which it intends to rely for the purpose of the confirmation hearing. Pursuant to Rule 121(3), this should be done no later than 30 days before the date of the confirmation hearing. Amendments to the charges and the list of evidence, as well as additions to the list of evidence, must be provided to the suspect and Trial Chamber 15 days prior to the hearing at the latest.[7] This is also the deadline for the Defence to provide a list of evidence it wishes to present at the confirmation hearing.[8]

By comparison to the ICTY and ICTR, these are rather short deadlines. At these ad hoc tribunals, the Prosecutor is under an obligation to disclose to the defence the material it relied upon to obtain the indictment against the accused within 30 days of his or her initial appearance.[9] In practice, the Prosecution of the ICC reads Article 61(3) through the prism of Rule 121(3). By arguing that disclosure of all evidence to be relied upon, together with the DCC, 30 days before the confirmation hearing satisfies the obligation of timely disclosure, the Prosecution significantly hampers effective defence preparation and the material ability to effectively confront charges. It is submitted that the better view is that the OTP should disclose all incriminatory evidence it intends to rely upon and all evidence material to the preparation of the defence and/or exonerating at the earliest opportunity. The Defence can then start reviewing and preparing the case in good time before the confirmation hearing. It is submitted that Rule 121(3) would then apply—as originally intended—as a final cut-off point by which the Prosecution must nail its 'colours to the mast' and identify the evidence it actually wishes to rely upon at confirmation. Properly interpreted, Rule 121(3) should act as a cut-off point by which the Prosecution identifies the evidence it has already disclosed and which the Defence would have had adequate time to consider. It is suggested that it should no longer, in practice, be interpreted by the Prosecution as a licence to disclose its key evidence to the defence at the last minute.

That Rule 121(3) has been interpreted in this fashion by the Prosecution can hardly be denied. The initial appearance of Mr Abu Garda was held on 18 May 2009.[10] The Defence did not receive any disclosure material for more than three months after this date. It finally received disclosure in two parts: the first part on 24 August 2009,[11]

[7] See Rule 121(4) and (5) Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP) part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002).

[8] See Rule 121(6) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[9] Rule 66 of the ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence, IT/32/Rev 49, mandates that the prosecutor shall make available to the defence 'within thirty days of the initial appearance of the accused, copies of the supporting material which accompanied the indictment when confirmation was sought as well as all prior statements obtained by the Prosecutor from the accused'.

[10] This is largely based on the first author's own experience as lead counsel for Mr Abu Garda. For more details on the disclosure difficulties in this case, see K Khan QC and A Shah, 'Defensive Practices: Representing Clients before the International Criminal Court' (2014) 76 Law and Contemporary Problems 191, 201–3.

[11] Prosecution's Communication of Potentially Exonerating Evidence Disclosed to the Defence on 24 August 2009, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-65, OTC, ICC, 25 August 2009.

less than two months prior to the commencement of the confirmation hearing on 19 October 2009; and the second part of the material, which included revised versions of summaries of interview transcripts of six prosecution witnesses, on 14 September 2009,[12] a mere few days prior to the 30-day deadline. The DCC was disclosed on 10 September 2009.[13]

With its own deadline to file its list of evidence 15 days prior to the commencement of the confirmation hearing, the Defence, which only consists of 3 persons under the Court's legal aid regime at the confirmation stage,[14] had little more than a month and a half to analyse several thousands of pages of material while preparing for the confirmation hearing and conducting defence investigations. The Defence in the Abu Garda case had the added difficulty that it could not enter the state (Sudan) where the charged crimes were committed.[15] Following clear instructions from the Single Judge that such late disclosure should not be repeated, the defence received much timelier disclosure in the related case of Banda and Jerbo.[16] Banda and Jerbo involved the same facts and much of the same disclosure material as Abu Garda.[17]

Also, in the Kenya I and II cases, the Single Judge was keen to avoid disclosure by either party at the final deadline under the Rules. With a view 'to guaranteeing the fairness and expeditiousness of the disclosure proceedings',[18] the Single Judge issued a disclosure calendar establishing specific disclosure deadlines of evidentiary materials for both parties which were much earlier than the deadlines under Rule 121.[19] The learned Single Judge emphasized that both parties were to strictly comply with their disclosure deadlines.[20]

Despite the clear order of the learned Single Judge, a large amount of disclosure material was again received by the defence at the very last minute—precisely on the 30-day deadline detailed in Rule 121(3), to be exact. On this date, the Defence received [12] Prosecution's Communication of Incriminating Evidence Disclosed to the Defence on 14 and 17 September 2009, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-112, OTP, ICC, 18 September 2009.

[13] Public Redacted Version of Prosecution's 'Document Containing the Charges Submitted Pursuant to Article 61(3) of the Statute' filed on 10 September 2009, Abu Garda, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-02/09-91-Red, OTP, ICC, 24 September 2009.

[14] Counsel, a legal assistant, and a case manager.

[15] Defence Request for a Temporary Stay of Proceedings, Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-274, Defence teams of Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain and Saleh Mohammed Jerbo Jamus, 6 January 2012.

[16] ICC-02/05-03/09.

[17] Transcript of Status Conference, Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-T-5-ENG ET WT, PTC I, ICC, 23 June 2010, 14.

[18] Decision on the 'Prosecution's application requesting disclosure after a final resolution of the Government of Kenya's admissibility challenge' and Establishing a Calendar for Disclosure between the Parties, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-62, PTC II, ICC, 20 April 2011, para. 15.

[19] Ibid.

[20] She denied a Prosecutor's request for an extension of one of the disclosure deadlines but granted additional time to submit proposed Art 81(2) and 81(4) redactions. See Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application for Extension of Time Limit for Disclosure', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-82, PTC II, ICC, 10 May 2011. Similarly, she granted the defence additional time to propose redactions. See Decision on the 'Defence's Application for Extension of Time to Submit Properly Justified Proposals for Redactions', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-215, PTC II, ICC, 21 July 2011.

the DCC from the prosecution,[21] as well as an 'in-depth analysis chart' counting several thousands of pages, which was intended to assist the Defence and judges to better comprehend the prosecution's theory of the case.[22] In addition, the Defence in Kenya I and II received thousands of pages of allegedly incriminating material, including over a thousand pages of transcripts of witness interviews.[23] This clearly gave the Defence too little time to undertake a proper analysis of the late disclosure, particularly while actively preparing for the confirmation hearing itself and continuing defence investigations based on earlier disclosure, including interviewing witnesses.

To exacerbate matters, the Single Judge in Kenya I imposed a deadline on the defence teams to indicate who, if anyone, they intended to call to testify. This deadline was 15 days after the promulgation of the order. The Defence was still attempting to review and absorb massive amounts of allegedly incriminating material at this time. Most importantly, the defence had not yet received the DCC and the totality of the evidence.[24] Yet it was required to announce its own witnesses. The Defence effectively suggested that this was to put the proverbial 'cart before the horse' and requested an extension of this deadline. A week's extension was granted. This was still before the defence received the DCC and the last thousand or so pages of disclosure material.[25] The Single Judge's reasoning was revealing:[26]

> [T]he Defence was expected to progressively prepare its case upon receipt of the relevant piece of evidence in accordance with the Calendar for Disclosure. If, conversely, [21] Prosecution's Submissions on the 'Order to the Prosecutor to File a Proposed New Redacted Version of the Art 58 Application (ICC-01/09-01/11-157)', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-165-Red, PTC II, ICC, 7 July 2011, para. 19 (indicating that the DCC will be filed on 1 August and not before); Public with Public Annex A and Confidential Annex B Prosecution's Document Containing the Charges and List of Evidence submitted pursuant to Art 61(3) and Rule 121(3), Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, OTP, ICC, ICC-01/09-01/11-242, 2 August 2011.

[22] Corrigendum to Decision on the Defences' Requests for a Compliance Order in regard to Decision 'ICC-01/09-02/11-48', Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-167-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 12 July 2011, in particular paras 20 and 21; Decision on the Defence Requests in Relation to the Submission of a Comprehensive In-Depth Analysis Chart, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-191, PTC II, ICC, 13 July 2011; Prosecution's submission of comprehensive in-depth analysis chart of evidence included in the list of evidence, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, PTC II, ICC, ICC-01/09-01/11-241, 1 August 2011.

[23] Prosecution's Document Containing the Charges, List of Evidence and Comprehensive In-Depth Analysis Chart of Evidence Included in the List of Evidence Submitted Pursuant to Art 61(3) and Rule 121(3), Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-257, OTP, ICC, 19 August 2011; Prosecution's Communication to the Defence of Incriminating Evidence pursuant to Art 61(3)(b), Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-237, OTP, ICC, 1 August 2011.

[24] Decision Requesting the Parties to Submit Information for the Preparation of the Confirmation of Charges Hearing, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-153, PTC II, ICC, 29 June 2011.

[25] Defence Application for Extension of Time to Submit Information on Viva Voce Witnesses to be Called at the Confirmation Hearing, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-168, Defence, 8 July 2011, paras 12 and 13; Decision on the Defence Application of Time to Submit Information on Viva Voce Witnesses to be Called at the Confirmation Hearing, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-176, PTC II, ICC, 11 July 2011.

[26] Decision on the Defence Application of Time to Submit Information on Viva Voce Witnesses to be Called at the Confirmation Hearing, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 25) para. 17.

> the Defence was to wait until the disclosure of the Prosecutor's evidence is finalized—or even until the DCC is filed—to start preparing their case, the existence of intermediate deadlines within the context of the disclosure proceedings would serve a very limited purpose, if at all.

Yet, it goes against all principles of fairness to ask the Defence to disclose its case and the witnesses it intends to rely on before it is fully informed of the charges against the suspect. Clearly, the Defence should not have been put in that position until it had adequate time to absorb the thousands of pages of disclosure material; but most importantly, until it had received the DCC. The Single Judge herself had previously acknowledged that the importance of the DCC should not be underestimated and had a direct bearing on the defence's ability to prepare adequately for the confirmation hearing.[27] In light of these issues, it is fair to conclude that the confirmation proceedings were rushed through, giving the Defence inadequate preparation time, which was unfair.

In the event that the Prosecution fails to abide by its disclosure obligations, the defence may address itself to the Pre-Trial Chamber, which may issue disclosure orders to the Prosecution. The Pre-Trial Chamber may also issue such orders proprio motu.[28] However, the problem both in Kenya I and II was that the prosecution had not, strictly speaking, violated its disclosure obligations under the Rules (as opposed to the principles underlying the Statute). Defence counsel for Ambassador Muthaura submitted that the Pre-Trial Chamber should not:

> [B]e hamstrung or handcuffed to a rigid rule that, in all cases, 30 days before the [confirmation] hearing is consistent with the obligations or consistent with the rights of the suspect to have adequate time and facilities and also a reasonable time before the hearing to get all the evidence.[29]

However, though the Single Judge in Kenya I and II encouraged 'the parties to fulfill their disclosure obligations as soon as practicable and not only on the date when the deadline as provided by the statutory documents expire[d]',[30] and set strict disclosure deadlines, she still permitted the Prosecution to disclose significant material to the Defence very late in the day and in a manner that was hardly conducive to an effective confirmation hearing, in which the Defence could effectively challenge the Prosecution's case.

[27] Decision on the 'Prosecution's Request for Extension of Page Limit for the Document Containing the Charges', Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-154, PTC II, ICC, 1 July 2011, para. 5.

[28] This is explicitly allowed under Rule 121(1) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. See also Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application Requesting Disclosure after a Final Resolution of the Government of Kenya's Admissibility Challenge' and Establishing a Calendar for Disclosure Between the Parties, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang (n 18) para. 15.

[29] Transcript of Status Conference, Muthaura, Kenyatta and Ali, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-T-2-ENG ET WT, PTC II, ICC, 18 April 2011, 13, lines 14–20.

[30] Decision Setting the Regime for Evidence Disclosure and Other Related Matters, Ruto, Kosgey and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-44, PTC II, ICC, 6 April 2011, para. 10. In that same paragraph, the Single Judge also expressed the view that 'the deadlines established by rule 121 of the Rules are only indicative of the minimum time limits that a party can avail itself to comply with its disclosure obligations'.

Compounding difficulties caused by how the deadlines in the Rules are interpreted is the fact that there is not necessarily a systematic approach among different Pre-Trial Chambers to the issue of disclosure. This is problematic because, if the bulk of disclosure takes place at, or close to, the 30-day final deadline, the defence is placed in a very difficult position to meet its own deadline 15 days later.[31]

A further problem is that the Prosecutor is not under an obligation to submit the entirety of the material in her possession which is relevant to the charges. The prosecutor may rely upon summaries and redacted statements at confirmation. At this stage of proceedings, the prosecutor must support 'each charge with sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that the person committed the crime charged' (Article 61(5) of the Rome Statute). Thus, the scope of disclosure for confirmation hearing differs from that pertaining at trial. The standard of proof at the confirmation stage is 'substantial grounds to believe', while the standard at trial is 'beyond reasonable doubt'. Whilst the Prosecution cannot withhold incriminatory evidence to later ambush the defence or mislead it to prepare its case on a false basis, it may disclose summaries of such evidence, including anonymous statements, anonymous interviews, and anonymous summaries pursuant to Article 61(5) of the Rome Statute. The Prosecutor relies heavily on this provision.[32] Such anonymous summaries tend to be very succinct. Both in the Katanga and Kenya I and II confirmation proceedings, such summaries were often no longer than one page. This makes it extremely difficult, if not practically impossible, for the Defence to conduct proper investigations in preparation of the confirmation hearing.

This is highly unsatisfactory, whilst acknowledging that the confirmation hearing is not intended to be a 'mini-trial'[33] but merely as a means to protect suspects against 'wrongful and wholly unfounded charges'.[34] Out of 16 cases before the ICC, 4 were not confirmed, 1 was withdrawn before trial and should not have been confirmed,[35] and 2 have been sent back for a second confirmation hearing, one of which was accompanied by precise instructions from the Pre-Trial Chamber for the Prosecutor to implement and rectify deficiencies in investigations.[36] Confirmation hearings must be meaningful and effective. This, in turn, requires timely prosecution disclosure which gives the Defence time to read and digest prosecution evidence and to conduct certain investigations. Late disclosure cannot become—or appear to become—a deliberate trial tactic of the Prosecution so as to impede the defence and to thwart the very purpose of the confirmation process—which is to sieve out 'wrong cases' and avoid the [32] See e.g. Public redacted version of the 'Decision on the Use of Summaries of the Statements of Witnesses 267 and 243' issued on 3 April 2008, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-644, PTC I, ICC, 25 June 2008, authorizing the use of summaries for witnesses 267 and 243.

[31] See further Khan and Shah (n 10) 201–4.

[33] Decision on the confirmation of charges, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-717, PTC I, ICC, 30 September 2008, para. 64.

[34] Ibid., para. 63.

[35] The case against Ambassador Francis Kirimi Muthaura. See introduction.

[36] See Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges pursuant to article 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, Gbagbo, Situation in Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-432, PTC I, ICC, 3 June 2013, paras 15, 37, and 42–4.

danger of an accused being compelled to defend himself against 'wrongful and wholly unfounded charges'.

41.3.2 Post-confirmation disclosure

If and when a charge is confirmed and the suspect (now formally designated an 'accused') is committed to trial, the Trial Chamber to which the case is assigned is under an obligation to 'provide for disclosure of documents or information not previously disclosed, sufficiently in advance of the commencement of the trial to enable adequate preparation for trial' (Article 64(3)(c)).

The incriminating material that must be disclosed is described in Rule 76 of the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence. This rule imposes an obligation upon the Prosecutor to disclose to the Defence 'the names of witnesses whom the Prosecutor intends to call to testify and copies of any prior statements made by those witnesses'. Thereafter, the Prosecutor must 'advise the defence of the names of any additional prosecution witnesses and provide copies of their statements when the decision is made to call those witnesses'.

The Appeals Chamber gave a broad interpretation to 'prior statements' under Rule 76, requiring the Prosecutor to disclose any prior statements, irrespective of the form in which they are recorded.[37] The prosecutor does not have a duty to produce a signed written record pursuant to Rule 111 if she has produced an audio- or video-recording pursuant to Rule 112.[38] The Prosecutor must produce and disclose a transcript if she opts for the latter.[39] For the Defence, it would be significantly more useful to have both a statement and the transcripts of an audio-recording because the latter can be very voluminous, easily amounting to several hundreds of pages per witness. These interviews are not organized per topic and sometimes can be quite dense and unstructured; many appear to the Defence to be contradictory, incoherent, and rather difficult to follow.[40] At least a summary of the anticipated testimony, structured topic-by-topic and chronologically, would be of great assistance to defence investigations.

Pursuant to Article 64(3)(c), all incriminating material must be disclosed 'sufficiently in advance' of the trial. The specific deadline is set by the Chamber with conduct of the case. The Prosecutor is, however, not prevented from disclosing further evidence after any deadline has passed. Indeed, pursuant to Rule 84, the Trial Chamber shall 'make any necessary orders for the disclosure of documents or information not previously disclosed and for the production of additional evidence'. To [37] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber IV of 12 September 2011 entitled 'Reasons for the Order on Translation of Witness Statements (ICC-02/05-03/09-199) and Additional Instructions on Translation', Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-295, AC, ICC, 17 February 2012, para. 23.

[38] Ibid., paras 26–8. This, of course, does not give the Prosecutor a right to withhold such a written statement if it in fact exists.

[39] See e.g. Decision on the 'Prosecution's Urgent Application to Be Permitted to Present as Incriminating Evidence Transcripts and Translations of Videos and Video DRC-OTP-1042-0006 pursuant to Regulation 35 and Request for Redactions (ICC-01/04-01/07-1260)', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1336, TC II, ICC, 27 July 2009, paras 10–13.

[40] This is based on the authors' personal experience.

avoid any delays to the start of the trial, 'any such orders shall include strict time limits which shall be kept under review by the Trial Chamber'.

Rule 84 recognizes that disclosure is a continuing process. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber determined that the Prosecution is allowed to carry on investigating after the confirmation hearing and disclose any new evidence obtained.[41] The Appeals Chamber nonetheless held that, 'ideally, it would be desirable for the investigation to be complete by the time of the confirmation hearing'.[42] It seems that perhaps firmer injunctions are needed to ensure that the prosecution starts taking its pre-trial disclosure obligations and pre-confirmation investigation responsibilities more seriously. Timely disclosure of the 'meat' of the Prosecution's case should be the norm, not the exception. Regrettably, it seems that the prevailing norm is that the evidence most directly implicating a suspect is the very last to be disclosed to the Defence, usually no earlier than 30 days before the confirmation of charges hearing itself. It also seems that investigations conducted by the prosecution post-confirmation may render largely redundant investigations conducted by the defence pre-confirmation. This is because the case at trial can be based upon significantly new witnesses, whose accounts were never disclosed—never mind confronted and challenged by the defence—at the confirmation stage.[43]

It goes without saying that the Defence suffers real prejudice from this shift in approach as a result of inadequate preparation time. It also means it has wasted considerable time and resources in preparing for the confirmation hearing and challenging evidence which will not be relied upon in the ultimate determination of the guilt or innocence of the accused persons.

The trial commencement dates of the Kenya I and Kenya II trials have been vacated numerous times because of late disclosure and new evidence on the eve of trial. In its last decision postponing the commencement of the Kenya I trial, the Chamber said it was 'deeply concerned by both the significant volume of late disclosure in this case and the fact that at this late date, additional evidence still remains to be disclosed to the Defence'.[44] The Chamber recalled its previous decision postponing the earlier trial date, in which it found that 'the disclosure of a large amount of materials close to

[41] Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006, paras 49–57.

[42] Ibid., para. 54.

[43] Public Redacted Version of 'Defence Application pursuant to Art 64(4) for an order to refer back to Pre-Trial Chamber II or a Judge of the Pre-Trial Division the Preliminary issue of the Validity of the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges or for an order striking out new facts alleged in the Prosecution's Pre-Trial Brief and Request for an extension of the page limit pursuant to Regulation 37(2)', Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-628-Red, Defence for Francis Kirimi Muthaura, 7 February 2013, para. 1 ('The Pre-Trial Brief is based upon new and untested evidence obtained by the Office of the Prosecutor ("OTP") post-confirmation. In tandem with this "new evidence", the Pre-Trial Brief sees the OTP jettisoning much of its "core evidence" relied upon at the confirmation stage. On any view, the case now advanced by the OTP has undergone a metamorphosis from that confirmed by the PTC in January 2012').

[44] Decision on prosecution requests to add witnesses and evidence and defence requests to reschedule the trial start date, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-762, TC V(A), ICC, 3 June 2013, para. 90.

the scheduled commencement date of trial puts a significant burden on the Defence's preparation' and 'the Defence was in a position to start conducting its investigations relating to a significant part of the disclosed material only recently and for some of it the Defence is still unable to investigate'.[45]

Thus, the pattern of significantly delayed disclosure continues at the trial stage. Even after the start of the trial, the Prosecutor may apply to add newly discovered incriminating evidence to its list even though the deadline to disclose all incriminating evidence on which the prosecutor intends to rely at trial has long passed. The Chamber will in principle allow late submission of evidence, but only if a timely and sufficiently motivated application for an extension of the time limit pursuant to Regulation 35(2) of the Regulations of the Court has been made.[46] This Regulation requires the prosecutor to demonstrate the existence of ' "exceptional circumstances", such as incapacitating illness, to demonstrate that there is a "reason outside his/her control" '.[47]

In the Katanga and Ngudjolo case, the Chamber held that 'a persistent shortage of resources, let alone the fact that transcribing and translating video material is especially time consuming, cannot be considered as an "exceptional circumstance" '.[48] Indeed, the Chamber emphasized that, for the prosecution to be allowed to disclose newly discovered incriminating evidence after the deadline:

> [i]t must convince the Chamber of the significance and relevance of the newly discovered evidence and the need for the Chamber to consider it in the interest of having a better understanding of the case and the establishment of the truth. It does not suffice, in this regard, for the Prosecution simply to argue that the evidence is new. Instead, the Prosecution must either show that the new evidence is more compelling than evidence already disclosed to the Defence, or that it brings to light previously unknown facts which have a significant bearing upon the case.

An additional condition for admissibility of new evidence, not previously disclosed, is that the 'late addition will not cause undue prejudice to the Defence in relation to the latter's right to have adequate time and facilities to prepare in accordance with article 67(1)(b) of the Statute'.[49] This has, however, barely prevented Chambers from [45] Ibid., para. 90, citing Decision concerning the start date of trial, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-642, TC V, ICC, paras 13 and 15. See also Transcript of Status Conference, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-T-22-ENG ET WT, TC V, ICC, 14 February 2013, 18, lines 23–5 and 25, lines 18–25; Order Concerning the Start Date of Trial, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-677, TC V, ICC, 7 March 2013, para. 10.

[46] Decision on Prosecution requests ICC-01/04-01/07-1386 and ICC-01/04-01/07-1407 made pursuant to Regulation 35 of the Regulations, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1552, TC II, ICC, 23 October 2009, para. 14. See also Decision on Prosecution requests ICC-01/04-01/07-1726-Conf-Exp and ICC-01/04-01/07-1738-Conf-Exp made pursuant to Regulation 35 of the Regulations, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1869, TC II, ICC, 15 February 2010, para. 12.

[47] Decision on the 'Prosecution's Urgent Application to be Permitted to Present as Incriminating Evidence Transcripts and Translations of Videos and Video DRC-OTP-1042-0006 pursuant to Regulation 35 and Request for Redactions (ICC-01/04-01/07-1260)', Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 39) para. 7.

[48] Ibid.

[49] Decision on Prosecution requests ICC-01/04-01/07-1386 and ICC-01/04-01/07-1407, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 46) para. 14.

granting requests for late disclosure of evidence obtained after the commencement of the trial.[50]

Accordingly, neither the Rome Statute nor the Rules of Procedure and Evidence impose a final disclosure deadline. Rather, it is for the Trial Chamber to set time limits, and allow them to be extended post facto, provided any ruling on disclosure or late disclosure is consistent with the Chamber's obligation to ensure the fairness and expeditiousness of the trial pursuant to Article 64(2). On the one hand, it is appropriate to allow for a level of flexibility, given that each case is different and has different demands. On the other hand, each case before the ICC is voluminous and highly demanding in light of the complexity of any charge of crimes against humanity, war crimes, or genocide. In light of these minimum complexities all cases have in common, and the frequency of late disclosure of incriminating information, inclusion of a final deadline applicable to all trials in the ICC Rules themselves would be warranted. This final deadline should be extended only in highly exceptional circumstances, and not with the same ease as such extensions are presently granted.

41.4 Information which is Exculpatory or Assists the Defence

In addition to incriminating material, the defence is entitled to disclosure, as soon as practicable, of evidence in the prosecutor's possession or control, which in her belief 'shows or tends to show the innocence of the accused, or to mitigate the guilt of the accused, or which may affect the credibility of prosecution evidence' (Article 67(2) of the Rome Statute). The ad hoc tribunals have referred to the duty of the Prosecutor to disclose exculpatory information as equally important as the duty to prosecute.[51] Indeed, it has been emphasized that the prosecutor is like a minister of justice 'whose object is not simply to secure a conviction but to present the case for the Prosecution, which includes not only inculpatory, but also exculpatory evidence in order to assist the Chamber to discover the truth in a judicial setting'.[52] In light of the importance attached to the prosecutor's duty to disclose both incriminating and exonerating evidence, it is revealing that, as Professor Alex Whiting confirms, '[d]isclosure will be often viewed as a secondary obligation of prosecutors and investigators'.[53]

In case of doubt relating to the exculpatory nature of the information, the Prosecutor may request an ex parte hearing before the judges, under Rule 83,[54] who will then [50] See e.g. ibid.; Decision on Prosecution requests ICC-01/04-01/07-1726-Conf-Exp and ICC-01/04-01/07-1738-Conf-Exp, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 46). See also Decision concerning the start date of trial, Ruto and Sang (n 45).

[51] Decision on Motions to Extend for Filing Appellant's Briefs, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2, TC, ICTY, 11 May 2001, para. 14; Judgment, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-A, AC, ICTY, 17 December 2004, paras 183 and 242; Judgment, Blaškić, IT-95-14-A, AC, ICTY, 29 July, 2004, para. 264; Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Regarding the Role of the Prosecutor's Electronic Disclosure Suite in Discharging Disclosure Obligations, Karemera et al., ICTR-98-44-AR73.7, AC, ICTR, 30 June 2006, para. 9.

[52] Decision on Communication between the Parties and their Witnesses, Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16, TC, ICTY, 21 September 1998, para. (ii).

[53] See Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume.

[54] See Decision on Art 54(3)(e) Documents, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 6) para. 2, explaining why such hearings are necessarily ex parte:

> The rationale behind the ex parte nature of rule 83 is that the subject matter of such hearings is to determine whether the Defence should have access to some specific materials. The presence decide whether the material in question is exculpatory and must be disclosed without undue delay.

The Prosecutor's obligation to disclose exonerating information is a continued obligation and a distinction is no longer made between the confirmation and trial stages. The Single Judge in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case held that, at the confirmation stage, it suffices for the prosecution to disclose the bulk of exonerating information within its possession or control.[55] Subsequent Pre-Trial Chambers have, however, taken a different—and, it is submitted, better—view and considered that there is no legal or practical reason as to why the prosecution would be unable to comply with its duty to disclose all exculpatory and relevant materials in its possession prior to the confirmation hearing.[56] However, the consequences of breaches of this obligation may be more severe when they occur closer, or in the course of trial, than during the confirmation stage.[57]

Late disclosure of exonerating evidence to the defence is unfortunately rather prevalent and perhaps far too easily accepted as 'par for the course' in criminal trials. In practice, this is so even if no good cause for the delay has been shown in accordance with Regulation 35(2), provided that the Defence is given adequate time and facilities to analyse the late disclosure material.[58] This is because, on balance, it is in the interest of the defence to receive the material, even if served rather late in the day—and often after the trial has actually commenced.[59]

Further, pursuant to Rule 77, the Defence is entitled to inspect 'any books, documents, photographs and other tangible objects in the possession or control of the Prosecutor, which are material to the preparation of the defence or are intended for use by the Prosecutor as evidence for the purposes of the confirmation hearing or at trial, or were obtained from or belonged to the person'.

Rule 77 potentially has a wider ambit than Article 67(2), but is also more difficult to define. The Appeals Chamber held that the Prosecutor's obligation to make available to the Defence any information that is material to the defence preparation must be construed broadly so as to include 'all objects that are relevant for the preparation > of the Defence at this type of hearing would, in principle, defeat its very purpose because: (i) the Prosecution would be prevented from going into the details of the relevant materials, which have not yet been disclosed to the Defence; and (ii) the Defence would not be in a position to make meaningful submissions as it does not have access to such materials.

[55] This principle was referred to as the 'bulk' rule. See Decision on Art 54(3)(e) Documents, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 6) paras 8, 45, and 109–18.

[56] Decision on the 'Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the "Decision Setting the Regime for Evidence Disclosure and Other Related Matters" (ICC-01/09-01/11-44)', Ruto, Henry and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-74, PTC II, ICC, 2 May 2011, paras 24–8.

[57] See Decision on Art 54(3)(e) Documents, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 6) paras 8, 65–6, 70, and 124–5.

[58] Decision on the 'Prosecution's Urgent Application to be Permitted to Present as Incriminating Evidence Transcripts and Translations of Videos and Video DRC-OTP-1042-0006 pursuant to Regulation 35 and Request for Redactions (ICC-01/04-01/07-1260)', Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 39) para. 29; Decision on the Prosecutor's request for late disclosure of exculpatory evidence (Witness P-387) (ICC-01/04-01/07-1296), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1423, TC II, ICC, 25 August 2009, para. 10.

[59] Decision on the Prosecutor's request for late disclosure of exculpatory evidence (Witness P-387) (ICC-01/04-01/07-1296), Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 58) para. 9.

of the defence', irrespective of whether they are 'directly linked to incriminating or exonerating evidence'.[60] This interpretation has been derived from that given to 'material to the preparation of the defence' in the ICTY, namely material that is 'significantly helpful to an understanding of important inculpatory or exculpatory evidence; it is material if there is a strong indication that…it will play an important role in uncovering admissible evidence, aiding witness preparation, corroborating testimony, or assisting impeachment or rebuttal'.[61] In a more recent case, the Appeals Chamber has held that the Defence needs to only establish prima facie relevance under Rule 77 and 'this places a low burden on the defence'.[62]

Some may argue that this definition is 'too broad' because it may not be fair to blame the prosecution for failing to comply with its Rule 77 obligation when the defence is merely 'shopping for ideas'.[63] The authors respectfully disagree. It must, by necessity, be an open and flexible definition, as information can be 'material to the preparation of the defence' in a variety of ways—even if not immediately evident, or explicitly anticipated at the outset of proceedings. It is important that the Defence is given access to such material without placing unnecessary limitations, in order to 'neutralize any potential advantage to the Prosecutor over the defence' by virtue of her greater access to key information.[64] The ICTY definition, which is similar to the ICC definition, has been cited with approval by Senior Appeals Counsel at the ICTY.[65]

The definition is wide enough to include any material which helps the Defence understand the context of the events, to understand certain aspects of the conflict, or to prepare submissions on sentencing issues.[66] Rule 77 material also includes any information relating to benefits enjoyed by the prosecution witnesses, including whether they have

[60] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Lubanga Dyilo against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber I of 18 January 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1433, AC, ICC, 11 July 2008, paras 77–8.

[61] Decision on the motion by the accused Zejnil Delalić for the disclosure of evidence, Delalić et al., IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 26 September 1996.

[62] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain and Mr Saleh Mohammed Jerbo Jamus against the Decision of Trial Chamber IV of 23 January 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Defence's Request for Disclosure of Documents in the Possession of the Office of the Prosecutor', Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-501, AC, ICC, 28 August 2013, para. 42.

[63] A Mura Muiruri, 'Disclosure of Evidence at the International Criminal Court: Taking Stock of Debates and Lessons Learnt', LLM Thesis Leiden University (16 July 2012) 18. See also Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume.

[64] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Katanga against the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 22 January 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Modalities of Victim Participation at Trial', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2288, AC, ICC, 16 July 2010, fn. 125, citing the United Nations General Assembly, 'Draft Report of the Preparatory Committee', A/AC.249/L.15 (23 August 1996) 14.

[65] H Brady, 'Disclosure of Evidence' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 403, 411. See, however, the views of Professor Whiting in this volume. Professor Whiting states that, in determining that 'all objects that are relevant for the preparation of the defence' should be disclosed to the Defence pursuant to Rule 77, the ICC Appeals Chamber 'broadened considerably the scope of disclosure required by Rule 77' by comparison with the ICTY standard (Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume). With respect, we do not agree with that view, given that Rule 77 requires disclosable material to be relevant to the preparation of the Defence. Rule 77, therefore, does not cover all 'relevant' information without any qualification, as suggested by Professor Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume.

[66] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Lubanga Dyilo against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber I of 18 January 2008, Lubanga (n 60) para. 82.

been relocated. Another limitation is that—though the prosecutor must disclose all information relating to the benefits enjoyed by the witness—the VWU has no such duty. It is, however, the VWU which covers most expenses for witnesses, in particular for those who are within the VWU's witness protection and support programme.[67]

This was confirmed by a recent oral ruling in the Kenya I case on a defence request for disclosure from the VWU of all expenses made by the VWU for the purposes of relocation, maintenance, and/or support of the upcoming witnesses. The Chamber denied the request on the following ground:

> In the Chamber's view, the probative value of granting the request . . . is outweighed by both the considerations of prejudice and efficiency, not only in relation to the witness but also the operations of the Victims and Witnesses Unit and the administration of justice in general. Witnesses who come to testify, it is presumed, will have to have sustenance in their lives, whether it is afforded to them on their own or through the instrumentality of the Victims and Witnesses Unit. It therefore does not afford a prima facie [indicium] of credibility that the Victims and Witnesses Unit has undertaken those reasonable tasks of providing reasonable support and maintenance to a witness rather than the witness doing it themselves.[68]

The Chamber also agreed with the Prosecution and VWU that the latter 'is an independent unit tasked with making independent judgements on what is appropriate, in terms of costs to be expended on witnesses' sustenance or maintenance, witnesses that are within their care, and as such, all efforts are made to ensure that those costs are reasonable and not inordinate'.[69]

Leave to appeal was denied,[70] and non-disclosure of such information by the VWU remains the practice to date. This has created a rather unfortunate situation for the defence. It makes no difference to the Defence which unit of the ICC provides support to a witness. What matters is that the witness benefits from testifying, which may be an inducement for a witness to give false testimony. Alternatively, it may be entirely benign and appropriate. However, it can hardly be denied that 'if the assistance places a witness or his or her family members in significantly improved material circumstances as compared to those prior to the VWU's intervention, it may prima facie impact on the credibility of the witness's evidence'.[71]

Indeed, in the eastern parts of the DRC, relocation and all the benefits that come with it was undoubtedly one of the tools which contributed to an emerging culture

[67] Urgent Decision on Evidentiary Scope of the Confirmation Hearing, Preventive Relocation and Disclosure under Art 67(2) of the Statute and Rule 77 of the Rules, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-428-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 25 April 2008.

[68] Transcript of hearing of 28 October 2013, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-T-60-RED-ENG, TC V(A), ICC, 44.

[69] Ibid., 43, lines 24 to 44, line 4.

[70] Decision on Defence Applications for Leave to Appeal the Decision on Disclosure of Information on VWU Assistance, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1154, TC V(A), ICC, 21 January 2014.

[71] Defence Application for Leave to Appeal the Trial Chamber's Oral Decision of 28 October 2013 on the Defence's request for disclosure of all costs expended by the VWU for relocation, maintenance and support of Witness P-268, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1080, Defence for Mr William Samoei Ruto, 4 November 2013, para. 22.

of corruption of the evidence in that part of the world.[72] A significant number of witnesses in the Lubanga and Katanga and Ngudjolo cases alleged that part of their motive for giving false statements and testimony was that the intermediary who contacted them promised them money, education, and free re-housing.[73] For instance, relocated witness P-28 stated in the Katanga and Ngudjolo trial:

> I will say this gentleman raised my hopes. He said this was something very confidential and that no one would get to know about it. That is what he said. However, nothing was made up with respect to the events that took place in Bogoro. I do confirm that with respect to that statement, the statement about schooling was made up by number 14. No, it is false.[74]

Even Bernard Lavigne, a French magistrate who led the first investigative team in the case of Lubanga, acknowledged that the news went around in Bunia that a witness who claimed to have safety concerns may be relocated by the ICC, and that some persons saw this as an opportunity to secure free re-housing.[75] Most ironically, the intermediaries who have been the subject of severe criticism for corrupting witnesses have all been relocated.[76] The benefits accruing to them have not changed even after the judges in Lubanga suggested that the prosecutor should consider prosecuting these intermediaries under Article 70 of the Rome Statute.[77]

These are not trivial matters. These examples demonstrate how essential it is for the Defence to explore such matters with the witnesses. Rewarding witnesses for their cooperation, even if inadvertently, has the potential to lead to corruption or otherwise infect the trial process. If there is nothing untoward in such payments, the question remains, why not disclose the payments and benefits received by witnesses?

In addition, until recently, there was a total lack of transparency about the nature of the relationship between the Prosecution and its intermediaries. No information about their payment, contract, or job description was disclosed to the defence.[78] Nonetheless, this information became particularly relevant when it became known that some intermediaries were suspected, including by the Prosecution's own investigators, of inventing financial claims as well as security threats to maximize economic and other support from the ICC.[79]

[72] See further C Buisman, 'Delegating Investigations: Lessons to be Learned from the Lubanga Judgment', (2013) 11 Northwestern Journal of International Human Rights 30, 60–1.

[73] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, para. 293; Redacted Decision on Intermediaries, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2434-Red2, TC I, ICC, 31 May, 2010, paras 140 and 146; Second Corrigendum to the Defence Closing Brief, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3266-Corr2-Red, Defence for Mr Germain Katanga, 29 June 2012, paras 487, 488, 492, and 509–10 ('Katanga Defence Closing Brief').

[74] Transcript of hearing of 23 November 2010, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-221-Red, 39–40.

[75] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga (n 73) para. 147 (citing Lavigne Deposition).

[76] Katanga Defence Closing Brief (n 73) paras 484, 500, and 504.

[77] Judgment hearing, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-359-ENG, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012, 5, lines 22 to 26, line 4.

[78] Katanga Defence Closing Brief (n 73) para. 476.

[79] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga (n 73) paras 289 and 371; Katanga Defence Closing Brief (n 73) paras 503–4. See also Buisman, 'Delegating Investigations' (n 72).

In the Kenya I case, the judges went further. Although a request for the disclosure of the identities of all intermediaries was rejected,[80] the Chamber accepted that the following information concerning intermediaries was material to the Defence, and thus disclosable pursuant to Rule 77:

- a list of all intermediaries (identified by pseudonym) who had contact with witnesses and indicating which witness they had contact with;[81]
- the general purpose, or purposes, for contact with a witness;[82]
- dates of contact between an intermediary and witness;[83]
- payments, benefits, or assistance (including non-financial assistance) provided to a witness because of their status as a witness;[84]
- copies of receipts, but not the entity making the disbursement.[85]

The Chamber rejected related requests for the disclosure of locations of meetings between intermediaries and witnesses;[86] topics discussed;[87] and copies of all correspondence between the prosecution and its intermediaries.[88] In respect of these requests, the Chamber held that the Defence had not provided sufficient detail as to their materiality to the defence.[89]

It is also worth mentioning that the Chamber accepted a broad definition of 'intermediary', agreed by both parties,[90] namely:

> any individual (whether acting in an individual capacity or on behalf of an organisation, agency or State) other than VWU staff members: (a) through whom initial contact was made on behalf of the Prosecution with any Prosecution trial witness; (b) who has had any contact (directly or indirectly) with any Prosecution trial witness at the request of the Prosecution; (c) [REDACTED].[91]

The chamber rejected, as overly broad,[92] however, the proposition that intermediaries would include anyone 'who has provided benefits, support, or assistance to a prosecution trial witness at any time—knowing or believing such individual to be either a prosecution trial witness for the Kenya Situation [REDACTED]'.[93] The Prosecution sought leave to appeal this decision, which was denied.[94]

This represents a real improvement to the situation that previously prevailed. However, given that intermediaries still play a significant role in conducting investigations for the Prosecution and potentially play an influential role vis-à-vis prosecution witnesses, it would only be fair to disclose their identities to the Defence. Transparency in investigations is key, in particular when operating in countries where [80] Decision on Disclosure of Information related to Prosecution Intermediaries, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-904-Red, TC V(A), ICC, 4 September 2013, para. 47.

[81] Ibid., para. 49. [82] Ibid., para. 50. [83] Ibid., para. 52. [84] Ibid., para. 61.
[85] Ibid., para. 62. [86] Ibid., para. 54. [87] Ibid., para. 57. [88] Ibid., para. 65.
[89] Ibid., para. 65. [90] Ibid., para. 36.
[91] Ibid., para. 35. [92] Ibid., paras 38–40. [93] Ibid., para. 35.
[94] Decision on Prosecution's Application for Leave to Appeal the 'Decision on Disclosure of Information related to Prosecution Intermediaries', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1018-Red, TC V(A), ICC, 8 October 2013.

many different interest groups appear to be active in seeking to influence the evidence which will eventually be presented to the court by either party.

41.4.1 Disclosure demands for strategic purposes?

Our esteemed colleague, Professor Whiting, suggests in his chapter that defence counsel may have a proclivity to complain about disclosure violations for tactical reasons. As an example, he refers to the Karadžić case, arguing that '[i]t can be inferred from the frequency and nature of the legal adviser's motions that they are designed primarily for their publicity value, with little expectation that they will succeed in court'.[95] A careful review of what transpired paints a somewhat different picture. Whilst it is correct that the Defence filed 92 motions alleging disclosure violations and consequent prejudice to the Defence, 73 of them were granted in part, finding that the Prosecution indeed violated its disclosure obligation, which 'reflect[s] badly on the Prosecution's disclosure practices'.[96] Most of them were nonetheless rejected because of lack of prejudice to the defence, either because the defence had received the disclosure material in time to make use of it, or it was cumulative to material already disclosed.[97]

It may, of course, be that the accused filed such a high number of disclosure motions for strategic reasons, which would be fine if these reasons were valid and consistent with the applicable codes of deontology. For example, it may be the case that while each individual violation in and of itself may not prejudice the defence, the cumulative prejudice of such violations may be significant. In the Karadžić case, the numbers are revealing. The Prosecution failed to disclose 424 statements of its own witnesses in a timely fashion; this number represents an astonishing 25% of the total amount of statements in this case.[98] In addition, approximately 335,000 pages of exculpatory material appear to have been served tardily upon the Defence.[99] In a situation where disclosure violations have been so excessive, the accused may have had an obvious interest in documenting these violations in a systematic manner irrespective of the chances of

[95] Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume.

[96] Decision on Accused's Second Motion for New Trial for Disclosure Violations, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, TC, ICTY, 14 August 2014, para. 15. See also Decision on Accused's Motion for a New Trial for Disclosure Violations, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, TC, ICTY, 3 September 2012, para. 14. For the numbers (which appear not to be in dispute), see Second Motion for New Trial for Disclosure Violations, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, Radovan Karadžić, 30 July 2014, para. 5.

[97] Decision on Accused's Second Motion, Karadžić (n 96) paras 11–17; Decision on Accused's Motion, Karadžić (n 96) para. 14.

[98] Second Motion for New Trial for Disclosure Violations, Karadžić (n 96) para. 5. Though the prosecution does not agree with all the figures raised by the accused (at para. 5 of its Response, the prosecution states that the accused exaggerates the number of Rule 68 violations during the defence case), it has not contested the number of prosecution witness statements disclosed late. See Prosecution Response to 'Second Motion for New Trial for Disclosure Violations', Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, OTP, ICTY, 7 August 2014.

[99] Second Motion for New Trial for Disclosure Violations, Karadžić (n 96) paras 3 and 5. The prosecution does not dispute the number of pages cited by the accused as being disclosed after the start of the trial, but it disputes that all disclosure after the start of the trial date amounts to late disclosure. See Prosecution Response to Motion for New Trial for Disclosure Violations, Karadžić, IT-95-5/18-T, OTP, ICTY, 27 August 2012, fn. 10. The Chamber has not explicitly ruled on this dispute, because it had already ruled on each disclosure motion separately. See Decision on Accused's Second Motion, Karadžić (n 96); Decision on Accused's Motion, Karadžić (n 96).

winning each individual complaint. The picture that such disclosure violations and disclosure related complaints portray would be of obvious importance to the Defence, since it impacts upon defence work and upon its ability to counter a Prosecution narrative and marshal its own case properly. In addition, public filings, seeking relief from the Chamber and highlighting any alleged systemic weaknesses in the prosecution, may be an efficient means to ensure remedial steps are taken and safeguards put in place to prevent such repeat breaches or inadequacies in the Prosecution's conduct of the case in the future. It is trite to say that sometimes arguments by the Defence may be poorly grounded and bothersome to the Prosecution; others will be compelling. If disclosure-related complaints are taken a little more seriously by the Prosecution with a view to how it can improve and ensure such disclosure breaches or shortcomings do not occur in the future, they would provide occasion for the Prosecution to put in place a system that will enable it to more readily discharge its statutory obligations.

41.5 Exemptions from Disclosure Obligations

41.5.1 Redactions

The Prosecutor's obligation to disclose both incriminating and exonerating materials is subject to limitations. Internal work documents are not subject to disclosure.[100] In addition, the prosecutor can apply to the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber to be exempted from her duty to disclose materials to the defence on any of the grounds set forth in Rule 81(2) and (4). Under these provisions, such requests may be granted where disclosure prejudices further or ongoing investigations,[101] or where disclosure would jeopardize the safety and security of victims or witnesses, or members of their families.[102]

Non-disclosure to the Defence of relevant information, including identifying details of witnesses and their family members, can be authorized under these rules, but supposedly only on an exceptional basis. The Appeals Chamber referred to non-disclosure to the Defence as a measure of last resort, which must be balanced with the rights of the defendant. The 'overriding principle is that full disclosure should be made'.[103] Accordingly, protective measures may be granted, but not before exhausting the possibility of employing less extreme measures (principle of necessity). Protective measures must also be strictly limited to the exigencies of the situation (principle of proportionality), and not infringe the rights of the Defence.[104] More concretely, the Chamber

[100] See Rule 81(1) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[101] See Rule 81(2) Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[102] See Rule 81(4) Rules of Procedure and Evidence. See Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume, for a more elaborate analysis of the exemptions from disclosure obligations including internal documents under Rule 81(1), confidential agreements under Art 54(3)(e) and national security under Art 72. Lack of space required the authors to focus only on the disclosure exemptions most frequently applied.

[103] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statements', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-475, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008, para. 63 ('Katanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Redactions').

[104] Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-108-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 26 May 2006; Decision on the Final System of Disclosure

must determine on a case-by-case basis whether the disclosure of the person's identity generates an objectively justified security risk; whether less restrictive protective measures are reasonably available; and whether non-disclosure gravely prejudices the defence.[105] General security problems in the region alone do not justify redactions from the Defence.[106] For this, it must be shown that such security problems are prompted by the defendant.[107]

In practice, however, this exceptional measure is routinely applied. Particularly by comparison with the ad hoc tribunals, the ICC has adopted a permissive approach in authorizing redactions from the public and defence, not infrequently on a permanent basis.[108] However, the Appeals Chamber held that 'non-disclosure must be kept under review and altered should changed circumstances make that appropriate'.[109] and the Establishment of a Timetable, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-102, PTC I, ICC, 15 May 2006; Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Requests and Amended Requests for Redactions under Rule 81', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-773, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, para. 34 (the Chamber must assess whether the redactions are 'prejudicial to or inconsistent with the rights of the accused and a fair and impartial trial') ('Lubanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Rule 81 Redactions').

[105] Katanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Redactions (n 103) paras 59, 60, and 71–2; Decision on the Defence Request to Redact the Identity Source of DRC-D03-0001-0707, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3122, TC II, ICC, 22 August 2011, 5–7. See also Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81(2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga (n 41) paras 36–7.

[106] Lubanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Rule 81 Redactions (n 104) para. 21; Public Redacted Version of the Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information Falling under Art 67(2) of the Statute and Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Witnesses 6, 83, 102, and 221) of 18 May 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1145-Conf-Exp), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1396-tENG, TC II, ICC, 23 December 2009, para. 9.

[107] Katanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Redactions (n 103) para. 71.

[108] Ibid., para. 63; Public Redacted Version of the Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information in the Second Statement of Prosecution Witness 249 of 18 May 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1149-Conf-Exp), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1395-Corr-tENG, TC II, ICC, 13 January 2010, para. 27; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information under Art 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (ICC-01/04-01/07-971-Conf-Exp), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1096-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 November 2009, paras 26–7; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information and to Maintain and Reinstate Redacted Passages in Certain Documents under Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Witnesses 26, 36, 158, and 180) (ICC-01/04-01/07-981-Conf), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1097-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 November 2009, para. 21. See also Decision on the Defence Request to Redact the Identity Source of DRC-D03-0001-0707 (n 105) 9, where the permanent redaction of a defence source was authorized for the first time in international justice. See, however, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information from Certain Evidence under Art 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (ICC-01/04-01/07-957), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1098-tENG, TC II, ICC, 30 December 2009, paras 13–18; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information under Art 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (ICC-01/04-01/07-934), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1101-tENG, TC II, ICC, 5 May 2009.

[109] Katanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Redactions (n 103) paras 63 and 73; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information Falling under Art 67(2) of the Statute and Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Witnesses 6, 83, 102, and 221), Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 106) para. 4.

These provisions have been given a rather broad interpretation and allow the Prosecution to withhold the identities of most prosecution witnesses from the defence until shortly before the trial begins, and sometimes even later. As mentioned previously in this chapter, the identities of prosecution witnesses are rarely disclosed to the Defence or to the public at the confirmation stage.[110] The Defence has a right, however, to know the identities of such witnesses prior to their testimonies at trial.[111]

On the basis of these provisions, the Prosecution has been allowed to redact any identifying information, not only of witnesses, but also any members of their families, 'innocent third parties',[112] 'potential witnesses',[113] or 'others at risk on account of the activities of the Court'.[114] These categories are wide and have allowed the Prosecution to redact identifying information of a large number of individuals. Accordingly, much of the evidence disclosed is heavily redacted and, thus, unintelligible because a great deal of related material is also redacted to prevent the persons whose protection is sought from being identified through indirect channels.[115] Not infrequently, the result of such heavy redactions is that entire pages are blacked out. Not only does this render any proper analysis of the disclosed materials practically impossible, it also impacts on the Defence's ability to adequately investigate. Indeed, whether as 'innocent third party', 'potential witness', 'prosecution source', or a person 'at risk on account of the activities of the Court', identifying information of any individual who has ever spoken to the prosecution, a prosecution witness, or a potential witness may be withheld from the defence. It is suggested that the redaction of such information from the defence needs to be approached with more circumspection. It is the view of the authors that simply too much material is redacted by the prosecution and too few justifications are given supporting such redactions.

The Banda and Jerbo case illustrates the genuine difficulties for the Defence that arise from this wide interpretation of Rule 81(2) and (4).[116] In this case, all identifying details of persons who were present inside the AU base in Darfur in the period immediately prior to the attack on the base, which constitutes the core charge against the suspects, were withheld from the Defence for more than two years after the main disclosure was served. The information was highly relevant to the Defence, given its clear interest in speaking to the persons whose identifying details were withheld; the disclosure was only given to the Defence after several months' effort was expended by the [110] Arts 61(5) and 68(5) Rome Statute of the ICC (adopted 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 90.

[111] Such disclosure should be made as soon as is practicable. It appears that the latest that disclosure of the identity of witnesses has been authorized—upon exceptional circumstances being shown—has been 30 days before the date of anticipated testimony. This has been the experience of one of the authors in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case.

[112] Katanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Redactions (n 103) para. 54.

[113] Judgment on the appeal of Mr Germain Katanga against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statements', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-476, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008.

[114] Katanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Redactions (n 103) para. 54.

[115] See e.g. Transcript of Status Conference, Muthaura and Kenyatta (n 45) 25, lines 4-12.

[116] See also Khan and Shah (n 10) 206–8.

Defence on securing the same.[117] This very late disclosure of clearly relevant information seriously jeopardized the Defence's investigations, especially in light of the fact that the Defence had no opportunity to visit the situation country.[118] Its opportunities to investigate properly were, thus, extremely limited from the outset, and such unnecessary additional limitations plainly did not help. Therefore, the proportionality test was clearly not applied appropriately in this instance, as the redactions were highly prejudicial to the fair trial rights of the suspects who were deprived of an opportunity to speak to potentially relevant sources.

Other redactions in the same case concerned identities of persons whom a prosecution witness had visited several years before in an area in Darfur which was geographically very remote from the crime scene of the case (an AU base in the town of Haskanita).[119] The identities of international journalists and other individuals living outside Sudan have also been withheld from the Defence.[120] The justification for these redactions was that the persons in question needed protection as 'innocent third parties'.[121] On similar grounds, the identities of two senior officials from an international organization, who had briefly interacted with a prosecution witness in Darfur, were also redacted.[122]

Arguably, these types of redactions, which occur in every case, are excessive and do not reach the threshold of an 'objectively justifiable risk' to any individual as a result of disclosure to the Defence. The Prosecution and judges do not always realize the extent to which the defence is genuinely prejudiced by excessive redactions. Indeed, late disclosure of important information may require the defence to speak to their potential witnesses or sources again and ask specific questions about such material. This increases the burden on the limited defence investigation budget. But more importantly, witnesses who may have been able to comment on such material may no longer be available once the material has finally been received by the defence. This is particularly a genuine risk in circumstances such as those in the Banda and Jerbo case, where any encounter with witnesses must necessarily take place outside of the situation area, requiring witnesses from that area to travel to a third country.[123]

Non-disclosure of the identities of family members of witnesses can also affect the rights of the Defence, most notably the right to have adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence. To verify the veracity of the testimony of witnesses, speaking to members of their families or persons in their close proximity has proved essential. It is particularly through such persons that the discovery can be made that certain parts of the testimony are not truthful.[124] Unfortunately, it frequently occurs that the Prosecution does not make

[117] This statement is based on the first author's own experience and knowledge. See also ibid.

[118] Defence Request for a Temporary Stay of Proceedings, Banda and Jerbo (n 15).

[119] This statement is based on one of the authors' own experience and knowledge. See also Khan and Shah (n 10) 206–8.

[120] This statement is based on one of the authors' own experience and knowledge.

[121] This statement is based on one of the authors' own experience and knowledge.

[122] This statement is based on the authors' own experience and knowledge. See also Khan and Shah (n 10) 206–8.

[123] Defence Request for a Temporary Stay of Proceedings, Banda and Jerbo (n 15) paras 13 and 14.

[124] Order to the Prosecutor regarding the alleged false testimony of witness P-159, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3223, TC II, ICC, 13 January 2012.

these necessary enquiries. It is then even more important that the Defence be offered an opportunity to do so.

Another area of concern is the protection of sources. In order to safeguard ongoing prosecution investigations, not only witnesses, but also sources can be protected. While the Defence is entitled to receive eventually the identities of all incriminating witnesses, it is more cumbersome to receive the identities of prosecution sources. In some cases, their identities have even been withheld from the defence on a permanent basis.[125]

The term 'source' has been interpreted widely. Sources may include persons, as well as organizations who act as intermediaries between the Court and potential witnesses.[126] The names of staff members of the prosecution, NGOs, or other intermediaries are regularly redacted at least until the start of the trial, if not longer.[127] By contrast, the ad hocs, particularly the ICTY, have been strict on disclosure of the identities of sources.[128]

Both in the Lubanga and the Ngudjolo and Katanga cases, the Prosecutor relied excessively on intermediaries whose identities were unknown. The identities of these intermediaries were withheld from the defence for years and largely throughout the trial, notwithstanding various attempts on the part of the defence to have them disclosed;[129] some have never been disclosed.[130] The Chambers both in Lubanga and in Ngudjolo and Katanga ordered disclosure of the identities only of the intermediaries whose credibility was put in question.[131] As a result of this late or non-disclosure of the identities of the intermediaries, the defence was not allowed to ask any questions that may have led to their identification. It was thus frustrated in its efforts to challenge their credibility, and in turn, the credibility of the witnesses introduced by these intermediaries.[132]

[125] See, for instance, Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information in the Second Statement of Prosecution Witness 249 of 18 May 2009, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1395-Corr-tENG, TC II, ICC, 13 January 2010, para. 27.

[126] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information under Art 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (ICC-01/04-01/07-934), Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 108) paras 25–6.

[127] See also Decision on Three Prosecutor's Applications to Maintain Redactions or Reinstate Redacted Passages (ICC-01/04-01/07-859, ICC-01/04-01/07-860, and ICC-01/04-01/07-862), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1034-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 November 2009, paras 50–1. The supervisor of investigations in Ituri testified under pseudonym: Transcript of hearing of 25 November 2009, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-81-Red-ENG, TC II, ICC.

[128] Decision on Motions on Behalf of Idriz Balaj and Lahi Brahimaj to Receive Ten Unredacted Witness Statements, Haradinaj et al., IT-04-84-PT, TC II, ICTY, 3 May 2006; Order on Motion to Compel Compliance by the Prosecutor with Rules 66(A) and 68, Kordić and Čerkez, IT-95-14/2-PT, TC, ICTY, 26 February 1999; Decision on Fifth Motion by Prosecution for Protective Measures, Brđanin and Talić, IT-99-36-PT, TC II, ICTY, 15 November 2000; Decision on Prosecution's Request for Variation of Third Protective Measures Decision, Brđanin and Talić, IT-99-36-PT, TC II, ICTY, 29 November 2000, para. 14.

[129] See e.g. Public Submissions and Decision, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-312-ENG, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, TC I, ICC, 7 July, 2010, 15–22; Redacted Decision on Intermediaries, Lubanga (n 73) paras 5, 6, 15–16, 34, 50, 56, 66–74, 81, 85–7, 112, and 115; Katanga Defence Closing Brief (n 73) para. 473, fn. 609.

[130] For instance, the identity of intermediary P-310 in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case has not been disclosed to the defence. In Lubanga, the defence is still unaware of the identities of intermediaries 81, 123, 154, 254, and 290. See Redacted Decision on Intermediaries, Lubanga (n 73) paras 139 and 145.

[131] Redacted Decision on Intermediaries, Lubanga (n 73) paras 5, 6, 138–9, and 150.

[132] Katanga Defence Closing Brief (n 73) para. 474.

In the case of one intermediary common to the Lubanga and Katanga and Ngudjolo cases (P-143), the defence unsuccessfully sought disclosure of his identity on more than one occasion.[133] Eventually, when his credibility had become a genuine issue of dispute in the case of Lubanga, the Lubanga Chamber, followed by the Katanga and Ngudjolo Chamber, ordered disclosure of his identity. However, even after an explicit and unambiguous disclosure order was made, the Prosecution refused to comply and disclose the identity of P-143 to the defence. The Prosecution insisted that security concerns prevented it from obeying this court order; in fact, negotiations were still ongoing regarding P-143's protective measures, the implementation of which were delayed by P-143 who wanted more protection and did not want his identity to be disclosed.[134]

It is obviously not for the prosecution to make that ultimate decision and to simply ignore a disclosure order. The Court would have taken all factors, including security concerns, into consideration when it issued its order. Consequently, the Chamber stayed the proceedings on the ground that a fair trial could not be guaranteed if the Prosecutor refused to follow the Court's orders.[135] The Appeals Chamber overturned this decision considering that alternative, less drastic, measures, including sanctions on the Prosecution, were available to remedy the situation.[136] Three months after it was ordered to do so, the prosecution disclosed the identity to the defence teams concerned.[137]

It is further suggested that protection of NGOs and prosecution personnel is excessive. Given the nature of their work, they should be expected to show greater fortitude and robustness in a criminal process than ordinary civilians, for example, victim witnesses.[138] The fact that several NGOs cooperate with the ICC is not in itself a confidential matter, and can easily be ascertained from the respective Internet sites of these NGOs. For example, in an amicus brief, submitted in the DRC situation, the Women's Institute for Gender Justice broadcasted to the entire world the fact that it had conducted interviews in the DRC, and transmitted its findings to the ICC prosecutor.[139]

In the ICTY and ICTR context, with the exception of the ICRC, these types of redactions have generally been rejected by Trial Chambers. The defence is usually [133] The defence had obtained this information in the field before the commencement of trial. This is based on one of the authors' own knowledge and experience.

[134] Public Redacted Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultations with the VWU, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2517-Red, TC I, ICC, 8 July 2010, paras 2–17.

[135] Ibid., para. 31.

[136] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber I of 8 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultations with the VWU', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2582, AC, ICC, 8 October 2010, paras 45–61.

[137] On 13 September 2010, almost a year after the start of the trial (24 November 2009) and over three months after the Chamber ordered it to do so (7 June 2010), the OTP finally disclosed P-143's identity to the defence by email. This is based on one of the authors' own experience and knowledge.

[138] On similar grounds, the ECtHR has held that the protection of the identities of police officers was excessive. See Judgment of 20 November 1989, Kostovski v The Netherlands, 1989 ECHR (Ser. A) 166.

[139] Decision on the Request submitted pursuant to Rule 103(1) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-373, PTC I, ICC, 20 August 2007.

entitled to receive the identities of anyone involved in taking witness information, be it investigators, interpreters, prosecution staff members, and/or NGO members;[140] it has not been considered fair that the Defence is denied the opportunity to contest the methodology of the collection of witness statements.[141] Given how often witnesses allege that interpreters or investigators have misunderstood them in cases of inconsistencies with their viva voce testimonies, it would also be helpful for the Defence to receive disclosure of their names, at least once trial commences and witnesses make such allegations.

Similarly, if redactions ordered pertain to the name of an organization or a person who has transmitted a document to the prosecution, or referred a victim or witness to prosecution investigators, then their identity is crucial to the ability of the Defence to analyse and challenge chain of custody issues, possible collusion, undue influence, as well as the existence of prior statements. Indeed, an efficient investigation commences with enquiries about such persons, which cannot be done unless their identities are known and given to the defence.[142]

Therefore, claims of security concerns should not be accepted on face value. Many allegations of threats from the defendant or an associate have turned out to be false.[143] For any claims that are true, protective measures can and must be taken. No court can operate where witnesses are in danger; similarly, no witness should be placed at real risk on account of his or her testimony. Where anyone seeks to interfere or threaten a witness, Article 70 of the Rome Statute should be deployed and investigations and prosecutions commenced. No one—whether on the side of the Defence or on the prosecution side (including the gamut of intermediaries that are used)—should feel they may interfere with the administration of justice and get away with it. All that said, it must be remembered that the ICC often operates in less affluent countries. From experience and review of the ratio of failed asylum applications to successful ones, we can confidently state that a significant number of people assert a well-founded fear of persecution to use the 1951 Refugee Convention as a vehicle for economic migration. This is understandable in many ways when one is seeking to escape the poverty, lack of opportunity, and sometimes hopelessness that exist in too

[140] Decision on Ojdanic Motion for Disclosure of Witness Statements and for Finding of Violation of Rule 66(A)(ii), Milutinović et al., IT-05-87-T, TC, ICTY, 29 September 2006, para. 14; and Decision on Prosecution Motion for Protective Measures (Concerning a Humanitarian Organisation), Slobodan Milošević, IT-02-54-T, TC, ICTY, 1 April 2003.

[141] Décision relative à la Requête de la Défense en extreme urgence tenant au respect, par le Procureur, de la 'Décision relative à la Requête de la Défense en Communication de preuves' rendue le 1er novembre 2000', Nyiramasuhuko et al., ICTR-97-21-T, TC II, ICTR, 8 June 2001; Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion for, inter alia, Modification of the Decision of 8 June 2001, Nyiramasuhuko et al., ICTR-97-21-T, TC II, ICTR, 25 September 2001, para. 19; Decision on the Defence Motion for Disclosure of Exculpatory Evidence, Rule 68 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Nzirorera, ICTR-98-44-I, TC III, ICTR, 7 October 2003, para. 20.

[142] This has been acknowledged by the judges. See Katanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Redactions (n 103) para. 62. See also Decision on Third Defence Motion for Leave to Appeal, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-514, PTC I, ICC, 4 October 2006.

[143] For instance, in Kenya I, the victim representative claimed that some of her clients were threatened by Ruto or his associates. She did so in her closing arguments at the end of the confirmation hearing, thereby depriving Ruto of an opportunity to respond. See Transcript of hearing of 8 September 2011, Ruto, Kosgey, and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-T-12-ENG, PTC II, ICC, 15–34.

many countries. It would, however, be naive to think that the same motivations may not induce individuals to embellish, exaggerate, or even tell untruths to benefit from relocation, health care, education allowances for children, subsistence allowance and the like in return for a narrative much sought after by a party to the litigation. At the very least, parties need to be alive to the risk that such factors may infect or colour the narratives given.

It has been alleged by at least one commentator that closed sessions, the need for redactions, and restrictions on disclosure are sometimes invoked, not to protect the safety of a witness, but for strategic reasons.[144] It may be tempting to blame evidential gaps and shortcomings in discharging the burden of proof on security threats coming from the accused, or his associates—instead of investigative shortcomings and a flawed case theory. Of course, such aspersions would be vigorously denied by the prosecution![145]

Even where fear is genuine, threats often do not come from the defendant, but may flow from societal pressures. Members of closed, often close-knit communities it seems frequently act on their own initiatives rather than on instructions from an accused. Where society is polarized, but an accused and his legal team are complying in full with orders of the court, non-disclosure to the Defence will not increase the safety of the witness concerned. The main fear is that the defendant will inform others within his community of the identities of witnesses. It should, however, be noted that, very often, the identities of those assisting the prosecution are already known in the communities before the accused is even aware of their identity. It may be the witness himself who speaks about his involvement with the tribunal or court, or his family. It may also be an officer of the court or tribunal who accidentally provides such information to people on the ground.[146]

Accordingly, when authorizing the Prosecution to redact relevant information from the Defence, Chambers should assess very carefully the necessity thereof in light of an objectively justifiable risk.

41.5.2 Non-disclosure to the public

Naturally, and quite correctly, more common than non-disclosure to the Defence is non-disclosure to the public. Many of the exhibits tendered in cases are classified as confidential and many of the proceedings occur in private, rather than public sessions. As a result, it is very hard for the public to follow the proceedings in a way that make them intelligible.

In practice, at the ICC most witnesses enjoy in-court protective measures, which usually consist of the use of a pseudonym for the witness, voice and image distortion, [144] See also T Waters, '[Redacted]: Writing and Reconciling in the Shadow of Secrecy at a War Crimes Tribunal', draft paper published in materials for The ICTR Legacy from the Defence Perspective, Conference held in Brussels, Belgium, 24 May 2010, Part V.

[145] Indeed, Whiting reacts strongly against this allegation, calling it 'unfounded'. See Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume, fn. 35.

[146] For instance, the Katanga defence team had discovered the identity of intermediary W-143 in the field long before the name was officially disclosed to it.

private sessions where needed to protect the witness's identity, as well as redactions of identifying information in the public transcript. In general, the Defence has full sight of the witness and is aware of all identifying information. Thus, it is merely the public which is excluded from having the information. Exceptionally, more drastic in-court protective measures could be granted, such as hearing the entire testimony in camera or preventing the witness from facing the accused by placing an extra curtain in the courtroom.[147]

The test for in-court protective measures is the same as set out, i.e. they will be granted only if, on a case-by-case determination, they are considered necessary 'in light of an objectively justifiable risk' and proportional 'to the rights of the accused'.[148]

Indeed, while an exceptional measure—pursuant to Article 68(1) and (2), read together with Article 64(2) and (6)(e) of the Rome Statute and Rule 87 of the Rules—the Trial Chamber is authorized to order protective measures 'to protect the safety, physical and psychological well-being, dignity and privacy of victims and witnesses' and to hold 'any part of the proceedings in camera',[149] although such measures must be in compliance with Article 68(1) and 'shall' therefore not prejudice the fair trial rights of the accused.[150]

Accordingly, in the Lubanga case, the Chamber held that applications for protective measures should not be 'routinely made in the expectation that they will be routinely granted'.[151] Unfortunately, such applications are routinely made and granted.

The extent of private sessions has meant that interested third parties seeking to follow the proceedings are confronted with a disrupted and disjointed record. Attempts to monitor the proceedings remotely and in the public gallery are significantly hampered by the frequent movement into or out of closed sessions.

The IBA expressed concern about this excessive use of private sessions.[152] The IBA held that 'to many observers, aspects of the [case] appear to be shrouded in secrecy'.[153] The IBA further noted that, from the reclassified transcripts disclosed much later, it was apparent that many of the private sessions had been unnecessary.[154] The Chamber in the case against Katanga and Ngudjolo acknowledged the 'superfluous' recourse [147] See Rules 87 and 88 Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[148] See Public redacted version of Order on protective measures for certain witnesses called by the Prosecutor and the Chamber (Rules 87 and 88 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1667-Red-tENG, TC II, ICC, 9 December 2009, paras 8–9.

[149] Confidential redacted version of Decision on 'Prosecution's First Request for In-Court Protective Measures for Trial Witnesses', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-902-Conf-Red, TC V(A), ICC, 4 September 2013, para. 11.

[150] Ibid.

[151] Transcript of hearing on 24 March 2009, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-153-Red2-ENG, TC I, ICC, at 63, lines 15–17.

[152] IBA, 'The ICC Trials: An Examination of Key Judicial Developments at the International Criminal Court between November 2009 and April 2010' (17 May 2010). See e.g. Transcript of hearing of 20 May 2010, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-144, TC II, ICC, 25–9.

[153] IBA (n 152) 39. [154] Ibid.

to private session.[155] On several occasions, the Presiding Judges in the Katanga and Lubanga cases emphasized the importance of a public hearing.[156]

The Prosecution, however, routinely asks for private sessions, even if the risk of identification is negligible. For instance, in the Katanga and Ngudjolo case the Prosecution requested for a closed session each time an NGO or a person who had cooperated with the Court was mentioned. Most of the time, the mere mention of such a person or NGO does not disclose the fact that the organization or the person had provided assistance to the Court. Their mention in public does not, therefore, put them at any risk. The Chamber agreed that such information can be discussed publicly.[157]

The Chamber in Kenya I case has gone a step further. Despite repeated objections from the defence, all witnesses except four have been granted in-court protective measures;[158] these have been the only witnesses to testify publicly and using their own names.

The normal procedure is that the Prosecution first files an application for in-court protective measures, which is then followed by a report from the VWU after assessing the witness's security concerns, recommending which in-court protective measures, if any, are to be granted. In the Kenya I case, the bench ordered the VWU to disclose their reports to the parties in order to give them an opportunity to make oral submissions thereon. Based on the witnesses' alleged subjective fears as well as a general perception that any witness in Kenya is at risk, the VWU has recommended in-court protective measures for all Kenyan witnesses so far, and this looks unlikely to change. In making such recommendations, the VWU does not investigate the security claims, nor does it undertake a risk assessment independent of what the witnesses recount. Nonetheless, in practice, the bench relies heavily on the VWU's assessment and has adopted in-court protective measures for all Kenyan witnesses thus far. This appears to sit rather uneasily with the requirement identified by the Appeals Chamber, that protective measures should not be granted on the basis of a general assessment of the security in a region only, but rather on an individualized assessment of the witness's own safety and security.[159]

While less obvious and less drastic than non-disclosure to the Defence, such non-disclosure to the public also has serious negative consequences for the defence. The right to a public hearing is one of the fundamental rights of the accused, as set out

[155] Transcript of hearing of 28 May 2010, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-149, TC II, ICC, 53–4.

[156] Transcript of hearing of 26 May 2010, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-147, TC II, ICC, 42; Transcript of hearing of 19 April 2010, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-129, 9; Transcript of hearing of 20 May 2010, Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 152) 4–5; Status conference of 16 January 2009, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-104, 3–4.

[157] Transcript of hearing of 24 March 2011, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-240-RED-ENG TC II, ICC, 33. See also Transcript of hearing of 20 May 2010, Katanga and Ngudjolo (Decision on the protective measures for W-11/279) (n 152) 4–5.

[158] The four witnesses who testified in public session were (i) a French expert living in France, (ii) a satellite expert living in the United States, (iii) a Commissioner of the Waki Commission living in New Zealand, and (iv) a Kenyan clerk in the same Commission.

[159] Lubanga Appeals Judgment on the First Decision on Rule 81 Redactions (n 104) para. 21; Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information Falling under Art 67(2) of the Statute and Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Witnesses 6, 83, 102, and 221), Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 106) para. 9.

in Article 67(1) of the Rome Statute. The principle of public hearings is also set out in Article 64(7) stating that the trial 'shall be held in public' except when 'special circumstances require that certain proceedings be in closed session for the purposes set forth in Article 68, or to protect confidential or sensitive information to be given in evidence'. Regulation 20 of the Regulations of the Court similarly sets out the principle of public trials.

Accordingly, withholding information from the public where not strictly necessary, undermines the fundamental right of the accused to a public hearing and thus to a fair trial pursuant to Article 67(1) of the Rome Statute. A real advantage of public testimony is that there is a greater possibility that persons involved in the event in question will be in a position to identify false testimony and bring it to the attention of the other party. In addition, such members of the public who know that an account of a particular witness is false may be able to offer to testify as a witness for the other party. This will not happen if the public is unable to hear and see key information pertaining to the testimony of the witness[160]

In this regard, the ECtHR has held that the public character of proceedings 'protects litigants against the administration of justice in secret with no public scrutiny; it is also one of the means whereby confidence in the courts can be maintained. By rendering the administration of justice transparent, publicity contributes to the achievement of the aim of article 6(1), namely a fair trial.'[161] Thus, public trials are important, not only to protect the fairness of the proceedings, but also to allow the public to follow what is going on. The public nature of criminal proceedings 'offers protection against arbitrary decisions and builds confidence by allowing the public to see justice administered'.[162]

Former Vice-President and ICTY Appeals Judge Florence Mumba has underscored the point that while there may be a need for limited exception to the right of a public trial, public hearings 'serve an important educational purpose, by helping people understand how the law is applied to facts that constitute crimes, acting as a check on "framed" trials, and giving the public a chance to suggest changes to the law or justice system'.[163]

Protection—when not absolutely justified—may also work as an incentive to give false testimony because false witnesses, testifying before foreign judges, may feel they can comfortably invent and concoct, and not be found out. The light of publicity militates towards more truthful testimony. Only if a witness is in real fear and there is a real risk that such fear may impact upon truthful, candid, and complete testimony should protective measures be imposed.

[160] See also Waters (n 144) 28.

[161] Judgment, Werner v Austria, ECHR (24 November 1997) para. 45. See also UN Human Rights Committee, CCPR General Comment No. 13: Art 14 (Administration of Justice), Equality before the Courts and the Right to a Fair and Public Hearing by an Independent Court Established by Law (13 April 1984) para. 6; W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 768–9.

[162] Decision on the Motions by the Prosecution for Protective Measures for the Prosecution Witnesses Pseudonymed 'B' through to 'M', Delalić et al., IT-96-21, TC, ICTY, 28 April 1997, paras 33–4.

[163] F Mumba, 'Ensuring a Fair Trial whilst Protecting Victims and Witnesses: Balancing of Interests' in R May et al. (eds), Essays on ICTY Procedure and Evidence in Honour of Gabrielle Kirk McDonald (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 2001) 359, 365.

In addition, the argument can be made that hiding the identities of the potential witnesses from the public increases, rather than decreases security issues for them. People guess and gossip about who are witnesses in high-profile trials, something that is difficult to prevent. More pertinently, if the identities of witnesses are made public, anyone approaching such a witness in relation to his or her testimony—or the trial itself—will be at risk of prosecution under Article 70. Conversely, where people do not know that an individual is a witness, such prosecutions may be more difficult and the deterrent lessened. An obvious example is where a member of the public may say negative things about the ICC or the prosecution in the presence of a person who happens to be a prosecution witness, in a manner that dissuades him or her from testifying—and it cannot be proved that the person knew that the person spoken to was, in fact, a witness. This is relevant to the intent element of Article 70. If the identity had been made public, this risk may have been lessened. The point really is that no hard and fast rule can be adopted; everything depends upon the situation of the witness himself. But a one-size-fits-all approach, which extols withholding the identity of a witness in all circumstances as the best way of addressing security concerns that may exist, may be a little simplistic and ill considered.

Where witnesses are relocated to a third country, the justification for withholding the identity of the witness should lessen and proceedings should more easily be conducted in public. Where the witness remains in the country, however, the reality is that the Court is somewhat limited as to the support that can be given. It is the state's own security and law enforcement mechanisms that must be deployed. The Court can give financial support and counselling, and remove a witness if the risk factor increases, but that is it. The reality is that the Court must rely, in part at least, on the community for a witness's safety. If the community is excluded from knowing who a potential witness is and, accordingly, who is in danger, the witness is rather defenceless. It must be remembered that in many situations open before the court (all of which relate to Africa), the sense of community—at a local level—is strong. If communities can be engaged and trusted—and motivated to ensure that witnesses testify without pressure or interference—this will constitute the most tangible and effective protection that can be given to a witness and, in doing so, it will foster increased confidence in the court process itself.

In light of this reality, the protective scheme should be applied as intended, that is, as an exception to the rule that the proceedings are public and all relevant information is disclosed to the Defence. It should stop being applied as the rule, as it currently is in the ICC. Many witnesses ask for protection even if this is not strictly required. This is confirmed by the fact that a person who testified in the case of Katanga and Ngudjolo returned to his community after being relocated for security concerns. He has not reported any difficulties since being back, although people in his community know that he testified as a witness for the Prosecution.[164]

[164] Version publique expurgée de la Décision relative à la requête du Bureau du Procureur aux fins de communiquer avec le témoin P-250 (ICC-01/04-01/07-2711-Conf, 18 février 2011), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2711-Red, TC II, ICC, 10 March 2011.

41.6 Concluding Remarks

It appears from the earlier examples that the disclosure regime, as is currently in place at the ICC, is far from ideal and is in need of improvement. The case of Muthaura does not stand alone, but it does stand out in the sense that it is the clearest example of direct and serious consequences of disclosure irregularities. In this case, it meant that the charges against Ambassador Muthaura were wrongly confirmed; in a future case, it could mean that the accused is wrongly convicted of the charges. In order to avoid repetition of the Muthaura scenario and make proposals for improvement, it is worth giving this case another careful look. The Defence maintained throughout confirmation proceedings and into the trial stage that the entire case theory of the Prosecution was flawed and that prosecution investigations had been wholly inadequate. Those defence complaints go beyond the ambit of the present chapter. But it still remains valid to ask 'what went wrong with disclosure?' Whilst that is a broad question, with the Defence alleging various serious systemic disclosure failings in that case, reference may be made to one complaint that entered the public domain in order to shed light on what is alleged to be a wider malaise in the OTP, in which disclosure obligations are apparently not properly understood by the Prosecution and/or in which processes are deficient or non-existent. Worryingly, far too often there appears to be a basic failure to even grasp the factual matrix of the case upon which so many disclosure decisions depend.

The Prosecution failed to disclose an asylum affidavit of its main witness (Witness 4) against Ambassador Muthaura. This affidavit contradicted the witness's statement to the Prosecution in respect of one of the main allegations, which is that he attended a meeting at the Nairobi Club, where Ambassador Muthaura, President Kenyatta, and others formulated and implemented the alleged common plan to commit the crimes charged.[165]

Significantly, in his affidavit, Witness 4 says someone else told him about the Nairobi Club meeting, but that he was in fact not present. The allegation about this meeting is one of the most important aspects of Witness 4's testimony. Thus, it goes without saying that this information should have been given to the Defence without delay.

Yet, instead of disclosing it, the prosecution applied to the Single Judge of the Pre-Trial Chamber for authorization to withhold the entire affidavit from the Defence. In that application, the Prosecution failed to inform the Single Judge sufficiently about the exculpatory nature of the affidavit. The Single Judge, therefore, failed to appreciate the significance of the document to the Defence and granted the application.[166]

[165] Prosecution Response to the Defence Applications under Art 64 of the Statute, Muthaura and Kenyatta (n 2) para. 9.

[166] The prosecution conceded that 'the reasoning contained in its redactions application was insufficient in light of the potential significance of [the exculpatory information]'. See ibid., paras 37–8. See also Public Redacted Version of 'Defence Application pursuant to Article 64(4) for an order to refer back to Pre-Trial Chamber II or a Judge of the Pre-Trial Division the Preliminary issue of the Validity of the Decision on the Confirmation of Charges or for an order striking out new facts alleged in the Prosecution's Pre-Trial Brief and Request for an extension of the page limit pursuant to Regulation 37(2)', Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-628-Red, Defence for Francis Kirimi Muthaura, 7 February 2013, para. 18.

If the purpose of withholding the affidavit from the defence was to protect Witness 4's identity and place of residence, the Prosecution could easily have disclosed a redacted version to the defence, as it tends to do with other documents.

The Prosecution has expressed regret for its failure to disclose this document,[167] and insists that it was the result of an 'oversight'. It informed the Court that at least two prosecution staff members had reviewed the document on relevance and disclosure issues prior to the confirmation hearing and failed to appreciate the exculpatory nature of the statement, and the Prosecution explained this as follows: 'One must be familiar with Witness 4's statements that he attended the Nairobi Club meeting to spot the apparent inconsistency, and through an oversight, the inconsistency was not identified during the disclosure review.'[168] Accordingly, 'the potential significance of [the exculpatory information] was not discovered until after the confirmation hearing'.[169]

Assuming this explanation is correct,[170] it reveals a serious systemic failure within the Prosecutor's office. Indeed, the fact that the staff members who reviewed the affidavit were not aware of Witness 4's main allegation speaks volumes. Combined with the fact that nobody, not even those who interviewed the witness and obtained the affidavit, within the Prosecutor's office corrected this mistake during the course of two years, this is evidence of a 'negligent attitude' towards evidence review and a 'serious lack of proper oversight by senior Prosecution staff'.[171] Consequently, the Chamber reprimanded the Prosecutor and required her to conduct a complete review of the case file and certify before the Chamber that she had done so, as well as to make appropriate changes to the internal review process.[172]

Indeed, this case, as well as all other described disclosure problems seriously prejudicing the Defence, demonstrates that a complete review of the current ICC disclosure regime would be warranted. In fact, it is long overdue.

41.7 Proposals for Reform

The authors make the following recommendations:

- Rule 121(3) should be amended to provide that all items of disclosure relied upon by the Prosecution to obtain a decision under Article 58 must be disclosed to the defence, at the latest, 30 days after the initial appearance of the suspect.

[167] Prosecution Response to the Defence Applications under Art 64 of the Statute, Muthaura and Kenyatta (n 2) para. 31.

[168] Ibid., paras 37–8.

[169] Ibid., paras 37–8.

[170] It should be noted that the defence alleged bad faith on the part of the prosecution, which the prosecution denies (ibid., paras 7–9, 41, and 44–6). The Chamber did not find that the prosecution acted with bad faith, but instead found that the failure to disclose this crucial information was the result of 'a grave mistake' and a deficient internal review system within the prosecution (Decision on defence application pursuant to Art 64(4) and related requests, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-728, TC (V), ICC, 26 April 2013, paras 93–4).

[171] Concurring Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert to Decision on defence application pursuant to Art 64(4) and related requests, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-728, TC V, ICC, 26 April 2013, para. 4.

[172] Decision on defence application pursuant to Art 64(4) and related requests, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-728, TC V, ICC, 26 April 2013, paras 93–104.

- The Defence should be given at a minimum one month after the final prosecution disclosure deadline (as opposed to the current 15 days under Rule 121(6)) to review the totality of the disclosure material and the DCC, and finalize defence investigations before it must disclose the evidence it tends to rely on at the confirmation hearing.
- A three-month final prosecution pre-trial disclosure deadline should be incorporated into the Rules, which can be varied only on good cause being shown.
- A summary or witness statement should always be produced in addition to the transcripts of a witness's interview.
- Withholding information from the defence and/or the public should be allowed only as intended—that is as an exception to the rule that full disclosure must be made. The criteria adopted by the Appeals Chamber should be strictly applied and incorporated into the rules. The rules should indicate that general security concerns in a region do not suffice to establish an objectively justified risk. In addition, it should specify that information can only be withheld from the Defence if its disclosure to the suspect or accused, as opposed to the general public, would create a security risk.
- The Prosecution should be as transparent as possible about the reasons underlying its application for protective measures. In fairness to the accused who is often directly or indirectly accused of being involved in witness interference, he or she should be given an adequate opportunity to respond to such allegations. Accordingly, redactions in such applications should be limited to those absolutely necessary to protect the safety of a victim or witness.
- Full, unredacted disclosure of all material to be relied on at trial should be made at some point before the start of the trial. No permanent redactions in such material from the Defence should be allowed in any circumstances. This principle should be incorporated in the Rules.
- Rule 81(4) should be construed restrictively so as to ensure that the identities of 'innocent third parties', 'potential witnesses', and 'prosecution sources' can be withheld from the defence for a limited period of time only, if at all.
- The Prosecution must review its internal disclosure system. The prosecution should consider designating one disclosure officer of at least P-4 level in each trial team, who must certify that the disclosure obligations have been fulfilled and be available to answer questions that the Court may have. It is also suggested that consideration be given to appointing a senior trial attorney with responsibilities for implementing a functioning disclosure system and consistent disclosure practices across the Prosecutor's Office. This officer is to ensure that the systemic disclosure failings are fixed and improved over time.[173]

[173] We respectfully agree with the suggestion of Professor Whiting that a senior person should be involved in disclosure management and that the OTP must 'focus on devising an adequate disclosure system to manage all of the disclosure challenges outlined in this chapter'. See Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume.

- The Prosecution should consider allowing the Defence access to an electronic disclosure program which stores all relevant investigative material. Both the ICTY and ICTR have developed an 'Electronic Disclosure Suite' (EDS) which stores millions of pages of investigative data and which is accessible to the Defence. Given the massive amounts of material available on such a database, it would not suffice for the Prosecution to place any potentially relevant materials in the database without at least indicating which documents these are. It would also be important to make such a database user-friendly. The experience with the ICTY and ICTR has shown that such a system can be cumbersome and difficult to access and use. Accordingly, while this is a great idea in principle, the Prosecution should learn from the mistakes made by their ICTR and ICTY colleagues and develop an improved system.[174]

[174] K Gibson and C Lussiaá-Berdou, 'Disclosure of Evidence' in K Khan et al. (eds), Principles of Evidence in International Criminal Justice (New York: Oxford University Press 2010) 306, 313–15. See also Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume.

42

The Roads to Freedom—Interim Release in the Practice of the ICC

*Aiste Dumbryte

42.1 Introduction

Individuals, arrested pursuant to a warrant issued by the ICC (or the Court), are detained in the Court's detention facilities in Scheveningen, the Netherlands, near the Court's headquarters in The Hague. The detention centre is housed within a Dutch prison, which has made 12 cells available for the use of the Court.[1] The first detainee, Thomas Lubanga, was arrested in March 2006. The longest-serving detainee, Germain Katanga, was in custody of the Court for nearly seven years, from his arrest in October 2007 until the conviction in March 2014.

The Rome Statute entitles detained individuals to apply for interim release pending trial.[2] Despite dozens of applications for interim release by the Court's detainees, the only two instances when an individual was allowed to leave the ICC detention centre were Jean-Pierre Bemba's heavily monitored transfers to Belgium to attend the funerals of his father and stepmother. In comparison, the ICTY has granted provisional release for various periods to over 60 individuals.[3] Meanwhile the ICTR and the SCSL have not released any individuals from their custody.[4]

Pursuant to international human rights law, pre-trial detention should be an exception rather than the rule,[5] and it should not continue beyond the period for which the state can provide appropriate justification.[6] However, international * Aiste Dumbryte is an assistant lawyer at the Registry of the European Court of Human Rights Agency. She has an Advanced LLM in International Criminal Law (Cum Laude) at Leiden University and has previously worked as a junior professional officer at the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (Presence in Albania, Rule of Law and Human Rights Department), contractor at the ICC (Victims' Participation and Reparations Section), and legal assistant at the Lithuanian Red Cross Society (Department of Refugee Affairs).

[1] W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 730.

[2] Art 60(2) of the Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[3] C Davidson, 'No Shortcuts on Human Rights: Bail and the International Criminal Trial' (2010) 60 American University Law Review 1, 36.

[4] C Muller, 'The Law of Interim Release in the Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunals' (2008) 8 International Criminal Law Review 589, 614 and 619.

[5] General Comment No. 8: Right to Liberty and Security of Persons (Art 9), UN Doc HRI/GEN/1/Rev.1 (30 June 1982), 8, para. 3.

[6] McKay v UK App. no. 543/03 (ECtHR, 3 October 2006) para. 30; Assanidze v Georgia App. No. 71503/01 (ECtHR, 8 April 2004) para. 170; Torobekov v Kyrgyzstan (2011) UN Doc CCPR/C/103/D/1547/2007, para. 6.3.

criminal tribunals differ from ordinary courts: they deal with individuals who bear the greatest responsibility for especially heinous crimes affecting numerous victims. With this consideration in mind, several scholars have questioned whether human rights standards should apply just as rigidly in international criminal trials as they do in domestic trials concerning ordinary crimes.[7]

Accordingly, the aim of this chapter is to examine whether the ICC has managed to achieve an appropriate balance between two competing values: the accused's right to liberty, and the effective administration of international criminal justice. It will analyse the existing case law on the allocation of the burden of proof in cases of interim release, as well as the three available avenues of interim release: first, failing to meet the grounds for detention under Article 60(2); second, unreasonable length of detention under Article 60(4); third, release due to exceptional humanitarian circumstances, developed in the Court's jurisprudence.

42.2 Burden of Proof

42.2.1 Allocation of burden of proof

The Trial Chamber in Gbagbo affirmed 'the fundamental principle that deprivation of liberty should be an exception and not the rule'.[8] In accordance with this principle, human rights law places the burden on the state authorities to provide sufficient reasons in order to justify the necessity of detaining an individual; if they fail to do so, the individual in question must be released.[9]

In comparison, the ad hoc international criminal tribunals have created a system in which detention is considered the norm and release is an exception. The ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence (ICTY RPE), adopted in 1994, allowed provisional release only in exceptional circumstances.[10] This placed the burden on the accused to prove that in his/her case there were indeed exceptional circumstances that warranted release.[11] According to the Trial Chamber in Blaškić, 'both the letter … and the spirit of the Statute require that the legal principle is detention of the accused and that release is the exception'.[12] Unsurprisingly, only four individuals were granted

[7] W Schabas, Introduction to the International Criminal Court (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2004) 137; G McIntyre, 'Defining Human Rights in the Arena of International Humanitarian Law: Human Rights in the Jurisprudence of the ICTY' in G Boas and W Schabas (eds), International Criminal Law Developments in the Case Law of the ICTY (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 2003) 193–4.

[8] Third Decision on the Review of Laurent Gbagbo's Detention Pursuant to Art 60(3) of the Rome Statute, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-454, PTC I, ICC, 11 July 2013, para. 55.

[9] Ilijkov v Bulgaria App no 33977/96 (ECtHR, 26 July 2001) para. 85; Israil v Kazakhstan (2011) UN Doc CCPR/C/103/D/2024/2011, para. 9.2.

[10] Rule 65(B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 (adopted 11 February 1994) UN Doc IT/32 ('ICTY RPE 1994').

[11] Decision on Motion for Provisional Release Filed by the Accused Zejnil Delalić, Delalić, IT-96-21-T, TC, ICTY, 25 September 1996, para. 19.

[12] Order Denying a Motion for Provisional Release, Blaškić, IT-95-14-T, TC, ICTY, 20 December 1996, 4.

provisional release under this regime.[13] In December 1999 Rule 65(B) of the RPE was amended and the requirement of exceptional circumstances was removed, prompting some ICTY judges to argue that this meant shifting the burden to the prosecutor to prove that detention was necessary.[14] However, the Trial Chamber in Brđanin held that 'the wording of the Rule squarely places the onus at all times on the applicant to establish his entitlement to provisional release'.[15] The ICTR and the SCSL likewise place the burden on the detainee to establish his/her right to provisional release.[16]

Does the ICC uphold the principle that liberty is the rule and detention is the exception, or is it following in the footsteps of the ad hoc tribunals? Neither the Rome Statute nor the RPE explicitly mentions the allocation of burden of proof in cases of interim release. The drafting history of the Statute may be seen as implying that the Court intended to move away from the practice of the ad hocs. The draft statute adopted by the Preparatory Committee on 3 April 1998 provided that 'the person shall be detained unless [the Court] is satisfied that the person will voluntarily appear for trial and none of the other factors in [Article 59(1)(b)] are present'.[17] This formulation clearly established detention as the rule and required the accused to satisfy the relevant organs of the Court that he/she will not abscond and will comply with other relevant conditions. However, the Rome Conference ultimately rejected this text. The current formulation of Article 60(2) therefore reads that 'the person shall continue to be detained' 'if the Pre-Trial Chamber is satisfied that the conditions set forth in [Article 58(1)] are met'.[18] This means that detention is only possible if certain conditions are fulfilled, and thus logic would seem to suggest that the side which seeks to keep the individual in detention must bear the burden of proving the existence of the necessary conditions. According to Article 60(3) and Rule 118(2), the Court must regularly review its ruling on detention,[19] and within the scope of this review it must consider all relevant information and not only the arguments raised by the detained person.[20]

[13] M DeFrank, 'ICTY Provisional Release: Current Practice, a Dissenting Voice, and the Case for a Rule Change' (2001–2) 80 Texas Law Review 1429, 1430.

[14] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Patrick Robinson, Decision on Momčilo Krajišnik's Notice of Motion for Provisional Release, Krajišnik and Plavšić, IT-00-39 & 40-PT, TC, ICTY, 8 October 2001, para. 18.

[15] Decision on Motion by Radoslav for Provisional Release, Brđanin and Talić, IT-99-36-T TC II, ICTY, 25 July 2000, para. 13.

[16] Decision on Defence Motion to Fix a Date for the Commencement of the Trial of Father Emmanuel Rukundo or, in the Alternative, to Request his Provisional Release, Rukundo, ICTR-2001-70-I, TC III, ICTR, 18 August 2003, para. 21; Decision on the Motion by Morris Kallon for Bail, Sesay et al., SCSL-04-15-PT, TC, SCSL, 23 February 2004, para. 32.

[17] Art 60(6) of the Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, UN Doc A/CONF.183/2/Add.1 (14 April 1998)(emphasis added).

[18] Art 60(2) ICC Statute (emphasis added).

[19] Art 60(3) ICC Statute; Rule 118(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Official Records of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE'): the ruling on detention shall be reviewed every 120 days.

[20] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 28 July 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Review of the Detention of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Pursuant to Rule 118(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1019, AC, ICC, 19 November 2010, para. 52.

However, in the Court's case law to date, the change of circumstances underlying the previous decision on detention, or the appearance of new facts which necessitate a modification of that decision, must in fact be proved by the accused. For example, the Trial Chamber in Bemba found that none of the arguments presented by the Defence, such as the accused's diminishing political status and shrinking finances, constituted a substantive change in circumstances, and thus declined to order interim release.[21] Another Trial Chamber in Gbagbo rejected the Defence's claim that a Pre-Trial Chamber decision adjourning the confirmation hearing constituted a new fact, and held that this decision did not have any effect on the need to keep Gbagbo in detention.[22] In none of the cases to date did the Chamber examine possible changed circumstances which had not been raised by the Defence. Placing the burden of proof on the accused was criticized by several judges of the Appeals Chamber, who argued that even when the detained person does not submit any arguments, the Chamber must nonetheless analyse, on the basis of evidence presented by the prosecution, whether the grounds for detention continue to be met.[23] However, the majority of the ICC judges have so far decided to the contrary and followed the model of the ad hoc tribunals.

42.2.2 Justification for shifting the burden of proof

Pursuant to Article 21(3) of the Rome Statute, the application and interpretation of law by the Chambers must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights. In the context of interim release, various Chambers have referred to human rights jurisprudence and held that deprivation of liberty must be considered an exception and not the rule,[24] and that the Defence must be able to effectively challenge the lawfulness of detention.[25] How, then, does the shifting of the burden of proof onto the accused and requiring him/her to justify his/her entitlement to interim release comply with Article 21(3)?

In this regard, the ICTY has offered two reasons to justify the departure from human rights standards: first, the 'extreme gravity' of the crimes charged by the Tribunal;[26] and second, the absence of any power in the Tribunal to execute its own arrest warrants.[27] Some scholars argue that international criminal courts are more akin to military tribunals than civilian courts, and thus they should be entitled to develop their own human rights standards.[28] Meanwhile, others claim that requiring [21] Decision on the Review of the Detention of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Pursuant to Rule 118(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-743, TC III, ICC, 1 April 2010, paras 28–9.

[22] Gbagbo (n 8) paras 35–6.

[23] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Georghios M Pikis, Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled 'Decision on Application for Interim Release', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-323, AC, ICC, 16 December 2008, para. 24; Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Laurent Koudou Gbagbo against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 13 July 2012 entitled 'Decision on the "Requête de la Défense Demandant la Mise en Liberté Provisoire du Président Gbagbo"', L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-278-Red, AC, ICC, 26 October 2012, para. 22.

[24] Gbagbo (n 8) para. 55. [25] Bemba (n 23) para. 32. [26] Delalić (n 11) para. 19.

[27] Brđanin (n 15) para. 18. [28] McIntyre (n 7) 193–4.

the accused to prove that he/she will not flee or interfere with the evidence is 'neither just nor logical',[29] and warn that reduced protection leads to such examples as that of Théoneste Bagosora, who was detained by the ICTR for 12 years before his conviction, without release.[30]

Without prejudice to the importance of safeguarding the rights of the accused, the specific context in which international criminal tribunals operate may indeed require a different application of human rights standards in order to make interim release more difficult. As established in the Rome Statute, the ICC only exercises jurisdiction over the most serious crimes of international concern.[31] In accordance with the jurisprudence of the ECtHR, the seriousness of charges is one of the factors that may justify prolonged detention,[32] and many domestic jurisdictions deny interim release to individuals accused of murder and other serious crimes.[33] In addition, the ICC only deals with 'big fish'—individuals who often maintain considerable political powers and have influential networks of support; states may be reluctant to arrest them, and victims are likely afraid to testify as long as they are at large.[34] Thus, there are valid grounds to assume that such individuals would flee or interfere with the court proceedings if released. In a case concerning a former high-ranking police official accused of drug trafficking, the ECtHR found that lengthy pre-trial detention without interim release was justified by the combined effect of the gravity of charges, the individual's influential position, and his acquaintance with many witnesses in the case.[35] All these factors are typically present in the cases before the ICC. Therefore, shifting the burden on the accused to prove that the extreme gravity of charges against him/her does not preclude interim release may be deemed reasonable in the circumstances and is arguably in line with international human rights standards.

42.3 Interim Release under Article 60(2): Failing to Meet the Grounds for Detention

The test for granting interim release under the Rome Statute is significantly more complicated than the one adopted by the ad hoc criminal tribunals. The latter had established two conditions for the accused to meet: the Tribunal must be satisfied that the accused will appear for trial and that he/she will not pose any danger to victims and witnesses.[36] Meanwhile, Article 60(2) of the Rome Statute foresees a [29] A Trotter, 'Innocence, Liberty and Provisional Release at the ICTY: A Post-Mortem of "Compelling Humanitarian Grounds" in Context' (2012) 12 Human Rights Law Review 353, 364.

[30] G Sluiter, 'Human Rights Protection in the ICC Pre-Trial Phase' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009), 461–2.

[31] Arts 1 and 5 ICC Statute.

[32] Clooth v Belgium App. no. 12718/87 (ECtHR, 12 December 1991) para. 40; Tomasi v France App. no. 12850/87 (ECtHR, 27 August 1992) para. 89.

[33] DeFrank (n 13) 145.

[34] K Doran, 'Provisional Release in International Human Rights Law and International Criminal Law' (2011) 11 International Criminal Law Review 707, 724–5.

[35] Shikuta v Russia App. no. 45373/05 (ECtHR, 11 April 2013) paras 46–7.

[36] Rule 65(B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 (adopted 11 February 1994, as amended 22 May 2013) UN

two-prong test: in order for the continued detention to be justified, the requirement in Article 58(1)(a) (reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court) must be met cumulatively with at least one of the conditions set in Article 58(1)(b) (risk of flight; risk of interfering with the Court proceedings; risk of continuing commission of crimes).[37] If the accused proves the absence of all of the circumstances listed in Article 58(1)(a) and 58(1)(b), there is yet an additional condition: the Chamber must consult the state to which the accused seeks to be released[38]—if such a state is not willing and able to accept the person concerned and to enforce the conditions imposed by the Court, interim release will be denied.[39]

As established by the ICC Appeals Chamber in Lubanga, the decision pursuant to Article 60(2) is not of a discretionary nature: if the criteria for continuing detention are met, the person shall remain in detention, whereas if they are not met, the person shall be released.[40] In this respect, the Rome Statute again differs from the RPE of the ICTY, which gives the Tribunal discretion to continue detaining the accused even when the grounds for provisional release are met. Conversely, if these grounds are not met, the Tribunal has no discretion to grant release.[41]

42.3.1 Reasonable grounds under Article 58(1)(a)

Article 58(1)(a) of the Rome Statute sets the conditions that the Prosecutor must meet when applying for a warrant of arrest. When the Pre-Trial Chamber makes a decision on the arrest of an individual, it must assess and confirm the existence of reasonable grounds to believe that the said individual has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court.[42] In accordance with Article 60(2), these grounds must be considered anew when deciding on interim release. As established by the Appeals Chamber in Gbagbo, at that stage it is imperative to determine de novo whether the conditions of Article 58(1)(a) are met, because that is when the submissions of the Defence are heard for the first time.[43] Judge Pikis similarly argued in Bemba that relying on the Doc IT/32/Rev. 49 ('ICTY RPE'); Rule 65(B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (adopted 29 June 1995, as amended 10 April 2013) UN Doc ITR/3/Rev.22 ('ICTR RPE'); Rule 65(B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Special Court for Sierra Leone (adopted 16 January 2002, as amended 31 May 2012) ('SCSL RPE').

[37] ICC-01/05-01/08-475, PTC II, ICC, 14 August 2009, para. 50.

[38] Regulation 51 of the Regulations of the Court, ICC-BD/01-01-04, 26 May 2004 (adopted by the judges of the Court during the Fifth Plenary Session) ('ICC Regulations').

[39] Judgment on the Appeal of the Prosecutor against Pre-Trial Chamber II's 'Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-631-Red, AC, ICC, 2 December 2009, paras 106–7.

[40] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Décision sur la Demande de Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-824, AC, ICC, 13 February 2007, para. 134.

[41] Brđanin (n 15) para. 22; DeFrank (n 13) 1432.

[42] C Hall, 'Article 58' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (München: C H Beck 2008) 1137–9.

[43] Gbagbo (n 23) para. 23.

decision of another Pre-Trial Chamber, taken in the absence of the arrested individual, prevents the accused from effectively challenging his/her detention.[44] The Defence in Gbagbo has also noted that more information is available to the Chamber at the time of its decision on interim release than when the arrest warrant was issued, so the Chamber should consider whether the conditions of Article 58(1)(a) continue to be met in light of this new information.[45]

However, in practice the Chambers have thus far chosen to confirm the reasoning of the arrest warrant and reject the Defence's submissions.[46] Single Judge Tarfusser in Bemba et al. expressed doubts as 'to what extent a Pre-Trial Chamber . . . can be meaningfully called upon reassessing the existence of reasonable grounds to believe that a crime has been committed in the context of an application for interim release'.[47] In Gbagbo, even after the Pre-Trial Chamber chose not to confirm any of the charges against Laurent Gbagbo and adjourned the hearing, ordering the prosecutor to submit additional evidence, the Appeals Chamber held that this did not eliminate the reasonable grounds under Article 58(1)(a) and declined to grant interim release.[48] Furthermore, the Trial Chamber found in Bemba that 'substantial grounds' under Article 61(7) imply a higher evidentiary threshold than 'reasonable grounds' under Article 58(1)(a).[49] Therefore, when the charges have been confirmed pursuant to Article 61 of the Statute, the threshold of Article 58(1)(a) will always be met as well.

Consequently, the ICC jurisprudence makes it evident that reasonable grounds to believe that an individual has committed a crime within the Court's jurisdiction remain as long as the proceedings against that individual continue. Thus, the chances for the Defence to successfully challenge the application of Article 58(1)(a) are extremely low. Furthermore, application of Article 58(1)(a) in determination of interim release raises conceptual problems as well: if the Chamber was unable to establish reasonable grounds to believe that an individual had committed crimes, this would require revoking the arrest warrant and terminating the proceedings against the accused, and not merely granting interim release.[50] For this reason some scholars [44] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Georghios M Pikis, Bemba (n 23) paras 21–2, 32.

[45] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Laurent Gbagbo against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 July 2013 entitled 'Third Decision on the Review of Laurent Gbagbo's Detention Pursuant to Article 60(3) of the Rome Statute', L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-548-Red, AC, ICC, 29 October 2013, para. 30.

[46] Decision on Application for Interim Release, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-321, PTC III, ICC, 16 December 2008, para. 34; Decision on the Application for Interim Release of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-345, PTC I, ICC, 27 March 2008, 6; Decision on the 'Requête de la Défense Demandant la Mise en Liberté Provisoire du Président Gbagbo', L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-180-Red, PTC I, ICC, 13 July 2012, para. 53.

[47] Decision on the 'Requête Urgente de la Défense Sollicitant la Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Monsieur Fidèle Babala Wandu', Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-258, PTC II, 14 March 2014, para. 5.

[48] Gbagbo (n 45) para. 41.

[49] Public Redacted Version of the 'Decision on Applications for Provisional Release' of 27 June 2011, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1565-Red, TC III, ICC, 16 August 2011, para. 53.

[50] Schabas (n 1) 725.

speculate that the drafters of the Rome Statute must have intended to limit the analysis under Article 60(2) to the grounds set in Article 58(1)(b) and not to include Article 58(1)(a).[51] Therefore, it is proposed here to amend the Rome Statute and exclude Article 58(1)(a) from the test under Article 60(2)—its analysis should be explicitly limited to the existence of the factors listed in Article 58(1)(b), similarly to the test adopted by the ad hoc tribunals.

42.3.2 Conditions under Article 58(1)(b)

Article 58(1)(b) of the Rome Statute lists three conditions under which detention can be justified: risk of flight; risk of interference with the proceedings; risk of continuing commission of crimes. Any one of them is sufficient to keep an individual in the Court's custody; thus, in order to be granted interim release, the accused must prove that none of the three risks can be established.[52] As already noted, risk of flight and of interference with the proceedings are assessed by the ad hoc tribunals as well.[53] International human rights law also allows states to use such grounds to justify deprivation of liberty.[54]

The standard of proof that must be met by the Prosecutor is that of appearance: detention must 'appear to be necessary'.[55] As stated by the Appeals Chamber in Katanga and Ngudjolo, the question whether any of the three conditions under Article 58(1)(b) are met 'revolves around the possibility, not the inevitability, of a future occurrence'.[56] The Appeals Chamber in Lubanga also found that such analysis 'necessarily involves an element of prediction'.[57] In practice, this means that the prosecution does not need to show concrete actions taken by the accused to abscond or to interfere with the Court proceedings—the mere possibility of him/her engaging in such conduct will suffice to keep him/her in detention.[58]

The Appeals Chamber in Ntaganda accepted that the prosecutor can meet this standard of proof by relying on information from external sources (in that case—a group of experts appointed by the UN Secretary General), as long as these sources employ a 'rigorous methodology' and are 'sufficiently detailed'.[59] However, dissenting Judges Ušacka and Van den Wyngaert warned that such external experts often lack the specific expertise that is necessary for criminal investigations, and thus it is essential for the OTP to carry out its own independent investigation.[60]

[51] Ibid., 724. [52] Lubanga (n 40) para. 139.

[53] Rule 65(B) ICTY RPE, ICTR RPE, and SCSL RPE. See also (n 36).

[54] Tiron v Romania App. no. 17689/03 (ECtHR, 7 April 2009) para. 37; WBE v Netherlands (1992) UN Doc CCPR/C/46/D/432/1990, para. 6.3.

[55] Art 58(1)(b) ICC Statute; Lubanga (n 40) para. 135; Bemba (n 23) para. 51.

[56] Judgment in the Appeal by Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui of 27 March 2008 against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I on the Application of the Appellant for Interim Release, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-572, AC, ICC, 9 June 2008, para. 21.

[57] Lubanga (n 40) para. 137. [58] Bemba (n 23) para. 67.

[59] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Bosco Ntaganda against the Decision of Pre-Trial chamber II of 18 November 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Defence's Application for Interim Release', Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-271-Red, AC, ICC, 5 March 2014, paras 37–43.

[60] Ibid., Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, ICC-01/04-02/06-271-Anx1, para. 23; ibid., Dissenting Opinion of Judge Christine Van den Wyngaert, ICC-01/04-02/06-271-Anx2, paras 1–4.

42.3.2.1 Risk of flight

The Appeals Chamber has established that the necessity of continued detention in order to ensure the person's appearance at trial cannot be decided on the basis of one factor taken in isolation—instead, all relevant factors must be taken together.[61] The Court's jurisprudence permits to draw a distinction between three types of factors: (a) those related to the individual conduct, (b) to the court proceedings, and (c) to the cooperation of states.

42.3.2.1.1 Factors related to the conduct of the accused Factors examined by the Court include the accused's political position, influence, and contacts;[62] financial resources available to him/her;[63] his/her assurance to cooperate with the Court;[64] good behaviour in detention;[65] education, professional, or social status;[66] and family ties.[67] In assessing these factors, the Chambers seem to presume that the individual constitutes a risk of flight, unless there is sufficient proof to the contrary. For example, the Trial Chamber in Bemba stated that the accused's undertaking to voluntarily return and cooperate with the Court is insufficient to mitigate the risk of flight because there is no way of verifying the truth of such promises[68]—irrespective of the fact that the accused had been temporarily released and complied with all the conditions,[69] a factor relied on by the ICTY.[70] In Gbagbo, the Pre-Trial Chamber found that the continuing political support for the accused increased the possibility of absconding,[71] although Judge Ušacka of the Appeals Chamber criticized the failure to assess Laurent Gbagbo's character and whether he was still interested in returning to political office.[72] In Mbarushimana, the Pre-Trial Chamber accepted the prosecutor's argument that releasing the accused to France would allow him to move freely within the Schengen area and thus increase the risk of flight, despite any evidence of his intentions or previous attempts to do so.[73] In comparison, the SCSL in Fofana established the risk of [61] Ntaganda (n 59) para. 55.

[62] Decision on the Application for Interim Release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-586-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 18 October 2006, 6.

[63] Decision on the 'Defence Request for Interim Release', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-163, PTC I, ICC, 19 May 2011, para. 46.

[64] Bemba (n 46) para. 37.

[65] Bemba (n 37) para. 64.

[66] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Aimé Kilolo Musamba against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 14 March 2014 entitled 'Decision on the "Demande de Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Maître Aimé Kilolo Musamba"', Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-558, AC, ICC, 11 July 2014, para. 111.

[67] Ibid., para. 68.

[68] Public Redacted Version of the Decision on the 'Demande de Mise en Liberté Provisoire de M Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Afin d'Accomplir ses Devoirs Civiques en République Démocratique du Congo' of 2 September 2011, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1691, TC III, ICC, 2 September 2011, para. 22.

[69] Bemba (n 37) para. 65.

[70] Decision on the Motion for Provisional Release of the Accused Prlić, Prlić et al., IT-04-74-T, TC III, ICTY, 11 June 2007, 3.

[71] Gbagbo (n 46) para. 60.

[72] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, Gbagbo (n 23) para. 25.

[73] Mbarushimana (n 63) para. 50.

absconding only on the basis of concrete evidence of the accused's previous visits to neighbouring countries.[74]

The Ntaganda case provided the Court with its first opportunity to consider the weight of the accused's voluntary surrender in the assessment of the risk of flight. At the ICTY, voluntary surrender was a significant factor in favour of granting interim release.[75] Meanwhile, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber concluded that Bosco Ntaganda's surrender was motivated not by 'good will to comply with international justice', but rather by the likelihood of him being killed by the armed groups operating in the DRC and Rwanda,[76] and thus denied the application for interim release. While this decision demonstrates the Court's ability to examine the individual's conduct in a broader context, it also raises concerns that the Court is willing to engage in a more contextual analysis only when this works to the detriment of the accused.

In several cases the ICC judges relied on the accused being part of a 'network' that may provide him/her with the means to abscond.[77] In Bemba et al., Single Judge Tarfusser held that Aimé Kilolo Musamba and Jean-Jacques Mangenda Kabongo belonged to the network of Jean-Pierre Bemba by virtue of serving as the lead counsel and the case manager, respectively, in Bemba's case at the Court.[78] Some scholars criticized this decision as contempt for defence lawyers, which the single judge found to be 'no different than Bemba's henchmen and enforcers'.[79] Kilolo in his appeal also argued that his relationship to Bemba was professional and not personal, and thus insufficient to make him part of Bemba's network.[80] However, the Appeals Chamber upheld the reasoning of the single judge.[81] This demonstrates that the ICC is willing to apply a wide-reaching definition of a 'network' as a justification for the risk of flight. Without elaborating any criteria as to what type and level of relationship is necessary to make an individual part of a network, the Court risks unduly restricting the accused's ability to prove the absence of risks under Article 58(1)(b).

Contrary to these examples, Single Judge Trendafilova found in Bemba that the findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber cannot be built solely on a hypothetical argument. Relying on the cumulative effect of such factors as Jean-Pierre Bemba's good behaviour in detention, full cooperation during an earlier temporary release, and willingness to live as a public figure and not a fugitive, the single judge found that Article 58(1)(b)(i) was not satisfied.[82] This decision goes in line with international human rights

[74] Fofana—Decision on Application for Bail Pursuant to Rule 65, Norman et al., SCSL-04-14-T, TC, SCSL, 5 August 2004, para. 79.

[75] Brđanin (n 15) para. 17; DeFrank (n 13) 1432–4.

[76] Decision on the Defence's Application for Interim Release', Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-147, PTC II, PT Ch II (18 November 2013) paras 42–4.

[77] Decision on Application for Interim Release, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-80-Anx, PTC III, ICC, 20 August 2008, para. 24; Gbagbo (n 46) para. 60.

[78] Decision on the 'Demande de Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Maître Aimé Kilolo Musamba', Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-259, PTC II, ICC, 14 March 2014, para. 22; Decision on the 'Requête de Mise en Liberté' Submitted by the Defence for Jean-Jacques Mangenda, Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-261, PTC II, 17 March 2014, para. 29.

[79] K Heller, 'PTC II to Defence Attorneys: You Are All Criminals' (Opinio Juris, 28 April 2014) <http://opiniojuris.org/2014/04/28/ptc-defence-attorneys-criminals/> accessed 20 July 2014.

[80] Bemba et al. (n 66) para. 91. [81] Ibid., paras 104–5. [82] Bemba (n 37) paras 61–9.

jurisprudence, where it has been repeatedly stated that showing that it is easy or possible for the detainee to abscond is insufficient: concrete circumstances making his/her flight particularly likely must be demonstrated.[83] However, Judge Trendafilova's decision was reversed on appeal.[84]

The approach taken by the single judge in Bemba deserves credit. The subsequent judgment of the Appeals Chamber failed to analyse all the relevant factors together, instead taking them separately and stating that none was sufficient to grant interim release.[85] The Appeals Chamber criticized the single judge for not justifying why any of these factors had considerable weight, while the Chamber itself failed to provide any explanation for why they did not.[86] For instance, it found that the accused's behaviour during a prior temporary release was irrelevant, since he had been 'left with no choice but to comply'[87]—in fact, this shows the exact opposite: conditions imposed by the Chamber can remove the risk of flight.

Thus, the current state of the Court's practice in relation to the individual conduct relevant to the risk of flight is ambiguous: on one hand, the Appeals Chamber has emphasized the need to examine all the relevant circumstances taken together; on the other hand, in practice it has been more willing to accept hypothetical risks than analyse the cumulative effect of individual circumstances. However, a theoretical possibility of flight will always exist, and it would be unreasonable to require the Defence to completely deny it. Instead, in order to ensure that the accused has an actual opportunity to challenge his/her detention, the previous conduct of the accused should be given particularly great weight in determining future risks.

42.3.2.1.2 Factors related to the Court proceedings

In addition to the factors relating to personal circumstances, the Court has also considered the seriousness of the charges against the individual and the length of the potential sentence.[88] These grounds are commonly considered by the ICTY and the ECtHR as well.[89] However, international criminal tribunals are different from domestic courts: all the crimes within the jurisdiction of the former are very serious and envisage long sentences, as acknowledged by the ICTY in Haradinaj.[90] In this light, the Defence in Gbagbo argued that reliance on gravity creates a 'de facto irrebuttable presumption' against the accused.[91] The Appeals Chamber rejected this argument; however, its reasoning was unconvincing. The Chamber merely stated that the seriousness of charges in respect of some or all other suspects brought before the Court 'does not detract from the fact that the charges against Mr Gbagbo are serious'.[92] However,

[83] Stogmuller v Austria App. no. 1602/62 (ECtHR, 10 November 1969) para. 15; Hill v Spain (1997) UN Doc CCPR/C/59/D/526/1993, para. 12.3.

[84] Bemba (n 39) paras 87–8. [85] Ibid., para. 83. [86] Id. [87] Id.

[88] Lubanga (n 40) para. 136.

[89] Decision on Motion for Provisional Release Filed by Zoran Kupreškić, Mirjan Kupreškić, Drago Josipović, and Dragan Papić (Joined by Marinko Katava and Vladimir Šantić), Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16-T, TC, ICTY, 15 December 1997, para. 15; Panchenko v Russia App. no. 45100/98 (ECtHR, 8 February 2005) para. 105.

[90] Decision on Ramush Haradinaj's Motion for Provisional Release, Haradinaj et al., IT-04-84-PT, TC II, ICTY, 6 June 2005, para. 24.

[91] Gbagbo (n 23) para. 34. [92] Ibid., para. 54.

allowing the prosecutor to prove the risk of flight solely on the basis of gravity of the charges creates an unfair disadvantage to the accused.

A different situation occurred in Bemba et al. where four individuals were accused of offences against the administration of justice under Article 70 of the Rome Statute. When deciding their applications for interim release, Single Judge Tarfusser held that the lesser gravity of these offences is not 'per se suitable to diminish the risk of flight'.[93] The Appeals Chamber found this conclusion 'problematic'; it emphasized that the offences under Article 70 cannot be considered as grave as the core crimes under Article 5, and thus the gravity of such offences should not be given undue weight in assessing the risk of flight.[94] Indeed, it is important to ensure that the criterion of gravity of charges is not applied selectively to the detriment of the accused. In addition, Judge Ušacka in her dissent questioned whether the principles developed in relation to Articles 58(1) and 60(2) in the context of core crimes can be simply transferred to the context of offences against the administration of justice, or whether there is a need to develop alternative principles.[95] It is regrettable that the majority of the Appeals Chamber did not find it necessary to examine this question. The stage of the proceedings is also considered relevant when assessing the risk of flight: several Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers found that such a risk increases after the person's arrest;[96] it further increases after the confirmation of charges,[97] and increases even more after the start of the trial.[98] Such an approach deprives Article 58(1)(b)(i) of any actual meaning, since it allows the very fact of the ongoing investigation or trial to serve as a justification for detention. In such circumstances, the prosecution does not even need to present evidence related to the individual's behaviour. No comparable approach can be found in the case law of the ICTY or ECtHR.[99] Reliance on the stage of the proceedings establishes a very low threshold for the prosecution and excessively restricts the accused's ability to challenge his/her detention.

42.3.2.1.3 Factors related to the cooperation of states

In examining the risk of flight, the Court has looked at the availability of alternative means of restricting the individual's liberty and keeping him/her under surveillance. As the ICC does not have a territory to which the defendants could be released, interim release cannot be implemented without a state that is willing and able to accept the accused and enforce the conditions imposed by the Court.[100] Accordingly, Regulation

[93] Bemba et al. (n 47) para. 22.

[94] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Fidèle Babala Wandu against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of 14 March 2014 entitled 'Decision on the "Requête Urgente de la Défense Sollicitant la Mise en Liberté Provisoire de Monsieur Fidèle Babala Wandu" ', Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-559, AC, ICC, 11 July 2014, paras 88–9.

[95] Ibid., Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, ICC-01/05-01/13-559-Anx2, para. 16.

[96] Decision on Application for Interim Release, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-403, PTC II, ICC, 14 April 2009, para. 47.

[97] Bemba (n 39) para. 70.

[98] Decision on the Review of Detention of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo Pursuant to the Appeals Judgment of 19 November 2010, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1088, TC III, ICC, 17 December 2010, para. 32.

[99] V Tochilovsky, Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Courts and the European Court of Human Rights: Procedure and Evidence (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2008) 598 and 611.

[100] Bemba (n 96) paras 49–50.

51 requires the Chamber to consult the state to which the accused seeks to be released, irrespective of the grounds on which interim release is sought. In this light, Single Judge Trendafilova in Bemba was willing to take a cautious approach to provisional release and deny such a possibility, absent clear guarantees by a state in which the accused may reside.[101] A similar approach was taken by the ICTY in Brđanin[102] and the ICTR in Nsengimana.[103] Nonetheless, in a subsequent decision, Judge Trendafilova emphasized that States Parties have a duty to cooperate with the Court and the lack of guarantees 'cannot weigh heavily' against the release of the accused.[104]

This creates a dilemma. On one hand, the Rome Statute does not include an explicit obligation for States Parties to accept the accused individuals onto their territories,[105] and the reluctance of states to do so is understandable by their wish to protect their own security and public order. On the other hand, Article 21(3) of the Statute requires the Court to adhere to international human rights standards, and thus restricting the liberty of an individual, who would otherwise deserve to be released, should not be based on external factors outside his/her influence.[106] In order to ensure that individuals do not remain in detention merely because of logistical obstacles, the Court should attempt to enter into framework agreements on interim release, similar to agreements on witness relocation that have been signed with 12 States Parties.[107] Having such agreements before the actual need arises would help to avoid unjustified restrictions on the accused's right to liberty.[108]

Nonetheless, even when a state[109] was willing to accept Jean-Pierre Bemba on its territory and provided a detailed list of conditions that it was ready to impose, the ICC still refused to release him. The proposed conditions included round-the-clock monitoring of the accused's place of residence, unannounced visits to his place of residence to verify his presence there, and monitoring all telephone calls made and received by the accused.[110] In fact, they were more detailed than the conditions accepted by the ICTY in Prlić[111] and Haradinaj.[112] However, the Trial Chamber stated that although these measures may increase the difficulty of absconding, they were unable to reduce such a risk 'to an acceptable degree'.[113] As the proposed conditions seemed prima facie sufficient to diminish the risk of flight, the lack of any further explanation by the Trial Chamber in this regard is regrettable. Moreover, despite repeated requests by the [101] Id. [102] Brđanin (n 15) para. 18.

[103] Decision on Nsengimana's Motion for the Setting of a Date for a Pre-Trial Conference, a Date for the Commencement of Trial, and for Provisional Release, Nsengimana, ICTR-01-69-I, TC II, ICTR, 11 July 2005, para. 18.

[104] Bemba (n 37) paras 88–9. Although the Appeals Chamber subsequently overturned the decision, this particular point was not examined on appeal.

[105] Part IX ICC Statute.

[106] Trotter (n 29) 369: 'There is no easy solution to this dilemma, except to say that administrative and diplomatic inconvenience is not an extremely good reason for the infringement of human rights.'

[107] D Chaikel and L Smith van Lin, 'Witnesses before the International Criminal Court', International Bar Association Report (2013), 35.

[108] Davidson (n 3) 69. [109] The name of the state was redacted from the Court's decision.

[110] Public Redacted Version of the 26 September 2011 Decision on the Accused's Application for Provisional Release in Light of the Appeals Chamber's Judgment of 19 August 2011, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1789-Red, TC III, ICC, 27 September 2011, para. 13.

[111] Prlić (n 70) 4. [112] Haradinaj (n 90) para. 42. [113] Bemba (n 110) paras 37–8.

Defence to clarify the conditions that would mitigate this risk, the Appeals Chamber refused to do that,[114] thus leaving states without any guidance on how to cooperate with the Court in ensuring the accused's right to liberty. This can be contrasted with the jurisprudence of the ICTY, which was willing to accept detailed guarantees provided by states, unless they had a history of non-cooperation with the Tribunal[115] or were likely to be reluctant to arrest a particular person due to his/her former political influence and valuable information in his/her possession.[116]

42.3.2.2 Risk of interference with the proceedings

In the Court's jurisprudence to date, Article 58(1)(b)(ii) has been primarily analysed in the light of the ability of the accused to interfere with victims and witnesses. In determining such risk, the Appeals Chamber in Bemba rejected the argument that it was necessary to establish 'current and concrete actions' of the accused in respect of witnesses; instead, the Chamber analysed the potential risks related to the accused's ability to influence victims and witnesses.[117] In this respect the ICC differs from the ICTY, which has held that a heightened ability to interfere with victims and witnesses is insufficient to demonstrate that the accused will do so, and obstruction to the court proceedings in the event of provisional release cannot be presumed.[118]

Factors assessed under Article 58(1)(b)(ii) include the ability to identify and locate victims and witnesses;[119] volatile situation on the ground;[120] de jure and de facto control maintained by the accused in the region where most of them reside;[121] as well as his/her past attempts to intimidate them.[122] Conversely, the ICTY and ECtHR give the greatest weight to previous actions of the accused in attempting to interfere with the witnesses or otherwise obstruct the proceedings.[123] According to the ECtHR, the risk of interference becomes less relevant as the proceedings progress and the collection of evidence nears completion.[124] However, the ICC in Bemba took a different stance and found the progress of the proceedings immaterial to the establishment of risk.[125]

In the case concerning allegations of offences against the administration of justice (Bemba et al.), the Pre-Trial Chamber essentially concluded that if an individual is [114] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the Decision of Trial Chamber III of 26 September 2011 entitled 'Decision on the Accused's Application for Provisional Release in Light of the Appeals Chamber's Judgment of 19 August 2011', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1937-Red2, AC, ICC, 15 December 2011, para. 37.

[115] Brđanin (n 15) para. 15; Decision on Defence Motion for Provisional Release, Drljača and Kovačević, IT-97-24-T, TC, ICTY, 20 January 1998, para. 27.

[116] Decision on Provisional Release, Simatović, IT-03-69-T, TC, ICTY, 28 July 2004, para. 24.

[117] Bemba (n 23) para. 67.

[118] Brđanin (n 15) para. 19; Haradinaj (n 90) paras 47–8; DeFrank (n 13) 1437.

[119] Lubanga (n 62) 6.

[120] Review of the 'Decision on the Application for the Interim Release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-826, PTC I, ICC, 14 February 2007, 6.

[121] Mbarushimana (n 63) para. 65. [122] Id.

[123] Decision on Provisional Release, Stanišić, IT-03-69-T, TC, ICTY, 28 July 2004, para. 13; Becciev v Moldova App. no. 9190/03 (ECtHR, 4 October 2005) para. 59, Jovica.

[124] Nevmerzhitsky v Ukraine App. no. 54825/00 (ECtHR, 5 April 2005) para. 136.

[125] Bemba (n 49) para. 63.

accused of obstructing court proceedings, that in itself sufficiently demonstrates the existence of the risk under Article 58(1)(b)(ii).[126] Such reasoning is deeply problematic because it effectively denies interim release to any individual accused of offences against the administration of justice. In order to preserve the possibility of release in such cases, the Court should accord greater weight to the accused's actual ability and willingness to obstruct proceedings, rather than simply rely on the charges in the arrest warrant. In addition, the Pre-Trial Chamber in Katanga and Ngudjolo found that disclosure of the identities of prosecution witnesses increased the accused's ability to exert pressure on them in the event of release.[127] This position creates a tension between two rights of the accused: the right to prepare his/her defence on one hand and the right to liberty on the other. The existence of a link between disclosure of incriminating material and threat to victims and witnesses was rejected by the ICTY and SCSL.[128]

Accordingly, to date the ICC has put more emphasis on the external facts, such as the influence of the accused's network and former soldiers in the region,[129] and less on the conduct of the individual, such as lack of previous attempts to intimidate victims and witnesses.[130] This approach was criticized by Judge Ušacka in her Dissenting Opinion in the Appeals Chamber judgment in Gbagbo.[131] Despite the fact that former subordinates or partners of the accused continue to maintain their influence, the accused himself/herself may wish to sever any connections with them and refrain from obstructing court proceedings—lack of his/her attempts to interfere with witnesses could serve as a proof of that. Thus, although it is important that all relevant factors are considered together,[132] the ICC should undertake a more thorough analysis of the individual motives and previous conduct in relation to victims and witnesses in determining the risk under Article 58(1)(b)(ii).

42.3.2.3 Risk of continuing commission of crimes

The Pre-Trial Chamber in Bemba found the third prong of Article 58(1)(b) inapplicable, since the situation in the CAR had changed and the peace process was under way.[133] Meanwhile in Gbagbo, Single Judge Fernandez de Gurmendi stated that a large and well-organized network of Laurent Gbagbo's supporters in Côte d'Ivoire was still active and aiming to restore his power—therefore, the accused could utilize this network to commit further crimes.[134] This is in line with the ECtHR jurisprudence, [126] Bemba et al. (n 47) para. 27.

[127] Review of the 'Decision on the Application for Interim Release of Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-694, PTC I, ICC, 23 July 2008, 6.

[128] Muller (n 4) 623. [129] Bemba (n 77) para. 24. [130] Bemba (n 37) para. 74.

[131] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Anita Ušacka, Gbagbo (n 23) para. 30.

[132] Bemba (n 23) para. 55. [133] Bemba (n 46) para. 42; Bemba (n 37) para. 76.

[134] Gbagbo (n 46) para. 69. In a later decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber found that the improving security situation in Côte d'Ivoire eliminated the risk that Laurent Gbagbo may commit further crimes upon his release; nonetheless, Gbagbo's detention was deemed necessary due to the two remaining prongs of Art 58(1)(b)—see Fourth Decision on the Review of Laurent Gbagbo's Detention Pursuant to Art 60(3) of the Rome Statute, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC- 02/11-01/11-558, PTC I, ICC, 11 November 2013, para. 51.

which requires the danger of repeated offences to be plausible and not merely hypothetical.[135] In this regard, the accused's ability to commit further international crimes is heavily dependent upon the external context, such as the existence of an armed conflict, or the consolidation of power in the hands of certain groups or individuals. Therefore, in examining whether this requirement is met, the ICC, contrary to domestic and human rights courts, considers primarily external factors rather than individual intentions.

One instance where individual factors were considered to establish the risk of further commission of crimes was Mbarushimana. The Pre-Trial Chamber paid particular attention to the accused's experience in and access to information technology which would allow him to contribute to the commission of crimes without being easily monitored or controlled.[136] The Appeals Chamber further added that lack of Callixte Mbarushimana's previous contribution to the commission of crimes through information technology was immaterial, as long as there was a reasonable possibility that he may do so in the future.[137] Without concrete instances of the use of such technology for committing crimes by the accused, the Chamber's conclusion is purely speculative and unjustifiably restricts his/her right to liberty.

42.4 Interim Release under Article 60(4): Unreasonable Length of Detention

42.4.1 Two-tiered test under Article 60(4)

Article 60(4) of the Rome Statute foresees a two-tiered test: first, the overall period of the pre-trial detention must be found unreasonable; and second, this must be caused by an inexcusable delay on the part of the prosecutor.[138] For the purpose of this Article, only the periods of detention which are related to the ICC proceedings are to be taken into consideration—for example, the detention of Thomas Lubanga in the DRC awaiting trial for distinct crimes other than those charged by the Court was not considered.[139]

In determining whether the length of detention is reasonable, the Appeals Chamber has stated that there cannot be a fixed period of time; instead, the length of detention must be examined in the light of the particular circumstances of each case.[140] Factors that have been found relevant in justifying prolonged detention include the volume of evidence and filings,[141] difficulties in obtaining evidence,[142] novel legal issues raised in the case,[143] and suspension of proceedings upon request by the Defence.[144]

[135] Clooth (n 32) para. 40. [136] Mbarushimana (n 63) para. 66.

[137] Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Callixte Mbarushimana against the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 19 May 2011 entitled 'Decision on the "Defence Request for Interim Release"', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-283, AC, ICC, 14 July 2011, para. 60.

[138] Bemba (n 46) para. 45. [139] Lubanga (n 40) para. 121. [140] Ibid., para. 122.

[141] Bemba (n 46) para. 47. [142] Lubanga (n 62) 7.

[143] Review of Detention and Decision on the 'Third Defence Request for Interim Release', Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-428, PTC I, ICC, 16 September 2011, para. 55.

[144] Bemba (n 98) para. 44.

Analogous factors are considered by the ECtHR[145] and ICTR.[146] On this basis, in several ICC cases detention of five,[147] seven,[148] and even 30 months[149] was found not to be per se unreasonable.

Although it is neither possible nor desirable to set a fixed time limit for the duration of detention, the practice of the ICC to date does not provide any specific guidance as to when detention becomes unreasonably long. Factors related to the complexity of the case are not really helpful, as all the cases before the Court include multiple crimes committed over long periods of time and affecting numerous victims, and thus they are inevitably complex. This was acknowledged by the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga; however, the Appellant's request to exclude these factors from consideration was dismissed without any reasoning.[150] The ad hoc tribunals have considered detention of two,[151] six,[152] and nine[153] years justifiable under the particular circumstances of each case, and have never granted interim release solely on the basis of the length of detention.[154]

Pursuant to Article 60(4), the length of detention must not only be unreasonable, but also be caused by deliberate actions or gross negligence of the prosecutor.[155] In assessing the progress made by the OTP in Bemba, the Trial Chamber found that the prosecution had called over half of its witnesses and had not sought any significant adjournments, and thus there had been no inexcusable delay.[156] The main problem that this requirement creates is that delays caused by other factors (such as unreasonable delay in issuing the Trial Chamber judgment, disqualification of a judge, or budgetary and resource problems) will not permit granting interim release, although their effect on the detainee is exactly the same.[157]

Consequently, it must be acknowledged that cases concerning international crimes will often take significantly longer to complete, and thus have a greater burden on the liberty of the accused, than those concerning ordinary crimes. Nonetheless, the prolonged detention of the accused should be considered reasonable only as long as the proceedings before the Court meet a due diligence standard, established in human rights law.[158] Meanwhile, if any of the organs of the Court—including the prosecutor, the Chambers, and the Registry—fails to act with due diligence, this should trigger the application of Article 60(4) and warrant interim release of the accused.

[145] Mooren v Germany App. no. 11364/03 (ECtHR, 9 July 2009) para. 106.
[146] Decision on the Defence Motion for the Provisional Release of the Accused, Kanyabashi, ICTR-96-15-T, TC II, ICTR, 21 February 2001, para. 12.
[147] Katanga and Ngudjolo (n 127) 11. [148] Lubanga (n 40) para. 122.
[149] Bemba (n 98) para. 44. [150] Lubanga (n 40) para. 123.
[151] Decision on Motion for Provisional Release of Miroslav Kvočka, Kvočka et al., IT-98-30-PT, TC, ICTY, 2 February 2000, 3–4.
[152] Decision on the Defence Motion for Release, Bagosora et al., ICTR-98-41-T, TC III, ICTR, 12 July 2002, para. 27.
[153] Decision on the Accused Vojislav Šešelj's Request for Provisional Release, Šešelj, IT-03-67-T, TC III, ICTY, 23 March 2012, para. 13.
[154] DeFrank (n 13) 1439. [155] Mbarushimana (n 143) para. 59.
[156] Bemba (n 49) para. 67. [157] K Khan, 'Article 60' in Triffterer (n 42) 1167.
[158] Labita v Italy App. no. 26772/95 (ECtHR, 6 April 2000) para. 153.

42.4.2 Relationship between Article 60(2) and 60(4)

The relationship between Article 60(2) and 60(4) is unclear. The Appeals Chamber in Lubanga noted that ruling against the applicant under Article 60(2) does not prevent him/her from being released under Article 60(4).[159] However, subsequent Pre-Trial Chambers in Lubanga and Bemba emphasized the need to ensure a balance between the accused's right to liberty on one hand, and the public interest to ensure his/her appearance at trial and protection of witnesses on the other.[160] The ICTY has likewise stated that provisional release could not be granted by reason of the length of detention where the accused was unable to establish that he/she will appear for trial.[161] This is clearly in tension with the earlier Appeal Chamber's decision in Lubanga, as well as international human rights law.[162]

In addition, this chapter has already discussed the difficulties of the application of Article 60(2), highlighting the limited chances for the accused to obtain interim release under that Article. With this in mind, there is a risk that the need to balance the length of detention with findings under Article 60(2) might effectively make Article 60(4) inoperative. Thus, in order to preserve the effectiveness of Article 60(4), this provision should be read independently of the findings under Article 60(2). This would not only contribute to preventing unreasonably long detention of individuals by the ICC, but would also provide an even stronger incentive for the prosecution (and potentially other organs of the Court) to act with due diligence and avoid unreasonable delays, ultimately ensuring a speedier conduct of ICC trials.

42.5 Interim Release in Exceptional Humanitarian Circumstances

The Rome Statute does not explicitly provide any other grounds for interim release than those listed in Article 60(2) and 60(4). However, it was found in Bemba that Article 64(6)(f) entails 'inherent powers' of the Chamber to grant provisional or temporary release in exceptional humanitarian circumstances.[163] Examples of such exceptional circumstances were the deaths of Jean-Pierre Bemba's father and stepmother, in the light of which he was temporarily released to participate in their funerals in Belgium, escorted by the police.[164] In addition, the Appeals Chamber in Gbagbo acknowledged that the medical condition of the accused may be a factor in [159] Lubanga (n 40) para. 120.

[160] Second Review of the 'Decision on the Application for Interim Release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo', Lubanga, ICC-01/04-01/06-924, PTC I, 11 June 2007, 7; Bemba (n 46) para. 47.

[161] Brđanin (n 15) para. 25. [162] Tochilovsky (n 99) 599. [163] Bemba (n 49) para. 51.

[164] Decision on the Defence's Urgent Request Concerning Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba's Attendance of his Father's Funeral, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-437-Red, PTC II, ICC, 3 July 2009, para. 9; Decision on the Defence Request for Mr Jean-Pierre Bema to Attend his Stepmother's Funeral, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1099-Red, TC III, ICC, 12 January 2011, paras 13–15.

the exercise of the Chamber's discretion in granting interim release;[165] however, as long as the health risks can be addressed by the medical service at the ICC Detention Centre, release shall not be granted.[166] Meanwhile, the need to complete electoral registration in the home country was not considered by the Trial Chamber as the type of circumstance to warrant interim release.[167]

The jurisprudence of the ICTY shows that humanitarian grounds play a significant role in granting provisional release. For example, Milan Simić was released due to serious medical problems which required intensive daily care by a qualified medical team,[168] and Jadranko Prlić was allowed to visit his ailing parents and brother.[169] Conversely, in Kovačević the Trial Chamber refused to grant provisional release, stating that the health condition of the accused was not terminal or immediately life-threatening and that he could be effectively treated in the Netherlands; the fact that the accused would be more receptive to medical treatment in his home country with the support of his family was found insufficient to warrant release from detention.[170]

In the existing case law of the ICC, exceptional humanitarian circumstances have been the justification for the only two instances of temporary release from detention. As the existence of such circumstances is not necessarily linked to the complexity of the case, the charges against the individual, or his/her potential behaviour, the possibility for the accused to be granted interim release on these grounds is significantly higher than under Article 60(2) and 60(4). In this light it is rather paradoxical that this ground for interim release is not mentioned in the Rome Statute or any other legal documents of the ICC and is therefore left within the discretion of the judges. In order to ensure that the possibility to be released due to humanitarian reasons is not revoked by subsequent case law, the current stage of the jurisprudence should be codified in the ICC Statute and exceptional humanitarian circumstances should be included as an independent ground for interim release.

42.6 Conclusions and Recommendations

The context in which the ICC operates, as well as its lack of enforcement capabilities, determines that the possibilities for the accused to be released from detention pending the trial judgment are more restricted than in cases of ordinary criminals tried by domestic courts. Nonetheless, Article 21(3) of the Rome Statute obliges the Court to act in line with international human rights standards. Therefore, it is essential to establish an appropriate balance between the right of accused to liberty and the effective administration of justice. As argued in this chapter, the current legal regime fails to ensure such a balance.

[165] Gbagbo (n 23) para. 87.

[166] Decision on the Request for the Conditional Release of Laurent Gbagbo and on his Medical Treatment, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-362-Red, PTC I, ICC, 18 January 2013, paras 35–7.

[167] Bemba (n 49) para. 69.

[168] Decision on Provisional Release of the Accused, Simić, IT-95-9-T, TC, ICTY, 26 March 1998, 2.

[169] Prlić et al. (n 70) 3.

[170] Kovačević (n 115) para. 14.

Pursuant to the text of the Rome Statute and the Court's case law, there are three situations when the accused can be released from detention, pending the Trial Chamber judgment: first, when the accused proves that he/she will not abscond, interfere with the Court's proceedings, and commit further crimes (Article 60(2)); second, when detention is unreasonably long due to an inexcusable delay by the prosecution (Article 60(4)); and third, when release is justified by exceptional humanitarian circumstances (Bemba and Gbagbo). This chapter discussed the practical and conceptual problems related to each of these avenues, and has arrived at the conclusion that several amendments of the Rome Statute are necessary to rectify the shortcomings in the present regime of interim release.

First, Article 60(2) should not include Article 58(1)(a) in the consideration of interim release. The existence of reasonable grounds to believe that the accused has committed crimes within the Court's jurisdiction are confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber issuing the arrest warrant, and if such grounds cease to exist, then the appropriate course of action is to terminate the proceedings against the accused, and not merely grant him/her interim release.

Second, Article 60(4) should extend the application of the due diligence standard to all the organs of the Court. While at present only an inexcusable delay on the part of the prosecutor may trigger the application of Article 60(4), several other organs of the Court may, by their actions, also lead to delays in the Court's proceedings and thus prolong the detention of the accused.

Third, the Rome Statute should explicitly include a provision (most appropriately in a new paragraph of Article 60) that the accused may be granted interim release due to exceptional humanitarian circumstances, following the example of Rule 65(B) of the ICTY. While an amendment of the RPE or Regulations of the ICC would be easier, including exceptional humanitarian circumstances in the Rome Statute is necessary to put it on an equal footing with the other grounds for interim release, as well as to ensure that all the powers of the Chambers are listed in the Statute and not in subsidiary legal documents.

In addition to the proposed statutory amendments, there is also a need to ensure that the development of the Court's case law does not make interim release de facto impossible. First, when assessing the risk of flight, interference with the proceedings, or continuing commission of crimes under Articles 60(2) and 58(1)(b), the Chambers should place a greater emphasis on the conduct and personal circumstances of the accused, rather than factors which are beyond his/her control or which are likely to exist in all cases before the ICC, such as the advanced stage of the proceedings or the existence of potential supporters of the accused. This is necessary to ensure that the Court assesses real and not merely hypothetical risks, and to avoid undue restrictions to the liberty of the accused. Second, the Chambers should follow the position of the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga which held that the application of Article 60(4) is independent of Article 60(2), because this would prevent Article 60(4) from becoming inoperative and would provide an additional incentive for the Court to conduct the proceedings with due diligence and without inexcusable delays.

Finally, interim release will be impossible in practice without the willingness and ability of states to accept the accused onto their territory and enforce the conditions of release imposed by the Court. It is understandable that many states are reluctant to allow into their territory individuals accused of international crimes. Nonetheless, the Court should actively seek to sign framework agreements with states, in order to have them available before the need arises and to avoid situations where an individual cannot be released merely because of the lack of state cooperation.

43

Testifying behind Bars—Detained ICC Witnesses and Human Rights Protection

Joris van Wijk and Marjolein Cupido

43.1 Introduction

On 27 March 2011 three witnesses arrived in The Hague to testify before the ICC in the case against Katanga and Ngudjolo. The witnesses are former militia leaders who were detained in the DRC for their alleged involvement in the murder of nine UN peacekeepers and the preparation of a military coup.[1] Their transfer to The Hague was subject to an agreement between the ICC and the DRC stating, inter alia, that the witnesses remain in the ICC's Detention Centre during their stay in The Hague and return to the DRC immediately after having testified.

Before being transferred to The Hague, the witnesses expressed fears for their safety.[2] The ICC's Victims and Witnesses Unit (VWU) therefore entered into negotiations with the Congolese authorities and the witnesses to discuss the implementation of protective measures, e.g. that the witnesses' identities and testimonies would not be disclosed and that there would be extra surveillance (by specialized guards and cameras) in their Congolese prison.[3] According to the witnesses' duty counsel, these measures, however, turned out to be inadequate to ensure their

* Associate Professor of Criminology, VU University Amsterdam.

 PhD and lecturer, VU University Amsterdam.

[1] J Easterday, 'Three Defense Witnesses Blame the DRC for Bogoro Attack, then Seek Asylum in the Netherlands', International Justice Monitor, 6 June 2011; Rechtbank Den Haag, 26 September 2012, para. 1.2.

[2] Decision on Amicus Curiae Application and on the 'Requête Tendant à Obtenir Présentations des Témoins DRC-D02-P-0350, DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 aux Autorités Néerlandaises aux Fins d'Asile' (Articles 68 and 93(7) of the Statute), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3003-tENG, TC II, ICC, 9 June 2011 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011'), paras 1–4.

[3] Ibid., para. 3. Other protective measures that were proposed include, e.g., that the evidence be submitted in camera; that the transcript of the hearings be sealed; that the witnesses be detained in a secure prison facility, that their guards be trained according to international standards and selected in consultation with the VWU; that the VWU maintain direct and regular context with the guards; that the VWU regularly visit the detained witnesses; and that the VWU monitor any legal proceedings against the detained witnesses. See Order to Provide Further Assurances Regarding the Security of DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 et DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2952, TC II, ICC, 24 May 2011 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo order of 24 May 2011'), para. 7; Decision on the Security Situation of Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228 et DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3128, TC II, ICC, 24 August 2011 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 24 August 2011'), para. 13.

safety.[4] In their testimonies before the ICC, the witnesses gave detailed information about the involvement of the incumbent political leadership of the DRC—including President Kabila—in the Ituri massacres.[5] Counsel argued that because of these incriminating statements, the witnesses would face persecution, human rights violations, and possible execution upon their return to the DRC.[6] He therefore proposed a different protective measure: allowing the witnesses to apply for asylum in the Netherlands.[7] On 12 May 2011 the three witnesses filed an application for asylum with the Dutch authorities. In order to facilitate the Dutch asylum procedure, counsel requested that the ICC suspend the witnesses' return to the DRC[8] and hand them over to the Dutch authorities.[9]

The witnesses' asylum applications have exposed the competing responsibilities of the ICC and the Dutch authorities in relation to detained witnesses.[10] On the one hand, the Court is obliged to duly return detained witnesses to the requested state—typically their country of origin—'[w]hen the purposes of the transfer have been fulfilled'—i.e. after they have testified. On the other hand, the ICC and the Netherlands need to respect internationally recognized human rights—including the right to apply for asylum—and to protect persons from persecution. Attempts to address and reconcile these competing obligations have resulted in lengthy proceedings before the ICC and the Dutch courts.

[4] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) para. 27. After all, the proposed protective measures are designed for people at liberty, not for detainees. As a consequence of their detention, the ICC will only have limited possibilities to ensure the witnesses' protection and safety. The VWU can only monitor the situation and hope that the Red Cross and the DRC government cooperate in protecting the detained witnesses. See also Easterday (n 1).

[5] For more detailed information about the content of the witnesses' testimonies, see Easterday (n 1).

[6] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) paras 28–30; Katanga and Ngudjolo order of 24 May 2011 (n 3) para. 24; Decision on the Security Situation of Three Detained Witnesses in Relation to their Testimony before the Court (Art 68 of the Statute) and Order to Request Cooperation from the Democratic Republic of the Congo to Provide Assistance in Ensuring their Protection in Accordance with Art 93(1)(j) of the Statute, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3033, TC II, ICC, 22 June 2011 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo decision and order of 22 June 2011'), paras 22–7. The witnesses allege that the Congolese authorities are concerned that they might be prosecuted by the ICC for their involvement in the commission of international crimes. This concern could prompt them to eliminate witnesses who may incriminate them. Furthermore, the Congolese authorities have a motive to silence the witnesses, as their testimony might affect the President's re-election.

[7] Katanga and Ngudjolo order of 24 May 2011 (n 3) paras 18–19.

[8] One reason it is impossible to give effect to the initially agreed return of the witnesses to the DRC is that the witnesses' testimonies 'were much more specific and detailed than what was previously known about its potential content. According to the [Katanga] defence, the fact that the witnesses have directly implicated the DRC government in the crimes committed at Bogoro is a new development which has profound political and personal consequences.' Katanga and Ngudjolo decision and order of 22 June 2011 (n 6) para. 28.

[9] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) para. 55. In addition, the Duty Counsel requested the ICC to allow the witnesses to apply for asylum. Now that the witnesses' application for asylum had already been submitted to the Dutch authorities at the time the Counsel makes this request, the Court finds that a ruling on this specific point is no longer required. Ibid., para. 57.

[10] E.g. Decision on the Urgent Request for Convening a Status Conference on the Detention of Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228, and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3254, TC II, ICC, 1 March 2012 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 1 March 2012'), para. 17.

In this chapter, we aim to assess the consequences of this issue for the functioning of the international criminal justice system. We will argue that the decisions taken by the ICC and the Dutch courts have a potentially negative effect on future state cooperation with the Court and on human rights protection of witnesses and defendants. Our argument is structured as follows. In section 43.2, we discuss the course of the legal proceedings, which have mainly addressed three questions: (i) do the witnesses have the right to apply for asylum in the Netherlands?; (ii) can the witnesses' asylum requests be granted?; (iii) can the witnesses be detained pending the asylum proceedings and, if so, who is responsible for their detention: the ICC or the Dutch government? In section 43.3 we proceed to set out potential future scenarios for the three witnesses. The broader implications of these scenarios and possible solutions to prevent similar situations in the future are assessed in sections 43.4 and 43.5. We conclude in section 43.6 that these solutions all come with considerable complications and reservations. As a result, the asylum issue can have serious implications for the future functioning of the international criminal justice system.

43.2 Legal Proceedings

43.2.1 Application for asylum

In responding to duty counsel's request to allow the witnesses to apply for asylum, the ICC confirmed that Article 68 of the Rome Statute[11] obliges the Court to 'take all protective measures necessary to prevent the risk witnesses incur on account of their cooperation with the Court'.[12] In the Court's view, this provision only requires it to protect witnesses from risks related to their cooperation with the ICC. It does not imply a broader duty to protect witnesses from the risk of persecution they may suffer in their country of origin.[13] In particular, the Court does not have to put the principle of non-refoulement (prohibiting the expulsion of refugees to places where their lives could be threatened) into effect.[14] After all, 'only a State which possesses territory is

[11] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[12] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) para. 61 (emphasis added).

[13] Ibid., paras 59–63. For a critical evaluation of this approach, see G Sluiter, 'Shared Responsibility in International Criminal Justice, the ICC and Asylum' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 661, 670 and the arguments made by the Katanga Defence, Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) para. 36. We agree that the Court's distinction may not be practically feasible. This also appears to be recognized by the Court when it somewhat incomprehensibly finds that 'in practice it will be impossible to determine whether any attempt to harm the detained witnesses will be linked to their testimony or indeed be made at the initiative of the DRC authorities. If the witnesses are to be returned to the DRC, they must therefore be protected against every potential source of danger that may be linked to their testimony before the Court'. Katanga and Ngudjolo decision and order of 22 June 2011 (n 6) para. 38.

[14] In this sense, the ICC's evaluation differs from the evaluation states should make in response to an asylum application. '[T]he criteria for considering an asylum application, in particular those pertaining to the risk of persecution incurred by the applicants, are not identical to the criteria applied by the Court to assess the risks faced by witnesses on account of their testimony before the Court.' Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) para. 63.

actually able to apply the non-refoulement rule.... In this case, it is therefore incumbent upon the Dutch authorities, and them alone, to assess the extent of their obligations under the non-refoulement principle.'[15]

Having said that, the ICC cannot completely refrain from protecting witnesses from persecution. Article 21(3) of the Rome Statute compels it to interpret and apply its Statute consistently with internationally recognized human rights, including the right to apply for asylum and the non-refoulement principle.[16] In this view, the Court determined that it must enable the witnesses to exercise their right to seek asylum[17] and allow the Dutch authorities to evaluate the witnesses' asylum applications.[18] For this reason, it delayed the return of the witnesses to the DRC.

The Dutch authorities were not pleased with the thus imposed responsibility for the ICC's witnesses, and have continuously sought to exempt the witnesses from the Dutch asylum procedure by arguing, inter alia, that the witnesses' applications are mere 'requests for protection'.[19] These requests allegedly fall outside the scope of the Dutch Alien Act (Vreemdelingenwet) and should therefore be evaluated on the basis of a sui generis procedure. In this procedure, the authorities would only determine whether the non-refoulement principle obstructs the Netherlands from excluding the witnesses from asylum protection.[20]

In its decision of 28 December 2011, the District Court of The Hague prevented the Dutch authorities from pursuing this course. The Court found that neither Dutch immigration law, nor the regulations concerning the relations between the States Parties (in particular the host state) and the ICC exempt the witnesses from the regular asylum procedure.[21] The fact that the ICC exercises jurisdiction over the witnesses does not alter this finding, since the witnesses are present on Dutch territory and the ICC is willing to facilitate their asylum procedure.[22] The Court therefore ordered the Dutch authorities to adjudicate the witnesses' asylum applications pursuant to the Alien Act before 28 June 2012.[23]

On 31 October 2012—more than three months after the deadline expired—the Minister for Immigration, Integration, and Asylum excluded the witnesses from refugee protection on the basis of Article 1(f) of the Refugee Convention. This provision stipulates that refugee status cannot be granted when there are 'serious reasons for considering' that the applicant committed war crimes, crimes against humanity, or genocide. The 'serious reasons for considering' standard is a rather low evidentiary

[15] Ibid., para. 64.

[16] The Court thereby emphasized that 'Article 21(3) of the Statute does not place an obligation on the Court to ensure that States Parties properly apply internationally recognised human rights in their domestic proceedings. It only requires the Chambers to ensure that the Statute and other sources of law set forth in article 21(1) and 21(2) are applied in a manner which is not inconsistent with or in violation of internationally recognised human rights.' Ibid., para. 62.

[17] This includes the witnesses' right to meet and correspond with their lawyers of choice so that they can get proper access to the asylum authorities.

[18] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) para. 73.

[19] J Easterday, 'Dutch Court Rules that Witnesses Must Be Allowed Asylum Procedure', International Justice Monitor, 10 January 2012; Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013, paras 5.1–5.3.1.

[20] Rechtbank Den Haag, 28 December 2011, para. 8.2. [21] Ibid., para. 9.9.

[22] Ibid., para. 9.8. [23] Ibid., para. 9.10.

standard that does not require proof beyond reasonable doubt.[24] As one of the authors of this chapter previously noted,

> [i]t is not exceptional that applicants in the Netherlands are excluded on the basis of their (high-level) position in a militia…, coupled with publicly available reports which state that (the particular unit within) the organization the applicant has worked for was responsible for committing international crimes at the time the applicant worked for the organization.[25]

In the current case, human rights reports and ICC case law demonstrated that armed militia groups committed crimes against humanity in the Ituri region in the DRC between 2002 and 2003.[26] The witnesses' statements before the ICC and the Dutch authorities furthermore evidenced that each of the witnesses was somehow involved in these armed militias groups and facilitated the crimes committed.[27] It is therefore no great surprise that the Amsterdam District Court recently upheld the Minister's exclusion of the witnesses from refugee protection. According to the Court, there are serious reasons for considering that the witnesses knowingly and personally participated in crimes against humanity.[28] It found that the witnesses should have at least been aware that crimes were being committed given the large scale of the violence.[29] Moreover, the Court established that the witnesses participated in these crimes by, inter alia, exercising a presiding and coordinating function in the organization responsible for the commission of crimes and by assisting weapons transport.[30]

The District Court also agreed with the Dutch authorities that Article 3 of the ECHR does not obstruct the witnesses' deportation to the DRC because of the risk that they will face ill-treatment. Referring to case law of the EctHR, the District Court established that the ICC's protective measures generally offer a level of human rights protection that is equivalent to the protection ensured by the ECHR.[31] The Court [24] The Dutch authorities and Courts use the 'personal and knowing participation test'. It needs to be established that the accused contributed to the commission of an international crime—by, inter alia, personally committing, facilitating, or ordering the crime—while he knew or should have known that he was thus contributing to this crime.

[25] J van Wijk, 'When International Criminal Justice Collides with Principles of International Protection: Assessing the Consequences of ICC Witnesses Seeking Asylum, Defendants Being Acquitted and Convicted Being Released' (2013) 26 Journal of International Criminal Justice 173, 178–9.

[26] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688), para. 10.6.3 and paras 10.7.2–10.7.3 (ECLI 6692) and paras 9.3.3–9.3.5, 9.4.3. (ECLI 6705).

[27] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013, paras 10.6.4. (ECLI 6688), 10.7.4 (ECLI 6692), and 9.3.6 (ECLI 6705).

[28] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688), para. 10.6.4. The Court critically assesses the substantiation of the Minister's decision to exclude the witnesses on the basis of Article 1f. It finds that several of the arguments and documents put forward by the Minister are insufficient to support its decision. The Court, for example, considers the mere fact that the witness knew that the FNI—the organization of which he was the President—committed serious crimes an insufficient basis for his exclusion. This finding does not ensure that the witness also personally responsible for planning the attacks, directing the troops, supplying weapons, and the commission of crimes. Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013, para. 10.5.

[29] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688), paras 10.6.4 and 10.7.4 (ECLI 6692), and para. 9.3.6 (ECLI 6705).

[30] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688), paras 10.6.4 and 10.7.4 (ECLI 6692), and paras 9.3.6 and 9.4.5 (ECLI 6705).

[31] Ibid., para. 11.2.

seems to presume that the imposition of such protective measures may also benefit the state—in this case the DRC—implementing these measures, since the DRC thus effectively acts as a member of an international organization that offers a human rights protection that is comparable to the ECHR.[32] According to the District Court, it may therefore be assumed that the DRC will not violate Article 3 of the ECHR.

However, this does not mean that the District Court allowed the deportation of the witnesses to the DRC. The Court established that the DRC has kept the witnesses in unlawful detention since June 2007 (when the order for their pre-trial detention expired). Furthermore, the Congolese authorities have failed to ensure that the death penalty will not be imposed on the witnesses. According to the District Court, these circumstances constitute a flagrant denial of justice pursuant to Article 6 of the ECHR, impeding the witnesses' expulsion to the DRC.[33] The fact that the Dutch authorities—in cooperation with the ICC and the DRC—are working on a standard procedure to establish additional safeguards in this respect does not change this finding.[34] As long as the diplomatic consultations are ongoing, the witnesses cannot be returned.

With this decision, the District Court effectively put the witnesses in a 'legal limbo':[35] they may neither reside legally in the Netherlands, nor be deported to their country of origin. The Dutch authorities have appealed the decision,[36] and it is still unclear how the Court of Appeal will decide on this issue.

43.2.2 Detention situation

The witnesses' detention situation has been controversial since 24 August 2011. That day, the ICC confirmed that it had received explicit guarantees from the DRC that no harm would be done to the witnesses on account of their testimony.[37] Furthermore, the Court was satisfied that the Congolese authorities implemented measures that offer sufficient protection against the security risks to which the witnesses might be exposed as a consequence of their testimonies before the Court.[38] It therefore decided

[32] Id.

[33] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688 and 6692), paras 11.4–11.5 and para. 10.5 ECLI (6705). Like the Minister, the Court concludes that there is no risk that the witnesses will be exposed to treatment contrary to Art 3 of the ECHR. Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688), para. 11.2 and J Easterday, 'Lawyers Brief ICC on Dutch Asylum Cases', International Justice Monitor, 19 March 2013. The Court in this respect refers to the protective measures the ICC required—i.e. because of the implementation of the ICC's protective measures, there is no risk of an Art 3 violation in the DRC. This is an interesting approach considering that the ICC explicitly distinguished its obligations in relation to the implementation of protective measures from the State's more encompassing obligation for human rights protection. Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) para. 61.

[34] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688 and 6692), paras 11.5 and 10.5 (ECLI 6705).

[35] Van Wijk (25) 180.

[36] 'Detentie Congolese Getuigen door ICC Opgeheven, Nederland Aan Zet', Prakken d'Oliveira Press Release, 21 January 2014.

[37] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 24 August 2011 (n 3) para. 13.

[38] Id. The ICC and the DRC agreed on the following protective measures: (i) the witnesses will be detained in a secure prison facility where they will be protected from aggression by other inmates; (ii) the guards who will guard the witnesses are trained according to international standards and will be selected in consultation between the VWU and the Congolese authorities; (iii) the VWU will, through the prison authorities, maintain regular and direct contact with the guards in order to anticipate any change in the that its obligation to maintain custody over the witnesses has, in principle, come to an end.[39] Accordingly, there were 'no further grounds to delay the return of the three detained witnesses to the DRC'.[40]

At the same time, the ICC acknowledged that requesting the Dutch authorities to cooperate with the witnesses' return to the DRC pending the asylum procedure would violate the witnesses' right to apply for asylum and contravene with the Dutch authorities' obligation to evaluate the asylum application. In this view, it found that the asylum proceedings make the return of the witnesses 'temporarily impossible from a legal point of view'.[41] The Court therefore suspended the return of the witnesses to the DRC until the final outcome of their asylum claims.[42] The witnesses were to remain in custody of the ICC on the basis of Article 93(7) of the Rome Statute.[43] The Court in this respect emphasized that it cannot indefinitely prolong the witnesses' detention.[44]

According to the witnesses' Dutch asylum counsel, the ICC thus created a Kafkaesque situation that violates the witnesses' right to liberty and to an effective remedy (Articles 5 and 13 of the ECHR, respectively).[45] They argued that Article 93(7) of the Rome Statute does not provide a valid legal basis for the witnesses' prolonged detention, since this provision only applies to the period of time that witnesses testify before the ICC. Now that the current witnesses have completed their testimonies, their prolonged detention, without any proper charges, is unlawful. Counsel accordingly made various requests to the ICC and the Netherlands to end the witnesses' unlawful detention.

At first, the ICC evasively responded to these requests. It alleged that it was 'an extraordinary situation' in which there was 'very little room for manoeuvre'.[46] Because the Rome Statute did not address the issue, 'a solution must be sought as soon as possible in consultations between the Court, the host State and the DRC'.[47] Until that time, Article 93(7) of the Rome Statute prohibits the Court from releasing the witnesses.[48] security situation of the detained witnesses; (iv) the VWU will regularly visit the detained witnesses to assess their security situation; (v) the VWU will be able to monitor any legal proceedings against the detained witnesses.

[39] Ibid., para. 17. [40] Ibid., para. 14. [41] Ibid., para. 15.

[42] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 1 March 2012 (n 10) para. 11.

[43] Ibid., para. 17. The Court clarifies that the witnesses' detention by the ICC is linked to their detention in the DRC and to the pending asylum procedure.

[44] Ibid., para. 20.

[45] J Easterday, 'Lawyers Bring Petition against the Dutch State for Unlawful Detention of Congolese Witnesses in ICC Trial', International Justice Monitor, 7 September 2012.

[46] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 1 March 2012 (n 10) para. 20.

[47] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 24 August 2011 (n 3). See also Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 9 June 2011 (n 2) para. 85. The Lubanga Trial Chamber in a similar situation seems to take a somewhat stricter approach when it 'reiterates its instructions to the Registry to prepare for the return of defence Witness 19 once he is fit to travel, pursuant to Art 93(7)(b) of the Statute and Rule 192(4) of the Rules. It is for the Dutch authorities to determine whether it necessary to intervene in order to take control of him for the purposes of conducting any extant national proceedings'. Decision on the Observations Submitted by Counsel Representing Defence Witness 19 in the Dutch Asylum Proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2835, TC I, ICC, 15 December 2001, para. 19.

[48] Decision on the Application for the Interim Release of Detained Witnesses DRC-D02- P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228, and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3405-tENG, TC II, ICC, 1 October 2013 ('Lubanga decision of 1 October 2013'), paras 25–6. Judge Van den Wyngaert wrote a strong dissenting opinion to this decision.

After all, despite being in custody of the ICC, the witnesses' detention is based on the Congolese restriction of liberty. The Court cannot rule on the merits of this Congolese detention, since this would undermine the essence of the cooperation regime, violate the fundamental principle of state sovereignty, and unjustly turn the ICC into a human rights court.[49] The witnesses should therefore request the Congolese authorities to review their detention—it is up to them to decide on the witnesses' release.[50] The ICC also emphasized its dependence of the Netherlands. It held that—irrespective of the Congolese authorization—the Court would be required to release the witnesses if the Dutch courts determine that the witnesses' continued detention violates their international obligations to protect the freedom of persons on Dutch territory.[51] The ICC, however, cannot decide to release the witnesses on Dutch soil without the consent of the national authorities. The witnesses' fate thus lies in the hands of the Dutch authorities.

Almost three years after the witnesses testified, the ICC changed its course. Acting on a proprio motu basis, the Appeals Chamber considered it appropriate and necessary to bring the detention of the Congolese witnesses to an end.[52] According to the Appeals Chamber, the witnesses' detention—entailing the non-implementation of Article 93(7) of the Rome Statute—is problematic for at least two reasons. First, the Court's obligation under Article 21(3) of the Rome Statute to apply the Statute in conformity with internationally recognized human rights standards does imply that it can violate Article 93(7). In particular, > such an interpretation [of Article 21(3)] would seriously damage the Court's ability to enter into future cooperation agreements with States, which would undermine the Court's ability to obtain needed testimony and evidence and render it more difficult to establish the truth in the cases before it.[53]

Second, the ICC is not and cannot be 'an administrative detention unit for asylum seekers' or persons who are otherwise involved in judicial proceedings before domestic courts.[54] The Court's detention authority is rather limited to 'situations where the detention is related to judicial proceedings before the Court'.[55]

In order to reconcile Article 93(7) of the Rome Statute with the witness' right to apply for asylum, the Appeals Chamber turned to Rule 192 of the ICC's Rules of Procedure and Evidence and Article 44 of the Headquarters Agreement between the ICC and the Netherlands. These provisions stipulate that witnesses will be 'under the control and in the physical custody' of the Dutch authorities when they are transported from the Detention Centre to the airport.[56] During this transport, the authorities thus have the [49] Ibid., para. 27. The different application of Art 21(3) in relation to the asylum requests and the detention situation (whereas an assessment on the basis of this Art does apply to the former, it does not apply to the latter) results from the fact that the right to apply for asylum and the prohibition of non-refoulement are jus cogens norms, whereas the right to liberty is not an intransgressible rule of international law and is therefore subject to numerous derogations.

[50] Ibid., para. 31. [51] Ibid., para. 35.

[52] Order on the Implementation of the Cooperation Agreement between the Court and the Democratic Republic of the Congo Concluded Pursuant Art 93(7) of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-158, AC, ICC, 20 January 2014, para. 21.

[53] Ibid., para. 26. [54] Ibid., para. 27. [55] Id. [56] Ibid., para. 29.

possibility to intervene and to obviate the witnesses' return to the DRC until there is a final decision on their asylum application.

> [T]he Appeals Chamber acknowledges that The Netherlands may be faced with conflicting obligations, namely those with the Court, pursuant to the Headquarters Agreement, and those pursuant to The Netherland's international and domestic legal obligations in relation to the pending asylum claims. However, the Appeals Chamber is firmly of the view that the resolution of these conflicting obligations lies with The Netherlands.[57]

The Appeals Chamber therefore proceeded to order the Registrar to prepare the witnesses' return to the DRC.[58] The Registrar should consult with the Dutch authorities to determine the procedure that will be followed in this respect. This procedure must enable the Dutch authorities to decide whether they need to intervene in the witnesses' return in light of their own human rights obligations.[59]

The witnesses' Duty Counsel asserted that the order of the Appeals Chamber prevents the Dutch authorities from hiding behind the ICC. They therefore urged the authorities to give proper effect to the Chamber's order and to prevent the witnesses from being returned to the DRC. It remains unclear whether the authorities have met this request and have taken custody over the witnesses. However, looking at the position that the Dutch authorities have taken so far, not much can be expected from them. The authorities have persistently rejected taking custody of the witnesses, maintaining that—pending the asylum procedure—the witnesses should remain detained in the ICC's Detention Centre.[60] Moreover, the authorities argued that the Netherlands cannot evaluate the legitimacy of the ICC's detention of the witnesses.[61] In addition, the Dutch courts have disassociated themselves from the witnesses' detention. Although The Hague District Court initially asserted that the Netherlands should be concerned about the witnesses' fate[62] and ordered the Dutch authorities to assume control over them,[63] soon after this decision the ECtHR judgment in the case of Longa raised questions about its future validity and effect.[64]

Like the three witnesses under consideration, Longa is a Congolese national and a detained ICC defence witness who applied for asylum in the Netherlands.[65] Pending [57] Id. [58] Ibid., para. 30. [59] Id.

[60] See Katanga and Ngudjolo decision of 1 March 2012 (n 10). In a different case concerning a similar situation, the Netherlands Ministry for Foreign Affairs sent a note verbale to the ICC which gives further insights into the government's position. The note verbale was cited in Longa v the Netherlands App. no. 33917/12 (ECtHR, 9 October 2012) ('Longa v the Netherlands') para. 22.

[61] Raad van State, 22 March 2012, para. 2.1.7.

[62] Rechtbank Den Haag, 26 September 2012, para. 3.8. [63] Ibid., para. 3.9.

[64] On 29 October 2012 the Court of Appeal of The Hague already decided to suspend the immediate enforceability of the District Court's decision. Considering the judgment of the ECtHR, the Dutch judges are confronted with a legal question—should the state take control over the witnesses?—that has no obvious answer. In such a situation, a lack of restraint could lead to an irreversible situation that cannot be solved easily. Acknowledging that the detention situation of the witnesses requires the Court's attention, the Court of Appeal finds that the State's interests necessitate a preservation of the current situation in which the witnesses are detained by the ICC. Gerechtshof 's-Gravenhage, 29 October 2012 (ECLI 1393), paras 6–9.

[65] Longa v the Netherlands (n 60) paras 1–26.

the decision on his asylum application, he remained detained by the ICC. Longa contested the lawfulness of his detention before the ECtHR.[66] He argued that the Dutch refusal to review and end his illegal detention situation constitutes a violation of Articles 5 and 13 of the ECHR. The ECtHR, however, dismissed Longa's complaints. The Court assumed that, '[t]he exercise of jurisdiction is a necessary condition for a Contracting State (in casu the Netherlands) to be able to be held responsible for acts or omissions imputable to it'.[67] Jurisdiction is primarily based on territoriality—i.e. states exercise jurisdiction over persons who are physically present on their territory.[68] Exceptions to the principle of territoriality may, however, arise when 'States establish international organisations in order to pursue or strengthen their cooperation in certain fields of activities, and where they attribute to these organisations certain competences and accord them immunities'.[69] This is also true in Longa's case. The fact that Longa 'is deprived of his liberty on Netherlands soil does not of itself suffice to bring questions touching on the lawfulness of his detention' within the Dutch jurisdiction.[70]As long as he is neither returned to the DRC, nor handed over to the Dutch authorities, his detention remains based on an agreement between the ICC and the DRC.[71] Being grounded on an arrangement that was lawfully concluded between an international criminal tribunal and a state not party to the ECHR, the Netherlands—as the ICC's host state—is not obliged to review the lawfulness of Longa's detention.[72] The Dutch consideration of Longa's asylum request does not alter this conclusion.[73]

Considering the ECtHR's findings and conclusions in Longa, The Hague Court of Appeal quashed the earlier decision of the District Court. The Court of Appeal determined that the witnesses' detention is not unlawful, but is based on, and is derived from, their detention in the DRC. As such, neither the Dutch courts nor the ICC are competent to evaluate the lawfulness of the DRC's detention.[74] The witnesses should rather turn to the DRC for assistance.[75] The fact that the witnesses are present on Dutch soil and have applied for asylum in the Netherlands cannot alter this finding. The witnesses have appealed this judgment before the Supreme Court which is yet to render judgment.[76] It will be interesting to see whether and how the Supreme Court's decision is influenced by the ICC's order that the witnesses be returned to the DRC subject to the intervention by the Netherlands.

[66] Ibid., paras 51–4. Longa argues that whereas the Congolese title for his detention expired on 2 July 2007, the ICC has no legal ground to keep him detained after he gave evidence. Furthermore, the Dutch authorities never even claimed that there was a basis for the applicant's detention under their domestic law.

[67] Ibid., para. 61. [68] Ibid., para. 69. [69] Id. [70] Ibid., para. 73.

[71] Ibid., para. 75. [72] Ibid., para. 80. [73] Ibid., paras 82–3.

[74] Gerechtshof 's-Gravenhage, 18 December 2012 (ECLI 6075), para. 2.2.

[75] Id. This, interestingly, leads to the Courts' paradoxical suggestion to let the witnesses seek legal remedies in the very same (Congolese) legal system that the Court believes to be responsible for a 'flagrant denial of justice'.

[76] According to the witnesses' counsel, this decision could take until March 2014, possibly longer. See also Easterday (n 33).

43.3 Taking Stock

43.3.1 Where are we now?

The previous outline of the proceedings in the situation of the Congolese witnesses has shown that the regulations concerning the position and responsibilities of the ICC and the Netherlands vis-à-vis detained witnesses are inconclusive.[77] The drafters of the Rome Statute have failed to regulate situations where detained witnesses ask for protection from the host state by applying for asylum. When this situation presented itself in practice, it prompted sensitive diplomatic consultations and complex legal proceedings.

The diplomatic consultations between the ICC, the Netherlands, and the DRC have had a negative effect on their mutual relations. The ICC and the Netherlands have both tried to absolve themselves of responsibility for the protection and detention of the witnesses. Frustrated by the resulting impasse, the ICC accused the Dutch authorities of taking an 'unwavering stance'[78] and an 'intransigent position'.[79] For the DRC, the consultations have been even more unsatisfactory. The Congolese authorities have expressed great dissatisfaction with the witnesses' delayed return. The issue may even withhold the DRC from adopting legislation implementing the Rome Statute.[80] A solution to this diplomatic conflict does not seem to be within reach. When the responsible Dutch State Secretary of Security and Justice was in the summer of 2013 asked what solutions he was working on, he could only answer that the Dutch authorities and the ICC were trying to come to 'structural agreements'.[81]

The legal proceedings have provided only a little more clarity on the witnesses' position and rights. The Dutch authorities have excluded the witnesses from asylum protection on the basis of Article 1(f) of the 1951 Refugee Convention. At the same time, the Netherlands cannot deport the witnesses to the DRC because of the risk that their right to a fair trial will be violated. They are thus put in a 'legal limbo' in which they may neither legally stay in the Netherlands, nor be deported to their country of origin. Although there are reasons to believe that the Dutch authorities give priority

[77] Sluiter (n 13) 666–7. Sluiter, however, doubts whether the possibility of asylum applications by detained witnesses was completely unforeseen by the Dutch authorities. He points out that there were concerns about this issue with the Dutch delegation during the deliberations in Rome. Moreover, Sluiter refers to correspondence from the Dutch parliament that seems to foresee and allow the possibility of asylum application by detained ICC witnesses. On this issue see also J van Wijk, 'Asielzoekende Getuigen bij het Internationaal Strafhof, een Steeds Nederlandser Probleem' (2012) 9 Nederlands Juristenblad 527, 530.

[78] Order on Duty Counsel's Requests Concerning the Detention of Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228, and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3303-tENG, TC II, ICC, 1 June 2012, para. 14; Decision on the Request for Release of Witnesses DRC-D02-P-0236, DRC-D02-P-0228, and DRC-D02-P-0350, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, TC II, ICC, 8 February 2013 ('Katanga decision of 8 February 2013') para. 14.

[79] Katanga decision of 8 February 2013 (n 78) para. 22.

[80] S Kendall, 'Defense Witnesses Claim Asylum in the Netherlands: Implications for State Cooperation', International Justice Monitor, 29 August 2011.

[81] Kamerbrief 2013Z08919, 'Beantwoording Kamervragen over door het Internationaal Strafhof vrijgesproken verdachten', 17 June 2013.

to processing the pending appeals of this decision, it is not expected that a definite decision on the asylum applications will be available at short notice. In the meantime, the witnesses' detention position remains uncertain. With the ICC ordering the return of the witnesses to the DRC, only the Dutch authorities can prevent them from being sent back to the Congolese prison. However, considering the past position of the Dutch authorities, it can be reasonably expected that they will continue trying to expulse the witnesses.

43.3.2 What's next?

The Dutch authorities will only be allowed to send the witnesses back to Congo if they can convince Dutch courts that enough safeguards have been put in place to guarantee that Article 6 ECHR will not be violated upon their return. However, even if they succeed in doing so, it would not mean that the witnesses can be returned to Congo without further ado. The witnesses still have the right to request a so-called Rule 39 Interim Measure at the ECtHR, and urgent measure that applies when there is an imminent risk of irreparable harm and grants temporary protection against expulsion. Although the ECtHR grants such requests only on an exceptional basis,[82] the Congolese witnesses seem to stand a relatively good chance to be granted such protection and frustrate immediate deportation. A number of 1(f) excluded asylum seekers in, for example, the Netherlands have in recent times successfully filed requests for interim measures.[83] Since ECtHR procedures are not known for their expeditiousness—procedures of up to three years are no exception[84]—the witnesses' prompt expulsion to the DRC is not to be expected any time soon.

The asylum application of the Congolese witnesses clearly creates a Catch-22 situation. It is unlikely that the ICC, the Netherlands, and the DRC will, in the near future, come to a solution, which is acceptable to all. As such, the situation depicts the practical and political problems that result from a lack of harmonization between (the execution of) international criminal law and (upholding) the principles of international protection deriving from international refugee and human rights law. When taken on their own, the rules and principles underlying each of these legal regimes may form a sufficiently consistent and coherent framework. The Congolese case, however, shows that problems arise when they are applied at the same time.[85]

Considering the fundamental problem underlying the difficulties of the Congolese case, one wonders about the future implications of this case. One can also ask whether there are any viable strategies available that would grant detainees the opportunity to testify at the ICC, without hampering the relationship between the ICC and its States Parties.

[82] ECHR, Factsheet; Interim Measures, January 2013 <http://www.echr.coe.int/Documents/FS_Interim_measures_ENG.pdf> accessed 10 November 2013.

[83] E.g. District Court The Hague, 18 May 2010, ECLI (BN1020); District Court The Hague, 8 May 2013, ECLI (CA 2650).

[84] See e.g. Othman v the United Kingdom App. no. 8139/09 (ECtHR, 17 January 2012). The interim measure was granted on 19 February 2009, while the decision was taken on 17 January 2012.

[85] Van Wijk (n 25) 183.

43.4 Future Implications

43.4.1 Knowing the past…

Although the asylum applications of the Congolese witnesses are often presented as a novum, they were actually not the first detained witnesses who applied for asylum after having testified at an international criminal court. Former Rwandan Justice Minister Agnes Ntamabyariro was awaiting her genocide trial before the Rwandan national courts in detention when, in 2006, the ICTR ordered her transfer to the Tribunal to testify in the Government II case.[86] While giving testimony, she complained about the treatment of the Rwandan authorities.[87] After testifying, Ntamabyariro delivered a written asylum request to the ICTR President and communicated this to the Deputy Registrar. She cited her fear of torture and the imposition of the death penalty. Without regard to the asylum application, the ICTR transferred her to the Rwandan authorities using a specially chartered flight.[88] The case has rarely been addressed by the media, politicians, or academics.

Years before, in 1997, a similar 'hasty' approach was taken when Dragan Opačić—a detained ICTY witness—filed an asylum request in the Netherlands. Opačić was a former member of the Bosnian-Serb Army. In 1995—when he was only 19 years old—a Bosnian court convicted him to ten years' imprisonment for having committed war crimes against Bosnian Muslims when he was working as a guard at the Trnopolje 'concentration camp'. During his cross-examination as a witness in the case against Dušco Tadić, Opačić claimed that the Bosnian authorities abused and pressured him to falsely testify against Tadić. Moreover, he asserted that he had never been a camp guard and that his conviction in Bosnia was based on lies. Opačić feared that, because of these allegations, his life was in danger or that he would face other forms of ill-treatment upon his return to Bosnia. He therefore requested that he remain in the Tribunal's custody until the relevant authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina (B&H) had decided upon the revision of his judgment. The Trial Chamber, however, rejected Opačić's request and ordered that he be remanded to B&H.[89] After all, the ICTY had ensured B&H that Opačić would be returned to its custody upon completion of any proceedings before the Tribunal. The Chamber also expressed its 'full confidence' that B&H would observe the principle that 'no person under any form of detention or [86] The Rwandan government for months refused to cooperate in the transfer of the witness to Arusha. The deputy prosecutor argued that the trial in Rwanda was set to start soon and releasing her to ICTR custody could interfere with this process. The Trial Chamber ordered her to be transferred, threatening that a refusal to cooperate would be reported to the Security Council. 'Former Minister Ntamabyariro Will Not Testify at ICTR as Set', The Arusha Times, 29 April 2006.

[87] Minutes of Proceedings, Bizimungu et al., ICTR-99-50-T, TC II, ICTR, 23 August 2006.

[88] 'United Nations Illegally Transfers Asylum Seeker', Press Release Philippe Larochelle & Avi Singh Lawyers, 13 September 2006 (copy with authors).

[89] Order for the Return of a Detained Witness, Tadić, IT-94-1-ST—IT-95-7-Misc. 1, TC II, ICTY, 27 May 1997.

imprisonment shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment'.[90]

Opačić also requested the Dutch authorities to bar his expulsion. He started a summary proceeding before the District Court in The Hague to block his expulsion to B&H.[91] Opačić's counsel argued that the Netherlands would violate Articles 2, 3, 5, and/or 6 of the ECHR if it facilitated his return by transferring him from the UN Detention Facility to an airport. The District Court, however, pointed to the binding character of ICTY orders and found no reasons to review the ICTY decision. It argued that the Tribunal had assessed Opačić's request in light of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).[92] Considering that the ICCPR provides as much protection as the ECHR, the ICTY procedure provided sufficient due process guarantees and used the same assessment criteria as Dutch courts.[93]

Following his unsuccessful summary proceedings, Opačić—as a final solution—applied for asylum in the Netherlands. The Dutch Immigration and Naturalization Services (IND) in The Hague and at Schiphol Airport, as well as the State Attorney, were notified. According to Opačić's asylum counsel, the Immigration Services, however, never even took his request into consideration.[94] Days after the request was filed, Opačić was flown to Sarajavo to serve his sentence. The Dutch media paid particular attention to the transfer.[95]

43.4.2 . . . to understand the future

Although few detained witnesses have filed asylum requests, this demonstrates that the ICC as well as the Dutch government could have foreseen that the matter would come up again sooner or later. Perhaps it was never considered to be a real issue, because such requests had never seriously frustrated or hampered the relationship between the tribunals on the one hand, and the host state or other cooperating states on the other. A possible explanation for the very different course of events in the case of the three Congolese witnesses is that they applied for asylum in the host state—in casu the Netherlands—before requesting the Court to bar expulsion. This enabled the Katanga Trial Chamber—after having recognized the principle of non-refoulement—to publicly urge the Dutch authorities to proceed in investigating the already pending asylum claims.[96] In contrast, because Opačić applied for asylum [90] This principle has been laid down in Principle 6 of the Body of Principles for the Protection of all Persons under any Form of Detention or Imprisonment, UNGA Res 43/173 (9 December 1988) UN Doc A/RES/43/173.

[91] Dragan Opačić v The Netherlands, Kort Geding, 30 mei 1997, KG97/742, para. 3.4.

[92] This, in itself, is a remarkable line of argumentation, since the Chamber did not refer to the ICPP but, instead, the Body of Principles for the Protection of all Persons under any Form of Detention or Imprisonment (n 90).

[93] J d'Aspremont and C Bröllman, 'Challenging International Criminal Tribunals before Domestic Courts' in A Reinisch (ed.), Challenges of Acts of International Organizations before National Courts (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 113.

[94] Personal correspondence with legal counsel.

[95] See e.g. 'Dragan Opačić—Getuige 'L' in Zaak Tadić—Loog', VPRO Argos, 10 September 1999 <http://www.domovina.net/archive/1999/19990910_vpro_ned.php> accessed 10 November 2013 (full transcript in Dutch).

[96] Van Wijk (n 25) 175. As already discussed, the Trial Chamber in a later stage also considered that the pending asylum proceedings make the return of the witnesses 'temporarily impossible from a legal point after the ICTY had ordered his return, the Tribunal could not openly pressure the Dutch authorities to assess his pending asylum request. This arguably provided the Dutch authorities with a window of opportunity to surreptitiously ignore Opačić's asylum claim, facilitate his expulsion, and thereby 'save' the relationship between the ICTY, the Netherlands, and B&H.

Thus, the 'recipe for success' for filing an asylum request in case detained witnesses fear violations of their human rights upon return to their country of origin seems clear now. Witnesses should first apply for asylum in the Netherlands, and only at a later stage inform the Court. Future ICC witnesses may profit from this knowledge when they choose to apply for asylum in the Netherlands. This does not imply that the Netherlands can expect a 'sudden wave' of new asylum applications by detained witnesses.[97] Only under very particular circumstances can witnesses make a viable claim for refugee status. Successful claims are most likely for (defence) witnesses who (i) stay in (pre-trial) detention in their country of origin, (ii) stay in a detention facility governed by a (former) adversary, or (iii) can make a credible claim that their human rights will be violated upon their return. The latter requirement only applies to witnesses who stay in remand or prison facilities which are governed by (former) adversaries who are not known to take good care of the accused and prisoners.

In this view, ICC witnesses who are in (pre-)trial detention under the auspices of an international tribunal or of a country with a decent human rights record will not benefit much from applying for asylum in the Netherlands. However, insofar as it concerns detained witnesses from, for example, the Côte d'Ivoire or Congo—countries which are not known for respecting human rights[98]—things might look different. To make it more concrete, if the legal counsel of Laurent Gbagbo—the former President of the Côte d'Ivoire—were to request former Police Chief Jean-Noel Abehi or former Student Union leader Jean-Yves Dibopieuin to testify in The Hague, these men would stand a reasonable chance of (successfully) applying for asylum. They currently await prosecution in a Côte d'Ivoire detention facility in relation to their role in the Côte d'Ivoire's post-election violence and could object to deportation by claiming that the Côte d'Ivoire will violate their human rights upon their return.[99]

It is difficult to foretell if such witnesses are interested in making asylum claims. The Congolese case demonstrates that applying for asylum comes at a price. The Congolese witnesses have remained in ICC detention for almost three years; they are also caught up in many legal procedures and have a bleak chance of being granted asylum. At the of view' and suspended the return of the witnesses to the DRC until the final outcome of their asylum claim. See (n 41).

[97] D Yabasun and M Holvoet, 'Seeking Asylum before the International Criminal Court. Another Challenge for a Court in Need of Credibility' (2013) 12 International Criminal Law Review 725, 744–5. See also Sluiter (n 13) 16: '[t]he application for asylum by detained witnesses is quite unique and unlikely to arise in the future'.

[98] The human rights situation in relation to prisoners in Congo has already been discussed extensively. For a recent critical account of the human rights situation in the Côte d'Ivoire, see 'A Long Way from Reconciliation; Abusive Military Crackdown in Response to Security Threats in Côte d'Ivoire', Human Rights Watch (2012).

[99] See C Stein, 'Is Ivory Coast Zeal to Prosecute Former Bad Guys Setting Up War in West Africa?', The Christian Science Monitor, 12 March 2013.

same time they are—at least for the time being—safe and have access to good medical facilities. Furthermore, they have both the ICC and the Netherlands pushing the Congolese government to guarantee good treatment and a fair trial.

43.5 Possible Solutions

The previous account has shown that the asylum issue seriously impacts on the relationship between the ICC and the Netherlands on the one hand, and the ICC and the sending state on the other. The perception alone that more asylum requests might follow could thwart a sending state's willingness to transfer witnesses to The Hague. This could seriously delay—or even frustrate—court proceedings. When thinking about solutions for this legal and political 'Gordian knot', two approaches come to the fore. First, there is the option of imposing preliminary safeguards to protect the human rights of detained witnesses. Second, there is the option to limit their access to human rights protection. Both options have serious shortcomings and, for the following reasons, may not be regarded as viable alternatives.

43.5.1 Preliminary safeguards for human rights protection

The Congolese case shows that the ICC can order protective measures for detained witnesses in their home countries. Such measures can, for example, consist of extra surveillance by specialized guards and cameras in the witnesses' prison (cells). Once these measures are successfully installed, they will ensure a sufficient level of human rights protection. It can therefore be presumed that Article 3 of the ECHR will not be violated.[100] At the same time, the Congolese case demonstrates that expulsion of witnesses can be impeded if the witnesses face a flagrant denial of justice pursuant to Article 6 of the ECHR. This can, for example, be the case if persons have been kept in unlawful detention for a long time, or if the death penalty might be imposed.[101] To prevent this in future cases, the ICC could—apart from taking measures which offer the witness Article 3 ECHR protection—take measures that offer Article 6 ECHR protection and safeguard the witness's right to a fair trial upon return. Such preliminary safeguards could reduce the reluctance of both the Netherlands and the sending state to cooperate in transferring the witness. There are, however, at least three important reservations to be made in this respect.

First, installing fair trial measures could create an incentive for detainees in post-conflict countries to testify at the ICC. Indeed, if testifying would mean that the ICC pushes for domestic criminal proceedings which fit Article 6 of the ECHR criteria, this may entice detainees to fabricate stories in order to be called as a witness.

Second, such an approach would make the ICC and/or the Netherlands de facto human rights lobbyists. By installing measures to protect detained witnesses against [100] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688), para. 11.2.

[101] Rechtbank Amsterdam, 14 October 2013 (ECLI 6688 and 6692), paras 11.4–11.5 and para. 10.5 ECLI (6705).

Article 3 violations—as it did in the case of the Congolese witnesses—the ICC stays within its mandate. After all, these protective measures are directly linked to the mandate of the Victims and Witness Unit as expressed in Article 68 of the ICC's Rules of Procedure and Evidence. By contrast, the Court's engagement with fair trial standards of national criminal proceedings on behalf of detained witnesses goes beyond its mandate to conduct proceedings against alleged perpetrators of international crimes. It effectively allows the Court to interfere in domestic proceedings. Such interference would be remarkable in light of the Court's explicit intention not to be a human rights court.[102] Instead of the ICC, the Netherlands could therefore do the lobbying. It is, however, questionable if this is feasible. Although the Dutch government regularly calls for fair trial standards in general, preventively demanding diplomatic 'fair trial assurances' for individuals would imply a very significant burden on Dutch diplomatic efforts.

Third, and most importantly, such anticipatory measures still cannot exclude the possibility of witnesses applying for asylum in the Netherlands after having testified. Even when the ICC, the sending state, and Dutch government all agree that the necessary conditions have been created to guarantee good treatment and a fair trial upon return, the case law in the Congo case confirms that witnesses retain the right to an independent and impartial judicial evaluation. As long as the witnesses have access to the Dutch asylum procedure, the ICC cannot guarantee any sending state a swift return of its detainees.

43.5.2 Limiting witnesses' access to human rights protection

Another possible solution in dealing with future detained witnesses is either to virtually or physically transfer part of the court proceedings to the country in which the witness is detained. Both these measures seek to exclude witnesses from requesting protection against, for example, alleged torture, unlawful detention, or the death penalty in the Netherlands. Therefore, we refer to them as limitations of human rights protection.

43.5.2.1 Virtual transfer of court proceedings

A virtual transfer of court proceedings could be created by letting detained witnesses testify by means of a video-link. As a general rule, Article 69 (2) of the Rome Statute requires in-person testimony. However, '[t]he Court may also permit the giving of viva voce (oral) or recorded testimony of a witness by means of video or audio technology'. Rule 68 of the ICC's Rules of Procedure and Evidence regulates this. So far, witness testimony through video-links has generally been used to protect prosecution witnesses. Referring to a decision of the Bemba Trial Chamber, Yabasun and Holvoet argue that this protection of witnesses seems to be the exact purpose of witness testimonies from a remote location.[103] Careful reading of this decision, however, suggests that a less strict interpretation is certainly possible. The Trial Chamber stated:

[102] See (n 47). One could, on the other hand, argue that any promotion of fair domestic proceedings coincides with the ICC's positive complementarity goal to ensure that states themselves are willing and able to carry out criminal prosecutions, but if the Court were to go this way, it would definitely stretch its mandate. This would be the case, in particular, if such domestic prosecutions were not related to any of the crimes which fell under the Court's jurisdiction.

> [o]ne of the relevant criteria for determining whether or not a witness may be allowed to give viva voce (oral) testimony by means of video technology relates to the witness's personal circumstances, which have thus far been interpreted as being linked to, inter alia, the well-being of a witness.[104]

Thus, the Chamber does not exclude the possibility of allowing the use of video-links for other reasons but the well-being of a witness. In a more recent decision, the same Chamber accordingly held that 'logistical difficulties in arranging a witness's travel to testify at the seat of the Court in The Hague, which would seriously impact upon the expeditious conduct of the proceedings', can justify hearing a witness's testimony by means of video technology.[105] This decision indicates a tendency to gradually expand the criteria under which video-testimonies are possible. It remains as yet uncertain whether the Court will also allow video testimony for the purpose of safeguarding state cooperation by preventing a detained witness from applying for asylum in the Netherlands.

If the Court proceeds to do so, the question arises of how to implement this in practice. Rule 67(3) of the ICC's Rule of Procedure and Evidence requires that the video-link testimony is conducted from a 'venue … conducive to the giving of truthful and open testimony and to the safety, physical and psychological well-being, dignity and privacy of the witness'. Applying this rule in relation to detained witnesses, the following question arises: to what extent would the Court consider a cell in a detention facility in the Northern Côte d'Ivoire or Kinshasa—no matter what elaborate protective measures the Registry may have taken and no matter which monitoring mechanisms

[103] Yabasun and Holvoet (n 97) 744.

[104] Public Redacted Decision on the 'Prosecution Request to Hear Witness CAR-OTP-PPPP-0036's Testimony via Video-Link', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2101, TC III, ICC, 3 February 2012, para. 7.

[105] Decision on 'Defence Motion for Authorization to Hear the Testimony of Witness D-45 via Video-Link' of 6 March 2013, ICC-01/05-01/08-2525-Conf, a public redacted version of this decision was filed on 7 March 2013: Public Redacted Version of 'Decision on "Defence Motion for Authorization to Hear the Testimony of Witness D-45 via Video-Link"' of 6 March 2013, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2525-Red, TC III, ICC, 7 March 2013, para. 7; Decision on the 'Submissions on the Remaining Defence Evidence' and the Appearance of Witnesses D04-23, D04-26, D04-25, D04-36, D04-29, and D04-30 via Video-Link, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2740, TC III, ICC, 15 August 2013, para. 10; and Decision on the Defence's 'Submission on the Anticipated Witness Schedule and the Testimony of Witness D04-54' (ICC-01/05-01/08-2806-Conf), Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2818, TC III, ICC, 17 September 2013, para. 10. This position was confirmed in November 2013, when the Trial Chamber held that defence witness CHM-01 should in principle testify in person at the seat of the Court in The Hague, but that 'in light of the Registry's enquiry, in case logistical difficulties prevent the witness from travelling to the seat of the Court and starting his testimony … the Chamber will hear his testimony viva voce by means of video technology'. Public Redacted Version of Decision on the Presentation of Additional Testimony Pursuant to Articles 64(6)(b) and (d) and 69(3) of the Rome Statute, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2863-Red, TC III, ICC, para. 6.

may have been set in place—such a venue? It seems hard to imagine that a former Gbagbo supporter or Ouatarra defector would regard his prison cell as an encouraging environment in which he could speak freely and possibly critique the government regime that is also responsible for his (safety in) custody. The ICC's protective measures in Côte d'Ivoire prisons are likely to be more temporary in nature than the memory of its prison wardens.

Another option would be to take the testimony in an ICC Field Office or another more neutral venue. But whatever venue is selected, it will always be a challenge to create an atmosphere which is truly 'conducive to giving a truthful and open testimony'.[106] It seems that as long as all roads from the chosen venue by definition lead back to a detention centre which is operated by a former adversary who is perceived to violate human rights, any alternative venue might be problematic from the perspective of the witness. But then, if this line of reasoning were followed to the extreme, it would even mean that the ICC courtroom could not be considered a suitable venue as long as watertight agreements on the witnesses' return to the country of detention are in place. The ICC may just have to accept that the witness testimonies on which it relies have been taken under circumstances that are not ideal.

Although far from perfect, this demonstrates that remote testimonies of detained witnesses by video-link could in theory offer an alternative to in-person testimony. Yet, it remains to be seen if this is, in practice, a viable alternative. According to the International Bar Association (IBA), video-link testimony is particularly suitable for situations where there are security concerns; the witness's credibility is not in contention; and only factual information is provided.[107] In any other situation, the IBA's first choice is that witnesses come to The Hague and testify in person before the Court. The OTP takes a similar position.[108] If, in addition, the detained witness insists on testifying in person in The Hague—for example, if he does not deem any venue in the country of detention to be safe enough—this puts the Court in a moral quandary. If the defence, the prosecutor, as well as the witness's first choice were to let the testimony take place in The Hague, one could argue that the Court should have very strong arguments not to cater to this. Would the perceived threat of an asylum application be such a reason? To make it concrete, imagine Laurent Gbagbo requested his former Côte d'Ivoire Police Chief Jean-Noel Abehi to testify on his behalf, and imagine Abehi insisted on testifying in person in The Hague, could in that case the mere possibility of Abehi expressing his/her rights under the Refugee Convention—to which all States Parties of the Rome Statute, the Côte d'Ivoire included, are signatories—be considered sufficient reason not to allow him to do so, but instead to issue an order to organize a video-conference? Even if this could entail the risk that this material witness would under those circumstances not testify at all?

[106] As required by Rule 67(3) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Official Records of the ASP to the Rome Statute of the ICC, First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE').

[107] D Chaikel and L Smith van Lin, 'Witnesses before the International Criminal Court', International Bar Association Report (2013), 18.

[108] Id.

43.5.2.2 Physical transfer of court proceedings

The problems outlined in the previous section could to a certain extent be solved by physically transferring parts of court proceedings to third countries. There would be no need for the witness to come to the Court if the Court comes to the witness. One could in this respect think of introducing ICC investigating judges who can issue 'rogatory commissions' to take witness testimonies under oath and present written transcripts of these testimonies in court. Countries like Canada and the Netherlands, for example, already use such commissions to gather evidence in universal jurisdiction cases against Rwandan génocidaires.[109]

Also, this alternative entails certain challenges and limitations. Where a video-link testimony is possible under the current Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the introduction of rogatory commissions would entail a major revision of the existing rules, regulations, and practice. It would require a complete paradigm shift in the present legal culture of international criminal law. Moreover, the introduction of rogatory commissions does not tackle all of the challenges discussed. For example, it will still be difficult to find a venue which is truly conducive to truthful testimonies. Therefore, we do not foresee that this alternative will be implemented in the near future. The challenges to implement a system of rogatory commissions may simply not outweigh the solutions it provides.

43.6 Concluding Remarks

In this chapter we described how three detained Congolese ICC witnesses applied for asylum in the Netherlands. After long and complex proceedings, the Dutch courts excluded the witnesses from refugee protection on the basis of Article 1(f) of the Refugee Convention. Their deportation to the DRC was, however, hampered by Article 6 of the ECHR. Now that the ICC has ordered the return of the witnesses to their home country, it remains to be seen whether the Netherlands will take over custody until the decision on the witnesses' asylum application becomes final.

We have argued that this particular case has had a negative effect on the mutual relations between the ICC, the Netherlands, and the DRC. Moreover, we argued that the threat of more asylum applications could have serious implications for the future functioning of the international criminal justice system. Although it is unlikely that the ICC will be overwhelmed by detained witnesses applying for asylum in the Netherlands, the perceived threat alone will hamper the relationship between the ICC, States Parties, and the Netherlands as a host state. This dilemma demonstrates the practical and political problems that result from a lack of harmonization between (the execution of) international criminal law and (upholding) protective principles derived from international refugee and human rights law. It is difficult to conceive a solution that reduces the reluctance of sending states to cooperate with the ICC and at the same time guarantees access to the highest standards of human rights protection for detained witnesses and the accused. The three possible solutions we explored—anticipatory Article 6 measures, video-link testimony, and rogatory commissions—all come with complications and reservations. In particular, they all entail the risk that detained witnesses do not testify, because their human rights (protection) cannot be fully ensured. This begs the question to what extent the ICC as an institute intending to do justice according to the highest legal standards would, in that case, lose prestige. Because intuitively, it seems that something is not right if the Court were to simply accept that material witnesses cannot testify in person for the mere reason that it may put them in a rightful position to request protection against persecution, acts of torture, illegal detention, or the death penalty.

[109] For Canada, see e.g. R Currie and I Stancu, 'R. v Munyaneza: Pondering Canada's First Core Crimes Conviction' (2010) 10 International Criminal Law Review 829, 832. For the Netherlands, see e.g. Judgment of the District Court of The Hague in the case against Yvonne Basebya, LJN: BZ4292, 1 March 2013.

44

External Support and Internal Coordination—The ICC and the Protection of Witnesses

*Markus Eikel

44.1 Introduction

44.1.1 Topic

In April 2013 the OTP of the ICC issued a statement in relation to the situation in Kenya, in which it reaffirmed that 'witness protection remains one of our highest priorities'.[1] The same month, the departing Registrar, Ms Silvana Arbia, in summarizing her work, described the protection of witnesses as 'a sensitive issue and arguably the most important function of the Registry'.[2] In August and November 2013, in two different situations, the Court issued arrest warrants[3] against individuals for the commission of crimes against the administration of justice under Article 70 of the Rome Statute.[4] These attempts to punish witness tampering and intimidation can be seen as one further means to enhance witness protection. Why has the protection of witnesses become a crucial issue for both the prosecution and the Registry of the ICC? What guidance does the statutory framework of the Court provide on the role of the organs, and how has the jurisprudence developed in that regard? What practical problems in relation to protective measures have occurred in the early work of the Court, and how have they been solved? These are some of the questions the present chapter would like to address.

Protective measures have become an essential issue for the early practice of the ICC because most evidence presented during ICC proceedings so far has been witness testimony. The ICC also conducts investigations and prosecutions in situations

* OTP, ICC, MA (Hamburg, 1993), PhD (Hamburg, 1997), LLM (Leiden, 2011). The views expressed in this article are those of the author alone and do not necessarily reflect the views of the OTP.

[1] Statement by the OTP, 5 April 2013: <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/Pages/otp-statement-05-04-2013.aspx> accessed 3 May 2013.

[2] S Arbia, The Registrar's Legacy. Reflections on the Work of the Registry of the International Criminal Court 2008–2013 (April 2013) 4.

[3] Warrant of Arrest for Walter Osapiri Barasa, Barasa, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/13-11-US-Exp, PTC II, ICC, 2 August 2013; Warrant of Arrest for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, Aimé Kilolo Musamba, Jean-Jacques Mangenda Kabongo, Fidèle Babala Wandu, and Narcisse Arido, Bemba et al., Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/13-1-Red2-tENG, PTC II, ICC, 20 November 2013.

[4] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

of ongoing conflict or immediate post-conflict, which increases the demands on the Court's limited witness protection capacities. Importantly, the legal framework at the ICC, in contrast to the ICTY, the ICTR, and the SCSL, splits responsibilities between the different organs of the Court, thereby creating uncertainty and even confusion as to the practical responsibilities within the Court.

While there is no lack of academic attention for the work of the Court, scholarly contributions have so far largely ignored the aspect of the Court's work dealing with protective measures. If covered, legal literature has focused on specific aspects of protective measures at the ICC, i.e. the relationship between anonymous witness testimony and protective measures;[5] or a comparison of judicial protective measures between the different international criminal tribunals.[6] Some publications have described the work of the Court's Registry, including its efforts in relation to witness protection.[7] A comprehensive study has focused on the protection of witnesses in the African context, including a chapter on the ICC.[8]

In contrast to these previous approaches, this chapter will view protective measures primarily as an example of how the ICC, in its infant years, transfers statutory responsibilities into the practical work of the Court. This chapter identifies two main weaknesses in the Court's protection system: 1) a lack of internal coordination, especially in its early years, and 2) a lack of external support, leaving the Court to struggle with limitations of state cooperation and budgetary constraints. This chapter suggests enhancing the implementation of a comprehensive inter-organ approach towards protective measures. By promoting this model, this chapter intends to contribute to ongoing efforts to achieve a better governance of the Court.

44.1.2 Structure

This chapter will first analyse the various provisions in the Rome Statute and Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICC[9] dealing with protective measures. The Pre-Trial Chamber and Trial Chamber (44.2.1), the prosecutor (44.2.2), and the Registrar (44.2.3) are all assigned specific responsibilities in relation to protective measures. An analysis of the travaux préparatoires of the Rome Statute and the Rules in relation to relevant provisions will be undertaken in order to clarify some of the ambiguities

[5] M Kurth, 'Anonymous Witnesses before the International Criminal Court: Due Process in Dire Straits' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff 2009) 615.

[6] C McLaughlin, 'Victim and Witness Measures of the International Criminal Court: A Comparative Analysis' (2007) 6 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals 189.

[7] S Arbia, 'The International Criminal Court: Witness and Victim Protection and Support, Legal Aid and Family Visits' (2010) 36 Commonwealth Law Bulletin 519; M Dubuisson et al., 'Contribution of the Registry to Greater Respect for the Principles of Fairness and Expeditious Proceedings before the International Criminal Court' in Stahn and Sluiter (n 5) 565–84.

[8] C Mahony, The Justice Sector Afterthought: Witness Protection in Africa (Pretoria: Institute for Security Studies 2010) especially 15–58.

[9] Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Official Records of the ASP to the Rome Statute of the ICC, First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE').

inherent in the current drafting (44.2.4). In section 44.3, this chapter will closely examine two case studies (44.3.1.1 Lubanga 2008 and 44.3.1.2 Katanga and Ngudjolo 2008) that reflect the inherent tensions between Article 43(6) and Article 68(1) of the Rome Statute. In relation to procedural protective measures, as early as 2006 the question arose in the Lubanga case if the prosecution mandatorily needed to seek advice from the VWU before applying for exceptions from its general obligation to disclose the identity of witnesses (44.3.2).

Subsequently, this chapter will present agreed practices for protective measures of the Court that have consensually been developed between the different organs within the first years of the Court's existence (section 44.4). These established practices illustrate the dedicated efforts of all organs to overcome the difficulties of the early days of the Court, but also demonstrate the limitations of the Court in its protection capacities. The chapter will include protective measures of procedural and non-judicial nature. Examples for the latter are the Security Risk Assessment (SRA) and Individual Risk Assessment (IRA) (44.4.1), the Initial Response System (IRS) (44.4.2), and the Court's Witness Protection Programme (ICCPP) (44.4.3); an example of the former is the system of rolling disclosure (44.4.4).

In the conclusion (section 44.5), this chapter provides a short summary of its legal analysis and outlines the model of a comprehensive inter-organ approach. It recommends implementing the model in the framework of other ongoing efforts to achieve better efficiency within the Court. It stresses at the same time that, beyond improving internal coordination, the Court needs intensified support from external actors, both in terms of capacity and finances, if it truly wants to extend its protection capabilities.

As protective measures at the ICC offer a wide range of potential sub-topics, it is deemed necessary to determine at the outset of this chapter that the focus will be on protective measures for witnesses, not victims, although the Rome Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence often refer to the protection of both groups at the same time.[10] In addition, the analysis in this article focuses on protective measures during the time period prior to the in-court testimony of a witness. In a previous publication, the author has suggested a model of phased lead responsibilities for Court organs covering the whole period from the beginning of the investigation in a situation until the time after in-court testimony.[11]

44.2 Legal Framework

The statutory framework of the ICC is significantly different from the ad hoc Tribunals, as it distributes responsibility for witness protection between the different organs of the Court. There is no equivalent for these elaborate provisions in the Statutes or Rules of the ICTY, ICTR, or SCSL. The provisions reflect the importance attributed to the protection of witnesses in the Statute. However, the statutory framework leaves the Court with ambiguity as to their practical implementation.

[10] See e.g. in Arts 64(2) and 68(1) ICC Statute and Rule 81(4) ICC RPE.

[11] M Eikel, 'Witness Protection Measures at the International Criminal Court: Legal Framework and Emerging Practice' (2012) 23 Criminal Law Forum 97, 130–2.

Similar to the general references in the ICTY and ICTR Statutes,[12] Article 68(1) of the Rome Statute assigns responsibility for witness protection to the Court as a whole:

> The Court shall take appropriate measures to protect the safety, physical and psychological well-being, dignity and privacy of victims and witnesses. In doing so, the Court shall have regard to all relevant factors, including age, gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3, and health, and the nature of the crime, in particular, but not limited to, where the crime involves sexual or gender violence or violence against children.[13]

44.2.1 Chambers

Three statutory provisions specifically deal with the responsibilities of the Chambers for the protection of witnesses.

According to Article 57(3)(c), the Pre-Trial Chamber may 'where necessary, provide for the protection and privacy of victims and witnesses'. The reference mainly serves the purpose of clarifying the competence of the Chamber to provide applicable measures at the pre-trial stage.[14] ICC Rule of Procedure and Evidence 86 further establishes as a general principle that the Pre-Trial Chamber, in making any decision or order, 'shall take into account the needs of all victims and witnesses in accordance with article 68'.

According to Article 64(2), 'the Trial Chamber shall ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and is conducted with full respect for the rights of the accused and due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses'. In essence, the Chamber has to apply a balancing test between fair trial rights of the accused and the protection of witnesses.[15] It has been judged that this 'will be a difficult balance to reach especially for the disclosure to the accused of names and addresses of the witnesses in order to allow preparing their defence'.[16] The rights of the accused are broadly defined in Article 67.

[12] Art 22 of the Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute'); Art 22 of the Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute').

[13] According to Art 34 ICC Statute, the term Court refers to all judicial organs of the ICC (i.e. Presidency, Chambers, Prosecution, and Registry). Other provisions of the Statute further describe the responsibilities of these organs.

[14] F Guariglia et al., 'Article 57' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. Observers' Notes, Article by Article (München: C H Beck 2008) 1126.

[15] For the treatment of due process rights in the jurisprudence of the ICC, see more generally M Kurth, 'Anonymous Witnesses before the International Criminal Court: Due Process in Dire Straits' in Stahn and Sluiter (n 5) 615; McLaughlin (n 6) 207.

[16] G Bitti, 'Article 64' in O Triffterer (n 14) 1203–4. The Defence in the Muthaura and Kenyatta case has rather unconvincingly argued that the drafting of Art 64(2) clearly gives priority to the fair trial rights of the accused. See Defence Response to the Public Redacted Version of the 5 November 2012 'Prosecution Application for Delayed Disclosure of Witness Identities' (ICC-01/09-02/11-519-Conf-Exp), Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-/02/11-561, TC V, ICC, 7 December 2012, para. 24, with reference to ICTY jurisprudence in footnote 26.

Article 64(6)(e) provides that 'in performing its functions prior to trial or during the course of a trial, the Trial Chamber may, as necessary … provide for the protection of the accused, witnesses and victims'. It has been argued that this provision imposes a duty rather than a discretionary power for the Trial Chamber.[17] In the same sense, Trial Chamber I has stated that 'once constituted, [it had] a statutory responsibility for the protection of victims and witnesses throughout the entirety of the period it is seized of the case'.[18]

Following equivalent rules at ICTY and ICTR,[19] Rule 81(4) and Rule 87 give Chambers the authority to grant procedural measures of witness protection, either related to limitations of disclosure, or as in-court protective measures, such as image and voice distortion or testimony in closed session.

44.2.2 Prosecutor

Articles 54(3)(f) and 68(1) indicate that the prosecutor takes protective measures, thereby emphasizing that the Prosecutor has a mandate to decide on and implement protective measures in relation to his witnesses.

According to Article 54(3)(f), the Prosecutor 'may take necessary measures, or request that necessary measures be taken, to ensure the confidentiality of information, the protection of any person or the preservation of evidence'. It has been argued that Article 54(3)(f) gives the Prosecutor discretionary power in the area of witness protection, and that he or she therefore has a witness protection authority alongside that of the Court and the VWU.[20]

The second statutory provision is Article 68(1) (in part already quoted):

> The Court shall take appropriate measures to protect the safety, physical and psychological well-being, dignity and privacy of victims and witnesses. In so doing, the Court shall have regard to all relevant factors, including age, gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3, and health, and the nature of the crime, in particular, but not limited to, where the crime involves sexual or gender violence or violence against children. The Prosecutor shall take such measures particularly during the investigation and prosecution of such crimes. These measures shall not be prejudicial to or inconsistent with the rights of the accused and a fair and impartial trial.[21]

The language of Article 68(1) indicates that it is a mandatory duty of the prosecutor to take protective measures, and that this power is not subordinate to that of any other

[17] W Schabas, The International Criminal Court. A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 768.

[18] Decision on Consequences of Non-Disclosure of Exculpatory Materials Covered by Art 54(3)(e) Agreements and the Application to Stay the Prosecution of the Accused, together with Certain Other Issues Raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1401, TC I, ICC, 13 June 2008, para. 41.

[19] Rules 69 and 75 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 (adopted 11 February 1994, as amended 8 December 2010) UN Doc IT/32/Rev. 45 ('ICTY RPE'); Rules 69 and 75 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTR (adopted 29 June 1995, as amended 10 April 2013) UN Doc ITR/3/Rev.22.

[20] M Bergsmo and P Kruger, 'Article 54' in O Triffterer (n 14) 1086–7.

[21] Emphasis added.

organ of the Court.[22] The last sentence of paragraph 1 appears to provide a caveat intended to ensure that a decision by the prosecution to provide protective measures to a witness must be undertaken in an impartial and objective manner.[23] This rationale is supported by the fact that certain protective measures are provided by the VWU, so that they cannot be construed as an incentive for the witness to provide evidence in favour of the prosecution's case.

44.2.2.1 Prosecution's disclosure obligation and exemptions

Rule 76(1) obliges the Prosecutor to disclose to the Defence the identity and the statements of any witnesses he intends to call to testify, 'sufficiently in advance to enable the adequate preparation of the defence'.[24] This obligation, however, is not absolute. The Prosecutor can request an exemption if the protection of victims and witnesses is of concern, in accordance with Rules 76(4), 81(4), or 87(3). Rule 81(4) allows that, at pre-trial stage, witnesses' names and identifying information may be redacted (i.e. anonymous witnesses are authorized) 'to protect the safety of witnesses and victims and members of their families'.[25] Article 68(5) further provides for the possibility to submit the summary of a witness statement prior to the commencement of the trial in cases 'where the disclosure of evidence or information pursuant to this Statute may lead to the grave endangerment of the security of a witness or his or her family'. All these scenarios are exemptions from the general disclosure obligation of the Prosecutor, and they therefore need to be authorized by Chambers before being implemented.[26]

44.2.3 Registrar

Whereas the Statute is clear that the Prosecutor takes protective measures, the function of the VWU is two-fold. The unit provides protective measures,[27] and it advises on or recommends these measures.[28]

According to Article 43(6), 'the Registrar shall set up a Victims and Witnesses Unit within the Registry. This Unit shall provide, in consultation with the OTP, protective [22] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Georghis M Pikis and Judge Daniel David Ntanda Nsereko, Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the 'Decision on Evidentiary Scope of the Confirmation Hearing, Preventive Relocation and Disclosure under Article 67(2) of the Statute and Rule 67 of the Rules' of Pre-Trial Chamber I, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-776, AC, ICC, 26 November 2008, para. 15 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo appeals judgment on preventive relocation').

[23] Mahony (n 8) 35.

[24] For the drafting history of this rule, see H Brady, 'Disclosure of Evidence' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational Publishers 2001) 408–10.

[25] Rule 81(4) ICC RPE.

[26] Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Request for Authorisation to Redact Witness Statements', Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-475, AC, ICC, 13 May 2008, para. 44 ('Katanga appeals judgment on authorisation to redact witness statements').

[27] Art 43(6) ICC Statute and Rule 17(2)(a)(i) ICC RPE.

[28] Art 68(4) ICC Statute and Rule 17(2)(a)(i) ICC RPE. See also Rules 87(1) and 88(1) ICC RPE.

measures and security arrangements, counselling and other appropriate assistance for witnesses, victims who appear before the Court, and others who are at risk on account of testimony given by such witnesses'. Through Article 43(6), the VWU becomes a statutory organ of the Registry, and therefore its budget is part of the Court's regular budget.[29]

According to Article 68(4), '[t]he Victims and Witnesses Unit may advise the Prosecutor and the Court on appropriate protective measures, security arrangements, counselling and assistance as referred to in article 43, paragraph 6'.

Article 68(4) makes an explicit link to Article 43(6), but the content of both articles are not consistent. Article 68(4) provides that the VWU may advise the prosecutor and the Court on protective measures. To the contrary, Article 43(6) stipulates that the VWU shall provide, in consultation with the Office of the Prosecutor, protective measures and security arrangements. Read together, these provisions make it difficult to determine who in the end is in charge of implementing protective measures.

In November 2008 the Appeals Chamber concluded that the VWU 'is responsible not merely for giving advice on protective measures, but for the actual provision of protective measures and security arrangements',[30] thereby emphasizing the importance of Article 43(6). In the dissenting opinion of Judges Pikis and Nsereko[31] as well as in legal literature[32] it has been argued that Article 43(6) must be read in pari materiae with Article 68(4). The role of the VWU with respect to protection measures 'must be an advisory one', as it is simply not within the power of the VWU to order protection measures for witnesses, because the VWU does not have the means to issue such orders or to enforce them.

Rule 17(2)(a) further contributes to the existing ambiguity, as the functions of the VWU in relation to witnesses are described as both providing witnesses with adequate protective and security measures and, at the same time, recommending to the organs of the Court the adoption of protection measures. In light of the early criticism about the lack of clarity in the Rome Statute, it is somewhat surprising that the Rules, finalized in September 2002, have contributed little to clarify the position of the VWU as created by the Statute.[33]

The matter is further complicated by different conceptions of how the VWU is supposed to provide protective measures. One view would consider the VWU as a mere service provider, implementing requests of prosecution and Defence, and thereby complementing the authority of the prosecution to request measures in accordance with Article 54(3)(f). Alternatively, one could view the VWU as a statutory organ providing neutral services to both prosecution and Defence. When accepting that second view, the wording of Article 43(6), asking the VWU to consult solely with the OTP, [29] T Ingadottir et al., 'The International Criminal Court. The Victims and Witnesses Unit (Article 43.6 of the Rome Statute). A Discussion Paper' (2000) 8 ICC Discussion Paper No. 1, 8.

[30] Katanga and Ngudjolo appeals judgment on preventive relocation (n 22) para. 89.

[31] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Georghis M Pikis and Judge Daniel David Ntanda Nsereko, ibid., paras 14 and 22.

[32] D Tolbert, 'Article 43' in Triffterer (n 14) 989.

[33] G Dive, 'The Registry' in Lee (n 24) 267. Most of the recommendations in the paper of Ingadottir et al. (n 29) about the role of VWU seem to have been ignored when finalizing the RPE.

remains ambivalent. In sum, the VWU not only has the double-function of advising and providing, but the latter function is based on different conceptions of how the unit fits into the overall institutional structure of the Court.

The ambiguities of the drafting of Statute and Rules cannot be solved if one looks solely at the criteria of context, object, and purpose, as outlined in Article 31(1) of the VCLT.[34] As a supplementary means of interpretation, in accordance with Article 32 of the Convention, the travaux préparatoires of the Rome Statute will be analysed in the subsequent section.[35]

44.2.4 Travaux préparatoires Article 43(6) and Article 68(1)

Between 1994 and 1996 various drafts of the Statute of the ICC were submitted by the ILC, the ad hoc Committee on the Establishment of a Permanent ICC and the Preparatory Committee on an ICC.[36] Discussions at the Rome Conference in relation to Article 68 were framed by a draft proposal of the Canadian delegation.[37] This draft merged the first three paragraphs of the Preparatory Committee draft into only two.[38] As one result, the responsibility of the Court as a whole moved to the beginning of the article, as in the statutory provisions of the ICTY and ICTR. As a second important consequence, the responsibilities of the prosecutor moved more prominently to paragraph 1 of Article 68, directly following the responsibilities of the Court as a whole (see the quote in section 44.2.2). As a third important consequence, the language in relation to the VWU changed to a less-obliging 'may': the VWU 'may advise the Prosecutor and the Court on appropriate protective measures, security arrangements, counselling and assistance referred to in article 44, paragraph 4'. Article 68 therefore emphasized the important role of the prosecutor for taking protective measures.

The draft article that ultimately became Article 43 also underwent a significant re-wording. This change in wording first appeared on 30 June 1998 in the text of the [34] 'Its objects may be gathered from the chapter of the law in which the particular section is included and its purposes from the wider aims of the law as may be gathered from its preamble and general tenor of the treaty.' See Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber 1's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-168, AC, ICC, 13 July 2006, para. 33. Following this definition, the purpose of both articles is the same. In relation to the objects, Art 43 is placed in Part IV of the Statute, covering the composition of the Court, whereas Art 68 is in Part VI, which covers 'The Trial'. Ultimately, these criteria do not solve the ambiguities between the two articles.

[35] Art 32 of the VCLT (signed 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331: 'Recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion, in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of article 31, or to determine the meaning when the interpretation according to article 31: (a) leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure; or (b) leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable.'

[36] For a detailed analysis of these proposals in relation to witness protection, see Eikel (n 11) 108–9.

[37] W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 823.

[38] United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Proposal Submitted by Canada, Art 68, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.58 and UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.58/Rev.1 (6 July 1998); Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGMP/L.2 (24 June 1998).

Conference Coordinator responsible for Articles 43 and 44,[39] and was transferred from there to all further drafts up to the final version of Article 43.[40] According to the amended wording, the VWU 'shall provide, in consultation with the Office of the Prosecutor, protective measures and security arrangements, counselling and other appropriate assistance for witnesses, victims who appear before the Court, and for others who are at risk on account of testimony given by such witness'.

From optionally advising the other organs, the role of the VWU in Article 43 was suddenly enhanced to being responsible for carrying out protective measures. The redrafting of Article 43 was now completely inconsistent with the provisions of Article 68. In the recommendations of the working group's coordinator, a footnote demonstrates the awareness of the drafters that the provisions of draft Articles 68 and 44 had to be brought in line.[41] On 7 July 1998 the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole asked the Chairman of the Drafting Committee to bring the text of draft Article 44 in line with draft Article 68(5) (later Article 68(4)), thereby fully aware that there was a discrepancy.[42] The adjustment of both articles obviously did not take place.

In sum, the drafting at the Conference changed the system of responsibilities for protective measures to an incoherent framework: on the one hand, Article 68(1) gave the prosecutor a decisive role in the field of protective measures, while the VWU was confined to an advisory function. On the other hand, Article 43(6) put the VWU in charge of providing protective measures, in consultation with the OTP. Here lies the starting point of all further confusions about the role of the respective organs. The following section (44.3) will show what controversies resulted from the drafting ambiguities of the two articles in the early practice of the Court. The larger part (44.3.1) will focus on physical protective measures, as disagreements primarily arose in this area. Section 44.3.2 will cover an aspect of procedural protective measures where different opinions were less contentious.

44.3 Disagreements about Responsibilities for Protective Measures

44.3.1 Physical protective measures

*44.3.1.1 Admittance into the witness protection programme (*Lubanga 2008)

Prior to the scheduled beginning of the Lubanga trial, in early October 2007, the prosecution informed the Chamber that 35 of its 37 trial witnesses 'require the protection

[39] Committee of the Whole, Coordinator's Text on Articles 43 and 44, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.36 (30 June 1998).

[40] Recommendation of the Coordinator, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.45 (4 July 1998); Drafting Committee, Texts Adopted on First Reading (7 July 1998), UN Doc A/CONF.183/DC/R.98 (7 July 1998); Report of the Drafting Committee to the Committee of the Whole, Part 4. Composition and Administration of the Court, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.67 (13 July 1998).

[41] Recommendation of the Coordinator, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/L.45 (4 July 1998), footnote 89: 'The language of this paragraph should be brought in line with that of article 68, paragraph 5.'

[42] Note regarding Arts 37, 43, 44, and 49 contained in the transmittal letter from the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to the Chairman of the Drafting Committee, 7 July 1998.

of the Registry's Victims and Witnesses Unit'.[43] In view of the Trial Chamber, the prosecution had referred 11 witnesses to the VWU ahead of time; however, 'the process for the outstanding 24 witnesses was commenced significantly and unjustifiably late'.[44] As will be explained in section 44.4.3 of this chapter, a protection referral application is an inter-organ procedure, during which the OTP refers a matter to the Registry.

During status conferences on 12 and 13 February 2008, the OTP contended that the VWU was obliged by Article 43(6) to provide protective measures for all witnesses 'who are at risk'. Whereas the OTP asked that 'all foreseeable risks' should be eliminated, the VWU determined a different threshold, identified as 'a high likelihood that the witness will be harmed or killed unless action is taken'.[45]

At the same status conference, the VWU revealed 'that a fundamental difference of approach had emerged between the prosecution and the Unit during the preceding year that has impeded the progress of this case'.[46] The Prosecution and the VWU had previously operated on an agreed-upon set of four criteria, which the VWU then 'abandoned'[47]. The VWU admitted that it had modified the approach originally applied, which granted entry into the programme when a certain number of these criteria were met. The criteria were now seen 'as no more than one of the available tools' in 'an organic and developing area'.[48]

In its April 2008 decision, Trial Chamber I abstained from any comments on 'the respective roles of the VWU and the prosecution . . . in any wider sense'.[49] The Chamber stressed that its decision was 'fact-specific', and that it would intervene into the decision-making process of the Registrar only if she would have clearly applied the wrong criteria. Without further explanation, the Trial Chamber then simply stated that the criticism towards the VWU was 'without sustainable foundation',[50] and it complimented the VWU for an assessment on a 'fact sensitive rather than a mechanical or formulistic basis'.[51] In terms of the timing of the OTP protection referrals, it qualified the activities of the OTP as 'excessively late'.[52] The Trial Chamber further pointed out that the OTP and the VWU 'regrettably have been unable to agree on the extent of their respective responsibilities for witnesses who may be at risk of harm'.[53]

In its decision, the Trial Chamber stressed the need for a comprehensive inter-organ approach towards all protective measures available. As a result of the decision, the [43] Hearing Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-52-ENG, TC I, ICC, 1 October 2007, 27, lines 15–20.

[44] Decision regarding the Timing and Manner of Disclosure and the Date of Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1019, TC I, ICC, 9 November 2007, para. 20.

[45] Hearing Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-74-Conf-Exp-ENG, TC I, ICC, 12 February 2008 as quoted in Decision on Responsibilities for Protective Measures, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1311-Anx2, 24 April 2008, para. 56 ('Lubanga decision on responsibilities for protective measures').

[46] Ibid., para. 35.

[47] Lubanga decision on responsibilities for protective measures (n 45) para. 34, referring to criticism of the OTP towards VWU.

[48] Ibid., para. 41. [49] Ibid., para. 77. [50] Ibid., para. 77. [51] Ibid., paras 79 and 82.

[52] Ibid., para. 81. [53] Ibid., para. 77.

prosecution was not in a position to timely disclose the identity and statements of the witnesses whose applications to the programme had been refused. The Trial Chamber saw no other choice than to postpone the beginning of the trial to the end of June 2008 (from where it was again delayed to early 2009).

The difficulties that arose in this incident had their origin in the contradictory provisions of Articles 43(6) and 68(4). Whereas both parties agreed upon the issue that the VWU administers the Court's witness protection programme (as the protective measure in question), they disagreed on the criteria that determined access to the programme and thereby on the question who decides on these criteria. The controversy was further rooted in the two different concepts of the role of the VWU. The OTP, based on Articles 54(3)(f) and 68(1), viewed the referral application to the VWU as a service request, in nature similar to a translation or an IT request. Contrary to that, the VWU emphasized its role neutral to both Prosecution and Defence, based on the incorporation of the Unit into the Registry in accordance with Article 43(6).

*44.3.1.2 Preventive relocation (*Katanga and Ngudjolo 2008)

In the Katanga and Ngudjolo proceedings, the OTP submitted referral applications for the inclusion of several witnesses into the ICCPP. After the Registrar turned these referral applications down, the OTP, on its own initiative, relocated four witnesses which it deemed at risk due to their interaction with the Court.[54] Pre-Trial Chamber I concluded that the Prosecutor had no power to preventively relocate witnesses.[55] Based on Article 43(6), in view of the single judge, the Registrar is responsible for running the ICCPP, and the role of both Prosecution and Defence is limited to making applications for the inclusion of witnesses into the programme. In relation to protective measures, the judge observed that, by implementing the practice of preventive relocation, the Prosecution was 'misusing its mandate in order to de facto shift the power to decide on the relocation of a given witness from the Registry to the Prosecution'.[56]

The Pre-Trial Chamber's argumentation became less convincing when it resorted to a 'contextual interpretation' of Article 68(1), which led the single judge to make findings on the responsibilities of the prosecutor for protection. It is questionable to narrow the prosecution's mandate for protection under Article 68(1) to the following functions: (i) advising the witnesses as to what they can expect from the Court in terms of protection, as well as the competent organ of the Court for the adoption and implementation of the different protective measures; (ii) requesting the inclusion of [54] Prosecution's Submission of Information on the Preventive Relocation of Witnesses 132, 163, 238, and 287, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-398, PTC I, ICC, 3.

[55] Corrigendum to the Decision on Evidentiary Scope of the Confirmation Hearing, Preventive Relocation and Disclosure under Art 67(2) of the Statute and Rule 77 of the Rules, Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-428-Corr, 25 April 2008, para. 23 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on preventive relocation').

[56] Ibid., para. 32.

witnesses in the ICCPP, as well as providing the Registrar with the necessary information to facilitate the assessment process; and (iii) requesting procedural protective measures such as redactions of identifying information from the Chamber.[57]

In its analysis, the Pre-Trial Chamber limited its contextual interpretation of Article 68(1) to Article 43(6), but did not pay attention to the equally relevant Articles 54(3)(f) and 68(4).[58]

Following its argumentation, the Pre-Trial Chamber decided that 'the Prosecution shall immediately put an end to the practice of preventive relocation'.[59] As a remedial action, the Pre-Trial Chamber initially excluded the use of statements, interview notes, and interview transcripts of two witnesses that had been relocated.[60] As a consequence, the Prosecutor withdrew the charge of sexual slavery that appeared in the arrest warrants for Katanga and Ngudjolo, apparently unable to support the charge without those witnesses. The Registry then agreed to admit the two witnesses into the ICCPP, not out of reconsideration of the original risk assessment but rather due to new security concerns incurred following the prosecutor's preventive relocations.[61]

On the same issue, in October 2008 the Appeals Chamber undertook an analysis of the drafting of Article 43(6) and came to the conclusion that 'the role of VWU in relation to protective measures was . . . not limited to the provision of giving advice alone'.[62] It thereby stressed the double-function of the VWU of providing and recommending protective measures. The Appeals Chamber, similarly to what Pre-Trial Chamber I had done in its April 2008 decision, explored the drafting of only one of the key statutory provisions (Article 43), but did not look at the drafting history of Articles 54 and 68. In that context, the Appeals Chamber could have further elaborated on what it understood to be the 'significant role' that the prosecutor plays in relation to measures of relocation.[63]

Explicitly, the Appeals Chamber emphasized the need for cooperation between the organs, which it deemed 'essential' and of 'vital importance' for the success of witness protection.[64] The 'more general mandate' of the OTP enables the prosecutor to take charge of protective measures for its witnesses, prior to testimony in court, with the exceptions as mentioned in the judgment. In cases of disagreement, the Chamber saw itself as the 'ultimate arbiter'.[65]

[57] Ibid., para. 25.

[58] As pointed out by the Prosecution in Prosecution's Document in Support of Appeal Against the Decision on the Evidentiary Scope of the Confirmation Hearing and Preventive Relocation, Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-541, AC, ICC, 2 June 2008, paras 26–7.

[59] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on preventive relocation (n 55) para. 54.

[60] Ibid., para. 39.

[61] VWU's Considerations on the System of Witness Protection and the Practice of 'Preventive Relocation', Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-585, AC, ICC, 12 June 2008, paras 39–42. For a concise summary of the preventive relocation episode, see also 'Courting History. The Landmark International Criminal Court's First Years', Human Rights Watch (2008), 171 ('HRW, Courting History').

[62] Katanga and Ngudjolo appeals judgment on preventive relocation (n 22) para. 90.

[63] Ibid., para. 100.

[64] Ibid., para. 101. The dissenting opinion goes as far as to say that cooperation is envisioned by the provisions of Art 43(6) and Art 68(4). See Dissenting Opinion of Judges Pikis and Nsereko, ibid., para. 23.

[65] Katanga and Ngudjolo appeals judgment on preventive relocation (n 22) para. 97.

In contrast, the dissenting judges of the Appeals Chamber gave decisive power to Article 68, which, in their view, 'is the main statutory provision definitive of the powers, authority and responsibilities for providing protection to victims and witnesses'.[66] According to the dissenting judges, a decision to grant the Registrar exclusive responsibility to approve and implement protective measures 'flies in the face of the unequivocal provisions of article 68(1) and article 54(3)(f)'.[67]

44.3.2 Limitations to disclosure of witness identities (October 2006)

An early disagreement in relation to procedural protective measures arose when the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Lubanga proceedings ruled that, before requesting non-disclosure of a witness' identity in accordance with Rule 81(4), the OTP needed to mandatorily refer the matter to the VWU to seek advice on options for less restrictive protective measures.[68] The Appeals Chamber overturned the decision, indicating that a mandatory application to the VWU was prescribed neither in the Statute nor the Rules nor the Regulations of the Court; that such an application could in many cases be 'useful', but it would be 'overly formalistic' to make it mandatory; and that redaction applications were to be approved by the Chamber on a 'case-by-case basis', on application by the prosecution.[69] In subsequent decisions, the Appeals Chamber established a set of criteria to justify redactions. These criteria include:

1. The existence of an 'objectively justifiable risk' to the safety of the person concerned (in difference to a subjective feeling of insecurity);[70]
2. The risk must arise from disclosing the particular information to the accused (in difference to disclosing the information to the public);[71]
3. The infeasibility or insufficiency of less restrictive protective measures;[72]
4. An assessment as to whether the redactions sought are 'prejudicial to or inconsistent with the rights of the accused and a fair and impartial trial';[73]

[66] Dissenting Opinion of Judges Pikis and Nsereko, ibid., para. 15.

[67] Ibid., para. 7.

[68] Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81 (2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-108-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 19 May 2006, para. 31.

[69] Judgment on the Prosecutor's appeal against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'Decision Establishing General Principles Governing Applications to Restrict Disclosure pursuant to Rule 81 (2) and (4) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-568, AC, ICC, 13 October 2006, paras 33–40 (hereafter 'Lubanga appeals judgment on general principles'). See for the context of this decision D Scheffer, 'A Review of the Experiences of the Pre-Trial and Appeals Chambers of the International Criminal Court Regarding the Disclosure of Evidence', in Stahn and Sluiter (n 5) 585, at 593.

[70] Katanga appeals judgment on authorization to redact witness statements (n 26) para. 71.

[71] Ibid., para. 71 (b).

[72] Lubanga appeals judgment on general principles (n 69) para. 37; Judgment on the appeal of Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled 'First Decision on the Prosecution Requests and Amended Requests for Redactions under Rule 81', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-773, AC, ICC, 14 December 2006, para. 33.

[73] Ibid., para. 34.

5. The obligation to periodically review the decision authorizing the redactions should circumstances change.[74]

While applying these criteria, the Court subsequently succeeded in establishing practices for procedural protective measures, which in turn supported general efforts to achieve better judicial efficiency. In this context, the principle of a rolling disclosure established in the Kenya cases will be described in section 44.4.3.

44.4 Developed Practices

By overcoming some of the initial difficulties, the Court as a whole has managed to achieve substantive results in developing more satisfactory protective tools. One positive—and immediately obvious—indicator for the effectiveness of the protective measures is the fact that, in the first seven years after starting its operations, none of the more than 500 ICC witnesses seems to have suffered serious harm due to his or her interaction with the Court.[75] As a significant internal achievement, in March 2011 the prosecutor and the Registrar concluded a 'Joint Protocol on the Mandate, Standards and Procedure for Protection'.[76]

However, the protection capacities of the Court are hampered by insufficient cooperation from external partners, in particular States Parties, and budgetary constraints.[77] Protective measures are part of the cooperation regime established by the ICC Statute, which is premised around the duty assumed by States Parties to act as the enforcement arm of the Court.[78] Article 93(1)(j) obliges States Parties to provide assistance to the Court in relation to the protection of victims and witnesses. The provision does not specify what form of protective measures may be requested by the Court.[79]

All organs of the Court have to rely on some form of domestic support to implement protective measures. The Registry is confronted with a low level of states' cooperation when it tries to conclude relocation agreements for witnesses.

While Chambers cannot compel states to render routine enforcement nor directly impose penalties in the face of non-compliance,[80] they can issue court orders to instruct States Parties to implement protective measures. As an example, when the security situation in Ituri (DRC) significantly deteriorated in 2006, the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Lubanga proceedings ordered the Registrar to conclude agreements with the DRC Government and the UN 'to enhance (a) national capacity to protect witnesses and (b) cooperation with the Court in order to protect witnesses working within their

[74] Katanga appeals judgment on authorization to redact witness statements (n 26) para. 73(c).
[75] Mahony (n 8) 16.
[76] The Protocol is not public, but reference is made in court filings. See e.g. Prosecution's Response to 'Defence Request for Variation of Decision on Summons or in the Alternative Request for Leave to Appeal', Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-59, PTC II, ICC, 15 April 2011, para. 8.
[77] See for the funding of the Court in general Ford, Chapter 5, this volume.
[78] R Rastan, 'The Responsibility to Enforce—Connecting Justice with Unity' in Stahn and Sluiter (n 5) 163.
[79] C Kress and K Prost, 'Article 93' in Triffterer (n 14) 1578.
[80] Rastan (n 78) 181.

structures or accepted within their national witness protection programmes (which could include inter alia redeployment outside risk areas)'.[81]

In recent reports, the Court has identified witness protection as an area where shared expertise could lead to capacity building on the domestic level.[82] Seminars held in 2013 in Dakar and Arusha, attended by high-ranking representatives of the ICC and of African states, have stressed the need of the Court for further relocation agreements, which at the same time could provide for broader domestic capacity and technical assistance.[83] The OTP has consistently asked that states in their cooperation programmes give particular attention to the setting up of national witness protection programmes.[84] In Kenya, one of the ICC situation countries, international support has helped to make the national witness protection unit operational.[85]

However, one has to be careful not to over-emphasize the potential of domestic protection programmes; they are largely non-existent in most of the countries where the ICC investigates. While there is without a doubt a need to strengthen domestic witness protection capacities, setting up protection programmes also faces significant challenges, which primarily relate to lack of domestic capacity (i.e. control over territory, poor infrastructure, lack of personnel with expertise),[86] and actual or perceived lack of neutrality (i.e. when state officials or the state apparatus were themselves involved in the commission of crimes).[87] For the signing of relocation agreements, the Court does not require a state to have its own national witness protection programme.[88]

44.4.1 SRA and IRA

At various times before the Chambers, the VWU has outlined its approach to protective measures as follows:

> The very foundation of the Court's protection system lies on the application of good practises by any representative of the Court who interacts with [81] Decision on a General Framework Concerning Protective Measures for Prosecution and Defence Witnesses, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-447, PTC I, ICC, 19 September 2006, 5–6.

[82] Report of the Court on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/11/39, 16 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), paras 23–6; Report of the Court on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/12/35, 9 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 32.

[83] Report of the Bureau on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/12/36, 21 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), Annex III: Summary of the Dakar seminar on witness protection (25–6 June 2013); Summary of the Arusha seminar on Witness Protection (29–30 October 2013), ICC-ASP/12/36/Add. 1, 7 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP).

[84] Prosecutorial Strategy 2009–12, OTP, 1 February 2010, para. 64; Report of the Bureau on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/8/44, 15 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP), para. 95.

[85] Focal Points' Compilation of Examples of Projects Aimed at Strengthening Domestic Jurisdictions to Deal with Rome Statute Crimes, RC/ST/CM/INF.2, 30 May 2010 (Kampala Review Conference of the Rome Statute), Example C: Support to Kenya in order to Operationalize a Witness Protection Programme, United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, 6–7. For the problematic aspect of the domestic witness protection programme in Kenya, see C Alai and N Mue, 'Complementarity and the Impact of the Rome Statute and the International Criminal Court in Kenya' in C Stahn and M El Zeidy (eds), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity. From Theory to Practice vol. II (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 1232–3.

[86] Ending Threats and Reprisals against Victims of Torture and related international crimes: A Call to Action, Redress (2009) 62–3.

[87] Ibid., 64–5.

[88] Report of the Court on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/12/35, 9 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 31.

> witnesses. These practices are aimed at hiding a witness's interaction with the Court from the community where the witness resides, from potential threats and the public. These practices are enhanced by an Initial Response System (IRS) which enables the Court to extract witnesses who are afraid of being immediately targeted or who have been targeted to a safe location in the field. A protective measure of last resort is the entry to the ICCPP and subsequent relocation of the witness and his or her close relations away from the source of the threat.[89]

Beyond these general principles, more in-depth public information in relation to the protective measures of the Court is scarce. In particular, the VWU does not specify or provide examples of what it considers to be 'good practices' beyond the fact that 'these are based on the premise that prevention is the best protection'.[90] In the view of the OTP, good practices are appropriate to avoid creating or exacerbating risks, but have limited utility in reducing existing risks.[91] They are 'always necessary', but 'may not always be sufficient'.[92]

One important aspect of applying good practices is the continuous conduct of risk assessments. In its Regulations, the OTP has committed itself to develop an 'Area-Specific Threat and Risk Assessment' for each area of operation related to an investigation; to ensure direct and secure contact with witnesses; and to regularly update general and individual security risk assessments.[93] By now, SRA and IRA have been accepted by judges as a proper tool to evaluate the security situation of a witness.[94]

More recently, the VWU has also conducted security risk assessments for defence witnesses.[95] As the defence has no capacity to conduct risk assessments on its own, it needs to rely on the support that the VWU can provide. As an example, in the early stages of the Kenya cases, the defence had to communicate the name and the contact details of a witness to the VWU, which was to advise the defence within two weeks' time if the contact would put the person at risk, and which security arrangements the defence should adopt. While the defence deemed this system to be 'unworkable', the prosecution pointed out that

[89] VWU's Considerations on the System of Witness Protection and the Practice of 'Preventive Relocation', Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-585, AC, ICC, 12 June 2008, paras 9–10; see also Arbia (n 7); Summary Report on the Seminar on Protection of Victims and Witnesses Appearing before the International Criminal Court (24 November 2010).

[90] Summary Report on the Round Table on the Protection of Victims and Witnesses Appearing before the International Criminal Court (29–30 January 2009).

[91] Prosecution's Response to 'Victims and Witnesses Unit's considerations on the system of witness protection and the practice of "preventive relocation" '), Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-664, AC, ICC, 7 July 2008, note 70.

[92] Prosecution's Document in Support of Appeal against the Decision on the Evidentiary Scope of the Confirmation Hearing and Preventive Relocation, Katanga and Ngudjolo, ICC-01/04-01/07-541, AC, ICC, 2 June 2008, para. 19.

[93] Regulation 44 and Regulation 45(c) and (e), Regulations of the OTP, ICC-BD/05-01-09, 23 April 2009.

[94] Eikel (n 11) 123.

[95] Decision on the 'Defence Motion for Disclosure of VWU Security Assessments of Defence Witnesses', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2588, TC III, ICC, 19 April 2013.

the same system also applied to OTP witnesses as well as defence witnesses in other cases.[96]

The VWU has also taken on the task of conducting IRAs of prosecution witnesses in cases where their identities are disclosed during the investigation of the defence.[97] For such scenarios, Chambers have asked the VWU and defence teams to conclude a Joint Protocol, including that the defence must request an IRA from the VWU before contacting prosecution witnesses.[98] With all these activities, the awareness that the VWU is a neutral entity that serves both Prosecution and defence has grown.

44.4.2 IRS

In the words of the former ICC Registrar, the IRS is 'a 24/7 emergency response system which enables the Court to extract to a safe location in the field witnesses who are afraid of being imminently targeted or who have in fact been targeted'.[99] A call to the 'emergency hotline' activates a network of local partners with the capacity to intervene and extract an individual to a safe location in case of an urgent threat.[100] The threat is subsequently assessed by VWU protection officers in order to determine if further protective measures are required.

An IRS functions only in defined geographic areas where multiple witnesses are residing. It is therefore more difficult for the OTP to access witnesses residing outside of the IRS areas, which might affect the evidence that the Prosecution is able to collect and to present in court. Local partners implementing the IRS are well-remunerated personnel from the security sector or have previous security sector experience.[101] They do not know about the identities of potential users of the IRS hotline; their involvement is for the most part limited to following a pre-established protocol to bring a threatened individual to a safe location.[102] As an example, in Uganda, the domestic police force has assisted with the implementation of the IRS.[103] Effective maintenance of the system requires training of the local police, regular contact with local [96] Prosecution's Response to 'Defence Request for Variation of Decision on Summons or in the Alternative Request for Leave to Appeal' (ICC-01/09-01/11-47-Corr2), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-61, PTC II, ICC, 18 April 2011, para. 11; Instructions on Approaching Third Parties' Material to the Defence's Investigations, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1734-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2009, paras 15–20.

[97] Prosecution's Response to 'Defence Request for Variation of Decision on Summons or in the Alternative Request for Leave to Appeal', Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-59, PTC II, ICC, 15 April 2011, para. 10.

[98] Instructions on Approaching Third Parties Material to the Defence's Investigations, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1734-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2009, paras 13, 15, and 17.

[99] Arbia (n 7) 522; see also Summary Report on the Round Table on the Protection of Victims and Witnesses Appearing before the International Criminal Court (29 and 30 January 2009); Regulation 95 (Protection arrangements) of the Regulations of the Registry, ICC-BD/03-01-06-Rev.1 (entered into force 6 March 2006, revised 25 September 2006).

[100] HRW, Courting History (n 61) 152.

[101] Mahony (n 8) 41.

[102] HRW, Courting History (n 61) 153; all information is based on interviews of Human Rights Watch with ICC Staff in May 2007 and March 2008; Mahony (n 8) 36–7.

[103] Report of the Court on the Kampala Field Office: activities, challenges, and review of staffing levels; and on memoranda of understanding with situation countries, ICC-ASP/9/11, 30 July 2010 (Ninth Session of the ASP), 2.

authorities, and frequent testing of its efficacy and responsiveness. The IRS is managed and financed by the VWU.[104]

Over the years, judges have accepted that the IRS is one of the protection tools genuinely offered by the Court. In evaluating the protective measures available to individuals, in their decisions, judges now make reference to the question of whether a person has access to the IRS,[105] or they might refer to the IRS in relation to other available protective measures.[106]

An IRS has financial implications and is therefore also of concern to the States Parties. When the Court entered the trial stage of its first proceedings, in 2007, the Bureau of the ASP foresaw 'the increase in expenditure to provide satisfactory protection for witnesses', which is 'particularly relevant for the implementation and maintenance of the initial response systems for witnesses under threat'.[107] In the budget for 2009, the 'expansion of initial response systems in the field' was a relevant factor.[108] In 2013 an IRS was operational in the DRC, CAR, Kenya, and Côte d'Ivoire.[109] The IRS in Uganda is no longer in place.[110] With respect to the DRC, the Court has indicated that, for 2013, it 'will continue to maintain the IRS…with a view to gradually reducing the number of IRS established there in view of reduced activities and ongoing implementation of exit strategies for witnesses'.[111] The recent downsizing of functional IRS is mainly due to financial limitations. However, as the surrender of Bosco Ntaganda—one of the targets in the DRC—to the Court has shown, protection needs can only be forecasted to a certain degree, while some level of unpredictability remains. Due to primarily financial implications, the Court faces difficult decisions with the inherent danger that protection capacities might not be available when they are needed at short notice.

[104] Proposed Programme Budget for 2011 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/9/10, 2 August 2010 (Ninth Session of the ASP), 115; Proposed Programme Budget for 2010 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/8/10, 30 July 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP), 109; see also the reference to acquisition of new vehicles for the Initial Response Systems in Report of the Court on Capital Investment Replacements, ASP/8/27, 29 October 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP), 3, Table 1. See also the reference to the IRS in the amended Draft Regulation 92(2) for the Regulations of the Registry.

[105] See, for example, Prosecution's Request for Protective Measures for one Prosecution Witness, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1643, TC I, ICC, 23 January 2009, 3; Decision on the 'Prosecution's Request for Non-Disclosure of the Identity of Eight Individuals providing Rule 77 Information' of 5 December 2008 and 'Prosecution's Request for Non-Disclosure of Information in One Witness Statement Containing Rule 77 Information' of 12 March 2009, ICC-01/04-01/07-1980-Anx2, TC I, ICC, 24 June 2009, para. 14.

[106] Decision on the Prosecutor's Application to Redact Information under Art 67(2) of the Statute or Rule 77 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1101-tENG, TC II, ICC, 4 May 2009, para. 43.

[107] Report of the Bureau on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/6/21, 19 October 2007 (Sixth Session of the ASP), 12.

[108] Proposed Programme Budget for 2009 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/7/9, 29 July 2008 (Seventh Session of the ASP), 7–8.

[109] Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/11/10, 16 August 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 425.

[110] Report of the Court on the Kampala Field Office: activities, challenges, and review of staffing levels; and on memoranda of understanding with situation countries, ICC-ASP/9/11, 30 July 2010 (Ninth Session of the ASP), para. 8.

[111] Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/11/10, 16 August 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 425.

44.4.3 The ICCPP

Out of all protective tools available to the Court, the ICCPP serves as a prime example to show how the limitations of external support significantly weaken the Court's protection capabilities.

In the statutory rules of the ICC, Rule 16(4) makes the only direct reference to the ICCPP.[112] According to this rule, agreements on relocation of victims and witnesses may be negotiated with states by the Registrar on behalf of the Court. Rule 16(4) thereby refers to two important features of the ICCPP: the programme is administered by the Registrar, and its capacities are based on the cooperation of States Parties.

The mechanisms for the witness protection programme are further elaborated in the Regulations of the Registry. Regulation 96 provides, inter alia, that 'an application for inclusion in the protection programme may be filed by the prosecutor or by counsel'.[113] In essence, a referral application for acceptance into the ICCPP becomes an inter-organ procedure. The prosecution has no control over the timing of the decision-making process within the Registry.[114] The VWU conducts 'a careful and independent evaluation and assessment of the information provided', which includes an extensive interview of the witness and the family members as well as an analysis of other information available to the VWU.[115] The VWU has claimed that, 'given the difficult situations in the field, the VWU's assessment necessarily takes some time'.[116] The assessment process is lengthy; in 2008 it became evident that it would take an average of at least two to three months.[117] One of the reasons for the long processing time is what Human Rights Watch has qualified as 'inadequate resources'[118] of the VWU. In 2008 the VWU employed 38 permanent staff (including 13 psychosocial personnel).[119]

[112] At the STL, a protection programme is defined for the first time within the system of an international criminal court; see Rule 166 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the SCSL (adopted 16 January 2002, as amended 30 October 2009): 'The Registrar shall establish a protection programme within the Victims and Witnesses Unit for the purpose of protecting individuals through relocation to Third States. The Registrar shall take all necessary measures to arrange relocation to Third States of individuals and their close relations who, following the determination of the Registrar, are at risk of imminent serious harm or death as a result of their interaction with the Tribunal. All procedures and administrative functions in relation to the Protection Programme shall remain confidential.'

[113] Regulation 96 of the Regulations of the Registry. The draft for amended Regulation 96 specifies that the duration of the ICCPP is initially for one year, but can be extended for another year and then exceptionally on a case-by-case basis. It also makes specific references to the termination of the programme. See <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/news%20and%20highlights/Pages/790.aspx> accessed 3 May 2013.

[114] At a status conference in December 2007, the Prosecution was 'not in a position to provide… information on how much time it will take the Victims and Witnesses Unit to assess the referrals and, where applicable, to implement the protective measures'. See Hearing Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-52-ENG, TC I, ICC, 1 October 2007, 28, lines 4–11.

[115] VWU's observations on the protection measures available in relation to the individuals concerned by the Prosecutor's proposal for redaction, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-72-Red, PTC III, ICC, 18 August 2008, para. 25.

[116] Dubuisson et al. (n 7) 574.

[117] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on preventive relocation (n 55) para. 61.

[118] HRW, Courting History (n 61) 150.

[119] Mahony (n 8) 20–1; HRW, Courting History (n 61) 151.

For 2013, 50 staff members were projected, 17 of which hold professional positions (with 33 in general service posts).[120] These staff members are divided over three different sub-units: Operations (in charge of logistics, specifically those related to travel by witnesses for the purpose of testimony before the Court); Protection (in charge of protection matters, including the ICCPP); and Support (dealing with psycho-social support to victims and witnesses).[121] The budget for the VWU has risen from around €1 million in 2004 to about €6 million for the years 2010 to 2013.[122] The stagnation in the last few years is in large part due to the increasing pressure of States Parties for the Court to present a 'zero-nominal growth' budget. Nevertheless, Human Rights Watch has recommended that 'particular attention should be paid to increasing the staff levels within the VWU to address the protection and support needs of victims'.[123]

In its Court filings, the VWU has elaborated on its views of the ICCPP. It considers the ICCPP a 'protective measure of last resort', as 'it significantly impacts and disrupts the life of the individual'.[124] As a key requirement, the VWU 'can only recommend participation in the ICCPP . . . if the threshold in relation to the level of risk has been met'.[125] In the ICC context, the precise content of all criteria relevant for the admission into the witness protection programme remains confidential;[126] the criteria are, as such, redacted from the public versions of the relevant court filings.

However, it appears that the condition of essential or crucial testimony is amongst these criteria,[127] which means that 'crucial testimony cannot be replaced by another because it is unique. The persecutor therefore knows that by 'eliminating' that person, the participant in the proceedings will no longer be able to give evidence about an event'.[128] In addition, 'there must be a clearly documented and serious protection need for the person'.[129] The informed consent of the person is also required.[130] The ICTY, less secretive about the applied criteria for its protection programme, has stated that a

[120] Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/11/10, 16 August 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), Table 83, 122.

[121] Ibid., para. 409.

[122] The development of resources of VWU can be traced through the following documents: ibid.; Proposed Programme Budget for 2012 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/10/10, 21 July 2011 (Tenth Session of the ASP), Table 96, 128; Proposed Programme Budget for 2010 of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/8/10, 30 July 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP), Table 76, 110; Proposed Programme Budget for 2008, ICC-ASP/6/8, 25 July 2007 (Sixth Session of the ASP), Table 78, 105; Proposed Programme Budget for 2007, ICC-ASP/5/9, 22 August 2006 (Fifth Session of the ASP), Table 83, 127.

[123] HRW, Courting History (n 61) 176.

[124] Arbia (n 7) 522.

[125] VWU's observations on the protection measures available in relation to the individuals concerned by the Prosecutor's proposal for redaction, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-72-Red, PTC III, ICC, 18 August 2008, para. 8.

[126] HRW, Courting History (n 61) 170.

[127] Summary Report on the Round Table on the Protection of Victims and Witnesses Appearing before the International Criminal Court (29–30 January 2009) 6.

[128] Ibid., 2.

[129] Ending Threats and Reprisals against Victims of Torture and Related International Crimes: A Call to Action, Redress (2009), 55.

[130] Victims and Witnesses Unit's observations on the protection measures available in relation to the individuals concerned by the Prosecutor's proposal for redaction, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-72-Red, PTC III, ICC, 18 August 2008, para. 26.

real threat and suitability for the programme are the key criteria for admittance into the programme.[131]

Since 2008 both the OTP and the Registry have made a dedicated effort to consult each other as early as possible on the situation of individual witnesses. The OTP has committed itself to share much earlier the scope of its investigations with the VWU. In the case of referral applications, the VWU is therefore less likely to be confronted with the case of an unknown individual in an undefined situational context. However, the VWU does know about the overall security situation of the investigation earlier on and can therefore better assess the individual security situation.

The VWU is confronted with capacity deficits in several ways. Apart from the limited staff resources, the VWU has only a limited number of slots in the ICCPP available, as it relies on support from States Parties and other international organizations. Therefore, the Court and the ASP have repeatedly made appeals to States Parties to enter into agreements with the Court on the relocation of witnesses.[132] In 2009, from the 210 notes-verbales sent to the States Parties requesting cooperation and assistance in reaching relocation agreements, the Court received only 31 responses. Out of those, ten States Parties signed a 'framework agreement', while two others entered an ad hoc agreement on specific cases.[133] In the course of 2009, the VWU had accepted eight witnesses for relocation, but by November, four applications were still pending with States Parties.[134]

Since 2009 the Registrar has also developed a 'Special Fund Model', by which member states can donate to a Special Fund for Relocations to move witnesses to third countries 'through a cost-neutral arrangement'.[135] Donations can be undertaken by way of 'earmarking' them for specific states. This model differentiates between a 'donor state' and a 'host state'. A State Party can thereby, as donor state, donate funds to assist relocating a witness to a host state, without hosting the witness himself/herself, and vice versa.[136] As of now, the Special Fund has collected €1 million from at least five states.[137] However, by November 2011, no State Party from Africa had accepted to relocate witnesses under the terms of the Special Fund.[138]

[131] ICTY Manual on Developed Practices. Developed in Conjunction with UNICRI as Part of the Project to Preserve the Legacy of the ICTY, UNICRI (2009) 202.

[132] Report of the Bureau on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/6/21, 19 October 2007 (Sixth Session of the ASP), para. 47; Report on the Activities of the Court, ICC-ASP/7/25, 29 October 2008 (Seventh Session of the ASP), para. 80.

[133] Report of the Bureau on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/8/44, 15 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP), para. 91.

[134] Ibid., para. 92.

[135] Arbia (n 7) 523; Summary Report on the Seminar on Protection of Victims and Witnesses Appearing before the International Criminal Court (24 November 2010) 6; Report of the Bureau on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/8/44, 15 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP), para. 93.

[136] During the VWU symposium in November 2010, the Special Fund Model was criticized, as it would prevent host states from effectively integrating protected persons into their societies, considering that they would not have to bear any financial burden. See for the comments of the Belgium representative, Summary Report on the Seminar on Protection of Victims and Witnesses Appearing before the International Criminal Court (24 November 2010) 6.

[137] Report on programme performance of the International Criminal Court for the year 2010, ICC-ASP/10/16, 5 July 2011 (Tenth Session of the ASP), para. 97; Report on activities and programme performance of the International Criminal Court for the year 2011, ICC-ASP/11/8, 4 May 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 138.

[138] Report of the Court on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/10/40, 18 November 2011 (Tenth Session of the ASP), para. 42.

The general problems of receiving state support in the area of witness protection were highlighted in the Court's recent Reports on cooperation. In 2011 the Court reported as follows:

> The Court currently faces a critical challenge in terms of witness protection. Faced with an urgent and unforeseen situation at the beginning of 2011, the Court requested States Parties to temporarily accept witnesses on their territory. Out of the nine requests for cooperation sent to that effect, none received a positive reply. The Registry needs to be able to urgently evacuate witnesses to a 'safe haven' country when a life threatening situation for the witness materialises. It is paramount that States carefully consider their respective legal parameters with regard to the protection of witnesses.… Should the Court not be able to find a State willing to accept witnesses on its territory on very short notice, there is a serious and imminent risk of having a witness in grave danger.[139]

The ASP noted this development with concern and encouraged all States Parties 'to consider strengthening their cooperation with the Court by entering into agreements or arrangements with the Court or any other means concerning, inter alia, protective measures for witnesses, their families and others'.[140] In 2013, however, the Court still stressed the 'critical need for witness protection related agreements'. While 13 relocation agreements had been concluded, it was assessed that the overall shortage of agreements could become 'critical for the proper functioning of the Court' and already had 'an impact on the proceedings and on the wellbeing of witnesses'.[141]

As admittance to the ICCPP could be both cost-intensive and intrusive to the witness' life, discussions have been ongoing about alternative protective measures. The Court has reacted to previous criticism 'to adapt the court's protection programs to the diversity of existing protection needs'.[142] Measures that have been suggested and implemented in this context include the use of safe houses, increased police patrolling, closed protection for governmental officials, enhanced surveillance of witnesses' homes, or the investigation of security-related incidents by national authorities.[143] In the CAR, the OTP and the VWU have set up a 'neighbourhood watch', which is a form of local system of civilian guards that is supposed to patrol in areas where a high density of witnesses is located. The OTP and the VWU have also worked on an 'assisted move' scheme. This scheme supports a witness who has not been exposed to an imminent, life-threatening incident to move with his family to a third country and provides him or her with support for a limited period of time, so that he or she

[139] Ibid., paras. 45–6.

[140] Resolution on cooperation adopted at the Eleventh session of the ASP, ICC-ASP/11/Res. 5, 21 November 2011 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), paras 16–17.

[141] Report of the Court on Cooperation, ICC-ASP/12/35, 9 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), paras 27–30; in a similar tone Summary of the Arusha seminar on witness protection (29–30 October 2013), ICC-ASP/12/36/Add. 1, 7 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP).

[142] HRW, Courting History (n 61) 174.

[143] Summary Report on the Round Table on the Protection of Victims and Witnesses Appearing before the International Criminal Court (29–30 January 2009) 3; Summary Report on the Seminar on Protection of Victims and Witnesses Appearing before the International Criminal Court (24 November 2010) 3; Prosecution's Submissions on the Agenda for Status Conference, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-417, TC V, ICC, 28 May 2012, para. 12.

can settle in his new location and eventually become self-sustainable. The assisted move scheme has also been included in the proposed amendments of the Regulations of the Registry.[144]

44.4.4 Rolling disclosure

As a procedural practice generally established, the prosecution has to complete the disclosure of its evidence three months before the beginning of the trial.[145] In the Kenya cases in May 2012, the prosecution proposed a system of 'rolling disclosure', suggesting exceptions from the disclosure deadline of three months, due to security reasons of individual witnesses. In particular, it asked to 1) disclose the identity of witnesses in the ICCPP 60 days prior to the commencement of the trial; 2) disclose the identity of other witnesses with specific security concerns 30 days before the start of the trial; and 3) 'in exceptional circumstances and when justified by security concerns particular to an individual witness', disclose the identity of a witness 30 days prior to the beginning of his/her anticipated testimony.[146]

Rolling disclosure as a practice had already been put in place at other international criminal tribunals, especially at the ICTY and SCSL.[147] At the ICTY, the Milošević Trial Chamber went as far as authorizing delayed disclosure to the Accused of witness identities until ten days before testimony.[148] In the Katanga and Ngudjolo proceedings, Trial Chamber II had granted the delayed disclosure of two trial witnesses.[149]

After hearing the parties,[150] in July 2012, the Trial Chamber agreed with the first two proposals, but stayed away from determining any specific deadline for the third [144] See Call for Comments on Amendments to the Regulations of the Registry, 27 April 2012, Draft Regulation 95 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/news%20and%20highlights/Pages/790.aspx> accessed 3 May 2013.

[145] Decision regarding the Timing and Manner of Disclosure and the Date of Trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, (ICC-01/04-01/06-1019), TC I, ICC, 9 November 2007, para. 21.

[146] Prosecution's Submissions on the Agenda for Status Conference, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-417, TC V, ICC, 28 May 2012, para. 16. See for the relationship between disclosure obligation and witness protection Whiting, Chapter 40, this volume.

[147] Victims' Rights before the International Criminal Court: A Guide for Victims, their Legal Representatives and NGOs, FIDH (2007), Chapter VI.

[148] First decision on Prosecution Motion for Protective Measures for Sensitive Source Witnesses, Milošević, IT-02-54-T, TC, ICTY, 3 May 2002, para. 13.

[149] Public redacted version of the Decision on the Protection of Prosecution Witnesses 267 and 353 of 20 May 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1156-Conf-Exp), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1179-tENG, TC II, ICC, 28 May 2009, 23. The un-redacted interview transcripts of witness 267 were to be disclosed 45 days prior to the commencement of the trial; and the transcripts of witness 353 45 days prior to the testimony of the witness.

[150] The defence teams for Ruto and Sang had no objections to the first two proposals, but suggested for the third category a deadline no later than 45 days prior to testimony. See Hearing Transcript, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-T-15-ENG, TC V, ICC, 11 June 2012, 6, lines 7 to 8, line 21. While the defence for Mr Kenyatta had no objections to rolling disclosure either, the defence for Mr Muthaura called it 'a recipe for disaster', referring to negative experiences with a witness in the ICTY Tadić Trial. See Hearing Transcript, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-T18, TC V, ICC, 12 June 2012, 16, lines 10 to 22, line 5. However, the identity of witness L in the Tadić case who later admitted that he gave false testimony was protected from the public, not the accused. See Y Featherstone, 'Constitutional and Institutional Developments: The International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: Recent Developments in Witness Protection' (1997) 10 Leiden Journal of International Law 179, 195–6.

deadline, adhering to a case-by-case basis assessment.[151] In the same decision, it asked the prosecution to provide a provisional list of witnesses to the VWU six months before the beginning of the trial. The Chamber further stressed that the system of rolling disclosure was not automatic, but only applied following a ruling by the Chamber on a specific application made to that effect.

In November 2012 the OTP started to make applications for the system to individual witnesses; extensive litigation followed. In the Ruto and Sang case, in November and December 2012 the prosecution made three applications for delayed disclosure of a total of 21 witnesses. Redacted interview transcripts were disclosed to the defence in the interim. In the first of those applications, it referred to nine witnesses.[152] Details of the security situation of all witnesses are to a large extent redacted from the public version of the application. However, by the time of addressing the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution had already referred all nine witnesses for a security and protection assessment to the VWU.[153] The prosecution thereby clearly demonstrated that it followed the comprehensive inter-organ approach as had been promoted in previous jurisprudence.

In December 2012 the OTP made two additional applications for delayed disclosure, one covering seven[154] and another five witnesses.[155] The defence deemed these applications as untimely and therefore objected to them.[156] The situation of most witnesses was not discussed in the public domain; the only partial exception is witness P-524, for whom the Trial Chamber initially rejected that his identity would be disclosed not earlier than 45 days prior to his anticipated testimony.[157] The OTP subsequently submitted additional security-related information for this particular witness, and indicated that it had already formally referred the situation of the witness to the VWU.[158] While details of the individual security situation remained [151] Decision on the schedule leading up to trial, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-440, TC V, ICC, 9 July 2012, paras 8, 16, and 19; Decision on the schedule leading up to trial, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-451, TC V, ICC, 9 July 2012, paras 13, 21, and 24.

[152] Public Redacted Version of the 5 November 2012 'Prosecution's application for delayed disclosure of the identities of certain witnesses and authorisation of redactions pursuant to Decision ICC-01/09-01/11-458', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-468-Red, TC V, ICC, 7 November 2012, paras 3–10.

[153] Ibid., paras 15 and 61.

[154] Public redacted version Second application for delayed disclosure of witness identities and application for variation of the 5 November 2012 deadline with respect to Witnesses 15, 16, and 32, Prosecutor v Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-515-Red2, TC V, ICC, 20 December 2012, para. 2. For two witnesses (P-15 and P-16), the OTP applied for disclosure 30 days prior to the beginning of the trial; for five other witnesses (P-0032, P-0144, P-0481, P-0495, and P-0524), the OTP applied for disclosure 45 days prior to their anticipated testimony.

[155] ICC-01/09-01/11-521-Conf-Exp, 27 December 2012 as quoted in Public with Confidential Ex parte Prosecution and VWU Annexes 1 and 2, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-523, TC V, ICC, 2 January 2013, para. 3.

[156] ICC-01/09-01/11-526-Conf, 3 January 2013 as quoted in Decision on prosecution's 'Urgent request for reconsideration pursuant to Trial Chamber V's "Decision on the second and third Prosecution requests for delayed disclosure of witness identities"', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-578-Red, TC V, ICC, 30 January 2013, para. 4.

[157] ICC-01/09-01/ll-564-Conf-Exp, 23 January 2013 as quoted in ibid., para. 5.

[158] ICC-01/09-01/ll-569-Conf-Exp, 24 January 2013 as quoted in ibid., para. 6.

confidential, the Chamber decided that 'the recent developments in P-524's security situation justify the further temporary non-disclosure of his identity in order to give the VWU sufficient time to finalise its security assessment and to put in place any required measures'.[159]

In March 2013 the Trial Chamber determined that the number of witnesses subject to delayed disclosure represented 'a significant proportion' of all trial witnesses and that the situation had been caused by 'delays on the part of the Prosecution' in referring the witnesses to the VWU.[160] Amongst other factors, this specific delay led the judges to order a postponement of the trial date, as had been requested by the defence.[161]

In the Muthaura and Kenyatta case, in November 2012 the prosecution applied for delayed disclosure of six witnesses, while providing redacted interview transcripts in the interim. For one of those (P-118), it asked for disclosure 30 days prior to his testimony.[162] The Prosecution provided details of the individual security situations, arguing, in line with the list of criteria established by the Appeals Chamber, that for insider witnesses an objectively justifiable risk existed because there was a high risk of interference before testimony and a history of targeting certain groups of insiders; that less restrictive protective measures were infeasible or insufficient, as the security concerns mainly originated from the suspects and their supporters; and that the disclosure caused no undue prejudice to the fair trial rights of the accused, as the number of witnesses were limited and the redacted transcripts provided the defence already with most of the substance of the evidence.[163] Witness P-118 is described as having 'unique knowledge regarding the organisation's operations in the PEV and the Accuseds' roles therein'; and his situation therefore characterized as 'truly exceptional' warranting a delayed disclosure beyond the established deadlines.[164]

The defence disagreed, insisting primarily that the fair trial rights of the accused were affected. It stressed that delayed disclosure before trial prevents the defence to adequately carry out its own investigations, especially in relation to the credibility of prosecution witnesses. It objected in particular to delayed disclosure after the beginning of the trial, indicating that this scheme would force the defence to conduct investigations and trial activities at the same time and would hamper the defence's ability to adequately prepare cross-examination of witnesses testifying early on in the trial schedule.

In December 2012 the OTP requested delayed disclosure of seven additional witnesses. All had already been referred to the VWU 'promptly after the interviews', and the prosecution 'is working with the VWU to implement protection solutions in the

[159] Ibid., para. 9.

[160] Decision concerning the start date of trial, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-642, TC V, ICC, 8 March 2013, para. 14.

[161] Ibid., para. 18.

[162] Public Redacted Version of the 5 November 2012 'Prosecution Application for delayed disclosure of witness identities' (ICC-01/09-02/11-519-Conf-Exp), Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-519-Red, TC V, ICC, 7 November 2012, paras 1–3.

[163] Ibid., paras 13 and 19.

[164] Ibid., paras 31–6.

shortest possible time'.[165] It was indicated that some witnesses would be the target of bribery, which would in turn lead to them not testifying in court.[166]

The redacted version of the prosecution filing includes certain indicia why the situation of three of the witnesses was deemed 'exceptional', warranting in the view of the Prosecution disclosure only prior to their anticipated date of testimony. One witness resided, amongst other factors, in an area where the accused enjoyed broad support; another had received direct threats and warnings that he should not testify; and a third one needed to stay in his current location in order to maintain his business to support his family, whereas his 'protection plan' would have required him to leave his business, adversely affecting his ability to support himself as well as his dependents.[167]

The decisions of Trial Chamber V on all the OTP applications are not in the public domain. Some indication is provided in a decision of 8 January 2013, in which the judges authorized the prosecution to temporarily withhold the disclosure of two of the witnesses, as the VWU assessment was pending.[168] Again, an assessment of individual security situations by VWU had become an essential pre-requisite for the Chamber's decision. Nevertheless, it remains difficult to fully assess the graveness of the security situation of these individual witnesses, as most of the details are redacted.

As the prosecution stressed 'the unprecedented security challenges'[169] in Kenya, it has, in the Kenyatta and Muthaura case, sought delayed disclosure for a third (12 out of 35)[170] of its trial witnesses, in its view 'a manageable and reasonable number'.[171] The 2006 Appeals Chamber decision had indicated that it would not limit delayed disclosure of witness identities to a 'very small number' prior to the Confirmation Hearing.[172] At trial stage, however, the number of witnesses falling under the rolling scheme should be more limited, in particular for those witnesses who are to be disclosed only after the commencement of trial. It is therefore questionable if a third of the trial witnesses really is 'manageable' and does not adversely affect the preparation of the defence. In March 2013 the Trial Chamber decided also in the Kenyatta and Muthaura case to postpone the beginning of the trial, citing as one of the reasons the need to provide the defence with more preparation time as a response to delayed disclosure.[173]

[165] Public Redacted Version of the 7 December 2012 'Second Prosecution application for delayed disclosure of witness identities and application for variation of the 5 November 2012 deadline with respect to Witness 334', Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-562-Red, TC V, ICC, 10 December 2012, para. 2.

[166] Ibid., para. 20. [167] Ibid., paras 34–44.

[168] ICC-01/09-02/11-593-Conf-Exp as quoted in Public, with Confidential, ex parte, Prosecution and VWU only Annexes A and B fourth provision of additional information to the Prosecution's second application for delayed disclosure of witness identities (ICC-01/09-02/11-562), Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-616, TC V, ICC, 31 January 2013, para. 2.

[169] Ibid., para. 31.

[170] See also Withdrawal of request for the delayed disclosure of the identity of Witness 7, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-543, TC V, ICC, 28 November 2012.

[171] Public, with Confidential, ex parte, Prosecution and VWU only Annexes A and B fourth provision of additional information to the Prosecution's second application for delayed disclosure of witness identities (ICC-01/09-02/11-562), Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-616, TC V, ICC, 31 January 2013, para. 31.

[172] Lubanga appeals judgment on general principles (n 69) para. 36.

[173] Order concerning the start date of trial, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-677, TC V, ICC, 7 March 2013, para. 10.

In sum, the recent example of the rolling disclosure system in the Kenya cases has demonstrated that the Court has strengthened its ability to develop standard practices in the area of procedural protective measures. The example has further shown that the Court has moved away from primarily fighting over inter-organ responsibilities in the area of witness protection, while at the same time introducing protective practices that are designed to enhance judicial efficiency. The interaction between the prosecution and the VWU in this case can be characterized as smooth, as the Prosecution pro-actively consulted with the VWU; reported on these consultations to the Chamber; no apparent disagreements between the organs were detectable in the public domain; and the Chamber did not need to intervene as an arbiter.

Instead, litigation has concentrated on different views of prosecution and defence in relation to the principles underlying the rolling disclosure system. One might argue that the implementation of procedural protection measures, in comparison to non-judicial protective measures, is less burdensome on the protection capacities of the Court and therefore less controversial. However, procedural protection measures are inevitably interlinked with protective measures of a non-judicial nature. The precise timing of delayed disclosure, for example, is in large part determined by the implementation of physical protection measures, which in turn are based on inter-organ coordination, starting with a shared risk assessment. In general, the focus on disagreements in the case of rolling disclosure between the prosecution and the defence (and not between the prosecution and the Registry) should be viewed as an indicator that the Court has moved away from the internal disagreements of its earlier years and towards a more mature state of its judicial functioning.

44.5 Conclusion

This chapter has undertaken an analysis of the system of protective measures currently at practice at the ICC. It has analysed the existing legal framework and concluded that this framework results in divided, even contradictory internal responsibilities for protective measures (section 44.2). Subsequently, the chapter has followed how this framework has translated itself into the early practice of the ICC by closely examining two case studies that are based on inherent tensions between Article 43(6) and Article 68(1) (section 44.3); and by describing how the Court has undertaken significant steps to overcome some of the difficulties by developing established practices for protective measures in the area of procedural (rolling disclosure) and non-judicial (IRS and ICCPP) protective measures (section 44.4).

This chapter has focused on protective measures prior to in-court testimony. It recommends implementing a model that is based on a comprehensive inter-organ approach, translated into practice as a maximum of cooperation, coordination, and information exchange. The relevant jurisprudence, focusing on the particular protective measure of relocation (see section 44.3), has emphasized this need to evaluate protective measures comprehensively between organs. In this context, relocation is just one option within the wide range of protective measures available to the Court, and can only be assessed in close relation with other protective measures.

In the case study from the Lubanga proceedings (see section 44.3.1.1), the OTP and the Registry were unable to agree on the appropriate risk assessment and therefore also on the appropriate protective measures. The judges concluded that acceptance into the ICCPP was not the appropriate protective measure for most of the witnesses concerned. In the case study from the Katanga and Ngudjolo proceedings (see section 44.3.1.2), the Appeals Chamber decided that responsibility for any form of relocation, beyond the mere inclusion into the ICCPP, remains in the hands of the VWU. The overarching motivation behind the existing jurisprudence is to acknowledge a significant role for the prosecution and to give the VWU certain clearly defined areas of providing protective measures at the same time, thereby translating the statutory compromise into an intensified need for inter-organ cooperation, coordination, and information exchange.

Less controversial was the decision of the Appeals Chamber in the Lubanga proceedings to clearly give the prosecution the initiative to apply for limitations to its disclosure obligation in relation to witnesses' identity (section 44.3.2). While the Pre-Trial Chamber initially ordered a mandatory referral to the VWU, the Appeals Chamber stressed a case-by-case assessment and subsequently developed a set of criteria to conduct such an assessment justifying redactions.

The analysis conducted in this article has focused on interpreting witness protection as an aspect of governance of the Court, i.e. to view protection as part of various attempts within the Court to develop the ICC into a more efficient institution.[174] This article has argued that these efforts should appropriately recognize the model of a comprehensive inter-organ approach for protective measures.[175]

Beyond internal coordination, however, the Court is in need of increased support from States Parties and other external actors, in terms of both enhanced capacity and financial means for protective tools, such as the IRS (44.4.2) and the ICCPP (44.4.3), if one wants to significantly enhance its protection capabilities. The promotion of domestic capacity in the field of protective measures is a possible way of improvement, but it needs to take into account the potential lack of expertise as well as neutrality on the domestic level. In sum, internal coordination and external support are both indispensably needed in order to further enhance the system of witness protection measures at the ICC.

[174] A study group on governance within the Hague Working Group of the ASP Bureau refers to witness protection as an area where discussions on the relationship between Chambers, the OTP, and the VWU would be beneficial in the framework of a lessons learned exercise conducted by the Court and ASP. See Study Group on Governance: First Report of the Court to the ASP, ICC-ASP/11/31/Add.1, 23 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), Annex, para. 7.

[175] The interpretation of witness protection as an issue of governance of the Court is in line with the main argumentation of a previously article published by the author; see Eikel (n 11) 99–100.

45

Victim Participation Revisited—What the ICC is Learning about Itself

*Sergey Vasiliev

45.1 Introduction

The maturity of international criminal justice institutions is not measured in years but by their accomplishments in the implementation of their core judicial mandates and by how formidable and impactful their jurisprudence is. The experience of the ICC's predecessors, the UN ad hoc tribunals, attests that performance of these courts essentially depends on their ability to quickly devise and effectively apply innovative procedural solutions that make the best of their legal framework, whatever its quality, and the resources available to them, however limited. If the achievements of the ICC in organizing an effective and sustainable victim participation system are any benchmark, the Court's 'effective age' can be said to lag behind its 'actual age'. As compared to the progress made by the ICTY and ICTR in the course of their first 12 years, the ICC is still a teenager that is discovering itself and afflicted by an 'identity anxiety'.

Well into its second decade, the ICC has made significant strides in enabling victims to participate in the proceedings. But it is still struggling to find the 'holy grail' scheme for structuring the victim participation process. This can in part be attributed to the generally slow pace of its adjudication. The Court has completed only three cases in the first instance to date,[1] and in two of them the judicial proceedings have run the full cycle (including appeals against decisions pursuant to Articles 74 and 76).[2] A critique of the ICC's performance couched in exclusively quantitative terms with no attention to the unique challenges the Court has been facing during its somewhat prolonged start-up phase would be unfair.[3] This does not mean, of course, that political,

* Postdoctoral researcher, Faculty of Law and Centre for International Criminal Justice, Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam (s.vasiliev@vu.nl). This chapter takes into account the important developments in jurisprudence up to April 2014.

[1] Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012 ('Lubanga trial judgment'); Judgment pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/12-3-tENG, TC II, ICC, 18 December 2012 ('Ngudjolo trial judgment'); Jugement rendu en application de l'article 74 du Statut, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3436, TC II, ICC, 7 March 2014 ('Katanga trial judgment').

[2] On 25 June 2014 the parties discontinued their appeals against the Katanga trial judgment (n 1), as a result of which it became the first ICC's final judgment pursuant to Art. 74.

[3] See Speech by Ms Silvana Arbia, the ICC Registrar, during the conference 'Justice for All? The International Criminal Court—10 years review of the ICC', University of New South Wales (UNSW), Sydney, Australia (14 February 2012), 2 (responding to the critique that 'the Court is operating less operational, or logistical hurdles are unique to the ICC and automatically justify inefficiency. Regardless, the fact is that the judicial record of the ICC's first 12 years leaves us with the experiential data that are provisional at best. This should be taken into consideration when evaluating the approaches the ICC has developed in operationalizing its legal framework on victim participation.[4] By the same token, it may be too early to attempt a definitive assessment of the Court's legal and administrative practices, let alone draw far-reaching conclusions as to whether the ICC's experiment with victim participation has been a success or failure on the grandiose scale.

Nevertheless, it is not only opportune but also necessary at this juncture to draw lessons from the last decade of the ICC's experience with regard to victim participation. Based on what has been learnt by now about the ICC's strengths and limitations in this regard, it is urgent to consider the need for and best avenues of corrective action in order to help the teenager court make its 'life choices' in the near future. This may consist in giving clearer directions for reforms that the Court should be pursuing or, instead, in agreeing to give it more time and space for growing up and for ploughing its way. Given the growing sense of urgency, the importance for the ICC to make cogent strategic choices, and to do so at some point soon, leaves no doubt.

The Court organs and principals as well as the representatives of States Parties have repeatedly recognized victims' rights as 'the cornerstone of the Statute' and victims as the main beneficiaries of the ICC's existence.[5] It comes as no surprise that NGOs and victim rights groups in particular have considered victims and their procedural participation and representation as the banner of the ICC's innovative 'reparative' mandate.[6] This rhetoric views victims and affected communities as a principal source of the ICC's legitimacy and its raison d'être, with their level of 'customer satisfaction' efficiently than the special tribunals' by pointing out that it 'operates within a unique international setting' and 'implements its judicial mandate in a political environment, with ongoing conflicts, which are very fresh in the people's minds and are all linked to national or regional political issues').

[4] In a similar vein, see Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities and the Trust Fund for Victims, including Reparations and Intermediaries, ICC-ASP/12/38, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 4.

[5] Victims and Affected Communities, Reparations and Trust Fund for Victims, Preamble, Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.5, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP) ('Determined to ensure the effective implementation of victims' rights, which constitute a cornerstone of the Rome Statute system'); Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/12/38 (n 4) para. 5. See also Speech by the ICC Registrar, Ms Silvana Arbia (n 3) 2; Policy Paper on Victims' Participation under Art 68 (3) of the ICC Statute, ICC-OTP, 1 April 2010 ('OTP Policy Paper on Victim Participation'), 5 ('an essential feature of the Rome system and an important contribution to international justice'); Stocktaking of international criminal justice: The impact of the Rome Statute system on victims and affected communities. Final report by the focal points (Chile and Finland) ('Report: Stocktaking of International Criminal Justice'), annex V(a), RC/11 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/RC2010/RC-11-Annex.V.a-ENG.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014, para. 32 ('victims are the main beneficiaries of justice').

[6] E.g. Recommendations to the 12th Session of the ASP, 20–8 November 2013, The Hague, Victims' Rights Working Group <http://www.vrwg.org/downloads/20131113vrwgasp12final.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014 ('VRWG recommendations to ASP-12') 4 (calling upon States Parties and the Court 'to recognise the benefits that victims' participation in the proceedings bring for victims themselves, but also for the legitimacy of the Court, the fulfilment of the ultimate object and purpose of the Rome Statute and its centrality to international justice as a whole.'); Making Victim Participation Effective and Meaningful, Victims' Rights Working Group, June 2014 <http://www.vrwg.org/downloads/englishvrwgpapermakingvictimparticipationeffectiveandmeaningful-june2014-(2).pdf> accessed 24 June 2014, 1 ('The participation of victims in proceedings is a unique feature of the ICC and an essential part of its reparative mandate').

with the Court serving as the litmus of its effectiveness.[7] Over and above other widely used yardsticks—fair trials, enforceability of decisions (most importantly, arrest warrants), even-handedness and geographic distribution of investigations and prosecutions, and relationships with certain blocs of states—the ICC's engagement with victims and affected communities serves as a principal metric of its relevance and validity. The degree of contentment on the part of victims—however calculated—has come to be the basis on which value judgments are passed on the Court and its benchmark of success in achieving the socio-political goals in the conflict and post-conflict settings.[8]

The benefits promised by the ICC to victims of international crimes, especially as a result of the more expansive interpretations of the provisions of its Statute,[9] are unprecedented. They encompass a panoply of rights or opportunities, including participation, representation, protection, general assistance, and reparations. Having set the bar so high, the stakes vested in victim participation are enormous for the Rome Statute system as a whole. Whilst the institutional credibility of the ICC is certainly one of them, what seems to be at stake ultimately is the very idea of international justice.[10] The risks of leaving promises unfulfilled and frustrating the hopes created with the victims are enormous.[11] With their expectations already being sky-high, what the Court actually offers and is capable of delivering can too easily be misunderstood. The effective expectation-management and correction of any misperceptions left by gaps in outreach are a priority task.[12] The Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities

[7] On the problematic premises and effects of the victim representation rhetoric and the invocation of 'victims' as a telos of the ICC's work, see S Kendall and S Nouwen, 'Representational Practices at the International Criminal Court: The Gap between Juridified and Abstract Victimhood' (2013) 76 Law and Contemporary Problems 235.

[8] E.g. D Tolbert, 'Taking Stock of the Impact of the Rome Statute and the International Criminal Court on Victims and Affected Communities', Stocktaking of International Criminal Justice: The Impact of the Rome Statute System on Victims and Affected Communities, Review Conference of the Rome Statute of the ICC, 2 June 2010, Kampala, Uganda <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/RC2010/Stocktaking/DavidTolbert-ReviewConferencePaper-on-victims.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014, 1 ('Ultimately, the success of the Court will hinge on whether it is perceived as an effective option in terms of delivering justice for the victims of the world's worst crimes.').

[9] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[10] REDRESS, 'The Participation of Victims in International Criminal Court Proceedings: A Review of the Practice and Consideration of Options for the Future', October 2012 <http://www.redress.org/downloads/publications/121030participation_report.pdf> accessed on 17 March 2014, 9 ('This daunting challenge is the grand beacon of international justice, and not the thread which will unravel it and cause its ultimate demise.').

[11] E Stover, The Witnesses: War Crimes and the Promise of Justice in The Hague (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press 2007) 150 ('if the ICC is not thoughtful, prudent, and practical about how it manages these expectations, it could end up digging its own grave with the spade of good intentions.'); E Haslam, 'Victim Participation at the International Criminal Court: A Triumph of Hope Over Experience?' in D McGoldrick et al. (eds), The Permanent International Criminal Court—Legal and Policy Issues (Oxford: Hart Publishing 2004) 319; H Friman, 'Participation of Victims in the ICC Criminal Proceedings and the Early Jurisprudence of the Court' in G Sluiter and S Vasiliev (eds), International Criminal Procedure: Towards a Coherent Body of Law (London: Cameron May 2009) 204; C Van den Wyngaert, 'Victims before International Criminal Courts: Some Views and Concerns of an ICC Trial Judge' (2011) 44 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 475, 494–5.

[12] Report: Stocktaking of International Criminal Justice (n 5) 80. On expectations towards the ICC in the affected communities, see Public Redacted Version of Report Concerning Victims' Representations (ICC-01/09-6-Conf-Exp) and annexes 2 to 10, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-6-Red, of the ASP has acknowledged the urgency of this concern in connection with limited resources and negative financial prospects:

> there is a need to close the gap between expectations, rights and resources. In other words, whilst stakeholders should bear in mind that victims' rights are a cornerstone of the Statute and, therefore, the debate on victims cannot be reduced to a cost-driver, they should be aware that the world is still facing a financial crisis that has consequences in terms of the allocation of resources. As a result, finding that balance is a matter of priority.[13]

In the wake of the initial avalanche of literature on the importance of victims' rights and interpreting the open-ended ICC legal framework on its own terms, a significant body of critical scholarship has emerged assessing the Court's first practice in implementing the victim participation scheme.[14] Building upon the second-wave debates, this chapter takes a panoramic view on the ICC's victim participation system and evaluates the progress made by the Court organs and States Parties in enhancing its sustainability and effectiveness.[15] A significant part of the problem lies in the persisting ambiguities about the fundamental purpose and rationales of the participation by victims in the ICC proceedings. This is a corollary of the well-intentioned but misconceived rhetoric promising 'restorative justice' through victim participation and advocating that the Court should provide victims with procedural opportunities for participation that comport with this ideology. However, there is a profound conceptual and practical disconnect between the processes of victim-friendly yet essentially retributive criminal justice that the Court is mandated and able to deliver and the ideal of restorative justice, which remains unattainable in its context.

This chapter posits that this disconnect cannot effectively be bridged and, in order to address it, the Court must be prepared to free itself from the 'restorative' complex because this rhetoric has no place in the fashioning of the victim participation system. The restorative ambition may attach and must be limited to reparations

PTC II, ICC, 29 March 2010, paras 16–20; Turning the Lens: Victims and Affected Communities on the Court and the Rome Statute System, RC/ST/V/INF.2, 30 May 2010, Review Conference of the Rome Statute, Kampala, 31 May–11 June 2010 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/RC2010/Stocktaking/RC-ST-V-INF.2-ENG.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014; Tolbert (n 8) 1 and 6–7.

[13] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/12/38 (n 4) para. 5.

[14] E.g. H Friman, 'The International Criminal Court and Participation of Victims: A Third Party to the Proceedings?' (2009) 22 Leiden Journal of International Law 485; S Zappalà, 'The Rights of Victims v the Rights of the Accused' (2010) 8 Journal of International Criminal Justice 137; E Haslam and R Edmunds, 'Common Legal Representation at the International Criminal Court: More Symbolic than Real?' (2012) 12 International Criminal Law Review 871; F Eckelmans, 'The ICC's Practice on Victim Participation' in T Bonacker and C Safferling (eds), Victims of International Crimes: An Interdisciplinary Discourse (The Hague: TMC Asser Press 2013) 189–221; M Pena, 'Victim Participation at the International Criminal Court: Achievements Made and Challenges Lying Ahead' (2010) 16 ILSA Journal of International and Comparative Law 987; M Pena and G Carayon, 'Is the ICC Making the Most of Victim Participation?' (2013) 7 International Journal of Transitional Justice 518.

[15] Protection of and general assistance to victims participating in the proceedings are not covered. The issues of victim reparations (Arts 75, 79, and 82(4) ICC Statute) are also excluded; see e.g. McCarthy, Chapter 46, this volume.

ordered by the Court and/or administered by the Trust Fund for Victims.[16] But further optimization and harmonization of standards and practices regarding the application process, representation, and participation of victims in the ICC proceedings across Chambers should proceed on the lowest common denominator of procedural pragmatism. Individual and direct participation by victims should be tied, to the extent possible, to the accepted rationales of criminal process and the expected contribution by the participating victims to the goals of effective and efficient operation of the ICC as a criminal court. Reflecting on the way forward, the current trends towards predominantly collective forms of application, representation, and participation will continue and should be embraced. The shift to procedural pragmatism could erroneously be seen as emasculating the 'Victim's Court' project of its idealism. But a more sober and moderate approach is ultimately more conducive to increasing the degree of victims' satisfaction, preventing 'secondary victimization' at the hands of the ICC, and bolstering its credibility and viability in the long run.

The chapter starts by unpacking the root causes of the difficulties the ICC is facing in developing a uniform and stable system of victim participation (section 45.2). The next section provides a tour d'horizon of key turns in the jurisprudence and administrative practices relating to participation of victims under the regime of Article 68(3) as complemented by Rules 89–92. Without attempting a comprehensive overview, section 45.3 addresses the hurdles faced by the Court and evaluates the solutions developed by the Chambers and the Registry in operationalizing the Article 68(3) participatory regime, with a focus on the application process, participatory modalities, and representation. The chapter then illustrates that over time, victim participation emerged as a top-priority governance matter within the ICC system. It is currently a source of preoccupation for States Parties who have viewed the Court's struggles with increasing concern. In reflecting on the optimal future strategies, section 45.4 turns to the process of consultations between the Court and the ASP that took place in the past few years and traces the evolution of the ASP's thinking on, and approach to, this matter based on its yearly resolutions. Juxtaposed against the Court's continuous efforts to develop workable ad hoc solutions and a court-wide strategy, the ASP's recent policy push for simplified and harmonized procedures may be questioned. The diversity of situations before the Court and the distinct challenges each of them poses render the asserted goal of formulating a comprehensive one-size-fits-all approach unrealistic. The nature of the difficulties facing the Court makes its practices only susceptible to well-calculated, gradual, and 'soft' harmonization. Premature consolidation would not solve the problems with victim participation. The optimal approach must allow a reasonable variation across different situations and cases, and reserve a necessary degree of 'manual control' to the Court. The scaling down of the grand restorative ambitions in developing the participatory scheme is the most affordable of the sacrifices for the Court; this is a key lesson that the ICC must have learnt after the protracted journey of rediscovering itself as a primarily retributive justice institution.

[16] Arts 75, 79, and 82(4) ICC Statute.

45.2 Challenges of Victim Participation at the ICC: A Bird's-Eye View

The idea of allowing victims to participate in the proceedings in their own capacity (as opposed to the traditional role of witnesses) was one of the most controversial issues about the ICC procedure from the outset. It was debated during the Rome Conference and subsequently in the Preparatory Commission when developing the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (RPE)[17] governing the specifics of victim participation.[18] The provision of victims' participatory rights was hailed by many as the most significant innovation of the ICC law and the greatest victory for victims of international crimes in the international legal domain; nevertheless, sceptical voices were heard from early on.[19] Those critiques concerned, among other things, the uncertain procedural rationales of victim participation, its unfeasibility in the ICC context, and its potentially detrimental effects on the Court's ability to deliver a fair trial.

More than one decade into the ICC's operations, vigorous debates on victim participation continue both within and outside of the Court. The court-wide strategy in relation to victims (2009) and its revised version (2012) reflect the internal consensus on general issues that the ICC has been able to produce.[20] However, with regard to detail, a uniform vision shared by key organs and figures of the Court is yet to emerge.[21] Victim participation is a divisive issue that has led to no less than ideological controversies and a split within the Court:

> Those who were in favour of the system and those within the Registry with the task of trying to make it work have been slowly pushed into a corner. With ever [17] Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1, 3–10 September 2002 (First Session of the ASP), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE').

[18] For an account of negotiations on the relevant Rules, see G Bitti and H Friman, 'Participation of Victims in the Proceedings' in R Lee et al. (eds), The International Criminal Court—Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Ardsley: Transnational 2001) 456–74.

[19] For moderately positive accounts, see Haslam (n 11); C Jorda and J de Hemptinne, 'The Status and Role of the Victim' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: A Commentary (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 1388–9 and 1416. For a critical view, see A Zahar and G Sluiter, International Criminal Law: A Critical Introduction (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 75–6 ('a potentially harmful experiment' in 'still a highly fragile system that should stay clear of experiments until the system has been put in order').

[20] Report of the Court on the Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/8/45, 10 November 2009 (Eighth Session of the ASP) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP8/ICC-ASP-8-45-ENG.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014; Court's Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/11/38, 5 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP11/ICC-ASP-11-38-ENG.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014.

[21] A Ušacka, 'Promises Fulfilled? Some Reflections on the International Criminal Court in its First Decade' (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 473, 484; J Wemmers, 'Victims' Rights and the International Criminal Court: Perceptions within the Court Regarding the Victims' Right to Participate' (2010) 23 Leiden Journal of International Law 629, 638 (providing empirical data on the different perceptions of the ICC employees). See e.g. OTP Policy Paper on Victim Participation (n 5) 15 (contrary to the established jurisprudence stating that 'other than for reparation purposes, it should be the rare exception where victims are allowed to present evidence to prove the innocence or guilt of the accused' and that 'when victims are in the possession of meaningful evidence necessary to establish the truth there are numerous opportunities to contact the Prosecution directly').

> shrinking budgets, ever expanding tasks dictated by the different and often inconsistent Chamber rulings and little remit of their own to re-structure the work more efficiently, Registry officials are put in a position where they are destined to fail, which simply fuels the sceptics and contributes to the calls to further shrink the budget.[22]

Outside the Court, the commentators and court observers' attention towards the topic of victim participation has steadily been on the rise. The proponents and milder critics hoped that the ICC would be able to develop a fair and workable regime sooner, but the task turned out to be more complex than expected. The assessments of the Court's progress in ensuring sustainable practice have varied substantially, including among the ICC judges.[23] Several years down the line, alarmed accounts outweigh by far the more positive and hopeful ones.[24]

The optimal policy the ICC was expected to devise in accommodating victims as actors in the proceedings must allow reconciling several competing objectives. The Court's revised strategy formulates this as the task to '[e]nsure that victims are able to fully exercise their right to effectively participate in the ICC proceedings with effective legal representation in a manner that is consistent with their rights and personal interests as well as with the rights of the accused to a fair, expeditious and impartial trial'.[25] Thus, on the one hand, the victims must be able to realize participatory rights fully and meaningfully in accordance with the legal framework. Under the Article 68(3) regime, whereby victims' 'views and concerns' may be allowed by the Court to be presented and considered at appropriate stages of proceedings if their 'personal interests' are affected,[26] participation may not be prejudicial to, or inconsistent with, the rights of the accused and a fair and impartial trial. On the other hand, victim participation must also be efficient. This is not only about judicial economy but also the prudent allocation of resources in light of the goals of grafting victim participation onto the procedural system (which, as noted, are far from clear). Such participation should neither lead to the overburdening and collapse of the system, nor result in the impossibility for the victims to enjoy the rights and procedural opportunities provided to them under the Statute. For example, victims may suffer prejudice as a result of a failure by [22] REDRESS (n 10) 7. See also Independent Panel of experts report on victim participation at the ICC, July 2013 <http://www.iccnow.org/documents/Independent_Panel_of_Experts_Report_on_Victim_Participation_at_the_ICC.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014, para. 5 ('The system is significantly affected by divergent visions of the participation system within the ICC… [D]ifferent efforts aimed at addressing the current challenges are disjointed and risk further undermining the system of participation').

[23] A Fulford, 'The Reflections of a Trial Judge' (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 215, 222 (being 'cautiously optimistic', from the Lubanga experience, that victim participation can be accommodated without adding greatly to the length of the proceedings). Cf. Van den Wyngaert (n 11) 493 ('During the trials, victims take up an important proportion of the time… [T]ime spent during the hearings is considerable because questions by the victims will often trigger new questions by the Defence. In addition, the "victims' case" is taking a lot of time.… Whatever the actual average number of hours, it is clearly significant').

[24] E.g. W Schabas, 'The International Criminal Court at Ten' (2011) 22 Criminal Law Forum 493, 500; C Chung, 'Victims' Participation at the International Criminal Court: Are Concessions of the Court Clouding the Promise?' (2008) 6 Northwestern Journal of International Human Rights 459, 461.

[25] Court's Revised strategy in relation to victims, ICC-ASP/11/38 (n 20) para. 20.

[26] See further S Vasiliev, 'Article 68(3) of the ICC Statute and Personal Interests of Victims in the Emerging Practice of the ICC' in C Stahn and G Sluiter (eds), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court (Leiden/Boston: Brill 2009) 638–58.

the Court to process, in a timely fashion, their applications for participation or procedural requests submitted by legal representatives and to ensure meaningful participation. 'Meaningful participation' is a formula dominating the discourse on victim participation at the ICC, but its procedural content has remained undetermined so long as there is no consensus on what 'meaning' it refers to. Arguably, such participation should be more than a pointless—and unaffordable—symbolism. It must benefit victims by enabling them to promote, individually or collectively, their legally recognized interests in the manner consistent with the Statute while contributing tangibly to the discharge of the core functions of the Court's criminal process.

The experience of the past decade demonstrates that striking the balance between these objectives in practice is easier said than done; the ICC's performance has raised the spectre of failing them all, depending on the angle of critique. First, despite the clear prioritization of rights of the accused in Article 68(3), the victim participation practice has been deemed to put a strain on fair trial principles. The victims' presence in the wings of adjudication has raised suspicion of undermining the judges' ability to focus on the delivery of a fair and expeditious trial for defendants.[27] That said, in the trials completed thus far, victim participation did not take the largest share of blame for endangering due process. Recalcitrance or negligence on the part of the prosecution was seen as the main threat to fair trial and a source of prejudice to be kept in check by the Chambers.[28] However, concerns about the impact of victim participation on fair trial rights have never been fully extinguished and the 'conflict rhetoric' endures.[29]

Second, questions are still being raised about the ability of the Court to deliver on the promise of 'meaningful' participation. According to some accounts, the victims' involvement in the proceedings is more symbolic than effectual, as a result of resource-saving pressure and practical impossibility to ensure genuine and individualized representation of thousands of victims.[30] The system of common legal representation of victims appears not only justifiable but also indispensable given the nature of the ICC cases. But it has also been seen as legitimizing surrogate participation and allowing the 'managerial impetus' to displace the principled—value-based and goal-inspired—considerations. Critics have pointed to the tendency of the Court's discourse to put an excessive emphasis on efficiency concerns, which has led to the 'progressive marginalization of the system', whereas the question should have rather been how the goals of victim participation can be realized given the massive nature

[27] E.g. Zahar and Sluiter (n 19) 76; M Jouet, 'Reconciling the Conflicting Rights of Victims and Defendants at the International Criminal Court' (2007) 26 Saint Louis University Public Law Review 249, 250, and 271–4.

[28] Lubanga trial judgment (n 1) paras 120–3; Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Art 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution for the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1401, TC I, ICC, 13 June 2008, paras 75–7 and 90–5; Redacted Decision on the Prosecution's Urgent Request for Variation of the Time-Limit to Disclose the Identity of Intermediary 143 or Alternatively to Stay Proceedings Pending Further Consultations with the VWU, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2517-Red, TC I, ICC, 8 July 2010, para. 31.

[29] E.g. Zappalà (n 14) 143; Van den Wyngaert (n 11) 488 (on 'the paradox' between the rights of the accused and interests of victims).

[30] Haslam and Edmunds (n 14) 872; Van den Wyngaert (n 11) 489 and 495.

of victimization.[31] The criticism, however, falls short of specifying what evident ways to realize those goals, other than through what it refers to as 'marginalization', are realistically available.[32] The need to ensure sustainability sets fetters on the extent to which the quantitative growth of the current scheme can be afforded, if it is to be retained, and informs the tenor and scope of possible reforms. Despite the thin consensus that the rights provided to victims under the ICC law should not be alienated or constrained by budgetary considerations, the lack of agreement on the appropriate contours of participation is the crux of the matter and the reason the controversies persist.[33] It is also conceivable that the Court's experimentation and efforts in fashioning the system are more than mere cost-saving measures motivated by budgetary constraints. They can actually reflect a substantive shift in the understanding of the rationales of victim participation and be a sign of the agreement on its purposes emerging.[34]

Third, perhaps the hardest battle for the Court in running the victim participation scheme relates to its effectiveness. The system as it has existed until now has consumed inordinate amounts of time and financial resources.[35] The Sisyphean efforts the Chambers, Registry, and the parties invested in devising, workable solutions through consultations and experimentation appear to have been a helter-skelter crisis management rather than a routine and sustainable operation. Yet, as principals of the Court have acknowledged, this dedicated work did not help against recurrent delays in processing victim applications and making judicial decisions thereupon, due to insufficient resources.[36] It was not uncommon for the applicants to have to wait for two years before their status could be determined and to therefore miss procedural opportunities to exercise their rights.[37] The magnitude of resources consumed by the system—paid out as court personnel salaries, counsel fees, costs of maintaining the infrastructure, etc.—has led to questions whether such allocation of funds was justifiable or made any sense in light of the supposed goal of promoting social restoration.[38] The enterprise absorbed a considerable budget that could instead be utilized for reparations or the Trust Fund's general assistance projects.

As can be gleaned from this bird's-eye view, the challenges faced by the ICC in administering and fine-tuning its victim participation scheme have been inordinate. The following section discusses the specific solutions devised by the Court in addressing them. Before proceeding further, it is necessary to pause upon principal factors encumbering its efforts. In the ICC context, the difficulty of striking a balance

[31] REDRESS (n 10) 8.

[32] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities and the Trust Fund for Victims and Reparations, ICC-ASP/11/32, 23 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 19 ('with current resources, it was not possible to grant all victims the right to participate. The Court's conclusion was that consideration should be given to the possibility of revising the application system, or the resources for victims' participation be increased. As regards the budgetary aspect, the need to establish a system that worked within existing resources was stressed', emphases added).

[33] Tolbert (n 8) 2. [34] Cf. Haslam and Edmunds (n 14) 872.

[35] Eckelmans (n 14) 190; Chung (n 24) 461. See also Van den Wyngaert (n 11) 492–3 (the 2012 ICC budget earmarked €7,000,000 for victim-related tasks, excluding resources consumed by the parties; no less than one-third of the TC's legal support staff was fully dedicated to working on victim applications in the first months of the Katanga trial proceedings).

[36] Speech by Ms Silvana Arbia (n 3) 4. [37] Chung (n 24) 460; Pena (n 14) 512.

[38] E.g. Schabas (n 24) 500–1; Van den Wyngaert (n 11) 495.

between meaningful and workable participation lay in several circumstances. The first and obvious reason is the nature and dimension of cases coming before the Court. Most of them involve mass victimization, and, depending on the types and scale of violence, ongoing security risks, political context, and the quality of the Court's outreach, are apt to result in thousands of applicants wishing to be granted a victim status and participate at various stages of the proceedings.[39]

In early 2012 the Registrar reported that the total number of persons who had applied for participation in the proceedings as victims exceeded 11,000, of which 4,350 applications for participation had been granted.[40] These numbers attest to the growing effectiveness of the outreach programmes through which the Court accesses the affected communities and the increasing interest to the ICC on the part of victims. It has been suggested that this is 'important for the broader success of the Court as a credible, effective and relevant justice institution'.[41] But paradoxically, those numbers also expose the risk for the Court to fall victim to its own success.[42] As will be discussed, the applications need to be received by the Registry's VPRS, checked for completeness, redacted, circulated to the parties for observations, and decided upon.[43] This protocol has proven highly time-consuming to implement.

With respect to the statistics of victim participation in the ICC cases, the number of victims admitted in the first two trials in the Situation in the DRC did not exceed several hundred (129 persons in Lubanga and 366 persons in Katanga and Ngudjolo).[44] Further, 103 victims were admitted to participate in the Banda case (pre-trial) proceedings in the Situation in Darfur.[45] In the Situation in Kenya, 628 persons were admitted to participate as victims in the Ruto and Sang trial and 725 in the Kenyatta post-confirmation proceedings.[46] In the Laurent Gbagbo case (Situation in Côte d'Ivoire), the [39] REDRESS (n 10) 8 n 22 ('Mass victimization is not a "problem" or "constraint" that can justify the failure of the system: it is the basis upon which the system must be developed.'); Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/11/32 (n 32) para. 20 ('Rome Statute crimes tended to have mass victims and therefore there was a need to look at the totality of the victims. It was suggested that the collective approach should be the basic approach, given the mass nature of the crimes under the Court's jurisdiction, but this should not exclude the possibility of allowing for individual applications or participation when circumstances so warrant it').

[40] Speech by Ms Silvana Arbia (n 3) 3. [41] REDRESS (n 10) 10.

[42] Report of the Court on the Review of the System for Victims to Apply to Participate in Proceedings, ICC-ASP/11/22, 5 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP) ('ICC Report on the Review of Application System'), para. 6 ('While these numbers are testimony to the interest of victims in the ICC, such numbers have, however, also put a strain on the Court').

[43] See section 45.3.1. Application process.

[44] In the Lubanga trial, the TC ultimately withdrew the status of six victims: Lubanga trial judgment (n 1) paras 15, 484, and 1362. In Katanga and Ngudjolo, the victim status of two victims was withdrawn after the legal representative doubted the truthfulness of their statements to the Court: Ngudjolo trial judgment (n 1) para. 32; Katanga trial judgment (n 1) para. 36; Decision on the Maintenance of Participating Victim Status of Victims a/0381/09 and a/0363/09 and Mr Nsita Luvengika's Request for Leave to Terminate his Mandate as Said Victims' Legal Representative, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3064-tENG, TC II, ICC, 7 July 2011, para. 48.

[45] Case information sheet, Information on the case The Prosecutor v Abdallah Banda Abakaer Nourain <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/PIDS/publications/BandaEng.pdf> accessed 3 March 2015.

[46] Case information sheet, Information on the case The Prosecutor v William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/PIDS/publications/RutoKosgeySangEng.pdf> accessed 3 March 2015, 3; Case information sheet, Information on the case The Prosecutor v Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/PIDS/publications/KenyattaEng.pdf> accessed 3 March 2015, 3.

Pre-Trial Chamber granted 199 victims the right to participate in the pre-trial process.[47] However, in the Bemba trial, the number of admitted victims is of a different order of magnitude and amounts to no fewer than 5,229 victims.[48] According to the Court's 2012 report,

> [t]he rate at which the Court received applications has increased by 300 per cent, from 187 applications received on average per month in 2010, to 564 in 2011. As at the end of April 2012, 19,422 applications for participation and for reparations have been submitted, and 4,107 victims have been accepted to participate in proceedings before the Court. In the future, while the number of victims who decide to apply to the Court may fluctuate, it can be predicted that they will continue to involve the same high numbers as currently received.[49]

Hence it cannot be excluded that the numbers of victims applying and admitted for participation will continue to rise, for a number of reasons. First, with the improved outreach, the information about the Court will reach more potential applicants. Second, the growth in the number of eligible victims can be expected as the 'natural consequence of the proliferation of proceedings', at least until the Court reaches the balance between new and concluded proceedings.[50]

The active use by victims of procedural avenues, even in an organized manner and through common legal representatives, by definition contributes to lengthier proceedings. In addition to optimizing the system for processing the applications for participation, the Court must find a way of accommodating the significant numbers of admitted victims in the proceedings in order to guarantee them effective participation and representation. Without tailored solutions and vigilant control by the judges over the implementation of the scheme, the exercise of rights by victims that is formally in keeping with the legal framework does not in itself ensure effectiveness and sustainability of the system.

Second, the complications that the Chambers have faced in arriving at a workable system of victim participation in the initial stages are attributable to the limitations of the ICC's legal framework itself. Despite being a comprehensive codification previously unseen in international criminal law, the ICC Statute, Rules, and Regulations of the Court[51] do not provide 'thick' regulation because it was impossible for the drafters to anticipate all issues and secure consensus on every important detail. When drafting the procedural provisions, state delegations had recourse to the legal drafting technique that could accommodate uneasy diplomatic compromises and masked their inability to agree on more specific provisions.[52] On key

[47] Case information sheet, Information on the case The Prosecutor v Laurent Gbagbo <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/PIDS/publications/GbagboEng.pdf> accessed 3 March 2015, 3.

[48] Case information sheet, Information on the case The Prosecutor v Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/PIDS/publications/BembaEng.pdf > accessed 3 March 2015, 3.

[49] ICC Report on the Review of Application System (n 42) para. 5.

[50] Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims: Past, Present and Future, ICC-ASP/11/40, 5 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 75.

[51] Regulations of the Court, ICC-BD/01-01-04, 26 May 2004 (adopted by the judges of the Court during the Fifth Plenary Sessions).

[52] C Kress, 'The Procedural Law of the International Criminal Court in Outline: Anatomy of a Unique Compromise' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 603, 604–6.

issues, including the parameters of victim participation, the approaches existing in domestic systems could not be reconciled other than through the adoption of 'constructively ambiguous'—and, dropping the euphemistic language, 'frustratingly vague'—formulas.[53]

The Rome Conference created a unique law-making momentum. State delegations wished to seize this opportunity to rectify what they saw as a gaping omission in the ad hoc tribunals' procedure—the problem of procedurally disempowered victims, which was to be solved by ensuring that the ICC's procedural justice is more 'victim-friendly'.[54] This conception was reinforced by the advocacy of victim rights groups and human rights NGOs, which exerted a strong influence on state delegations through the provision of legal advice and drafting assistance, public campaigning, and direct pressure.[55] The combined effect of these factors catered for a powerful 'victim lobby' in Rome and led to the promulgation of an innovative and progressive set of victims' rights as part of the compromises embodied in the Statute. The bold and experimental sui generis regime of victim participation was unparalleled in ambition and vocabulary, and had a proven track record neither in national jurisdictions nor in the previous international criminal tribunals. Although the ICC framework and domestic regimes have sometimes been compared in terms of 'higher' and 'lower' standards of victim participation,[56] such comparison is not particularly helpful, at least as far as the Article 68(3) regime is concerned. This is due to the vague character of the Statute and the novelty of the participation model, which is different from any domestic approach.[57] When devising the ICC model, states were not restrained by the same degree of caution and conservatism that would have inhibited such far-reaching experimentation with criminal justice had it been attempted in their own domestic systems.

Therefore, the ICC legal framework for victim participation is essentially a result of diplomatic compromises and NGO advocacy. Although ably facilitated by input from legal experts, this legislative process was barely an optimal means to ensure the required degree of legal certainty and coherence that would make that framework ready for use on the day when the Court opened its doors. The ICC Statute and subordinate Rules are both ambitious in accommodating the involvement by victims in the proceedings and inconclusive when it comes to the indispensable detail. First and foremost this applies to Article 68(3), a key provision governing victim participation at the various stages of the proceedings. The language of that article was copied almost [53] C Trumbull IV, 'The Victims of Victim Participation in International Criminal Proceedings' (2008) 29 Michigan Journal of International Law 777, 793.

[54] Jorda and de Hemptinne (n 19) 1387–9; D Donat-Cattin, 'Article 68' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: CH Beck 2008) 1277.

[55] D Donat-Cattin, 'The Role of Victims in ICC Proceedings' in F Lattanzi and W Schabas (eds), Essays on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court vol. I (Rome: Editrice Il Sirente 2000) 268.

[56] Donat-Cattin (n 54) 1278.

[57] For a comparative analysis, see Vasiliev (n 26) 679–87. See also Separate opinion of Judge Georghios M Pikis, Decision of the Appeals Chamber on the Joint Application of Victims a/0001/06 to a/0003/06 and a/105/06 concerning the 'Directions and Decision of the Appeals Chamber' of 2 February 2007, ICC-01/04-01/06-925, AC, ICC, 13 June 2007 ('Lubanga appeal decision on joint application of victims'), para. 11.

verbatim from the relevant provision of the 1985 UN Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, which was never meant to operate as a self-executing norm.[58] The Declaration expressly left it to states to define technicalities of the presentation by victims of 'views and concerns' in the way 'consistent with the relevant national criminal justice system'.[59] When borrowing its text for what was to become Article 68(3), the ICC Statute negotiators neither deciphered this important qualification nor fleshed it out in the context of the Court's procedural system.[60] Further, because the drafters of the ICC Rules did not feel authorized to fill in the gaps left open by the diplomatic exercise by going beyond the Statute's provisions, many of the fundamental questions about the rationales and appropriate forms of participation under Article 68(3) remained unanswered.

As a result, the challenging task of working out the procedural scheme by means of trial-and-error fell to the judges, and the cogency of this solution has been questioned.[61] The approach under which the legislator makes a policy choice considering the possible options and indicates clearly the nature and admissible modes of victim participation would have arguably led to the quicker identification of sustainable solutions and consolidation of practice at the ICC, with a possibility of making further adjustments as necessary.[62] No definite and institution-wide answers to the questions of procedural rationales and technicalities were apt to emerge from the adjudication by different Chambers in individual cases. While leaving these issues for judicial determination has been a regular way of legislating in international criminal procedure, the ad hoc tribunals' experience attests that this is bound to result in experimentalism, incremental development of the law, and inconsistencies over time and across different Chambers.

Procedural law-making through jurisprudence and the use of judicial quasi-legislative powers tends to unfold in a piecemeal fashion; it enables achieving the adequate degree of certainty and stability after the critical mass of accreted experience, if at all. It was foreseeable that 'it may take the Court some years of cut-and-try before it arrives at solid principles for the balanced and cogent application of th[e] obscure norm' of Article 68(3).[63] While it is unfortunate that this prediction has materialized, the primary reason for that is known, and the fault does not necessarily lie with the Court. If any failures are to be attributed to it, those can only be its own. Although the question of 'whom to blame' is not nearly as pressing as 'what to do', the misperceptions about the root causes of the problem are distracting in the search of proper solutions. These cannot endlessly be sought in 'what drafters had in mind',

[58] Vasiliev (n 26) 652–3.

[59] Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, UNGA Res 40/34 (29 November 1985) UN Doc A/RES/40/34, para. 6(b).

[60] Vasiliev (n 26) 688–9 ('a perfect mantra of the Victim Rights Movement but … apparently ill-suited to serve as a legal formula establishing prerequisites to granting victims participatory rights').

[61] E.g. Zappalà (n 14) 141–3.

[62] Cf. Rule 23(1) of the Internal Rules of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (adopted 12 June 2007, as amended 3 August 2011) ('The purpose of Civil Party action before the ECCC is to: (a) Participate in criminal proceedings … by supporting the prosecution; and (b) Seek collective and moral reparations, as provided in Rule 23*quinquies*').

[63] Vasiliev (n 26) 688.

which is of little practical relevance and impossible to establish with specificity in any event. Instead, the optimal solutions must be pursued on the basis of 'what works'. The strategic goals of the Court and the modalities employed in achieving them are bound to evolve. In steering the Court, its governing body (ASP) should be able to articulate the objectives clearly and enable the institution to reach them by providing the necessary support and timely guidance, building on the Court's accumulated experience.

45.3 Implementation of Victim Participation: Problems and Solutions

This section highlights the challenges faced by the Court in realizing the key aspects of victim participation and discusses the procedural and administrative responses it has developed in dealing with them. The overview of practice is not exhaustive but limited to issues that have acquired greatest urgency in the past few years, with a focus on the areas which shed light on the role of victims as procedural participants and in respect of which the approaches adopted by different Chambers have varied. Although the ICC has gained experience with regimes other than Article 68(3), in particular the 'Part II regime',[64] this section only reviews practice under the former Article, as supplemented by Rules 89–92 and Regulation 86. It addresses the following aspects of participation: (i) the process by which applicants acquire victim status; (ii) participation of victims in the trial process; and (iii) legal representation. The bulk of discussion is devoted to the system for victims to apply for participation, which largely predetermines the Court's approach to representation and participation and has therefore been the focus of experiments by the Chambers. The further review of the Court's approaches to defining the modalities of participation at trial (in particular, expressing 'views and concerns', presenting and challenging the admissibility of evidence regarding the guilt or innocence, and examining witnesses) provides valuable insights into the judges' perceptions of the overarching purpose of victim participation. This jurisprudence is a source of important judicial clarifications about the victims' procedural role. While their involvement in the pre-trial stage of case proceedings essentially relates to the confirmation of charges, the limited nature and function of that procedure impact on the scope and character of participation allowed at that stage. This renders such participation less representative of the broader rationales and explains the current focus on the trial process.

[64] Arts 15(3) and 19(3) ICC Statute. See e.g. Public Redacted Version of Report Concerning Victims' Representations, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-6-Conf-Exp, Registry, ICC, 29 March 2010; Report on Victims' Representations, Situation in the Republic of Cote d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-11-Red, Registry, ICC, 29 August 2011; Observations on behalf of victims on the 'Application on behalf of the Government of Libya relating to Abdullah Al-Senussi pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-353-Red, OPCV, ICC, 17 June 2013; Observations on behalf of victims on the Government of Libya's Application pursuant to Art 19 of the Rome Statute, Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-166-Red-Corr, OPCV, ICC, 4 June 2012; Reasons for the Oral Decision on the Motion Challenging the Admissibility of the Case (Art 19 of the Statute), Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1213-tENG, TC II, ICC, 16 June 2009, nn 14 and 17 (with further references).

45.3.1 Application process

45.3.1.1 Formal requirements

Under Article 68(3), victim applications are to be submitted to the Registrar who transmits them to the Chamber.[65] After the applications are translated and redacted, they are circulated to the parties for observations. Upon receiving the same, each application should be considered and decided upon individually by the judges who are to determine whether the applicant (i) is eligible for the victim status under Rule 85[66] and (ii) fulfils the criteria set forth in Article 68(3), and, if so, (iii) shall specify the proceedings and manner in which participation is deemed appropriate, i.e. set out the procedural rights allowed at respective stages.[67] In order to appreciate the logistical implications of this procedure, its complexity and resource intensity should be considered in the context of the thousands of applications received in most ICC cases. Each application must be verified for completeness, redacted, sent for observations, and decided upon in a timely fashion. In addition, for some forms of participation tied to Article 68(3)—e.g. the questioning of witnesses by the legal representatives and the submission of evidence on the guilt or innocence of the defendant—a distinct application is required, with a new round of observations by the parties and a separate ruling by the Chamber.[68]

The ICC jurisprudence regarding the vetting of applications has attained a reasonable degree of consolidation, including the issue of who may formally qualify as a victim under Rule 85.[69] The Rule requires applicants to show that: (i) they are a natural person or an organization or institution within the meaning of the Rule; (ii) a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court appears to have been committed; (iii) they have suffered harm; and (iv) such harm arose 'as a result' of the alleged crime within the jurisdiction of the ICC.[70] The test applied by various Chambers hinges upon the following parameters:[71] (i) the required proof of identity (with variations demanded by

[65] Rule 89(1) ICC RPE.

[66] Rule 85 ICC RPE ('natural persons who have suffered harm as a result of the commission of any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court [or] . . . organisations or institutions that have sustained direct harm to any of their property, which is dedicated to religion, art, or science or charitable purposes, and to their historic monuments, hospitals and other places and objects for humanitarian purposes').

[67] Rule 89(2) ICC RPE ('The Chamber, on its own initiative or on the application of the Prosecutor or the defence, may reject the application if it considers that the person is not a victim or that the criteria set forth in article 68, paragraph 3, are not otherwise fulfilled').

[68] Rule 91(3) ICC RPE. See infra section 45.3.2. Participation at trial: Key modalities.

[69] Eckelmans (n 14) 197; ICC Report on the Review of Application System (n 42) para. 26.

[70] See e.g. Fourth Decision on Victims' Participation, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-320, PTC III, ICC, 12 December 2008, para. 30; Decision on Victims' Participation in Proceedings Related to the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-24, PTC II, ICC, 3 November 2010, para. 19; Decision on Victims' Participation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-267, PTC II, ICC, 26 August 2011, para. 40.

[71] See e.g. Decision on Victims' Participation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-211, PTC II, ICC, 15 January 2014, para. 18; Decision on the 97 Applications for Participation at the Pre-Trial Stage of the Case, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-579, PTC I, ICC, 10 June 2008, para. 65; Bemba, Fourth Decision on Victims' Participation (n 70) para. 30.

the situation in a specific country);[72] (ii) the link between the events described in the application and crimes within the ICC's jurisdiction (within the temporal and territorial limits of the 'situation')[73] and to the crimes charged against the accused (for participation in a specific case);[74] and (iii) the need for a causal link between the 'harm' suffered and the crimes charged,[75] with clarifications as to the nature of the 'harm'.[76] There have been variations with respect to the eligibility of certain categories of victims. In particular, some Chambers have held that child applicants might apply without a guardian,[77] while others have treated such applications as incomplete.[78] Similarly,

[72] Decision on Victims' Applications for Participation, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-101, PTC II, ICC, 10 August 2007, para. 16 ('it would be inappropriate to expect applicants to be able to provide proof of identity of the same type as would be required of individuals living in areas not experiencing the same types of difficulties'); Decision on the Requests of the Legal Representative of Applicants on application process for victims' participation and legal representation, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-374, PTC I, ICC, 17 August 2007, paras 14–15; Judgment on the appeals of the Defence against the decisions entitled 'Decision on victims' applications for participation a/0010/06, a/0064/06 to a/0070/06, a/0081/06, a/0082/06, a/0084/06 to a/0089/06, a/0091/06 to a/0097/06, a/0099/06, a/0100/06, a/0102/06 to a/0104/06, a/0111/06, a/0113/06 to a/0117/06, a/0120/06, a/0121/06 and a/0123/06 to a/0127/06' of Pre-Trial Chamber II, ICC-02/04-179, AC, ICC, 23 February 2009, para. 38; Decision on Victims' Participation and Victims' Common Legal Representation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, ICC-02/11-01/11-138, PTC I, ICC, 4 June 2012, para. 21; Decision on Victims' Participation, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1119, TC I, ICC, 18 January 2008 ('Lubanga decision on victim participation at trial'), paras 87–9; Ntaganda, Decision on Victims' Participation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings (n 71) paras 19 and 21.

[73] Kenya Decision on Victims' Participation in Proceedings (n 70) para. 19.

[74] Judgment on the appeals of the Prosecutor and the Defence against Trial Chamber I's Decision on Victims' Participation of 18 January 2008, ICC-01/04-01/06-1432, AC, ICC, 11 July 2008 ('Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial'), para. 58. See e.g. Decision on 8 Applications for Victims' Participation in the Proceedings, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-93, PTC I, ICC, 9 July 2010.

[75] Requiring that a 'sufficient causal link' between the crimes and the harm be established by 'sufficient evidence', see Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings Submitted by VPRS 1 to VPRS 6 in the Case The Prosecutor v Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-172-tEN, PTC I, ICC, 29 June 2006, at 6–9; Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74) para. 62; Decision on the 138 applications for victims' participation in the proceedings, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-351, PTC, ICC, 11 August 2011, paras 21–2; Katanga and Ngudjolo, Decision on the 97 Applications for Participation at the Pre-Trial Stage of the Case (n 71) paras 65–7; Bemba, Fourth Decision on Victims' Participation (n 70) paras 74–7. See also Decision on Victims' Participation and Victims' Common Legal Representation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-01/09-01/11-138, PTC I, ICC, 4 June 2012, para. 31.

[76] The harm sustained by natural persons may be both direct and indirect, but it must necessarily be personal: Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74) paras 32–8.

[77] Allowing such applications on a case-by-case basis, see Decision on the treatment of applications for participation, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-933, TC II, ICC, 26 February 2009, para. 36; Decision on the applications by victims to participate in the proceedings, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1556, TC I, ICC, 15 December 2008, paras 95–6.

[78] Decision on Victims' Applications for Participation a/0014/07 to a/0020/07 and a/0076/07 to a/0125/07, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-172, PTC II, ICC, 21 November 2008, paras 19–20; Decision on victims' applications for participation a/0192/07 to a/0194/07, a/0196/07, a/0200/07, a/0204/07, a/0206/07, a/0209/07, a/0212/07, a/0216/07, a/0217/07, a/0219/07 to a/0221/07, a/02228/07 to a/0230/07, a/0234/07, a/0235/07, a/0237/07, a/0324/07, and a/0326/07 under Rule 89, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-180, PTC II, ICC, 10 March 2009; Corrigendum to Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of Applicants a/0011/06 to a/0015/06, a/0021/07, a/0023/07 to a/0033/07 and a/0035/07 to a/0038/07, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-111-Corr, PTC I, ICC, 14 December 2007.

the Chambers' rulings as to whether applications may be made or participation continued on behalf of deceased victims have diverged.[79]

45.3.1.2 Sustainability: the resources black hole

Although the formal requirements used in assessing applications have gradually taken clearer contours, the implementation of the system has been fraught with severe burdens for the victims, the VPRS, the Chambers, and the parties. The victims' experience with the application process under Rule 89(1) has often been negative. Part of the problem is that the applicants are expected to complete a shortened—but still rather lengthy—standard application form;[80] these forms are developed by the Registry (VPRS), approved by the Presidency,[81] and distributed locally through interlocutors who have direct access to victims.[82] The degree of detail of the personal information the applicants are required to provide is substantial,[83] and arguably, it is incommensurate in relation to the scope of eventual participation through a common legal [79] Holding that only living persons may apply to participate: Decision on Victims' Participation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-267, PTC II, ICC, 26 August 2011, para. 47. Cf. Dispositif de la deuxième décision relative aux demandes de participation de victimes à la procédure, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1669, TC II, ICC, 23 November 2009, para. 4 and at 8; Motifs de la deuxième décision relative aux demandes de participation de victimes à la procédure, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1737, TC II, ICC, 22 December 2009, paras 30–2 (close family members of the deceased victim may not apply in his name but may continue participation on his behalf within the limits of the views and concerns expressed by the victim in his or her initial application); Decision on the application to resume action, submitted by a family member of deceased Victim a/0253/09, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3383-tENG, TC II, ICC, 10 June 2013, paras 6–8. Cf. Bemba, Fourth Decision on Victims' Participation (n 69) para. 44 (the deceased victim can be represented by the successor that has been recognized as a participant) and Decision on the participation of victims in the trial and on 86 applications by victims to participate in the proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-807, TC III, ICC, 30 June 2010, para. 80; Annex 2 (ICC-01/04-01/06-2065-Anx2), Order issuing confidential and public redacted versions of Annex A to the 'Decision on the applications by 7 victims to participate in the proceedings of 10 July 2009', Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2035, TC I, ICC, 23 July 2009, 15 (permitting the deceased victim's uncle to act on his behalf). For discussion, see T Bachvarova, 'Victims' Eligibility before the International Criminal Court in Historical and Comparative Context' (2011) 11 International Criminal Law Review 665, 672–82; Eckelmans (n 14) 199.

[80] Pena and Carayon (n 14) 10; Kendall and Nouwen (n 7) 245–6.

[81] Regulations 23(2) and 86(1) and (2) Regulations of the Court. In 2010 the standard application form developed in 2005 was reduced from 17 to 7 pages.

[82] Eckelmans (n 14) 193–4.

[83] Regulation 86(2) Regulations of the Court. See further Decision on the Requests of the Legal Representatives of Applicants on Application Process for Victims' Participation and Legal Representation, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-374, PTC I, ICC, 17 August 2007, para. 12 ('(i) the identity of the applicant; (ii) the date of the crime(s); (iii) the location of the crime(s); (iv) a description of the harm suffered as a result of the commission of any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; (v) proof of identity; (vi) if the application is made by a person acting with the consent of the victim, the express consent of that victim; (vii) if the application is made by a person acting on behalf of a victim, in the case of a victim who is a child, proof of kinship or legal guardianship; or, in the case of a victim who is disabled, proof of legal guardianship; (viii) a signature or thumb-print of the Applicant on the document, at the very least, on the last page of the application'); Bemba Fourth Decision on Victims' Participation (n 70) para. 81.

representative.[84] For many victims, it was impossible to supply proper identity documents and birth certificates in support of the applications due to the unavailability of, or the lack of access to, civil records in the areas of conflict, which has led the Chambers to accepting alternative proofs of identity.[85] The frequent misunderstanding of formal requirements by the applicants has routinely resulted in deficient applications,[86] and the VPRS then had to invest extra work in following up with the applicants in order to obtain the missing information.[87]

Victims who are illiterate or do not speak the language used in the application forms require assistance in completing them; the VPRS has relied heavily on local intermediaries rather than the Court staff or lawyers for that.[88] The Chambers have acknowledged the crucial role intermediaries play in assisting victims with their applications despite related controversies and, most notably, defence objections regarding possible abuse.[89] However, due to its neutral status the Registry has been in a position neither to reimburse the intermediaries' expenses incurred in connection with these services nor to provide legal aid to the applicants prior to the judicial recognition of their status.[90]

The time-consuming job of ensuring the completeness of applications falls to the severely under-resourced VPRS, and the section has laboured under tremendous work pressure.[91] In dealing with its growing workload, it could rely on the limited staff in the ICC's few field offices, local intermediaries, and legal representatives, if appointed.[92] Still, this was no panacea against the significant backlog of incomplete applications, which has been the true challenge to the system.[93] The Court reported in 2012 that it was:

[84] REDRESS (n 8) 16 (observing that the emphasis on eligibility, rather than meaningful participation, adds to the frustration of victims). See also Eckelmans (n 14) 194.

[85] Eckelmans (n 14) 198. See supra n 72 and Decision on the Registry Report on Six Applications to Participate in the Proceedings, Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-231, TC IV, ICC, 17 October 2011, para. 23 (admitting a signed declaration from two witnesses able to provide a proof of their identity, attesting of the identity of the applicant or relationship with the person acting on his behalf).

[86] Report on Activities and Programme Performance of the ICC for the Year 2011, ICC-ASP/11/8, 4 May 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), 51 (only 40% of applications received in 2011 from the DRC and 50% of applications from Kenya were complete).

[87] Regulation 86(4) Regulations of the Court. See e.g. Decision on Victim's Participation in Proceedings Related to the Situation in Uganda, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-191, PTC II, ICC, 9 March 2012, para. 24.

[88] Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/11/40 (n 50) para. 39.

[89] Decision on 772 Applications by Victims to Participate in the Proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1017, TC III, ICC, 18 November 2010, para. 34; Grounds for the Decision on the 345 Applications for Participation in the Proceedings Submitted by Victims, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1491-Red-tENG, TC II, ICC, 23 September 2009, paras 40–3.

[90] REDRESS (n 8) 17-8 and 26.

[91] Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 of the ICC, ICC-ASP-11/10, 16 August 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 434 ('There has been no increase in VPRS staff at headquarters since 2006, in spite of the workload increasing many times over. This has put very high pressure on the section each year. The scale of these increases is such that they can no longer be absorbed within existing staff resources if the section is to be in a position to respond to demands of Chambers, maintain control in the field and respect the rights of victims').

[92] REDRESS (n 8) 18 and 26–7.

[93] Ibid., 26; Proposed Programme Budget for 2013 of the ICC (n 91) para. 434.

> experiencing difficulties processing applications in a timely manner so as to keep pace with the proceedings and enable victims to effectively exercise their rights under the Statute. One of the main reasons for this difficulty is the lack of appropriate resources in the Registry, parties, legal representatives of applicants and Chambers to deal with the volume of applications.[94]

The VPRS is juggling multiple responsibilities.[95] Over and above ensuring the completeness of applications, it is also charged with conducting consultations with victims regarding the appointment of common legal representatives, preparing a confidential report summarizing and grouping the applications for the Chamber,[96] and discussing redactions with legal representatives.[97] While the VPRS has a general duty to assist victims and groups of victims,[98] it was only able to provide assistance indirectly by organizing trainings for intermediaries and providing support to lawyers.[99] The deficit of resources and multi-tasking prevented the section from directly helping victims to complete application forms, as a result of which it had to expend time in procuring the information missing from the applications ex post facto. In 2012 the VPRS attempted to alleviate the backlog of business by recruiting additional temporary staff and by prioritizing case proceedings over situation proceedings, but these quick-fix solutions proved inadequate.[100]

As a result of this backlog, the Registry was systematically unable to comply with Chambers' orders to transmit applications to the relevant Chamber within a set timeframe, citing the lack of resources.[101] Because the Court was not in a position to decide on their status, victims were precluded from exercising their rights and missed out on important hearings. In the Bemba and Lubanga trials and in the Mbarushimana confirmation process, the Registry informed the judges of its failure to comply with its filing obligations.[102] Victims who applied for participation prior to the expiry of deadlines set by the Chambers were deprived of the opportunity to have their views and concerns heard.[103]

[94] ICC Report on the Review of Application System (n 42) para. 6.

[95] See e.g. ICC Report on the Review of Application System (n 42) paras 8–9.

[96] The Chambers have started requesting the VPRS to include preliminary assessments of and basic information from individual applications in light of each of the requirements of Rule 85 in its Regulation 86(5) reports. See e.g. Uganda, Decision on Victim's Participation in Proceedings Related to the Situation in Uganda (n 87) para. 27.

[97] Regulation 86(5) and (6) Regulations of the Court.

[98] Regulation 86(9) Regulations of the Court.

[99] REDRESS (n 10) 18 and 26.

[100] Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in relation to victims, ICC-ASP/11/40 (n 50) para. 40.

[101] ICC Report on the Review of Application System (n 42) para. 12 ('Despite having done its utmost to avoid causing delays in the proceedings or preventing victims from exercising their rights, at several times during 2011 the Registry was obliged to inform Chambers that it was not in a position to comply with orders by the deadlines imposed. At present, the Registry is unable to keep pace and a sizeable backlog of applications exists'); Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/11/40 (n 50) para. 40.

[102] Proposal on Victim Participation in the Confirmation Hearing, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10, Registry, ICC, 6 June 2011; Request for Instructions on Victims' Applications for Participation and Reparations Received by the Registry, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2817, Registry, ICC, 2 November 2011, para. 1.

[103] REDRESS (n 10) 18 and 20–1; Pena and Carayon (n 14) 11.

The application system has become a true 'black hole' for the Court's judicial and administrative resources and for those of the parties. Before circulating the applications among the parties in order to obtain their views as required by Rule 89, the Chamber is to decide on protective measures and necessary redactions.[104] Without access to confidential VPRS reports, parties often have to make observations on the stacks of applications that are incomplete and heavily redacted; understandably, in such cases their observations tend to be unspecific.[105] In turn, the Chambers have had to individually examine each application and corroborating evidence, the relevant VPRS reports, and parties' observations before issuing a reasoned decision on each applicant's request. This domain of responsibility has been the consistent drain of the Chambers' limited resources.[106] Plagued with unavoidable delays in transmitting and processing victims' applications, the individualized vetting system has proven unworkable with the steadily growing workload of the Court.

With the application process being the gateway through which victims enter into the ICC system, the bottlenecks associated with this stage expose the general tension between the 'individual' and 'collective' dimensions of procedural participation by victims. On the one hand, the individualized approach to processing and deciding on the applications offers victims the benefit of the first, albeit provisional, official recognition of their status and guarantees a sufficient substantive connection between applicants and the case.[107] On the other hand, the sheer number of applicants renders the individualized application-vetting impracticable. The system under which victims have to wait for two years before they can obtain the first judicial determination of their standing and participate through a common legal representative, while being deprived of the opportunities to exercise rights in the meantime, has clearly discredited itself. The scheme is unsustainable and in need of reform, although there is no agreement on the nature and extent of the same. Recommendations towards improving the system have ranged from requiring the optimization falling short of major restructuring[108] to advocating far-reaching amendments.[109] The Court itself has experimented with a number of ad hoc solutions in individual cases, next to undertaking an institution-wide review of the system.

[104] ICC Report on the Review of Application System (n 42) para. 10; Eckelmans (n 14) 196; Van den Wyngaert (n 11) 482.

[105] Van den Wyngaert (n 11) 482; REDRESS (n 10) 22–3; Eckelmans (n 14) 196.

[106] Van den Wyngaert (n 11) 482–4.

[107] REDRESS (n 10) 10.

[108] REDRESS (n 10) 24–33 (the existing system can be strengthened without changing its structure but by strengthening outreach, improving the quality of initial applications, enabling parties to see the Registry's reports on applications; setting clear timeframes, avoiding duplicative decision-making, and separating the participation-oriented from reparation-oriented application process); Independent Panel of Experts report (n 22) 44–5.

[109] War Crimes Research Office, 'Obtaining Victim Status for Purposes of Participating in Proceedings at the International Criminal Court', ICC Legal Analysis and Education Project, December 2013 ('WCRO Report on application system') 49.

45.3.1.3 Judicial experimentation and review of the system

The nature and scale of problems plaguing the application system prodded the Court into action. From 2012 Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers have taken a series of initiatives in individual cases towards making it more manageable and less resource-consuming. The promising judicial experiments in Gbagbo, Kenya I and II, and Ntaganda are landmarked by creative and strategic thinking on the part of the judges in the ICC's quest for system-wide solutions. However, these ad hoc solutions did not avoid controversy: first, they reinforced the cross-chamber pluralism in the treatment of victim applications; second, some of them were inconsistent with the individualized vetting procedure provided for by Rule 89; and third, some Chambers have failed to consult with parties and victims before adopting a specific solution, with such unilateralism being objectionable.

45.3.1.3.1 Gbagbo: partly collective approach

The first experiment meant to address the inefficiencies of the application system within the resources available was that pioneered by Single Judge Férnandez de Gurmendi in the lead-up to the Laurent Gbagbo confirmation process. With reference to the duty to ensure fair and expeditious proceedings and 'to guarantee the rights of victims to express their views and concerns in a meaningful manner' in accordance with Article 68(3), the judge deemed it imperative 'to enhance the efficiency and the substantive value of victims' participation by envisaging a system that takes into account the particular circumstances of the Case' and can adequately cope with numerous applicants.[110] After consultations with the Registry regarding the viability of a collective approach and, in line with its recommendations, the judge issued a decision that generally favoured the collective application scheme. But for the purpose of the case, a 'mixed approach' was adopted, which allowed victims to apply either as individuals or as a group.[111] This approach was to be implemented by the Registry in three phases: (i) producing an initial mapping report on the victim population in Côte d'Ivoire identifying groups of victims and persons that could act on behalf of multiple victims with their consent, in accordance with Rule 89(3), and encouraging applicants to join with others and consent to a single application form (without it being possible to impose a collective process);[112] (ii) collection and processing of victims' applications; and (iii) the organization of common legal representation.[113]

[110] Decision on Issues Related to the Victims' Application Process, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-33, PTC III, ICC, 6 February 2012 ('Gbagbo application process decision'), paras 5–6.

[111] Gbagbo application process decision (n 110) para. 7 ('the system for the Case should encourage a collective approach to victims' applications. Such a system, tailored to the specific needs of the Case, would be without prejudice to continuing the long-term consideration of a collective system that could eventually be applied by the Court as a whole and could, in fact, serve as a valuable experience which may be beneficial to such a long-term project'); Organization of the Participation of Victims, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-29-Red, Registry, ICC, 20 January 2012.

[112] Rule 89(3) ICC RPE ('An application … may also be made by a person acting with the consent of the victim, or a person acting on behalf of a victim, in the case of a victim who is a child or, when necessary, a victim who is disabled'). See Gbagbo application process decision' (n 111) para. 8.

[113] Gbagbo application process decision' (n 110) paras 3 and 10.

In accordance with the judge's order, the Registry developed a collective application form consisting of a 'group form' that allows describing the elements common to the group (e.g. harm suffered and alleged crimes), and a one-page individual declaration meant for information on specific events and individual harm.[114] The Registry reiterated in its report that a 'wholly collective approach' would be inconsistent with the ICC's legal framework and that the proposed approach merely introduced 'a measure of collective management of the process in the interests of efficiency and effectiveness' while still allowing individual presentation and treatment of applications.[115] In response to the defence and the OPCV challenges that the 'partly collective' solution is inefficient and incompatible with the legal framework, the single judge held that collective applications are not inconsistent with Regulation 86 and allow obtaining the sufficient amount of information from the applicants.[116] Subject to limited alterations to the form, the judge proceeded with this approach and allowed the VPRS to assist the applicants in completing collective forms.[117]

The Gbagbo solution has since been replicated by other Chambers[118] and was identified by the Court as valuable didactic material for future cases, provided that 'it proves to be efficient for the Court, satisfying for victims, and in compliance with Court's legal framework'.[119] However, court monitors' assessments were mixed and echoed some of the defence and OPCV submissions in pointing out the problems and risks the scheme posed.[120] They criticized this approach on the following grounds: insufficiency of personal detail in collective forms (indicating neither the date of birth nor gender);[121] ongoing uncertainty about its consistency with the ICC Statute and Rules;[122] difficulties inherent in grouping victims and the risk of muting the voices of victims with distinct interests (in particular, children and victims of sexual violence);[123] risk of [114] Annex B: Proposed partly collective application form, Proposal on a partly collective application form for victims' participation, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-45-AnxB, Registry, ICC, 29 February 2012.

[115] L Gbagbo, Annex B: proposed partly collective application form (n 114) 7; Annex A: Report on the Registry's Proposed Collective Application, Proposal on a partly collective application form for victims' participation, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-45-AnxB, Registry, ICC, 29 February 2012, paras 10 and 17; Gbagbo Organization of the Participation of Victims (n 111) paras 25–6.

[116] Second decision on issues related to the victims' application process, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-86, PTC III, ICC, 5 April 2012 ('Gbagbo second application process decision'), paras 16 et seq.

[117] Gbagbo second application process decision (n 116) para. 27.

[118] See Uganda Decision on Victim's Participation in Proceedings Related to the Situation in Uganda (n 87) para. 22 (with reference to Gbagbo encouraging a collective approach to victims' applications and requesting the VPRS to prepare a similar standard form for collective applications).

[119] Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims (n 50) para. 44.

[120] One of them, REDRESS, was allowed to file an amicus curiae brief: REDRESS Trust Observations to Pre-Trial Chamber I of the ICC Pursuant to Rule 103 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-62, Amicus Curiae, ICC, 16 March 2012.

[121] Cf. REDRESS (n 8) 35 (this is not a fatal flaw because the information provided is sufficient to determine eligibility to participate and does not serve to define the nature and modalities of eventual participation, while the required degree of detail in the context of individualized process exceeds the needs of the essentially collective participation). See also Gbagbo second application process decision (n 116) para. 20.

[122] REDRESS (n 8) 35.

[123] Ibid., 36–7.

manipulation and difficulties with identifying 'representatives' of a group;[124] and security risks involved in the collective process.[125]

45.3.1.3.2 Kenya I and II: differentiated approach

Ahead of trial in the two Kenya cases, Trial Chamber V introduced an innovative 'differentiated procedure' for organizing the application process, which it found to be more appropriate for giving effect to Article 68(3) 'in the particular circumstances of the case'.[126] In essence, this approach not merely combines the individual and collective modes of completing and processing applications, but also links these modes to the nature of participation sought by the applicants. The Chamber held that (i) only those victims who intend to appear before the Chamber in person or via video-link are supposed to submit individual applications to be processed in accordance with Rule 89; whereas (ii) other victims, who wish to participate by expressing views and concerns through a common legal representative and without appearing before the Chamber do not have to apply in accordance with Rule 98.[127] Next to submitting a standard application, the applicants in the first category are expected to explain, through a common legal representative, 'why they are considered to be best placed to reflect the interests of the victims' and to provide 'a detailed summary of the aspects to be covered if the victim is allowed to present her views and concerns'.[128] By contrast, the second category of victims could choose to 'register' as 'victim participants' in a simplified procedure administered by the Registry, without individual assessment by the judges of their eligibility.[129] Common legal representative would be given access to a database with registration details (names, contact information, and information about the harm suffered).[130]

In explaining the rationale for this categorization of applicants, the Chamber held that the Rule 89(1) procedure was only appropriate and necessary for victims intending to present views and concerns individually by appearing before the Chamber.[131] In addition, it could work in cases with small numbers of victims where a common legal representative could present their individual views and concerns. In the Chamber's view, the differentiation between the applicants seeking personal participation and those seeking to participate through a common legal representative enabled it to strike 'the correct balance between the need to allow for the presentation and consideration of victims' views and concerns, on the one hand, and to safeguard the rights of the accused and a fair and impartial trial, on the other'.[132] It also assured that no victim would be excluded from participation only due to administrative difficulty in complying with the requirements of Rule 89 and Regulation 86.[133]

[124] Ibid., 37. [125] Ibid., 37–8.

[126] Decision on victims' representation and participation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-460, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012 ('Ruto and Sang victim participation decision'), paras 23 and 24 (referring to 'a large number of victims involved and also unprecedented security concerns and other difficulties that may be associated with the completion of a detailed application form'); Decision on victims' representation and participation, Muthaura and Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-498, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012 ('Muthaura and Kenyatta victim participation decision'). As the two decisions are identical, this chapter only refers to the Ruto and Sang decision.

[127] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 25. [128] Ibid., para. 56.

[129] Ibid., para. 25. [130] Ibid., 49. [131] Ibid., paras 27–8. [132] Ibid., para. 29.

[133] Ibid., para. 32.

On its own merits, the approach developed by the Trial Chamber is appealing, as it allows addressing the efficiency problems of the application system while not entailing the transition to a fully or partially collective process.[134] The differentiated scheme removes the need for individual consideration of numerous applications by victims not seeking to appear before the Chamber in person. The Chamber suggested that the procedure is better aligned with the interests of victims; reportedly the simplified application procedure was indeed welcomed in the affected communities.[135] The procedure would relieve victims and intermediaries from the onerous task of filling in lengthy application forms, unless the applicants wish to participate individually, and help reduce safety risks.[136] It would minimize delays in processing the applications of victims who seek personal participation and enable them to exercise their rights.[137] This system also allows sparing the resources of the Chamber and the parties, and promotes the right of the accused to be tried without undue delay and to have adequate time to prepare the defence.[138] Finally, it enables a more prudent allocation of resources, being more pragmatic and participation-oriented: the emphasis here is placed on the substance of participation sought rather than on the determination of eligibility for its own sake. Hence this is not only the more efficient but also the more effective approach apt to improve the victims' experience with the Court.[139]

Regardless of the evident benefits of this approach, the way in which the Chamber introduced it was not without problems. First, it did not consult with the parties and victims. This is regrettable given that the victims ought to be allowed an opportunity to be heard on matters affecting their interests, as opposed to the situation in which an abstract interpretation of such interests is being taken as a point of departure.[140] Although the Chamber is not duty bound to request the views of the parties, the Registry, and the legal representatives, it should have done so in this case, not least because the decision fundamentally affected the interests of all sides involved.[141] Consultation was warranted given the importance of the issue and the innovative character of the Chamber's approach, as a matter of good practice (for example, as discussed, the Gbagbo Chamber did not fail to hold consultations).

Second, the enactment of the Kenya procedure rested on a serious legal flaw. The Chamber admitted that its solution conflicts with the plain text of Rule 89(1), which [134] See also REDRESS (n 8) 38.

[135] Periodic Report on the General Situation of Victims in The Prosecutor v William Samoei Ruto and Joshua Arap Sang and the Activities of the VPRS and the Common Legal Representative, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-566-Anx, Registry, ICC, 23 January 2013, para. 11; Report of the Court on the Implementation in 2013 of the Revised Strategy in relation to victims, ICC-ASP/12/41, 11 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP) ('ICC Report on the Implementation of the Revised Victim Strategy'), para. 31; Amicus Curiae Observations of Kituo Cha Sheria Pursuant to Rule 103 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01-11-478, Amicus Curiae, ICC, 23 November 2012, para. 26.

[136] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 31.

[137] Ibid., para. 30.

[138] Ibid., para. 36.

[139] Ibid., para. 37. Accordingly, see REDRESS (n 8) 38; WCRO Report on application system (n 109) 55.

[140] WCRO Report on application system (n 109) 33; Pena and Carayon (n 14) 15–16.

[141] See also Request pursuant to Rule 103 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence for leave to submit observation as amicus curiae, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-519, Amicus Curiae, ICC, 24 December 2012, para. 8.

requires individualized treatment of each and every application.[142] That Rule does not make the vetting procedure dependent upon the intended nature of participation and does not envisage the categorization of victims along these lines for the purpose of the application procedure. As a way to bypass, that is, to ignore, this provision, inconvenient as it were, the Chamber engaged in precarious legal acrobatics. With reference to Article 51(4) and (5), which establishes that the Rules are subordinate to the Statute and that any collisions shall be resolved in favour of the latter, the bench suggested that the Rule conflicts with Article 68(3) and that it would therefore apply the Rule 'in the manner that it considers to be most consistent with the norms indicated in Article 68(3) of the Statute'.[143]

This reasoning is unconvincing. The suggested manner of 'applying the Rule' would in fact amount to 'misapplying' it, while there is nothing in the text of Rule 89 that is inconsistent with Article 68(3) and that would justify its misapplication. It is quite another thing that the Rule was inconsistent with the interpretation the Chamber wished to give to Article 68(3), as it expressly admitted.[144] However sound the judicial policy considerations are behind this interpretation, Article 51 does not authorize judges to set a Rule aside in such scenarios. A legal collision between the Statute and the RPE should not be conflated with the impossibility to interpret the rule—that is formally consistent with the Statute and has been widely relied upon in all previous cases—in the way ensuring, in the Chamber's view, the optimal operation of the Statute. While it is true that Rule 89 gives effect to Article 68(3),[145] the specific manner in which it does so has been agreed upon by the Preparatory Commission which negotiated and drafted the RPE and is therefore binding on the judges, even if they disagree with it.

Hence the Chamber's approach was ultra vires Article 21(1)(a) of the Statute, which provides that the Court 'shall' apply the Rules of Procedure and Evidence 'in the first place', along with the Statute and Elements of Crimes. Where the judges are of the view that a certain Rule stands in the way of the optimal functioning of the statutory regime, the proper way of dealing with this problem is the amendment of the Rule by the ASP in accordance with Article 51(2), and judges may propose amendments by an absolute majority. Alternatively, Article 51(3) authorizes the judges, 'in urgent cases where the Rules do not provide for a specific situation before the Court', to draw up provisional rules by a two-thirds majority, to be effective until adopted, amended, or rejected at the next ordinary or special session of the ASP. Presumably, the judges did not resort to this avenue because it is burdensome and time-consuming—or because Rule 89 in fact does 'provide for a specific situation before the Court' in which case the Article 51(3) prerogatives cannot be invoked. However, the unavailability of such a fix is no justification for violating the Statute and the Rules: in this case, the implementation of

[142] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 22. [143] Ibid., para. 22.

[144] Ibid., para. 28 ('due to the large number of expected victim participants, it is not feasible to apply the Rule 89(1) procedure to all victims in this case whilst at the same time respecting the letter, object and purpose of Article 68(3) of the Statute').

[145] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 20.

the Chamber's approach must have been preceded by the rule-amendment by the Assembly.[146]

Third, there have been other, more practical objections to the Kenya procedure. For example, it was feared that this approach could lead to divisions among the victim population into the first and second classes of victims, engendering frustration and resentment.[147] Another set of objections related to the issue of whether the differentiated approach indeed saves court resources because the Registry still needed to put in place the new registration system, process the registration requests, and liaise with common legal representatives. It would not be relieved from reporting obligations, which require considerable efforts in obtaining the detailed information from the common legal representative.[148] The VPRS must remain on a stand-by in view of the Chamber's possible requests for information under Rule 89 and Regulation 86 in case the victim decides to appear in person; this ad hoc mode of filling in the information gaps may engender delays during the ongoing proceedings, rather than in the lead-up to the trial.[149] If the views and concerns expressed on behalf of the victims are to reflect their actual and personal views and concerns, the major burden of liaising with the registered applicants and obtaining the necessary information shifts to the common legal representative, who is also to pass the details on to the VPRS for the purpose of reporting to the Chamber.[150] Finally, the differentiated system does not help to solve the efficiency problem, but allows avoiding it. It might not work as expected where a significant number of victims wish to appear in person; in that scenario the application procedure would return to the Rule 89(1) track and the same issue the differentiated system was meant to obviate will resurface.[151] That said, the chance of this materializing needs to be assessed in light of experience—thus far, only a limited number of victims have chosen to appear in person: three victims in the Lubanga trial, two in Katanga, and five in Bemba.[152]

45.3.1.3.3 Ntaganda: simplified approach

The Ntaganda (pre-trial) Single Judge experimented with the simplified application approach after having consulted the Registry about the performance of the Gbagbo model and having decided to depart from it in accordance with the Registry's recommendation.[153] Given the reported difficulty in Gbagbo with appointing a single contact person for the group, the single judge favoured the option of developing 'a concise and [146] See also WCRO Report on application system (n 109) 60.

[147] See e.g. Ruto and Sang, Amicus Curiae Observations of Kituo Cha Sheria Pursuant to Rule 103 (n 135) para. 30; Request to Present Views and Concerns of Legal Representation at the Trial Phase, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-469, Legal Representative of Victims, 6 November 2012, para. 16(a).

[148] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 55 (VPRS will be directed to periodically provide 'detailed statistics about the victims' population … appended to a comprehensive report on the general situation of the victims as a whole, including registered and non-registered victims [and] … prepared in cooperation with the Common Legal Representative').

[149] REDRESS (n 8) 39.

[150] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 55.

[151] REDRESS (n 8) 39.

[152] See section 45.3.2. Participation at trial: Key modalities.

[153] Decision Establishing Principles on the Victims' Application Process, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-67, PTC II, ICC, 28 May 2013, para. 18; Registry Observations in Compliance with the Decision ICC-01/04-02/06-54, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-57, Registry, ICC, 6 May 2013, paras 5–10. The same approach was subsequently adopted in the Ongwen case: Decision Establishing Principles on the Victims' Application Process, Ongwen, Situation in Uganda, ICC-02/04-01/15-205, PTC II, ICC, 4 March 2015, paras 15-7.

simplified individual form'.[154] The 'simplified' form would essentially be the same as the 'individual declaration' used in Gbagbo and in addition enable the information to be provided about the events and the harm suffered.[155] Being a one-page document, it would be limited to particulars strictly required by Rule 85: the identity of the applicant; a link between the victim and the crimes with which the suspect is charged; and information regarding harm suffered as a result of those crimes.[156] Thus, victims would submit applications separately, but the VPRS would be able to group them together and process them collectively. In turn, this would enhance the efficiency and streamline the process of redactions, while making it possible for the parties to make meaningful observations on the applications.[157]

45.3.1.4 Court's review of the system and possible avenues

As noted, the determination of the optimal ways to make the application system sustainable has been a two-track endeavour. Besides the Chambers' initiatives taken in individual cases, the Court has conducted an institution-wide review of the system, pursuant to the request the ASP made in 2011.[158] The assessment was concluded in 2012 and led to the submission to the 11th session of the ASP of the Report on the review of the system for victims to apply for participation.[159] The Court presented six options for improving the application process that could be used in combination.[160] The bulk of the report provided an analysis of those options in terms of sustainability, effectiveness, and efficiency.[161] The following avenues were identified: (i) continued implementation of the current system; (ii) Partly collective application process; (iii) fully collective application process leading to collective participation; (iv) providing the Registry report as the basis for observations by the parties and decision-making; (v) decision-making on the status of victims performed by judges, not litigated between the parties; and (vi) dealing with victims' applications only at the pre-trial stage.[162]

The first avenue would require the investment of additional resources and providing the Court organs, parties, and participants with additional capacities to ensure that the system is sustainable; no amendments to the legal framework would be imperative.[163] In any event, the current system was deemed in need of fine-tuning and, in particular, the splitting of the participation-oriented and reparation-oriented

[154] Ntaganda Decision Establishing Principles on the Victims' Application Process (n 153) para. 18

[155] Ntaganda Registry Observations in Compliance with the Decision ICC-01/04-02/06-54 (n 153) paras 8 and 9.

[156] Ntaganda Decision Establishing Principles on the Victims' Application Process (n 153) paras 21–2; Ongwen Decision Establishing Principles on the Victims' Applications Process (n 153) paras 19-21.

[157] Ibid., paras 22–3. While this book was in final production, the new admission procedure was developed for the Ntaganda trial. It differs from the Kenya system in that it provides for a greater degree of judicial oversight over application process for victims participating solely through the legal representative: Decision on victims' participation in trial proceedings, Ntaganda, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-02/06-449, TC VI, ICC, 6 February 2015, para. 24.

[158] Strengthening the ICC and the ASP, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, 21 December 2011 (Tenth Session of the ASP), para. 49 (requesting the ICC 'to review the system for victims' applications to ensure its sustainability, effectiveness and efficiency, and to report thereon to the Assembly').

[159] ICC Report on the Review of Application System (n 42).

[160] Ibid., paras 20 and 73.

[161] Defining these parameters, see ibid., paras 17–19.

[162] Ibid., para. 21.

[163] Ibid., paras 22–5 and 31–2.

application process. Even with this possibility in mind, the Court's discussion of this option reveals pessimism as to its acceptability for States Parties, given the budgetary constraints.[164]

The 'partly collective' system draws upon the Gbagbo experience, which, as outlined, complies with the legal framework in place. The Court pointed out that this model spared it some time and paperwork in practice, but underperformed in efficiency terms—it required the Registry sections operating in the field and legal representatives of the victims to expend greater resources.[165] Similarly, the defence and legal representatives expressed a concern that the partly collective process did not provide them with sufficient information for the effective exercise of their functions (review of the applications and representation of victims, respectively).[166] The OPCV pointed to the risk of discrepancies between the information contained in collective application forms and in individual declarations, while the OPCD doubted its efficiency in light of the need for the defence to spot inconsistencies. Accordingly, the Court did not take a definitive position on the adequacy of the Gbagbo approach until the end of the pre-trial phase, but expressed the preliminary view that it may be unsuitable in situations where no natural or pre-existing groups of victims could be discerned or where victims were scattered over a wide geographic area.[167]

The third avenue appears to be the most 'radical' option among those identified: it would 'represent a major shift' of 'not only moving away from the individualized approach to dealing with victims' applications . . . but also a shift from individual to collective participation'.[168] Applications would be filed by a representative of the group of victims or the community or by a victim association. Otherwise, the participation would be pursued by a (general) legal representative of victims tasked with defining who he or she represents; the detailed application process could be done away with altogether, similarly to the approach in the Kenya cases.[169] This avenue would require the recognition of victim groups, communities, or associations as eligible applicants and participants by Rule 85. In all likelihood, any of these sub-options would require amendments to Rules 85 and 89 and Regulation 86, which reflect, by default, the individualized application and participation scheme.[170] Since participation would become fully collective, with the 'personal interests' of victims being absorbed or replaced by 'group interests',[171] Article 68(3) might also be in need of amendment.[172] The fully collective approach was found to be potentially promising in terms of saving the resources of all organs and parties, although legal and practical challenges were anticipated for the Registry in the process of selection of community representatives and the constitution of victim associations.[173] The fundamental concern, raised by the OPCV, was that the collective approach might not be able to accommodate the distinct interests of victims of 'hidden crimes', such as sexual violence, and might deprive them of

[164] Ibid., paras 28 and 30. [165] Ibid., paras 33–5. [166] Ibid., paras 36–7.
[167] Ibid., para. 38. [168] Ibid., para. 39. [169] Ibid., paras 39(1)–(3).
[170] Ibid., paras 41–2. [171] Ibid., para. 39(1) and n 29.
[172] Ibid., para. 41 (considering this uncertain since the 'fully collective application options are untested').
[173] Ibid., para. 44.

the access to the Court and the possibility of expressing their views and concerns meaningfully.[174] While the fully collective approach might enhance efficiency of victim participation and save considerable resources, it is an uncharted territory, in particular in terms of impact on the victims and the role of the Registry on the ground. Due to the lack of experience, the Court's ability to assess its implications credibly was rather limited.[175]

The remaining three options identified in the report are more modest and present loose variations on the first avenue, seeking to deal with the perceived inefficiencies of the current system. The fourth avenue envisaged that the Registry would provide the Chamber and the parties with a prima facie report on the applications, possibly in the form of a table with unified entries highlighting 'borderline cases' for observations and adjudication.[176] As noted, at present such reports are prepared in accordance with Regulation 86(5) and submitted to the Chamber alone, although more recently the VPRS was also allowed to communicate them to the parties, which allows anticipating some of the practical implications of this model.[177] While this option might save the resources of the Chambers, legal representatives, and the parties, it would not result in efficiency gains for the Registry; furthermore, the VPRS's disclosure of views on the merits of the applications could be seen as compromising its neutrality.[178]

The fifth approach proposed by the Court entails removing or limiting the opportunity for the parties to make observations on the applications; the determination of eligibility for 'victim status' would be an exclusive or to a large extent unilateral judicial responsibility. The Chamber could (i) provide the parties with partial information for observations but not with the applications themselves; (ii) seek submissions on relevant legal issues, without sharing the applications; or (iii) give the parties no opportunity to make observations at all.[179] This solution would require amendment of Rule 89(1), which makes the transmission of applications to the parties mandatory. It would impact neither on the application process as experienced by the victims nor on the judicial workload, but the Registry would be relieved from the burdensome job of redacting the applications.[180] The major objection to this option, expressed by the OPCD, related to the fact that the parties would be deprived of the right to be heard and to the negative impact on the defence rights.[181] Furthermore, this solution might not result in time-saving in the long term, as it merely defers the possibility for the parties to make submissions on the applications until after the start of the trial. This also means that the status of victims would be uncertain throughout the proceedings, which could cause distress for the victims in case their 'provisional' status is withdrawn along the way.[182]

Finally, the sixth avenue envisions keeping the application process within the timeframe of the pre-confirmation process and establishing a firm deadline after

[174] Ibid., para. 46. [175] Ibid., paras 48–9. [176] Ibid., paras 50–1.

[177] ICC Report on the Implementation of the Revised Victim Strategy (n 135) para. 32 (in Lubanga appeal process and in Ntaganda pre-trial the VPRS notified its reports on victim applications to the parties). Cf. ICC Report of the Review of Application System (n 42) para. 56.

[178] ICC Report of the Review of Application System (n 42) para. 53. [179] Ibid., paras 55–6.

[180] Ibid., paras 59–60. [181] Ibid., para. 61. [182] Ibid., paras 62–3.

which no applications could be received and taken into consideration, unless the scope of charges is broadened.[183] This approach is meant to address defence complaints that a large number of applications coming in during the trial impacts on the right of the accused to have adequate time and facilities to prepare.[184] The problem is of a general character, but it took a particularly disturbing dimension in Bemba.[185] Pre-Trial Chambers could be given the role of sole decision-makers with regard to the status of victims at all stages of process, even after the case proceeds to trial. The Court deemed the amendment of Rule 89(1) and Regulation 86 necessary to provide authority for the imposition of a global deadline for the submission of the applications, with the amendment of Article 68(3) possibly being necessary. In addition, it had to be explored whether the delegation of full responsibility for handling applications to Pre-Trial Chambers was possible under Articles 39, 57, 61, and 64. The expected consequences of instituting a deadline for receipt of applications for the sustainability and efficiency of the system are that the considerable resources would be spared by the Trial Chamber and by the parties (only during the trial phase), but the capacities of the Pre-Trial Chambers would have to be increased. Sufficient time would be needed prior to the confirmation hearing for processing the applications, which might conflict with the right of the accused to be tried without undue delay.[186] Finally, the solution could also severely limit the number of incoming applications, depending on the length of the pre-confirmation phase.

It can be inferred from the report that the Court is keenly aware of the fact that the current application system is not sustainable with the resources at its disposal.[187] However, the report did not recommend the immediate adoption of any of the options identified; instead, the ICC indicated that '[i]t is unlikely that one option would suit all situations and cases' and, before the legal, financial, and practical implications of those options are evaluated, it would be 'premature to recommend a specific option at this stage'.[188] At the same time, the solutions suggesting that the Court's capacities should be increased were considered unattractive or not viable, considering the likely opposition by States Parties. The Court paid relatively little attention to the bifurcated solution tested by the Trial Chamber in the Kenya cases, which was due to its novelty at the time the report was finalized. The Kenya approach was not included qua a separate option, but its 'collective aspect' was mentioned under the third option ('fully collective approach'), which means that it can be classified as one of the possible combinations the Court proposed to experiment with. Arguably, the report implicitly confirms that the Kenya Trial Chamber

[183] Ibid., paras 65–6.

[184] Ibid., para. 66. See e.g. Defence Response to the Third Transmission of Victims' Applications for Participation in the Proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-945, Defence, ICC, 11 October 2010, paras 7–12; Defence Observations on the 'Fourth Transmission to the parties and legal representatives of redacted versions of applications for participation in the proceedings', Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-968, Defence, ICC, 22 October 2010, para. 5.

[185] See e.g. WCRO Report on application system (n 109) 19. The same problem, occurring on a lesser scale, was reported in the Lubanga trial: Chung (n 24) 490–1.

[186] ICC Report of the Review of Application System (n 42) paras 69 and 70.

[187] Ibid., para. 72.

[188] Ibid., paras 20 and 74.

went beyond what was allowed under the Rules by introducing the 'registration' process.[189]

The Court's balanced and cautious approach to defining the optimal avenue corresponds to the position adopted by respectable victim rights organizations and court monitors. For example, REDRESS expressed a view that 'none of the proposals are easy solutions that would provide a quick fix to any of the efficiency challenges noted in relation to ongoing proceedings.'[190] Similarly, the Victims' Rights Working Group (VWRG) pointed out the need for 'careful scrutiny of the far-reaching consequences potential changes may have on the rights of victims as set out in the Rome Statute'; it acknowledged that none of the approaches is perfect and urged the Court 'to further assess [the] impact for each of the options put forward'.[191] Further, REDRESS considered that the 'fully collective approach' is the one that 'would appear to significantly deviate from the current statutory framework and, in the context of conflict situations and diverging victim affiliations and identities, may further alienate certain victims from the Court and detract from the overall goal of victim participation'.[192] The VWRG also echoed concerns registered by the Court about the fully collective approach.[193] Court monitors have viewed the 'tiered approach' introduced in the Kenya cases as most promising, although they recognized that it might have downsides and that its implications had to be carefully assessed, considering the feedback from the parties and stakeholders.[194] Among the more comprehensive solutions that were employed in Gbagbo and in Kenya, the WCRO firmly endorsed the latter approach as actually 'the only feasible solution'.[195] It considered the optimization measures identified by the Court as half-hearted and incapable of addressing the efficiency problem on their own.[196] The independent panel of experts expressed a preference for the Ntaganda solution (a one-page form) and opined that there should be a possibility for victims to add any other relevant information.[197] While the use of a shortened form would, in the panel's view, spare victims the effort and economize court resources,[198] the panel did not envisage providing collective applications forms under the 'partly collective' approach. Nor did it clarify how it expected a one-page form to be sufficient for obtaining all the information required for smooth operation of the individualized vetting process under current Rule 89.

[189] Ibid., paras 39(3) n 30 (comparing the third sub-option under the 'fully collective approach' to decisions in the Kenya cases) and 41–2 (on the possibly necessary amendments to Art 68(3), Rule 89(1), and Regulation 86).

[190] REDRESS (n 8) 40.

[191] ICC at 10: The Implementation of Victims Right. Issues and Concerns presented on the Occasion of the 11th Session of the ASP, Victims' Rights Working Group, 14–22 November 2012 ('VRWG Report') <http://www.vrwg.org/VRWG%20Documents/201114_VRWG_ASP11-ENGLISH-VERSION.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014, 7.

[192] REDRESS (n 8) 40. [193] VRWG Report (n 191) 8.

[194] REDRESS (n 8) 40. See also VRWG Report (n 191) 8–9 (opposing 'attempts at discouraging victims to apply to appear in person or register.').

[195] WCRO Report on Application System (n 109) 50 and 54. [196] Ibid., 51–60.

[197] Independent Panel of Experts (n 22) paras 65–6 (e.g. narrative responses relating to the requirements of Rule 85, possible protection concerns, choice of legal representation, and events).

[198] Ibid., paras 65–6.

45.3.2 Participation at trial: key modalities

Under the Article 68(3) regime, victim participants enjoy a broad range of procedural rights and opportunities that may be exercised through their (common) legal representative during the trial stage. The ICC's legal framework and jurisprudence recognize a range of forms of direct and indirect participation, some of which may be used both during the confirmation and trial. These include the attendance of and participation in hearings (Rule 91(2)); right to access and receive notification of all public filings and those confidential filings which concern them (as identified by the parties); the right to consult trial records of the proceedings, subject to any restrictions concerning confidentiality and the protection of national security information (Rule 131(2)); making opening and closing statements (Rule 89(1)); advancing oral and written submissions upon leave (Rule 91(2)); presentation of views and concerns upon leave (Article 68(3)); questioning witnesses through legal representatives, subject to the Chamber's authorization (Rule 91(3)); providing testimonial evidence (dual status); calling evidence relating to reparations during the trial under Regulation 56 Regulations of the Court; leading and challenging the admissibility evidence to guilt or innocence and challenging the admissibility of such evidence. This section will discuss the three modalities that best illustrate what rationales the victim participation has served in practice and how the Chambers have construed the victims' procedural role.

45.3.2.1 Views and concerns

The expression of 'views and concerns' is a mode of victim participation that is expressly mentioned in Article 68(3). It may be allowed, provided that (i) the victims' personal interests are affected; (ii) the stage of the proceedings is appropriate for such participation; and (iii) it would not be prejudicial to or inconsistent with the rights of the accused and a fair and impartial trial. The ICC's legal framework does not define what 'views and concerns' mean. Although it could imply a default, catch-all mode of participation under Article 68(3), it is uncertain how it correlates with the modalities foreseen in the Rules detailing that Article. For instance, are the possibilities for the legal representatives to deliver opening and closing statements, to question witnesses and experts, and to make an application for that end to be considered as the ways of expressing 'views and concerns', or are these distinct participation modalities?[199]

As noted elsewhere, the language 'views and concerns' was drawn directly from the 1985 UN Declaration, without a meaningful attempt to decipher the term.[200] In the early Lubanga jurisprudence, Judge Pikis of the Appeals Chamber expressed the opinion that 'views and concerns' should be interpreted as 'highly qualified participation' intrinsically linked to 'personal interests', i.e. not going to the prerogatives of the parties.[201]

[199] Rule 89(1) ICC RPE ('the Chamber shall then specify the proceedings and manner in which participation is considered appropriate, which may include making opening and closing statements'); Rule 91(3)(a) ICC RPE.

[200] On the meaning of 'views and concerns', see Vasiliev (n 26) 653–4.

[201] Separate opinion of Judge Georghios M Pikis, Lubanga appeal decision on joint application of victims (n 57) para. 15 ('Victims are not made parties to the proceedings nor can they proffer or advance anything other than their "views and concerns"').

In later jurisprudence, Trial Chambers have distinguished 'views and concerns' from testimony and have given the former a narrow interpretation, but along different lines than Judge Pikis.

The Lubanga Trial Chamber held that Article 68(3) makes it clear that 'victims have the right to participate directly in the proceedings', since it also provides that the views and concerns may otherwise be presented by a legal representative.[202] But it also admitted that 'the personal appearance of a large number of victims could affect the expeditiousness and fairness of the proceedings, and . . . that the victims' common views and concerns may sometimes be better presented by a common legal representative (i.e. for reasons of language, security or expediency)'.[203] The Chamber ruled that it would decide in due course whether to allow joint representation and joint presentation of views and concerns by legal representatives at any particular stage in the proceedings.[204] During the trial, the legal representative requested the Chamber to permit three participants to appear in person to present 'views and concerns' and to give testimony under oath.[205] The Chamber observed that the personal participation must not have a negative impact on the trial, and allowed victims to testify and decide after testimony whether they still wished to present their 'views and concerns'.[206] It considered that there is a 'critical distinction' between 'views and concerns' and testimony as 'possible means of placing material before the Chamber'. The former is equivalent to presenting submissions that might assist the Chamber in its approach to evidence but do not amount to evidence, unlike testimony which does contribute to the evidentiary record and may only be given by victims under oath from the witness box.[207] The choice between the expression of views and concerns, in person or through a legal representative, and giving evidence must be carefully considered, whereas in the case of presenting both, any repetition must be avoided. The choice between the two modes is case-specific and informed by the circumstances of the trial.[208] The role of legal representatives is crucial in assisting victims to decide on the 'most appropriate form of participation'.[209] Implicitly, the Chamber showed a preference for receiving the victims' submissions qua evidence rather than qua 'views and concerns'; presumably, the latter have no probative value and cannot be used for the purpose of the decision under Article 74.[210] In the trial, as the victims concerned were allowed to give evidence, their applications to present 'views and concerns' were adjourned and not renewed.[211]

The Katanga and Ngudjolo Chamber held that '[e]xcept for provisions such as those of rule 91 of the Rules, which provide for certain modalities of participation, the founding texts do not provide an exhaustive definition of the terms "views and [202] Lubanga decision on victim participation at trial (n 72) para. 115. [203] Ibid., para. 116.

[204] Ibid., para. 116.
[205] Decision on the request by victims a/0225/06, a/0229/06, and a/0270/07 to express their views and concerns in person and to present evidence during the trial, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2032-Anx, TC I, ICC, 26 June 2009, paras 1 and 4.
[206] Ibid., paras 39–40. [207] Ibid., para. 25. [208] Ibid., paras 26–7.
[209] Ibid., para. 40.
[210] Art 74(2) ICC Statute ('The Court may base its decision only on evidence submitted and discussed before it at the trial', Emphasis added).
[211] Lubanga trial judgment (n 1) para. 485.

concerns", and each Chamber has the discretion to define their content according to the specific circumstances of the case before it'.[212] According to the Chamber, the factors relevant to its determination of the most appropriate modalities of participation included, for example, 'the nature and scope of the charges, the number of victims taking part in the proceedings and the degree of similarity between their respective interests, as well as the manner in which they are represented'.[213] The Trial Chamber refrained from drawing a line between 'views and concerns' and victim testimony, but it ruled that requesting the submission of incriminating or exculpatory evidence and challenging the admissibility of such evidence are 'a means for the victims to express their "views and concerns" within the meaning of Article 68(3)'.[214] No 'views and concerns', as a sui generis form of victim participation that could pursue other purposes, were contemplated for the purpose of the Katanga and Ngudjolo trial. Unlike the Lubanga Chamber, Trial Chamber II did not authorize the expression of 'views and concerns' as a self-standing, non-adjectival procedural action. Hence, this modality had no autonomous function or content and merely served as a vehicle for the victims to request the submission of evidence on the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

By contrast, in Bemba, Trial Chamber III did distinguish the presentation of 'views and 'concerns' as an autonomous modality and set the procedure to be followed in case the legal representatives wished the victims to be allowed to participate in this manner. The Chamber held that this mode of participation might take the form of unsworn statements. In order for the participants to be allowed to present their views and concerns to the Chamber, the legal representatives were to file written applications setting out (i) the manner in which the victims' views and concerns are to be presented (e.g. in person pursuant to Rule 89 of the Rules or in writing); (ii) the estimated time needed; (iii) how the personal interests of the participating victims would be affected by the presentation of their views and concerns to the Chamber; (iv) the request for public presentation or presentation with in-court protective measures; and (v) whether the victims are persons authorized to participate in the trial, and if so, the application numbers under which those persons are registered.[215] After the legal representatives requested to allow 17 victims to appear for the presentation of evidence and/or views and concerns, the Bemba Chamber ordered them to select a maximum of 8 'relevant victims'. The 'relevance' is to be determined based on whether the victims are:

> (i) best-placed to assist the Chamber in the determination of the truth in this case; (ii) able to present evidence and/or views and concerns that affect the personal interests of the greatest number of participating victims; (iii) best-placed to present testimony that will not be cumulative of that which has already been presented in this case; and

[212] Decision on the Modalities of Victim Participation at Trial, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1788-tENG, TC II, ICC, 22 January 2010 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial'), para. 53.

[213] Ibid., para. 54. [214] Ibid., para. 82.

[215] Order regarding applications by victims to present their views and concerns or to present evidence, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1935, TC III, ICC, 21 November 2011, para. 3(c).

(iv) willing for their identity to be disclosed to the parties in the event that they are permitted to testify and/or present their views and concerns.[216]

Notably, these criteria emphasize that, in order to appear in person, the victims are expected to make a contribution to the effective and efficient establishment of the truth in the case and to provide relevant evidence and/or views and concerns that are sufficiently reflective of the personal interests of broader classes of victims.

The subsequent decisions of the Bemba Chamber clarified further the meaning and scope of 'views and concerns'. In line with the Lubanga Decision, Trial Chamber III held that individual victims are not precluded from submitting an application to present their views and concerns in person.[217] It adopted Trial Chamber I's distinction between the expression of 'views and concerns' and giving evidence. In elaborating on it, the Bemba Chamber found that the threshold to be met by a victim wishing to testify is 'significantly higher' than that applicable to requests to express their views and concerns in person.[218] Hence, victims whose application to testify was declined might still be allowed to express 'views and concerns'.[219] The need to ensure expeditious proceedings requires the Chamber to 'determine which victims shall be authorised to present their views and concerns in person', which is, as the Lubanga Chamber ruled, a fact-specific decision that is to take into account 'the circumstances of the trial as a whole'.[220] The legal test to be applied in considering a victim's application to present views and concerns is then 'whether the personal interests of the individual victims are affected and whether the accounts expected to be provided are representative of a larger number of victims', considering 'the nature of the harm suffered and the location of the events alleged by the victims who were proposed to express their views and concerns'.[221] On this basis, the Chamber ultimately authorized three victims to present their views and concerns in person, out of five victims who were allowed to appear.[222] The relevant victims were to express their views and concerns not under oath and they were not to be questioned on the detail, but only to be guided by their legal representative. The Chamber requested the victims to focus on the harm suffered and on the impact of the alleged crimes on their lives.[223]

In the Kenya cases, the Chamber interpreted 'views and concerns' both as an umbrella or catch-all term encompassing any mode of participation pursuant to Article 68(3) and a distinct form of oral submissions. As noted, the framework decision on victim participation that introduced the novel application system categorized victims based on the type of participation sought: those who wished to present their 'views and concerns' in person and those participating through a common legal [216] Second order regarding the applications of the legal representatives of victims to present evidence and the views and concerns of victims, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2027, TC III, ICC, 21 December 2011, para. 12.

[217] Decision on the supplemented applications by the legal representatives of victims to present evidence and the views and concerns of victims, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2138, TC III, ICC, 22 February 2012 ('Bemba decision on supplemented applications'), para. 17.

[218] Ibid., para. 20. [219] Ibid., para. 20. [220] Ibid., para. 22. [221] Ibid., para. 22.

[222] Ibid., para. 55(b).

[223] Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-227-Red, TC III, ICC, 25 June 2010, 21–2; Transcript, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-228-Red, TC III, ICC, 26 June 2010, 10.

representative.[224] This categorization reflects a broader understanding of the term. As for the victims 'wishing to present their views individually by appearing directly before the Chamber, in person or via video-link', the Chamber held that it would be allowed to do so at certain stages of trial and in the manner determined by the Court, which might include opening and closing statements.[225] In that case, the common legal representative is to submit a request on their behalf 'explaining why they are considered to be best placed to reflect the interests of the victims, together with a detailed summary of the aspects that will be addressed by each victim if authorised to present his or her views and concerns'.[226] If the application is granted, the victim may be allowed to present his or her 'views and concerns' (in a narrow sense) next to oral submissions by the common legal representative at 'critical junctures', for example, during opening and closing statements.[227] Importantly, the Chamber required the legal representative to justify why, besides showing that 'personal interests' of the victim are at stake, the victim is also able to represent the general 'interests of the victims'. As shown previously, this qualification was also advanced by the Bemba Chamber.[228] Effectively, this reads an additional requirement into the Article 68(3) test—namely, that the expected expression of views and concerns by an individual victim should reflect the interests of a broader victim group or community—and is a step away from the individualized participation towards a more representative, collectivized participation.

Hence, in the trial practice thus far, the nature and scope of 'views and concerns'—a general and default mode of participation, whether through a legal representative or in person—have been subject to divergent interpretations across the Chambers. Most Chambers construed it as personal participation by a victim in the form of making oral submissions in Court and a modality independent from the presentation of evidence. But some Chambers gave it a narrow interpretation for the purpose of the trial process and limited it to requests to submit evidence under Article 69(3). Overall, this form of participation has not played a prominent role in practice and has been but a secondary way for victims to contribute to the proceedings. It has been overshadowed by the manners of participation such as leading and challenging the admissibility of evidence, which judges have regarded as more effective for establishing the truth because, unlike with testimony, views and concerns may not serve as a basis for the judgment. Furthermore, the opportunity to express 'views and concerns' was in any event made contingent on the ability of such views to contribute to truth-finding and to represent the personal interests of the 'greatest number of participating victims'.

45.3.2.2 Leading and challenging the admissibility of evidence

Neither Article 68(3) nor other provisions in the Statute authorize victims to call and challenge the admissibility of evidence on the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and 'views and concerns' as the default mode of participation does not lend itself to the interpretation that the victims have this right. However, in all cases to date, the ICC

[224] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 25.
[225] See e.g. ibid., para. 56 and n 30. [226] Ibid., para. 56. [227] Ibid., para. 73.
[228] See text accompanying supra n 216.

Trial Chambers have allowed the legal representatives to present such evidence and to challenge its admissibility, subject to the Chamber's authorization and the Article 68(3) requirements.[229] The Trial Chambers have uniformly done so with reference to their power to require the submission of all evidence considered necessary for the determination of the truth pursuant to Article 69(3).

The anchorage of victims' evidentiary role to the Trial Chamber's truth-finding competences amounts to an expansive and inventive interpretation of the ICC's legal framework, but it is also rather controversial.[230] This sudden turn in the ICC's case law must have perplexed commentators at the time.[231] First, Articles 69(3) and 64(8)(b) provide that the parties—i.e. the prosecution and the defence—may submit evidence. The second sentence of Article 69(3) explicitly authorizes the parties to submit evidence and does not mention victims. Arguably, the Chamber's power to request the submission of evidence in addition to that already presented must be subject to the provisions establishing who is competent to submit evidence. Furthermore, Article 64(6)(d) authorizes the Chamber to '[o]rder the production of evidence in addition to that already collected prior to the trial or presented during the trial by the parties'. Second, the pre-2008 appellate jurisprudence was moving in an opposite direction, as some of the earlier judgments and individual opinions sought to draw a clearer distinction between the 'personal interests' of victims and those pursued by the prosecution. In 2007 the Appeals Chamber held that > any determination by the Appeals Chamber of whether the personal interests of victims are affected in relation to a particular appeal will require careful consideration on a case-by-case basis. Clear examples of where the personal interests of victims are affected are when their protection is in issue and in relation to proceedings for reparations. More generally, an assessment will need to be made in each case as to whether the interests asserted by victims do not, in fact, fall outside their personal interests and belong instead to the role assigned to the Prosecutor.[232]

In a separate opinion from that decision, which conceptualized 'views and concerns' as 'highly qualified participation', Judge Pikis drew a clear line between the personal interests of victims and the interests of the prosecution:

> In relation to what can victims express their views and concerns? Not in relation to the proof of the case or the advancement of the defence. The burden of proof of [229] Lubanga decision on victim participation at trial (n 72) para. 108, upheld in Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74) paras 93–105; Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 212) paras 81–101, upheld in Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Katanga against the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 22 January 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Modalities of Victim Participation at Trial', Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2288, AC, ICC, 16 July 2010, paras 37–40; Corrigendum to Decision on the participation of victims in the trial and on 86 applications by victims to participate in the proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-807-Corr, TC III, ICC, 12 July 2010 ('Bemba victim participation decision'), paras 29 and 36; Bemba, Order regarding applications by victims to present their views and concerns or to present evidence (n 215) para. 17; Bemba decision on supplemented applications (n 217) paras 10–18; Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 77.

[230] See also Friman (n 14) 494 ('a clever construct, but one that prompts a number of questions').

[231] Cf. Friman (n 11) 229; Vasiliev (n 26) 653–4 (favouring a narrow interpretation of 'views and concerns').

[232] Lubanga appeal decision on joint application of victims (n 57) para. 28.

> the guilt of the accused lies squarely with the Prosecutor (Art 66 (2) of the Statute). Provision is made in the Statute (Art 54 (1)) for the Prosecutor to seek and obtain information from victims about the facts surrounding the crime or crimes forming the subject-matter of the proceedings…. It is not the victims' domain either to reinforce the prosecution or dispute the defence. Participating victims' views and concerns are referable to the cause that legitimizes their participation, the cause that distinguishes them from other victims, namely their personal interests to the extent they are affected by the proceedings.[233]

However, the Lubanga Trial Chamber, which pioneered the notion of 'evidence called by the victims', based it not on any entitlement of participating victims to that effect in the ICC Statute or Rules but on the power of the Chamber to request the submission of all evidence necessary for the determination of the truth:

> the right to introduce evidence during trials before the Court is not limited to the parties, not least because the Court has a general right (that is not dependent on the cooperation or the consent of the parties) to request the presentation of all evidence necessary for the determination of the truth, pursuant to Article 69(3) of the Statute.... [V]ictims participating in the proceedings may be permitted to tender and examine evidence if in the view of the Chamber it will assist it in the determination of the truth, and if in this sense the Court has 'requested' the evidence.[234]

This rationale for victims' role in truth-finding, intimately linked to the Chamber's ex officio power, was endorsed by the Appeals Chamber and adopted without reservation—and with an overbearing emphasis on the epistemic objective—by Trial Chamber II:

> the only legitimate interest the victims may invoke when seeking to establish the facts which are subject of the proceedings is that of contributing to the determination of the truth by helping the Chamber to establish what exactly happened. They may do so by providing it with their knowledge of the background to the case or by drawing its attention to relevant information of which it was not aware. In the latter case, the Chamber may also deem it appropriate for a particular victim to testify in person.[235]

The opportunity for participating victims to call incriminating or exonerating evidence or to challenge its admissibility is not a manner of expressing 'views and concerns', but an autonomous form of participation de-linked from the Article 68(3) regime and deriving from Article 69(3). It hinges on, and is justified by, the expected contribution of such evidence (or admissibility challenges) to the establishment of the truth. The primary consideration behind allowing victims to present evidence is that this should assist the Chamber in discharging its truth-finding function. In addition, the Lubanga Trial Chamber held that Rule 91(3), which authorizes legal representatives to question witnesses with leave of the Chamber, including experts and the defendant, does not limit this right to witnesses called by the parties. While under that Rule victims may be authorized by the Chamber to participate in the questioning of witnesses through legal representatives, it is a tenuous legal ground at best to assert their competence to lead evidence. If the Statute's drafters did not intend victims to be able to do so in the first place, there would be no reason for them to add a limitation to Rule 91(3) from the absence of which the Lubanga Trial Chamber drew support for its construction.

[233] Separate Opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, Lubanga appeal decision on joint application of victims (n 57) para. 16.

[234] Lubanga decision on victim participation at trial (n 72) para. 108.

[235] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 212) para. 60. See also paras 65, 82–4, 91, and 96. Further, see Directions for the conduct of the proceedings and testimony in accordance with Rule 140, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1665, TC II, ICC, 20 November 2009 ('Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions'), para. 20 (legal representatives will be allowed to call one or more of their clients to testify in person if the proposed testimony 'can make a genuine contribution to the ascertainment of the truth').

The Appeals Chamber's majority upheld the Lubanga trial decision on the issue of evidence, but its judgment was accompanied by strong dissents from Judge Pikis and Judge Kirsch.[236] The majority acknowledged that the right to lead evidence pertaining to guilt or innocence and the right to challenge its admissibility lies primarily with the parties, referring to 'numerous provisions which support this interpretation'.[237] The majority also pointed out that the disclosure regime in the Statute and Rules is addressed to the parties alone and does not envisage disclosure by victims. It found that '[p]resumptively, it is the Prosecutor's function to lead evidence of the guilt of the accused', but concluded nonetheless that victims are not precluded from leading or challenging the admissibility of such evidence.[238] According to the majority, Article 66(3), which stipulates that in order to convict, the Court 'must be convinced of the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt', is determinative of the issue. The provisions granting judges the power to call additional evidence and/or all evidence necessary for the determination of the truth (Articles 64(6)(d) and 69(3), second sentence) prevail over those regarding the onus of proof and the presentation of evidence by the parties (Articles 64(8)(b), 66(2), and 69(3), first sentence).[239] Second, the majority considered that in order to 'give effect to the spirit and intention of article 68(3) of the Statute in the context of trial proceedings it must be interpreted so as to make participation by victims meaningful'.[240] Because evidence that does not go to guilt or innocence would 'most likely be considered inadmissible and irrelevant', precluding victims generally from leading or challenging the admissibility of such evidence would have rendered their participatory rights at trial 'ineffectual'. This reasoning is speculative and erroneous, as it advances a groundless limitation on the competence of the Trial Chamber to determine the admissibility of evidence.[241]

[236] Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Georghios M Pikis, Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74); Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Philippe Kirsch, Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74), ICC-01/04-01/06-1432-Anx, AC, ICC, 24 July 2008 ('Lubanga partly dissenting opinion of Judge Kirsch').

[237] Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74) para. 93 (including Arts 15, 53, 54, 58, and 61(5) ICC Statute and Art 66(2), which imposes the onus to prove guilt on the prosecutor).

[238] Ibid., paras 93–4. [239] Ibid., para. 95. [240] Ibid., para. 97.

[241] Art 64(9)(a) ICC Statute ('The Trial Chamber shall have, inter alia, the power on application of the party or on its own motion to… [r]ule on the admissibility or relevance of evidence') and Art 69(4) ICC Statute (referring to the Court rather than the Chamber).

This also inappositely excludes from admissible and relevant evidence any items that may be relevant to sentencing and reparations (e.g. going to the scope and nature of harm suffered by the victims)—the evidence that may be presented not only during separate post-conviction hearings but also during trial.[242]

The Appeals Chamber's majority held that leading evidence and challenging its admissibility is not an unfettered right of victims, but an opportunity that is subject to the Trial Chamber's authorization in each instance. Considering the imperative need to guarantee fairness for the accused and to place the onus of proof squarely on the prosecution, the Trial Chamber may exercise its discretion to allow victim evidence subject to (i) a discrete application; (ii) notice to the parties; (iii) demonstration that personal interests are affected by the specific proceedings; (iv) compliance with disclosure obligations and protection orders; (v) determination of appropriateness; and (vi) consistency with the rights of the accused and a fair trial.[243] It is true that Trial Chambers' tight control over this form of participation is crucial and that this legal test enables them to exercise such control. Still, the Appeals Chamber's position is difficult to reconcile with the logic of its previous pronouncement that 'personal interests' of victims should be distinguished from the prosecutor's interests;[244] it is regrettable that the contradiction is nowhere addressed.

Judge Pikis dissented from the majority's position and adhered to his previous view regarding the distinction between the victims' role and the prosecutorial function. In rejecting the notion of the victims' evidence, he referred to the provisions of the Statute reserving the right to submit evidence to the parties and placing the burden of proof on the prosecution, and emphasized the defendant's right not to be confronted with multiple accusers.[245] Similarly, Judge Kirsch pointed out that the ICC legal framework assigns the role of leading the evidence relevant to the verdict exclusively to the parties. The absence of disclosure obligations incumbent on participating victims from the Statute and Rules plainly confirms that they were not intended by the drafters to lead evidence.[246] According to the judge, the related safeguards do not mitigate the concern that leading evidence as to the guilt or innocence does not comport with the ordinary meaning of 'views and concerns'. His reasons deserve to be quoted at length:

> On an ordinary understanding of those words, they do not equate to an ability to lead evidence on guilt. It would . . . be perfectly legitimate for victims to present their views and concerns in relation to the evidence submitted by the parties where it affects their personal interests. However, there is a sizeable difference between presenting their views and concerns in relation to issues that arise at the [242] Art 76(1) ICC Statute ('In the event of conviction, the Trial Chamber shall consider the appropriate sentence to be imposed and shall take into account the evidence presented and submissions made during the trial that are relevant to the sentence'); Regulation 56 Regulations of the Court ('The Trial Chamber may hear the witnesses and examine the evidence for the purposes of a decision on reparations in accordance with Article 75, paragraph 2, at the same time as for the purposes of trial').

[243] Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74) para. 104.

[244] See text accompanying supra n 232.

[245] Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Georghios M Pikis, Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74) paras 5 et seq.

[246] Lubanga partly dissenting opinion of Judge Philippe Kirsch (n 236) paras 5 et seq.

> trial that affect the personal interests of victims and presenting a prosecution case by leading additional evidence—independent of that led by the Prosecutor—on guilt.... Far from lending support to the idea that victims should be permitted independently to lead evidence on guilt, [Rule 91(3)] emphasises... the more limited role that was assigned to the victims during the course of a trial, when compared with that provided to the parties. Rule 91 falls within a subsection of the Rules relating specifically to the participation of victims in the proceedings.... [T]here is no reference to victims leading evidence pertaining to guilt or innocence in rule 91 itself or within the section of the Rules in which it appears. On a matter of such fundamental importance, a provision to deal with this subject would have been expressly included, had it been the intention of the drafters for victims to lead such evidence.[247]

As for the right to challenge the admissibility and relevance of evidence, Judge Kirsch was of the view that such routine challenges would be inappropriate, but in limited circumstances where the submission of evidence by the parties affects the victims' personal interests, they may allowed to express their views and concerns.[248]

This discussion says enough about the controversy of victims' evidence, even though this notion is now well established in practice. During the Lubanga trial, three participating victims testified in January 2010 and evidence was presented on behalf of the school with a status of victim prior to the presentation of the defence case.[249] The Katanga and Ngudjolo Trial Chamber heard the testimony of two victims called by legal representatives between 21 and 25 February 2011, after the prosecution concluded its case.[250] In the Bemba trial, two victims called by the legal representatives testified in early May 2012.[251] The Trial Chambers have handed down detailed guidelines with the requirements applicable to any requests by legal representatives to call evidence, namely that they should clarify the relevance of the proposed testimony of the victim to the issues in the case and illustrate its supposed contribution to the establishment of the truth.[252] The relevant considerations include whether (i) 'the proposed testimony relates to matters that were already addressed by the Prosecution in the presentation of its case or would be unnecessarily repetitive of evidence already tendered by the parties'; (ii) the topic on which the victim proposes to testify is sufficiently closely related to issues raised by the charges before the Chamber; (iii) the proposed testimony is 'typical of a larger group of participating victims, who have had similar experiences as the victim who wishes to testify, or whether the victim is uniquely apt to give evidence about a particular matter'; and (iv) 'the testimony will [247] Ibid., paras 30 and 32. [248] Ibid., paras 36–8.

[249] Lubanga trial judgment (n 1) para. 21; Lubanga, Decision on the request by victims a/0225/06... (n 205) para. 44.

[250] Ngudjolo trial judgment (n 1) para. 23; Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) paras 5 and 24.

[251] See testimonies of CAR-V20-PPPP-0001 and CAR-V20-PPPP-0002: Transcripts, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-220-ENG, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-221-Red-ENG, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-222-ENG, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-223-Red-ENG, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-224-ENG, ICC-01/05-01/08-T-225-ENG, TC III, ICC, 1-7 May 2012.

[252] Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) para. 30; Bemba decision on supplemented applications (n 217) paras 24–5.

likely bring to light substantial new information that is relevant to issues which the Chamber must consider in its assessment of the charges'.[253]

The testimony of victims may be permitted upon a written application that is to be filed prior to the conclusion of the prosecution case.[254] The primary concern for the judges is that the victim's testimony must take place in an expeditious manner not prejudicial to or inconsistent with the rights of the accused and a fair and impartial trial.[255] More specifically, such testimony should not (i) infringe the right of the accused to be tried without undue delay as per Article 67(1)(c); (ii) effectively amount to auxiliary prosecution; or (iii) consist in an anonymous testimony vis-à-vis the defence.[256] The testimony may not come as an 'unfair surprise' to the defence, which is entitled to disclosure and adequate time for preparation.[257] Therefore, the legal representative's request is to be accompanied by a signed statement by the victim, containing a comprehensive summary of the proposed testimony that is to be disclosed to the parties under Regulation 54(f) in case the application is granted.[258] Legal representatives should avoid redactions in the statements other than those necessary to protect the safety, or physical or psychological well-being of the victims or third persons; such redactions are subject to authorization by the Chamber.[259]

Although evidence called by victims is now mainstream practice at the ICC, it remains one of its most questionable aspects. The possibility for the victims, as participants rather than parties, to lead evidence relevant to the verdict borders on the prerogative of parties; this makes the differentiation between parties and participants elusive.[260] The 'personal interest' of victims in connection with the verdict (in essence, the interest in obtaining the verdict of guilty) has become judicially recognized.[261] As quasi-parties, victims dispose of the procedural means to pursue their cause through the submission of evidence that forms part of the 'victims' case' advanced by legal representatives, even though it is not a self-standing case but the one inextricably linked to the judicial authority to order evidence necessary for the ascertainment of the truth and, therefore, subordinate to that goal.[262]

[253] Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) para. 30.

[254] Ibid., para. 25; Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 212) para. 87.

[255] Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) para. 21.

[256] Ibid., para. 22. Reaffirming the third prong, see Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 212) para. 92.

[257] Ibid., para. 23.

[258] Ibid., para. 26. Both the application and the summary shall be notified to the parties who will have seven days to make observations (para. 28).

[259] Ibid., para. 27.

[260] See also Friman (n 14) 492 and 500.

[261] E.g. Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 212) para. 86 (allowing victims to testify after the prosecution case because 'the persons concerned will give evidence about the crimes with which the accused have been charged, and about any part played therein by the accused, [and] the Defence should be given the opportunity to present its case once all victims of the crimes to which the accused must answer have given their evidence, including any victims called by the Legal Representatives').

[262] Cf. Partly Dissenting Opinion of Judge Sylvia Steiner on the Decision on the supplemented applications by the legal representatives of victims to present evidence and the views and concerns of victims, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-2138, TC III, ICC, 23 February 2012 ('Bemba dissenting opinion of Judge Steiner'), para. 10 (rejecting 'the strict condition according to which the testimony of a victim "needs to be considered to make a genuine contribution to the ascertainment of the truth"').

The ultimate purpose and expected consequence of allowing victims to call evidence is for the Trial Chamber to emancipate itself, at least in part, from its dependency on the parties for evidence, by giving itself access to the victims' evidence casting the 'third perspective' on the issues at trial. Such may indeed be the evidence that none of the parties would be interested in calling, given that partisan interests are far from always aligned with the goal of establishing the truth. The latter also concerns the ICC prosecutor whose function as an impartial truth-seeker does not formally extend to trial proceedings.[263]

While the goal of enhancing the Trial Chamber's truth-finding capacity can be accepted as the rationale for authorizing victims to present evidence, there seems to be an ongoing confusion in the ICC's interpretation of that derived competence, which has also affected the legal test that the Chambers are using. On the one hand, both the Appeals Chamber and Trial Chambers went to great lengths to consistently de-link this procedural opportunity from the Article 68(3) regime, by anchoring it to the judicial authority under Article 69(3) to establish the truth. On the other hand, most of them—with the notable exception of the Katanga and Ngudjolo Chamber—have at the same time continued to require the participants to demonstrate that the proposed evidence is relevant to their 'personal interests'.[264] However, if Article 69(3) is a self-sufficient legal authority for allowing victims to call evidence, there is neither legal basis nor conceivable procedural rationale to limit it to evidence that affects or promotes 'personal interests', as long as it is conducive to truth-finding. Such limitation cannot be inferred from the controlling Article 69(3) and, moreover, the objective of 'determining the truth' is broader than, and not subordinate to, victims' 'personal interests'.

It is submitted that this incongruence lays bare the insecurity underlying the concept of 'victims' evidence' and the persisting uncertainty about the proper role of victims in the context of the ICC trial proceedings. Despite the mandate of the Chamber to order evidence necessary for the determination of the truth serving as the single main authority for allowing victims to present evidence going to the verdict, the Chambers still prefer to fall back on the Article 68(3) requirement of 'personal interests' in considering requests to submit evidence. One probable reason for that is the wish to avoid a discomforting impression that the Court is 'using' victims as evidentiary sources just as keenly as the ad hoc tribunals did—something that Judge Steiner has called a 'utilitarian approach towards the role of victims before the Court'.[265]

[263] Art 54(1)(a) ICC Statute. For further discussion, see S Vasiliev, 'Trial' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012) 708–9.

[264] E.g. Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 77. By contrast, TC II regarded requests for the submission of incriminating or exculpatory evidence pursuant to Art 69(3) as 'a means for the victims to express their "views and concerns" within the meaning of article 68(3) of the Statute', not the submission of such evidence in and of itself: Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 212) para. 82; Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) paras 19–30 (making no mention of 'personal interests' as the element that needs to be satisfied in order for the victims to present evidence).

[265] Bemba dissenting opinion of Judge Steiner (n 262) para. 11 (stating, regarding the requirement that victim evidence must constitute a genuine contribution to the establishment of the truth, that 'the strict limitations imposed by the Majority to the presentation of evidence by victims and the "case-by-case" analysis of the victims' right to present their views and concerns reflect a utilitarian approach towards the role of victims before the Court, which has no legal basis and appears to unreasonably restrict the

However, it would appear, following the Appeals and Trial Chamber's own logic, that 'personal interests' should not play any role in the determination of the requests to present evidence. This criterion is automatically met whenever a legal representative seeks to call evidence and hence is irrelevant to the determination. Establishing the truth, being the goal pursued by the Chamber in the exercise of its Article 69(3) power, is an essentially public interest, which may (or may not) coincide with the victims' 'personal interests'. Therefore, it is a procedurally incoherent and legally flawed approach for the Chambers to continue guising the presentation of evidence on behalf of participating victims under Article 69(3) as a manner for them to express their 'views and concerns' that is only allowed in pursuit of their 'personal interests'.

The Court's vision of the victims' evidentiary role and its reasoning underlying the treatment of relevant matters must be more transparent and unambiguous. The ICC Trial Chambers do in fact expect and appreciate the participating victims' contributions to the determination of the truth, which—both legally and theoretically speaking—is the only true rationale for allowing them to call evidence. The current thinking and equivocality at the Court are the signs of the phenomenon that can be called the 'restorative justice complex of a retributive court'. This refers to the flawed idea that it is unjustifiable or inappropriate for an institution, which is aspiring to mete out 'restorative justice' for the victims, to submit the principal aspects of their role and participation in the criminal process to the cornerstone goals and rationales of that process—i.e. not only to the demands of a fair trial, as expressly recognized in Article 68(3), but also to the basic goal of truth-finding. While the 'restorative justice complex' and its implications will be discussed later in the chapter, suffice it to say here that there are no cogent reasons for the ICC to be affected by it. The ICC does indeed benefit from the evidentiary contributions of victims, as it is essentially a victim-friendly, retributive (criminal) court, not a restorative justice institution—at least before the reparations stage. Being such, the Court 'makes it up' to participating victims by offering them other avenues through which they can pursue their personal interests in the procedural domain—including by expressing 'views and concerns' and by making themselves heard on the matters which squarely affect such interests (e.g. admissibility of certain evidence, protective measures, detention and interim release, and so on).

45.3.2.3 Questioning witnesses

Rule 91(3) authorizes legal representatives to participate in the examination of witnesses. Presumably, this is the best way for them to present victims' 'views and concerns'.[266] Like with other forms of participation at trial, this is not an unconditional right but one subject to judicial authorization pursuant to Article 68(3) and Rule 91(3)(b).[267] Rule 91(3) does not give specific guidance on the admissible scope and mode of such rights recognised for victims by the drafters of the Statute'). See also Bemba dissenting opinion of Judge Steiner, para. 14.

[266] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 229) para. 74.

[267] Rule 91(3)(b) ICC RPE ('The Chamber shall then issue a ruling on the request, taking into account the stage of the proceedings, the rights of the accused, the interests of witnesses, the need for a fair, impartial and expeditious trial and in order to give effect to Article 68, paragraph 3.').

questioning, and the Chambers hold a considerable discretion in this regard. As an aspect of the Article 68(3) regime, questioning by legal representatives should be confined by the scope of 'personal interests'. In defining the mode and scope of the questioning by legal representatives, the Trial Chambers should balance various interests at stake.

For example, the Lubanga Trial Chamber required a sufficient connection between the victims' personal interests and the testimony regarding historical and sociopolitical context of the crimes to be given by the Chamber expert whom the legal representatives requested to be allowed to question.[268] The Chamber found that victims had 'an undoubted interest in setting their personal experiences, and the harm it is said they individually experienced, in their true historical, economic, and social context' and therefore allowed legal representatives to 'explore such aspects of these background matters as are relevant to each of them provided, and to the extent, that the areas are relevant to, and are of assistance in, establishing the context in which the alleged crimes have been committed'.[269] In responding to the defence submission that 'personal interests' are not the same as general or public interests, the Chamber recalled that while 'general interest' is insufficient to allow questioning,[270] the 'personal interests' do not have to be 'unique or singular'.[271] It identified the substantive areas that could be addressed at questioning to the extent not already covered in testimony and not limited to the expert's written report.[272] The questioning on behalf of the participants was to be limited to (i) the issues and areas in which the victims have a personal interest; (ii) the context and history which is relevant to the charges the accused faces; and (iii) the matters within the expertise of the witness (not limited to the contents of the written report). The Chamber reminded of the imperative need for the questions to be 'proportionate, relevant and focused' and not to amount to 'submissions'.[273] During the defence phase of the Lubanga trial, the Chamber rejected the defence motion requesting it to formulate a different standard of 'personal interests' for the purpose of questioning of defence witnesses by the legal representatives.[274] It considered the existing safeguard that the manner and timing of their questioning must not be prejudicial as adequate and valid and held that this is a case-specific determination that may not be conducted in advance or generally.[275]

The character of admissible questions by legal representatives, in particular whether those may be leading questions like at cross-examination, received attention in the Lubanga case as well. In the course of a hearing, one of the legal [268] Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-193-ENG, TC I, ICC, 17 June 2009, 3–10.

[269] Ibid., 8.

[270] Lubanga decision on victim participation at trial (n 72) para. 96 ('A general interest in the outcome of the case or in the issues or evidence the Chamber will be considering… is likely to be insufficient').

[271] Lubanga transcript (n 268) 9. [272] Ibid., 9–10. [273] Id.

[274] Decision on the defence observations regarding the right of the legal representatives of victims to question defence witnesses and on the notion of personal interest -and- Decision on the defence application to exclude certain representatives of victims from the Chamber during the non-public evidence of various defence witnesses, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2340, TC I, ICC, 11 March 2010, paras 7 and 28.

[275] Ibid., para. 35.

representatives was instructed to refrain from posing questions 'suggestive of an answer' and to put neutral questions instead.[276] The instruction was followed up by a decision holding that a distinct role of legal representatives renders the common-law modes of questioning (examination-in-chief, cross-examination, and re-examination) not applicable.[277] Both the Trial and Appeals Chambers' jurisprudence connected the participatory rights of victims at trial, including the opportunity to question witnesses under Rule 91(3), to the purpose of 'assisting the bench in the pursuit of the truth' under Article 69(3).[278] Therefore, legal representatives were authorized to ask questions seeking to clarify or elicit evidence relevant to the victims' personal interests, whether going to the guilt or innocence of the accused.[279] The Chamber held that there is 'a presumption in favour of a neutral approach to questioning on behalf of victims', i.e. victims 'are less likely than the parties to need to resort to the more combative techniques of "cross-examination" '.[280] But where the views and concerns of the victims conflict with the evidence given by a witness, legal representatives may legitimately 'seek to press, challenge or discredit a witness' and to pose closed, leading, or challenging questions, depending on the interests affected and issues raised.[281] The reversible presumption in favour of neutral questioning requires a legal representative to make an oral request to the Chamber whenever he or she wishes to depart from it.[282] Essentially, this sui generis mode of questioning by legal representatives is akin to examination-in-chief that may turn into cross-examination of a hostile witness, since witnesses adverse to victims could be asked leading questions upon leave.

The Katanga and Ngudjolo Chamber's directives regarding the questioning by legal representatives reflect a stricter approach. As the Chamber held repeatedly, such questioning must mainly pursue the goal of determining the truth because victims are not parties and have no role in supporting the prosecution case.[283] Questions posed by legal representatives 'may be an important factor in helping the Chamber to better understand the contentious issues of the case in light of their local knowledge and socio-cultural background'.[284] The Chamber classified the questions likely to be posed by legal representatives into (i) questions asked under Article 75 concerning potential orders on reparations; (ii) anticipated questions; and (iii) unanticipated questions. With respect to the former type of questions, Rule [276] Transcript, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-T-169-ENG, TC I, ICC, 6 May 2009, 14.

[277] Decision on the Manner of Questioning Witnesses by the Legal Representatives of Victims, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2127, TC I, ICC, 16 September 2009 ('Lubanga decision on victims' questioning'), para. 24.

[278] Ibid., para. 27.

[279] Ibid., para. 26; Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74) para. 102.

[280] Lubanga decision on victims' questioning (n 277) para. 28.

[281] Ibid., paras 28–9.

[282] Ibid., para. 30.

[283] Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 229) para. 75; Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) para. 82; Transcript, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-87-Red-ENG, TC II, ICC, 30 November 2009, 33 ('the legal representatives of the victims are not supplemental prosecutors or part two of the Prosecution. . . . They are not to gather up all the various questions and bring them all together at the very end. If that role is to be played by anyone, it will be played by the Chamber').

[284] Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) para. 82.

91(4) on the questioning by legal representatives during hearings concerning reparations exempts them from the condition set out in Rule 91(2), i.e. the right of parties to make observations on the application.[285] The legal representative makes a written application, including an explanation of the purpose and scope of questions and documents to be used at questioning, which is notified to the parties.[286] For anticipated questions on matters other than reparations, the same protocol applies, except that parties are entitled to make observations under Rule 91(2).[287] The Chamber may also authorize the legal representative, subject to Rule 91(3)(b), to pose the question or do so on his or her behalf before cross-examination, if the matter has not been addressed sufficiently by the witness during examination-in-chief.[288] Unanticipated questions on unforeseen matters relevant to the interests of the victims and arising out of examination-in-chief may be put to the witness by the Chamber if necessary for ascertainment of truth or for clarification of testimony.[289] At trial, the Katanga and Ngudjolo Chamber posed three questions to the first prosecution witness after examination-in-chief and prior to cross-examination by the defence teams, as proposed by legal representatives.[290]

On the issue of the scope of questioning by legal representatives, Trial Chamber II concurred with the Lubanga Decision in ruling that their questions are only residual and must aim to clarify or complement previous evidence of a witness. Factual questions going beyond matters raised in examination-in-chief may be allowed provided that they (i) are not duplicative or repetitive of what has already been asked by the parties; (ii) are limited to matters in controversy between the parties or matters directly relevant to the interests of victims; (iii) do not go to the credibility and/or accuracy of testimony, unless the testimony goes directly against the interests of victims; and (iv) pertain to possible reparations for specific individuals or groups, unless authorized under Regulation 56 of the Regulations of the Court.[291] With respect to the nature of questions to be posed by legal representatives, the Chamber followed the Lubanga jurisprudence holding that questioning must be conducted neutrally and leading or closed questions avoided, unless the Chamber specifically allows them to conduct cross-examination.[292]

Noting the 'slight differences in the formulation of the approach' towards questioning by legal representatives between other chambers, the Bemba Trial Chamber held that 'the underlying position is the same' and 'has been demonstrated in both trials as providing an effective means of addressing the issue'.[293] It therefore adopted

[285] Ibid., para. 86. See Rule 91(4) ICC RPE ('For a hearing limited to reparations under Article 75, the restrictions on questioning by the legal representatives set forth in sub-rule 2 shall not apply. In that case, the legal representatives may, with the permission of the Chamber concerned, question witnesses, experts and the person concerned').

[286] Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) paras 84–5 (the application must be made as early as possible and not later than seven days before the witness's first appearance, as the Chamber needs to decide whether the defence is to be given an opportunity to make observations on it).

[287] Ibid., para. 87. [288] Ibid., para. 88. [289] Ibid., para. 89.

[290] Transcript, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-87-Red-ENG, TC II, ICC, 30 November 2009, 45–6.

[291] Katanga and Ngudjolo trial directions (n 235) para. 90.

[292] Ibid., para. 91; Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 229) para. 78.

[293] Bemba victim participation decision (n 229) para. 40.

the presumption of neutral questioning by legal representatives, subject to the possibility of varying it if necessary. The legal representatives were instructed to file a discrete application outlining the nature and detail of proposed questions seven days before the relevant witness is scheduled to testify.[294] During the trial, the Chamber rejected the defence argument that insider witnesses are 'collectively unlikely to be able to give evidence which impacts upon the personal interests of the victims' and granted requests of two legal representatives to be allowed to question such a witness supposed to testify on the mode of liability and the crime of pillage.[295] The Chamber held that the interests of victims are not limited to issues relating to physical commission of crimes but also extend to the question of who should be held liable. Therefore, this is the area that may legitimately be explored by the legal representatives where the Chamber finds the proposed questions appropriate.[296]

The framework decision on the conduct of the Ruto and Sang trial provided for the same protocol to be followed in case legal representatives wish to question a witness. This included the requirement of a reasoned filing to be notified to the parties seven days in advance of the witness's appearance, subject to variation in case of changes in the witness schedule or unanticipated issues raised during testimony.[297] The Trial Chamber held that the proposed questions must be relevant to the victims' interests, must not repeat questions posed by the calling parties, and must not formulate new allegations against the accused.[298] The Chamber also upheld the presumption in favour of a neutral manner of questioning by the legal representative reversible upon an oral request made during examination.[299]

To sum up, the ICC trial practice displays a considerable degree of consolidation on the issues relating to the questioning of witnesses, including experts and the accused, by the legal representatives of participating victims. Questioning pursuant to Rule 91(3)(a) is an indirect form of the expression of views and concerns on behalf of victim participants and is subject to a distinct application. In order to ensure that witness questioning is kept within the boundaries of Article 68(3), the Chambers have exercised close control over when and how witnesses may be examined on behalf of the participating victims. The Trial Chambers have uniformly required from the legal representatives a reasoned application explaining the relevance of specific questions to the matters expected to be raised in the testimony and to the victims' personal interests. The legal representatives' questioning is of a residual nature and subject to a reversible presumption in favour of a neutral manner of posing questions. Like with leading evidence, the Chambers have linked this form of participation with the determination of the truth as the overarching goal of the trial proceedings before the Court.

[294] Ibid., para. 102(h).

[295] Decision (i) ruling on legal representatives' applications to question Witness 33 and (ii) setting a schedule for the filing of submissions in relation to future applications to question witnesses, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1729, TC III, ICC, 9 September 2011.

[296] Bemba decision (i) ruling on legal representatives' applications to question Witness 33 (n 295) paras 16–17.

[297] Decision on the Conduct of Trial Proceedings (General Directions), Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-847, TC V(A), ICC, 12 August 2013 ('Ruto and Sang general directions'), para. 19. See also Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 74.

[298] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 75.

[299] Ibid., para. 76.

45.3.3 Representation

The organization of legal representation of victims is crucial to enabling them to effectively realize their participatory rights, given that the bulk of victim participation before the ICC occurs through legal representatives. In essence, 'meaningful' participation is impossible without a real and effective representation, given the 'physical and conceptual' distance between most victims and the legal proceedings before the ICC.[300] The procedural and logistical challenges to ensuring effective representation have been significant.[301] They related, among other things, to grouping victims, selection of representatives, provision of legal aid, and the relationship between legal representatives and the OPCV. Further, tensions have surged between the ideals of 'meaningful' participation and 'real' representation of victims' personal interests on the one hand, and what may be perceived as the reality of symbolic representation and participation of victims at the ICC on the other.[302] This paragraph will barely scratch the surface of those tensions.

Article 68(3) provides that 'views and concerns may be presented by the legal representatives of the victims where the Court considers it appropriate, in accordance with the [RPE]'. The RPE appear to encourage participation through legal representatives, not least because some forms of participation are only available to victims' representatives, e.g. attendance of and participation in hearings and questioning witnesses.[303] Although Rule 90(1) provides that '[a] victim shall be free to choose a legal representative', this is qualified in the following paragraphs, stipulating that individual preferences regarding the choice of a legal representative may be overridden. First, in case of a large number of victims the Chamber may request victims or groups of victims to choose a common legal representative in order to ensure the effectiveness of the proceedings and, second, it may request the Registrar to 'choose one or more common legal representatives' if the victims 'are unable to choose a common legal representative or representatives within a time limit that the Chamber may decide'.[304] The measures aimed at organizing common legal representation are subject to the requirement that the selection of a legal representative must ensure that the victims' 'distinct interests', in particular those relating to protection, are represented and that the conflict of interests is avoided.[305] Regulation 79(2) of the Regulations of the Court further provides for a duty to give due consideration to 'the views of victims, and the need to respect local traditions and to assist specific groups of victims'.

Identifying a suitable (common) legal representative is an inherently difficult task. An external counsel from the same country where victims are will have cultural proximity to them, speak their language, know the context of the conflict and crimes, and, therefore, will have an advantage of being able to communicate with the clients more effectively. But, at the same time, he or she will more likely be unfamiliar with the Court's law and jurisprudence and find it challenging to operate in the Court's

[300] REDRESS (n 8) 55.
[301] Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/11/40 (n 50) para. 35.
[302] For an analysis, see Haslam and Edmunds (n 14).
[303] Rule 91(2) and (3)(a) ICC RPE.
[304] Rules 90(1)–(3) ICC RPE.
[305] Rule 90(4) ICC RPE.

proceedings: 'they are generally from a very different legal context from the ICC and may not have the background or training that enables them to work optimally in a multicultural setting with different norms and modes of interaction'.[306] By contrast, a court-appointed counsel, including an OPCV staff member, may be an effective advocate. But without a sufficient link and direct contact with victims he or she may be unable to genuinely present their 'views and concerns' that amount to more than general legal submissions second-guessing what those views and concerns are. This form of 'representation' rather creates a bogus of participation. Indeed, the Court has assured that common legal representation is organized considering the 'need to ensure that the participation of victims, through their legal representatives, is as meaningful as possible, as opposed to "purely symbolic" '.[307] However, the representation is necessarily collective, whereby each group of victims encompasses large numbers of individuals and is given one voice in the courtroom through a common legal representative. The question arises whether victim participation and representation can be anything other than 'symbolic' in the context of crimes with mass victimization and to what extent the familiar concept of the lawyer–client relationship is applicable to the representation of victims participating in the ICC proceedings.[308]

According to court monitors, the Court's practice of consultations with victims regarding the selection of legal representatives has been shaped by managerial concerns and undermined by the perennial problem of the deficit of resources.[309] The Registry was unable to consult victims as to their wishes before choosing legal representatives and the Chambers held that the interests of each victim could be taken into account only to some extent.[310] As a result, (common) legal representatives were at times appointed unilaterally and over the applicants' objections.[311] In addition to external counsel chosen by the Registry and appointed by the Chambers, the OPCV has acted as a legal representative for unrepresented applicants.[312] Proposals have been made to enhance the OPCV's role and shift to it all responsibility for representing victims in order to increase the cost-efficiency of the representation system.[313] However, the possible exclusive role of the OPCV as victim representative raised concerns, as it would effectively abrogate the victims' freedom to choose legal representatives.[314]

[306] Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/11/40 (n 50) para. 35.

[307] Decision on common legal representation of victims for the purpose of trial, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1005, TC III, ICC, 10 November 2010 ('Bemba decision on common legal representation'), para. 9(a).

[308] Kendall and Nouwen (n 7) 248 ('structural constraints often dilute this relationship').

[309] REDRESS (n 8) 56.

[310] Bemba decision on common legal representation (n 307) para. 14.

[311] E.g. Decision on the 'Motion from Victims a/0041/10, a/0045/10, a/0051/10, and a/0056/10 requesting the Pre-Trial Chamber to Reconsider the Appointment of Common Legal Representative Sureta Chana for All Victims', Ruto et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-330, PTC II, ICC, 9 September 2011; Decision on Common Legal Representation, Banda and Jerbo, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-03/09-337, TC IV, ICC, 25 May 2012.

[312] Regulation 80(1) Regulations of the Court.

[313] Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance on the work of its Eighteenth Session', Committee on Budget and Finance, 22 May 2012, ICC-ASP/11/5 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 57.

[314] See e.g. REDRESS (n 8) 57; VRWG Report (n 191) 9–10.

Large numbers of victims have tended to be represented by a single legal representative appointed by the Court. Victims were grouped based on the criteria relevant in light of Rule 90(4), such as by the geographical area or by crime from which they suffered. As an exception rather than the rule, in Lubanga victim participants chose their own legal representatives and, as a result, there were eight represented groups of victims in the court, which may be deemed excessive. In the Katanga and Ngudjolo trial, 366 victims were split into two groups, each represented by a common legal representative.[315] In Bemba, over 5,000 victims participating in the trial have been represented by two common legal representatives.[316] The OPCV was authorized to represent victim participants who had not yet chosen a representative and until the decision on the appointment of such was made, including for the purpose of opening statements.[317] In each of the two Kenya cases, the totality of victims were represented by one common legal representative based in Kenya and by the OPCV acting on his behalf in the proceedings before the Court.[318] Under this novel 'combined approach', the common legal representative acts as the 'point of contact' for the victims. He or she formulates their 'views and concerns' and may appear on their behalf at 'critical junctures of the trial' (e.g. opening and closing statements as well as, upon specific request, on other occasions).[319] By contrast, the OPCV's role is to serve, on a daily basis, as the 'interface' between the common legal representative and the Chamber, including attendance of hearings, oral interventions, written submissions, access to confidential documents, and questioning witnesses on behalf of the representative.[320]

The representation system in the Kenya cases is an attempt at combining the best of both worlds. First, it envisages a close involvement by the OPCV, which has considerable expertise on victim representation and courtroom experience; and, second, this scheme is meant to preserve a genuine attorney–client link between the victims and the local-based professional and independent common legal representative who maintains regular and direct contact with the victims and is more than a mere 'intermediary' in The Hague.[321] While this experiment is interesting and promising, its expected merits are yet to be validated by experience. The division of labour, effective communication, and two-way transmission of the victims' views and concerns and court developments between the common legal representative and the OPCV may pose challenges and will depend heavily on their ability to construct an effective working relationship. Other than that, as noted, it is the [315] Order on the Organisation of Common Legal Representation, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1328, TC II, ICC, 22 July 2009, 2–4.

[316] Bemba decision on common legal representation (n 307) para. 7.

[317] Decision on the legal representation of victim applicants at trial, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1020, TC III, ICC, 19 November 2010, paras 24–7.

[318] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) paras 41–5; Muthaura and Kenyatta victim participation decision (n 126) paras 40–4.

[319] Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) paras 42, 71, and 73.

[320] Ibid., paras 43–4, 68, and 71.

[321] VRWG Report (n 191) 10. Cf. Kendall and Nouwen (n 7) 249 (characterizing this arrangement as 're-representation', because victims are represented by the common legal representative who is in turn represented in court by the OPCV).

Chamber's top-down manner of introducing this scheme that has been subject to criticism: the victims whose rights and interests are most affected by the decision were not consulted.[322]

45.3.4 Towards a pragmatic system: evolution or devolution of the regime?

The foregoing overview of the ICC's practice regarding the key aspects of the application, representation, and participation process shows that the Court has been continuously clarifying and refining the specifics of the participation system in response to challenges arising in individual cases. In addition, the Court has been engaged in the genuine and critical monitoring of its own performance and the transparent appraisal of practices employed by different Chambers in search of strategically coherent and enduring solutions. This commendable endeavour was not only aimed at identifying workable quick fixes but also did not eschew fundamental questions of the broader philosophy that should inform the direction to be taken by the Court in the future. A long way has been travelled from the initial approach of allowing 'symbolic' participation to limiting it to substantive and 'meaningful' participation.[323] It is worth recalling that this discursive shift surfaced at first in the Appeals Chamber's judgments striking down the notion of general participatory rights and victim status under Article 68(3) in non-judicial phases of the investigation into a situation and restricting participation during that early stage to instances explicitly envisaged by the legal framework.[324]

By now, the Court's drift away from 'victim symbolism' to procedural pragmatism can be discerned in all major aspects of victim participation, at least as far the trial process is concerned. The application, representation, and participation processes have been taking a markedly more pragmatist shape. In respect of the application scheme, the emphasis has increasingly been put on the kind of eventual participation [322] REDRESS (n 8) 59 ('The Court should be doing more than paying lip-service to honour its obligation to consult with participating victims about their legal representation'); VRWG Report (n 191) 10.

[323] See e.g. Lubanga appeal judgment on victim participation at trial (n 74) para. 97; Order on the Organisation of Common Legal Representation of Victims, Katanga and Ngudjolo, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-1328, TC II, ICC, 22 July 2009, para. 10(a) ('the Chamber attaches the greatest importance to the requirement that the participation of victims, through their legal representatives, must be as meaningful as possible as opposed to being purely symbolic'); Katanga and Ngudjolo decision on victim participation at trial (n 229) para. 57; Decision on common legal representation of victims for the purpose of trial, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-1005, TC III, ICC, 10 November 2010, para. 9 (a); Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 10.

[324] Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS 1, VPRS 2, VPRS 3, VPRS 4, VPRS 5, and VPRS 6, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-101, PTC, ICC, 17 January 2006. But see Judgment on victim participation in the investigation stage of the proceedings in the appeal of the OPCD against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 3 December 2007 and in the appeals of the OPCD and the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 6 December 2007, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-177, AC, ICC, 2 February 2009; Judgment on victim participation in the investigation stage of the proceedings in the appeal of the OPCD against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 7 December 2007 and in the appeals of the OPCD and the Prosecutor against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 24 December 2007, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-556, AC, ICC, 19 December 2008.

sought by the applicants, as opposed to the issue of formal eligibility to participate. In testing the different individual and collective approaches and their combinations, the Chambers have generally operated within the remit of the Statute, but some experiments, most notably in the Kenya cases, did conflict with the plain legal requirement of the individualized judicial treatment of applications provided for by Rule 89. The preference for collective approaches in structuring application, participation, and representation constitute the unmistakable trend of the past few years of the ICC practice. But this trend does not go so far as to discourage or exclude individual and direct forms of participation allowed by the Statute. Victims do retain the possibility of appearing before the Chamber in person, provided that they are in a position to meaningfully contribute to the proceedings.

The cornerstone questions are what kind of participation is regarded as 'meaningful', and whose perspective on this is determinative, given that it is likely to vary by actor? With regard to the modalities of participation at trial that have been discussed previously, all of which relate to the ad hoc forms of involvement subject to a requirement of distinct application, the red thread going through the jurisprudence is the participating victims' expected contribution to truth-finding and clarification of matters raised by evidence. Under 'meaningful participation', the Court understands participation that not only benefits the victims but also promotes the Court's primary function, in particular the determination of the truth in the case in a manner consistent with the tenets of a fair trial. The ways in which the Trial Chambers have interpreted and applied participation modalities clearly demonstrate that the judges have expected active procedural participation by victims to further (and at a minimum not to obstruct) the goals of criminal process. This is when the Chambers have granted applications for the presentation of evidence, questioning of witnesses, and the expression of views and concerns.

These considerations have substantially shaped the exercise by the judges of their broad discretion in fashioning the aspects of victim participation and the enjoyment by victims of their participatory rights under the Article 68(3) regime. Whether with regard to the expression of 'views and concerns', presentation of evidence, or questioning of witnesses, the Trial Chambers have consistently given a special prominence to the search for the truth as the cornerstone rationale of active procedural participation of victims. This is also the kind of contributions which the Chambers have appreciated most:

> the Chamber wishes to commend the contribution made by the legal representatives and their teams throughout the proceedings. In the Chamber's view, they were able to find their rightful place during the trial and in their own way, by, at times, taking a different stance to the Prosecution, they made a meaningful contribution to establishing the truth in relation to certain aspects of the case. The Chamber extends its gratitude for their contribution.[325]

[325] Summary of Trial Chamber II's Judgment of 7 March 2014 pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute in the case of The Prosecutor v Germain Katanga <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/press%20and%20media/press%20releases/Documents/986/14_0259_ENG_summary_judgment.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014.

It is as telling as it is understandable that the judges have been forthcoming in accommodating the forms of participation deemed crucial in light of the fundamental objectives of the criminal process. To that end, the Chambers have demonstrated considerable flexibility and creativity, occasionally going beyond the letter of Article 68(3) of the Statute, so as to enable victims to participate in the way that promoted their 'personal interests' while remaining in harmony with the truth-finding objective. The Trial Chambers' consistent position, endorsed by the Appeals Chamber, that victims may be allowed to lead and challenge the admissibility of evidence going to the guilt or innocence of the accused, is the case in point. The judges did not shy away from devising this procedural device in the absence of a direct statutory basis and grounding it in their ex officio competence under Article 69(3). In the areas of the trial process discussed earlier, the procedural rationales for victim participation and the nature and scope of recognized 'personal interests' of victims are inextricably linked with the goals of an orderly and effective functioning of the criminal court. The objectives regularly invoked in the ICC's treatment of victim participation have included truth-finding; fair and expeditious determination of the guilt or innocence of the accused; and ensuring that victims are able to express their views and concerns on matters affecting their personal interests and that they have an opportunity and means to participate 'meaningfully' in the process in accordance with the legal framework.

The subheading of this paragraph queries whether the development of victim participation at the ICC is more appropriately described as evolution or devolution of the regime. The answer to that depends on what normative content and rationales are read into this indeterminate and malleable regime. Do victims participate in order to pursue specific judicially recognized 'personal interests' that can realistically and reasonably be catered for in the framework of the criminal process, given the institutional features of the ICC and the challenges of its operational context? Or do they participate for the sake of it, as a means of benefiting from the supposed 'restorative' effects of such participation? The two ways of asking this question reflect the different schools of thought competing in this domain. The distinct philosophies of justice, retributive and restorative justice, inform the ICC debates and exercise a strong pull in opposite directions. The contestation is about the nature of the ICC's victim participation system, namely whether it is a key element of a victim-friendly and victim-oriented, yet essentially retributive, justice process, or whether it is a 'restorative justice' device in the proper sense that is grafted onto the ICC procedural system.

The perspective determines how the (d)evolution of the ICC regime is viewed, with its major trends being the pull towards a (partially) collective and combined approach to processing applications (except where direct and personal participation is being sought); general preference for collective legal representation; and keen endorsement of participation aligned with the goals and functions of criminal procedure. Looking at these dynamics through the 'restorative justice' prism first, the ICC victim participation system has imploded and devolved. Worse still, it has given up on the promise of 'restorative justice' through participation because victims are being effectively 'instrumentalized' through current trials arrangements. The ICC as a 'retributive court' only guises itself as a dispenser of restorative justice, but in fact it depends on—and keenly uses—victims as evidentiary sources, only providing them with extensive forms of participation where those can promote the Court's own interests and assist it in carrying out its functions. Victims are participants, not full parties, without an unconditional right to speak, present evidence, and to express their views and concerns. The most tangible participation is subjected to stringent control by the judges and is made strictly subordinate to the procedural objectives that have little in common with the goal of personal and social restoration of victims and affected communities. The vetting through which victims gain judicial recognition and the courtroom process through which they are 'participating' are format-driven, sterile, indirect, and collective to a large extent, while the agency of a common legal representative epitomizes such an emasculated 'participation'.

However, the picture transforms once one 'changes the lenses' and adopts the perspective under which 'meaningful participation' is one that promotes the ultimate objectives of the criminal process and contributes to the discharge by the Court of its core functions. Under this view, the steady and consistent developments at the ICC constitute evolution in the positive sense; they signify the Court's growing maturity and its deliberate, experience-driven move to wards procedural pragmatism that benefits the victims, the Court, and the major stakeholders. With the diverging approaches being tested by the Chambers and with the growing consolidation—not to say uniformization—of practice, the Court has made significant progress in giving effect to the victim participation regime and in constructing a more sustainable and efficient system through trial and error. The importance of these achievements is not diminished by the fact that they came at the cost of initial ambitions and unrealistic expectations. The more pragmatic system, which is not yet wholly adequate and settled but is well on the way towards this end, can only emerge if the ideal of 'restorative justice' through victim participation is abandoned. As the choice needs to be made of the prism through which to look at victim participation before the ICC, the superposition of the two lenses—retributive and restorative—is bound to obscure the vision of what it should amount to and what can and should be expected of the ICC in this respect. Uncertainties about the ultimate goals of victim participation not only reflect on the rigour of judicial reasoning, but also feed unrealistic expectations among victims and their communities. A court that considers itself accountable under incompatible sets of ideals and rationales is doomed to fail them all.

45.4 Victim Participation as Governance Matter

45.4.1 Victim participation and the ASP: positions and action

45.4.1.1 Evolving perceptions and approaches

The first signs of trouble faced by the Court in organizing the victim participation system started surfacing during the first few years of the ICC's judicial operation. The contours and dimension of the problem were not totally clear, especially considering that in the first cases the number of victim applicants and participants was significant but still manageable. For this reason, the need to enhance the effectiveness and sustainability of the system did not show on the ASP's agenda until 2011. The first engagement in the ASP with the topic of victims had a considerably broader focus: it was neither problem-driven nor motivated by the urgency of solving issues that had arisen in practice. As late as in 2009 the ASP decided, at its eighth session and following the proposal by Chile and Finland, that the 2010 Review Conference in Kampala would cover, as one of the four sub-items under the agenda item 'Stocktaking of international criminal justice', the topic of the 'Impact of the Rome Statute on victims and affected communities'.[326] During the Kampala conference, the technicalities of victim participation and the ICC's performance in this respect were far from priorities, although side events on the topic were held as part of the stocktaking exercise. The states were clearly reluctant to open Pandora's box by revisiting the debates settled and compromises sealed in Rome.[327] With hindsight, it was for the better that Article 68(3) was not reviewed in Kampala as a way of making the relevant regime more specific.[328] This would have been premature at that stage and would have reduced the room for the ICC judges to experiment with the Article, without guaranteeing that the practice under the amended provision would present lesser challenges. As a result of the decisions reached in Kampala, States Parties requested the ICC to continue optimizing its 'strategic planning process' in relation to victims, without providing any more specifics on the direction such strategic planning should take.[329] Subsequently, at the eleventh session in 2011, the ASP requested the Court to revise its strategy in relation to victims and to report thereon in advance of the eleventh session. The revised strategy was adopted in 2012 and the ASP requested the ICC to monitor its implementation.[330]

The growing concern of the Assembly in respect of victim participation was in reaction to disturbing reports from the Court itself. The ongoing managerial problems with the system for the victims to apply for participation, including delays with processing applications and resulting backlogs, were conveyed to it on several occasions, whereby the Court referred to the deficit of time and human resources and the need to consider collective forms of application.[331] The ASP's Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities echoed these misgivings in 2012, when it noted the unsustainability of the application system as 'the most pressing major concern'

[326] Official Records of the ASP to the Rome Statute of the ICC, Eighth Session, The Hague, 18–26 November 2009 (ICC publication, ICC-ASP/8/20) vol. I, part II, Resolution ICC-ASP/8/Res.6, para. 5 and annex IV. Other issues were complementarity, cooperation, and peace and justice.

[327] See also REDRESS (n 8) 36 ('To date, States have wisely refrained from making any significant amendments to the legal framework of the ICC, despite the recent opportunity provided by the Review Conference, given the very careful balances that were achieved in the Treaty negotiations at Rome').

[328] Cf. Vasiliev (n 26) 688 (arguing in 2008 that the problem with Art 68 (3) could more effectively and promptly be resolved at the coming review conference). In light of the subsequent developments, it is unlikely that this proposal would have led to a more sustainable and effective regime, if implemented at that stage. That said, States Parties could and should have concerned themselves with the problems in this domain earlier than they actually did.

[329] Resolution RC/Res.2, 'The impact of the Rome Statute system on victims and affected communities', adopted at the 9th plenary meeting, on 8 June 2010, para. 2.

[330] Court's Revised strategy in relation to victims, ICC-ASP/11/38 (n 20).

[331] E.g. Study Group on Governance: Lessons Learnt: First Report of the Court to the ASP, Annex ('Identification of Issues'), ICC-ASP/11/31/Add.1, 23 October 2012 <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP11/ICC-ASP-11-31-Add1-ENG.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014, 5.

and in 2013 when emphasizing the need to reform the system with a view to simplifying it.[332] As a result, from 2011 on, the Assembly turned its attention to the critical state of affairs at the Court and repeatedly placed on record its concerns about the continued backlogs in processing victims' applications, as relevant resolutions make clear.[333] In 2012 the informal consultations of the joint facilitation of the Bureau led to the consensus that a feasible solution could lie in 'a predominantly collective approach to the submission and review of victims' applications, as well as to victims' participation in the proceedings as the general rule, without precluding exceptional individual applications when the circumstances so warrant it'.[334] The Bureau considered that 'with a view to strengthening the consistency of the system, a collective approach to victims' participation throughout the system, at all stages of the proceedings, i.e., application, participation and reparations, may in the long term contribute to guarantee its effectiveness and sustainability'.[335] Accordingly, at the eleventh session (2012) the Assembly expressed an unequivocal endorsement of, and preference for, a collective approach to structuring the system for victims to apply for participation.[336]

The 2013 ASP Resolution adopted at the twelfth session welcomed 'the ongoing and continuous work of the Court in implementing and monitoring the implementation of the Revised Strategy'[337] and recalled its concerns about 'the difficulty the Court has encountered, on some occasions, in processing applications from victims seeking to participate in proceedings'.[338] Moreover, the resolution reaffirmed 'the need to review the system for victims to apply to participate in proceedings, in order to ensure the sustainability, effectiveness, and efficiency of the system, including any necessary amendment to the legal framework, while preserving the rights of victims under the Rome Statute', and called upon the Court 'to explore ways to harmonize the application process for victims to participate in the proceedings before the Court, and in consultation with all relevant stakeholders'.[339] Finally, the Bureau on Victims [332] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/11/32 (n 32) para. 24 ('with the existing resources the system is not likely to be able to handle the increase in victims' applications foreseen in upcoming cases.... [L]eaving this matter unresolved might, in fact, place the credibility of the entire Rome Statute system and the Court's work at risk, if it results in the system's failure to protect victims' rights and interests and ensuring that they are fully represented and are able to participate in the proceedings, matters at the core of the Rome Statute'); Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/12/38 (n 4) para. 10.

[333] See e.g. Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, (n 158) para. 49; Victims and Reparations, Resolution ICC-ASP/11/Res.7, 21 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), paras 3 and 4; Victims and Affected Communities, Reparations and Trust Fund for Victims, Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.5, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 2.

[334] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/11/32 (n 32) para. 25.

[335] Ibid., para. 27.

[336] Victims and Reparations, Resolution ICC-ASP/11/Res.7 (n 333) para. 5 ('requests the Bureau to prepare, in consultation with the Court, any amendments to the legal framework for the implementation of a predominantly collective approach in the system for victims to apply to participate in the proceedings').

[337] Victims and Affected Communities, Reparations and Trust Fund for Victims, Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.5 (n 5) para. 1.

[338] Ibid., para. 2 (also noting 'the efforts of the Court to ensure that such a process impacts positively on the effective implementation and protection of the rights and interests of victims under the Rome Statute'). See also the 2014 Resolution on "Victims and affected communities, reparations and Trust Fund for Victims", ICC-ASP/13/Res.4, 17 December 2014 (Thirteenth Session of the ASP), para. 2.

[339] Victims and Affected Communities, Reparations and Trust Fund for Victims, Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.5 (n 5) para. 3. Reiterating this in 2014, see Resolution on "Victims and affected communities, reparations and Trust Fund for Victims", ICC-ASP/13/Res.4 (n 338) para. 3.

and Affected Communities was invited 'to explore, in consultation with the Court, the need for possible amendments to the legal framework for the participation of victims in the proceedings'.[340] Interestingly, no references to the need or preference for a collective approach to organizing the system of victim applications as the best way forward appear in the 2013 and 2014 Resolutions, whch merely 'note' it. This retreat from the previously stated emphasis on collective forms of application and participation as the only possible solution indicates hesitance or a lack of coherent vision (and consensus) within the ASP itself.

45.4.1.2 Appraising harmonization agenda: a case for 'soft' harmonization

The evolution of the ASP's positions invites observations on the role it has played thus far in respect of victim participation issues. First, it is clear that the Assembly did not closely monitor the Court's performance in this domain from the outset. Initially, prior to the Court's alarming reports, it adopted a detached, rather than hands-on, approach: it neither conducted its own in-depth analysis of the judicial approaches tested by the Court in individual cases on an ongoing basis, nor engaged in a strategic planning process early enough that would have benefited the ICC system as a whole.

It is only recently that the ASP embarked on a strategic reflection regarding victim issues in the framework of the 'Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities and the Trust Fund for Victims, including reparations and intermediaries'. This is a welcome but overdue development. If the Assembly had kept its finger on the pulse of the Court from the beginning, it would have been in a better position to discharge its responsibility in guiding the Court, at least by indicating the general direction in which it should be moving on victim participation matters. The fact that it did not do so earlier reduced its ability to anticipate problems and take effective steps in helping the Court manage the system. The open substantive and critical dialogue with States Parties—not necessarily resulting in policy guidance handed down by the ASP—would have been of great assistance to the Court and would have enabled a consolidated position on controversial issues, along with specific proposals, to emerge sooner. The continuing absence of an overarching vision and the ICC system-wide strategic thinking within the Assembly is a part of the problem that the Court has been facing and from which it is yet to emerge. The closer involvement by the Assembly in the matters reflecting on general governance does not imply executive interference with the Court's work, let alone the unilateral imposition of specific solutions; such a hegemonic approach would have infringed its judicial autonomy and undermined its independence or the perception thereof.[341] Instead, a balanced approach is warranted, involving regular consultations and joint brainstorming and problem-solving by the Court and by the Assembly organs.

[340] Victims and Affected Communities, Reparations and Trust Fund for Victims, Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.5 (n 5) paras 2 and 3. See Resolution on "Victims and affected communities, reparations and Trust Fund for Victims", ICC-ASP/13/Res.4 (n 338) para. 4 (entrusting the task of exploring the need to amend the legal framework, based on the Court's 2015 report, to the Bureau's Study Group on Governance).

[341] Victims and Reparations, Resolution ICC-ASP/11/Res.7 (n 333) para. 5 ('requests the Bureau to prepare, in consultation with the Court, any amendments to the legal framework for the implementation of a predominantly collective approach in the system for victims to apply to participate in the proceedings').

The 2013 Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.5 and the 2014 Resolution ICC-ASP/13/Res.4 indicate that the Assembly is steering its course towards harmonization of arrangements for the victims to apply for participation in the proceedings. Presumably, this is to be achieved through the adoption of a uniform system that would apply across cases. The need to harmonize approaches as such does not suggest a specific direction in which the Court should be heading; thus, as noted, the latest Resolutions refrained from prodding the Court towards the collective approach. Nevertheless, the appropriateness, timeliness, and feasibility of the agenda oriented at 'harmonization' raise questions. The Bureau stated in its 2013 report that 'the main concern in this matter is the existence of different approaches within the Court considering the victims' right to participate and the resources that are needed to implement the different options'.[342] It referred, in particular, to the approaches developed by different Chambers since 2012 in the Gbagbo, Ntaganda, and Kenya cases, as well as to the six options outlined in the Court's Report on the review of the application system.[343] Still, it is not self-evident why the existence of diverging approaches within the Court is in itself a matter of concern and inappropriate or detrimental in principle. The real problem is the inability to devise and implement a system that would ensure a sustainable, effective, and meaningful victim participation in each case. It ought not to be substituted by the 'problem' of non-uniformity of the approaches applied by different Chambers. Non-uniformity in and of itself would not be a ground for concern in case each of the divergent approaches enabled the Court to meet the demands of each individual case and to ensure sustainable practice.

Convincing arguments in favour of an institution-wide uniform approach across situations and cases are yet to be heard. Total consistency serves no immediate purpose other than academic or administrative propensity for standardization and orderliness. But, as the ICC practice demonstrates, these concerns are very distant from the practical realities. As long as there are no delays in processing the applications, no deprivation of rights victims are provided with under the legal framework, no defects and disconnects in legal representation, and no mismanaged participation, it is unlikely to matter to individual victims and victim groups whether they are being treated slightly differently by the Court than the victims in any other situation in the Court's present or past practice. Pluralism and certainty are not irreconcilable, while premature and ill-conceived harmonization could be counterproductive and impoverishing. As seen from the practice to date, the situations before the Court are diverse in terms of the number of victims applying for participation. Besides the scope and success of outreach effort in situation countries, this is indicative of the objective differences between the situations, including, but not limited to, the character of crimes committed, the nature and patterns of victimization, the presence of special categories of victims (e.g. victims of gender-based and sexual violence crimes), and the general security situation on the ground. With forensic contexts varying by case, so may be the challenges raised by victim participation in each of them. As noted, in the Lubanga trial, 129 victims participated, distributed into three groups, whereas in Bemba, over 5,000 victims, organized in two groups, are participating. This gives a reason for pause; the question is to what extent the modalities of processing victim applications and organizing legal representation and participation should be identical in cases involving substantially different numbers of victim applicants and victims with recognized status. Situation-sensitive policies and case-specific approaches may be called for.[344]

[342] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/12/38 (n 4) para. 10.
[343] Ibid., para. 10 and n 14. See section 45.3.1.3, Judicial experimentation and review of the system.

The Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities reported that the Court had been sceptical about the proposal for a uniform system on which the States Parties have insisted:

> [w]ith regard to victims' participation, both the Court and other stakeholders agree that there is a need to review the participation system with the aim of simplifying it. . . . While States Parties have expressed the need for a uniform system, the Court has stressed that it is up to the Judges within their judicial independency to choose the method of participation, bearing in mind the fact that the number of victims seeking to participate in the cases before the Court can vary greatly. Finally, it was proposed that discussions on victims' participation should continue, considering, inter alia, the issue of the stage of the proceedings at which the status of victims will be decided.[345]

The Court's position is understandable. As was shown previously, the ICC was unable to take a clear stance in its Report on the review of the application system on which one of the options presented therein was preferable. It is still testing the effectiveness and efficiency of each of the Chambers' experiments.[346] Any attempt to hurry the Court out of the current experimental phase should take account of the dimension of the procedural and logistical challenges it faces. Since the assessment of the merits of specific approaches needs to wait until the completion of the relevant proceedings, it may take the Court longer to be able to draw credible and empirical conclusions about their performance. Arguably, the Court should be given sufficient room and time for making such assessments and deciding on the optimal approach based on the outcome of the experimentation by different Chambers.[347] It is advised to tread carefully and opt for a specific approach only once it has discovered 'what works'. Without certainty about the scheme that deserves to serve as the basis for harmonization and about the reasons for which it is to be preferred to the alternatives currently on the table, a definitive move in a specific direction poses a significant risk of error. Given the need to preserve the stability of the ICC system to the extent possible, any steps entailing a drastic reform of victim participation system must be thoroughly considered. Because undertaking reforms and amending the course or restoring the status quo afterwards would seriously discredit the ICC, the 'measure thrice and cut once'

[344] See also Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/11/40 (n 50) para. 80 ('Overall, the Court must adapt to the unique aspects of each case and situation.').

[345] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/12/38 (n 4) para. 10 (emphasis added).

[346] See section 45.3.1.3, Judicial experimentation and review of the system. A major review is taking place and will be completed in the course of 2015. See Resolution on "Victims and affected communities, reparations and Trust Fund for Victims", ICC-ASP/13/Res.4 (n 338) para. 4.

[347] VRWG Report (n 191) 7. The recent addition of the Ntaganda trial approach (supra n 157) attests that the Court's experimentation is anything but complete.

approach is to be favoured over hasty choices. What is needed is patience, resilience, and creativity in devising workable solutions, lest the valuable avenues that could be identified or validated experimentally would be foreclosed.[348] Finally, in case the 'harmonization' agenda is pursued, it may only be 'soft' and allow room for reasonable flexibility in specific cases.[349] The Court should be able and prepared to exercise 'manual control' until an acceptable uniform approach has been identified. It is only after a critical mass of experiential knowledge has been accumulated from the monitoring of different models that an informed deliberation would be possible in the areas in which harmonization is desirable or imperative and along which lines it must proceed.

45.4.2 Forging the way ahead

45.4.2.1 'Restorative complex' of 'retributive court'

In reflecting on the way forward, commentators and court monitors have expressed concern that further developments and reforms in respect of victim participation at the ICC will be resource-driven and be aimed at scaling it down from 'what the drafters had in mind'.[350] States have recognized that there exist objective practical, financial, and logistical constraints making the review and reform of the system pressing, while the Court has been acutely aware of 'the difficult economic circumstances facing the global community'.[351] The zero-growth budget and the increasing donor-fatigue in the conditions of the world financial crisis make it unlikely that maintaining victim participation, as it currently exists at the ICC, would be possible in the near future, let alone expanding it further.[352] The proponents of victim participation believe that this way of looking at it is in itself a matter of concern.[353] For them, the utilitarian or resource-driven approach leads to unprincipled concessions. It is a betrayal of the hope vested in the Rome Statute and weakens the ICC system as a whole.[354]

It can be agreed that budgetary constraints and logistical and financial challenges, daunting as they were, are a tenuous reason for giving up on the idea of meaningful and effective victim participation. Furthermore, it is true that before embarking on any reforms, it is imperative to arrive at a shared understanding of the goals and rationales of victim participation in the ICC process.[355] But the pull towards a [348] See also ICC Report on the Review of Application System (n 42) para. 20 ('The possible options identified in this preliminary report are not exhaustive and others not yet identified at this stage may also deserve consideration.').

[349] VRWG Report (n 191) 7 ('considering that each situation or case will be different, with different crimes covered and challenges faced by victims, a certain degree of flexibility may need to be retained.').

[350] Ibid. ('Each option should be considered on its own merits, financial considerations being only one of a number of objectives, the key one being to develop a system of meaningful participation as anticipated by the drafters of the Rome Statute.'). See also supra n 31.

[351] Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in relation to victims, ICC-ASP/11/40 (n 50) para. 55.

[352] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/11/32 (n 32) para. 18.

[353] VRWG Report (n 191) 7.

[354] Pena and Carayon (n 14) 18 ('If the debate is focused on patching up the side-effects of the current system, which has not allowed victim participation to reach its full potential, the risk of removing international justice further from the very persons and communities it is meant to serve runs high.').

[355] Pena and Carayon (n 14) 18 ('Any effort to review or amend the victim participation system must first seek to understand the rationale and goals of victim participation').

more streamlined, pragmatic, and outcome-oriented, or effective, system does not necessarily derive from the financial pressures alone—it can and should also be the result of the ICC learning a whole lot more about itself in light of experience. At this juncture, the Court should reflect on what rationales for participation can realistically be accommodated in the criminal process and which of them can be translated without loss of meaning into procedural language. The time is ripe for it to ask the right questions and to make fundamental choices: the Court is poised to decide which of the conceptual lenses—that of 'retributive justice' or that of 'restorative justice'—enables a clearer vision for the institution, States Parties, and the victims and affected communities, and which distorts the idea about how the ICC procedural system works and generates unrealistic expectations that are a far cry from what a criminal court can deliver.

From the outset, the 'restorative justice' rhetoric has accompanied the development of the rights of crime victims under international law to obtain redress for the harm suffered; it also entered the international criminal law domain with the expansion of the procedural status of victims in the context of the ICC. The 'restorative' rationale was on the minds of the drafters of the ICC legal framework. It was also invoked by commentators when describing the purposes of participation, next to those of reparations under Articles 75 and 79.[356] Therefore, it comes as no surprise that this 'restorative justice' discourse has entered the meetings of the Assembly and the corridors of the Court,[357] although no uniform understanding of the concept has emerged. However, the validity of the parallel, let alone equation, between this paradigm and the ICC's process is questionable; this rhetoric is fallacious and detrimental insofar as it misrepresents the nature of the ICC's procedural system and feeds unreasonable expectations.[358] Rather than a restorative justice institution, the ICC is more accurately described as a victim-friendly, yet essentially retributive justice, court.[359] Leaving to one side the reparation system, which is yet to be put to service, there is hardly anything 'restorative' about the ICC's day-to-day criminal justice work.

It is true that some aspects of the two paradigms of justice are comparable, in particular the emphasis on the truth. It is widely recognized—and not contested [356] E.g. S Fernández de Gurmendi and H Friman, 'The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Court' (2001) 3 Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law 289, 312 ('The Rome Statute moves away from the exercise of purely retributive justice to incorporate a new dimension of participation of and reparation to victims').

[357] E.g. Report of the Court on the Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/8/45 (n 20) para. 3 ('A key feature of the system established in the Rome Statute is the recognition that the ICC has not only a punitive but also a restorative function. It reflects growing international consensus that participation and reparations play an important role in achieving justice for victims').

[358] Vasiliev (n 26) 675–9 ('applying the "restorative" label to the ICC is inaccurate and engenders risk of overstating the ambit and purpose of the victim-serving function that the Court can reasonably be expected to fulfil').

[359] F Guariglia, 'The Rules of Procedure and Evidence for the International Criminal Court: A New Development in International Adjudication of Individual Criminal Responsibility' in A Cassese et al. (eds), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2002) 1128 ('the ICC is a much more victim-oriented tribunal' than the predecessors); Vasiliev (n 26) 677–8. Cf. Pena and Carayon (n 14) 6 (using 'victim-oriented' and 'restorative justice' concepts interchangeably).

here—that victims can make an important contribution to the establishment of the truth about the crimes, given their first-hand knowledge about the facts and socio-political and historical context.[360] Their active involvement in the international criminal process benefits the victims themselves, the Court, and the affected communities in the long term. Regardless of their contribution to the process, victims are entitled to a responsive system that treats them with utmost respect and caters to their legitimate interests. However, this does not mean that it is justified to read the 'restorative justice' philosophy into the victim participation or that this paradigm can be engrained into the criminal procedure as it is enshrined in the Court's constituent documents. The purposes and processes of restorative justice and those of retributive justice are too conceptually and practically remote to draw a deterministic link between the possible (occasional) restorative and healing effects experienced by individual victims and their active involvement in international criminal proceedings.

The asserted nexus between victim participation and the restoration of individual victims as well as whole societies was an element of the discourse within the Court and the Assembly. Thus, the ICC Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims states that '[v]ictims' participation empowers them, recognises their suffering and enables them to contribute to the establishment of the historical record, the truth as it were of what occurred.... Moreover their participation in the justice process... is one step in the process of healing for individuals and societies.'[361] This conception prematurely adopts the idea of therapeutic jurisprudence.[362] At the micro-level of individuals, the court proceedings might have a healing and restorative effect, as some commentators tend to believe.[363] While the processes can and should be improved and organized in such a way as to prevent secondary victimization, the healing and restorative effects of the courtroom experience are strictly individual and subject to variables which are difficult to account for in advance. Moreover, there is only some extent to which the criminal justice process, charged with its own functions, can pursue the objectives of personal restoration and empowerment of victims.[364] Cathartic and therapeutic experiences of victims from giving testimony or expressing views and concerns in person are precious by-products of international criminal justice but they are neither mandatory nor regular outcomes. This uncertainty multiplies when one zooms out to the macro-level of communities: it is exceedingly difficult to ascertain to what extent individual proceedings contribute to the objectives of restoration and reconciliation [360] Jorda and de Hemptinne (n 19) 1388; REDRESS (n 10) 5; Independent Panel of experts report (n 22) para. 4; Pena and Carayon (n 14) 7–8.

[361] Court's Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/11/38 (n 20) para. 10.

[362] D Oluwu, 'International Criminal Justice and the Promise of Therapeutic Jurisprudence' <http://www.aija.org.au/TherapJurisp06/Monograph%20Papers/4%20Olowu.pdf> accessed 17 March 2014, 63–5.

[363] Pena and Carayon (n 14) 5 ('justice should be restorative, as opposed to having a strictly punitive objective, and that in itself participation in the justice process could bring recognition to victims and be an important factor in their healing and rehabilitation').

[364] Ibid., 16–17 ('ICC's justice to be restorative, participation in the proceedings should empower victims rather than confine them to a position where others decide what is best for them').

in the social group dimension. Both individual and far-reaching societal effects of legal proceedings are yet to be empirically ascertained and conflating those effects at the two distinct (individual versus collective) levels is unwarranted.[365] The belief in the possibility of achieving restorative justice through victim participation at the ICC is unverified (like any other article of faith though).[366]

But the ICC's actual practice demonstrates that the 'restorative justice' rhetoric has had little, if any, impact on the operation of procedural modalities of participation, unlike the idea of victim-oriented retributive justice. While the expansive interpretations of victim status and 'personal interests' were not uncommon in the early years, the Court has been steadily drifting towards a more pragmatic model. The narrower interpretations and increasingly 'utilitarian' approach were occasionally lamented by some of the judges,[367] but the 'restorative justice' rationales were given little space in judicial decisions setting the parameters of victims' procedural role before the ICC. The experimentation with collective forms of application and representation does not comport with the 'restorative justice' ideals that supposedly underlie victim participation. Participation does not occur for its own sake; on the contrary, the most 'meaningful' modes of active participation by the victims are always underpinned by a specific rationale: the determination of the truth. As noted, the Court has occasionally revealed insecurity about its 'utilitarian' attitude to the role of victim participants at trial; this 'restorative complex' is discernible, for instance, in the contradictory treatment by the Chambers of the opportunity for legal representatives to lead evidence relevant to the verdict.[368] Like with this limited manifestation of the 'restorative complex', the Court should free itself from the same in other areas as well. The sooner it rediscovers itself as a victim-oriented yet retributive court constrained in the mandate and resources, as opposed to a 'restorative justice' organ, the faster it will arrive at workable procedural and administrative solutions in respect of victim participation. Likewise, the ICC's stakeholders are advised to abandon the 'restorative justice' think and embrace a more pragmatic, realistic, and earnest approach when it comes to the operation of the ICC procedural system. This would make it easier to manage the expectations, boosted too high in the first years of the ICC. It also offers a vision motivated by considerations other than trivial preoccupation with cost reduction. Victim participation is not to be pursued for the sake of its 'restorative' effects, the promise of which is elusive. Instead, it must be grounded in the functions of the criminal process and contributions victims can make to the discharge of those functions while pursuing 'personal interests' through participation—i.e. 'participation must be meaningful for victims but also for the purposes of the [365] J Doak, 'The Therapeutic Dimension of Transitional Justice: Emotional Repair and Victim Satisfaction in International Trials and Truth Commissions' (2011) 11 International Criminal Law Review 263, 264.

[366] E.g. Pena and Carayon (n 14) 18 ('We strongly believe that the ICC can deliver restorative justice to victims').

[367] See e.g. Bemba dissenting opinion of Judge Steiner (n 262) paras 10–11.

[368] See section 45.3.2.2, Leading and challenging the admissibility of evidence.

proceedings, in other words, to provide sufficient relevant information for the Judges, the parties and participants'.[369]

45.4.2.2 Optimal 'harmonization' and amendments

It may not be the right time to discuss the harmonization of standards and practices in detail while the Court is still testing some of the models that could indicate the avenues for any future reforms. A comprehensive appraisal should ideally proceed on the basis of a full cycle of judicial proceedings, and preferably in several completed cases. But the goal of harmonizing practice articulated by the Assembly and the views expressed by the representatives of States Parties in the joint facilitation of The Hague Working Group may already indicate the contours of possible reforms and set the agenda for strategic planning.[370] This section therefore reflects on the directions the possible harmonization should take in light of how the system has functioned, as well as on the amendments to the legal framework necessary to enable reforms and consolidation of practice, if it is to be undertaken.

First of all, as noted, any harmonization of practice and standards across different Chambers must allow tailoring any 'default' approaches to the circumstances and demands of individual cases. Second, the selection of a specific model as the 'axis of harmonization' must not ignore the general direction in which the victim participation scheme has been developing. The Court's movement towards a more pragmatic procedural system has been endorsed by the Assembly and its Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities. Neither retaining the current system nor enhancing it as a way to amplify its restorative potential would be tenable, given the practical realities of delivering justice for crimes involving mass victimization and the essence of the ICC's criminal adjudication. Restorative ambitions must be tempered in part of the core criminal process (as opposed to its 'reparations add-on') and efforts intensified to manage the expectations among victims and affected communities. Accordingly, the basis for harmonization should reflect the most pragmatic, lowest common denominator standard found across the ICC Chambers. The harmonization model should maximize the effective and meaningful character of victim participation (both for the victims and for the Court) and to streamline it to the extent possible. The participation of victims in the proceedings will be meaningful to them only if it is also meaningful for the Court. For example, as Trial Chambers have held repeatedly, the role of victims at trial is to contribute to the truth-finding objective of the trial. The opportunities for the victims to lead evidence on the guilt or innocence, to participate in the questioning of witnesses, and to express their views and concerns have consistently been qualified by the obligation to ensure that these forms of participation contribute to the determination of the truth. This warrants a principled interpretation of 'personal interests' as those interests that are aligned and compatible with the functions of the criminal court.

[369] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/12/38 (n 4) para. 10.
[370] See section 45.4.1, Victim participation and the ASP: positions and action.

While the ASP endorsed a 'predominantly collective approach in the system for victims to apply to participate' in the past,[371] it is unclear what it actually meant under such an approach.[372] The Court's practice provides several options that might fall under this description, including the 'partly collective' model used in Gbagbo and the 'differentiated approach' in the Kenya cases.[373] Most certainly, the fully collective approach is not the only proposal on the table; the less drastic measures have been identified, are being tested, and might prove workable. The Kenya approach allows for the participation-oriented, rather than eligibility-driven, application process and ensures that the effort and resources invested in vetting the applications for participation are commensurate to the type of participation sought. The individual treatment must, to the extent possible, be reserved for the applications of those victims seeking individual and direct participation before the Chamber in order to present evidence or express views and concerns in person. This differentiated approach restricts the Rule 89(1) procedure to the applications for individual participation while channelling the applications of victims who wish to participate through a common legal representative via the simplified registration process. This solution holds a significant promise and its outcome would deserve close scrutiny. Objections have been made, from a practical perspective, that this avoids rather solves the problem, as nothing precludes large numbers of victims to choose to appear in person before the Chamber. But it is not implausible that this solution would prove workable in light of the experience in the cases thus far, where only a handful of victims requested to testify or present their views and concerns to the Chamber directly.[374] Moreover, where a large number of victims wish to appear, the Chamber has a further possibility of making a selection among the relevant victims, as indicated by the Ruto and Sang and Bemba Trial Chambers.[375] Such selection has been based on whether the proposed evidence is expected to contribute to truth-finding and whether the views and concerns the relevant victims requested to express in person reflect the 'personal interests' shared by a larger group of victims.

Another challenge posed by the Kenya approach is the system of legal representation and participation in which the common legal representatives and the OPCV distribute the tasks and responsibilities amongst themselves and are expected to operate in tandem. On its face, the system allows ensuring the real and meaningful representation of victims in the ICC proceedings—a local-based common legal representative with direct access to, and contact with, the victims who may appear during the critical junctures of the process and the OPCV representing him in the proceedings and serving as his eyes and ears in The Hague. It remains to be seen whether the combined scheme is viable despite foreseeable difficulties in ensuring an effective communication and coordination between the two tiers of representatives. The endorsement of this (or any other) approach does not mean that it is to be imposed on, and to be [371] See n 336.

[372] VRWG Report (n 191) 5 ('the term "collective" carries multiple meanings and is in itself a complex concept. A collective approach may be suitable only for some, but not all, victims.… [T]here is a need for more reflection around what is meant by this term, and to whom it might apply').

[373] See section 45.3.1.3, Judicial experimentation and review of the system.

[374] WCRO Report on application system (n 109) 53.

[375] Ibid., 54. See also Ruto and Sang victim participation decision (n 126) para. 56; Bemba decision on supplemented applications (n 217) para. 22.

applied uniformly in, all cases. But provided that it proves effective, there exist no principled or practical reasons why it cannot be used in other cases, including those with relatively small numbers of victims (which will at any rate be rare at the ICC). Subject to all caveats, the Kenya approach—or, for that matter, the approach adopted for the Ntaganda trial—can in principle serve as the basis for any future harmonization of standards and practices.

This brings us to the question of possible amendments to the ICC's legal framework that would enable the necessary reforms to the victim participation system. The same issue has been considered by the Court in its review of the system and during the consultations in the Bureau. In affirming the urgency of the reforms, the Bureau recommended that:

> the Court should not be inhibited by the existing legal framework of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence in analysing and proposing ways forward, some of which could require amendments to the existing legal framework. Furthermore, it was up to States Parties and the Court to progressively review the Rules of Procedure and Evidence in light of experience and lessons learnt. Some delegations expressed their preparedness to adapt the legal framework if, as a result of consultations, it was deemed necessary.[376]

Nonetheless, the issue of amendments has not been taken lightly by the Court, the Bureau, and States Parties. Any adjustments to the legal framework must be based on the solid assessment of practice, and this exercise is still under way. This cautious approach regarding the amendments should be—and has been—welcomed.[377] At the same time, the Bureau,[378] the Court,[379] and observers[380] have all recognized that the system can hardly be reformed without amending the RPE. While the nature of such amendments may vary depending on the specific proposal, under many of them Rule 89(1) would be an obvious candidate for review. In particular, this Rule will need to be modified in order to accommodate the 'differentiated' approach based on the collective processing and simplified registration of victim applications for participation. Such an amendment is indispensable in any event, as a way to provide a legal authority for the continued reliance on this approach in the Ruto and Sang case,[381] which was arguably adopted in violation of the Rule and ultra vires the Statute.[382] Similarly, if States Parties decide to reform the application system by making it fully collective, so that victims would be expected to apply and participate as groups or associations, the amendments to Rule 85 will be required, at a minimum.[383]

[376] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/11/32 (n 32) para. 21.

[377] E.g. VRWG recommendations to ASP-12 (n 6) 5 ('changes to the legal framework of the Court in relation to the participation of victims are premature and that any proposal to that effect must be preceded by a Court-led comprehensive evaluation of how the system has worked to date').

[378] Report of the Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities, ICC-ASP/11/32 (n 32) para. 26 ('streamlining the processing of the applications in order to simplify the judicial oversight required for victims' admission as participants, in order to avoid undue delays and expedite the judicial process' would be enabled by an amendment of Rules 89 and 90).

[379] See section 45.3.1.4, Court's review of the system and possible avenues.

[380] E.g. Independent Panel of Experts Report (n 22) para. 6 (recognizing that changes to the RPE, Regulations of the Court, or Regulations of the Registry may be required to implement procedural recommendations proposed by the panel).

[381] WCRO Report on application system (n 109) 60.

[382] See section 45.3.1.3, Judicial experimentation and review of the system.

[383] See section 45.3.1.4, Court's review of the system and possible avenues.

The Court also indicated in its Report on the review of the system for victims to apply for participation that amendments to Article 68(3) may be necessary to enable some of the possible reforms. However, the Article is sufficiently open-ended to accommodate any of the reforms currently under consideration (including the fully collective approach). At least, the provision has proven to be capacious enough to do without amendment in order to enable victims to lead evidence as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. While the vague character of Article 68(3) may have been a reason to propose its amendment at an earlier stage, it may seem paradoxical that now, when it is clear that the system is in need of reform, the 'constructive ambiguity' of this provision can turn into its greatest advantage. It allows avoiding the complicated process of amending the Statute under Article 121, which States Parties are unlikely to be willing to undertake in any event, at least in the near future.

45.5 Conclusion

Victim participation has been a major stumbling block for the Court and the issue that generated unprecedented academic and policy debates. What appears as the ICC's immaturity, considering its slow progress in making victim participation sustainable, effective, and uniform, is explained by objective factors. The culprits are, first, the unprecedented legal and logistical challenges posed by the task of accommodating the procedural participation by potentially large numbers of victims and, second, the fundamental uncertainty about the rationales of such participation the judges were left with as a result of indeterminate law constructed through the unhappy marriage of diplomatic compromise and activism. The clarification of the exact parameters of the victim participation regime was bound to become a long-drawn-out process of trial and error. It was developed on a case-by-case basis and in light of issues and challenges posed by practice.

The assessments of the ICC's performance in fleshing out the progressive but unhelpfully ambiguous statutory provisions on victim participation and in turning them into an operational regime are a mixed bag. The same holds for the reality of the ICC's participatory regime as experienced by the victims in the growing number of cases and situations in the Court's docket. The bulk of this chapter was spent on describing the hurdles faced by the Court in implementing the key aspects of that regime (application, participation at trial, and representation), the implications those have had for victim applicants and participants, and the corrective measures its organs have taken to make the system work. The Court deserves praise for the strenuous efforts and strides made by its judges, relevant sections of the Registry, and parties in developing, through creative experiments, and continuously improving the procedural solutions balancing the 'meaningful' and 'sustainable' participation. Experimentalism was the right attitude, especially in the absence of alternatives. However, innovations did not always work as expected. On occasions, the Chambers overtly strayed outside the ICC's legal framework and failed to consult with victims on the key issues of organization of the application, representation, and participation process.

It is understandable why the Court's policies in enabling and structuring the participation of victims have varied across cases. No one-size-fits-all framework that lends itself to effective use in all cases could be developed. Some of the solutions devised by the Court are promising, given the need for, and imminence of, reforms of victim participation. The framework devised for the purpose of Kenya trials is particularly interesting. It employs both individual and collective approaches to processing the applications and enabling participation, which are used depending on the type of participation sought by the applicant. While not bereft of potential problems, this approach commends itself for its procedural pragmatism and, possibly, effectiveness in ensuring meaningful participation (which remains to be seen). It is participation-oriented rather than eligibility-driven and thus it could spare the victims, the Chamber, the Registry, and the parties from the inefficiencies of the individualized vetting procedure under Rule 89(1). Because most victims do not appear in person but participate exclusively through a common legal representative, allowing them to register as participants without going through the innervating formal application process corresponds to the scope of their actual participation. Nevertheless, the continued use of this approach calls for an amendment of Rule 89(1); its adoption obviated the clear language of the Rule and the justification by the Chamber for referring to Article 68(3) is legally problematic.

In the past two years, the sustainability of the system (belatedly) emerged as a governance matter of concern for the Assembly. It was only towards the end of the first decade of the Court that the question of viable procedural translations of its victim-servicing mandate moved higher up the agenda of the ICC's governing body. As the Court's relationship with the 'victim constituency' strikes at the heart of its effectiveness, the dimension of the problem of victim participation clearly transcends the procedural domain. Given the divergence and experimental character of the approaches to victim participation, the Assembly currently expects the ICC to harmonize its practices, most notably with regard to the application process. This agenda can only be realistic and timely if 'soft' harmonization is pursued that leaves room for flexibility and manoeuvre in light of the experience and challenges posed in specific cases. While the Court is testing different solutions by cut-and-try, the search for a singularly effective framework in abstracto is premature and misconceived, given the diversity of the present and future situations. A constant re-evaluation of the approaches adopted and 'manual control' may be needed to ensure the successful operation of the regime in light of the demands of specific cases. Legal uncertainty and inequality of treatment across cases and over time may be the downsides of this experimental phase, but they could be minimized by providing victims and affected communities with timely information and through effective outreach and engagement in situation countries. It is crucial for the Court to consult with victims, intermediaries, and representatives of the affected communities when assessing the impact of its decisions and policies on the ground.[384] This is more likely to lead to effective and situation-sensitive modalities of facilitating the application, representation, and participation process that could serve as the possible basis for future reforms. Additional efforts should be invested in the outreach with a view to expectation-management, especially if and when structural changes are made. In turn, States Parties should remain closely involved and monitor the state of affairs in the domain of victim participation. Constructive dialogue and consultation with the Court are needed, as opposed to top-down 'hard' guidance.

[384] See also Report of the Court on the Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims, ICC-ASP/11/40 (n 50) para. 83 ('The Court must constantly monitor and adjust strategies and messages in order to respond not only to judicial developments but also to local dynamics. To do so requires from the entire Court system immense flexibility, creativity and, at times, speed. Coordinated public information campaigns targeted at appropriate audiences often clear up (mis)perceptions and set the record straight'); VRWG recommendations to ASP-12 (n 6) 5 (arguing that discussions on victim participation should 'seek out

Any further reflection on the practices that could be potential bases for harmonization should not be exclusively resource-driven. Instead, the principled consideration will be much facilitated if the cornerstone questions of the rationales behind the participation of victims in the process are squarely addressed. The scholarly and policy debates on victim participation have been overshadowed by the latent contestation between the 'restorative justice' and 'retributive justice' paradigms, which are competing for prevalence. The chapter argued that this quandary should be solved by the disavowal of the goal of achieving 'restorative justice' through victim participation (as opposed to reparations). When it comes to criminal procedure, the ICC is a 'retributive' court rigidly constrained in its mandate and resources, rather than an arm of restorative justice. The two justice philosophies are not easily combined. Hence, a coherent understanding of the reasons to allow for victim participation—and the workable scheme to enable it—will not emerge until the Court emancipates itself completely from what appears to be a 'restorative' complex. The review of the Trial Chambers' interpretations of the role of victims and their legal representatives in respect of the key modalities of participation at trial undertaken in this chapter has shown that the Court is not significantly disturbed by that complex. Although some signs of conceptual unease have been detected, the Chambers have consistently viewed 'meaningful participation' in terms of its alignment with, and contribution to, the fundamental objectives of the criminal process, most notably the search for the truth.

Finally, it is clear that the victim participation system should and will be further improved and even substantially reformed. There is no capacity to continue implementing it as it currently exists, let alone expanding it any further, because with the growing docket it will only become more and more unwieldy. Conversely, it is equally true that victim participation is here to remain—it is long past the point of return for the ICC system. Since victim participation is not apt to be dismantled or taken away, as the more radical of its foes may have wished, there is only one avenue for the future: to intensify efforts in making it more sustainable and effective than it currently is.[385] While it is the Court rather than the Assembly that will lead the way in that process, at least in the short term, it must not be left alone and should be able to count on the unwavering support of States Parties and major stakeholders.

relevant expertise and include consultations with relevant stakeholders, including victims themselves, NGOs and victims legal representatives').

[385] See also REDRESS (n 10) 8–9 ('This does not mean that victim participation is impossible or that it is not worth doing, if that were even an option for the sceptics to pursue. . . . Further creativity must be deployed to strengthen a system which works in some respects but is underperforming').

46

The Rome Statute's Regime of Victim Redress

Challenges and Prospects

*Conor McCarthy

46.1 Introduction

In its judgment on reparations in the Lubanga case, a Trial Chamber of the ICC observed that 'the reparation scheme provided for in the Statute[1] is not only one of the Statute's unique features, it is also a key feature',[2] and that 'the success of the Court is, to some extent, linked to the success of its reparation system'.[3] Despite its significance, over ten years since the establishment of the ICC a great deal of uncertainty continues to surround its regime of victim redress, which comprises both Court-ordered reparations and, it must not be forgotten, the support provided by the Trust Fund for Victims pursuant to the Fund's independent mandate to provide 'physical, psychological rehabilitation and/or material support' to victims.[4]

There is uncertainty as to the legal character of the regime and the proper scope of its ambition. In particular, there is uncertainty as to how (or, indeed, even perhaps whether) the framework of international criminal law can provide an appropriate context within which the harm caused by the excesses of war or mass violence can be addressed given all of the specific problems to which redress in such circumstances gives rise. At the doctrinal level, it is unclear whether the advent of the regime may herald the development, over time, of something akin to a system of delictual liability under the Rome Statute predicated upon the crimes enumerated therein, or whether, more modestly, the role of the reparations regime is largely limited to a discrete procedural mechanism ancillary to criminal proceedings before the Court. The procedural and, to a lesser extent, institutional means by which

* Barrister, Monckton Chambers.

[1] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[2] Decision Establishing the Principles and Procedures to be Applied to Reparations, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2904, TC I, ICC, 7 August 2012, para. 177 ('Lubanga reparations decision'); see also Judgment on the appeals against the "Decision establishing the principles and procedures to be applied to reparations" of 7 August 2012, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06 A A 2 A 3, AC, ICC, 3 March 2015 (Appeals Chamber Reparations Judgment).

[3] Id.

[4] Regulation 49 of the Regulations of the Trust Fund for Victims, ICC-ASP/4/Res.3, 3 December 2005 (Fourth Plenary Meeting of the ASP) ('TFV Regulations'). See also Rule 98(5) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Official Records of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE').

reparations decisions will be made and implemented remains largely uncharted. Added to this, the relationship between the ICC's regime of victim redress and the heterogeneous patchwork of mechanisms and procedures for redress that exist (in theory and practice) at the domestic and international level remain to be resolved. These are just some of the complex and difficult questions that are beginning to be faced by the Court and the Trust Fund and the other various institutions involved in the Statute's regime of victim redress. Without purporting to offer definitive conclusions in respect of these issues, this chapter will seek to identify what, in practice, the key challenges have been (and are likely to be) in respect of the Statute's system of victim redress.

This chapter begins by sketching an overview of the Statute's framework of victim redress by way of essential background, before moving on to consider a number of the key substantive, overarching questions which face the regime. First, the chapter explores the character of the Statute's reparations regime, asking how the regime is properly characterized in legal terms. Does it create (or does it provide the potential for the creation of) a system of substantive individual secondary liability under the Statute or does it merely serve as a procedural adjunct to criminal proceedings before the Court? Second, the chapter identifies a number of key issues which arise in respect of the relationship between the Statute's regime of victim redress as a whole and national legal systems, in particular the question of complementarity and victim redress. It asks what lessons can be drawn from early practice and looks ahead to possible future developments. Third, the chapter focuses on the early challenges the Statute's regime of victim redress has encountered and identifies trends in its practice. The chapter concludes with some reflections on whether the regime, in view of the obstacles it faces and the practice to date, is in a position to weather the many challenges it is likely to encounter in the coming years.

46.2 Overview of Rome Statute's Regime of Victim Redress

The creation of a regime of victim redress within the framework of the Rome Statute was a novel, but controversial, feature of the Statute at the time of its creation. Agreement as to the inclusion of a regime of victim redress (and, indeed, the arrangements for victim participation more generally)[5] were matters settled at a late stage in the negotiations preceding the Rome Statute. The form ultimately taken by the Statute's regime of victim redress reflects, in part, many influences, including the attitudes of states, the ILC's work on the topic, and, significantly, the lobbying of NGOs, in particular the victims' lobby which played an immensely active role during, and prior to, the Rome Conference.[6] The regime of victim redress which eventually emerged at the culmination of the Rome Conference was, in consequence, not the result of some overarching

[5] The ILC's Draft Statute for an ICC contained no provision for victim participation. See Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Sixth Session, 2 May–22 July 1994, UN Doc A/49/10.

[6] For a detailed discussion of the drafting history of the Rome Statute see C McCarthy, Reparations and Victims' Support in the International Criminal Court (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2012) 48 ff.

'grand design' but was rather the amalgamated result of proposals which emerged from many different quarters.[7]

Following the ILC's groundwork on a draft statute, the Preparatory Committee for the Establishment of an ICC (which provided a forum for further discussions and negotiations between states prior to the Rome Conference itself) included various options on arrangements for victim redress within its proposals, in particular at the suggestion of the French delegation to the Committee.[8] But even at the conclusion of the Preparatory Committee's work, proposals in respect of victim redress appeared only in bracketed form indicating that their inclusion was controversial for a number of delegations.[9] Certain delegations, it appears, feared that the incorporation of a power to award reparations in respect of crimes under international law may implicate the responsibility of states and may eventually be used to make reparations orders against them.[10] There was also a concern that the potentially enormous complexity of dealing with reparations in respect of crimes under international law may distract from the central purpose of the Court, namely the prosecution and punishment of those responsible for heinous crimes (a concern exacerbated by the fact that many judges inevitably come from legal traditions where questions of redress rarely form an element of criminal proceedings).[11] Ultimately, consensus about the creation of a regime of victim redress emerged at a late stage, just a few days before the conclusion of the Rome Conference,[12] a consensus which resulted from the strong support by certain, influential states (most notably, France and the United Kingdom, together with some support from the United States and Japan). This was combined with the intense and highly effective lobbying efforts of a broad coalition of NGOs active in the area of victims' rights. It was all of this which culminated in the establishment of the Statute's victim redress arrangements.

In its final form, the regime provides for the possibility of redress in respect of the harm suffered by victims of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, including genocide,[13] crimes against humanity,[14] and war crimes.[15] When the Court has jurisdiction in respect of the crime of aggression, the reparations regime and the power of the Trust Fund to provide victim support will also arise in this context. As noted earlier,

[7] For a detailed discussion of the negotiating history of the Rome Statute's reparations regime and the development of proposals relating to the Trust Fund for Victims, see O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008 1399 ff (on reparations) and 1439 (on the Trust Fund for Victims). See also R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the Rome Statute (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999) 262ff (on reparations) and 319ff (on applicable penalties).

[8] See e.g. French proposal to PrepComm regarding Art 45*bis* (the forerunner of Art 75), UN Doc A/AC.249/1997/WG.4/DP.3 (5 December 1997).

[9] Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Vol. II (Compilation of Proposals), UN Doc A/51/22 (1996) 224, para. 3.

[10] See C Muttukumara, 'Reparations to Victims' in Lee (n 7) 264. [11] Id.

[12] See Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters, UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.2/Add.7 (13 July 1998), 5. A number of earlier proposals on the question of reparations were introduced in the course of the Conference by various delegations, including UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.63 (8 July 1998); UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.63/Rev.1 (11 June 1998); and (proposal by the United States delegation) UN Doc A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.69 (10 July 1998).

[13] Art 6 ICC Statute. [14] Art 7 ICC Statute. [15] Art 8 ICC Statute.

the Statute's regime of victim redress encompasses two distinct elements, namely the power of the ICC to award reparations to victims of crimes within its jurisdiction and the capacity of the Trust Fund for Victims to provide support to such victims outside the context of court-ordered reparations'.[16]

The powers of the Court with regard to reparations are principally dealt with in Article 75 of the Statute. Article 75(1) empowers the Court to 'establish principles relating to reparations to, or in respect of, victims including restitution, compensation and rehabilitation'. Based on such principles, the Court may award reparations to victims. The Court's power to order reparations is set out in Article 75(2), which stipulates that '[t]he Court may make an order directly against a convicted person specifying appropriate reparations to, or in respect of, victims'. As well as deriving resources for reparations from a convicted person by way of a reparations order pursuant to Article 75(2), resources may also be derived from fines imposed pursuant to Article 77(2)(a) and from '[a] forfeiture of proceeds, property and assets derived directly or indirectly from that crime, without prejudice to the rights of bona fide third parties'.

The Trust Fund created by Article 79 of the Statute is a further crucial element of the Rome Statute's regime for victim redress. Money and other property collected through fines or forfeiture may be transferred to the Trust Fund by order of the Court.[17] In addition, the Trust Fund may receive voluntary contributions from a range of sources including 'governments, international organizations, individuals, corporations and other entities'.[18] Resources derived from voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund may be used to supplement resources available for Court-ordered reparations and the Trust Fund may also play a role in the design and implementation of reparations awards.[19] However, a further crucially important aspect of the Trust Fund's mandate is the provision of support to victims outside the context of court-ordered reparations. Such support may be provided prior to the issuance of a reparations order by the Court against a convicted person in a given situation and may be provided to victims including those not eligible for reparations.[20]

Given the negotiating history of the Statute, it is clear that the regime that eventually emerged from negotiations was the result of a confluence of different interests, agendas, and concerns. Unsurprisingly, therefore, it bears the hallmarks of compromise, more perhaps than it reflects a planned, overarching scheme for redressing the human consequences of mass violence. Indeed, this is perhaps implicitly acknowledged by the fact that the drafters of the Statute have left to the Court itself the task of 'establishing' reparations principles pursuant to Article 75(1) of the Statute, in many ways leaving it to the Court to bring the regime to life. The Court's challenge, then, in its developing practice in respect of victim redress is to bring to fruition the regime

[16] Rule 98(5) ICC RPE provides the Trust Fund with the general power to use resources, other than those collected through fines, forfeiture, or reparations, 'for the benefit of victims'. See also Chapters I and II TFV Regulations.

[17] Art 79(2) ICC Statute.

[18] Regulation 21(a) TFV Regulations.

[19] See Chapters II–V TFV Regulations. See also Chapter VIII.

[20] See Regulation 50 TFV Regulations. See also Chapter VIII.

and its disparate elements in a coherent and practicable way. Without doubt, this is not an easy task.

46.3 The Character of the Rome Statute's Reparations Regime

The notion that individuals may bear individual criminal responsibility for crimes under international law is axiomatic. In perhaps the most famous passage of its judgment, the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg ('IMT') declared that 'crimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of international law be enforced'.[21] The idea that from individual criminal responsibility, secondary responsibility for reparation also arises is undoubtedly attractive. As Christian Tomuschat observes:

> If the author of a [grave] crime is responsible for an act characterised by international law as unlawful, all arguments seem to favour a right for the victim or persons claiming through the victim to obtain reparation for the damage caused and a corresponding obligation to do so on behalf of the author of the crime.[22]

But, as Tomuschat notes, there is no logically inevitable relationship between primary responsibility and an obligation to make reparation.[23] Despite it being long established that individuals bear criminal responsibility under international law historically, no obligation has been imposed on perpetrators to provide reparation to their victims.

The ICC's reparations regime departs from this approach. The parameters of the regime, however, remain unclear. In particular, it is unclear whether the regime is substantive or procedural in scope. Does the Statute create a regime whereby the Court merely has power to order a perpetrator to provide reparations pursuant to Article 75(2) (with the reparations principles established by the Court being limited to the management of reparations in cases before the Court) or, more ambitiously, may the Court recognize an obligation to provide reparation between individuals as part of the Court's power to 'establish principles relating to reparations' pursuant to Article 75(1) of the Statute?[24] Whereas the former view merely sees the Court's reparations regime as essentially being a procedural adjunct to criminal proceedings, the latter is more akin to a system of individual delictual liability in respect of crimes under international law, [21] Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg, 14 November 1945–1 October 1946 vol. I (International Military Tribunal 1947) 223.

[22] C Tomuschat, 'Private Individuals' in J Crawford et al. (eds), The Law of International Responsibility (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 321.

[23] C Tomuschat, Human Rights: Between Idealism and Realism (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008) 355.

[24] It should be noted that the idea of an international court with the power to make orders binding upon individuals is incredibly unusual. It does seem fairly clear, at the very least in the context of reparations, that the ICC does have this power. Not least given that Art 75(2) of the Statute expressly provides that the 'Court may make a reparations order directly against the convicted person'. See also M Milanovic, 'Is the Rome Statute Binding Upon Individuals? (And Why We Should Care)' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 25.

albeit one ultimately premised on the criminal responsibility of perpetrators. In the Lubanga Reparations Judgment, the Appeals Chamber took the view that 'reparation orders are intrinsically linked to the individual whose criminal liability is established' (para. 67). But there is no consensus in the literature on the issue. Some have welcomed the creation of the regime as potentially heralding the development of a system of individual civil responsibility under international law, at least within the framework of the law of the Rome Statute. Others have adopted a more cautious approach.[25]

As to the first of these possibilities, the language adopted in Article 75,[26] in particular the use of the term 'principles' (as opposed to terms such as 'laws' or 'rules'), does not perhaps readily lend itself to the conferral of a power upon the Court to establish general hard-edged obligations that are binding upon individuals. The term 'principle' is defined in the Oxford English Dictionary as 'a fundamental … proposition that serves as the foundation for a system of … behaviour or for a chain of reasoning'. Thus, on a narrow interpretation, the power to establish 'principles' connotes a power to lay down propositions guiding the way in which the Court itself exercises its power to order reparations against a perpetrator pursuant to Article 75(2). This narrow interpretation is perhaps supported, contextually, by the structure of Article 75(1) itself, which provides that on the basis of the principles the Court establishes, it may 'determine the scope and extent of' harm to victims 'and will state the principles on which it is acting', indicating perhaps that the role of the principles is merely to guide the Court in the exercise of its own power. One further supporting point in this regard, is that although the Court is obliged to establish reparations principles, it has discretion as to whether to award reparations to victims under Article 75(2). As Christian Tomuschat notes, the conferral of a discretionary power upon the Court sits ill-at-ease with the notion that there exists, or could be brought into being by the Court, an obligation incumbent upon all perpetrators of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court to make reparation to victims.[27] In summary, on this view, the obligation on perpetrators to provide reparation to victims would only arise where it is expressly imposed by the Court pursuant to Article 75(2) of the Statute and would not exist outside the context of such an order.

A broader, more ambitious interpretation of Article 75 is also conceivable, under which the Court, through 'establishing principles relating to reparations to, or in respect of, victims', may recognize an obligation incumbent upon perpetrators to provide reparations to victims of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court (even where such an obligation did not arise from an order made by the Court itself pursuant to Article 75(2) of the Statute). This interpretation would necessarily give a broader reading to the term 'principles' so as to allow for the possibility of the recognition of [25] Tomuschat (n 22) 322, raising the question of whether '[g]iven the discretion that the Court enjoys [in making a decision to order a perpetrator to provide reparations], it might be asked whether [Art 75 of the Rome Statute] is a reflection of civil responsibility in the proper sense of the term'.

[26] It will be recalled that in accordance with Art 31 (1) of the VCLT, '[a] treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose'. VCLT (signed 23 May 1969, entered into force 27 January 1980) 1155 UNTS 331.

[27] Tomuschat (n 22) 317.

a principle of liability as between perpetrator and victim with regard to reparation. Inevitably, such a principle would have to be sufficiently nuanced in formulation to allow for the essentially discretionary nature of the Court's power to order that a perpetrator make reparation. A broader interpretation may also be supported by aspects of the language of Article 75(1). The ordinary meaning of the term 'establish' connotes the conferral of a power 'to fix, settle, institute or ordain permanently' or 'to set up on a secure or permanent basis'.[28] This plainly allows the Court to bring into being new principles or principles which have not previously been firmly established in the field of international criminal law (subject, of course, to the limits imposed by the Court's overall jurisdiction). Allied to this, the Court is obliged to establish principles relating to reparations to or in respect of victims. There is nothing in the text of Article 75 which requires the Court only to establish principles in respect of victims of the crimes prosecuted before the Court.[29] The ordinary meaning of the wording appears broader than this. Indeed, were the scope of the Court's reparations principles limited merely to regulating and managing the exercise of its power to make a reparations order, it may be said that Article 75(1) would be largely otiose, since the Court would plainly have the power to set out principles as to how and when it exercises one of its statutorily conferred powers. This is simply part and parcel of the judicial function and not something that would require specification in the Statute. All of this may be invoked in favour of a broader interpretation of the Court's power to establish reparations principles.

The decisions on reparations in the Lubanga case did not purport to lay down any general principles, outside those necessary for the Court to deal with reparations in the case at hand. This cautious approach is plainly not to be criticized, but does not necessarily indicate that a broader approach could not be adopted in future. Going forward, however, the question is not of insignificant importance. If the narrow interpretation posited is correct (and there are undoubtedly powerful arguments in support of it), then the ICC's reparations regime cannot be seen as a true system of secondary liability (albeit one contingent upon criminal responsibility) as some have contended. Its role and potential for development would be much more modest.

Whichever of these accounts of the Rome Statute's reparations regime is to be preferred, important practicalities must not be overlooked. In reality, the reasons which underlie the failure of post-conflict victim redress at the domestic level have little to do with the absence or insufficiency of obligations at the international level. A variety of other factors explain why it is commonplace for victims in the aftermath of armed conflict to find themselves without redress for the harm inflicted upon them.

First, a state that is unwilling or unable to prosecute or punish those who bear responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court is, for many of the [28] The Oxford English Dictionary vol. III (Oxford: Clarendon Press 1933) 297.

[29] It is notable in this regard that in Resolution ICC-ASP/10/Res.3, 20 December 2011 (Seventh Plenary Meeting of the ASP), the ICC ASP invited the Court to pre-establish principles relating to reparations.

same underlying reasons, likely to be equally unwilling to acknowledge the victimhood of those harmed by the atrocities in question. This may manifest itself in a refusal either by the state itself to provide redress to victims where it bears responsibility, or it may manifest itself through the state and its courts failing to facilitate the provision of redress against perpetrators or non-state actors through the civil justice system (or through partie civile proceedings in civil-law jurisdictions where they operate in the context of criminal trials). There are numerous examples of conflicts in which just as the prospect of criminal prosecutions has been politically inconceivable, so too is the prospect of redress for victims unthinkable. Where national reparations schemes are established, it is almost invariably only following a change in political dispensation or, at the very least, during the period of transition that victims can obtain reparations. Examples include national post-conflict or post-repression reparations programmes in Argentina (in respect of the junta period between c. 1976 and 1983); Chile (relating to atrocities committed in the period 1973–90); Brazil (relating to arbitrary killings perpetrated in the junta period between 1964 and 1985); and Malawi (concerning the period 1964–94).[30]

Malign factors do not, by any means, always underlie the failure of victim redress. A second reason for the absence of reparations in post-conflict situations is equally often the impecuniosity of the state concerned or perhaps a political desire to expend resources and energy on development and reconstruction rather than expending resources and efforts providing redress for past wrongs. An illustrative example is provided by post-apartheid South Africa. In the aftermath of apartheid, the major problem facing that country was not the willingness of authorities to provide programmes for redress to those who had been victimized (many of whom were, after all, by that time in the government of the state itself), but rather the central dilemma was the state's inability to provide redress. The scale of the task facing the government was immense. As explained by South Africa's Justice Minister, Penuell Maduna, in a submission to the United States Courts as part of the apartheid litigation occurring within that jurisdiction, '[i]n addition to institutionalising enforced racial segregation, and denying the majority the franchise, the apartheid system sought systematically to exclude most South Africans from access to adequate education, health care, housing, water, electricity, land and communications, while likewise excluding it from proper participation in the economy'.[31] Large-scale reparations programmes to redress the consequences of such acts would have meant taking resources from the public, the majority of whom were themselves victims of violations perpetrated by the former regime and, in many cases, returning these resources in the form of redress to much of the population from whom they came, thereby diverting resources from pressing economic development activities at a time when development and job creation were essential.

[30] See generally P de Greiff (ed.) The Handbook of Reparations (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2006).

[31] Declaration by Penuell Maduna, Justice Minister of the Republic of South Africa, on Apartheid Litigation in the United States, 11 July 2003 <http://www.nftc.org/default/ussabc/Maduna%20Declaration.pdf> accessed 25 July 2014.

46.4 The Failure of Victim Redress at the National Level: Reparations and Complementarity

It is often observed that the ICC's role in relation to the prosecution of crimes within its jurisdiction is necessarily subsidiary to that of national legal systems. The ICC has neither the resources nor capacity to play the primary role in prosecuting and punishing those responsible for mass-scale events. In the context of victim redress, this is all the more true. Dealing with reparations on a case-by-case basis before the Court will almost inevitably result, to a greater or lesser extent, in a fragmented and piecemeal response to mass-scale harm involving different, potentially quite fractionalized groups of perpetrators and victims drawn from different communities caught up in conflict. The ICC itself, with its focus on the prosecution of those most responsible, can do little more than deal with a relatively small element of the harm caused by crimes under international law occurring in a conflict. If a coherent approach to addressing the harm caused by conflict is to be adopted, then it is essential for a national response to reparations to be developed, where possible, at some point. What role, then, if any, can the Rome Statute play in promoting or encouraging victim redress at the domestic level?

A similar issue arises in respect of the prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, and a gargantuan literature has developed seeking to explain, evaluate, and critique the idea of 'complementarity' in the context of the prosecution of crimes within the Court's jurisdiction.[32] The theory has been posited that the ICC's regime for the prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court may catalyse the prosecution of conduct amounting to such crimes at the national level.[33] Whether the Rome Statute is capable of producing such effects (something which must, on any view, be highly context-dependent)[34] is a controversial and open question.[35]

Despite the controversy, a framework for 'complementarity' has been put in place in respect of the prosecution and punishment of crimes under the Rome Statute. As is well known, the primary responsibility for the prosecution and punishment of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court lies with national authorities. Where the Court has jurisdiction, a case before the ICC is inadmissible, by virtue of Article 17, where a State has investigated, is investigating, or has tried an individual in respect of the conduct subject to the complaint unless the State is unwilling or unable to do so genuinely.

[32] See C Stahn and M Zeidy, The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011); J Kleffner, Complementarity in the Rome Statute and National Criminal Jurisdictions (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2008); D Robinson, 'Three Theories of Complementarity: Charge, Sentence or Process?' (2012) 53 Harvard International Law Journal 85; D Robinson, 'The Mysterious Mysteriousness of Complementarity' (2010) 21 Criminal Law Forum 67.

[33] The concept of complementarity has varyingly been described as, in theory, having the potential to catalyse compliance as, inter alia, a legitimating process; as a sanctioning process; as a managerial process; and as a process of norm internalization. See Kleffner, (n 32) 309 ff.

[34] S Nouwen and W Werner, 'Doing Justice to the Political: The International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan' (2010) 21 European Journal of International Law 941.

[35] See S Nouwen, Complementarity in the Line of Fire: The Catalysing Effect of the International Criminal Court in Uganda and Sudan (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2012).

In contrast, in the context of reparations, there is no overt mechanism by which the Court, when determining whether a case is admissible, can consider whether and the extent to which a state has facilitated the provision of redress for victims at the national level. The primary focus of the Statute's admissibility provisions set out in Article 17 is (unsurprisingly) on the prosecution and punishment of grave crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court and not with arrangements for victim redress or, specifically, the question of whether bona fide efforts have been made to facilitate the remedying of the harm suffered by victims as a consequence of such crimes.

The question arises, then, as to whether there is any room for the Statute's provisions relating to complementarity to be interpreted and applied by the Court or, where relevant, the ICC OTP in a manner which is not limited purely to the questions relating to the prosecution and punishment of crimes at the domestic level, but which also takes cognizance of arrangements (or lack thereof) to facilitate victims in obtaining redress in respect of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. To date, the practice of the Court in its decisions on admissibility has focused, almost exclusively, on domestic processes for the prosecution and punishment of crimes. In none of its decisions examining domestic responses to crimes under international law at either the 'situation'[36] or 'case' stages[37] of proceedings, whether in admissibility decisions under Article 17 or the authorization of an investigation by the Court pursuant to Article 15, has the existence or absence of national programmes for victim redress or measures to facilitate victims in obtaining redress featured, even as a subsidiary matter.

As regards the prosecutorial decision to initiate an investigation in accordance with Article 53, the existence of national reparations do not seem to feature much more prominently. Alongside the power of the Court under Article 17 to consider the existence or character of reparations at the domestic level, the OTP could also take the existence or otherwise of national reparations programmes into account in considering whether to initiate an investigation in accordance with Article 53 of the Statute. Article 53(1) of the Statute states:

> The prosecutor shall, having evaluated the information made available to him or her, initiate an investigation unless he or she determines that there is no reasonable basis to proceed under this Statute. In deciding whether to initiate an investigation, the Prosecutor shall consider whether: . . . (c) [t]aking into account the gravity of the crime and the interests of victims, there are nonetheless substantial reasons to believe that an investigation would not serve the interests of justice.

There is, however, an indication that the OTP is alive to the potential for national reparations arrangements to form part of the assessment of whether it is in the 'interests of justice' to proceed with an investigation and, if appropriate, prosecution. In [36] E.g. when the Court is considering whether to authorize the prosecutor to investigate a situation pursuant to Art 15 ICC Statute. See e.g. Decision Pursuant to Art 15 of the Rome Statute on the Authorization of an Investigation into the Situation in the Republic of Kenya, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01-09-19-Corr, PTC II, ICC, 31 March 2010.

[37] See Decision by the Government of Kenya Challenging the Admissibility of the Case Pursuant to Art 19 (2) (b) of the Statute, Muthaura et al., Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-96, PTC II, ICC, 30 May 2011.

its Policy Paper on the Interests of Justice, the OTP noted the existence of alternative forms of justice in respect of mass atrocities other than individual punishment. It observed that '[a]ll approaches can be complementary' and listed alternative justice mechanisms including national reparations programmes as a 'potential consideration' under Article 53, when determining whether it is in the 'interests of justice' to prosecute. The position paper further observed that OTP 'fully endorses the complementary role that can be played by … reparations programs … in the pursuit of a broader justice. The Office notes the valuable role such measures may play in dealing with large numbers of offenders and in addressing the impunity gap'.[38] The significant bulk, however, of the OTP's policy position is concerned with the interests of justice test, as it applies to prosecution and punishment at the national level rather than the relationship between the interests of justice concept and alternative justice schemes such as reparations. Moreover, in its general 2003 policy position, entitled Paper on Some Policy Issues before the Office of the Prosecutor, dealing, inter alia, with complementarity, the relevance of national reparations schemes was not addressed.

Thus, in the practice of both the trial chambers of the ICC and the OTP, reparations have generally not been approached as a significant element in the interpretation and application of the provisions of the Statute relating to complementarity. This, however, is not an approach necessitated by the terms of the Statute. In appropriate cases, the Court could quite properly have regard to the existence (or lack thereof) of reparations programmes at the domestic level. This is clear from the text and ordinary meaning of Article 17. It will be recalled that, under Article 17(1), cases before the Court are inadmissible where the national authorities have investigated a case and decided not to prosecute the person concerned, unless the decision resulted from the unwillingness or inability genuinely to instigate and prosecute the case. Article 17(2) of the Statute provides:

> In order to determine unwillingness in a particular case, the Court shall consider, having regard to the principles of due process recognized by international law, whether … the national decision [not to investigate or prosecute] was made for the purpose of shielding the person concerned from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court referred to in article 5.

Article 17 of the Statute undoubtedly affords discretion to the Court to take into account reparations programmes (and indeed, other transitional justice mechanisms) in determining whether a State Party's 'national decision' not to prosecute and punish all (or perhaps even the majority) of perpetrators is indicative of an effort to 'shield' perpetrators from criminal responsibility. As the OTP's Policy Paper on the interests of justice implicitly recognizes, a range of different purposes may underlie a decision not to prosecute and punish certain categories of case, other than an attempt to shield a perpetrator.

With regard to crimes under international law, a key challenge faced by criminal justice processes dealing with such crimes, is that they often involve mass-scale conduct perpetrated by many individuals, at times even involving persons who collectively comprise a substantial section of society as a whole. This is illustrated nowhere more vividly than Rwanda where, in the years immediately following the genocide, approximately 100,000 individuals were detained and prosecuted for crimes associated with it.[39] Such was the scale of participation that the Rwandan authorities considered it necessary to establish the Gacaca judicial process, an adaptation of customary Rwandan forms of justice. But in the months following its establishment, rather than providing swift closure, Gacaca in fact revealed an almost unimaginable level of genocidal participation, with estimates suggesting that perhaps a million individuals (in a country with a population of around seven million) were implicated in the genocide.[40]

[38] Policy Paper on the Interests of Justice, OTP, September 2007, 7–8.

In such situations, the investigation, prosecution, and punishment of every transgressor will often not be feasible. The cost of investigating and prosecuting every crime may be enormous, imposing a significant burden on a conflict-affected country perhaps unable to provide basic public services including running water and housing. Perhaps most importantly, a political cost may be associated with post-conflict prosecutions. In a society transitioning from conflict, the need to move beyond past events may arguably render the prosecution of all of those bearing a degree of criminal responsibility undesirable. Such processes may take many years and perhaps make it difficult to move an ongoing peace process forward. Although such factors are inevitably highly context-dependent, the punishment of individual perpetrators often provides only partial means of administering justice in respect of crimes under international law and, in such situations, arrangements for victim redress can have a significant role to play.

There are principled reasons, too, why the use of programmes for victim redress rather than punitive measures against certain categories of perpetrator may still genuinely serve purposes of criminal justice. It has long been recognized that criminal justice processes may be understood in expressivist terms.[41] Reparations arrangements, like criminal injuries compensation schemes at the national level, can be seen as part and parcel of the response to crime by the criminal justice system as broadly understood, enabling the authoritative disavowal of criminal conduct as well as the vindication of the law and the rights of victims. From a principled standpoint, therefore, retribution involving the prosecution and punishment of perpetrators is not the only means by which criminal justice can be conceptualized or understood, or by which societal censure and the disapproval of criminal conduct can be given expression.[42] As Joel Feinberg, one of the leading social philosophers of the twentieth century, notes, [39] Report on the Situation of Human Rights in Rwanda Submitted by the Special Representative, Mr Michel Moussalli, Pursuant to Resolution 1998/69, Commission on Human Rights, Fifty-Fourth Session, UN Doc E/CN.4/1999/33, 8 February 1999.

[40] See A Meldrum, 'One Million Rwandans to Face Killing Charges in Village Courts', The Guardian, 15 January 2005; J Fierens, 'Gacaca Courts: Between Fantasy and Reality' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 896.

[41] J Feinberg, 'The Expressive Function of Punishment' in J Feinberg (ed.), Doing and Deserving: Essays in the Theory of Responsibility (Princeton: Princeton University Press 1970) 95.

[42] For further consideration of the role of international criminal justice and the role of reparations therein, see C McCarthy, 'Victim Redress and International Criminal Justice: Competing Paradigms or Compatible Forms of Justice?' (2012) 10 Journal of International Criminal Justice 351.

'[t]o say that the physical treatment [of punishment] itself expresses condemnation is simply to say that certain forms of hard treatment have become the conventional symbol of public reprobation'.[43] Although individual punishment is the conventional means by which recognition or denunciation may be given expression, there is no a priori reason why this must be so. A wide range of other mechanisms can also serve this purpose. For its part, victim redress can provide an authoritative pronouncement that the conduct to which the victim was subjected was a specific, and particularly grave type of wrong, namely a crime under international law.

In short, from both a principled and pragmatic standpoint, there may be occasions where it is entirely proper for the ICC to have regard to the existence or otherwise of reparations schemes at the national level as part of an assessment of whether cases are admissible before the Court. Bona fide efforts by a State to instigate reparations could also be a significant factor in the decision by the OTP as to whether it is in the 'interests of justice' to initiate an investigation in accordance with Article 53 of the Statute, perhaps particularly in situations where mass violence had occurred and the state had shown willingness and ability to prosecute perpetrators thought to bear most responsibility. As the post-genocide situation in Rwanda illustrates, in the aftermath of mass violations, it may be neither possible nor perhaps desirable to prosecute all those bearing a degree of criminal responsibility. To date the Trial Chambers dealing with questions of complementarity, either initially when authorizing an investigation by the Prosecutor or when determining the admissibility of cases pursuant to Article 17, have not considered the unavailability of redress at the national level or the lack of national reparations mechanisms as a factor of significance. While the OTP has referred to the potential relevance of reparations in the application of the interests of justice test pursuant to Article 54, overall the practice of the Court and its institutions to date has not been to treat reparations as an integral or important part of the Statute's complementarity regime. It remains to be seen whether, as the reparations regime of the Court develops, questions of reparations will be 'mainstreamed' within the Court's approach to complementarity or whether the regime for victim redress develops very much as an ancillary adjunct to criminal proceedings before the Court as suggested by the Appeals Chamber Reparations Judgment.

The ICC Trust Fund, and its victim support mandate, could also have a role to play from the perspective of complementarity. Inevitably in the aftermath of conflict a state may lack the resources or infrastructure (indeed, perhaps even the expertise) to put in place arrangements for reparations, such as rehabilitation facilities for victims, medical support, counselling, or micro-credit initiatives for those whose livelihood has been destroyed by, for instance, looting or wanton destruction. Many post-conflict states simply lack the resources to provide redress to victims. Appealing to the generosity of states (and other potential contributors) may, in some ways, provide a more effective means of acquiring resources for victim redress than relying solely on the imposition of responsibility which, in any event, may well be impecunious in the aftermath of armed conflict. Processes for the allocation of responsibility (whether that of individuals, organizations, or of the state itself) are often long, drawn-out, and laborious, with the result that victims may wait years to obtain redress. Equally importantly, it will be recalled, for example, that in the aftermath of apartheid, the major problem facing that country was not the willingness of authorities to provide programmes for redress to those who had been victimized (many of whom were, after all, by that time in the government of the state itself), but rather the central dilemma was the state's inability to provide redress. Through providing a conduit and facility by which willing States can channel support for victims, the Trust Fund could play a significant role in supporting arrangements for redress at the national level. The difficulty, however, in practice which the Trust Fund has faced has been the relatively modest resources which States Parties have to date put at its disposal for use in victim support or reparations arrangements. Annual contributions to the Trust Fund (which may receive funds not just from States Parties, but also from individuals and organizations) has fluctuated a good deal year-to-year since the establishment of the Fund. In general, contributions have ranged from around €500,000 to €1.5 million.[44] Fund balances are generally in the region of around €2 to 3 million.[45] While these funds are not trivial and have, in practice, been sufficient for targeted intervention in redressing the harm suffered by victims before the Court, the sums placed at the disposal of the Trust Fund by States Parties has been relatively modest. A number of states have been generous in their contributions, but many have made no contribution at all. It remains to be seen whether, as the profile of the Fund increases and it establishes a track record with States Parties, contributions will increase, enabling the Fund to have a much broader and deeper impact.

[43] Id.

In view of this, there are strong arguments in favour of a regime of victim redress which is not developed in isolation from national legal systems, but which operates effectively alongside such systems. Although there is no overt complementarity framework created in the provisions of the Statute, there is absolutely no reason, where appropriate, the existence of reparations programmes at national level (or lack thereof) cannot be taken into account by the Court and the OTP in decisions relating to complementarity. To date, questions of victim redress have not been integrated to any great extent into decision-making in relation to complementarity. There is certainly scope for this, and as the Statute's regime becomes more established, it will perhaps be desirable for victim redress to be 'mainstreamed' within the overall complementarity framework of the Court.

46.5 Early Trends: Towards a More Flexible System of Victim Redress?

The practice of the Court in respect of reparations and victim support in its early years has been very limited. The Lubanga case resulted in the Court's first determination on reparations in 2012, almost a decade after the creation of the Court. The Secretariat of the Trust Fund for Victims was established in Resolution ICC-ASP/3/Res.7 on 10

[44] See e.g. Financial Statements for the Period 1 January to 31 December 2007, ICC-ASP/7/20 (Seventh Session of the ASP), 338.

[45] Ibid., 335.

September 2004 and its victim support programmes began in earnest the following year. The regime is plainly at a very early stage in its development; however, the overall trend at present appears to be a move away from the procedural rigidity which seems apparent in the Statute and, particularly, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence to an approach characterized by a much greater degree of flexibility. There are three particular ways in which this is apparent: first, the Court, in Lubanga, signalled a move away from the applications-based approach to reparations; second, there appears to be a move away from an individualized to a more collective approach to reparations; and third, procedurally the Trial Chamber has, at least to some extent, outsourced issues relating to the operation and design of the reparations process as well as the assessment of harm to the Trust Fund for Victims.

As regards the seeming rigidity of the system, this is reflected in various provisions of both the Statute and the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence. One important aspect of this is the manner in which the Rules envisage reparations claims being initiated and assessed by the Court. Article 75(1) of the Statute requires that the Court only proceed to determine the extent of damage, loss, or injury to victims 'upon request' and further that it may only proceed 'on its own motion in exceptional circumstances'. The emphasis on an applications-based approach to reparations is reflected in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Rule 94 sets out the 'procedure upon request', which requires victims to file an application for reparations with the Registry of the Court setting out the harm they have suffered, the form of reparation sought, together with supporting documentation (no small task for many vulnerable or marginalized victims including the sick and disabled, children, the illiterate, or those poorly educated). Under the alternative, Rule 95 procedure, where the Court proceeds of its own motion, an applications-based approach is still envisaged. Rule 95 provides that where the Court proceeds of its own motion, the Registrar shall 'to the extent possible' seek to notify victims. According to Article 75(2)(a), 'where a victim makes a request for reparations, that request will be determined as if it had been brought under rule 94', in other words, the applications-based approach.

The definition of 'victim' in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (particularly when read alongside Rules 94 and 95 regarding the initiation of reparations claims) also appears to indicate an emphasis on individual rather than the potentially more varied and flexible forms of collective reparations. Under Rule 85(a) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence victims are 'natural persons who have suffered harm as a result of the commission of any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court'.[46] Although this does not preclude communities (which are after all collectivities of individuals) from obtaining collective reparations for the harm they have suffered, this aspect of the definition of victim, on its face, points towards a potential emphasis on individualized rather than collective approaches to reparations.

[46] Note that Rule 85(b) defines 'victims' also as including 'organizations or institutions that have sustained direct harm to any of their property which is dedicated to religion, education, art or science or charitable purposes, and to their historic monuments, hospitals and other places and objects for humanitarian purposes'.

Similarly, as regards the determination of reparations claims a degree of rigidity also seems to be present. Article 75(1) of the Statute states that the court will 'determine the scope and extent of any damage, loss and injury to, or in respect of, victims and will state the principles on which it is acting'. The latter requirement is unsurprising, not least to ensure that victims in different situations before the court or even different categories of victim in the same situation are treated consistently and therefore fairly. It is very unusual, however, at least in mass-scale claims situations, for a judicial institution to itself determine the scope of damage, loss, or injury suffered by victims. Although there may be instances when it is possible to determine the scope of loss in relatively short order, more often, where harm to countless victims is involved, a judicial process for the assessment of such harm at all but the most abstract level would involve enormous resources of time and expense on the part of a court. The assessment of 'the scope of damage, loss, and injury' has taken very well-resourced mass-scale claims processes a great deal of time to undertake in circumstances not dissimilar from those which are likely to come before the ICC. Examples include the damages phase of the work of the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission, the work of the Kosovo Property Claims Commission (relating to property claims following the forced displacement which occurred in the Kosovo conflict (1998–9)), and the work of its Iraqi equivalent, the Iraqi Property Claims Commission.

These various factors give rise to the potential for a somewhat formalistic and procedurally inflexible approach to reparations. Rigid processes or a singular approach to the procedures used for reparations are, however, likely to be ill-suited to remedying the many multi-faceted situations which come before the ICC. In some situations, there may be fairly significant resources available for reparations, whereas in others (and much more commonly) resources will be scarce, with the result that a targeted and highly prioritized approach to reparations may be both necessary and unavoidable. This would evidently have process implications. There is little point in notifying and encouraging many hundreds of victims to apply individually for reparations (with all of the expectations which that engenders) if only a small proportion of them will, in the end, receive reparations. Equally, collective reparations may also have an important role to play in redressing the harm suffered by victims, whether for resource reasons or simply because such redress is better able to respond to certain forms of harm, including harm to communities or groups which is not untypical of crimes under international law, a number of which by definition involve the targeting of particular ethnic, racial, or religious groups. Where collective reparations are contemplated it may be artificial or contrived to rely on an individualized applications-based process as the procedure by which issues of reparations are determined. More fundamentally, in many situations an applications-based approach may be wholly inappropriate. Victim communities (many of whom may be internally displaced or refugees) will often be highly disbursed through a country, region, or, in a prolonged conflict, internationally. In addition, many of the most vulnerable victims—who may be most in need of the assistance that reparations provide—may have great difficulty accessing and ultimately using an applications-based process. Child victims, women victims in certain cultural contexts, the illiterate, and the ill, disabled, or poverty-stricken are all perhaps examples of this. The need for a proactive, selective, and carefully targeted approach to reparations may therefore be acute. A single, rigid approach to the procedure or process adopted in determining questions of reparations is therefore clearly undesirable. The heterogeneous pattern of harm that victims may experience in conflict or mass violence requires a process capable of responding in a flexible and nuanced way in determining how such harm can best be addressed.

Perhaps owing to factors such as those set out earlier, the apparent rigidity of the Court's regime of victim redress appears to have given way to a more pragmatic and flexible (and perhaps more realistic) approach to the operation of its reparations regime. First, the Court appears to have avoided resorting to an applications-based approach to reparations in favour of a more proactive approach reliant upon victim-mapping processes, whereby the Court (through the TFV and the Registry) identifies victims eligible for reparations. In Lubanga this was to be done through a consultative exercise conducted by the TFV. This consultative phase was outlined by the TFV in submissions to the Court and involved meetings and informational sessions with communities in specific localities with victims groups, social services agencies, NGOs, community associations, traditional leaders, and others.[47] In effect, this consultative exercise appears to amount, in practice, to a broad-ranging victim-mapping exercise in which the location and distribution of victim communities, their needs, and the nature and scope of the harm they have suffered (individually and collectively) are all assessed, in order to inform the design and structure of the reparations arrangements which the Trust Fund has been invited to present to the Chamber for its approval. In conducting this process the Trust Fund is assisted by the Registry, in particular the Victims Participation and Reparations Section ('VPRS') together with the Public Information and Documentation Section ('PIDS'), both of which have substantial experience in outreach, and, in the case of VPRS, consultation with victims. The VPRS has extensive experience of conducting and managing victim-mapping exercises of different forms given its central role in ensuring that victims can participate in proceedings and to ensure that, where requested by the Court, their views are effectively represented to the chambers where they are called upon to make decisions affecting the interests of victims.

In addition, considerable responsibilities have been devolved to the Trust Fund in respect of reparations. In the Lubanga case, the Trial Chamber, rather than seeking to assess the harm suffered by victims, held that 'the assessment of harm is to be carried out by the TFV during a consultative phase in different localities'.[48] This was to be carried out by the Trust Fund as part of the consultative process referred to earlier. Not only have questions of process and the methodology of assessment been left to the TFV, but substantive issues relating to the prioritization of resources for reparations, the identification of those victims to be treated as eligible for devised programmes, and those not deemed eligible have all been left to the Trust Fund. In its decision the Chamber expressly eschewed an approach which required victims to have applied for reparations in order to be considered eligible for receiving reparations, finding that the 'individual application forms received thus far by the Registry should be transmitted to the TFV' and that '[i]f the TFV considers it appropriate, victims who have applied for reparations could be included in any reparations programme that is to be implemented by the TFV'.[49] In March 2015, the broad outsourcing of harm assessment to the Trust Fund was overturned on appeal.

[47] See Trust Fund for Victims Observations on Reparations in Response to the Scheduling Order of 14 March 2012, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2872, TC I, ICC, 25 April 2012, para. 199.

[48] Lubanga reparations decision (n 2) para. 283, reversed by the Apppeals Chamber Reparations Judgment (n 2), para. 1.

Finally, the Court has proven itself open to collective forms of redress despite the structure and terms of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, set out previously. In Lubanga, the Trial Chamber endorsed the 'suggestion of the TFV that a community-based approach, using the TFV's voluntary contributions, would be more beneficial and have greater utility than individual awards, given the limited funds available and the fact that this approach does not require costly and resource intensive verification procedures'.[50] Thus, not only has the Court eschewed an individualized approach to the initiation and assessment of reparations claims, but it has also indicated its openness to collective forms of redress as well. In March 2015, the Appeals Chamber stressed that collective reparations to a community require a sufficient link between the harm suffered by community members and the crimes of the convicted person (para. 212).

46.6 Conclusion

A tension underlies almost all systems for the redress of potentially mass-scale harm (whether established at the international or national level). This is a tension between the principled need for fairness and consistency in the treatment of victims and potential beneficiaries, against the need for efficiency and the expeditious delivery of redress to those who are to benefit from it and often in very great need. This balance is perhaps all the more difficult for an international institution, such as the ICC, to strike given the paramount importance it gives to treating victims in the various situations which come before it with scrupulous fairness and the very real difficulties that an international institution, without a developed bureaucracy at the national level, will inevitably face in verifying claims and delivering redress to disbursed victim communities. The response of the Trial Chamber to these challenges has been, in its early practice, to favour increasing flexibility in respect of arrangements for victim redress. In circumstances where resources are highly limited and where very few of the many potentially eligible victims can obtain redress, such an approach is perhaps inevitable. Caution, however, is required. In societies which suffer from deeply ingrained poverty, where even relatively modest benefits of one form or another (for instance, access to additional medical services, micro-credit initiatives, or rehabilitation programmes) can, if not distributed through a process seen to be fair, give rise to significant grievance, the need for a degree of rigour in terms of verification may be unavoidable. Moreover, procedures are also necessary to ensure that the integrity of a reparations process, at a more general level, is maintained. Reparations, after all, are not simply a specific form of humanitarian relief or charitable assistance. As suggested by the Appeals Chamber Reparations Judgment, care must be taken to ensure that carefully delineated distinctions are drawn between the proper function of reparations and social or humanitarian assistance which, although equally worthy, serve purposes quite distinct from the administration of criminal justice processes and the recognition of harm suffered by victims which underlie reparations. Proper procedures, including verification and monitoring arrangements, will therefore be necessary to ensure that the overall role of reparations arrangements is respected. The tension between these competing concerns of fairness and effectiveness is not one that is easy to resolve. In each new situation which comes before it, a different and tailored approach by the Court to these issues may be necessary. Time will tell how the balance is best struck.

[49] Ibid., para. 284. [50] Ibid., para. 274.

More generally, the practical difficulty of reconciling the demands of fairness and effectiveness also illustrates that the ICC's regime of victim redress must operate in a manner which supports rather than substitutes redress at the national level. The structure of the reparations regime is perhaps not ideally suited to this endeavour, but Trial Chambers, the OTP, and the Trust Fund for Victims can play a role ensuring that, where possible, national reparations arrangements are encouraged and coordinated with those established under the auspices of the Court. Ultimately, it is this task, that of ensuring an effective relationship between the ICC's regime of victim redress and national systems, which is likely to be the most important with regard to the success or otherwise of the regime.

PART VI

IMPACT, 'LEGACY', AND LESSONS LEARNED

47

The Deterrent Effect of the ICC on the Commission of International Crimes by Government Leaders

Nick Grono and Anna de Courcy Wheeler

47.1 Introduction

The first decade of the ICC's work saw a number of significant milestones—on 14 March 2012 it secured its first conviction in the trial of Thomas Lubanga for war crimes. It also arrested its first former head of state, former president of Côte d'Ivoire Laurent Gbagbo. But for many the ICC's proceedings have been marred by disappointments—over prosecutorial strategy,[1] Trial Chamber decisions that have seen the release of criminal suspects, and notably a growing sense that a permanent court set up to try the worst abuses of humanity has, despite its stated goal, failed to deter the commission of such crimes.

The hope that the ICC could deter the commission of the crimes it was established to try is part of a wider and growing commitment to early warning and prevention of atrocities and other human rights abuses. UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon declared that 2012 would be 'the year of prevention'[2] and the preventive possibilities of the Responsibility to Protect doctrine have been widely discussed.[3] The possibility of a preventive or deterrent effect has repeatedly been proffered as a rationale for the establishment of international criminal tribunals, not least the ICC, where the aim of prevention is specifically stated in the preamble to the Rome Statute.[4] Individual criminal prosecutions, it is posited, set a precedent, establishing international norms and deterring those who would commit egregious international crimes by demonstrating an end to impunity. This assumed deterrent function has been widely criticized by those who argue that the very nature of the crimes prosecuted by the ICC—war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide—make them resistant to deterrence

* Inaugural CEO of the Freedom Fund, former Deputy President and Chief Operating Officer of the International Crisis Group.

 Research and Policy Analyst, International Crisis Group

[1] Strategic Plan June 2012–15, OTP, 11 October 2013.

[2] Address by Ban Ki-moon, Secretary-General of the United Nations, to the Stanley Foundation Conference on the Responsibility to Protect (18 January 2012).

[3] See e.g. J Welsh and SK Sharma, 'Operationalizing the Responsibility to Prevent', (Oxford: Oxford Institute for Ethics, Law and Armed Conflict, 2012).

[4] Preamble of the Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute'), 'Determined to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes and thus to contribute to the prevention of such crimes.'

through prosecution, and that the record of international prosecutions thus far suggests that not only do international prosecutions offer little hope of preventing future atrocities, but risk prolonging conflicts.[5] Such crimes, it is suggested, often require significant mass participation and a degree of moral inversion that suggests the possibility of criminal prosecution would not significantly alter any cost-benefit analysis undertaken by perpetrators, nor would international justice reach to sanction members of the ordinary population whose participation enlivens such crimes. Critics of the ICC in particular point to the slow pace of prosecutions, difficulties in fulfilling arrest warrants—notably in the case of President Al Bashir of Sudan—and allegations of selectivity to argue that the Court as it currently operates cannot hope to have any real deterrent effect.[6]

There is, however, a much-overlooked middle ground. While supporters of the ICC regularly offer prevention of future crimes as a primary benefit and raison d'être for the Court, and its detractors point to the lack of evidence that domestic, let alone international, prosecutions have a deterrent effect on the commission of crimes, there is arguably reason to be hopeful. The possibility of ICC prosecution may be one of a range of calculations made by government leaders in determining, for example, the best way to put down a nascent rebellion, prevent secession, or deal with an increasingly challenging domestic opposition. This is not to suggest a mechanical cause and effect, or that the possibility of prosecution would be determinative. Rather, the prospect of prosecution by the ICC may be one of a range of domestic and international factors—such as the possibility of internal opposition, financial consequences, likelihood of military success, international disapproval short of prosecutions, and the possibility of sanctions and other coercive measures—that, in cases where a regime still perceives room for manoeuvre, could impact upon its strategic calculus.[7]

This chapter explores a growing body of evidence that suggests national leaders are aware of the possibility of ICC prosecution, and that this can influence their decision-making, for better or worse. If there is reason to believe that fear of ICC prosecution factors into a regime or leader's determination to cling to power, it is not unreasonable to posit that such a fear may also, in certain circumstances, act to curtail action and shift the calculus in favour of avoiding war crimes or crimes against humanity.

47.2 The Effect of Prosecutions on Political Calculations

A central difficulty for those seeking to establish a deterrent effect for criminal prosecutions is that 'while we can readily point to those who are not deterred, it is nearly

[5] See e.g. A Branch, 'Uganda's Civil War and the Politics of ICC Intervention' (2007) 21 Ethics and International Affairs 2.

[6] K Rodman, 'Darfur and the Limits of Legal Deterrence' (2008) 30 Human Rights Quarterly 529, 530–4; R Cryer, 'Prosecuting the Leaders: Promises, Politics and Practicalities' (2009) 1 Goettingen Journal of International Law 45.

[7] For an insightful survey of how deterrence might be expected to operate in the international arena see K Cronin-Furman, 'Managing Expectations: International Criminal Trials and the Prospects for Deterrence of Mass Atrocity' (2013) 7 International Journal of Transitional Justice 434.

impossible to identify those who are',[8] a difficulty magnified in an international setting. There are plenty of examples in which the threat of criminal prosecution has failed to deter perpetrators of crimes against humanity or atrocities. Since the establishment of the ICC in July 2002, wars or civil conflict in, inter alia, the DRC, Côte d'Ivoire, Sudan, Syria, and Libya have seen the commission of horrific atrocities that appear to provide ample evidence of the ICC's failure to deter.

This, however, does not mean that deterrence does not work. Those who argue that prosecutions do not deter future violations often focus on what Payam Akhavan has termed 'specific deterrence', that is, the possibility that prosecutions can deter leaders who have already committed war crimes or crimes against humanity from committing them in the future.[9] In fact, this is likely where prosecutions will have the least deterrent effect—in cases where a leader has already committed atrocity crimes, prosecution by the ICC will instead represent an existential threat to power and is thus more likely to cause leaders to dig in or further entrench an abusive or criminal campaign. We have seen this in Sudan, where President Bashir's indictment by the ICC has done little to halt attacks on civilians in both Darfur and, more recently, South Kordofan. Instead our focus should be on the longer-term legal deterrence and the entrenchment of human rights norms. Where prosecutions are unlikely to deter individuals who have already committed war crimes or crimes against humanity, over the longer term they can act to dissuade future generations of leaders from the commission of such crimes.[10]

As with conflict prevention efforts more broadly, the lack of substantive evidence in support of the deterrence theory may simply mean that we cannot concretely establish something that has not happened. There is, despite such evidentiary difficulties, significant anecdotal evidence to suggest that the danger of prosecution by the ICC—which today is one of the few credible threats faced by leaders of warring parties[11]—may influence the calculations and policy choices of national leaders.

47.2.1 Northern Uganda and the LRA

For 20 years the LRA targeted government officials and civilians alike with terror tactics that wreaked havoc and destruction across Northern Uganda. Headed by Joseph

[8] W Schabas, The International Criminal Court: A Commentary on the Rome Statute (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2010) 61.

[9] A Payam. 'Beyond Impunity: Can International Criminal Justice Prevent Future Atrocities?' (2001) 95 American Journal of International Law 7.

[10] See e.g. H Kim and K Sikkink, 'Explaining the Deterrence Effect of Human Rights Prosecutions for Transitional Countries' (2010) 54 International Studies Quarterly 939: 'Once violence has erupted, threats of punishment can do little to achieve immediate deterrence. However, the outbreak of such violence can be inhibited, and its resumption in post-conflict situations prevented, because it often results from an elite's deliberate political choices.'

[11] For example, in Sudan the threat of prosecution by the ICC was practically the only credible threat applied to the Khartoum government in relation to the Darfur conflict in the face of a Security Council unwilling or unable to make tough decisions. The international community's response was limited to the deployment of a small peacekeeping force that has repeatedly been challenged by government and rebel actors. The threat of prosecution itself has thus far not proved credible—the OTP has been unable to secure the arrest of President al-Bashir and other senior indictees.

Kony, who claimed to be on a spiritual mission to cleanse Northern Uganda and to rule according to the Ten Commandments, the LRA abducted tens of thousands of children and adults, putting them to work as porters or sex slaves, or turning them into rebel fighters. The group became notorious not only for their use of child soldiers, who were frequently forced to commit some of the worst atrocities of the conflict as a way of barring their return to civilian life and binding them to the LRA, but also for their willingness to kill and mutilate indiscriminately.[12] The Ugandan government's response—herding over a million of the North's predominantly Acholi inhabitants into squalid, insecure IDP camps—only served to compound the suffering of civilians in the region.[13]

In January 2004 the ICC announced that the Ugandan government had made the first State Party referral to the ICC. The opening of an investigation was controversial from the start. A wide range of international NGOs, mediators, academics, and Northern Ugandans argued that the threat of ICC prosecutions would undermine fragile local peace initiatives, would prolong the conflict by removing the LRA's incentive to negotiate, and would make displaced Northern Ugandans even more vulnerable to LRA attacks.[14] Three years later, however, others claimed that the ICC had played an important role in transforming the conflict in Northern Uganda.[15] A landmark cessation of hostilities agreement in August 2006 removed most LRA combatants from Uganda, allowing civilian resettlement and redevelopment in the region. The LRA has now largely abandoned Northern Uganda as a field of operation, though it continues sporadic attacks in neighbouring countries, most notably the DRC and the CAR.

To what extent the peace process, never completed, can be attributed to the initiation of ICC prosecutions is difficult to determine. Some have argued that the failure of states and other stakeholders to 'consistently and reliably support the international justice mechanisms' undermined their possible preventive or deterrent effect, and instead allowed Kony and the LRA to '[take] advantage of peace talks to regroup and re-arm his forces in order to perpetuate crimes'.[16] Apart from the peace process itself, [12] T Allen, 'War and Justice in Northern Uganda: An Assessment of the International Criminal Court's Intervention', Crisis States Research Centre, Development Studies Institute, London School of Economics (2005); J Egeland, 'A Ugandan Tragedy', Washington Post, 10 November 2004.

[13] A 2005 survey assessing the health of IDPs found an excess mortality rate of almost 1,000 per day, caused by insufficient quality and quantity of healthcare, inadequate water and sanitation services, and a lack of specific disease control interventions. Health and mortality survey among internally displaced persons in Gulu, Kitgum, and Pader districts, Northern Uganda, World Health Organization (2005).

[14] For example, J Volqvartz, 'ICC Under Fire Over Uganda Probe' CNN.com, 23 February 2005; K Southwick, 'When Peace and Justice Clash', International Herald Tribune, 14 October 2005; 'Not a Crime to Talk: Give Peace a Chance in Northern Uganda', Joint Statement by Refugee Law Center and Human Rights Focus (HURIFO) on the Juba Peace Talks (July 2006); H Cobban, 'Uganda: When International Justice and Internal Peace are at Odds', Christian Science Monitor, 24 August 2006; Z Lomo, 'Why the International Criminal Court must Withdraw Indictments against the Top LRA Leaders: A Legal Perspective', Kampala: Refugee Law Project (2006).

[15] N Grono and A O'Brien, 'Justice in Conflict? The ICC and Peace Processes' in N Waddell and P Clark (eds), Courting Conflict? Justice, Peace and the ICC in Africa (Royal African Society 2008); 'Northern Uganda Peace Process: The Need to Maintain Momentum', Crisis Group Africa Briefing No. 46 (2007).

[16] J Mendez, 'Justice and Prevention' in C Stahn and M El Zeidy (eds), The International Criminal Court and Complementarity: From Theory to Practice vol. 1 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2011) 35.

certainly various political and military developments in the region—in particular, the signing of Sudan's Comprehensive Peace Agreement in 2005[17]—reduced the LRA's tactical and strategic options, which in turn compelled the leadership to approach negotiations for a peace settlement with more commitment than in the past.

The ICC process does, however, appear to have had some impact, both through isolating the LRA leadership to the degree that they approached the negotiating table, and in giving them an incentive to reach a deal. The peace process subsequently developed a momentum of its own, and the LRA has effectively withdrawn from Uganda, its ranks depleted by the departure of those who have re-joined civilian life under the auspices of the Amnesties Act enacted in 2000.[18] Some have also suggested that the ICC indictments served to sever the LRA from crucial financial support from the Ugandan diaspora.[19] By raising awareness and focusing the attention of the international community, which in turn created a crucial broad base of regional and international support for the fledgling peace process, the ICC's efforts to hold the LRA leadership criminally responsible for its atrocities in Northern Uganda not only helped create that momentum, but embedded accountability and victims' interests in the structure and vocabulary of the peace process.

The LRA's refusal to negotiate, ostensibly for fear of arrest and prosecution, should of course temper some of the enthusiasm of those who support the ICC prosecutions in Uganda.[20] The LRA leadership has notably cited the ICC indictments as the ultimate barrier to a final peace deal,[21] with the media reporting that the Ugandan government had considered withdrawing Uganda's self-referral to the ICC in order to tempt the LRA towards peace negotiations.[22]

[17] The Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) included a provision that all foreign rebel groups be forced out of Sudan. From the mid-1990s, Sudan had collaborated with and offered support to the LRA, including providing a safe haven to LRA rebels and supplying weapons and training. LRA bases were primarily located in the South, but once the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM) took over the government of the South, the LRA's activities were increasingly curtailed. Nevertheless, accusations that the government of Sudan has resumed its support for the group continue to surface. See e.g. P Ronan et al., 'Hidden in Plain Sight: Sudan's Harbouring of the LRA in the Kafia Kingi Enclave 2009–13', The Resolve LRA Crisis Initiative with The Enough Project and Invisible Children (2013).

[18] The January 2000 Amnesty Act offered amnesty to 'Ugandans involved in acts of a war-like nature' since 26 January 1986. In the decade following its adoption almost 13,000 LRA members received amnesty, securing immunity from prosecution.

[19] See 'The Impact of the Rome Statute System on Victims and Affected Communities', Victims' Rights Working Group (2010) ('VRWG Report') 23: 'In Uganda some community members state that the ICC has had a deterrent effect on people financing and supporting war criminals Ugandan civil society members point out: "[t]here were individuals and institutions both internally within Uganda and in the Diaspora who may have been aiding, promoting and collaborating with the LRA by giving financial, material or technical support to the LRA rebels. The issue of arrest warrants for the top LRA leaders scared this category of collaborators and promoters who eventually gave up with the acts, for fear of being indicted by the ICC […]".'

[20] The ICC has had little success with securing custody of the LRA indictees: of five suspects, two are believed to be dead, and the other three, including Joseph Kony, have not yet been apprehended.

[21] Joseph Kony has himself directly addressed the issue of ICC warrants: 'We seem to have built our own deathbed by committing to this peace process…The international justice system is that if you are weak, the justice is on you…If you want to remain safe from ICC, you must fight and be strong.' Quoted in M Schomerus, 'International involvement and incentives for peace-making in northern Uganda' (2008) 19 Accord 92, 95.

[22] 'From early January 2005 the media reported that LRA leader Joseph Kony and his top commanders feared ICC prosecution if they came out of the bush and that this was an obstacle to the progress

Even with some temporal distance, it remains difficult to separate the influence of the ICC indictments from a host of political and strategic pressures on the LRA. What does appear clear, however, is that both critics and supporters of these indictments agree that they had some effect on the LRA leadership—that the threat of prosecution by the ICC is something that the LRA has taken into account when making strategic decisions on negotiations, surrender, or continued rebel activities. This effect is inter alia reflected in the 2015 transfer of Dominic Ongwen to the Court. This fact in itself is often, understandably, passed over in the rush to determine whether such influence was for the overall good or bad of the conflict and long-suffering victims. Nevertheless, it indicates the ICC's potential to act as a point of leverage, and thus a possible, if not proven, deterrent in the commission of atrocities.

47.2.2 DRC

The situation in the DRC—scene of a devastating civil war since 1998 that, despite a 2003 peace accords, continues in the east—is by some measures the most successful ICC intervention so far. On 14 March 2012 the ICC secured its first conviction, finding Congolese warlord Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, leader of the Union of Congolese Patriots (UPC), guilty of enlisting and using child soldiers in his home district of Ituri in Orientale province. Of the four other indictees whose arrest the ICC has secured, two former defendants—Ituri-based rebel leaders Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui—are Congolese. A third, on trial for alleged war crimes and crimes against humanity in the CAR, is the former Vice-President of the DRC, Jean-Pierre Bemba.

The ICC's activities in the DRC have not been without critics—some have argued that 'in Ituri, the prosecutor's strategy is seen more as fulfilling his own need to get fast judicial results than reflecting the magnitude of Lubanga's crimes'.[23] The ICC's long inability to secure the arrest of Bosco 'the Terminator' Ntaganda, leader of Congrès National pour la Défense du Peuple (National Congress for the Defence of the People, CNDP) rebel group accused of atrocities in the Kivus, who in January 2005 was integrated into the DRC armed forces despite the ICC arrest warrant, prompted fears that a perception of impunity could empower those targeting civilians.[24] These fears were compounded in December 2011 when Callixte Mbarushimana, alleged executive secretary of the FDLR and accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity in the Kivus, was released by the ICC, and the charges against him dismissed.[25] Though of the peace talks. According to press reports the government provided the LRA with assurances that the ICC investigation could be withdrawn, or an amnesty given, if the LRA agreed to peace talks. One report suggested that the government's reassurances were contained in a draft Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) given to the LRA on 4 January, but this could not be confirmed as the MoU had not been made public by the end of January. There appeared to be confusion about the legal basis (if any) for formally withdrawing a complaint which had already been submitted to the ICC.' CRC Country Briefing: Uganda—Update April 2004 to January 2005, Coalition to Stop the Use of Child Soldiers (2005).

[23] 'Jury Still Out on ICC Trials in DRC', IRIN News, 19 January 2011.

[24] Report of the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary, or arbitrary executions, Philip Alston, Human Rights Council, Fourteenth Session, Mission to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, UN Doc A/HRC/14/24/Add.3 (2010).

[25] 'Prosecutor Seeks New Charges in DRC', IWPR, 18 May 2012.

Ntaganda eventually surrendered and was transferred to ICC custody, his case serves as a reminder to many of the ICC's impotency in the absence of state cooperation. Others have criticized the ICC for concentrating on small-time rebel leaders, particularly those in Ituri, rather than focusing efforts on establishing charges against government members or high-ranking officials who are perceived as leading drivers of the DRC's civil conflict.[26]

There are, nevertheless, indications that the ICC prosecutions are having some impact on the strategic decisions of troop commanders in the DRC. Media reports suggest that a number of ex-combatants have noticed a modification in the behaviour of rebel commanders designed to avoid the possibility of ICC prosecution.[27] In April 2010 the Victims' Rights Working Group reported the perceived positive impact of the ICC arrests on the national peace process, including demobilisation, noting the belief among some victim communities in South Kivu that 'the ICC [. . .] deters, dissuades'.[28] As always, concrete evidence of the impact of ICC prosecutions is hard to come by. But, again, anecdotal evidence suggests that ICC indictments can act as a point of leverage to influence the calculations of certain leaders.

47.2.3 Colombia

The situation in Colombia has been under preliminary examination by the ICC Prosecutor since 2006. For over 40 years Colombia has been devastated by civil conflict, with approximately one-tenth of the population suffering displacement.[29] Two years later, the OTP declared that it would not open an official investigation, since the Colombian courts were undertaking war crimes and crimes against humanity trial proceedings, but that the situation remains under analysis.[30] In December 2011 and November 2013 the Prosecutor published a report presenting preliminary research findings, including those that indicate the commission of crimes against humanity and war crimes. Notably, the reports also indicated that crimes attributed to the Colombian army—including the use of 'false positives',[31] or the killing of civilians and the disguising of their bodies as guerrillas in order to artificially inflate the body count of guerrillas killed in combat—had come under analysis or pre-investigation.[32]

[26] J Stearns, Dancing in the Glory of Monsters (New York: Public Affairs 2011), 334: 'It is precisely because many former warlords are still in power that diplomats have been wary of launching prosecutions. This has resulted in an army and government replete with criminals who have little deterrent to keep them from resorting to violence again.'

[27] See e.g. 'Jury Still Out on ICC Trials in DRC', IRIN News, 19 January 2011.

[28] VRWG Report (n 19).

[29] J Easterday, 'Deciding the Fate of Complementarity: A Colombian Case Study' (2009) 26 Arizona Journal of International & Comparative Law 50.

[30] M Isabel, 'Moreno Ocampo: "Colombia Resembles But is Not Congo" ', 29 August 2008 <http://www.ossin.org/en/misc-americhe/moreno-ocampo-sulla-colombia.html> accessed 15 September 2014.

[31] In a report on Colombia in March 2010 the UN Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial executions noted that 'while there are examples of such [false positives] going back to the 1980s, the evidence indicates that they began occurring with disturbing frequency across Colombia from 2004'. Report of the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions, Philip Alston, Mission to Colombia, Human Rights Council, Fourteenth Session, UN Doc A/HRC/14/24/Add.2, (2010).

[32] Report on Preliminary Examination Activities, ICC OTP (2011).

Despite the possibility of prosecutions remaining relatively remote, there is nevertheless anecdotal evidence to suggest that the initiation of a pre-investigation and the possibility of prosecution before the ICC held significant sway over actors in the armed conflict.[33] Since the OTP announced its interest in the country, the government has taken a number of measures—most notably promulgating Peace and Justice Law[34]—arguably designed to avoid the spectacle of high-ranking government officials and army officers appearing at The Hague.[35] The improvement of Colombia's judicial workings has been attributed to the ICC's pre-investigation activities, with the Prosecutor's exertion of pressure on the government through visits and statements being credited with '[boosting] Colombia's historically ineffective justice system'.[36] The efforts of the Supreme Court in tackling impunity for human rights violations has similarly been partially credited to the threat of ICC-driven prosecutions and the desire to keep the accountability process in Colombia.[37]

The threat of ICC prosecution appears to not only have influenced the calculations of the Colombian government—including former President Pastrana who, according to the Wikileaks cables, expressed (unwarranted) concern that he may be prosecuted

[33] See e.g. P Engstrom, 'In the Shadow of the ICC: Colombia and International Criminal Justice', Report of the Expert Conference Examining the Nature and Dynamics of the Role of the International Criminal Court in the Ongoing Investigation and Prosecution of Atrocious Crimes Committed in Colombia (2011): 'Colombia's ratification of the Rome Statute and the OTP's ongoing interest in the country has already had an important impact in Colombia that goes far beyond merely influencing domestic criminal law. The prospect of prosecutions before the ICC has played directly into the dynamics of the armed confrontation, including the recent demobilisations of right-wing paramilitary groups. Various high-level initiatives are being undertaken by the government to avoid Colombian military officials and their civilian counterparts being brought before the ICC, and the left-wing guerrilla groups equally appear to be engaged in damage-limitation measures. In tandem, heightened sensitivity around issues of justice and peace has developed across Colombian society, as different sectors re-evaluate their positions or build new forms of alliances, both in elite political circles and among the diverse victims of the armed conflict.'

[34] The law came into force in 2005 and provides for reduced sentences for demobilized guerrillas and paramilitaries, but notably by August 2012 only two people had been sentenced despite the participation of over 4,000 demobilized guerrillas and paramilitaries. Despite these disheartening figures, the OTP in 2011 reported that '[t]here is no basis at this stage to conclude that the existing [national investigations and proceedings] are not genuine. The Office will continue to monitor the commission of new crimes and the judicial developments.' Report on Preliminary Examination Activities, ICC OTP (2011), para. 87.

[35] It is worth noting that this Law has been extensively criticized as being used as a shield to ICC prosecution, rather than representing a true attempt to secure justice of the victims. See e.g. K Ambos and F Huber, 'The Colombian Peace Process and the Principle of Complementarity of the International Criminal Court: Is there Sufficient Willingness and Ability on the Part of the Colombian Authorities or Should the Prosecutor Open an Investigation Now?', Extended version of the Statement in the 'Thematic Session: Colombia' ICC OTP–NGO roundtable (2010) 7: 'In the Colombian case, special attention must be given to the extradition of paramilitary leaders to the US, the pressure exercised by the former Uribe government against judicial sectors and the fact that Law 915 of 2005 is only being applied on a voluntary basis to a very reduced number of members of illegal armed groups who accept to be prosecuted under the special criminal procedure. Therefore, the great majority of members of illegal armed groups and all state officials are excluded from the application of Law 975 of 2005, which poses the question if there is a real willingness to investigate and prosecute effectively these persons under the subsidiary ordinary criminal system.' See also Easterday (n 29).

[36] The ICC's Colombia Investigation: Recent Developments and Domestic Proceedings, American Non-Governmental Organizations Coalition for the International Criminal Court (2009) 8.

[37] Id.

by the ICC for his actions while in power from 1998–2002[38]—but also those of paramilitary leaders operating under the umbrella of the United Self-defence Forces of Colombia (Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia, AUC).[39] Carlos Castaño, a paramilitary commander at one time believed to have been a leading figure in the AUC, was apparently sharply aware and fearful of the possibility of ICC prosecution, a fear that reportedly directly contributed to his demobilization.[40]

Though the degree to which the fear of prosecution by the ICC motivated Castaño's relinquishing of arms was arguably exceptional, what is clear is that, though other political or strategic motivations may have exerted a stronger influence on decision-making processes, following Colombia's ratification of the Rome Statute in 2002 and the expiration in November 2009 of the seven-year grace period contained in its Article 124 reservations to the Statute, paramilitary commanders in Colombia were aware of the risk of ICC prosecution and took this risk into account. This does not mean that they were immediately deterred—in 2012 Avocats Sans Frontières reported the continued existence of paramilitaries, neo-paramilitaries, and accompanying human rights violations.[41] Rather, it indicated that, as in the DRC and Uganda, in certain situations there may be space to use the possibility of ICC prosecutions as leverage not only against government leaders, but also against rebel groups.

47.2.4 Sudan and the case of Darfur

The case of Sudan represents the strongest challenge to those seeking to argue that the ICC provides a deterrent to the commission of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The government has proven immune not only to ICC pressures, but also those of the Security Council whose repeated resolutions calling a halt to violence in Darfur were routinely ignored.[42] For some, Sudan therefore provides clear evidence that ICC's prosecutions do not, and cannot, have a deterrent effect.

The war in Darfur truly began in February 2003 when rebels took up arms against a centralized government in Khartoum. The response was unequivocal—the government of Omar Al Bashir launched a military campaign, relying heavily on paramilitary [38] A cable from then-US Ambassador William Brownfield to Washington dated 14 November 2007 revealed that Pastrana had voiced concern that the ICC could attempt to prosecute him for allegedly creating a safe haven for narcoterrorists through the Caguan process.

[39] See e.g. C Sriram, 'The ICC Africa Experiment: The Central African Republic, Darfur, Northern Uganda, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo', Annual Convention of the International Studies Association (2008): 'there is anecdotal evidence both that fear of ICC prosecution motivated paramilitary fighters (or at least their leaders) in Colombia to strike a deal, and that fear of prosecutions may lead them to return to fighting or deter the two main guerrilla groups from negotiating.'

[40] 'Habla Vicente Castaño' ('Vicente Castaño Speaks'), Revista Semana, 5 June 2005.

[41] The Principle of Complementarity in the Rome Statute and the Colombian Situation: A Case that Demands More than a 'Positive' Approach, Avocats Sans Frontières (2009) militias and Janjaweed, displaced over 2.5 million people, and killed an estimated 300,000 in the first five years.[43] In 2007 the ICC issued arrest warrants for the Sudanese Minister of State for Humanitarian Affairs, Ahmad Harun, and for alleged Janjaweed leader Ali Kushayb issues in 2007. These arrests were eclipsed in March 2009 by the Court's indictment of President Bashir for war crimes and crimes against humanity in Darfur in a landmark decision to try a sitting head of state.

[42] UN Security Council Resolution 1564 called on the Government of Sudan to 'end the climate of impunity in Darfur by identifying and bringing to justice all those responsible […] and insists that the Government of Sudan take all appropriate steps to stop all violence and atrocities', UNSC Res 1564 (18 September 2004) UN Doc S/RES/1564, para. 7; UN Security Council Resolution 1556 called on the Government of Sudan to disarm Janjaweed militias, allow humanitarian access, and investigate violations of human rights and international humanitarian law. See UNSC Res 1556 (30 July 2004) UN Doc S/RES/1556.

The Prosecutor was almost immediately pilloried for what some, including the Assistant-General for Peacekeeping, saw as not only judicial overreach, but a step that could endanger the fragile peace processes in both Darfur and South Sudan.[44] The government reacted to Bashir's indictment by expelling 13 international aid agencies, including Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF) and Oxfam, and shutting down Sudanese human rights groups. Kidnappings of aid workers increased following the issuance of the warrant for Bashir—on 11 March, a week after the warrant was issued, five MSF aid workers were kidnapped. For many, these actions acted to bolster the belief that the government of Sudan would not be swayed, let alone deterred, by the threat of ICC prosecution. The government continues to obstruct any ICC attempts at investigation and the prosecution has, thus far, relied exclusively on evidence gathered outside Darfur.

Though the leading inner circle of Bashir's ruling National Congress Party (NCP) proved unresponsive to the threat of prosecution by the ICC and to Security Council ultimatums, there are signs that the government was not entirely immune or indifferent to the international stigmatization associated with such measures. Following the Prosecutor's July 2008 application for an arrest warrant for Bashir, there was a flurry of announcements of renewed peace initiatives and yet another ceasefire declaration. With regard to more concrete measures, the ICC indictment appears to have had little impact, though this could arguably be attributed more to the fact that the regime, confident most of the condemnation from the Security Council and wider international community would amount to nothing more than empty threats, calculated that continued warfare held the promise of best results—the reticence of the United States, for fear of upsetting the hard-won North–South peace deal, China's continued oil interests, and the lack of decisive sanctioning action by the Security Council, arguably fostered conditions where the regime had more to gain by continuing down a path that involved war crimes and crimes against humanity than it did by dialling back and committing to a genuine peace process.[45]

[43] Report to United Nations Security Council by Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs and Emergency Relief Coordinator John Holmes, 22 April 2008.

[44] See e.g. K Ainley, 'The International Criminal Court on Trial' (2011) 24 Cambridge Review of International Affairs 3 325: 'In November 2008, Assistant Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Edmond Mulet told the Security Council that Ocampo's attempts to charge Bashir could potentially derail the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement in South Sudan, and lead to serious security threats to UN peacekeepers in Darfur'. See also A de Waal, 'The ICC, Sudan and the Crisis of Human Rights', African Arguments, 5 March 2009; J Flint and A de Waal, 'To Put Justice before Peace Spells Disaster for Sudan', The Guardian, 6 March 2009.

[45] P Castillo, 'Rethinking Deterrence: The International Criminal Court in Sudan', UNISCI Discussion Papers, 13 (2007).

47.2.5 Newer cases—Kenya and Mali

The ICC has more recently brought a raft of newer charges and cases in Africa, in Mali, Kenya, and Libya. Each case is unique, with only Mali inviting ICC intervention, and each has received dramatically differing levels of domestic support. In Kenya, political leaders who had initially argued that only the ICC could provide the requisite independence and impartiality to ensure a fair trial quickly backtracked. Kenyan politicians repeatedly attempted to block the ICC prosecutions, lobbying to have the case suspended. These attempts to block accountability processes, though primarily rooted in the need to secure domestic support, particularly among certain ethnic groups, could also hint at a tendency among senior politicians to see prosecution, whether international or domestic, as a threat to their traditional ability to use violence to retain power during elections. The cases, once under way, received further blows—one of the judges on the case withdrew in April 2013 citing a heavy workload but amid criticisms of the prosecution's behaviour, and a key indictee, Uhuru Kenyatta, was elected President while fellow indictee William Ruto took the post of Vice-President. Kenyatta's trial has been repeatedly delayed at the request of the prosecution, and the ICC's ASP agreed that Kenyatta did not always need to be present at trial. But at the same time, widely feared election violence did not manifest—the peaceful holding of elections may be attributable, to some degree, to a fear of prosecution outweighing any possible political gains from violence.

In July 2012 the government of Mali, following a coup and the re-emergence of a powerful secessionist movement in the North, referred its case to the ICC. After conducting a preliminary examination the OTP in January 2013 opened an investigation into alleged crimes including murder and rape since January 2012. Though the case was originally referred by the Malian government, ICC Prosecutor Bensouda's repeated and firm assertions that the ICC will be watching all sides to the conflict, rather than only the rebels, raises the possibility that the ICC intervention in Mali could act to constrain the commission of abuses by government forces, particularly as military action in the north came at a time when the government was also struggling to establish international legitimacy.

47.2.6 Other international criminal prosecutions

Of course the ICC prosecutions are just the latest manifestation of a growing international trend towards individual criminal responsibility in the international sphere. Any possible deterrent effect of ICC prosecutions will naturally build on prosecutions that have come before, or that occur alongside the ICC's activities. The ad hoc ICTR and ICTY solidified the concept of individual international criminal responsibility, and the Yugoslav Tribunal in particular, having been established during an ongoing conflict, indicates the way in which potential or actual perpetrators can be influenced by the threat of prosecution. Many have noted that atrocities continued to be committed well after the establishment of the ICTY[46]—the Srebrenica massacre, the most infamous atrocity in the Yugoslav wars, occurred after the Tribunal was established. There were, however, patterns of behaviour modification that could be attributed to the establishment of the Tribunal and a fear of prosecution—examples such as the moving of mass graves to better disguise crimes and the perceived restraint of the Kosovo Liberation Army. In Sierra Leone, the Special Court's conviction of Charles Taylor, which marks the first time an international tribunal has convicted a former head of state, has been widely applauded. There are also indications that the threat of prosecution had an impact on perpetrator behaviour—some argue that the Court may have further fuelled the conflict in Liberia by driving combatants to join the Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy rebel group in an attempt to avoid possible indictments in Sierra Leone.[47]

[46] See e.g. M Drumbl, Atrocity, Punishment and International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007) 149.

47.2.7 Assessment of practice

Unfortunately, concrete evidence of immediate or short-term deterrence resulting from ICC prosecutions will by its nature remain scant, and it is currently too early to trace any longer-term deterrent effect. Nevertheless, anecdotal evidence from states subject to ICC investigations, indictments, or prosecutions indicates cause to be hopeful.[48] As the ICC becomes more widely known, its norms deeper entrenched, there appears to be a growing realization amongst governments, and perhaps more surprisingly rebel leaders, that they too could find themselves in the dock. Though there is evidence to suggest that in some situations, particularly those where conflict is ongoing and where war crimes or crimes against humanity have already occurred, the possibility of international individual criminal prosecution may act to prolong conflict, thereby facilitating the further commission of atrocities, there are equally certain situations, notably where a leader is not facing an existential threat, where the possibility of an ICC prosecution could tip the cost-benefit scale away from a criminal course of action. If there is reason to believe that fear of ICC prosecution factors into a leader's determination to cling onto power, it is not unreasonable to suggest that such a fear may also, in certain circumstances, factor into the cost-benefit analysis of a despot intent on crushing a secessionist or revolutionary movement, ethnic group, or the opposition.

47.3 The Wider Context, Public Policymaking

The debate over the role of prosecutions in deterring international crimes forms part of a larger debate on how, if at all, international pressure can encourage the development of rule of law and democracy, and reduce human rights abuses and repression in sovereign states. There are techniques we are all familiar with—the 'naming [47] M Staggs, Second Interim Report on the SCSL, UC Berkeley War Crimes Studies Center (2006) 23.

[48] See M Burnham, 'Naissance of the Court: The ICC at Ten', Global Policy Forum (2008) and 'Courting History: The Landmark International Criminal Court's First Years', Human Rights Watch (2008) 69 on the 'Lubanga syndrome'; see also D Wippman, 'Can an International Criminal Court Prevent and Punish Genocide?' in N Riemer (ed.), Protection against Genocide: Mission Impossible (Westport: Praeger Publishers 2000) 91.

and shaming' approach taken by much of the human rights community,[49] the imposition of sanctions,[50] the offering of development aid or lucrative financial and business arrangements to those states that engage with the international community,[51] and the threat of military intervention.[52] Nevertheless, one of the main challenges for international policymakers in their efforts to resolve conflicts or reduce human right abuses is that they often lack effective incentives or sanctions (diplomatic, legal, military, or economic) of sufficient credibility to influence the calculations of the warring parties.

Taking as a starting point the assumption that leaders—of governments or of rebel groups—wish to either maintain or attain access to domestic power, and that these leaders take rational and goal-oriented decisions, it is possible to establish a framework for elite decision-making that can elucidate how international pressure, including in the form of ICC prosecution, could influence the decision-making process of domestic leaders.[53] Prosecution of government leaders attaches personal culpability to those who act as 'conflict entrepreneurs', that is to say, those who strategically foment and normalize hatred and their accompanying crimes.[54] This personal culpability can have both direct (imprisonment) and indirect (bolstering opposition movements, reducing aid flows) deleterious effects on a leader's personal power. Furthermore, not only are government leaders more likely to have knowledge of the international legal system and the concept of international individual criminal responsibility than an average citizen, but they are also arguably more likely to be motivated by rational considerations that allow for the kind of cost-benefit analysis central to any model of deterrence.[55] Thus when evaluating the possibility of deterring such leaders, it may be that a practical approach that emphasizes the need to extend prosecution and dissemination of the work of the ICC can have some impact.

[49] Several human rights organisations, including Human Rights Watch and Amnesty, frequently adopt a 'name-and-shame' approach. For example, in 2000 Amnesty published two-dozen reports on Israel's activities and abuses in the Occupied Palestinian Territories. Myanmar was similarly targeted following the Junta's seizure of power in the late 1980s, with Amnesty, Avaas, and others leading an annual Global Day of Action for Burma. Atrocities in Sudan's Darfur have garnered much high-profile, sometimes celebrity, attention.

[50] A range of sanctions were imposed by the UN Security Council, the US, and the EU on Iraq, for example, after the invasion of Kuwait in 1990, and then later tied to the removal of WMDs; sanctions were also imposed on Yugoslavia in 1992 over the expulsion of non-Serb civilians and other human rights abuses. Similarly Muammar Gaddafi's regime was sanctioned following the Lockerbie bombing in 1992. Long-standing sanctions on Burma have been slowly lifted since 2013 in response to positive developments in the country.

[51] Since the early 1990s the EU has tied respect for human rights to specific agreements, including human rights conditionality clauses in its association agreements and other international trade and cooperation agreements. Several states, including Sri Lanka, Nicaragua, and India, have refused to sign a GSP+ agreement with the EU, allowing them preferential access to the EU market, in part due to the human rights and democracy requirements attached to these agreements.

[52] Several states have been threatened with military intervention on the basis of human rights abuses or atrocities, including Yugoslavia (ahead of the NATO bombing), Libya, and more recently Syria.

[53] David Keen has broken elite goals in situations where atrocity crimes are committed into four overlapping aims: (i) to establish or extend state power; (ii) to shore up elites against a threat; (iii) to legitimize or facilitate exploitation; (iv) to resolve insecurities. D Keen, Complex Emergencies (Cambridge: Polity Press 2008).

[54] Drumbl (n 46).

[55] Robinson and Darley have suggested three prerequisites for deterrence: (i) potential offenders must be aware of the law and punishments, and understand what constitutes criminal behaviour; (ii) they must feel that the law is applicable to them, understanding that the law as applied at a different time, to Rebel groups, however, are less likely to be vulnerable to international pressure. Most rebellions fail, and most rebels embarking on their challenge to the central government are unlikely to be concerned that they may later be sanctioned for their atrocities. For these individuals, survival and success are probably much more immediate concerns. When it comes to the calculations of government officials, however, sanctions—including prosecution—present a threat to power they have already attained, and thus may have greater influence or deterrent impact. If the threat of prosecution for future atrocities is a credible threat, then a government leader will arguably weigh that risk when deciding how to respond to a challenge to their authority, assuming a rational decision-making process.

Following this rationalist policymaking school of thought, the form international pressure takes and the degree to which it is successful will to a large extent be dependent upon complex domestic political contexts. Folch and Wright have set out a useful taxonomy of authoritarian regimes, and how different structures of repression and resource distribution affect sensitivity to economic sanctions, which can be of use in predicting how such regimes might react to legal sanctions.[56] Of particular interest is their finding that certain regimes—those which are heavily reliant on patronage networks and pay-offs to a small ruling elite—are particularly vulnerable to economic sanctions, which they argue 'may actually increase the perception of threat on the part of the members of the small supporting coalition of a personalist ruler, while at the same time the benefits of such support are likely to shrink'.[57] Like economic sanctions, by increasing the costs of supporting an indicted leader, ICC prosecutions can corrode the power base of leaders who rely on highly centralized systems of government. The degree to which the ICC can hope to deter through a pattern of prosecutions will always be hostage to the immediate domestic context. Autocratic leaders who face an existential threat are unlikely to be swayed by the possibility of prosecution, but those with hope of retaining power through non-criminal means are more likely to view the threat of indictment as a disincentive to criminal action.

47.3.1 The normative value of ICC prosecutions

When combined with a rationalist theory of domestic policy decision-making, the theory of incrementalism gives a more nuanced understanding of how and why national leaders make certain policy decisions with implications for foreign relations, particularly in the context of human rights. Incrementalism posits that public policy is structurally biased towards incremental changes to a largely stable status quo. Thus the uncertainty of the costs and consequences of radical change acts to limit leaders to a different person, and possibly in a different way applies equally to them; (iii) the individual must find that the costs outweigh the benefits of criminality. P Robinson and J Darley, 'Does Criminal Law Deter? A Behavioural Science Investigations' (2004) 24 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 173, 174.

[56] A Excribà-Folch and J Wright, 'Dealing with Tyranny: International Sanctions and Autocrats' Duration', IBEI Working Papers (2008).

[57] Id.

changes that fall within the parameters of existing policy consensus. This incrementalism has been observed on a much larger, and longer, scale by philosopher Steven Pinker. Writing on the decline in violence over the arch of human history, he has emphasized the growing intolerance of human society towards war, torture, and other forms of brutality, reflecting a normative shift in what is viewed as acceptable and part of the status quo.[58] A similar, more narrowly focused shift can be seen in international politics and the human rights movement, where concern for the conduct of hostilities between states set out in the Hague Conventions at the turn of the twentieth century has given way to increasing concerns over the internal conduct of state leaders, a development that would have been unthinkable in the previous millennia where state sovereignty precluded outside interference in the internal affairs of another state. As part of a growing normative value attached to human rights, prosecutions for war crimes or crimes against humanity are arguably progressively narrowing the space for criminal courses of action that as recently as 60 years ago were deemed to be beyond the concern of the international community.

Over the past two decades, human rights trials have gathered pace as part of a growing focus of individual criminal accountability in human rights law. The establishment of the ICTR and ICTY as well as a number of hybrid tribunals, including those in Sierra Leone and Cambodia, and the increasing number of domestic human rights trials for previous leaders, seen particularly in Latin America, are all part of what has been termed a 'justice cascade'.[59] In particular, the recent conviction of Charles Taylor, and the prosecutions of Bashir, Gbagbo, and Milošević, evidence a growing norm that posits that even national leaders who would have once been able to claim state immunity are no longer viewed as immune from international criminal prosecution for war crimes or crimes against humanity. The ICC—the world's first permanent international court established to try war crimes and crimes against humanity—marks for many a high point in the project of international justice, and has itself indicted two of these government leaders. As the norms of international law and individual criminal accountability become increasingly entrenched, the ICC has the opportunity, through its prosecutions, to contribute to emerging culpability norms that act to limit future atrocity crimes both by making them more costly in terms of a rational public policy choice analysis, and by establishing such crimes as firmly outside the status quo of behaviour accepted on the international scale.

Kathryn Sikkink and Hoon Kim have argued that an examination of data on human rights prosecutions suggests that 'both normative pressures and material punishment are at work in deterrence'.[60] Legal norms and expanding human rights discourse are increasingly acting to shape the decisions and even identity of political actors. As these human rights norms—which include the increasing legalization of [58] S Pinker, The Better Angels of Our Nature: The Decline of Violence in History and its Causes (London: Penguin Books 2011).

[59] E Lutz and K Sikkink, 'The Justice Cascade: The Evolution and Impact of Foreign Human Rights Trials in Latin America' (2001) 2 Chicago Journal of International Law 1.

[60] H Kim and K Sikkink, 'Explaining the Deterrence Effect of Human Rights Prosecutions for Transitional Countries' (2010) 54 International Studies Quarterly 939, 942.

human rights—move towards global institutionalization, non-compliant regimes risk increasingly heavy costs to legitimacy and reputation.

47.3.2 Strengthening the ICC

If we accept that, in certain cases, the possibility of prosecution by the ICC may have some limited influence on the policy decisions of leaders, either through increasing the costs to 'conflict entrepreneurs' of criminal courses of action, or by incrementally narrowing the policy options to exclude the most egregious crimes, the question then turns to how the ICC and international community can best leverage this influence to deterrent effect. The impact of ICC prosecutions rests on the credibility and consistency of the Court, as well as the willingness of the international community to accept such prosecutions as a signal of pariah status—'only if national or international institutions establish a credible and consistent pattern of accountability replacing impunity, it will be possible over time to impose a high cost on the use of atrocities to further political goals'.[61]

Key to the ICC's deterrent success will be its ability to secure arrests and convictions. The ICC took ten years to secure its first conviction, meaning that for the first decade of its operation its deterrent value was more theoretical than actual. The Lubanga trial, though criticized for its slow pace and its focus only on the recruitment of child soldiers, marked the first successful prosecution of a defendant under the Rome Statute and hopefully marks a turning point. By securing a conviction, the OTP, and the Court as a whole, demonstrated its effectiveness for the first time.

But the Court's reliance on political will in order to secure both arrests and convictions remains problematic. Without any standing police or military force to execute arrest warrants, the ICC depends wholly on international cooperation and in particular the acquiescence of the UN Security Council's permanent five members who can exert the necessary pressure on intransigent national governments.

Unfortunately, international cooperation in the execution of arrest warrants has been inconsistent at best. On 25 May 2010 Pre-Trial Chamber I issued a complaint to the Security Council over the non-compliance, or lack of cooperation, of Sudan in the cases of Ahmad Harun and Ali Kushayb, and suggested the Security Council take any action it deemed appropriate.[62] The Security Council has so far not addressed this matter—it has not sanctioned Sudan in any way, and there appears to have been no renewed effort to secure the arrest of the two indictees despite repeated reminders by the ICC (among others) that the matter is in the Council's hands. Similarly a number of African States Parties to the Rome Statute have declined to arrest President Bashir during state visits, and the African Union has argued that as a rule, heads of state should not be tried by the Court while in office. Yet even where there is a degree of political will, the Court still struggles to apprehend suspects. In Uganda, the national army has repeatedly failed to secure the arrest of LRA indictees despite improvements to their capabilities, and a lack of coordinated response by regional governments has allowed the LRA to retreat across borders and to continue its attacks.

[61] P Castillo, 'Rethinking Deterrence: The International Criminal Court in Sudan', UNISCI Discussion Papers, 13 (2007).

[62] Decision informing the United Nations Security Council about the lack of cooperation by the Republic of Sudan, Harun and Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-10/07-57, PTC I, ICC, 25 May 2010, 7.

Securing the arrest of suspects, when it happens, is only the first step in a process that hopes to provide an end to impunity. The threat of prosecution will only be credible if it is carried out both consistently and successfully, but securing convictions is by no means a foregone conclusion. The Lubanga case came close to collapse a number of times on procedural grounds, and despite his successful arrest, Callixte Mbarushimana's case did not come to trial after Pre-Trial Chamber I declined to confirm charges against him that included both war crimes and crimes against humanity due to a lack of substantial incriminating evidence against him.[63]

There is also the danger that, due to political concerns, a case may not even get so far as an evaluation of evidence and procedure: though the Rome Statute provides no mechanism for the withdrawal of warrants, a number of UN members have suggested that cooperation in peace processes could lead to the suspension or deferral of an ICC investigation or prosecution.[64] In both Sudan and Uganda, the Prosecutor has faced calls to abandon investigations or withdraw warrants to enable a peace deal to be made. Such calls do little to bolster the potential deterrent effect of ICC prosecutions. If the ICC is unable to convict perpetrators of atrocities because its prosecutions are consistently trumped by peace processes that explicitly or implicitly offer immunity, then its value as a deterrent will inevitably be compromised. Would-be perpetrators will not be deterred from the commission of war crimes or crimes against humanity by the threat of future prosecution if they are confident that a later agreement to participate in peace processes will secure them de jure or de facto immunity.

Calls to halt justice for the purposes of peace and an evident reliance on the P-5 for support have also exacerbated allegations and perceptions that the OTP has been politicized. Perceptions of a politicized office have damaged the legitimacy of the Prosecutor in the eyes of signatory states, most notably in Africa, and of civil society observers. As Kirstin Ainley has noted, 'the circumstances of [the ICC's] establishment and the first years of its operation have shown how bound-up the Court is with political power and political processes'.[65]

To limit such perceptions, it is vital that the Prosecutor's decisions are seen to be based on legal merit rather than political expediency. If political decisions must be made, they should be made by the UN Security Council which, under Article 16, has the power to defer an ICC investigation or prosecution for a renewable period of 12 months. For example, in cases where the Prosecutor is called on to halt investigations or withdraw warrants in the interests of peace, such decisions should rightly be seen as falling within the peace and security mandate of the Security Council. Though Article 53 of the Rome Statutes allows for the Prosecutor to decide to halt an investigation or prosecution if it is 'in the interests of justice',[66] the same option is not provided for in the interests of peace. The Rome Statute instead evinces a strong presumption that the kind of crimes under the Court's jurisdiction require effective criminal punishment, and the fact that negotiations are under way would not in itself be sufficient for the Prosecutor to halt proceedings.

[63] Decision on the Confirmation of Charges, Mbarushimana, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/10-465-Red, PTC I, ICC, 16 December 2011.

[64] The AU has widely campaigned for the deferral of ICC cases against Sudan's President al-Bashir and Kenya's President and Vice-Presidents Uhuru Kenyatta and William Ruto, and has received at various points backing from P-5 members Russia and China among others.

[65] K Ainley, 'The International Criminal Court on Trial' (2011) 24 Cambridge Review of International Affairs 309, 320.

The Court's legitimacy has also been harmed by its focus on African states. Of 21 cases and eight country situations brought before the Court in its first 12 years of operation, all are African. This has partly been a by-product of the UNSC's referral power—both Sudan and Libya, who were not signatories to the Rome Statute and therefore did not fall under the automatic jurisdiction of the Court, were referred by the Security Council. This power, though it expands the Court's jurisdictional reach, is a political, rather than legal one, and thus risks tainting the Court itself with allegations of political selectivity. The Court's focus on African states to the detriment of others where egregious atrocities have been reported, such as in Afghanistan and Sri Lanka, has eroded much of the initial support received from African governments by playing into critiques that paint the ICC as a tool of the West, used by powerful states to sanction weaker nations. The OTP is currently conducting preliminary examinations of a number of non-African states, including Afghanistan, Georgia, Honduras, Korea, and the Ukraine.[67] The launch of a full investigation and the initiation of prosecutions in any of these states should substantial evidence of war crimes or crimes against humanity be found, would hopefully work to contradict such allegations.

Just as the Court is, through Security Council referrals and its need for support, rendered at least partially dependent on the political will of the P-5 and other powerful states, it is also dependent upon the cooperation of states under investigation. This has arguably led to a situation in which, in order to maintain the cooperation of governments, the Court has shied away from targeting government leaders and instead focused on rebel groups. These accusations have been levelled at the Court in the situations of Uganda and the DRC, where government actors have played a significant role in provoking or exacerbating conflict. If the Court is to have the hoped for deterrent impact, it must not allow government leaders to use it as a tool against political opponents or to shield themselves from rigorous scrutiny. The potential deterrent impact of ICC prosecutions, which could be expected to have a greater impact on government leaders than on rebel groups, is lost if government leaders who themselves abuse human rights can escape conviction.

Finally, but perhaps most crucially, it is essential that the Court and international community act in unison in their response to war crimes and crimes against humanity. The Court, where necessary, should cajole or shame the international community, particularly those states who spearheaded its creation and who profess to be strong supporters of the Court, into taking concrete action to support the Court's arrest warrants, investigations, and prosecutions. One of the most powerful deterrent effects of ICC prosecutions may be those that are indirect—other sanctioning measures initiated as a result of the Court's finding that there is preliminary evidence to suggest a leader is guilty of committing, sanctioning, or aiding and abetting atrocities. Leaders may fear ICC prosecution not so much because they foresee a real possibility that they might themselves end up in the ICC dock, but because prosecution by the ICC is the strongest international signaller of pariah status, with all the political, economic, and strategic punishment that entails. As Richard Falk has noted, 'the maximum impact of human rights pressures, absent enforcement mechanisms, is to isolate a target government, perhaps denying it some of the benefits of trade and aid'.[68] Though ICC prosecutions are only one of a number of policy instruments that can be used to influence national governments, they should arguably act as a strong signaller to the international community of the need for the application of other policy measures in concert. Such measures could range from diplomatic pressure and incentives for cooperation to cutting off financial support, suspension of diplomatic relations, and targeted sanctions, particularly those targeting indicted individuals.

[66] See also Policy Paper on the Interests of Justice, OTP, September 2007.
[67] ICC Preliminary Examinations <http://www.icc-cpi.int/> accessed 25 July 2014.

The Court itself faces both structural and operational challenges in maximizing its potential to not only influence government leaders, but to use that influence to deter future crimes. The Court, particularly in cases of a UNSC referral, needs to ensure that it operates independently of the political processes that trigger its involvement, gathering its own momentum in prosecutions. Allegations of selectivity and politicization should be tackled through exhibiting more consistency and transparency in the selection of cases, and through finding a better balance between seeking cooperation from target countries and prosecuting government members. Crucially, the decisions of the Court need the full backing of those members of the international community that profess to be its supporters but who have too often undermined the work of the Court through silence or political bargaining.

47.4 Conclusions

The success or failure of the ICC in deterring the commission of atrocity crimes rests to a large degree on its ability to pursue successful prosecutions. Only when national and international institutions establish a credible and consistent pattern of accountability will it be possible to impose a high enough cost on the use of atrocities to advance political goals. At present, this remains a key challenge for the Court and its supporters. If the Court can replace impunity with accountability, it will be able to capitalize on its potential to deter those contemplating future atrocities; not in all cases, and probably not in the midst of conflict, but in those situations where the commission of crimes is one of a series of police options available to a leader facing a challenge to his or her authority. The hope is that future leaders, cognizant of the prosecutions of Taylor and Milošević and Gbabgo and Bashir, may factor the possibility of his or her own prosecution into policy choices, such as whether to crush a growing opposition with violence, or negotiate, or address the underlying grievances. It will not be a determinative factor, but it will hopefully carry significant and increasing weight. To ensure that this potential deterrent impact becomes more actual than theoretical, the Court through its actions, and States Parties through their support need to enhance the consistency and credibility of ICC prosecution. Only then will the Court begin living up to its founders' expectations that it will contribute to the prevention of international crimes.

[68] R Falk, 'Theoretical Foundations in Human Rights' in R Claude and B Weston (eds), Human Rights in the World Community: Issues and Action 3rd edn (University of Pennsylvania Press 1992) 3.

48

The ICC and Capacity Building at the National Level

*Olympia Bekou

48.1 Introduction

With the adoption of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court[1] on 17 July 1998, the permanent ICC (the Court) was established. Few thought at the time that the ICC would become operational as early as July 2002, and even fewer appreciated the full extent of what had been achieved in Rome. The emerging field of international criminal justice, with the ICC at its core, soon became a firm reality. At the same time came the realization that the Rome Statute puts forward a system of criminal accountability, where states, alongside the Court, shoulder much of the responsibility to investigate and prosecute the core international crimes, namely genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes.

The key principle that determines the role played by states is that of complementarity.[2] Under the Rome Statute, the ICC can only take over from national courts when they are deemed to be 'unwilling' or 'unable' to deal with a case. Consequently, and given the limited resources the ICC has, only a handful of cases from a particular situation will be tried in The Hague.[3] National jurisdictions are therefore called to deal with the vast majority of cases before domestic courts. For states to fulfil their role envisaged in the Statute and to maintain primacy in adjudicating mass atrocity, they need to both investigate and prosecute, whilst keeping the ICC at bay, but also to be able to execute cooperation requests made by the Court.[4] Whilst willingness is essentially a matter of politics,[5] the ability of states to perform these functions can significantly improve through 'capacity building'. Capacity building is understood as the strengthening of national jurisdictions in order to be able to oversee national

* Professor of Public International Law and Head, International Criminal Justice Unit, HRLC, School of Law, University of Nottingham.

[1] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[2] Tenth preambular paragraph and Arts 1 and 17 ICC Statute.

[3] The Court budget for 2015, approved at the 13th plenary session of the ASP (ICC-ASP), was set at €130,665,600. See Resolution on the Programme budget for 2015, the Working Capital Fund for 2015, scale of assessments for the apportionment of expenses of the ICC, financing appropriations for 2015 and the Contingency Fund, ICC-ASP/13/Res.1, 17 December 2014.

[4] It should be noted that there is a clear obligation under the Statute for States to make national procedures available for all forms of cooperation. See Art 88 ICC Statute.

[5] See e.g. Y Lijun, 'On the Principle of Complementarity in the ICC Statute of the International Criminal Court' (2005) 4 Chinese Journal of International Law 121, 123.

investigations and prosecutions at a suitable level, and to cooperate with the Court.[6] The chapter examines the importance of capacity building in administering justice for core international crimes. It discusses the obstacles national jurisdictions need to overcome in order to meet the complementarity challenge. It further explores the notion of positive complementarity as the basis for capacity building with a view to revisiting the position of national legal orders in the Rome Statute system of justice.

48.2 Complementarity and the Challenges of National Capacity

Central to the Rome Statute system of international criminal justice is the principle of complementarity. As mentioned already, the willingness and ability of states to investigate and prosecute at the national level determines whether or not a case is admissible before the ICC.[7] As a 'court of last resort',[8] the ICC's jurisdiction is activated only when national proceedings are not forthcoming. By only granting the ICC the ability to exercise its jurisdiction in the residuary of situations where states have failed, the primary responsibility to attain those objectives must lie with states. Consequently, complementarity acts as a filter, which only lets through those cases that truly merit international intervention, leaving the rest of the cases to be dealt with by willing and able national courts. Complementarity is also an acknowledgement of the primacy of the state and the respect for state sovereignty.[9] Observing and applying the principle of complementarity ensures that the ICC does not overstep the boundaries of its competence negotiated by the drafters of the Rome Statute and consented to by ratification. However, the implications of the principle of complementarity are much more complex.

In the years that followed the adoption of the Statute, it became common to refer to the 'catalytic effect' of complementarity.[10] Put simply, complementarity acts as a catalyst, by virtue of which states feel encouraged to initiate investigations or prosecutions in order to evade ICC jurisdiction.[11] The effects of this encouragement are equally profound, as such investigations and prosecutions may signal a shift from a 'culture of impunity' to a 'culture of accountability'.[12]

[6] See generally, M Bergsmo et al., 'Complementarity after Kampala: Capacity Building and the ICC's Legal Tools' (2010) 2 Goettingen Journal of International Law 791–811.

[7] Art 17 ICC Statute.

[8] See e.g. P Kirsch, 'The Role of the International Criminal Court in Enforcing International Criminal Law' (2007) 22 American University International Law Review 539, 543.

[9] J Holmes, 'The Principle of Complementarity' in R Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court: The Making of the ICC Statute (The Hague: Kluwer Law International 1999), 41.

[10] J Kleffner and G Kor (eds), 'Complementarity as a Catalyst for Compliance' in Complementary Views on Complementarity—Proceedings of the International Roundtable on the Complementary Nature of the International Criminal Court (The Hague: T M C Asser Press 2006), 79–104. A-M Slaughter and W Burke-White, 'The Future of International Law is Domestic (or, the European Way of Law)' (2006) 47 Harvard International Law Journal 327, 341.

[11] The absence of cases before the Court was hailed as a measure of the ICC's success by the Court's first prosecutor. See Statement by Luis Moreno-Ocampo, Chief Prosecutor of the ICC during the ceremony for the solemn undertaking of the Chief Prosecutor of the ICC (16 June 2004).

[12] Report on Prosecutorial Strategy, OTP, The Hague, 14 September 2006, 4.

From a domestic perspective, the internalization of the responsibility to investigate and prosecute crimes under international law can contribute to the process of strengthening, if not building, a domestic culture of justice and the rule of law.[13] It is a reality that international crimes are committed in the context of systematic and systemic violence where there has been a partial or complete breakdown of law and order.[14] The process of ensuring criminal accountability for serious and mass violations of human rights can play an important role in the process of transitional justice. Ultimately concerned with the facilitation of the process of societal reconciliation, transitional justice denotes the various policies and strategies adopted by societies in transition to address gross human rights violations that occurred in the course of periods of conflict, authoritarianism, or other forms of violence and social unrest.

In addition, where appropriate, it is important to encourage local ownership over criminal justice for atrocities in order to strengthen the contribution that international criminal justice may make to societal reconciliation.[15] The proceedings of international judicial institutions of international criminal justice—the ICC, the ad hoc ICTY and ICTR,[16] and even the proceedings of hybrid institutions such as the SCSL and the STL are geographically and temporally remote from the societies that experienced and were victim to the impugned violence.[17] They all have struggled for local acceptance due to the physical and cultural distance between the tribunal and the community where the atrocities took place.[18] This is why outreach is of such fundamental significance.[19] The fact remains however, that trials in The Hague are still unlikely to have as much meaning for the local community as those occurring in the state where the crimes were committed.[20] For the impact of justice at the national level to take effect within the local community, it must be visible, comprehensible, and considered legitimate within such affected communities.[21] Where trials are held [13] See e.g. J Stromseth, 'Justice on the Ground: Can International Criminal Courts Strengthen Domestic Rule of Law in Post-Conflict Societies?' (2009) 1 Hague Journal on the Rule of Law 87–97.

[14] See e.g. Kirsch (n 8) 540.

[15] See e.g. Bergsmo et al. (n 6) 800.

[16] The ad hoc tribunals were created under the Security Council's Chapter VII powers and could therefore fall back on the Security Council's powers of enforcement, though they have not done so in practice. See Art 8 Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute'); Art 7 Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute'); Agreement between the United Nations and the Lebanese Republic on the Establishment of an STL, UNSC Res 1757 (30 May 2007) UN Doc S/RES/1757, Annex.

[17] See e.g. C Sriram, 'Globalising Justice: From Universal Jurisdiction to Mixed Tribunals' (2004) 4 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights 7–32.

[18] See C Sriram, 'Revolutions in Accountability: New Approaches to Past Abuses' (2003) 19 American University International Law Review 301, 383; C Stahn, 'The Geometry of Transitional Justice: Choices of Institutional Design', (2005) 18 Leiden Journal of International Law 425, 449; J Stromseth, 'Pursuing Accountability for Atrocities After Conflict: What Impact on Binding the Rule of Law' (2007) 38 Georgetown Journal of International Law 251, 260.

[19] The fact that outreach was only engaged in at a late stage in the process has only exacerbated the struggle. See D Orentlicher, Shrinking the Space for Denial: The Impact of the ICTY in Serbia (New York: Open Society Institute 2008) 22. The ICC has acknowledged the importance of outreach in its work, and has sought to communicate its activities amongst affected local communities. See ICC, Structure of the Court, Outreach <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/structure%20of%20the%20court/outreach/Pages/outreach.aspx> accessed 15 September 2014.

[20] J Turner, 'Nationalizing International Criminal Law' (2005) 41 Stanford Journal of International Law 1, 24.

[21] M Drumbl, Atrocity, Punishment and International Law (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 2007), 148.

at the national level, it is more likely that victims and members of the local community will be able to attend hearings and engage with the criminal justice process. Such participation has been thought to help victims 'find meaning and a catharsis following seemingly random victimization'.[22] By encouraging local justice rather than international justice, complementarity assists in making the process of justice visible, so that it is both done and seen to be done by those directly affected by the wrongdoing.[23]

From a practical perspective, it is also important to acknowledge the limitations to the ICC's capacity. As mentioned already, it is impossible for the Court to shoulder responsibility for the investigation and prosecution of every act of core international criminality.[24] By encouraging states to step up to the challenge, the principle of complementarity relieves some of the pressure on the ICC as an institution of finite resources and capacity. Therefore, the principle of complementarity operates to reduce the 'impunity gap', both between the situations that are subject to investigation by the ICC and those that are not, and between those individuals who are prosecuted by the Court and those perpetrators who are not.[25]

The principle of complementarity, by engaging both national authorities and the Court in the pursuit of the objectives of universal accountability, helps to manage the workload of the Court. Further, where national judicial systems have the capacity to conduct effective investigations and prosecutions and there exists the political will to enable those proceedings to take place—and to do so in accordance with the rule of law—national proceedings, particularly those undertaken by the situation-states, are likely to be more efficient with a greater chance of success. For example, national authorities have easier and more direct access to evidence and witnesses, and do not face the logistical challenges faced by the ICC or by third states that are not only geographically more remote, but which rely on the full cooperation of the situation-state to access that evidence and those witnesses.[26]

In light of this, the state of national jurisdictions following mass atrocity may hinder the application of complementarity in practice, as it may not always be possible for national jurisdictions to oversee investigations and prosecutions. The state of national jurisdictions following mass atrocity may be such that any accountability efforts or transitional justice processes may be impeded regarding their effectiveness or efficiency. In addition, it should not be forgotten that, even though the Rome Statute does not oblige states to investigate and prosecute,[27] it does require national [22] Sriram (n 18) 383. [23] See Sriram (n 17). [24] Stahn (n 18) 449.

[25] Report of the Bureau on Stocktaking: Complementarity, ICC-ASP/8/51, 18 March 2010 (Resumed Eighth Session of the Assembly of States Parties), para. 3 ('Report of the Bureau on Stocktaking: Complementarity').

[26] See Paper on some policy issues before the OTP, September 2003, 4. Other reasons that suggest local proceedings are more favourable to the remoteness of international proceedings are discussed in Bergsmo et al. (n 6) 800.

[27] See H Duffy and J Huston, 'Implementation of the ICC Statute: International Obligations and Constitutional Considerations' in C Kreß and F Lattanzi (eds), The ICC Statute and Domestic Legal Orders, Volume I: General Aspects and Constitutional Issues (Baden-Baden: Nomos 2000), 31; J Kleffner, 'The Impact of Complementarity on National Implementation of Substantive International Criminal Law' (2003) 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice 86, 90.

institutions to cooperate in respect of investigations and prosecutions conducted by the ICC through, amongst other things, transferring perpetrators, witnesses, and evidence to the Court.[28] This leads to the 'complementarity paradox', whereby states that are unable or unwilling to investigate or prosecute may be relied upon to cooperate with the ICC, if it decides to exercise its jurisdiction.[29] Successful prosecution of perpetrators is also dependent on the availability of evidence and witnesses, as well as the ability to secure evidence in a timely fashion.[30] The Rome Statute places an obligation on states to cooperate with the Court in respect of investigations and prosecutions carried out by the ICC.[31] The ability of states to cooperate with the ICC in respect of trials carried out at the international level also has great significance for the success of the ICC's regime. The need for capacity building is therefore evident. Before turning to the mechanics of capacity building, it is important to briefly explore the challenges faced by national legal orders, the very challenges that capacity-building efforts generally seek to address.

48.3 Challenges to Domestic Capacity

Of the difficulties faced by states in fulfilling their role under the complementarity regime, the absence of national implementing legislation is the first one to consider. Legislation enables states to investigate and prosecute—and therefore engage with—the implementation of complementarity, provides the legal basis for the execution of a request for cooperation with the ICC, and ensures that, when trials are carried out at the national level, they meet international standards. Of the 123 States Parties to the ICC, approximately less than half possess full legislation implementing the crimes and cooperation provisions of the Statute and enabling them to execute ICC cooperation requests and to investigate and prosecute at the national level.[32] Not only does legislation need to be present, but it must also be of a suitable standard to adequately facilitate effective cooperation and to ensure that trials carried out at the national level meet international standards.

The absence of specific legislation incorporating the crimes and substantive law into domestic law forces investigations and prosecutions to be labelled merely as ordinary crimes such as murder, rape, or theft. Such 'ordinary crimes' lack the stigma of the core international crimes, i.e. genocide, war crimes, or crimes against humanity, and may not carry the same significance in the eyes of victims, perpetrators, and the wider international community.[33]

[28] Art 86 ICC Statute. States are obliged to provide for the various forms of cooperation outlined in Parts IX and X of the ICC Statute.

[29] O Bekou and R Cryer, 'The International Criminal Court and Universal Jurisdiction: A Close Encounter?' (2007) 56 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 49, 63.

[30] M Bassiouni, 'Where is the ICC Heading?' (2006) 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice 421, 423.

[31] Art 86 ICC Statute.

[32] See information obtained through the National Implementing Legislation Database which forms part of the ICC Legal Tools Project <http://www.legal-tools.org/en/go-to-database/national-implementing-legislation-database/> accessed 17 July 2014.

[33] See W Ferdinandusse, 'The Prosecution of Grave Breaches in National Courts' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal Justice 723, 729–34.

Moreover, even where the necessary legislation incorporating the crimes under the jurisdiction of the Court is present, states may still struggle to pursue justice at the national level. This is because the investigation and prosecution of international crimes is a complicated affair, requiring a high degree of precision, organization, and expertise. The elements of international crimes are far more complex than those of ordinary domestic law crimes. Obtaining evidence to reach the level of proof required to meet the contextual and circumstantial elements inherent in international crimes and proving the existence of one or more specialized modes of liability is not an easy task.[34]

The complexity of the situation is further exacerbated by the very demand for justice. The lack of resources, infrastructure, and manpower to respond to situations of potential mass criminality may be lacking. Post-conflict states generally lack courtrooms, detention centres, and prisons, as well as judges, police officers, etc., necessary to practically conduct investigations and prosecutions.[35] State law enforcement agencies and judicial authorities may not have the technical expertise necessary to conduct large-scale complex criminal investigations, potentially involving a high number of both victims and perpetrators.[36] The size of the investigations and volume of evidence can be overwhelming for even the most well-resourced justice systems. Large numbers of factually rich cases, concerning large quantities of data, given the limitations in resources, skills, and expertise, further impede the ability of national courts to meet an increased caseload. The capacity of national institutions to deliver justice may also be hindered by inefficient work processes. Doing justice for atrocities requires the handling and organization of large quantities of data. Failure to organize data and maintain a clear overview of each case may lead to cases being pursued, but failing later in the process due to weaknesses or gaps in the evidence, wasting time and increasing the cost of the administration of justice.[37] Further, societies transitioning out of periods of authoritarianism and internecine violence may lack trust in the very justice and security institutions that would be responsible for delivering criminal accountability given the role that those institutions can often play in maintaining authoritarian regimes and in systematic violence.[38]

Turning now to some of the situations currently before the ICC, the difficulties of doing justice for atrocities on the ground can be easily understood through looking at some numbers. Although one cannot easily get access to reliable statistics, either [34] M Bergsmo and P Webb, 'Innovations at the International Criminal Court: Bringing New Technologies into the Investigation and Prosecution of Core International Crimes' in H Radtke et al. (eds), Historische Dimensionen von Kriegsverbrecherprozessen nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg (Baden-Baden: Nomos 2007), 205.

[35] See e.g. E Baylis, 'Reassessing the Role of International Criminal Law: Rebuilding National Courts through Transnational Networks' (2009) 50 Boston College Law Review 1, 49.

[36] S Straus, 'How Many Perpetrators Were There in the Rwandan Genocide? An Estimate' (2004) 6 Journal of Genocide Research 85. See also M Bergsmo et al., The Backlog of Core International Crimes Case Files in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Oslo: Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2009) <http://www.fichl.org/fileadmin/fichl/documents/FICHL_3_Second_Edition_web.pdf> accessed 17 July 2014.

[37] M Bergsmo et al., 'Preserving the Overview of Law and Facts: the Case Matrix' in A Smeulers (ed.), Collective Violence and International Criminal Justice (Antwerp: Intersentia 2010), 413–35.

[38] See e.g. Baylis (n 35) 29.

because they simply do not exist in a given country, or because even where some statistics are available, they are not accurate or are incomplete, a quick overview of some key indicators demonstrates the state of national capacity. In Uganda, for instance, there were approximately 295 judges in 2012 to deal with roughly 127,000 cases before national courts, only 23 of which were war crimes cases.[39] An individual spends on average 15.1 months on remand, and the convict–remand ratio is 53:47.[40] In the DRC, the number of judges in 2009 was 2,150 and justice occupied only 0.6% of the national budget, whereas 18,000 persons were in pre-trial detention with 4,000 prisoners post-sentencing, which is demonstrative of the slow pace of proceedings.[41] In Kenya, in 2011 there were 332 judges, 83 civilian prosecutors, and 360 police prosecutors to deal with a backlog of 6,000 cases before the Court of Appeal in 2013, of which 5,000 (according to the Director of Public Prosecutions, but questioned by many) are post-election violence related.[42] In 2011 there were 6,642 persons detained at the pre-trial stage, with 8,825 sentenced prisoners.[43] In Côte d'Ivoire, with 1 judge per 26,000 persons, and 5% of the national budget spent on justice, there were apparently 150 cases concerning individuals from the Gbagbo regime.[44] Of the total number of prisoners, 29% were in pre-trial detention and 71% had been sentenced.[45]

These rudimentary statistics demonstrate that there is a great need to enhance national courts in order to fulfil the promise of complementarity and to give meaning

[39] See S Lubwama and S Kakaire, 'With Few Judges, Justice is Delayed and Denied', The Observer (Uganda), 24 October 2012; M Habati, 'Uganda: Staff Crisis in Judiciary', The Independent (Uganda), 10 June 2012; H Athumani, 'Uganda Needs More Judges', Uganda Radio Network (Kampala), 23 July 2012; Justice, Law and Order Sector (Uganda), Facts and Figures <http://www.jlos.go.ug/index.php/2012-09-25-11-10-36/facts-figures>; ibid., Case Backlog Reduction Program <http://www.jlos.go.ug/index.php/2012-09-25-11-09-41/case-backlog-reduction>.

[40] Id.

[41] See Report of the Mapping Exercise documenting the most serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law committed within the territory of the DRC between March 1993 and June 2003, United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (2010), 416; La Mise en Oeuvre Effective du Principe de Complémentarité—République démocratique du Congo, Open Society Justice Initiative (2011); Document—République Démocratique Du Congo. Il Est Temps Que Justice Soit Rendue. La République Démocratique Du Congo A Besoin D'une Nouvelle Stratégie En Matière De Justice, Amnesty International (2011); Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 2013: Congo, Democratic Republic of the US Department of State, Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor (2013); L Davis, Justice-Sensitive Security System Reform in the DRC, International Center for Transitional Justice (2009).

[42] See International Commission of Jurists, Kenyan Section, 'Access to Justice' <http://www.icj-kenya.org/index.php/icj-programmes/access-to-justice6> accessed 17 July 2014; National Council for Law Reporting (Kenya Law), 'Kenya Law Blog' <http://www.kenyalaw.org/kenyaLawBlog/> accessed 17 July 2014; Kenya, 'Turning Pebbles': Evading Accountability for Post-Election Violence in Kenya, Human Rights Watch (2011); D Madegwa, 'Kenya: Judiciary Begins Clearing Backlog of Cases', The Star (Kenya), 14 January 2013; M Mutiga, 'Kenya CJ Vows to Clear Case Backlog in 6 Months', Daily Nation (Kenya), 29 October 2011.

[43] Id.

[44] See Côte d'Ivoire, Ministère de la Justice, 'Personnel et Cadre de Travail' <http://justice-ci.org/cellule/76-personnel-et-cadre-de-travail.html> accessed 17 July 2014; L'Organisation et le Fonctionnement du Système Judiciaire en Côte d'Ivoire, United Nations, United Nations Operation in Côte d'Ivoire, Rule of Law Unit (2007); ibid., Rapport sur la Situation des Établissements Pénitentiaires en Côte d'Ivoire; Turning Rhetoric into Reality: Accountability for Serious International Crimes in Côte d'Ivoire, Human Rights Watch (2013).

[45] Ibid.

to the system of justice that the Court envisages. Indeed, the success of the ICC as a mechanism of accountability passes through the strength of national legal orders. Identifying the legal foundation which could be used as a basis in order to build capacity is therefore crucial.

48.4 Positive Complementarity: A Suitable Basis for Capacity Building?

For many, positive complementarity constitutes a valuable tool in the armoury of capacity building.[46] The emergence of the concept came as an answer to the conundrum of how to deal with the absence of a provision in the Statute that could provide the basis for comprehensive assistance with building national capacity.[47]

As a term, 'positive complementarity' was first used within the ICC OTP in 2006 to describe the active encouragement of states to conduct national proceedings and, where appropriate, to provide the necessary assistance to enable them to do so.[48] Until 2010, the notion of positive complementarity was perceived only as a prosecutorial strategy. In the view of the OTP, positive complementarity 'encourages genuine national proceedings where possible; relies on national and international networks; and participates in a system of international cooperation'.[49]

Positive complementarity received much attention ahead of the first Review Conference of the Rome Statute for the ICC which took place in Kampala, Uganda in 2010, and which gave further prominence to positive complementarity in the stocktaking exercise that formed part of the Conference.[50] Culminating in a resolution on positive complementarity,[51] the Review Conference transformed what was the common understanding of positive complementarity until then and changed its character from a purely prosecutorial strategy to the basis for engaging in capacity building. Before the Review Conference, positive complementarity was understood as the part of the ICC's role and its potential to enhance national systems; in Kampala, that understanding shifted, primarily because of the limitations in the capacity of the ICC to take on such a role. As the Bureau on Stocktaking [46] See e.g. C Stahn, 'Complementarity: A Tale of Two Notions' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 87–113; W Burke-White, 'Proactive Complementarity: The International Criminal Court and National Courts in the Rome System of International Justice' (2008) 49 Harvard International Law Journal 53–108; P Akhavan, 'The Lord's Resistance Army Case: Uganda's Submission of the First State Referral to the International Criminal Court' (2005) 99 American Journal of International Law 403–21.

[47] Art 93(10) ICC Statute provides very limited scope for such assistance. See e.g. F Gioia, '"Reverse Cooperation" and the Architecture of the ICC Statute: A Vital Part of the Relationship between States and the ICC?' in M Malaguti (ed.), ICC and International Cooperation in Light of the ICC Statute (Lecce: Argo 2011), 75–101.

[48] Report on Prosecutorial Strategy, OTP, 14 September 2006. [49] Id., 5.

[50] See Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/8/Res.3, Annex IV, 'Topics for Stocktaking', 26 November 2009 (Eighth Plenary Meeting of the ASP) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Resolutions/ICC-ASP-8-Res.3-ENG.pdf> accessed 15 September 2014. See also, generally, Bergsmo et al. (n 6).

[51] Complementarity, Resolution RC/Res.1, 8 June 2010 (Ninth Plenary Meeting of the ASP) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/Resolutions/RC-Res.1-ENG.pdf> accessed 15 September 2014 ('Resolution RC/Res.1').

explicitly put it in its report to the Review Conference, 'the Court is not a development agency . . . Activities aimed at strengthening national jurisdictions as set out in this paper should be carried forward by States themselves, together with international and regional organizations and civil society, exploring interfaces and synergies with the Rome Statute system.'[52] That states, as well as other organizations, including NGOs are publicly called upon to step in, in support of capacity building, is a significant acknowledgement of their role in building such capacity and the shifting of the onus from the ICC to other actors.[53] Furthermore, positive complementarity was then defined as 'all activities/actions whereby national jurisdictions are strengthened and enabled to conduct genuine national investigations and trials of crimes included in the Rome Statute, without involving the Court in capacity building, financial support and technical assistance, but instead leaving these actions and activities for States, to assist each other on a voluntary basis'.[54]

Accordingly, in its resolution, the Review Conference recognized 'the need for additional measures at the national level as required and for the enhancement of international assistance to effectively prosecute perpetrators of the most serious crimes of concern to the international community',[55] recognized 'the desirability for States to assist each other in strengthening domestic capacity to ensure that investigations and prosecutions of serious crimes of international concern can take place at the national level',[56] and encouraged 'the Court, States Parties and other stakeholders, including international organizations and civil society, to further explore ways in which to enhance the capacity of national jurisdictions to investigate and prosecute serious crimes of international concern'.[57]

Positive complementarity therefore focuses on the technical and financial assistance provided to states in order to build their capacity to oversee investigations and prosecutions of core international crimes. It can take the form of legislative assistance, technical assistance, and capacity building, as well as assistance in terms of constructing physical infrastructure.[58] Examples of technical assistance and capacity building include the training of law enforcement and judicial officials, defence counsel, and forensic investigators, and the development of capacity to ensure the protection of victims and witnesses. Such support could also involve supplying judges and prosecutors to assist national courts, specialist international crimes divisions, or hybrid tribunals, or the provision of mutual legal assistance and cooperation to facilitate actual prosecutions. In terms of physical infrastructure, international crimes often occur in the context of periods of conflict and protracted insecurity. Positive complementarity can involve the provision of assistance in the (re)construction of the necessary infrastructure to establish an operational system of criminal justice.[59]

[52] Report of the Bureau on Stocktaking: Complementarity, ICC-ASP/8/Res.9, Appendix, 25 March 2010 (Tenth Plenary Meeting of the ASP) ('Report of the Bureau on Stocktaking: Complementarity'), para. 4.

[53] Resolution RC/Res.1 (n 51) paras 3 and 8. [54] Ibid., para. 16. [55] Ibid., para. 3.

[56] Ibid., para. 5. [57] Ibid., para. 8.

[58] Report of the Bureau on Stocktaking: Complementarity (n 52) para. 17. [59] Id.

Capacity building has evolved through a strategy of positive complementarity, and states and other actors are now charged with building capacity through voluntary and bilateral assistance. It is the clear intention of the States Parties that positive complementarity ought to constitute the foundation on which all capacity building should occur.

48.5 The 'How To' of Capacity Building

With positive complementarity having entered the vocabulary of international criminal lawyers, attention should focus on the question of how to strengthen national capacity. Whereas complementarity pertains to both willingness and ability, the strengthening of domestic capacity is more likely to influence the ability rather than the willingness.[60]

An important step in designing capacity-building programmes is the identification of the actual needs and gaps of a national criminal justice system independently of any assumed solutions.[61] Usually, this is done through a diagnostic process to determine needs or 'gaps' between current conditions and desired or required conditions. Otherwise known as 'needs assessment', it is often a prerequisite to any capacity-building scheme, and is usually linked to development funding. Performed in order to solve or avoid current problems, create or take advantage of a future opportunity, or to provide learning, development, or growth,[62] a needs assessment, done properly, may offer an accurate snapshot of the state of national proceedings.

Indeed, having access to reliable and current information and factual data on the criminal justice system in a post-conflict country is a challenge. It is likely that many of the key challenges encountered in undertaking a needs assessment would also be telling of the actual needs and gaps of the criminal justice system as a whole. For instance, in states where capacity is lacking, institutions rarely hold up-to-date catalogues of staff, equipment, buildings, and facilities.[63] Budgets are often unknown and few institutions have developed operational plans. Annual Reports may be prepared and published one year, but not the next. The telecoms infrastructure is limited and painfully interrupted by the conditions on the ground.

Identifying the current and aspired conditions in a national criminal justice system is a prerequisite in order to strengthen that system and enable it to undertake investigations and prosecutions of core international crimes. Contrasting the existing conditions to the aspired conditions of a given criminal justice system assists with identifying the gaps and needs. In that context, it might be crucial to ascertain and, if possible, seek to address the underlying causes of the current conditions before [60] See e.g. E Hunter, 'Establishing the Legal Basis for Capacity Building by the ICC' in M Bergsmo (ed.), Active Complementarity: Legal Information Transfer (Oslo: Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher 2011), 67–93.

[61] R Kaufman, 'Strategic Thinking: A Guide to Identifying and Solving Problems' (2006) jointly published by the American Society for Training and Development, and the International Society for Performance Improvement; R Kaufman, Mega Planning: Practical Tools for Organizational Success (Thousand Oaks: Sage Publications, 2000); R Kaufman, Change, Choices, and Consequences: A Guide to Mega Thinking and Planning (Amherst: HRD Press 2006).

[62] K Gupta et al., A Practical Guide to Needs Assessment 2nd edn (San Francisco: Pfeiffer 2007) 17.

[63] See Baylis (n 35) 29.

identifying the possible solutions or steps that could be employed to reduce the gaps between the current conditions and the aspired conditions.[64]

Despite their increasing emphasis, needs assessments cannot be seen as a panacea to the obstacles faced by national legal orders in the pursuance of investigations and prosecutions. Whilst it is undeniably significant to recognize the precise reasons a national system is inhibited, it should be accepted that needs assessments cannot possibly be wholly objective and/or accurate. Rather, it is important to accept that the inherent biases of the assessor, as well as the very access to information he/she has, are likely to affect their findings. In addition, a state's need or sense of ownership/pride might not be conducive to such a holistic overview. States on the receiving end of capacity building should therefore be encouraged to articulate what they perceive their needs to be and to select the level and intensity of the capacity building they would be prepared to receive. In practice, most of the capacity-building efforts are likely to be on an ad hoc basis. Even in situations where a large rule of law programme is in place,[65] there is always a need for specialized capacity building in distinct areas that may not fall within the remit of pre-planned activities.

Besides engaging in assessing the needs of criminal justice systems, providing access to legal information on core international crimes would benefit those individuals who engage in the justice for atrocities sector. Law professionals need to have access to relevant information and also understand the substantive and procedural aspects of core international crimes and the way in which other jurisdictions, be it national or international, have approached them. Writing legal motions, arguments, and decisions is the bread and butter of all legal professionals, regardless of the nature of the legal system and the legal tradition it follows, i.e. common or civil law, etc. In order to effectively perform their tasks, law professionals in well-resourced countries would physically visit a library, or access online resources. In a post-conflict setting, this is not likely to be the case. Libraries may not be easily available, adequately stocked, or up to date. Online databases come at a premium and require access to certain infrastructure, such as personal computers and Internet access of a reasonable speed, which are beyond the reach of the vast majority of such professionals. Democratizing access to knowledge and information, although obviously not addressing all of the challenges associated with the lack of capacity, is an important step in improving the quality of proceedings at the national level.[66]

[64] Needs assessments have been the subject of the 'Greentree Process', an initiative facilitated by the 'International Centre for Transitional Justice' (ICTJ). One of the initiatives being explored by the Greentree Process is the possibility of enhancing coordination in the implementation of the principle of positive complementarity by developing a centralized system for the assessment of capacity-building needs to strengthen the rule of law and justice systems and the deployment of assistance to meet those needs. While discussions have been ongoing since 2010, with the first of the three high-level retreats convened at the Greentree Estate in New York, the process has yet to yield concrete outcomes. For further information, see Synthesis Report on 'Supporting Complementarity at the National Level: An Integrated Approach to Rule of Law', ICTJ (2011) and Synthesis Report on 'Supporting Complementarity at the National Level: From Theory to Practice' (2012).

[65] See E Witte, Putting Complementarity into Practice: Domestic Justice for International Crimes in the Democratic Republic of Congo, Uganda, and Kenya (New York: Open Society Foundations 2011).

[66] Initiatives such as the ICC's Legal Tools Project (n 32) that provide access to such information free of charge are therefore particularly welcome.

Putting access to information to one side, another challenge to national capacity is the lack of relevant skills and expertise. The accumulated knowledge concentrated in the international sphere, through the work of international(ized) courts and tribunals, ought to be transferred to the national courts, if national capacity is going to be enhanced. The two decades of international adjudication of core international crimes have provided ample information and case law, and a wealth of documents which may be useful to national jurisdictions, should they engage in investigations and prosecutions of mass atrocity crimes.[67] Channelling the key findings of international jurisprudence to national courts, assisting with improving work processes, and legal expertise can possibly be achieved with specific technical assistance.

Such assistance would need to be adapted to the needs of the concrete situation. Undeniably, significant challenges will be encountered during the process that the capacity builders would need to address. As regards the lack or inadequacy of implementing legislation discussed in an earlier section, emphasis should be placed on realizing its importance in terms of giving meaning to complementarity. However, it should not be forgotten that drafting such legislation is a complex, time-consuming, and politically loaded task. Reviewing the compatibility of existing legislation with the Rome Statute provisions, preparing new legislative instruments, and getting them through the legislative body, usually the national Parliament, is an onerous process, which may also be affected by changing political will.[68] In addition, the drafting of legislation requires expert knowledge and sufficient resources to do it properly. Such resources are not always available, particularly in war-torn countries where the drafters are few and the needs for other pieces of legislation may be more pressing. Furthermore, the complexity of the Rome Statute requires a good understanding by the national drafters of a variety of areas, such as criminal law and procedure, international law and process, as well as human rights and humanitarian law, which in turn impacts upon the speed and quality of the drafting of such legislation.[69]

The diminished physical and human infrastructure further impacts on the operational capacity of a domestic system. For example, for domestic institutions operating in the context of a weak economy, the lack of infrastructure, the lack of confidence in the judicial structure, as well as possible disputed authority may impede the building of national capacity.[70] Such operational capacity problems are likely to be aggravated in situations where there is a large backlog of cases, typical of post-conflict situations where limited resources and expertise lead to limited capacity to process cases, thus causing increased bottlenecks. The lack of training may further exacerbate this situation. The need for specific training is widely recognized;[71] however, all training should aim to equip

[67] See e.g. the ICTR/ICTY Case Law Database <http://www.unmict.org/en/cases/ictr-icty-case-law-database> accessed 17 July 2014.

[68] For example, the implementation process in the DRC has taken several years. See O Bekou and S Shah, 'Realising the Potential of the International Criminal Court: the African Experience' (2006) 6 Human Rights Law Review 499, 502.

[69] See O Bekou, 'Building Databases for the ICC Legal Tools Project: Data Structures and the National Implementing Legislation Database' in Bergsmo (n 60) 159.

[70] As such they had been highlighted at a special panel on complementarity hosted by South Africa and Denmark, the focal points for complementarity on 2 June 2010, in the course of the Review Conference.

[71] See Baylis (n 35) 52; M Ellis, 'The International Criminal Court and its Implication for Domestic Law and National Capacity Building' (2002–3) 15 Florida Journal of International Law 215, 239.

the recipients with those skills necessary to enable them to function without the need to have recourse to external consultants after the completion of such training. It should be emphasized, however, that despite the best intentions, this is not easily achieved.

These examples of capacity building make it necessary to consider yet another aspect: the availability of funds. Less well-resourced states are more likely to rely on external funding to help with the enhancement of national capacity. This is because the financial position of a country transitioning out of mass atrocity is unlikely to be able to cover the cost of re-building shattered infrastructure or raising the skills and expertise of those professionals likely to steer the process of national investigations and prosecutions and execution of ICC cooperation requests. By providing financial support to the affected states, they are given the opportunity to play their role in the Rome Statute system of justice with the view to putting an end to impunity. Part of this responsibility can also be shared by civil society organizations, whose activities, when supported, help strengthen the work of the ICC at grassroots level, both in terms of political initiatives and also in the promotion of the values, principles, and objectives underpinning the concept of international criminal justice.

Funding is the key to setting the wheels of positive complementarity in motion. The realization of the link between development aid and capacity building has increased in importance, as has the need for forward planning and avoidance of duplication of mandate amongst (competing) donors.[72] Providing access to funds should therefore be a priority, as should be matching the needs on the ground to the organization that can best deliver results regarding the relevant capacity-building activity. International donors should be cognizant of the fact that local capacity builders are not always in a position to fit the former's requirements. Despite the importance of maintaining standards, some flexibility ought to be exercised in order to enable the participation of local actors in the capacity-building process; a combination of funding cycles that allows for longer-term planning as well as initiatives that are shorter in length or issue-specific may therefore be needed. This is because the situation on the ground can be unpredictable, and the capacity needs of national legal orders may change in ways that do not necessarily correspond to internal deadlines of funders. Due emphasis should also be placed upon mainstreaming the inclusion of positive complementarity work areas beyond international criminal justice, such as conflict prevention or peacebuilding, which could assist in further strengthening capacity.

48.6 Concluding Remarks

Equipping national legal orders with the capacity required to enable them to oversee national investigations and prosecutions and cooperate with the ICC has gained in importance ever since the realization that what was created in Rome was not merely an international court, but a system of international criminal justice, with the ICC firmly at its centre and where national courts hold a pivotal role. The inclusion of the complementarity principle in the Rome Statute constitutes the cornerstone of that system. However, it was not until the advent of positive complementarity that capacity building gained in significance, with the former providing the necessary foundation for the advancement of the latter.

[72] Joint Staff Working Document on Advancing the Principle of Complementarity: Toolkit for Bridging the Gap between International and National Justice, High Representative of the European Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy (2013).

Through an understanding of the regime created by the Rome Statute and through an overview of some of the obstacles present at the national level, the chapter has sought to shed some light on the challenges faced in the enhancement of the ability of national legal orders to enable the investigation and prosecution of core international crimes. It also focused on highlighting some of the routes that may be available to those who wish to engage in capacity building. Implicit in this analysis is the view that what ought to be expected from national courts, given the capacity limitations, should not be the creation of 'mini-ICCs' on the ground, but national justice institutions that serve the needs of the societies they represent, whilst complying with requisite international standards. Striking the right balance in that respect is not an easy task.

With a view to the future, emphasis should be placed on how to best deliver capacity building on the ground, in light of the operational realities and without disregarding the need to increase national investigations and prosecutions that are fair, effective and efficient, as well as timely and in full cooperation with the ICC. Based on positive complementarity, fostering synergies amongst the international community and national legal actors should help to overcome the considerable challenges that restrict the effectiveness of capacity-building efforts, in order to materialize the complementarity promise and help attain the common goal of ending impunity.

49

Completion, Legacy, and Complementarity at the ICC

Elizabeth Evenson and Alison Smith

49.1 Introduction

Ten years after the ICC opened its doors, the tribunals which preceded it in the modern era of international criminal justice have had to wrestle with how they will finish up their work and close their doors. Although addressing this question was left until relatively late in the game, the SCSL and the ad hoc ICTY and ICTR developed 'completion strategies' to guide the winding down of their activities.[1] These strategies address not only the immediate issue of completing case work and trials, but also how so-called residual issues will be addressed. That is, how any ongoing obligations such as the protection of witnesses or the revision of sentences will be handled. Importantly, they also address how the legacy of the tribunals will be consolidated in the communities affected by the crimes within their jurisdiction.[2]

As a permanent court, the ICC may seem at first to be immune to questions about its own completion strategies. Indeed, the Rome Statute[3], while offering detailed guidance as to the criteria governing the opening of investigations, does not prescribe a legal mechanism for closing an investigation. That is, there is no apparent limit on the number of cases that can be brought in an ICC situation, usually understood as the specific set of incidents in a given country.[4] This is not to say that the prosecutor's

* Senior International Justice Counsel at Human Rights Watch. Research assistance provided by Justine Tillier and John Conroy, interns with the International Justice Program of Human Rights Watch.

 Legal Counsel and International Justice Director at No Peace without Justice.

[1] Report on the SCSL: Activities, Achievements, and Completion of its Mandate, Annex to Letter dated 5 October 2012 from the Permanent Representative of Canada to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council, UN Doc S/2012/741 (5 October 2012); UNSC Res 1503 (28 August 2003) UN Doc S/RES/1503; UNSC Res 1534 (26 March 2004) UN Doc S/RES/1534.

[2] See K Heller, 'Completion' in L Reydams et al. (eds), International Prosecutors (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2012) 887 (identifying completion issues, residual mechanisms, and legacy projects as three distinct components of completion strategies).

[3] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute').

[4] The Prosecutor may take a decision not to prosecute under Art 53 ICC Statute once an investigation is open, but this is a decision that may be revisited by the Prosecutor at any point and appears to relate primarily to a decision regarding the prosecution of a specific case, that is, a specific charge or charges against a specific individual or individuals. As the Court affirmed in a 2013 report: 'the ICC's legal framework does not foresee any limit on the number of cases that the OTP may bring before the Court—this is a matter of prosecutorial discretion.… [The absence of a statute of limitations for the crimes under the Court's jurisdiction] is a distinct strength of the ICC in the sense that individuals subject to outstanding arrest warrants cannot expect their cases to lapse and disappear.' Report of the Court on Complementarity: Completion of ICC Activities in a Situation Country, ICC-ASP/12/32, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), paras 11, 12, and 15.

ability to open new cases in a situation country is entirely without its limits. New cases will need to fall within the temporal and territorial limits of the situation, defined either by the scope of the referral to the Court or by the decision of the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber authorizing investigations.[5] Jurisprudence from the Court's Pre-Trial Chamber in the Mburashimana case suggests that even where a State Party referral is, on the face of it, open-ended, additional cases in that country may require the opening of a new situation if there is an insufficient link with the referral initially triggering the Court's jurisdiction.[6]

Even with these limits, however, the Court's jurisdiction is more open-ended than that of its predecessor tribunals, particularly given that with regard to States Parties, the ICC prosecutor can seek to open a new situation proprio motu in an existing situation country without relying on a mandate from either that state or the United Nations Security Council.[7] This is an important advantage when it comes to completion strategies. As discussed later in the chapter, completion strategies at other tribunals have been developed in the shadow of prospective and sometimes premature closure. Deficits in these strategies, or in their implementation, can undermine a tribunal's delivery of justice and its legacy, a topic Kevin Jon Heller has explored comprehensively in his study of completion.[8]

In practice, however, the ICC's work will, at some point, come to a conclusion as existing judicial proceedings are completed and additional cases are not pursued by the prosecutor. The ICC cannot stay in a particular situation in perpetuity:[9] While avoiding arbitrarily imposed timelines, there are several reasons that Court officials and States Parties need to enter new situations with their eyes already firmly trained on how the ICC will responsibly complete its work when the time comes.

First, ignoring that there will eventually be a closure to ICC situations would dilute the need for the ICC and its States Parties to think clearly and responsibly about the ICC's legacy, that is, to consider the overall impact of the Court on affected populations in terms of ending impunity, ensuring accountability and redress, strengthening the rule of law, and contributing to sustainable peace. These are elements that make the most sense only when contemplated in the

[5] Arts 1, 15, and 17 ICC Statute.

[6] See discussion of the Mburashimana jurisprudence in R Rastan, 'The Jurisdictional Scope of Situations before the International Criminal Court' (2012) 1 Criminal Law Forum 23, 1, 2–20.

[7] See Art 15(1) ICC Statute; see also Arts 1, 18, and 19 Statute of the ICTY, UNSC Res 827 (25 May 1993) UN Doc S/RES/827, Annex ('ICTY Statute') and Arts 1, 18, and 19 Statute of the ICTR, UNSC Res 955 (8 November 1944) UN Doc S/RES/955, Annex ('ICTR Statute').

[8] See Heller (n 2). Heller's analysis of completion strategies includes a range of other international or internationalized tribunals beyond the ICTY, the ICTR, and the SCSL, namely the Nuremberg Military Tribunals, the Bosnian War Crimes Chamber, the STL, the IMT, the IMT for the Far East, the Special Panels for Serious Crimes in East Timor, and Regulation 64 panels in Kosovo.

[9] Cf. S Bibas and W Burke-White, 'International Idealism Meets Domestic-Criminal-Procedure Realism' (2010) 59 Duke Law Journal 637, 680. According to Bibas and Burke-White, '[t]he idealistic desire to do justice collides with the reality of limited time and money'. As a result, international criminal justice has just recently begun to heed to systematic issues of case management. Because of limited resources, these authors argue, the system must do a better job at screening cases including through "proactive complementarity".

context of the ICC's eventual conclusion of work and departure from any particular country.

Avoiding the inevitable because it may be unpredictable would risk missing real opportunities to consolidate this legacy in existing ICC situation countries. For example, focusing on the Court's eventual completion of its activities from the outset is likely to highlight the desirability of the Court's ability to transfer some responsibilities to national authorities. This, in turn, could engender an orientation in the Court's activities towards ensuring there is capacity domestically to take up those responsibilities after the ICC has completed its work. While this will assist the Court in concluding its activities, enhancing national capacity would also benefit the Court's contributions to national jurisdictions. It would help put in place some of the elements necessary for national authorities to conduct additional investigations and prosecutions in order to bring fuller accountability than the ICC is likely to yield acting on its own. This could have real benefits for the ICC's legacy and contribution to national jurisdictions.[10]

Second, there are also opportunity costs for the ICC in terms of prospective new ICC situation countries. If the ICC's permanence and potential global reach are among its greatest strengths and innovations, they also create a real dilemma regarding how many situations and cases the Court, as a single institution with finite resources, can be expected to handle simultaneously.[11] States Parties should be willing to ensure the Court has the resources needed to increase the depth and reach of its work, but a clear sense of how to define the Court's mission in a given situation country and a strategy for completing that mission will enable the Court to increase its ability to respond to the high demand for justice.

Third, having one eye on the 'end game' is also important from the perspective of the populations affected by conflict. While justice cannot be rushed, there should come a time when the bulk of the accountability work can be considered to be done, so that it does not drag on forever. If the ICC is clear and up-front about when it considers its contribution to accountability has concluded, this will enable local populations to identify what still needs to be done by the national system and also enable them to feel a sense of closure of at least part of the accountability process. Great care should be taken to ensure that the ICC is not asked to move on prematurely before its work is completed in a given situation—a risk the Court has already encountered, as discussed later. But defining what that 'end' should look like and how the Court should arrive there responsibly so as to ensure its ongoing obligations are met and its legacy is consolidated, are key questions that the ICC, like its predecessor tribunals, needs to face.

[10] Report of the Court on Complementarity: Completion of ICC Activities in a Situation Country, ICC-ASP/12/32, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP) ('ASP Report of the Court on Complementarity'), paras 27–37; Report of the Bureau on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/11/24, 7 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), paras 16–20.

[11] See generally Bibas and Burke-White (n 9) discussing potential methods for better case management systems.

The need for real attention to completion strategies of international tribunals, and, in particular, to ensure that these strategies are legacy-sensitive, has been a matter of consensus for some time. As early as 2004, the UN Secretary-General reported that 'it is essential that, from the moment any future international or hybrid tribunal is established, consideration be given, as a priority, to the ultimate exit strategy and intended legacy in the country concerned'.[12] In spite of this, the ICC's first decade passed largely without any real forward momentum in a strategic consideration of these issues. There are positive signs that this is now changing and that a real discussion is finally emerging at the Court and among States Parties regarding the need for completion strategies.

Since the Kampala Review Conference in 2010, the ICC's ASP has had a dedicated 'facilitation' on 'complementarity' within its Bureau.[13] The facilitation has focused on so-called positive complementarity, that is, how international assistance to national jurisdictions can be enhanced in order to strengthen the willingness and ability of those jurisdictions to conduct the investigation and prosecution of ICC crimes.[14] In 2012 the ASP's Resolution on complementarity explicitly recognized that 'greater consideration should be given to how the Court will complete its activities in a situation country and that such exit strategies could provide guidance on how a situation country can be assisted in carrying on national proceedings when the Court completes its activities in a given situation'.[15] In its 2013 report to the ASP on complementarity, referenced earlier, the Court, in turn, set out initial observations on completion within the context of the ICC, lessons learned from other international or internationalized tribunals, and the role of the Court's field operations in completion strategies.[16]

Several of the issues raised here overlap with those identified by the Court in this 2013 report and this chapter seeks to make a contribution to pushing forward this important work. This chapter will first examine some of the key questions the Court and its States Parties will need to address to adapt and define the concept of 'completion' for the ICC. While recognizing that completion in the ICC context will have a number of unique features, this chapter will then go on to describe some of the lessons learned from the completion strategies of other international or internationalized tribunals in three key areas: capacity building, outreach, and archive management. Finally, as indicated, at the heart of a successful completion strategy will be an overriding concern to consolidate the Court's legacy in its situation countries. For this reason, this chapter will argue that realizing a connection between completion and positive complementarity, while not without [12] The Rule of Law and Transitional Justice in Conflict and Post-Conflict Societies, Report of the Secretary-General, UN Doc S/2011/634 (24 August 2004), para. 46; see also Heller (n 2) 887, 917–20 (noting that the OTPs of tribunals which have pursued a 'global' completion strategy, that is, a strategy developed prior to the creation of a tribunal, have been largely more successful than those which have adopted a 'situational' strategy, adopted after the tribunal is already established and operational).

[13] ASP Report of the Court on Complementarity (n 10) para. 47.

[14] Ibid., paras 13–14.

[15] Preamble of the Complementarity Resolution, ICC-ASP/11/Res.6, 21 November 2012 (Eighth Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

[16] ASP Report of the Court on Complementarity (n 10).

its challenges, could focus States Parties' discussions, including on the role of the Court, and achieving a correct understanding of the role of the Court, when it comes to complementarity.

49.2 Adapting the Concept of 'Completion' to the ICC

The ICC can benefit from the experience of the SCSL, ICTY, and the ICTR in the development of completion strategies. These experiences, however, cannot be borrowed nor the solutions adopted wholesale, given the differences between these institutions and the ICC, including in its length of operations, its mandate, and its structure. We identify here some of the key questions the ICC may face in contemplating its completion strategies.

49.2.1 Avoiding restrictions on the ICC's mandate

It is important to understand that the development of completion strategies for the ICTY, ICTR, and SCSL did not take place sua sponte, nor were they initially motivated by a primary concern for safeguarding legacy. Instead, completion strategies were developed as a direct by-product of the pressure on these tribunals—largely budgetary—to accelerate their conclusion.[17] Completion strategies went hand in hand with other measures to wrap up work, including, at the ICTY and ICTR, greater selectivity in the choice of cases, forced by the requirement in United Nations Security Council Resolution 1534 that the ICTY and ICTR focus on 'the most senior leaders'.[18]

Indeed, as Heller notes, even beyond Resolution 1534, completion deadlines and corresponding changes in procedures had a direct impact on prosecutorial decisions and, he argues, impaired prosecutorial independence as well as opened up impunity gaps and limited the effectiveness of legacy projects. These include ICTY rule changes permitting Trial Chambers to direct the prosecutor to select on which counts to proceed and to limit the prosecution's presentation of its case in chief, as well as giving the decision to refer a case to national jurisdictions under Rule 11*bis* to the Trial Chamber at both the ICTY and the ICTR.[19] Additionally, Rule 28 of the [17] See generally D Raab, 'Evaluating the ICTY and its Completion Strategy—Efforts to Achieve Accountability for War Criminals and their Tribunals' (2005) 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice 82, 84–8; citing President Claude Jorda's first Press release in 2000, where he was struck with completion concerns: 'What time-frame does the Tribunal set itself for fulfilling its mission?' Since then, ICTY Presidents and Officials have continuously responded to timeline concerns; F Donlon, 'The Transition of Responsibilities from the Special Court to the Residual Special Court for Sierra Leone—Challenges and Lessons Learned for Other International Tribunals' (2013) 11 Journal of Criminal Justice 857, 860–2; E Møse, 'The ICTR's Completion Strategy—Challenges and Possible Solutions' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 667, 668–9.

[18] Heller (n 2) 908; UNSC Res 1534 (26 March 2004) UN Doc S/RES/1534.

[19] Ibid., 906–9; Rule 11*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the SCSL (adopted 16 January 2002, as amended 27 May 2008) ('SCSL RPE'); Rule 11*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 (adopted 11 February 1994, as amended 22 May 2013) UN Doc IT/32/Rev. 49 ('ICTY RPE'); Rule 11*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTR (adopted 29 June 1995, as amended 10 April 2013) ('ICTR RPE').

ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence was amended to allow for additional review and scrutiny of indictments.[20] Anticipated closure created pressures that led to a reduction in the number of cases and increased the use of plea bargaining to expedite proceedings, leading to more lenient sentencing.[21] Closure also meant insufficient time to invest in domestic capacity building to close remaining impunity gaps at the national level.[22]

The ICC, as a permanent institution, can avoid some of the pitfalls associated with 'closure' in that it should be able to define for itself 'completion', permitting a fuller execution of its mandate. It is important that discussions of completion within the ICC context avoid imposing similar restrictions on the mandate of the Court's OTP or the Court as a whole. As discussed, given the more open-ended nature of the Court's jurisdiction and the permanence of the institution, the ICC prosecutor has a freer hand to stay longer and do more. Importantly, where possible within the defined limits of the situation open before the Court, the ICC prosecutor can also intervene again where there may be renewed violence without seeking a new mandate. This flexibility can be essential for responding to crisis situations, where early interventions can save lives and limit damage to property, making post-conflict or post-violence reconstruction quicker. Preparation for the point at which investigations and prosecutions will be complete should not be permitted to devolve into pressure to bring these possibilities to a premature end.[23]

Planning ahead will increase the likelihood that the Office and the Court as a whole will find ways to wind down activities in a manner that contributes to—rather than detracts from—its legacy. Indeed, an increased institutional focus on completion could have a positive effect. It could encourage the Office to undertake a much-needed

[20] Rule 28 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 (adopted 11 February 1994, as amended 12 November 1997), UN Doc IT/32/Rev.44.

[21] See Raab (n 17) at 89–91. According to Raab, the use of plea bargains have significantly facilitated to the accomplishment of the ICTY's mandate, and should be regarded as 'a sound development at the ICTY'. However, case management developments at the ICTY have not come without criticism. As Raab explains, Complaints of lenient sentencing were heard in the Banović case. In Banović, a prison guard pleaded guilty to killing five inmates and beating many more, and was sentenced to eight years in prison. Presiding Judge Robinson dissented, believing that the sentence was too lenient. Raab notes that the sentences handed down in Darko Mrdja and Biljana Plavšić were criticized for the same reason; Sentencing Judgment, Predrag Banović, IT-02-65/1-S, TC, ICTY, 28 October 2003.

[22] Heller (n 2) at 900–6; see also A Chehtman, 'Developing Local Capacity for War Crimes Trials: Insights from BiH, Sierra Leone, and Colombia' (2013) 49 Stanford Journal of International Law 297, 300–4, noting the weaknesses of national legal systems in post-conflict situations.

[23] It is important to note that 'completion' will not be a straightforward progression in most situations. Cases are likely to face a number of stumbling blocks and delays, particularly given the real challenges the ICC has faced so far in securing the assistance necessary for investigations and arrests in several situations. Investigations in situations where crimes are ongoing or where impunity is deep and pervasive—again a majority of ICC situations, given its role as a court of last resort—mean that the Court will need to conduct more than just a handful of cases. For this reason, it is important to underscore once again that no artificial timelines should be imposed on the Court's work in a given situation once it opens investigations.

evaluation of its existing situations, and, going forward, from the outset in any new situations to assess just what will be needed—whether there are additional cases, or clearly communicated and reasoned decisions not to prosecute—in order to complete its work.[24]

49.2.2 Timeliness of devising and implementing completion strategies

The argument that the OTP is under no obligation to 'complete' its work in any strict sense—nor should it be—has been offered as a reason it is premature to develop completion strategies at the ICC, as compared to the closures squarely faced by the SCSL and ad hoc tribunals. Here, however, the ICC has more, rather than less in common with the SCSL and ad hoc tribunals, and cannot afford to wait.

First, this is clear from the experiences of the ad hocs and, to a lesser extent, the SCSL. The ICTY began discussions on its exit strategy in 2000.[25] This came about because of the desire to transfer cases to national jurisdictions in states that had made up the former Yugoslavia. Previously, this was not considered possible because those states had been neither willing nor able to conduct investigations and prosecutions themselves.[26] The lack of a clear mandate and development of the completion strategy meant that there were uncertainties regarding the ICTY's mandate and how it would operate, challenges with respect to witness protection especially in domestic jurisdictions, and difficulties planning for maximizing the ICTY's legacy, which likewise had received little attention during the first ten years of the ICTY's existence.[27] While the end date for the ICTY's closure was pushed back many times, the focus in the early 2000s on issues of completion and legacy undoubtedly had a strong and positive impact on how the ICTY carried out its work, both in terms of case selection (and case referral) and on how it viewed itself vis-à-vis the populations in the States making up the former Yugoslavia.[28] The completion strategy of the SCSL was first presented to the Management Committee in 2005, less than three years after the SCSL opened its doors.[29] Issues of legacy were built into [24] Heller (n 2) 918: 'A global [completion] strategy facilitates the creation of a coherent prosecutorial programme. It is almost impossible for an OTP to develop such a programme if it has no idea how long it will operate, particularly when its mandate extends to a large number of suspects.'

[25] T Pittman, 'The Road to Establishment of the International Residual Mechanisms for Criminal Tribunals, From Completion to Continuation' (2011) 9 Journal of International Criminal Justice 797, 799. The first formal mention of closure of the ICTY or ICTR was in 2000, in a letter from the ICTY President, Judge Claude Jorda, to the UN Secretary-General. Raab (n 17) at 84.

[26] Letter dated 10 June 2002 from the President of the ICTY addressed to the Secretary-General, Annex to the Letter dated 17 June 2002 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, UN Doc S/2002/678 (19 June 2002).

[27] Eleventh ASP to the ICC: NPWJ convenes side event on 'Developing a Comprehensive Completion Strategy for the ICC, No Peace without Justice, 17 November 2012 <http://www.npwj.org/node/5747> accessed 6 November 2013.

[28] For example, outreach efforts intensified during this period, as the ICTY had a greater focus on legacy, which by definition requires the engagement of local communities. See also 'Conclusions and the Way Ahead', First Annual Report of the President of the SCSL for the Period 2 December 2002–1 December 2003, 31.

[29] Completion Strategy, SCSL (2009), para. 2.

the fabric of the SCSL from the start and constituted the vision that informed how the SCSL built itself as an institution and carried out its work.[30] This, alongside the limitations on the SCSL's jurisdiction to 'those who bear the greatest responsibility' and the limited budget with which the SCSL had to operate, has undoubtedly contributed to the extremely positive impact of the SCSL in the country and the region. It is the first of the international courts and tribunals to have closed its doors at the end of 2013.

Second, even within the ICC context, there is already some pressure from States Parties on the ICC to develop 'exit' or 'completion strategies'. While discussions have taken on increasing substance over the past year, this initially stemmed from what appeared to be at least primarily, if not exclusively budgetary interests, that is, an interest in managing the Court's expanding workload within 'existing resources' by seeking to shuffle around resources.[31]

In fact, a kind of 'exit' or at least a 'transition' is already happening. The ICC may have eight open situations, but there has been a transfer of resources out of the Darfur and Uganda situations, for example, in redeploying outreach staff and scaling back on field presences.[32] This transfer of resources can be justified with reference to a lack of judicial activities given the failure to arrest suspects in cases arising out of these situations, and the need, in the absence of significant new resources from ICC States Parties, to stretch to new situations. Although arrests in cases in these situations will require a scaling back up of court activities, what to do about situations where proceedings have stalled due to non-cooperation could be an important feature in any discussion about completion or transition strategies, a challenge the Court already faces. A desire to get out ahead of these pressures and address them in a responsible fashion should argue in favour of developing appropriate strategies now.

Third, and most fundamentally, completion is not just about activities that need to take place before the ICC can wrap up its work and move on. It is equally about the spirit with which the Court carries out all of its work in a situation country, which is a lesson that should be well learned from the SCSL. In addition, the timeline necessary

[30] See generally Donlon (n 17). Art 23 of the SCSL Agreement states that upon completion of judicial activities of the Special Court, the agreement shall be terminated. As Donlon explains, The SCSL agreement did not set down residual factors, nor indicate how completion would be managed in the future. Officials began to tackle completion and closure issues at the 2008 Freetown Conference. The SCSL recruited Donlon as adviser to prepare a report to analyse various residual institutional options for the Special Court. The Report noted several obligations that would survive on completion of all trials and appeals. See also Art 23 Agreement between the United Nations and the Government for Sierra Leone on the Establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone, UN Doc S/2002/246 (16 January 2002), Appendix II; F. Donlon, Consultant, Report on the Residual Functions and Residual Institution Options for the Special Court of Sierra Leone, December 2008.

[31] As an indication of the link between budgetary Pressure on the court to hold down growth and a push to develop completion strategies, see Report of the Committee on Budget and Finance on the Work of its Seventeenth Session, ICC-ASP/10/15, 18 November 2011 (Tenth Session of the ASP), para. 18 (warning that there are limits to the degree to which new court activities can be absorbed within existing resources, and suggesting the need to give further consideration to how the court will complete its activities in a situation country, including as one measure to permit the redeployment of existing resources).

[32] ASP Report of the Court on Complementarity (n 10) para. 42.

to lay the groundwork for responsible completion is so extensive that completion activities can be started as soon as an investigation is opened, without fear of jeopardizing the Court's independent exercise of its own mandate. This is particularly true of activities aimed at enhancing domestic capacity to take over certain responsibilities and to conduct additional investigations and prosecutions as part of consolidating the ICC's legacy, as discussed in section 49.3, which are likely to encounter challenges with regard to the willingness of authorities to put measures in place at the national level.[33]

49.2.3 Defining completion at the ICC

In defining 'completion', the ICC should benefit from wide consultation in affected communities and with national authorities. This is a lesson learned both by the ad hocs and the Special Court, the experiences of which stress the importance of broad national consultation to embed completion work in local populations and ensure the sustainability of completion plans.[34] How do these core constituents understand the completion of the ICC's work? How can strategies be devised to match or inform expectations about completion? How can completion strategies be developed to ensure they will be sustainable and carried on by the local populations, which is particularly important for ensuring the ICC's lasting legacy? How can the political willingness of national authorities to take over responsibilities or to conduct additional investigations and prosecutions be gauged and bolstered, and with what consequence for the timeline for implementation of completion strategies? Throughout the various activities that can be undertaken to consolidate legacy and ensure a smooth completion, it is critical that the ICC engage with local communities and authorities to make sure that whatever their strategy, it is one that actually can work.

A clear and unique challenge for the ICC, then, is that its same officials will be required to devise and implement completion strategies that may vary markedly from situation to situation. The Court is likely to need a working definition and model of completion, to be adapted to the specifics of a given situation based on the wide consultation suggested here. In our view, completion should be defined with respect to whether the Court has achieved its mandate and under what conditions the Court will be able to say it has done so. This will primarily relate to whether the Court has delivered impartial, independent, and meaningful justice. However, a definition of completion should also consider fulfilment of the Court's mandate as turning also on whether the domestic jurisdiction is ready to take over the Court's ongoing responsibilities in the situation and resume their primary responsibilities to investigate and prosecute ICC crimes.

[33] Heller (n 2) 901 ('Flawed strategies have often undermined the efforts of hybrid and internationalized tribunals to build domestic judicial capacity, limiting the ability of national jurisdictions to prosecute international crimes after the tribunals close').

[34] Ibid., 911 (terming the failure to consult with victims regarding the ICTR's closure as 'a critical oversight, even if the victim's desires would not have affected the completion strategy: although victim satisfaction may not be a sufficient condition of a tribunal's legitimacy, it is certainly one of its necessary conditions. A tribunal that is not seen as legitimate by the victims of a conflict is unlikely to be seen as legitimate by anyone else').

This is likely to be a controversial definition of what it means to complete the ICC's mandate. The ICC is a court of last resort and not a development agency. By definition this means it is stepping in where there is either a lack of capacity to try serious crimes under international law, or a lack of political will to do so, or both. Shifting the landscape to a point where national authorities are able and willing to assume the responsibility, for example, of protecting ICC witnesses, let alone carrying out investigations and prosecutions that may continue to run counter to politically powerful interests, will often be an uphill battle.[35] It may even be an unwinnable battle. Indeed, in the broader context of 'positive complementarity', actors have been slow to come to terms with the degree to which political will is far more dispositive—and far more difficult to generate—than technical assistance.

Insisting on this as a dimension of the Court's mandate, however, is the approach most consistent with a sense of completion that is alive to consolidating the Court's legacy. That is, as defined earlier, its long-term contribution to ending impunity and reasserting the rule of law in the countries in which it acts. It is also most consistent with recognizing that the ICC is likely to have sustained engagement with situation countries over significant periods of time in challenging and transitional circumstances, and the potential impact on national jurisdictions that its work can bring about should not be underestimated.[36] It is not to suggest that this is a role exclusively for the ICC alone; rather, it makes particularly relevant States Parties' discussions on 'positive complementarity,' as examined later in the chapter.[37] Nor is it meant to suggest that the ICC and States Parties should be held hostage where it proves, in spite of concerted effort and sustained attention, impossible to fully realize this goal. In those cases, it may be necessary to recognize that more modest measurements of completion will be necessary. However, it should be considered as a feature of completion at the outset.

It is also worth emphasizing that while the completion strategy timelines and benchmarks will have to be driven by the OTP, there is a need for the entire Court to be involved, since the entire Court will be required to implement the strategy. In addition, it will be imperative to involve not only local populations and authorities but also the ICC's States Parties, international organizations, civil society, and others who may be called upon at different times to play a part in implementing the completion strategy along the way.

[35] See Chehtman (n 22) 300, noting the unreliability of witness support and protection mechanisms in national post-conflict jurisdictions. Post-conflict areas tend to have great difficulty in providing support for victims, a lack of institutional framework, know-how, and resources.

[36] See F Pocar, 'Completion or Continuation Strategy? Appraising Problems and Possible Developments in Building the Legacy of the ICTY' (2008) 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice 655. Pocar notes the rich heritage of the ICTY and its impact on the region as well as other international criminal tribunals.

[37] See section 49.4.

49.3 Lessons Learned for Capacity Building, Outreach, and Archive Management

As indicated in the previous section, the completion strategies of international tribunals are generally understood to have three components: completion issues, residual functions, and legacy issues. The ICC has set out the following definitions:

i. Completion issues: core judicial and administrative work performed before completion or closing dates, including planning for residual issues;
ii. Residual functions: a range of core judicial and administrative tasks that must be performed post-completion, since a criminal court's mandate is not complete with the final rendering of decisions; and
iii. Legacy issues (long-term post-completion projects, which begin prior to the institution's closure, such as outreach and institutional and capacity-building efforts, aimed at leaving a lasting positive impact on affected communities and their criminal justice systems).[38]

Unlike the SCSL and ad hocs, all of which required the setting-up of special mechanisms to deal with this second category—residual issues—the ICC as a permanent institution will have capacity to address enforcement of sentences, revisions of convictions or sentences, protection of witnesses, management of archives, and other similar activities. These activities still remain relevant to the development of ICC completion strategies, in that planning and resources will be needed for the ICC to carry out what would otherwise have been issues delegated to the residual mechanisms of the SCSL and ad hocs. Such functions include assistance with implementation of reparations awards and oversight of the enforcement of sentences, both of which are critical functions that will need to be budgeted for, both financially and in terms of human resources, as part of a situation-specific ICC completion strategy. Perhaps even more critically, a focus in completion strategies on bolstering national capacity to take over residual functions is likely to benefit 'legacy issues', in that enhanced national capacity is likely to promote additional investigations and prosecutions and leave 'a lasting positive impact on affected communities and their criminal justice systems'.[39]

This section focuses on aspects of completion where there is greater potential for overlap between the strategies of the SCSL and ad hocs, and those of the ICC, and therefore for drawing on lessons learned. Some of the key elements that should feature in ICC completion strategies in this respect are outlined here: capacity building, outreach, and archive management. All the various courts and tribunals, including the ICC, could benefit from cooperation with one another, to reduce the need for any of them to reinvent the wheel.

[38] ASP Report of the Court on Complementarity (n 10) para. 17.

[39] Id.; see also Pocar (n 36) 661–2. As Pocar explains, One of the underlying principles in the ICTY completion strategy is building the region more generally. The ICTY has paved the way for domestic adjudication of international crimes. Judge Pocar argues that the Tribunal's legacy will not just be about its efficiency, but reinforcing the principles of its establishment.

Again, it is worth highlighting that completion and legacy are not just about specific activities that can usefully be carried out to prepare for the time when the ICC will depart, and to enhance the impact the ICC can have on local populations and on the rule of law and human rights in its situation countries. In many ways, the preparations for completion lie in how things are done, which should be informed by the difference it is foreseen the Court will make in its situation countries once its work is completed. The SCSL's legacy, for example, first had its own discrete section in the very first Annual Report of the Court, speaking about the development of the Court complex, including the buildings, as a legacy of the Court's presence; the development of skills of Sierra Leonean staff also as a means to have a lasting impact on the country's development; and a process of information and education being carried out across the country, led by the Outreach Section.[40] All of this work, from the very early days of the Court, was done as a means to build the foundations for leaving a legacy of accountability and contributing to legal reform in Sierra Leone.[41] The ICTY, with the assistance of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), has conducted assessments in its outreach activities, training, and identification of best practices in order to ensure a lasting impact in the former Yugoslavia.[42] This is the kind of vision that the ICC and its States Parties need to develop prior to the ICC's entry into a situation country if it is to work most effectively and efficiently to achieve its goals. For those countries where the ICC is already carrying out activities, it is critical that this vision be identified as soon as possible.

49.3.1 Capacity building

Technical assistance and transfer of knowledge should be pillars of a completion strategy to facilitate the transfer of responsibilities to national authorities. Responsibilities that can be appropriately transferred to situation countries are likely to include investigation and prosecution of outstanding cases, whether arrest warrants or summons to appear have been sought by the ICC or not, and witness protection.

In the case of the SCSL, its Rules of Procedure and Evidence were amended in 2008 to allow for the possibility of referral of its cases to a national jurisdiction, much as the ICTY and ICTR's Rules were amended to facilitate implementation of its completion strategy.[43] While there is only one fugitive remaining at the SCSL, Johnny Paul Koroma, it is possible that there will be contempt cases. The SCSL has made it abundantly clear that any interference with witnesses will be dealt with swiftly and severely by the Residual Special Court.[44] Such cases could be dealt with either by the Residual Special Court or by national courts.[45]

[40] For an overview of legacy activities of the SCSL see <http://scsl-legacy.ictj.org/> accessed 29 October 2013.

[41] Ibid. [42] Pocar (n 38) 663.

[43] Rule 11*bis* SCSL RPE; Rule 11*bis* ICTY RPE; Rule 11*bis* ICTR RPE; Rule 28 ICTY RPE (as amended 12 November 1997). See nn 20–1.

[44] 'Prosecutor Hollis Welcomes the Historic Final Judgment in the Charles Taylor Case', African Press Organization, 26 September 2013 <http://appablog.wordpress.com/2013/09/26/special-court-for-sierra-leone-scsl-prosecutor-hollis-welcomes-the-historic-final-judgment-in-the-charles-taylor-case/> accessed 17 July 2014.

[45] Regarding prosecution of Koroma see Donlon (n 17) 862–3; Art 1(2) SCSL Agreement (Ratification) Act, 2011 <http://www.rscsl.org/Documents/RSCSL-Act.pdf> accessed 16 July 2014 ('RSCSL Statute'). If

In terms of witness protection, ongoing responsibilities will include arranging protection and support in residual trials, appeals, and review proceedings; providing a contact point for protected victims and witnesses to inform them of the release of relevant convicted persons; monitoring and assessing threats to ensure that protective measures are effective and respected; and revising protective measures if necessary, as well as assisting victims and witnesses in their relocation to another State if required.[46] This is a wide array of responsibilities that will remain on the shoulders of the ICC, as it remains on the shoulders of the residual mechanisms for the ad hocs and the SCSL. The ICC has asked witnesses to testify and invited victims to participate; the responsibility for ensuring their safety and security will remain with the ICC long after the trials have concluded.

That said, witness protection is one area where it makes sense to have the tasks and duties carried out by the national authorities, where it is appropriate to do so and under the overall oversight of the ICC itself. This, for example, is what will happen with the Residual Special Court: its obligation towards the protection of victims and witnesses is continuing, in collaboration with the Sierra Leonean Police, through its support in the creation of a special Witnesses Protection and Assistance Unit whose work will be overseen by witness protection officers of the Residual Special Court.[47] This kind of cooperation, without abdicating responsibility, is a way in which the ICC could work in the future, which would both ensure a positive legacy through strengthening national witness protection programmes while at the same time reducing the financial burden on the ICC, which would need to oversee the national witness protection scheme but not need to have a fully functional witness protection unit working on a situation that has already closed.

49.3.2 Outreach

Outreach activities are needed to raise understanding about the institution, its mechanisms, and procedures. A survey conducted in 2012 by No Peace without Justice and its partners on the impact and the legacy of the SCSL both in Sierra Leone and in Liberia showed that a high awareness of the SCSL, its purposes, and work is evident in both countries.[48] In general, perceptions in Sierra Leone were Koroma is not referred to a competent national jurisdiction, the Residual Special Court shall have authority to try him.

[46] See generally, e.g. Arts 1, 18 RSCSL Statute; Arts 1, 2, and 20 Statute of the International Residual Mechanism for Criminal Tribunals, UNSC Res 1966 (22 December 2010) UN Doc S/RES/1966, Annex 1 ('IRMCT Statute'); G Acquavida, '"Best Before Date Shown": Residual Mechanisms at the ICTY' in B Swart et al. (eds), The Legacy of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (Oxford: Oxford University Press 2011) 8, citing Report of the Secretary-General on the Administrative and budgetary aspects of the ICTY and the ICTR and the Seat of Residual Mechanism(s) for the Tribunal, UN Doc S/2009/258 (21 May 2009).

[47] See 'Legacy: Completing the Work of the Special Court for Sierra Leon,' Open Society Justice Initiative (2011), pp. 12–13; see also description of national witness protection programme available at http://www.rscsl.org/legacy.html more positive than in Liberia and more people had heard of the SCSL in Sierra Leone than in Liberia.[49] This comes down to two things: first, the SCSL was based in Sierra Leone and not in Liberia. Second, outreach began much earlier in Sierra Leone than in Liberia and was able to have a broader reach, in part due to the establishment of outreach offices in every district of Sierra Leone from an early stage. There can be no doubt that there is a direct correlation between the outreach activities of the SCSL and strengthening its legacy and the positive contributions it has made to peace and justice. In the later years of the Court's life, SCSL outreach also began to focus on its closure and the establishment of the Residual Special Court, which is an important way to consolidate the SCSL's early gains and to promote acceptance by the populations both of the SCSL's closure and of the work of the Residual Special Court.

[48] 'Making Justice Count: Assessing the Impact and Legacy of the Special Court for Sierra Leone in Sierra Leone and Liberia', Special Court for Sierra Leone and No Peace without Justice (2012).

Similarly, the ICC will need to do outreach around its completion and closure in any given situation. For this reason, it will be critical that the ICC has a clear vision of what completion will mean, particularly in terms of the conditions that need to be realized in order to say the Court has completed its mandate. In part, this will—or should—also be dependent on what the local population has to say about this issue: while the OTP has to be independent in determining when it can say it has completed its work, as discussed earlier, there is a need to be responsive to what local populations think on the matter, otherwise irrespective of the excellent work the ICC may do, its departure risks leaving a bitter taste in too many mouths. This is one reason it is critical to undertake wide-ranging consultations, encompassing a variety of sectors of society and ensuring broad geographic reach, to minimize the risk of that happening. Involvement that was missing in the case of the ICTY was that of Serbian civil society actors as opposed to civil society from Croatia and Bosnia. The effects are evident: the situation now is that Bosnia is fully going ahead with national prosecutions; Croatia is moving forward but on a regional level; and Serbia has not shown any interest in national trials.[50]

49.3.3 Archives

There are two aspects to the archives of the ICC. On the one hand, there is a residual function—that of management of the ICC's archives—that clearly belongs with and can be carried out by the ICC itself. Indeed, there is an argument that the material produced by the ICC belongs to the ICC and should be retained by it and shared pursuant to the rules established in its archival policy. However, there is also an argument to be made that the archives of the ICC, at least insofar as they are not confidential, 'belong' in a non-technical and non-legal sense to the populations where the crimes that were investigated and prosecuted were actually carried out. While of course the ICC cannot write the country's history, and nor should it attempt to do so, it can make an important contribution at least to filling in parts of that history through the adjudication of contested facts and the attribution of individual criminal responsibility. As such, the archives of the ICC form, or should form, part of the history of its situation countries.[51] For the ICTY, for example, 90% of the ICTY's public archives are co-held with the Humanitarian Law Centre, which makes those records available for research and perusal by people from the region.[52] The public archives of the SCSL will likewise be available in Sierra Leone.[53]

[49] Id. [50] See Raab (n 17) at 92–5.

Indeed, the issuance of judgments could be a milestone or a starting point for a population, which could lead to national reconciliation It is important that local actors have access to materials. The success of the Peace Museum project in Sierra Leone, which involved a national body and trained local actors to deal with the Special Court's expertise, materials, and proceedings, is an example of this.[54]

It will be important for the ICC to build into its completion plans how it will share its archives with the situation country and which original items, such as exhibits whose owner cannot be found, should be provided to the situation country, for example for use in a museum or other memorial.[55] This is also important to avoid charges of the ICC 'stealing' both memories and property from its situation countries, which is a useful lesson learned from the ad hocs and the SCSL.[56]

49.4 A Role for the Court and the ASP

At the Kampala review conference, the ICC's ASP succeeded in putting the discussion of 'complementarity' on the map. More specifically, as indicated above, the ASP and individual States Parties have attempted to push forward discussion of 'positive complementarity', that is, how international assistance can be directed towards the strengthening of national jurisdictions in the investigation and [51] See observations regarding the SCSL archives in Donlon (n 17) at 867–9.

[52] See Fond za Humanitarno Pravo ('Humanitarian Law Centre') <http://www.hlc-rdc.org/?page_id=17468&lang=de> accessed 6 November 2013.

[53] Art 7 RSCSL Statute; see also Donlon (n 17) at 867–9.

[54] Donlon (n 17). As Donlon explains, The SCSL in cooperation with national stakeholders developed the Sierra Leone Peace Museum with the objective of establishing a memorial in Freetown which will include archives, a memorial, and exhibitions of war-related material. The Sierra Leone Human Rights Commission decided to house the archives of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission alongside the copy of the SCSL public records in the Peace Museum. Greater public education on the end of impunity and responses to grave human rights abuses will result as public records from various transitional justice institutions and will be available in one location.

[55] See generally G Frisso, 'Winding Down the ICTY: The Impact of the Completion Strategy and the Residual Mechanism on Victims' (2011) 3 Goettingen Journal of International Law 1093, 1118, 1119. Frisso argues that Archives are particularly important, as they offer a historical record and information about the circumstances in which atrocities were committed. It becomes part of a people's national heritage and should be preserved. It offers victims a collective right to know and may help contextualize victims' experiences, thereby facilitating the healing of wounds.

[56] See generally P Manning, 'Governing Memory: Justice, Reconciliation and Outreach at the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia' (2012) 5 Memory Studies 165, 166. Manning brings to light criticisms of the ECCC's contributions to reconciliation. He argues that the ECCC's mandate provides a 'selective memory' of events: particular events are recalled through narrow factual and legal lenses rather than a broader historical context, placing memory in neat positions between guilt and innocence.

prosecution of ICC crimes.[57] Since the review conference, the ASP, which has mandated annually facilitators and now ad hoc country focal points, to lead its work in this area, has sought out a strong role in pushing forward discussion with other important actors, particularly in the development and rule-of-law communities.[58] Experience since has shown that capacity building on investigation and prosecution of ICC crimes is no easy task, topped perhaps only by the challenge of securing the willingness of authorities to permit independent judicial activities to go forward without interference.[59] Nonetheless, the ASP's efforts to keep this issue front-and-centre for States Parties and to serve as an ambassador for complementarity with the development community hold potential for real contributions to seeing the principle of complementarity put increasingly into practice. The Court, however, has largely been sidelined by States Parties in discussions on complementarity. Particularly as discussions on positive complementarity were first undertaken within the ASP, some States Parties argued strenuously that the ICC has no role to play on positive complementarity. For some of these states, this was a mandate issue—they did not see positive complementarity in the Rome Statute. For other states, it has clearly been driven by a concern to keep the Court's budget down, fearing that complementarity efforts on the part of the Court would require additional resources.[60]

Given that ICC completion strategies will, as outlined, have a significant component related to capacity building, a consequence of State Party pressure on the Court to avoid its own role in complementarity may have contributed to stymied progress on discussion of such strategies. Court officials and staff will have specific expertise when it comes to identifying needs for capacity building in situations under investigation, and this expertise could be very useful to catalyse necessary complementarity efforts by other actors in these situation countries.[61] While capacity building directed to activities that support the transfer of ICC responsibilities represents a smaller basket than the long list of possible assistance that can support complementarity, it nonetheless includes a number of functions that are also essential to national investigations and prosecutions, including—perhaps most clearly of all—witness protection and support.[62]

[57] See e.g. Report of the Bureau on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/12/31, 15 October 2013, (Twelfth Session of the ASP); Report of the Bureau on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/11/24, 7 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP).

[58] Id. [59] Chehtman (n 22) 300–4.

[60] Authors' observations of State Party consultations on complementarity.

[61] 'Making Kampala Count: Advancing the Global Fight against Impunity at the ICC Review Conference', Human Rights Watch (2010), 46–9.

[62] For an overview of the kinds of assistance necessary to support national prosecutions and investigations, see Report of the Court on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/11/39, 16 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP); Joint Staff Document on Advancing the Principle of Complementarity, High Representative of the European Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy (2013); E Witte et al., International Crimes, Local Justice: A Handbook for Rule-of-Law Policymakers, Donors, and Implementers (New York: Open Society Foundations 2011); Chehtman (n 22) 309–15.

Resurgent interest at the Court and among States Parties on completion strategies could midwife this kind of meaningful collaboration between court officials and States Parties on complementarity. Once completion strategies are conceived and given the time it will take to build capacity in these areas, it would be preferable for these strategies to be developed almost from the outset of the opening of a situation. It could become a clear roadmap for the Assembly, as part of its role and the role of its secretariat to facilitate information exchanges on complementarity, to then broker international assistance towards these ends. Focusing on delivering the national capacity to support the Court's completion would provide a useful clarity of purpose to the efforts of the ASP, which otherwise would have seemed to cast about quite broadly for appropriate inroads on complementarity. States may want to resist a role for the Court—or even for themselves—in complementarity, but bringing complementarity discussions closer to emerging discussions on completion, as indeed reports produced for the twelfth ASP session have done, will contribute to a vision of the Court at the core of which there is a concern for legacy and impact.[63]

49.5 Conclusion

As the ICC enters its second decade, focused discussion on how the ICC will responsibly complete its activities in situations under investigation is long overdue. While there remains substantial work for the ICC to do in each of its current situations, a clear lesson learned from other international tribunals is that it is never early enough to begin preparing for eventual completion. This is important not only to ensure proper planning and implementation of completion strategies, but also because a focus on the 'end game' is likely to influence significantly how the ICC carries out its activities from the outset, increasing the Court's orientation, and that of its States Parties, towards its legacy and impact.

Recent progress made in directing Court and State Party attention towards completion should be capitalized upon, and urgently. In devising completion strategies, the ICC will need a working model of what 'completion' will look like, and to develop methods, including consultation with affected communities and national authorities, to adapt that model to a given situation country.

It is clear, however, that a second lesson learned is that capacity building of national jurisdictions should be a pillar of completion strategies across the Court's situations. Strengthened national jurisdictions can facilitate the Court's completion of its activities in that responsibilities can be turned over to local authorities. It will also help to put in place the building blocks necessary to promote additional investigations and prosecutions nationally, provided it goes hand in hand with efforts to promote the willingness of those authorities to permit independent judicial activities to go forward. This will afford broader accountability than the ICC acting alone and contribute to the Court's legacy: it should be considered a key dimension of any definition of the Court's completion of its mandate. Indeed, the ICC is uniquely positioned as compared to the other tribunals to harness the existing discussions of its member states on 'positive complementarity' to this end. It is an opportunity that should not be squandered.

[63] ASP Report of the Court on Complementarity (n 10); ASP Report of the Bureau on Complementarity (n 57).

50

A Look towards the Future—The ICC and 'Lessons Learnt'

*Philipp Ambach

50.1 Introduction

The establishment of the ICC in 2002 marks the hallmark of a dynamic process that had picked up pace in the early to mid-1990s with the inception of the ad hoc International Criminal Tribunals of the UN for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda.[1] However, the ICC was—and is—fundamentally distinct from the ad hoc Tribunals: while the latter started off as small pioneer units which grew successively over the years up to their completion in 2012 (ICTR) and 2013 (ICTY),[2] the former was designed to become a global court from its inception.[3] The Statute and Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICC[4] are the result of a concerted thought process and valiant common effort of a great many states to create a court that could help 'end impunity'.[5]

The present contribution focuses on some of the Court's major future challenges, and initiatives to improve the efficient management of criminal proceedings. I will first address challenges and strategies in relation to macro issues in the ICC's focus: (i) global membership; (ii) cooperation; (iii) complementarity; (iv) judicial integrity; and (v) efficiency of proceedings, before addressing specific features of the 'Lessons Learnt' initiative which was established in 2011 to assess the functioning of the ICC's procedural framework and look into possible improvements.[6] In conclusion, the lessons learnt initiative is brought into context with the Court's other challenges.

* Dr Philipp Ambach is Special Assistant to the President of the ICC. Previously, he worked as an Associate Legal Officer in the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY and ICTR, after having been admitted as Prosecutor in the OTP of Cologne, Germany.

[1] ICTY, under <http://www.icty.org>; and ICTR, under <http://www.ictr.org>; in the following when mentioned together: ad hoc Tribunals.

[2] Operations of ICTY and ICTR are gradually being transferred to the United Nations Mechanism for International Criminal Tribunals (MICT), which has been established to carry out a number of essential functions of the ICTR and ICTY after the completion of their respective mandates. The MICT is tasked with (i) continuing the 'jurisdiction, rights and obligations and essential functions' (UNSC Res 1966 (22 December 2010) UN Doc S/RES/1966) of the ICTR and the ICTY, and (ii) maintaining the legacy of both institutions. See under <http://www.unmict.org/index.html>.

[3] See for instance the Draft Programme Budget for 2005, ICC-ASP/3/2, 26 July 2004 (Third Session of the ASP), paras 100 and 141.

[4] Rome Statute of the ICC (signed 17 July 1998, entered into force 1 July 2002) 2187 UNTS 3 ('ICC Statute'); Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Official Records of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, First session, New York, 3–10 September 2002 (ICC-ASP/1/3 and Corr.1), part II.A (adopted and entered into force 9 September 2002) ('ICC RPE').

[5] See Preamble ICC Statute.

[6] Study Group on Governance: Lessons learnt: First report of the Court to the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/11/31/Add.1, 23 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP) ('First Report'), para. 13.

50.2 Operational Challenges of the ICC

The main challenges of the ICC can be broadly subdivided into two clusters: (i) challenges of a heteronomous nature where the Court's main stakeholders, the States Parties, are called upon in the first place to continue to put the ICC on the map and the ICC's direct influence to meaningfully tackle these challenges on its own is limited; and (ii) challenges that lie more within the institution's own risk and responsibility sphere. Both of them are discussed here.

50.2.1 Global membership

Increasing membership is crucial for the Rome Statute system to increase its jurisdictional reach and eventually achieve universal jurisdictional coverage.[7] Failing broad membership, the Court's territorial jurisdiction remains limited[8] and a number of conflicts (and consequently perpetrators of the gravest crimes) remain outside the Court's reach.[9] Limited global reach and at times political rather than judicial dynamics in the Security Council leave room for accusations of selectivity in the Court's operations.

With 123 States Parties to the Court after 12 years of operations, more than 70 states have yet to join, including the world's most populous countries, such as China, India, the United States, Indonesia, and Russia. A majority of the world's population therefore remains outside the Rome Statute's legal protection and limits the reach and applicability of its provisions. In a geopolitical context where many states are facing economic challenges and, often coupled with that, internal political instability, the interest to engage in supranational justice efforts, which some view as further eroding the traditional image of state sovereignty,[10] is limited. While the territorial coverage of the Rome Statute is fairly advanced on the European and American continents, approximately a third of African States and as many as two-thirds of Asia-Pacific states have yet to join the ICC. The slowing pace in ratifications in recent years[11] can be explained by the fact that nearly all states that intended to join from the beginning have done so by now. However, ICC accession remains a challenge in [7] Preamble ICC Statute, paras 3 and 5: 'Recognizing that such grave crimes threaten the peace, security and well-being of the world'; 'Determined to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes and thus to contribute to the prevention of such crimes' (emphasis added).

[8] Art 12(2) ICC Statute.

[9] While the UN Security Council can—in theory—override concerns of the ICC's limited jurisdiction through its referral power under Art 13(b) ICC Statute, the Security Council remains a political body and its decisions (or, at times, the absence thereof) consequently risk bearing political impetus. Most illustratively, the question has been asked repeatedly why the Security Council—unanimously—referred the situation in Libya which led to the fall of the Gaddafi regime without much ado to the ICC, whereas hundreds of thousands of Syrian victims are waiting for a similar resolution of the Security Council to the present day.

[10] G Werle, Principles of International Criminal Law 2nd edn (The Hague: T M C Asser Press 2009), Part One, paras 2 ff, 90, and 126.

[11] This development is reflected in the accessions to the Rome Statute: from four in 2010 and six in 2011 to only one State joining in 2012 and another in 2013; 2014 has seen no accession to date; see <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/states%20parties/Pages/the%20states%20parties%20to%20the%20rome%20statute.aspx> accessed 13 August 2014.

relation to the many non-States Parties that have not yet ratified the Rome Statute because of the sheer absence of lawmakers taking action and not for reasons of opposition to the ICC.

The ASP (Assembly)[12] as the 'parent body' of the ICC engages, through its Bureau,[13] in a variety of efforts with signatories and non-States Parties with a view to informing them, resolving misunderstandings, and overcoming institutional as well as political obstacles to joining the Rome Statute system.[14] But efforts and initiatives by the Assembly and the Court, where appropriate, are insufficient. Increasing the universality of the Rome Statute in the future will require coordinated awareness-raising and advocacy from a wide range of other actors such as States Parties, civil society, regional and international organizations, and professional associations,[15] especially at a time where political consensus is hard to find in the highest international echelons to provide immediate crisis relief and protection of civilians in ongoing armed conflicts.[16]

50.2.2 Cooperation

A second major challenge for the credibility and strength of the ICC in its operations is the cooperation of states with the Court and the enforcement of its orders through national authorities. In the absence of a police force of its own, the ICC is bound to rely on states to execute any judicial order that entails an enforcement-related function, most importantly its arrest warrants, but also measures to obtain evidence, the appearance of witnesses, and the freezing and seizing of assets.[17] The Court is ever [12] The Assembly is the collective body of the ICC's States Parties and the governing body of the ICC with a number of management oversight functions; see Art 112 ICC Statute. It is also the Assembly that decides on amendments to the Rome Statute, see Arts 121 and 122.

[13] The Bureau is established pursuant to Art 112(3) ICC Statute. As for its work on universality see Report of the Bureau on the Plan of Action for Achieving Universality and Full Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/11/26, 9 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP).

[14] Recent initiatives include the appointment of several States Parties as co-focal points for the 'Plan of action of the Assembly of States Parties for achieving universality and full implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court'. See Report of the Bureau on the Plan of Action for Achieving Universality and Full Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/12/26, 15 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP).

[15] See e.g. the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) at the UN Human Rights Council, which also provides a platform for States Parties to make recommendations to other States regarding the ratification or implementation of the Rome Statute: Universal Periodic Review provides opportunity to promote ICC, Coalition for the ICC (20 May 2014) <http://ciccglobaljustice.wordpress.com/2014/05/20/universal-periodic-review-provides-opportunity-to-promote-icc/> accessed 13 August 2008.

[16] A very blatant example is the inaction of the UNSC during a long period of reported massive human rights abuses and attacks on civilians in the ongoing armed conflict in Syria. See UNSC Res 2043 (21 April 2012) UN Doc S/RES/2043, establishing a United Nations Supervision Mission in Syria (UNSMIS) deploying unarmed military observers; and UNSC Res 2118 (27 September 2013) UN Doc S/RES/2118 on the destruction of Syrian chemical weapons; see generally at <http://www.securitycouncilreport.org/syria/> accessed 13 August 2014.

[17] Fundamentally, Art 86 ICC Statute stipulates a general obligation of States Parties to cooperate with the Court in its investigative and prosecutorial activities. Arts 89 and 92 ICC Statute govern the arrest warrant-related cooperation. See further Arts 15(2), 54(3)(c), 93, 96, and 99. See also C Kress et al., 'Part 9—International Cooperation and Judicial Assistance—Preliminary Remarks' in O Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court—Observers' Notes, Article by Article 2nd edn (München: C H Beck 2008) 1.

more in need of state cooperation because its increasing number of cases generates a fast-growing number of witnesses requiring protection.[18] While a number of framework agreements exist between the Court and States Parties on both the enforcement of sentences and the relocation of witnesses,[19] cooperation efforts have to remain strong to cater for the expected growing needs in the future.

In the past few years, cooperation between the ICC and States Parties as well as non-States Parties[20] has intensified. Yet, it is not unproblematic, particularly in situations where the OTP is investigating or prosecuting representatives of the very same regime from which cooperation is sought.[21] At worst, cooperation is not forthcoming at all—several suspects subject to ICC arrest warrants in a number of situations have successfully evaded arrest for many years and continue to do so.[22] In this regard, it is important that the States Parties collectively hold each other accountable for compliance with the ICC's cooperation regime—a treaty obligation that applies to each of them in the same manner. Failure to cooperate should not pass without consequences and the Court's jurisprudence provides the ground for subsequent actions amongst the States Parties.[23] In this respect, the Assembly has created a means to encourage cooperation through the non-cooperation procedures adopted at its eleventh session.[24] As for the cooperation duties of (non-Member) States in situations before the ICC through a UN Security Council referral, a more proactive role of the latter is needed to remind states of those duties which, in those cases, stem directly from the UN Charter.[25]

[18] Issues such as the enforcement of sentences and the relocation of witnesses are subject to voluntary cooperation of States and the ICC needs to establish cooperation through framework agreements with states that are willing.

[19] The last agreement on the enforcement of sentences dates from July 2012 (Agreement between the Kingdom of Denmark and the International Criminal Court on the Enforcement of Sentences of the International Criminal Court (adopted 1 June 2010, entered into force 5 July 2012) Official Journal of the International Court, ICC-PRES/12-02-12). See the Official Journal of the International Criminal Court for the current number of agreements <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/legal%20texts%20and%20tools/official%20journal/Pages/index.aspx>. Agreements on witness protection remain confidential.

[20] See Art 87(5) ICC Statute. See also Z Wenqi, 'On Co-operation by States Not Party to the International Criminal Court' (2006) 88 International Review of the Red Cross 87, 88f.

[21] See only Decision on Prosecution's Applications for a Finding of Non-Compliance Pursuant to Art 87(7) and for an Adjournment of the Provisional Trial Date, Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11-908, TC V(B), ICC, 31 March 2014, paras 92–5.

[22] At present, as many as 12 suspects sought with a warrant of arrest remain in abeyance. See <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/situations%20and%20cases/Pages/situations%20and%20cases.aspx> accessed 13 August 2014.

[23] Decision Pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Failure by the Republic of Malawi to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-139, PTC I, ICC, 12 December 2011; and Decision Pursuant to Art 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the Refusal of the Republic of Chad to Comply with the Cooperation Requests Issued by the Court with Respect to the Arrest and Surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-140, PTC I, ICC, 13 December 2011.

[24] Assembly Procedures Relating to Non-Cooperation, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, Annex, 21 December 2011 (Ninth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), 420. See also Report of the Bureau on Non-Cooperation, ICC-ASP/11/29, 1 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP). See for both <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/asp/non-cooperation/Pages/default.aspx> accessed 13 August 2014.

[25] Decision Regarding the Visit of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir to the Federal Republic of Ethiopia, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-199, PTC II, ICC, 29 April 2014, para. 12. See

50.2.3 Complementarity

The primacy of national jurisdictions, and in consequence the complementary role of the ICC, is one of the core features of the Rome system that requires further attention. The first pillar of complementarity, i.e. the judicial pillar, relates to the choice of the proper forum of jurisdiction. According to Article 17 of the Rome Statute, a case is admissible before the ICC only when a state with jurisdiction over the crime(s) in question 'is unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution'.[26] There was an initial fear that the Court would interpret the admissibility threshold overly restrictively in order to keep any case once received in its docket in an effort of self-preservation.[27] But such tensions have been mitigated. In particular, the Libya cases have shown that the system works in both directions.[28]

The second pillar of complementarity is 'positive' partnership and mutual assistance between the Court and its stakeholders, as well as between stakeholders.[29] A key element is the strengthening of national justice systems, including implementation of the Rome Statute in domestic jurisdictions. The role of the ICC itself in the strengthening and capacity building of national judiciaries is, however, very limited.[30] While a substantial number of States Parties have taken action or are in the process of passing necessary legislation, more can and needs to be done. In order to safeguard a professional and independent national judiciary, a number of key elements are fundamental: investigators with skills and resources; functioning witness protection facilities; guarantees for a proper defence; financial resources; judges' and prosecutors' know-how; and finally, the political will to bring perpetrators to justice.[31] This is where initiatives and efforts need to concentrate on strengthening national capacities and encouraging local ownership of domestic judicial proceedings.

also D Akande, 'The Legal Nature of Security Council Referrals to the ICC and its Impact on Al Bashir's Immunities' (2009) 7 Journal of International Criminal 335.

[26] Art 17(1)(a) ICC Statute.

[27] See P Bernhard Jr., 'The Paradox of Institutional Conversion: The Evolution of Complementarity in the International Criminal Court' (2011) 1 International Journal of Humanities and Social Science 203.

[28] The Appeals Chamber confirmed a decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Libya situation declaring the case of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi inadmissible before the ICC on the grounds that domestic proceedings are under way and that Libya was willing and able genuinely to carry out such proceedings. Judgment on the appeal of Mr Abdullah Al-Senussi against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I of 11 October 2013 entitled 'Decision on the Admissibility of the Case against Abdullah Al-Senussi', Gaddafi and Al-Senussi, Situation in Libya, ICC-01/11-01/11-565, AC, ICC, 24 July 2014; Judges Sang-Hyun Song and Judge Anita Ušacka appended two separate opinions.

[29] W Burke-White, 'Implementing a Policy of Positive Complementarity in the Rome System of Justice' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 59–85; C Stahn, 'Complementarity: A Tale of two Notions' (2008) 19 Criminal Law Forum 87–113.

[30] The ICC is a criminal court whose focus lies in rendering justice through fair and expeditious criminal proceedings. It is not a capacity-building agency or provider of rule of law training and general judicial assistance in nation-building settings. See Report of the Court on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/11/39, 16 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 59.

[31] See the elements proposed by the ICC for States to assist others in need as part of a more technical approach to complementarity: ibid., Section III—Thematic areas for the attention of other complementarity actors, 4 f.

Capacity-building programmes supported by States Parties, United Nations bodies, and civil society[32] are instrumental in building a solid network of states that can help each other strengthen and, where necessary, reform their national judicial systems.[33]

50.2.4 Judicial integrity

A fourth critical challenge for the Court is to maintain judicial integrity in the geopolitical environment it operates. The Court is part of a broader institutional landscape, including international and national political actors, such as the UN Security Council and other UN bodies, the AU, regional organizations, and national governments. The ICC must establish its place amongst these bodies while preserving its independence from the influence of national and international political actors around it. This is not always simple, as the Court's options to respond to politically motivated attempts to undermine its institutional legitimacy are limited: in its ongoing proceedings the ICC is restricted to providing factual information only.[34] In addition, the prosecutor, while having slightly more liberty to publicly comment upon current issues of relevance, needs to be reflective of her statutory mandate as an independent and impartial organ of justice.[35] In its existing operations, the Court has countered external political pressure, including from the US Administration in the ICC's earlier days[36] and regarding proceedings against African heads of states.[37] If and where changes of the ICC's legal framework are postulated in order to adapt the Court's operations to political realities, caution is warranted. Any such change needs to be properly reflected in an abstract manner and should not merely serve as a response to what is perceived as a concrete dilemma, possibly flanked by political pressure.[38]

[32] Resolution on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/11/Res.6, 21 November 2012 (Eighth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), paras 3 and 8; Resolution on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/12/Res.4, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), paras 3 and 5. See also the ASP Bureau Report on Complementarity 'Taking stock of the principle of complementarity—Bridging the impunity gap', ICC-ASP/8/51 (Eighth Session of the ASP).

[33] Note in this regard efforts on the part of the Assembly to provide a platform for exchanging information between the Court, States Parties, and other stakeholders, including international organizations and civil society, aimed at strengthening domestic jurisdictions; see Resolution on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/12/Res.4, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), para. 6; Report of the Secretariat on Complementarity, ICC-ASP/12/33, 15 October (Twelfth Session of the ASP).

[34] For the judges of the Court this is stipulated in Art 9(2) of the Code of Judicial Ethics, ICC-BD/02-01-05.

[35] Art 54(1) ICC Statute; Code of Conduct for the OTP, 5 September 2013, OTP2013/024322, Section 8.

[36] See UNSC Res 1593 (31 March 2005) UN Doc S/RES/1593; C Heyder, 'The U.N. Security Council's Referral of the Crimes in Darfur to the International Criminal Court in Light of U.S. Opposition to the Court: Implications for the International Criminal Court's Functions and Status' (2006) 24 Berkeley Journal of International Law 650f.

[37] Warrant of Arrest for Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-1, PTC I, ICC, 4 March 2009, amended by Second Warrant of Arrest for Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, Al Bashir, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/09-95, PTC I, ICC, 12 July 2010; proceedings before Trial Chamber V(b) in the case of Kenyatta, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-02/11.

[38] The Assembly, in collaboration with the ICC, has established a formalized and consultative process for the amendment of the ICC's Rules of Procedure and Evidence. The process will be discussed in detail infra. Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/11/Res.8, 21 November 2012 (Eighth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), para. 41, Annex II, Terms of reference of the Working Group on Amendments; and ICC-ASP/12/Res.8, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), para. 39.

50.2.5 Efficient management of judicial proceedings

A fifth challenge relates to the management of proceedings. International trials are, and will always be, comparatively slow in relation to ordinary national trials; the sheer size of international trials with multiple crime sites, a high number of distinct charges, often more than 50 witnesses per case, and thousands of pages of documentation submitted as evidence requires significant time and resources. This is exacerbated by the high complexity of these proceedings with perpetrators often far detached from the actual crimes on the ground, leading to a high degree of legal and factual complication. These factors have led to trial phases in international criminal tribunals that lasted for years.[39] The ICC is no exception in this regard.[40]

Another factor adding to the length of proceedings is the fact that the ICC operates in areas of conflict, which generates security obstacles for investigators and other ICC personnel in the field. Carrying investigations against all parties to a conflict in which atrocities have been committed[41] may lead to decreased cooperation by state authorities implicated in crimes.[42] Another factor adding to the complexity of proceedings is the ICC's victim participation regime.[43] Participation is only vaguely defined in the Statute and has created a great amount of diverse jurisprudence by the Chambers as to its handling.[44] On the technical level, both the Court's Registry and Chambers are exploring ways to optimize the participation procedure in the different stages of proceedings.[45]

In addition, the ICC procedural regime contains a number of unresolved issues. Uncertainties remain in relation to the standard of evidence used in the pre-trial phase prior to submitting the case to trial;[46] the general treatment of evidence;[47] the [39] There are many examples at both ICTR and ICTY of trial phases that lasted years and generated relevant litigation (see only Judgment, Gatete, ICTR-00-61-A, AC, ICTR, 9 October 2012, para. 45; Décision Relative à la Requête de l'Accusé aux Fins de Mettre un Terme à son Procès, Šešelj, IT-03-67-T, TC III, ICTY, 29 September 2011, with Separate Individual Opinion of the Presiding Judge Jean-Claude Antonetti).

[40] See only the length of the Lubanga and Katanga trials as well as the Bemba trial proceedings to date before the ICC <http://www.icc-cpi.int/en_menus/icc/situations%20and%20cases/cases/Pages/cases%20index.aspx> accessed 18 August 2014.

[41] The Prosecutor may use a staggered approach in her investigations; see Strategic plan June 2012–15, OTP, 11 October 2013, para. 22.

[42] This may be exacerbated in cases where the cooperation obligation is generated not by virtue of the Rome Statute but through a UNSC Resolution in accordance with Art 13(b) of the Rome Statute. See Public Document informing the United Nations Security Council about the lack of cooperation by the Republic of the Sudan, Ahmad HarunAli Kushayb, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, ICC-02/05-01/07-57, PTC I, ICC, 26 May 2010.

[43] Of note, the Statute also provides for the possibility of reparations in case of a conviction. Art 75 ICC Statute; Rules 94-98 ICC RPE.

[44] See REDRESS, 'The Participation of Victims in International Criminal Court Proceedings—A Review of the Practice and Consideration of Options for the Future', October 2012 <http://www.redress.org/downloads/publications/121030participation_report.pdf> accessed 18 August 2014.

[45] See the Court's Guide for the Participation of Victims in the Proceedings of the Court <http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/8FF91A2C-5274-4DCB-9CCE-37273C5E9AB4/282477/160910VPRSBookletEnglish.pdf> accessed 18 August 2014.

[46] See Art 61(7) ICC Statute ('substantial grounds to believe that the person committed each of the crimes charged'); see Decision adjourning the hearing on the confirmation of charges pursuant to Art 61(7)(c)(i) of the Rome Statute, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-432, PTC I, ICC, 3 June 2013, as well as the Dissenting opinion of Judge Silvia Fernandez de Gurmendi, ICC-02/11-01/11-432-Anx.

[47] For example, regarding the handling of prior recorded testimony, Rule 68 of the Rules was introduced only recently through Resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.7 of 27 November 203.

issue of in situ trials pursuant to Rule 100 of the Rules;[48] the modification of the legal characterization of facts pursuant to Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court;[49] and the application of Article 75 of the Rome Statute on reparations to victims;[50] but also the fundamental question regarding the procedural relationship between the pre-trial and trial phases—just to name a few.

Increasing the efficiency of the criminal process requires a number of measures. Inefficient and/or repetitive processes have to be identified, relevant statutory provisions have to be assessed, and solutions have to be formulated. Some problems may be solved through a simple change or streamlining of procedural practice between the chambers and judicial divisions.[51] Others may require a change of a Rule or even a provision of the Rome Statute.

50.3 The ICC's 'Lessons Learnt' Initiative to Increase the Efficiency of its Criminal Process

The ICC's Principals have made it clear to their stakeholders—most prominently at the twelfth session of the Assembly in December 2013[52]—that enhancing the efficiency of its operations is a major priority of the Court. Towards the end of the judicial cycle on trial of the first case before the Court in the Lubanga case,[53] the Court embarked on a 'lessons learnt' process regarding the efficiency of judicial proceedings, in close cooperation with States Parties.[54]

[48] Notification of the Decision of the Plenary of Judges on the 'Joint Defence Application for a Change of Place where the Court Shall Sit for Trial', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-875, Presidency, ICC, 26 August 2013, plus Annex.

[49] See, for example, Decision on the Implementation of Regulation 55 of the Regulations of the Court and Severing the Charges against the Accused Persons, Katanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-3319, TC II, ICC 21 November 2012.

[50] See only Report of the Court on Principles Relating to Victims' Reparations, ICC-ASP/12/39, 8 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP); Report of the Court on the Criteria for the Determination of Disposable Means Relating to Reparations, ICC-ASP/12/40, 8 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP).

[51] The ICC consists of three judicial divisions: Pre-Trial, Trial, and Appeals. See Arts 34(b) and 39 ICC Statute.

[52] Statement by Judge Sang-Hyun Song, President of the International Criminal Court, at the Opening of the Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (20 November 2013) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP12/ASP12-OP-Statement-ICCPRE-ENG.pdf> accessed 18 August 2014. Address by Fatou Bensouda, Chief Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, to the Assembly of States Parties during their Twelfth Session (20 November 2013) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP12/ASP12-OP-Statement-PROS-ENG-FRA.pdf> accessed 18 August 2014. Presentation of the 2014 Proposed Programme Budget by Herman von Hebel, Registrar of the International Criminal Court, during the Twelfth Session of the Assembly of States Parties (20 November 2013) <http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP12/ASP12-Statement-REG-ENG.pdf> accessed 18 August 2014.

[53] Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06.

[54] The Court recognized that procedural efficiency of its judicial proceedings will remain a continuous challenge for the institution. Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/11/31, 23 October 2012 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 12 f, as well as its Annex I Draft Roadmap on reviewing the criminal procedures of the ICC.

50.3.1 Initial States Parties initiatives to increase the efficiency of Court operations

In 2010 dialogue started between the Court and States Parties in light of the perceived need to take stock of the institutional framework of the Rome Statute system, focusing on the efficiency and effectiveness of the Court in its operations.

As a result of these informal discussions between the Court and States Parties, the Assembly issued a resolution at its ninth session in December 2010 in which it emphasized that enhancing the efficiency and effectiveness of the Court is of a 'common interest both for the Assembly . . . and the Court'.[55] The Assembly stressed the 'need to conduct a structured dialogue between States Parties and the Court with a view to strengthening the institutional framework of the Rome Statute system and enhancing the efficiency and effectiveness of the Court while fully preserving its judicial independence', and asked the Court to engage in such a dialogue with States Parties.[56]

The Assembly then established a study group on governance issues (Study Group)[57] within its 'Hague Working Group'[58] to facilitate the aforementioned dialogue with a view to 'identifying issues where further action is required' in consultation with the Court, and formulating recommendations to the Assembly through its Bureau.[59] The Assembly initially gave a mandate to this Study Group for a period of one year.[60] The Study Group consists of representatives of States Parties; representatives of the organs of the Court are regularly invited. Court-external stakeholders such as representatives of Counsel and the NGO-community may also take part as appropriate.

As a result of the Study Group's first year of work, the first amendment of the Court's regulatory framework was proposed to the Assembly pursuant to Article 51(2) of the Rome Statute:[61] the amendment of Rule 4 and the addition of Rule 4*bis* to the Rules, transferring the decision on the assignment of judges to the judicial divisions from the plenary of judges to the Presidency.[62] At the same time, the focus of the Study Group was trained on the issue of expediting the criminal process.[63]

[55] Establishment of a Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/9/Res.2, 10 December 2010 (Fifth Plenary Meeting of the ASP). Pursuant to Art 112 ICC Statute, the Assembly shall provide management oversight to the Presidency, the Prosecutor, and the Registrar regarding the administration of the Court.

[56] Id.

[57] Subsequently, the 'Study Group on Governance' took up its work in 2011, deriving its mandate from ICC-ASP/9/Res.2. For ease of reference, the abbreviation 'Study Group' shall be retained, as the group remained the same in its composition throughout the process of institutionalization.

[58] The Hague Working Group of the Assembly is, alongside the New York Working Group and the Committee on Budget and Finance, one of its subsidiary bodies pursuant to Art 112(4) ICC Statute.

[59] Establishment of a Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/9/Res.2, 10 December 2010 (Fifth Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

[60] The Assembly decided that the issues to be dealt with by the Study Group 'include, but are not limited to, matters pertaining to the strengthening of the institutional framework both within the Court and between the Court and the Assembly, as well as other relevant questions related to the operation of the Court'. Id.

[61] Pursuant to Art 51(2) ICC Statute, amendments to the Rules may be proposed by any State Party, the Prosecutor, or the judges acting by an absolute majority. These amendment proposals enter into force upon adoption by a two-thirds majority of the members of the Assembly.

[62] Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/10/30, 22 November 2011 (Tenth Session of the ASP), para. 21.

[63] Ibid., para. 23.

50.3.2 The ICC's 'lessons learnt' exercise

Further to the initial discussions in the Study Group in 2011, the Presidency of the Court decided to tackle the issue of increasing the efficiency of the criminal process in a systematic and sustainable fashion. As a first step, it communicated to states the Court's intention to conduct a thorough 'lessons learnt' exercise during 2012 in light of the experience of the first trials once a judicial cycle has been finished (at least for the trial phase), with a view to identifying potential improvements in current procedures. This initiative was endorsed by states as well as subsequently by the Assembly.[64] It was agreed that such a mechanism would become a channel between the Court and States Parties to achieve appropriate changes, where necessary, to the legal framework of the Court.[65] The Presidency indicated that the Advisory Committee of Legal Texts (ACLT), established pursuant to Regulation 4 of Regulations of the Court,[66] would be the proper body to address such issues, as it comprises all parties concerned, including representatives of the OTP and Counsel before the Court.[67]

50.3.2.1 Identification of legal issues

Throughout 2012 the Court and States Parties agreed that with the conclusion of the Lubanga case before Trial Chamber I,[68] sufficient courtroom practice had developed to conduct a substantive review of the Court's criminal process. It was agreed that as a starting point, the Court would identify areas of importance requiring further consideration;[69] it was further agreed to focus on the ICC Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[70]

In order to identify such issues, judges were invited by the Presidency to submit their individual ideas and suggestions, together with proposed solutions. In response, several judges identified issues and recommended solutions, either by suggesting the standardization of best practices or proposing amendments to the legal framework.[71]

[64] Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/11/31, 23 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 10.

[65] Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, 21 December 2011 (Ninth Plenary Meeting of the ASP) paras 35–8.

[66] Regulations of the Court, ICC-BD/01-01-04, 26 May 2004 (Fifth Plenary Session of the Judges of the Court) established pursuant to Art 52(1) of the Rome Statute. Pursuant to Regulation 4 of the Regulations of the Court, it is comprised of three judges elected from each division of the Court, as well as one representative from the OTP, one representative from the Registry, and one representative of Counsel included in the list of counsel pursuant to Rule 21(2) of the Rules.

[67] The Assembly has since repeatedly extended the Study Group's temporal mandate to accommodate for relevant discussions, see Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, 21 December 2011 (Ninth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), paras 36–8; Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/12/Res.8, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP), Annex I, para. 7 (extending the mandate to 2013 and later to 2014).

[68] Judgment Pursuant to Art 74 of the Statute, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-2842, TC I, ICC, 14 March 2012.

[69] First Report (n 6) para. 3.

[70] Ibid., para. 6; Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/11/31, 23 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 11.

[71] First Report (n 6) paras 2–5.

This list was discussed and revised with input from all organs of the Court and a representative of defence/victims' counsel. As a result, a list of legal/institutional issues to expedite proceedings and enhance their quality (List) was finalized.[72] The List does not contain any concrete proposals regarding Rule changes, but rather provides topical areas where it was considered by the Court that a Rule amendment would in all likelihood be required in order to meaningfully affect proceedings for the better.[73] The List outlines 9 clusters and 24 sub-clusters of distinct issues. The nine clusters identified are as follows:[74]

Pre-Trial, including issues such as the format and content of the confirmation of charges decision; the necessary degree of precision of the legal characterization of facts and modes of liability; and the question of hearing witnesses during the confirmation hearing;

The relationship between pre-trial and trial, including the issue of standardization of processes between the divisions (disclosure, redactions, a common case record, etc.); a common approach on the relevance and admissibility of evidence, including its format of presentation; and a trial chamber's possibility to introduce previously recorded reliable testimony;[75]

Specifically in relation to trial, the possibility to have a single judge handling the preparatory stages of the trial up to the beginning of the hearings;[76]

On victim participation and reparations, the general need to streamline and harmonize the system (both regarding the application and participation) across all phases of the proceedings was identified; and whether principles on reparations should be addressed in a court-wide document or should be further developed on a case-by-case basis; and whether reparation proceedings may be dealt with by a single judge;

On appeals, issues of streamlining/simplifying processes were raised, e.g. the current certification procedure for certain interlocutory appeals[77] as well as the general processing of interlocutory appeals;

On interim release, the question of alternative options to the requirement to consult relevant states before granting interim release to an accused;

The possibility of simplifying the procedure for designating an alternative seat of the Court for the proceedings;[78]

[72] The List was subsequently shared with States Parties, see First Report (n 6).

[73] Other issues identified by the organs of the Court and the representative of counsel in the course of establishing the List were not included, as they could be addressed internally through adoption of best practices or amendments to the Regulations of the Court and thus did not need to be submitted to the Assembly for adoption.

[74] It bears noting that in the eyes of the Court, the List is not intended to be exhaustive.

[75] This item has since been disposed of; see amended Rule 68 ICC RPE, as amended by resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.7, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

[76] This item has since been disposed of; see Rule 132*bis* ICC RPE, as amended by resolution ICC/ASP/11/Res.2, 21 November 2012 (Eighth Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

[77] See Arts 82(1)(d) and 82(2) ICC Statute; Rule 155 ICC RPE. C Staker, 'Appeal and revision' in Triffterer (n 17), Art 82, para. 11.

[78] This item has since been disposed of; see amended Rule 100 of the Rules, as amended by resolution ICC-ASP/12/Res.7, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

On language issues, the extent to which witness statements and other documents need to be translated; a possible simplification of the transcription system[79] as well as measures to streamline the transcript review system; and finally,

Organizational matters, including options to facilitate the movement of judges between all three divisions within the remit of Article 39 of the Rome Statute; the possibility for a chamber to sit temporarily with only two judges (e.g. in the case of illness or temporary unavailability); and issues regarding judges' mandate extensions under Article 36(10) of the Rome Statute.[80]

In order to facilitate internal discussions regarding possible Rule amendments based on the List, the Court established its 'Working Group on Lessons Learnt' ('WGLL'), comprising a number of interested judges under the leadership of Vice-President Sanji Monageng. The WGLL is designed to determine whether amendments to the Rules are required for a particular issue and to elaborate concrete proposals to the ACLT and the Study Group as a primary source of recommendations. At the start of 2013 the WGLL decided, on the basis of the judicial experience of the Court at that stage, to focus on three of the clusters identified in the List: Pre-trial; Pre-trial and trial relationship; and the seat of the Court.[81] The amended Rules 68 and 100 of the Rules[82] are a direct result of this prioritization.[83]

50.3.2.2 The Roadmap

Upon creation of the WGLL and the finalization of the List in mid-2012, States Parties indicated that they also expected to receive a minimum number of detailed amendment proposals to the Rules, as well as an outline of the procedure the Court intends to follow during the lessons learnt process.[84]

Some might have expected that the Court would soon be in a position to provide periodic suggestions for Rule amendments, following the example of the UN ad hoc Tribunals where multiple provisions of the Tribunals' Rules of Procedure and Evidence were amended on a rolling basis throughout the year. However, it is evident from the Court's institutional framework that there are considerable institutional obstacles to changes to either the Rules or the Statute, as both instruments were drafted and adopted by the States Parties and any amendment requires their approval and adoption.[85] To begin with, the ICC Statute and Rules are considerably more detailed than the regulatory framework of the UN ad hoc Tribunals,[86] due to the desire of states to [79] See Rules 111 and 112 ICC RPE. [80] Annex to First Report (n 6).

[81] Study Group on Governance—Working Group on Lessons Learnt: Second report of the Court to the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/12/37/Add.1, 31 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP) ('Second Report'), para. 3. On 27 March 2013 the Study Group received the first version of a written report from the WGLL, indicating this prioritization notice, ICC-ASP/12/37, 15 October 2013, para. 12.

[82] See Amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/12/Res.7, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

[83] See Second Report (n 81) paras 8–13, Annex I.A, Annex II.A.

[84] First Report (n 6) paras 6 and 12.

[85] Art 51(2) ICC Statute for the Rules; for the Statute, Arts 121 and 122 ICC Statute foresee an even more complicated regime.

[86] ICC Statute: 128 articles; ICTY Statute: 34 articles; ICC Rules: 225 Rules; ICTY Rules: 127 Rules. See also B Broomhall, 'Rules of Procedure and Evidence' in Triffterer (n 17), Art 51, para. 47.

create a comprehensive, stable, and sufficiently rigid legal framework from the very start.[87] While in the context of the UN ad hoc Tribunals, the Security Council left the judges with a considerable amount of legislative freedom and authority in that it was conferred upon the judges to adopt—and amend—their respective rules of procedure and evidence,[88] no such liberty was given to the ICC judges: pursuant to Article 51 of the Rome Statute, the adoption as well as any amendments to the Rules are within the remit of the Assembly. This means that amendments to the Rules in the same volume and frequency as carried out by the UN ad hoc Tribunals was not foreseen by the founding fathers of the Rome Statute.

Regarding amendments to the Rome Statute, the procedure, governed by Articles 121 and 122 of the Rome Statute, is even more difficult. Article 121 as the default provision for Statute amendments stipulates a very high threshold for any amendment, requiring the ratification or acceptance by seven-eighths of all States Parties for an amendment to enter into force.[89] For any amendments to the crimes themselves, the regime is even more restrictive.[90] Only regarding amendments to a predefined set of provisions of an institutional nature can a mere two-thirds majority suffice (Article 122 of the Rome Statute).[91] It follows that any change of the ICC regulatory framework regarding the Statute or Rules is by definition a lengthy process necessarily involving rounds of consultations not only amongst the organs of the Court internally but also amongst the Court's constituency, comprised of no less than 122 states at present.

Mindful of these statutory obstacles to amendments to the framework, the Assembly noted in 2012 that amendments to the Statute did not constitute a feasible means, at this stage, to provide timely redress to any problems relating to criminal procedure. The Assembly also noted that states, as the custodians of the Rome Statute, had a privileged role, both directly and indirectly under Article 51 of the Statute, in ensuring that any proposals were in accordance with the overarching strategic and policy considerations of the Rome Statue.[92]

During the Court's prioritization exercise of legal items warranting institutional amendment, it transpired, however, that the Court's statutory and regulatory framework did not provide an appropriate platform for the Court and States Parties to have a structured dialogue on possible recommendations to amend the Rules.[93] The Court therefore drew up a roadmap (Roadmap) of steps to be taken to ensure timely discussions and actions to bring any such proposal to the attention of States Parties for a possible adoption at the ASP at year-end. The Roadmap tasked the WGLL to assess [87] B. Broomhall, ibid., paras 8 and 47; R Clark, 'Amendments', ibid., Art 121, para. 4.

[88] For the adoption see Art 15 ICTY Statute; Art 14 ICTR Statute; Art 14 of the Statute of the SCSL. For amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, see Rule 6 of all respective Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

[89] Art 121(4) ICC Statute.

[90] Art 121(5) ICC Statute. In respect of a State Party that has not accepted the amendment, the Court shall not exercise its jurisdiction regarding a crime covered by the amendment when committed by that State Party's nationals or on its territory.

[91] The set of articles which can be amended through this procedure is defined in Art 122(1) ICC Statute.

[92] Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/11/31, 23 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), para. 11.

[93] Ibid., para. 14.

from the issues identified in the List whether amendments to the Rules are required.[94] If a need to amend a Rule is identified, the WGLL drafts necessary proposals for amendments, including an explanatory note, and transmits it to the ACLT for further consultation.[95] If accepted by the ACLT, the proposal is transmitted to states in the Study Group and from there eventually to the Assembly.[96]

In reaction to this, the Assembly held that, without prejudice to Article 51 of the Statute, states 'were encouraged to engage via the Roadmap, so as to avoid a disparate and unstructured approach to any proposals on amending the Rules'.[97] It was understood that this process was long term in outlook and that if the need arose over time, the Roadmap could be amended.[98] Consequently, the Roadmap and its implementation remained under review throughout 2013; by the end of that year, an amended, more flexible Roadmap was adopted by the Assembly.[99]

As a concrete example of an amendment proposal following the procedure established through the Roadmap, the Court proposed the addition of Rule 132*bis* to the Rules enabling the Court to designate a single judge for the preparation of trial.[100] Further amendment proposals that had been established through the Roadmap followed in 2013, regarding Rule 68 (Prior Recorded Testimony)[101] and Rule 100 of the Rules (Place of the Proceedings).[102] The proposals were subsequently adopted by the Assembly.[103]

50.3.3 Activities

50.3.3.1 Rule changes at the twelfth ASP

The Assembly of 2013 has demonstrated that the Roadmap still remains only one of many possible ways to put forward and bring to adoption amendment proposals for [94] First Report (n 6) para. 13. [95] Id.

[96] Should the Study Group decide to endorse any proposals they are transmitted to the Assembly's Working Group on Amendments for consideration at least 60 days prior to commencement of the next Assembly meeting at year-end. See Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/11/31, 23 October 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), Annex I, Draft Roadmap on Reviewing the Criminal Procedures of the International Criminal Court.

[97] In its Report of the Bureau on the Study Group on Governance, the Assembly however pointed out that States, Judges, or the Prosecutor could still put forward proposals outside the auspices of the Roadmap if they so desired. Ibid., para. 15.

[98] Ibid., paras 15 and 17; Report of the Bureau on Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/12/37, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 10.

[99] Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/12/Res.8, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 39. The amendments contained two proposals of the ICC regarding a more flexible exchange of views between the Court and the Study Group on amendment proposals, including more flexible timelines. Report of the Bureau on Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/12/37, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), Annex I.

[100] Report of the Study Group on Governance on Rule 132*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/11/41, 1 November 2012 (Eleventh Session of the ASP), its Annex I and the concrete proposal of the amendment in Annex II.

[101] See First Report (n 6) Annex. The proposal thematically belonged to the 'Pre-trial and trial relations and common issues' cluster of the List.

[102] Second Report (n 81) Annex, from the 'Seat of the Court' cluster of the List.

[103] Amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/12/Res.7, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Plenary Meeting of the ASP).

the Rules. To be sure, Article 51(2) of the Statute foresees that amendments to the Rules may be brought forward by any State Party, the judges acting by an absolute majority, or the prosecutor. States' rationale to engage via the Roadmap so as to avoid a 'disparate and unstructured approach to any proposals on amending the Rules'[104] was only partly followed in 2013. While amendments of Rules 68 and 100 were brought before the Assembly following the Roadmap,[105] proposals regarding Rules 134*bis*, 134*ter*, and 134*quater* regarding an accused's presence at trial were brought before the Assembly by States Parties without any meaningful involvement of the Study Group, let alone the Court. It is noteworthy that the latter amendment proposals were the reaction of states to the Situation in the Republic of Kenya before the ICC.[106] Previous judicial developments in ongoing cases in this Situation had brought up the issue of the accused's presence at trial and the interpretation of Article 63(1) of the Statute,[107] in particular with regard to persons 'mandated to fulfill extraordinary public duties at the highest national level'.[108]

The problem would appear to lie in the fact that there is a general rule for law-makers not to devise an abstract-general legal provision in order to fit the circumstances of a specific case. Such a procedure generally entails many risks, including fragmentation of the relevant legal text, possibly even its incoherence, as well as a loss of the abstract-general character constitutive of a law that is meant to apply to any situation regardless of specifics which have consciously been considered irrelevant for its application. It remains to be hoped that developments at the 12th ASP in November 2013 have not created a precedent devaluing the Roadmap in its revised form as it was adopted by States Parties during that very same Assembly meeting.[109]

50.3.3.2 Other initiatives

The revised Roadmap foresees interaction between the Court and states to thoroughly reflect upon every proposal prior to submission for adoption by the Assembly at year-end. Further, the Study Group expressed an interest to take note, where appropriate, of the relevant work by external stakeholders.[110]

[104] Report of the Bureau on Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/12/37, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 10.

[105] The Statutory trigger for the amendment proposals to be validly before the Assembly was a proposal by the judges to the Assembly by an absolute majority pursuant to Art 51(2)(b) ICC Statute. See Second Report (n 81) paras 10 and 13.

[106] ICC-01/09.

[107] See only Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber V(a) of 18 June 2013 entitled 'Decision on Mr Ruto's Request for Excusal from Continuous Presence at Trial', Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-1066, AC, ICC, 25 October 2013.

[108] See Rule 134*quater* ICC RPE.

[109] Strengthening the International Criminal Court and the Assembly of States Parties, ICC-ASP/12/Res.8, 27 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 39.

[110] Report of the Bureau on Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/12/37, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), para. 15. For example, on 9 July 2014 the Hague Institute for Global Justice hosted a Seminar, 'Increasing the Efficiency of the Criminal Process at the ICC, While Preserving Individual Rights', at which a comprehensive research paper on the same topic by a group of practitioners and scholars in the field of international criminal law was announced for late 2014.

In 2014 the WGLL has prepared and submitted to the Study Group a new cycle of proposals to amend the Rules with a view to achieving efficiency gains. Thus far, it has proposed an amendment permitting a trial chamber to continue carrying out its functions, under limited circumstances, if a judge of the chamber is temporarily absent for unforeseen urgent personal reasons.[111] The WGLL has simultaneously expanded its focus to an examination of translation issues under the 'language issues' cluster and proposed a series of amendments.[112]

Concomitantly, the Court has intensified efforts to analyse and identify key issues under the 'Pre-trial' cluster and the 'Pre-trial and trial relationship and common issues' cluster. These issues are not only highly technical but also result from the combination of the common law and Romano-Germanic legal traditions which form the basis of the judicial procedures established by the Rome Statute. Discussions between Pre-Trial and Trial Division judges have focused on issues of disclosure, additional evidence at trial, presentation of evidence, the record of proceedings, and witness protection.[113] In this process, the ICC is well advised to take a conservative approach—only where a Rule change is considered indispensable should the Court propose an amendment. In some instances, a technical solution can be found short of changing the written procedural framework.[114] An all too ambitious approach of changing Rules may deprive this legal instrument of the stability that Article 51 of the Rome Statute meant to confer upon it.[115]

Finally, the WGLL has been coordinating an initial series of consultations, beginning with the Registry, related to the Victim Participation and Reparations cluster. Issues are being identified regarding the Court's regime of victim participation in the proceedings, including with respect to the use of application forms. It is understood that the different prevailing victim participation regimes across the chambers and divisions[116] should ideally be harmonized, mindful, however, of the conditions specific to each and every case. Victim participation in the proceedings [111] Cf. the corresponding Rule 15*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 (adopted 11 February 1994, as amended 8 December 2010) UN Doc IT/32/Rev. 45.

[112] Second Report (n 81) para. 16. This work stems from an understanding that translation of witness statements and other important documents has proved extremely time-consuming at all stages of proceedings and poses a significant challenge to the Court's resources.

[113] Ibid., paras 14–15.

[114] For example, regarding common organizational issues between pre-trial and trial, by adopting a standardized redaction protocol, or by altering the numbering system used for evidence.

[115] B Broomhall, 'Composition and Administration of the Court' in Triffterer (n 17), Art 51, para. 8.

[116] See for pre-trial: Decision on Victims' Participation and Victims' Common Legal Representation at the Confirmation of Charges Hearing and in the Related Proceedings, L Gbagbo, Situation in the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire, ICC-02/11-01/11-138, PTC I, ICC, 4 June 2012, taking a simplified approach from previous pre-trial proceedings and introducing a shortened, simplified victim application form; for trial: Decision on Victims' Participation, Lubanga, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/06-1119, TC I, ICC, 18 January 2008; Decision on the Participation of Victims in the Trial and on 86 Applications by Victims to Participate in the Proceedings, Bemba, Situation in the Central African Republic, ICC-01/05-01/08-807, TC III, ICC 30 June 2010; in contrast, in its Decision on Victims' Representation and Participation, Ruto and Sang, Situation in the Republic of Kenya, ICC-01/09-01/11-460, TC V, ICC, 3 October 2012, Trial Chamber V developed a new, simplified application and participation scheme. See also for questions on the content of participatory rights Judgment on the Appeal of Mr Katanga against the Decision of Trial Chamber II is a highly sensitive issue, as it contains fundamental elements of the ICC's restorative justice function. It is therefore imperative to consult extensively and thoroughly with all major stakeholders to the proceedings with a view to determining whether amendments to the Rules may be warranted in order to harmonize the system.

50.4 Conclusion

The ICC has come a long way in the past decade, but a number of major challenges will have to be vigorously tackled in order to make headway. Challenges are heavily shaped by external factors and players, particularly in the areas of universality, cooperation, and complementarity. A number of measures can be taken to improve the status quo.

In order to increase membership and improve the relationship to non-States Parties, the Assembly, as well as States Parties, could intensify their dialogue with major non-States Parties, encouraging the latter to identify reasons for non-ratification so that misunderstandings and administrative obstacles can be addressed. States Parties who are in regional partnerships could use these political fora to encourage ratification, be that vis-à-vis members of the regional group which are non-States Parties, or initiatives as a regional group directed at third states (e.g. the European Union).[117] In the UN system, the UPR process at the UN Human Rights Council could be used as a platform for States Parties to issue periodic recommendations to others to join the Rome Statute. Finally, the Assembly, through its President,[118] in addition to being an active focal point,[119] could take further action to encourage States Parties, international/regional organizations, as well as NGOs to organize targeted workshops and conferences with a view to informing and engaging non-States Parties that are considering ratification.[120]

Additional steps can be taken to enhance cooperation. One measure is the establishment of a standard operating procedure (on technical details, logistics, lines of communication, specificity of cooperation requests, country-related specifics, etc.), of 22 January 2010 entitled 'Decision on the Modalities of Victim Participation at Trial', Katanga and Chui, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, ICC-01/04-01/07-2288, AC, ICC, 16 July 2010.

[117] See only the European Union's 'Council Common Position', 2003/444/CFSP of 16 June 2003, Official Journal of the European Union L 150/67, and 'Action Plan for the ICC' <http://ec.europa.eu/external_relations/human_rights/icc/> accessed 18 August 2014.

[118] For the Assembly President's activities in this field see the Assembly Plan of Action for Achieving Universality and Full Implementation of the Rome Statute, Annex to ICC-ASP/5/Res.3, 1 December 2006 (Seventh Plenary Meeting of the ASP); Promotion by the President of the Universality of the Rome Statute, Office of the President of the Assembly of States Parties, 9 July 2014.

[119] See Report of the Bureau on the Plan of Action for Achieving Universality and Full Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, ICC-ASP/12/26, 15 November 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), as well as the ad country focal points for the Plan of Action, ibid.

[120] The focal point could bring civil society and other actors willing to organize activities promoting ratification of the Rome Statute together with possible funders in an organized fashion. For example, since 1995 the European Union has funded a large array of NGO activities and campaigns geared at promoting the ratification of the Rome Statute through its European Instrument for Democracy and Human Rights (EIDHR).

in cooperation between the ICC and the Assembly focal point. State-to-state assistance by States Parties could be enhanced through regular interaction with the Court and other states as to the logistics and structural issues of cooperation under Part IX and X of the Rome Statute. Moreover, incentives for compliance might be strengthened through organized and targeted (political and diplomatic) pressure by supportive States Parties on States (Parties) who fail to cooperate, and strict application of the Assembly's non-cooperation procedure[121] and continuous assessment of its effectiveness.

Domestic implementation of the Rome Statute can be enhanced through further technical assistance. For instance, States Parties who have successfully enacted Rome Statute provisions in their national legislation can actively assist other States Parties in need. The Assembly could strengthen the role of its focal point and enhance its assistance portfolio. Useful measures might include the creation of databases including pertinent documentation and the issuance of a handbook on steps and legal guidelines on how best to enact Rome Statute provisions into national legislation and strengthen the local judicial infrastructure.

In relation to the efficiency of the ICC's criminal process, the Court together with States Parties have created a useful mechanism to tackle some of the most relevant challenges in an efficient manner. The Roadmap is based on two premises that are fundamental to a meaningful process and results:

i. First, that generally states prefer to reach agreement on the amendment of Rules: (i) based on the expertise and wisdom of the principal user, the Court itself; (ii) in an orderly and formalized process, including the consultation of all relevant stakeholders; and (iii) at a pace that provides for due reflection and assures that no hasty fixes are inserted into the Rules for a concrete situation at hand.[122]

ii. Second, that Rome Statute amendments are not being discussed at this stage.[123] To achieve a sustainable streamlining of the criminal process in a reasonable time frame, it is—for the time being—most conducive to focus on the assessment of current procedural practices and regulations and, as the next higher set of norms in the Court's regulatory framework, its Rules of Procedure and Evidence, while leaving out Rome Statute provisions for the time being. Discussing Rome Statute provisions bears risks. Apart from re-assessing Rome Statute provisions which may in hindsight benefit from some clarifying language, many other provisions can be expected to be brought back to the discussion table—provisions like Article 27 of the Rome Statute on the absence of head-of-state immunity for [121] Assembly Procedures Relating to Non-Cooperation', ICC-ASP/10/Res.5, Annex, 420.

[122] It is hoped that the procedure leading to the introduction of Rules 134*bis* to quater in November 2013 (Amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, ICC-ASP/12/Res.7, 27 November 2013) remains an exception.

[123] The Study Group considered a proposal to introduce into the Roadmap the possibility to consider proposals for amendments to the articles of the Rome Statute of an institutional nature. However, it decided not to amend the Roadmap in this regard but to keep the matter under review. Report of the Bureau on Study Group on Governance, ICC-ASP/12/37, 15 October 2013 (Twelfth Session of the ASP), paras 23–5.

> international crimes before an international court which contains established wisdom and an agreed legal standard since Nuremberg.[124]

The Study Group's operations have illustrated that the call by some for quick results in the shape of multiple amendments of the Rules on a rolling basis throughout a year proved overly ambitious. The preparatory involvement of all essential stakeholders dictates a certain—slow—speed at which results can be achieved. From the standpoint of those who wanted to create a rather rigid, solid Rome Statute system not subject to hasty changes in its procedural framework, this is a welcome feature.

Ultimately, when considering the future of the ICC, it is important to keep in mind what Chief Prosecutor Robert Jackson said in 1946 in his opening statement before the IMT in Nuremberg: 'The usefulness of this effort to do justice is not to be measured by considering the law or your judgment in isolation. This trial is part of the great effort to make the peace more secure.'[125]

[124] N Musau and S Jennings, 'Kenya Continues Push for ICC Changes', Institute for War and Peace Reporting (4 June 2014) <http://iwpr.net/report-news/kenya-continues-push-icc-changes> accessed 18 August 2014.

[125] R Jackson, 'Opening Address for the United States at the International Military Tribunal', Nazi Conspiracy & Aggression vol. I (Washington: Office of the United States Chief Counsel for Prosecution of Axis Criminality, United States Government Printing Office 1946), Chapter VII, 171 <http://fcit.usf.edu/holocaust/resource/document/DocJac17.htm> accessed 18 August 2014.

Name Index

Adada, R. 58n
Adler, M. 940n
Ainley, K. 1234n, 1241
Akande, D. 269
Akehurst, M. 167n
Akhavan, P. 226, 959n, 1227
al Dine, A. 225
Alexander I of Russia 34
Al-Hussein, Prince Z.R.Z. 780
Ali, M. 1017
Allen, R. 879
Alston, P. 727
Ambos, K. 500, 513, 530n, 562n, 582n, 584n, 618n, 626n, 631n, 660, 698, 709n, 714n, 891, 898n, 900, 905, 1232n
Arbia, S. 1105
Arbour, L. 11, 20, 21–2, 33, 375, 377, 819
Arido, N. 579
Arsanjani, M. 211n, 264–5, 485–6n
Ashworth, A. 493, 664
Askin, K. 801–2n
Aukerman, M. 946n

Babala, F. 579
Bacon, F. 875
Baghi, V. 950n
Bagosora, T. 1067
Baker, S. 320
Barak, A. 738–9
Bargewell, E. 749
Barriga, S. 146n
Bassett, M. 947n
Bass, G. 1018n
Bassiouni, C. 801n
Bayes, T. 872
Beccaria, C. 938–9
Bedau, H. 940n
Benito, O. 464–5, 934
Bensouda, F. 89, 130, 277, 405, 807n, 809, 823, 824–39, 1029, 1235
Bentham, J. 939
Berdejo, C. 953n
Bergsmo, M. 333n, 347n
Bernays, M.C. 501
Berster, L. 691n, 699, 702
Best, G. 746
Bibas, S. 1260n, 1261n
Binder, C. 485n
Bitti, G. 460n, 474
Blackstone, W. 883n
Blair, T. 75
Boas, G. 575n, 861n, 950n
Boehme, F. 644
Boelaert-Suominen, S. 767
Bohlander, M. 530n
Bohrer, Z. 954n
Bolton, J. 276
Boot, M. 709n
Bosco, D. 273n
Bothe, M. 762n, 776
Bozizé (UN Sec Gen) 55
Braman, D. 938n
Brandt, K. 619n
Bravin, J. 346n
Breivik, A. 951
Brinkley-Rubinstein, R. 951n, 953n
Brown, D. 402n
Brownmiller, S. 801n
Buergenthal, T. 794–5
Buisman, C. 818n, 819, 824n, 1015n, 1025n
Büngener, L. 1009n
Burchard, C. 596n, 602n, 606n
Burghardt, B. 225n, 512, 550n, 624n
Burke-White, W. 1260n, 1261n

Carayon, G. 1193n, 1194n, 1195n, 1196n
Carboni, M. 817n
Cassese, A. 224–5n, 379, 456–8, 474–5n, 483, 518, 562n, 568n, 655, 719, 767, 816n, 820n
Castaño, C. 1233
Cayley, A. 818n, 820n
Chaikel, D. 1014n
Charles VII of Orleans, King 609n
Charney, J. 959n
Chehtman, A. 1264n, 1268n
Chessani, J. 749n
Chesterman, S. 709n
Chifflet, P. 950n
Chinkin, C. 802n
Christopher, R. 942n
Chui, M. N. 72
Chung, C. 823–4n
Cicero 755
Clark, R. 197n, 785n
Cleary, K. 991, 1007n
Clinton, B. 732n
Cobban, H. 26n
Cohen, J. 861, 890
Cohen, L.J. 874–7
Cole, A. 342–3
Combs, N. 884–6
Corey-Boulet, R. 339n
Cowdery, N. 113n
Crawford, J. 475
Cryer, R. 58, 225n, 677n, 701, 709n, 891n

Dana, S. 96–7n, 949n
Daqun, L. 583
Darley, J. 938n, 951n, 959n, 1237–8n
D'Ascoli, S. 946n, 947–8
David, E. 379
Deen-Racsmany, Z. 155n, 157n
DeFalco, R. 605n
de Gurmendi, F. 598, 600–2, 605, 1077, 1153, 1194n
DeGuzman, M. 714n
De Lapradelle, A.G. 477
Dembele-Diarra, F. 805n
Dencker, F. 635n
Denning, Lord T. 887
Desalegn, H. 67

Deschamps, Baron E. 477
De Smedt, M. 831
Desportes, F. 866n
De Vos, C. 820n, 821n, 837n
De Waal, A. 346n, 837n
D'Huart, P. 562n, 582n
Diarra, F. 562n, 582n
Dinstein, Y. 709n, 737, 798
Donovan, W.J. 376
Doswald-Beck, L. 761n
Drumbl, M. 16n, 230, 959n
Dubber, M. 940n, 947
Duff, R. 939n, 940–1
du Plessis, M. 105
Durkheim, E. 940
Dyilo, T.L. 72, 118

Einstein, A. 733
El Zeidy, M. 215n
Emmerson, B. 1019n
Engstrom, P. 1232n
Eser, A. 582n
Esher, Lord W.B. 490–1
Evans-Pritchard, B. 101n, 339n, 809n
Eveno, V.B. 446
Excribà-Folch, A. 1238

Falk, R 1243
Feinberg, J. 940n, 1215
Finnin, S. 559n, 562n, 582n, 653–4
Fisher, K. 949n
Fiss, O. 446
Fletcher, G. 523–5, 635n, 656, 940n
Flint, J. 346n, 837n
Foucault, M. 239n
Frank, R. 658
Frase, R. 937, 939, 942n, 946n, 948
Friman, H. 58, 701, 1169n, 1194n
Frister, H. 636n
Fromageot, M. 477n
Frulli, M. 152n
Fulford, A. 471–2, 507, 511, 515, 527–8, 530, 531–3, 537, 549, 661, 920, 987, 989, 1139n

Gaddafi, Saif Al-Islam 41, 153n, 274–5
Gaeta, P. 269, 295, 379
Gage, Sir W. 321
Galbraith, J. 941n, 949n
Gallant, K. 476, 486
Galula, D. 759n
Garcia-Sayan, D. 325
Garda, A. 1032–3
Garretón, R. 1020
Gaynor, F. 950n
Gbagbo, S. 807
Geneuss, J. 540n
Gibson, K. 1017n
Giles, D. 321
Gil Gil, A. 695
Gillet, M. 298
Gimbernat Ordeig, E. 636n
Ginsburg, R.B. 868
Glassborow, K. 335–6n, 816n, 824n
Glickman, S. 949n
Goldstone, R. 77, 82–3, 347, 375, 376, 825, 1018n
Goy, B. 562n, 575n
Graham, K. 799n
Greenawalt, A.K.A. 694n, 695–7, 699
Grevers, C. 105
Grey, B. 942n
Grotius, H. 755–6
Grover, L. 146n, 452, 453
Guariglia, F. 1194n

Haan, V. 506
Habré, Hissène 80, 82
Hafner, G. 485n
Hall, C.K. 248–9n
Hamilton, R. 339n
Hampton, J. 939n, 940n
Harmon, M. 950n
Hart, H. 939–40n
Hastie, R. 878
Heller, K. 274, 947, 1260, 1263, 1265n, 1267n
Henckaerts, J.-M. 761n
Henderson, L. 877–8
Henham, R. 947n
Herder, J.G. 671
Hernandez, G. 466–7
Heyer, A. 596n, 602n, 606n
Higgins, R. 794–5
Hirohito, Emperor 4n
Hodžić, R. 1022
Hoel, A. 932n, 936n, 943n
Ho, H.L. 886, 887n
Holvoet, M. 1101
Honecker, E. 521
Huber, F. 1232n
Huigens, K. 935n
Hunt, D. 504n
Hunt, M. 228
Hussein, A. 45

Inder, B. 838

Jackson, J. 866n
Jackson, R. 375, 455, 778, 1295
Jacobs, D. 984n, 1004n
Jalloh, C. 255n, 257n
Jeβberger, F. 540n, 655, 688n
Jennings, S. 101n
Jescheck, H.-H. 655
Jolly, J. 468
Jones, J. 379
Jones, J.R.W.D. 700
Jorda, C. 1263n
Josephson, J. 877n, 879

Kabila, J. 1085
Kagezi, J. 78
Kambale, P. 335n, 336n
Kant, I. 936
Karsten, N. 620n
Kaul, H.-P. 343–4, 805n, 817–18
Kearney, M. 601n
Keegan, M. 333n, 347n
Keen, D. 1237n
Keller, A. 950n
Kelly, M. 704n
Kelsen, H. 34

Kendall, S. 1183n
Kennedy, J. 956n
Khan, A. 112n
Khan, K.A.A. 1015n, 1025n
Kibibi, M. 73
Kilolo Musamba, A. 1072
Kimber, J. 749n
Kim, H. 1227n, 1239
Ki-Moon, B. 1225
Kirsch, P. 452, 454n, 1171–3
Kiss, A. 596n, 601n, 605–6
Kittichaisaree, K. 453, 709n
Klamberg, M. 889n
Kleffner, J.K. 257n
Kolber, A. 951n
Kooijimans, P. 794–5
Koroma, J.P. 1270
Koskenniemi, M. 773
Kozinski, A. 1019
Krajišnik, M. 1020
Kress, C. 983
Krishnamirthi, G. 871–2n
Krupp, G. 376
Kuhlen, L. 627n, 636–7n
Ku, J. 959n
Kwoyelo, T. 78

Lappi-Seppälä, T. 941n
Laudan, L. 833–4n, 871
Lauterpacht, H. 449–50, 466, 473
Lavigne, B. 334, 337, 339, 340–1, 1044
Lazerges-Cousquer, L. 866n
Le Fraper du Hellen, B. 824
Lemkin, R. 671, 675, 693, 700
Levine, K. 402n
Lieber, F. 735
Lillquist, E. 883n
Lipton, P. 877n
List, W. 644
Livni, T. 75
Luban, D. 685n, 693, 704n, 710
Luping, D. 813–14
Lussiaá-Berdou, C. 1017n

MacArthur, D. 4n
McAuliffe-DeGuzman, M. 476n
McConnell, L. 749n
McDonald, G.K. 458
MacKenzie, R. 128n
Mackie, J. 938n
MacKinnon, C. 838
McMorrow, J. 403n
McMunigal, K. 1019n
Maduna, P. 1210
Mahony, C. 956n
Mamdani, M. 21
Manacorda, S. 601n
Mangenda, J.-J. 579
Manning, P. 1273n
Manson, A. 950n, 951n
Marshall, S.L.A. 756
Maruthi, T. 950n
Maxwell, P. 491
May, L. 690
Mbeki, T. 21
Meloni, C. 601n, 638–9n
Meron, T. 802n, 959n
Merope, S. 985, 1002n
Mettraux, G. 639n
Michaels, A. 658
Milanovic, M. 266–7
Miller, D. 891, 898n, 905
Mill, J.S. 875
Miraglia, M. 896n, 904
Mladić, R. 14, 17, 19, 376
Moir, L. 650n
Monageng, S. 597, 724, 726, 1288
Montt, R. 720
Moore, M. 942n
Morris, N. 937, 944
Morris, V. 575
Morsi, M. 209
Moussa, B. 321–2
Mubarak (Libya) 59
Mueller, J. 227
Mukabagwiza, E. 203
Müller, A. 212–13n
Mumba, F. 1057
Mummenthey, K. 642n
Murray, A.R.J. 703
Museveni (Uganda) 210, 213–14
Mysliwiec, P. 676n

Neier, A. 22
Nerlich, V. 481–2, 627n, 892, 906–7, 930–1n
Newman, G. 935n, 947n
Nino, C.S. 350n
Nouwen, S. 955–6n, 1183n
Nsereko, D.D.N. 1111
Ntamabyariro, A. 1096
Nzelibe, J. 959n

Obama, B. 276
Oboe-Osuji, C. 70–1
Ocampo, L.M. 89, 214, 808–10, 813–26, 836–8, 996
Odhiambo, O. 560
O'Donohue, J. 85
Ohlin, J.D. 467, 472–3, 500, 504n, 507, 513, 515, 649, 655, 657, 666, 936n, 948–9, 952
Ongwen, D. 560
Oosterveld, V. 454n
Opačić, D. 1096–8
Otti, V. 560, 569

Pado, M. 879
Paley, W. 886n
Pal, R. 369
Pastrana Arango, A. 1232–3
Patterson, A.W. 39n
Pellet, A. 182n, 278, 413n, 454, 459–61, 476, 477–8, 484–5
Pena, M. 1193n, 1194n, 1195n, 1196n
Pennington, N. 878
Pensky, M. 944n
Petraeus, D. 756
Pikis, G. 378, 1068–9, 1111, 1164–5, 1169–72
Pinker, S. 227, 1239
Pinochet, A. 23
Pittman, T. 1265n
Pitts, M.C. 231n

Plavšić, B. 960
Pocar, F. 1268–9n
Popper, K. 875
Powderly, J. 411–12n
Pruitt, R. 862–3n
Prunier, G. 1020
Puppe, I. 637n

Quigley, J. 181n, 703n

Raab, D. 1263n, 1264n
Rao, S.R. 105n
Rastan, R. 291n
Ravalomanana, M. 75
Reisinger Coracini, A. 795n
Reisman, M. 211n, 264–5
Rieff, D. 1020n
Ristroph, A. 937n, 950n
Robertson, G. 267
Roberts, P. 874n, 886n
Robinson, D. 58, 211, 701
Robinson, P. 937n, 938, 951n, 959n, 1237–8n
Root, E. 477
Rostock, P. 619n
Roxin, C. 468, 506–9, 514, 517, 519–24, 526, 528, 532, 535, 547–8, 552, 606n, 657, 757–8
Ruggie, J. 605
Ryan, M. 951n

SáCouto, S. 991, 1007n
Sadat, L. 268, 468, 709n
Saddam Hussein 24
Safferling, C. 905, 908n
Saland, P. 169n
Samson, E. 635n
Sartre, J.-P. 684–5
Sassoli, M. 758n
Saunders, H. 833–4n
Schabas, W. 211n, 224–5, 456, 481, 483, 485, 503, 512, 582n, 675, 678, 683, 695–6, 745n, 763, 808n, 898n, 931n
Scharf, M. 575
Scheffer, D. 262, 1007
Schild, W. 637n
Schomburg, W. 16n, 468, 541
Schquer, F. 871n
Seils, P. 381
Sellers, P. 838
Seneca 755
Shahabuddeen, M. 456, 466, 493, 692
Shakespeare, W. 761
Shapiro, B. 867n
Shaw, M. 181n
Shibahara, K. 898n
Sikkink, K. 1227n, 1239
Simmons, B. 18n
Simon, D. 889–90n
Sloane, R. 154, 946n, 949–50, 954n
Slobogin, P. 951n, 953n
Sluiter, G. 268n, 1094n, 1098n, 1138n
Smith van Lin, L. 1014n
Snyder, J. 22
Sorel, J.-M. 446
Spellicsy, S. 773n
Spellman, B. 871n
Spencer, J. 866n
Sriram, C. 1233n
Stahn, C. 983, 985, 987–8, 997, 1002
Stegmiller, I. 212–13n
Steiner, S. 1175
Stewart, J. 504n, 823, 837
Stover, E. 1135n
Stratenwerth, G. 627n, 636–7n
Sullivan, R. 665
Summers, S. 866n
Swaak-Goldman, O. 334

Tarfusser, C. 343, 805n, 904, 1069, 1072, 1074
Taylor, T. 735
Thagard, P. 877, 879
Thorburn, M. 950n, 951n
Tiba, F. 310–11n
Tladi, D. 269n
Tolbert, D. 1135n
Tomuschat, C. 1207–8
Tonry, M. 936n, 937n, 940n
Townsend, G. 332n, 333, 337n
Trendafilova, E. 805n, 1072–3, 1075
Triffterer, O. 379, 638n, 655
Triolo, A. 335n
Trotter, A. 1075n
Tutu, D. 77
Tuzmukhamedov, B. 584

Ušacka, Judge A. 230, 237, 247n, 274, 496, 510, 660, 674–5, 681, 685, 692, 1070–1, 1074, 1077

Van den Wyngaert, C. 467, 470–2, 486, 494–5, 497, 507, 509, 515, 527–8, 549–51, 553–5, 606, 661, 774, 996, 1000–1, 1003, 1005, 1070, 1139n, 1141n van der Wilt, H. 113n, 1264n
Van Schaak, B. 796n
van Sliedregt, E. 467, 527n, 530n, 627n, 631n, 954n
Van Wijk, J. 1097–8n
Vasiliev, S. 1188n, 1194n
Vest, H. 530n, 595n, 601n
Videla, J.R. 720
Villiger, M. 300n
Vinjamuri, L. 22
Vité, S. 771, 775
Vohrah, L.C. 458
Von Bar, C. 662
von Hagenbach, P. 609n
von Hirsh, A. 937, 938n, 940, 942n
Vyshinsky, A. 376

Waltzer, M. 734
Wechsler, H. 448
Weernink, A. 562n
Weigend, T. 467, 500, 514
Wemmers, J. 1138n
Werle, G. 225n, 512, 550n, 562n, 601n, 655, 688n
Werner, W. 955–6n
Whiting, A. 1040, 1042n, 1046, 1054n, 1061n
Wierda, M. 335n
William II of Hohenzollern 368
Williams, G. 491, 665
Williams, J. 778n

Wilmshurst, E. 58, 701
Wippman, D. 954n
Wirth, S. 709n, 714n
Withopf, E. 896n, 897
Woods, A. 944n, 953
Wouters, J. 382n
Wright, J. 1238
Wright, R. 402n
Wuterich, F. 750

Yabasun, D. 1101
Young, R. 684
Yuchtman, N. 953n

Zahar, A. 1138n
Zappalá, S. 1018n
Zenawi, M. 75
Zuckerman, A. 874n, 886n
Zuma, J. 76

Subject Index

Abu Garda 322, 1033 abuse of process doctrine 487 acceptability classes 881–2
accessorial liability 511, 557–91, 626–7
  aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 578–89
    material elements 579–84
    mental elements 584–7
  common purpose 595–6, 603
  conditional intent/dolus eventualis 566, 573, 576, 585, 591
  co-perpetration 528
  direct intent/dolus directus in the first degree 565, 573, 576, 584, 591 indirect intent/dolus directus in the second degree 565, 573, 576, 585
  instigating 569–74, 577–8, 587–9
    material elements 570–2
    mental elements 572–4
  ordering 560–9, 574, 587–9
    material elements 561–4
    mental elements 564–7
  perpetration 567–9, 574, 577–8
  planning 575–8, 587–9
    material elements 575–6
    mental elements 576–7
  ulterior intent/dolus specialis 567, 569, 574, 576–8, 585
accessory 539
accomplice liability see accessorial liability
accountability 18, 20, 23, 26, 61, 63, 1261
  see also accountability of international prosecutors Accountability, Coherence and Transparency Group (ACT) 12 accountability of international prosecutors 382–407 accountability and effectiveness, balancing 384–6 Code of Conduct 384, 387, 401, 405, 407 internal oversight 386–8 judicial oversight 388–94
  political oversight 394–6
  see also administrative and professional oversight
'Action Plan for expediting the criminal process of the ICC' 119 activism 82
  judicial 393
actus reus*:
  charging war crimes 734, 738, 741, 743, 750–1, 753
  command responsibility 613
  complicity liability 503, 505
  co-perpetration 519–20
  genocide 691, 702
Ad Hoc Committee 143, 144, 699
ad hoc tribunals:
  accessorial liability 559, 590
  categorization and fair labelling 511
  command responsibility 608, 611–12
  command responsibility: causality 637 command responsibility: commanders and forces, superiors and subordinates 613 command responsibility: duties on commanders and superiors 629 command responsibility: effective command, authority and control 619, 622 common purpose: objective contribution 599
  completion strategies 1267, 1269, 1271
  confirmation of charges phase 896
  cumulative charges 852–3, 856
  disclosure challenges 1007–8, 1010
  escaping judicial control 413
  external sources of law 427–8, 430
  immunities and cooperation 295, 298
  indirect perpetration 541–2
  instigating 572
  Lessons Learnt initiative 1288–9
  proportionate sentencing 934
  redactions 1048
  sexual violence and gender-based crimes 804, 836, 838
  sources of law and interpretive process 483, 487, 496, 497
  United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 33, 35
  see also International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY); International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) administrative and professional oversight 109–14, 196, 394–406
  Bar associations 400–2
  Independent Oversight Mechanism (IOM) 397–400
  informal sanctions 402–4
  preventive measures 404–6
admissibility 228–59, 927–9, 1168–76
  appeals 967, 969, 978–9
  Article 19 challenges in review 232–83
  complementarity 228–31, 233–6, 238–40, 244–5, 249, 253–4, 257, 259
  conditional 254, 256–8
  cumulative charges and cumulative convictions 840–1 deference and monitoring 240–45, 248, 249–53
    deferral of cases 250–1 post-(in)admissibility monitoring 251–3
  funding 101–2, 104
  Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 794
  legal methodology in review 239–45 mirroring test 239, 242–3, 253
  personal jurisdiction 154
  positive complementarity 233, 236, 252
  qualified deference 230, 253–8 monitoring of deference 255–6 supervising deference 256–8 time-management admissibility - parallel proceedings management 255 same conduct test 231, 233, 236–7, 241–3, 255, 258

admissibility (cont.):
selection of situations and cases 360, 361, 362, 371–3, 377–80
timing dilemmas 246–9
Advisory Committee of Legal Texts (ACLT) 1286
Advisory Committee on Nominations 128 Advisory Committee on nominations of judges 107 advocacy campaigns 19
advocacy organizations 82
Afghanistan 27, 169–70, 276, 753–4, 1242
AFRC 848, 852, 857, 858
African Commission of Human and Peoples' Rights 79–82, 251
African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights 81, 82, 126
African Court on Justice and Human Rights 79–82
African-led Support Mission in Mali (AFISMA) 52
African Union (AU) 9–10, 17, 65–83
and Assembly of States Parties (ASP) 108 complementarity in action 71–9
Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) 72–3
South Africa 74–7
Uganda 77–9
conflation of politics and law 66–8
deterrence and public policymaking 1240
immunities and cooperation 299–301
impunity gap 68–71
judicial integrity 1282
jurisdiction of African Court, expansion of 79–82
legislative decisions 118
non-cooperation, response to 132–3
non-states parties 269–70
Peace and Security Council 53–4, 59–60
Summit (2013) 66–7, 80
and United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 36, 43, 55–7
African Union Mission in Sudan (AMIS) 37
African Union-United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID) 37, 54 aggression, crime of and Kampala Amendments 267–8, 778–800 act of aggression and crime of aggression distinction 781–3 Article 8*bis* - definition 781–3 concurrent jurisdiction, implications of 798 domestic criminalization of ratifying state 794 elements of crimes 784–6 exclusion of responsibility, defences/grounds for 799 immunities 796–7
jurisdiction under international law 794–6 mental element 784–7
par in parem non habet imperium/act of state 797–8 prosecutorial function, triggering 800
referrals 787–8
Security Council, action or inaction by 798–9 special consent requirement 799–800
structure of Articles 15*bis* and 15*ter* - 'conditions' 786–93 victim state or universal jurisdiction 798–800
aiding and abetting 518–19, 528, 578–89, 591, 624
common purpose 596, 599–600, 605–6
material elements 579–84
mental elements 584–7
mitigation 513–14
aircraft, crimes committed on 163
Akayesu 492, 671, 683, 694–5, 697–9, 850
Al Bashir:
cumulative charges and cumulative convictions 857
jurisdiction 176, 196–7
sources of law and interpretive process 473–4, 496
standard of proof: beyond reasonable doubt 863
Al Bashir, O. 9, 13, 17, 19–20, 24, 669–704, 757 African Union 65, 67–8, 70, 76–7, 80
deferrals 53, 59–60
deterrent effect of ICC 1226, 1233–4, 1239, 1240, 1244
disclosure 1021–2
internal sources of law 421, 424
jurisdiction issues 286, 289–90, 292
non-cooperation and enforcement 45–9, 131–2 obligations for non-Party states after Security Council referral 268–72 obligations to cooperate 43, 299–300
Al-Senussi 69, 218–19, 235
admissibility challenges 232, 235, 248, 252, 257–8
Al-Senussi, A. 41, 70, 250, 274
Al Sweady 322
amendments 120–6, 788, 790
Kenyan and African Union proposals 122–6
Review Conference 117–18
Rules of Procedure and Evidence 120–2
amnesties 22, 26, 27, 78–9
Amnesty Commission 78
Amnesty International 92
Annual Report of the Court 1270 anocracies 227
appeals:
admissibility 967, 969, 978–9
final 966 interlocutory 895, 975, 978
jurisdiction 967
Appeals Chamber 963–80
jurisdiction 966–78
appeals against final decisions of Trial Chamber 974–6 conviction/sentence revision 976–7 interlocutory appeals 966–74
prosecutor or deputy prosecutor, disqualification of 977–8 sentence review 977 jurisprudence 978–80
applicable law and hierarchy of sources of law 411–43 see also external sources of law; internal sources of law Arab League 17, 81, 184–5
Independent Fact Finding Committee on Gaza 183
archives 1262, 1272–3
Area-Specific Threat and Risk Assessment 1120
Argentina 23, 26
command responsibility 640
confirmation of charges 891
personal jurisdiction 160, 161

policy element of crimes against humanity 719–20
victim redress and reparations 1210
arrest warrants 61, 367
Assembly of States Parties (ASP) 105–38
accountability and effectiveness 382–3, 386
administrative oversight 109–14, 196, 394–6 inspection, evaluation and investigation 112–14 policy-setting and strategic planning 109–12
admissibility 394–6
Advisory Committee 107
amendments 120–6, 788, 790
Kenyan and African Union proposals 122–6
Review Conference 117–18
Rules of Procedure and Evidence 120–2
appeals 964–5
budgetary decisions 114–16
Bureau of the Assembly 106–8, 129, 131–2, 135–6
charging war crimes 754
Committee on Budget and Finance 40, 107–8, 116
complementarity 136–7, 1273–5
completion strategies 1262, 1273–5
cooperation 135–6, 1280
dispute resolution 106
Draft Guidelines Governing the Relations Between the Court and Intermediaries 111
elections 106, 126–31
expediting ICC's proceedings 118–20
funding 84, 85, 87, 89, 90, 92–3, 94, 103
Independent Oversight Mechanism (IOM) 398, 401
internal sources of law 416–17, 418, 420
investigation teams: size and composition 339
jurisdiction 190
Kenya and Mali: prosecutions and political calculations 1235
legislative decisions 106, 116–26
Lessons Learnt initiative 1286, 1289–91
non-cooperation 106, 131–3
non-states parties 272–3
Oversight Committee 107
overview 105–8
and Palestine 183–4, 189, 278
personal jurisdiction 162
President/Presidency of the Assembly 106–7, 110, 114, 119, 131–2
Secretariat of the Assembly 108, 134–5, 137–8 selection of cases by Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 363
sexual violence and gender-based crimes: OTP's policy paper 837
situations and cases selection 368, 375
standard of proof, fixed or variable 888
subject matter jurisdiction 147
United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 39, 41, 44, 49, 60
victim participation 1135–7, 1157, 1159, 1198
witness protection 1122, 1125–6
Working Group of States Parties 107 asset freezing 61
associativity 711, 713
asylum, application for 440, 1086–9
atrocity by connivance 756
Attorney General 179–80, 201–5, 799 attribution principle 170 audits 387
Australia 433, 867–8
Law Reform Commission of Western Australia 664 authority 632
degree of 590 formal (de jure) 574, 618 informal (de facto) 574 position of 561–2, 590 authorization to proceed 367, 370, 373

Banda, A. 1021
Banda and Jerbo*:
appeals 973
confirmation of charges 894–5
incriminatory information 1033
proper disclosure of evidence 925
redactions 1049–50
trial procedures in Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909, 911
victim participation 1142
Bar associations 400–2
Bayesian epistemology 872–4
Belgium 136
Conseil d'État 57
Bemba*:
accessorial liability 560, 569
aiding, abetting and otherwise assisting 579
burden of proof 1066, 1071–3, 1077
command responsibility 618, 620, 622, 631, 642, 647
common purpose 603
confirmation of charges 898–9, 900–1, 903, 905, 917–18
cumulative charges and cumulative convictions 852, 855, 857
detained witnesses and human rights protection 1101
disclosure 923, 1014
interim release 1082
interim release: failing to meet grounds for detention 1068–9, 1074–5, 1076–7 interim release: unreasonable length of detention 1079–80
known or should have known 760, 768
legal recharacterization of facts 982, 988, 990–2, 994, 998–1000, 1005
mental elements and jurisprudence 660–3
self-referrals and inactivity and inability 218–20
sexual and gender-based violence 834–6
sources of law and interpretive process 479, 496
trial procedures in Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909, 929
victim participation 1143, 1151, 1158, 1162, 1166–8, 1173, 1179–80, 1183, 1192, 1198
Bemba, J.-P. 210, 1063, 1230
beyond reasonable doubt 344, 896
blameworthiness 500, 512, 515, 542, 631
Blaškić 718, 1064–5
Bosnia and Herzegovina 14, 16, 37, 202
Brazil 26, 37, 159–60, 1210
Brđanin 505–6, 1065, 1075 budgetary decisions see funding

Budget and Finance Team 91 bulk rule 894, 922
burden of proof 1064–7
Bureau of the Assembly of States Parties (ASP) 49, 106–8, 129, 131–2, 135–6, 1279, 1285
Bureau on Stocktaking 1252–3
Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities (ASP) 1135–6, 1188–90, 1192, 1197
but-for test 635–6

Cambodia 101, 436, 570, 575, 1273
  cumulative convictions 847, 854
  Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) 86, 429, 561
  Khmer Rouge Tribunal 429, 1239
Canada 640, 869, 1103, 1112
capacity building 1245–58, 1262, 1270–1, 1274–5, 1281–2 domestic capacity, challenges to 1249–52 methods 1254–7
cases see selection of situations and cases
categorization and fair labelling 510–11
causation/causality 564, 635–9
Čelebići 223, 359, 492–3, 846
Čelebići test 847–8, 850, 852–4, 856–8
Central African Republic (CAR):
  ad hoc declarations of acceptance of jurisdiction 185
  admissibility challenges 232–4
  Cour de Cassation 213, 225
  ordinary course of events and conscious risk-taking 660–3
  self-referrals, non-state actors and problems of inactivity and inability 210, 218, 273
  situations and cases selection 355, 366
  temporal parameters 177–8
  United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 54–5
  witness protection 1122, 1126
Chad 48, 132–3, 197, 273
characterization of armed conflict 762–77
  effective control 773 intensity threshold 769–71
  internationalization test 772–4, 777 international and non-international conflict 765–72, 774, 777 issues impacting on 774–7 organization level 769–71
  overall control 772–4 over- or under-characterization of situations 775 war crimes, exercise of jurisprudence over 762–4 charges 732–61
  actus reus 734, 738, 741, 743, 750–1, 753
  amending 984–9
  from confirmation to adjudication 916–22 interrelationship of Court with operational realities 749–60 forces agreements, status of 752–4 preserving jurisdictional floor of charging 749–52
    see also command responsibility jus in bello 734–41, 742–5, 749–51, 755–6, 760–1
  lex lata 749–51
  lex specialis 739–40
  mens rea 734, 741, 747, 760
  underlying structure 739–49 consensus compromises negotiated by States 745–9 specific textual incorporation 741–4 see also confirmation of charges; cumulative charges; Document Containing the Charges Chile 22–3, 26, 1210
China 7–8, 9, 277, 1234
  charging war crimes 741
  Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 791, 795
  personal jurisdiction 161
  United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 32, 34
civil society 82, 311, 312–13, 315 civil society organizations 76–7, 85, 91, 1257 claims (confirmed/open/plausible/probable/supported) 881 closeness of nexus 153–5
Coalition for the International Criminal Court (CICC) 91
Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind 451 Code of Professional Conduct for Counsel 422 coherence of story 878 collective criminality theory 501
Colombia 22, 323–6, 1231–3
  Armed Revolutionary Forces of Colombia (FARC) 323–4, 326
  Constitutional Court 324
  Legal Framework for Peace 324
command responsibility 536, 608–48, 754–60 accessory liability 626–7
  causation/causality 635–9
  charges - from confirmation to adjudication 918
  commanders and forces, superiors and subordinates 612–18 commanders and superiors, duties on 622–35 control, failure to exercise 623–4 crimes committed 633–5 duty to 'prevent' commission of crimes 624–9 duty to repress or submit matter to competent authorities for investigation and prosecution 629–32 taking all necessary and reasonable measures 632–3 co-perpetratorship, limits of 757–9 effective command, authority and control 618–22 liability, development of mode of 609–12 mens rea requirements 613, 639–48 conscious disregard of information clearly indicated 648 knowledge 640–3
    known or should have known 644–8 standard, proper application of 760
Commission of Experts on crimes in former Yugoslavia (1994) 719 Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights 79–82 commitment rule 881
Committee on Budget and Finance (CBF) 40, 84, 92–3, 107–8, 111, 115, 116
Committee on the Establishment of a Permanent ICC 1112
Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction 142 Committee for the Investigation and Prosecution of Major War Criminals 375–6

Committee on the Progressive Development of International Law and its Codification 450
common purpose 153, 592–607
accessorial liability 595–6, 603
aiding and abetting 596, 599–600, 605–6 anticipated or organizational/collective liability 592–3 complicity 595
criminal responsibility 593–4, 599, 603
culpability 593, 599, 602, 607
direct participation 593 individual participation in collective criminal enterprise 592–3 joint criminal enterprise (JCE) liability 594, 597–600 key features and delimitations 592–6 legality principle 593
liability 500, 513
minimum threshold/less than substantial 599, 607
neutral contributions 598–9, 607
objective contribution 596–607 factual nature 596, 597–604
legal nature 596, 604–7
significant contribution 598, 599–601, 607
substantial contribution 599–601
Comoros and Israeli raid on Humanitarian Aid Flotilla 165, 366
Compendium of Lessons Learned 829
compétence de la competence* principle 189
complementarity 18, 23, 305–27, 1211–16, 1281–2, 1293
admissibility 228–31, 233–6, 238–40, 244–5, 249, 253–4, 257, 259
African Union (AU) 69, 71–9
Assembly of States Parties (ASP) 136–7, 1273–5
capacity building 1245, 1246–9, 1251, 1256, 1258
funding 102
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 794
Libya 274
and national capacity 1246–9 national prosecutions, meaningful 306–15 civil society, role of 312–13
conditions 310–12
international community, role of 314–15 policy objectives in criminal justice 308–9 referrals and limits on national efforts 309–10 transitions, timing and interests of justice 313–14
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP): catalysing national proceedings 316–20 operational challenges 1281–2
passive 71
personal jurisdiction 156
selection of situations and cases 356, 360, 372, 379–80
technical analysis of national proceedings 320–6
Colombia 323–6
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 326–7
UK forces in Iraq 320–2 unwillingness/inability limb 236
see also completion, legacy and complementarity; positive complementarity completeness of story 878 completion, legacy and complementarity 1259–76
archives 1272–3
Assembly of States Parties (ASP) 1273–5
capacity building 1270–1
complementarity 1262, 1274–5
completion strategies 1259–62, 1269 defining completion 1267–8 legacy issues 1269
outreach 1271–2
positive complementarity 1262, 1268, 1273–4, 1276
residual functions 1269 restrictions on mandate, avoidance of 1263–5
Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) 1259, 1263, 1265–7, 1269–73
timeliness of devising and implementing completion strategies 1265–7 complicity 499, 503–4, 595, 626
concurrence:
apparent or false 843, 845
real 845, 851
concursus delictorum* (cumulative offences) 841–6, 848, 851–2, 858 conditional intent see dolus eventualis confidentiality and disclosure 389
confirmation of charges 891–908, 984
beyond reasonable doubt 896
intermediary phase 891, 905–8
legal characterization modification 902–5 Pre-Trial Chamber - procedural avenues 896–902 confirm charges 898 decline charges 898–9 hearing adjournment 899–901 withdrawal of charges 902 proceedings 893–5 reasonable grounds 896
standard of proof 896
substantial grounds 896–7, 904
sufficient basis/evidence 896
conscription, enlistment, and use of children under the age of 15 50, 72, 172–3, 267, 462–3 consilience 877–8
consistency of story 878 conspiracy 593
constructive ambiguity 125 consumption principle 843–4, 856
Contact Group 10
contextual elements of crimes 177 continuing crimes 171–2, 174 control over the will test 555 control theory of perpetration 467, 469, 471–2, 499–500, 506–12, 515–16
co-perpetration 517–21, 523–32, 535
indirect perpetration 548–9 normative principal 508–9
organizational liability 509–10
see also organizational control convictions:
and punishment distinction 324
revision 976–7
see also cumulative convictions
Cook Islands 208–9

cooperation 62–3, 65, 1279–80, 1293–4
African Union (AU) 70
Assembly of States Parties (ASP) 135–6, 299–301, 1280
Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) 73
funding 102
non-states parties 210–11, 265, 268–70
obligations 42–4
operational challenges 1279–80
reverse 253
self-referrals and problems of inactivity and inability 210–11 see also immunities and cooperation coordination see external support and internal coordination - witness protection
co-perpetration 499, 500, 507, 509–10, 516–37, 541, 544, 549, 757–9
aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 528, 582
alternative accounts 531–7
common purpose: objective contribution 602 Control Theory of Perpetration 517, 519–21, 523–6, 527–31, 532, 535 direct 479
emergence 518–27
instigating 571
with joint control 557
objective approach 519–20, 523, 532–3, 536
personal jurisdiction 153
planning 577–8
sources of law and interpretive process 467–8, 471–3
subjective approach 519–20, 523, 532–3, 536 see also indirect co-perpetration correspondence principle 652
co-sponsorship 8
Côte d'Ivoire:
accessorial liability 561
admissibility challenges 232, 234
capacity building 1251
complementarity 309, 1251
detained witnesses and human rights protection 1098
instigation 570
jurisdiction: ad hoc declarations of acceptance 188, 196, 200 meaningful national prosecutions 309
policy element of crimes against humanity 716–24
prosecutions and political calculations 1227
situations and cases selection 354, 367
subject matter jurisdiction 148
temporal parameters 174, 176
witness protection 1122
see also Gbagbo
counterfactual reasoning 529 coverage of the evidence 878 crimes against humanity - policy element 705–31
associativity 711, 713
atrocity 711
contextual interpretation 721–2 definition of policy element 708–10 discrepancy of policy element definitions 710–11
Gbagbo adjournment decision 716–24 general authorities on policy element 717–20
lessons from 723–4
policy element under ICC applicable law 721–3 jurisprudence concerns 713–15
equating 'policy' with 'systematic' 713–14
'grounds' of targeting 715
legal interpretation 721
Mbarushimana case 724–9
legal conclusion and factual findings 725–6
lessons from 729
reticence to find policy 726–8 ulterior purpose 728–9 necessity for 'policy element' 707–8 reform proposals 729–31 resulting concept of crime against humanity 711 scale 712 standard interpretation 722
teleological interpretation 722 Tribunals, approach of 712–13
widespread or systematic test 707–8, 710, 714, 730
Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind 795
criminal responsibility 650–1
accessorial liability 562–3
cases, selection of 378–9
charges - from confirmation to adjudication 917
Colombia 324
common purpose 593–4, 599, 603, 607
immunities and cooperation 283, 287
indirect perpetration 541
instigating 569
perpetration 499, 501
planning 577
of superior 638
see also culpability
'Criteria for selection of situations and cases' (draft paper) 371–2 Croatia 793
culpability 941–2, 944–5, 954, 958
common purpose 593, 599, 602, 607
parallel nature of 515 personal 1237–8
cumulative charges 836, 852–8
customary law 853–5
principle 852–3
Rome Statute 855–8
cumulative convictions 842–52
apparent or false concurrence 843, 845, 849
Čelebići test 847–8, 850, 852–4, 856–8
class 1 843–4, 846–9
class 2 844–5
class 3 845, 850–1
class 4 845, 851
concursus delictorum (cumulative offences) 841, 842–5, 846, 848, 851–2, 858
customary law 845–51
identity of facts constituting several offences 842–5 non-identity of facts constituting several offences 845
norm competition 844–5, 851
procedural dimension 841
real concurrence 845, 851
Rome Statute 851–2
substantive dimension 841
customary law 524–5, 845–51

Darfur Commission (International Commission of Inquiry on Darfur) 684, 693, 695, 704 default rule (mental elements in jurisprudence) 650–65, 785 anatomy of default rule 650–2
dolus directus of the first degree 652–4, 658, 661–2, 668
dolus directus of the second degree 658, 668
dolus eventualis 650, 654–7, 668
intent, attack against civilians and collateral damage 667 intent and knowledge 650–1 result 'will occur in the ordinary course of events' and relation with conscious risk-taking 654–64
Katanga and Ngudjolo 660–3 knowledge and recklessness 654–7 liability for more serious consequences 663–4
Lubanga 657–9
'unless otherwise specified' 665–6 wilful blindness doctrine 664–5 defence attorneys 403
deference 52–60, 63, 248–53, 258 qualified 230, 253–8
see also under admissibility challenges
de jure* position 613–14 de minimis* rule 378 democratic deficit 394
Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) (North Korea) 148–9
Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) 15, 72–3, 1230–1
accessorial liability 560, 561
ad hoc declarations of acceptance of jurisdiction 185, 193, 196–7, 203
admissibility challenges 232–3, 234
capacity building and complementarity 1251
charging war crimes 758
common purpose: objective contribution 597
complementarity and meaningful national prosecutions 313
deterrence and public policymaking 1242
external sources of law 438, 442
immunities and cooperation 289–91, 293, 295–6, 299–301
instigating 570
internal sources of law 415
investigation teams: size and composition 334–7, 341
non-states parties 270
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) role in catalysing national proceedings 316
policy element of crimes against humanity 724–9
prosecutions and political calculations 1227
redactions 1052
selection of cases by Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 362–3
self-referrals, non-state actors and problems of inactivity and inability 210, 213, 215–16, 316
sexual violence and gender-based crimes: OTP's evidence problem 819
situations and cases selection 366
temporal parameters 175–6
territorial parameters 166
victim participation 1142
witness protection 1122
see also Bemba; Katanga and Ngudjolo; Lubanga; Ntaganda demonstration effect 18 desert 937, 939, 940, 944, 953–4 detained ICC witnesses and human rights protection 439–41, 1084–104
future implications 1095, 1096–9
lessons learnt 1096–7
legal proceedings 1086–93
asylum, application for 1086–9
detention situation 1089–93
solutions 1099–103
limiting witnesses' access to human rights protection 1100–3
preliminary safeguards 1099–100
Detention Centre of ICC 1092 detention costs 98
deterrence 16–17, 19, 25, 308, 384, 959–60, 1240
see also deterrent effect of ICC on commission of international crimes by government leaders deterrent effect of ICC on commission of international crimes by government leaders 1225–44
legal deterrence 1227 prosecutions, effect of on political calculations 1226–36
assessment of practice 1236
Colombia 1231–3
Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) 1230–1
former Yugoslavia 1235–6
Kenya 1235
Mali 1235
Sierra Leone 1236
Sudan (Darfur) 1233–4
Uganda 1227–30
public policymaking 1236–43 normative value of prosecutions 1238–40 successful deterrent effects 1240–3 specific deterrence 1227 development aid 1237
direct intent see dolus directus in the first degree disciplinary measures 394–5
disclosure 387, 922–6, 1007–28
challenges 1017–25
documents, review of 384
electronic disclosure 1018 exculpatory disclosure 1022–3 framework 1009–17
exonerating evidence and information material to preparation of defence 1010–13
incriminating evidence 1010 limits on disclosure 1013–17 post-confirmation 922–5 pre-confirmation 922–3, 925 rolling 1127–31
standardized 925–6
witness protection 1014–15, 1110, 1117–18
see also evidence, sitting on and disclosure discretion:
judicial 248
prosecutorial 370, 372–3, 379, 380–1, 385
disjunctive test 713–14
dismissals of select counts 393
displacing the local 23–4

disputed territories 167–8 dispute, existence or absence of 196–7 dispute resolution 106
distinction, rule of 649–50
Document Containing the Charges (DCC) 917–21, 927, 1032–5, 1061
  confirmation of charges phase 893, 898, 901, 906, 908
  legal recharacterization of facts 989–90, 992, 995–6, 1002
dolus directus* in the first degree 643, 652–4, 658, 661–2, 668
  accessorial liability 565, 573, 576, 584, 591
dolus directus* in the second degree 643, 658, 668
  accessorial liability 565, 573, 576, 585
dolus eventualis 696
  accessorial liability 566, 573, 576, 585, 591
  command responsibility 643
  common purpose 606
  complicity liability 504
  co-perpetration 533–7
  default rule 650, 654–7, 668
  ordinary course of events and conscious risk-taking 660
  sources of law and interpretive process 495
dolus specialis 680, 690, 696
  accessorial liability 567, 569, 574, 576–8, 585
domination of the commission of a crime 547
do no harm rationale 21 double standards of international justice 3–12, 37 context 4–6
  status quo, beyond 11–12
'drafters intent' argument 723
Draft Guidelines Governing the Relations Between the Court and Intermediaries 111 draft investigation plan 370 dual national suspect 153–5 duty to punish 629

Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) 82
Egypt:
  Court of Cassation 659
  Freedom of Justice Party 209
Eichmann 509, 521, 701
Eichmann, A. 506, 520, 547, 757 either/or logic 236, 250
elections 106, 126–31
  judges 127–9
  prosecutor and deputy prosecutors 129–31
Electronic Disclosure Suite (EDS) 1062
El Salvador 26
Erdemović 456–7, 458, 483
Erdemović, D. 351
Eritrea-Ethiopia Claims Commission 1218 essential contribution requirement 529 Ethiopia 310
ethnicity 377
European Court of Human Rights:
  appeals 963
  burden of proof 1067
  detained witnesses and human rights protection 1088, 1092–3, 1095
  external sources of law 434, 435–6, 442
  fixed or variable standard of proof 888
  interim release 1073–4, 1076–7, 1079
  jurisdiction 190–1
  non-disclosure to the public 1057
  sources of law and interpretive process 486, 487–9, 493
European Court of Justice 963 evaluation teams 370
evidence:
  on appeal, admission of additional 974–5 circumstantial 563
  see also evidence, sitting on and disclosure; potentially exculpatory evidence Evidence Charts 894 evidence, sitting on and disclosure 1029–62 disclosure obligation exemptions 1047–58
    non-disclosure to the public 1054–8
    redactions 1047–54
  Document Containing the Charges (DCC) 1032–5, 1061
  Electronic Disclosure Suite (EDS) 1062
  exculpatory information or information which assists the defence 1040–7 legal principles 1031
  post-confirmation disclosure 1031
  pre-confirmation disclosure 1031
  reform proposals 1060–2
  see also incriminatory information evidentiary thresholds see procedural avenues exceptional humanitarian circumstances 1080–1
exculpatory information or information which assists the defence 389, 893–4, 923, 973, 1040–7
ex delicto non oritur actio* principle 271
ex injuria jus non oritur* principle 271 expediting proceedings 118–20, 926
external sources of law 425–43
  internationally recognized human rights 433–43 definition 434–6
    interpretation and application (definition) 436–43
  subsidiary sources of law 425–33
extradition requests 263
Extraordinary Session of the Assembly of Heads of States and Governments 9–10 fair labelling 503, 510–11, 515 fairness 926

fair trial, right to 57, 386, 487–8, 996–1002 family visits (funding) 110 field investigations 818–20 field offices 91
financial and business arrangements 1237 fitness to stand trial 436
Fofana 718, 1071–2
former Yugoslavia 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, 1235–6
  see also International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) France 8, 276, 279
  ad hoc declarations of acceptance of jurisdiction 195
  confirmation of charges 891
  Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 786
  legal recharacterization of facts 990

ordinary course of events and conscious risk-taking 657
subjective standard of proof 866
United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 54, 60, 63
victim redress and reparations 1205
freedom, right to, breach of, by illegal arrest or detention 437 funding: comparison with International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia 84–104 allocation of funds by activity 88 allocation of funds by Organ of the Court 88 budget process 92–4, 114–16 comparative inefficiency of ICC 100–3 constituencies 89–92 core activities 96–8 costs and spending 85–9 efficiency of ICC 94–100 inflation-adjusted spending 86 mandate-driven budget 94 spending by functions (ICTY vs ICC) 98 spending by sources (ICTY vs ICC) 97 staff versus non-staff costs 88, 102–4 support functions 96–8 willingness-to-pay budget 94
workloads and costs (ICTY vs ICC) 95, 98–9
zero growth budget 85, 90–4, 103, 115, 339, 1124, 1193

Gaddafi 69, 232, 235
Gaddafi, M. 13, 17, 21–2, 27, 59, 82, 219, 274–5
Gbagbo*:
accessorial liability 561, 570
adjournment decision 716–24
admissibility challenges 229, 234
appeals 979
burden of proof 1064, 1066
confirmation of charges 892, 899, 905
interim release 1082
interim release: exceptional humanitarian circumstances 1080–1
interim release: failing to meet grounds for detention 1068–9, 1071, 1073–4, 1077
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) investigative management 329
policy element of crimes against humanity 705, 707, 713, 730
proper disclosure of evidence 923
sexual and gender-based violence 822–3
trial procedures in Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909, 911
victim participation 1142, 1153–6, 1158–60, 1163, 1191, 1198
Gbagbo, L. 625, 809, 839, 1225, 1239, 1244
General Court (European Union) 963 general principles of law 431–3 genocide and Al Bashir case-law 689–704 analysis 674–81
collective intent 681 consistency 702
cultural genocide 691 customary law argument 699–701 definition of the crime and common element 674–9 deliberately inflicting conditions of life calculated to bring about physical destruction 687–90 dolus eventualis or foresight 696
dolus specialis 690, 696
elements of crimes as evidence of opinio juris of states 676–7 genocidal campaign and realistic genocidal intent 679–81 individual intent 681 intent and knowledge requirement 690 intent, ordinary meaning of 698–9 killing 686
knowledge-based approach 690–703
material elements 682–90
no requirement of a concrete threat 681–2
objective approach 684
particular seriousness of genocide 701 physical or biological destruction 692
prior case-law 677–9
'protected group' concept and 'ethnical group' 682–5 purpose-based approach 694–5, 701–2
rhetorics of genocide and acquittal 703–4 serious bodily or mental harm, causing 686–7 social concept of destruction 691
special intent 694
strict construction principle 675 structure of crime of genocide 672–82
subjective approach 684, 690
systematic considerations 676
teleology 671–2
travaux préparatoires 675–6, 699–701
Genocide Convention 296–9
genuine link test 153
German law (Dogmatik approach) 468–9, 507, 513, 514, 515, 517
Germany 22
aggression, crime of 779
command responsibility 640
dolus directus of the first degree 653
Federal Court of Justice 547–8 jurisdictional parameters 141–2
ordinary course of events and conscious risk-taking 654, 656, 658, 662–4
proportionate sentencing 940
subjective standard of proof 865–7
'Golden Rule' of interpretation 490 gravity criterion:
burden of proof 1066
common purpose 598, 602–3
comparative gravity test 233
proportionate sentencing/proportionality 941–2, 943–5, 958
selection of situations and cases 359–61, 372, 379–80
sexual violence and gender-based crimes: OTP's policy paper 836
Greentree Process 137, 314–15
guarantors 612–13
Guatemala 8, 205, 720
'Guiding Principles on Business and Human Rights' 605

Hague Working Group (Bureau's) 113, 115
Haradinaj 1073, 1075

harmonization 1197–2000
'soft' 19, 1137, 1190–3
Harun, A. 46, 272, 1234, 1240
Harun and Kushayb 569
Heads of State 202–3, 281, 290, 418
hierarchy:
co-perpetration 528
internal oversight and accountability 387
sources of law and interpretive process 461, 478–9, 484, 497
Honduras 1242
hostage-taking 221
Humanitarian Law Centre 1273
human rights 433–43
accountability and effectiveness 384
characterization of armed conflict 764–5
charging war crimes 736
completion strategies 1270
deterrence and public policymaking 1236–40
external sources of law 425
interim release 1063–4, 1066–7, 1080
prosecutions and political calculations 1227
sources of law and interpretive process 446, 464–5, 474, 498
standards 6
see also detained ICC witnesses and human rights protection Human Rights Watch 16, 25, 340–1, 1123–4 hybrid tribunals 572, 579, 581, 586–7, 590
see also Khmer Rouge Tribunal; Special Court of Sierra Leone; Special Tribunal for Lebanon

Immigration and Naturalization Services (IND) (Netherlands) 1097
immunities and cooperation 281–302
Assembly of States Parties (ASP) 299–301
content of international law in official capacity 285 customary international law 286–9, 293–4
jurisdiction 285–92
non-states parties 263–4, 268–9 obligation to cooperate 285, 292–301 analysis of conflicting obligations 299–301
Genocide Convention 296–9
independent basis for immunity removal 293–6 literal interpretation approach 296 official capacity 282–3, 286, 293 quality of states involved 285
Rome Statute 282–6
applicable law 282–4
methodological mapping of interaction 284–6
United Nations Security Council referral and immunity removal 289–91, 295–6 impartiality 325, 354, 379, 926
judicial 1003–5
impunity rationale 1003–5 inclusion, cases of (specialty) 844, 852 incrementalism theory 1238–9
incriminatory information 1031–40
post-confirmation disclosure 1037–40
pre-confirmation disclosure 1032–7
independence, prosecutorial 325, 354, 376, 379, 385–6, 994–6 Independent Oversight Mechanism (IOM) 87, 107, 109, 112–14, 138, 397–400
accountability 383–4
internal oversight and accountability 388
legislative decisions 125–6
in-depth analysis chart (IDAC) 927, 1027, 1034 India 205
indicative checklists 63 indirect co-perpetration 467–70, 472–3, 479, 509–10, 515, 522, 526–7, 544–5, 553–4
accessorial liability 557
charging war crimes 757–8 international human rights 486
ordering 568
organizational liability 509–10
planning 578
Pre-Trial Chamber's approach 549 strict construction 494
indirect intent see dolus directus in the second degree
indirect perpetration 499–510, 520–1, 526, 528, 538–57, 757
ad hoc tribunals 541–2
control theory 507–10, 548–9
co-perpetration 541, 544, 549
indirect co-perpetration 544–5, 549, 553–4
legality principle 550–1 narrow version 550–4
ordering 567–9
organizational control 545–9, 551–3, 556
outlook 554–6
perpetrators and accessories distinction 542–8
Pre-Trial Chamber's approach: criticism 548–50 substantive arguments 551–4
Individual Risk Assessment (IRA) 1107, 1119–21
in dubio pro reo principle 490, 492, 494–5, 549, 740, 897
inductive reasoning 864
inference to the best explanation (IBE) 877–80, 882
in the interests of justice 229, 362–3, 380
Initial Response System (IRS) 1107, 1120, 1121–2, 1131–2
instigating 569–74, 576, 577–8, 587–9, 591
and indirect perpetration, relationship between 539
material elements 570–2
mental elements 572–4
Institute for International Criminal Investigations 814–15
Institute for Security Studies 76 Institute for War and Peace Reporting 809
institutional autonomy 33–4 integrity, judicial 1282
intensity threshold 769–71 intent see dolus entries
intent, specificity and proportionality, balance between 649–50
Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR) 206, 311, 434, 435 interim release (from detention centre in the Netherlands) 1063–83
burden of proof 1064–7
conditions 1070–8
conduct of accused 1071–3 cooperation of states 1074–6

court proceedings 1073–4
exceptional humanitarian circumstances 1080–1 failing to meet grounds for detention 1067–78
human rights 1063–4, 1066–7, 1080
reasonable grounds 1068–70
recommendations 1081–3
risk of continuing commission of crimes 1077–8 risk of flight 1071–6
risk of interference with proceedings 1076–7 unreasonable length of detention 1078–80
interlocutory appeals 895, 966–74, 975, 978
internal documents of the prosecution 1013–14
internal sources of law 414–25
applicable legal texts and hierarchy 414–22 case law 422–5
main legal texts 414–21
supplementary legal texts 421–2
International Association of Prosecutors (IAP) 383, 401–2
International Bar Association (IBA) 1055, 1102
International Center for Transitional Justice 18, 137
International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) 737–8, 743–4, 761
international community, role of 314–15
International Court of Justice (ICJ) 202–3, 205–6
charging war crimes 739
fixed or variable standard of proof 887–8
genocide 692
immunities and cooperation 287, 288, 298–9
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 786–7
International Criminal Code 450
International Criminal Standard of Proof 861–90
fixed or variable standard of proof 887–8 formal approach 864, 872
inference to the best explanation (IBE) 877–80, 882
model, choice of 882
qualitative probability - argumentation theory 880–2 quantitative standard of proof 872–4 relevant variables model - inductive probability 864, 874–7 setting standard of proof 882–7
subjective approach 864, 865–71, 882, 889–90
theoretical considerations 864–5
International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) 5, 19–20, 23, 24, 668
accessorial liability 561
aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 578, 579–84, 586–7, 589
Annual Report (1994) 14
appeals 963, 979–80
burden of proof 1064–5, 1066
capacity building and complementarity 1247
characterization of armed conflict 764, 766–8, 770–1, 773–4, 777
charging war crimes 758, 806
command responsibility 596, 617, 628, 630, 633–4, 644–7
common purpose 596, 600, 606
complementarity and meaningful national prosecutions 310
completion strategies 1259, 1263–5, 1270, 1273
complicity liability 501, 503–6
confirmation of charges 891
co-perpetration 517–19
cumulative convictions and cumulative charges 846, 849, 850, 857, 858
deference and monitoring 250–51
detained witnesses and human rights protection 1096–8
deterrent effect 25, 1239
disclosure challenges 1011–12, 1018, 1022, 1024
exculpatory information or that which assists the defence 1042
external sources of law 428–31, 433, 436
funding 85–6, 95–104
genocide 677–9, 683, 690, 692, 694, 700, 704
immunities and cooperation 287–8, 298
indirect perpetration 552
instigating 569, 570–1, 573
intent, attack against civilians and collateral damage 667 intent, specificity and proportionality 649–50
interim release 1063, 1082
interim release: exceptional humanitarian circumstances 1081
interim release: failing to meet grounds for detention 1068, 1071–7
interim release: unreasonable length of detention 1080
investigation teams: size and composition 335, 337, 338
and joint criminal enterprise (JCE) 540
Lessons Learnt 1277
Manual on Developed Practices 339–40
non-states parties 269, 271
ordinary course of events and conscious risk-taking 658, 663
perpetration 515–16
personal jurisdiction 152
planning 575, 578
policy element of crimes against humanity 708–9, 712–13, 715, 718
pre-confirmation disclosure 1032
proportionate sentencing 946, 960
prosecutions and political calculations 1235
redactions 1052
Rules of the Road 18
selection of situations and cases 359, 369, 376–7
self-referrals, non-state actors and problems of inactivity and inability 220–21, 223, 269, 271
sexual violence and gender-based crimes 802–3, 813–14, 825, 835
sources of law and interpretive process 444–7, 452–4, 455, 468, 470, 482, 493–4
sufficiency of evidence, evaluation of 345, 347
'unless otherwise provided' 666
victim participation 1133
witness protection 1106–9, 1112, 1124–5, 1127
see also funding: comparison with International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) 5, 78
accessorial liability 561
aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 578, 579–81, 586, 589

International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) (cont.):
appeals 963, 979
Best Practices Manual for the Investigation and Prosecution of Sexual Violence Crimes 829
burden of proof 1065, 1067
capacity building and complementarity 1247
cases, selection of 377
command responsibility 617
common purpose 600
complementarity and meaningful national prosecutions 310
completion strategies 1259, 1263, 1270
complicity liability 503
confirmation of charges 891
co-perpetration 517
cumulative convictions 846, 850
deference and monitoring 250–51
detained witnesses and human rights protection 1096
deterrence and public policymaking 1239
disclosure regime 1059
external sources of law 429–30, 433, 436
funding 86
genocide 671, 683, 692, 694–5, 704
immunities and cooperation 287–8
instigating 570–1, 573
interim release 1063, 1075, 1079
investigation teams: size and composition 335
Lessons Learnt 1277
non-states parties 269
ordinary course of events and conscious risk-taking 658
personal jurisdiction 158
planning 575
policy element of crimes against humanity 718
pre-confirmation disclosure 1032
proportionate sentencing 946
prosecutions and political calculations 1235
redactions 1052
Review Committee 830
sexual violence and gender-based crimes 802–3, 806, 813–14
situations, selection of 369
sources of law and interpretive process 444–7, 452–4, 455, 468, 482, 492
subjective standard of proof 870
temporal parameters 172
victim participation 1133
witness protection 1106–9, 1112
International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH) 91
internationalization test 772–4, 777
International Labour Organization (ILO): Administrative Tribunal 93 International Law Commission (ILC): draft Code of Crimes (1996) 33, 708–9
jurisdiction 143
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 795, 797
planning 577
situations, selection of 370
sources of law and interpretive process 413, 449, 474–5
victim redress and reparations 1204–5
witness protection 1112
International Military Tribunal (IMT) 14, 368–9, 946, 1207
see also Nuremberg Tribunal; Tokyo Tribunal international peace and security, ICC as instrument of 31–3 intervention brigade 52
interviewing suspects 348 investigative management, strategies and techniques see Office of the Prosecutor (OTP): investigative management, strategies and techniques investigators, qualified and experienced 340
see also training Iraq:
charging war crimes 749–50
Historical Allegations Team (IHAT) 322
non-states parties 266
operation Danny Boy 320
personal jurisdiction 152
Property Claims Commission 1218 selection of cases and situations by Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 354–5, 359–60, 372–3
Special Tribunal 24
Sunni regime 24
temporal parameters 170
Israel 184, 199
Supreme Court 738, 761
Italy 748
iura novit curia* principle 856, 904–5

Japan 1205
Jelisić 678, 683
Joint African Union-United Nations chief mediator 54
joint criminal enterprise (JCE) 515–16, 540, 550
and complicity liability 501–6 expansion and weak theoretical basis 504–6
inter-linked or vertical 506
non-categorization in normative terms 502–4
co-perpetration 518–19
indirect perpetration 541–2
perpetration 499
planning 578
Joint Intentions Theory of Co-Perpetration 533 judicial activism 393 judicial discretion 248
judicial integrity 1282
judicial oversight 388–94
judicial proceedings, efficient management of 1283–4 judicial review 370 Judicial Studies Board 868
jurisdiction 6, 65–6, 141–78
African Court 79–82
aggressor state 796–7
appeals 967
completion strategies 1260–1 concurrent 798
consent-based 145
discretionary jurisdiction 157 disjointed jurisdiction 166
flag jurisdiction 165
immunities and cooperation 284, 285–92

parameters, jurisdictional 141–7 partial jurisdiction 165–6
personal jurisdiction 146, 151–63, 166, 168, 170
prescriptive jurisdiction 156
selection of situations and cases 371–3, 377–80
subject matter jurisdiction 146, 147–51, 168, 355–6 temporal jurisdiction 144, 146–7, 168–78 territorial jurisdiction 163–8, 170 universal jurisdiction 795–6, 798–800 victim state 795–6
see also Appeals Chamber; jurisdiction - Palestinian situation jurisdiction - Palestinian situation 179–209

Attorney General 201–5
Head of State 202–3 inherent or automatic jurisdiction 180–1 Minister of Foreign Affairs 202–3
Minister of Justice 201–5
new status and its effect on First and Second Declaration 199–208 Palestinian Declaration (2009): inconsistencies and legal uncertainties 183–92 potential review and alternative avenues 192–8 Prime Minister 202–3
ratione loci or ratione personae jurisdiction 187 ratione materiae jurisdiction 187 ratione temporis jurisdiction 187

jurisprudence 424–5, 427–8, 430, 464, 713–15, 978–80

jus in bello*/jus ad bellum (laws of war) 734–41, 742–5, 747, 749–51, 755–6, 760–1

jus cogens* (peremptory norm) 439–40

justice:
cascade 1239
transitional 230
see also politics of peace and justice; restorative justice; retributive justice

Justice Rapid Response 137

Kampala Amendments see aggression, crime of and Kampala Amendments

Karadžić 1022, 1025, 1046–7

Karadžić, R. 14, 17, 19, 376, 825, 1020

Katanga*:
accountability of prosecutors 392
admissibility challenges 229, 231, 233, 247
appeals 978–9
characterization of armed conflict 774
common purpose 594, 597–8, 600
incriminatory information 1036
legal recharacterization of facts 982, 988, 992–3, 996, 1000–1, 1003–5
perpetration and participation 508, 511–12
policy element of crimes against humanity 706, 713, 730
proportionate sentencing 932
self-referrals and inactivity and inability 217–19
sexual and gender-based violence 811–13, 819–20, 833–4, 836
sources of law and interpretive process 488
see also Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui

Katanga, G. 810, 812, 836, 862, 1063, 1084, 1230

Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui*:
accessorial liability 561, 570
charges - from confirmation to adjudication 916
confirmation of charges 903, 905
co-perpetration 526–8
default rule 660–3
detained witnesses and human rights protection 1084–92, 1097
exculpatory information or that which assists the defence 1041, 1044
genocide 697
incriminatory information 1039
indirect perpetration 544–6, 550, 554–5
interim release 1070, 1077
non-disclosure to the public 1055–6, 1058
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) investigative management 332, 348
perpetration and participation 499–500, 506, 509–10, 514, 516
proper disclosure of evidence 924
redactions 1051–2
sources of law and interpretive process 469, 471–2, 479, 496
trial procedures in Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909–12, 927, 929
victim participation 1142, 1158, 1165–6, 1173, 1178–9, 1183
witness protection 1107, 1115–17, 1127, 1132

Kenya 17, 19, 1235
admissibility challenges 229, 232, 235–7, 242
African Union (AU) 67–8
aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 579
Authorization Decision 187, 195–6
capacity building and complementarity 1251
disclosure challenges 1017
external sources of law 435, 441
funding 93
instigating 570
International Center for Transitional Justice 18
investigation teams: size and composition 336
Jubilee Alliance 24–5
Lessons Learnt initiative 1291
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) role in catalysing national proceedings 316–17
Orange Democratic Movement (ODM) 56
selection of situations by Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 354, 356, 367
sexual violence and gender-based crimes 822, 833
subject matter jurisdiction 147
sufficiency of evidence, evaluation of 343
temporal parameters 173
United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 47, 55–7, 60
witness protection 1105, 1119–20, 1122
see also Kenya I and II; Kenyatta; Muthaura; Ruto and Sang

Kenya I and II* cases 10–11
ad hoc declarations of acceptance of jurisdiction 198
appeals 968
common purpose 598
disclosure challenges 1022
funding 92–3
incriminatory information 1033–6, 1038–9
information which is exculpatory or assists the defence 1043, 1045
non-disclosure to the public 1056

Kenya I and II* cases (cont.):
self-referrals and inactivity and inability 222
victim participation 1142, 1153, 1155–8, 1160, 1162–3, 1167, 1183, 1185, 1191, 1198–9, 1201
witness protection 1127, 1131
see also Mutharua and Kenyatta (II); Ruto and Sang (I) Kenyatta 120, 126
accessorial liability: ordering 568
accountability of prosecutors 384, 405
confirmation of charges 903, 906
judicial oversight and accountability 392–3
legal recharacterization of facts 982
trial procedures in Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909, 911, 915
victim participation 1142
see also Muthaura and Kenyatta
Kenyatta, U. 9–10, 24–5, 56–7, 65, 70, 120, 1001, 1017, 1059, 1235
Khmer Rouge Tribunal 429, 1239
knowledge-based approach see under genocide and Al Bashir case-law known or should have known standard 643, 644–8, 760, 768, 918 Kony 560, 569
Kony, J. 207, 365, 1227–8
Korea, Republic of (South Korea) 142, 148–9, 354–5, 1242
Kosovo Property Claims Commission 1218
Krstić 677–9, 690, 692–4, 700
Krstić, R. 1025
Kunarac 712, 718
Kupreškić 846, 849, 855, 1021
Kushayb, A. (Harun and Kushayb) 46, 272, 1234, 1240

language issues 1288, 1292
Latin America 310–11, 523, 1239
law of armed conflict see jus in bello lead information, withholding disclosure of 1016–17 Lebanon see Special Tribunal for Lebanon
legal aid 91
legal information, access to 1255–6 legality principle 143–4, 550–1
charging war crimes 741
indirect perpetration 550–1
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 782
perpetration 500
sources of law and interpretive process 446, 476, 478, 480, 483, 485–6, 489–90, 493–4
legal recharacterization of facts 916–17, 981–1006
amending charges 984–9
Bemba 982, 988, 990–2, 994, 998–1000, 1005
confirmation of charges before trial 984
Document Containing the Charges (DCC) 989–90, 992, 995–6, 1002
fair trial, right to 996–1002
impunity rationale and judicial impartiality 1003–5 interpretation of Regulation by judiciary 989–93
Katanga 982, 988, 992–3, 996, 1000–1, 1003–5
Lubanga 982–3, 985–90, 995–6, 997–8, 1002–3
post-recharacterization 1004 practical implications 1002–3 pre-recharacterization 1004 prosecution and defence, rights of 993–1005
prosecutorial independence 994–6
recharacterization as an amendment 987–9 routine function 982–4
Ruto and Kenyatta 982, 1001–2
ultra vires 982–9
legal responsibility 539–40
legislative decisions see under Assembly of States Parties (ASP) legitimacy, undermining of 24–5
Lessons Learnt initiative to increase efficiency of criminal process 916, 925–6, 930–1, 1284–93 increase in efficiency of Court operations 1285 legal issues, identification of 1286–8 Roadmap of steps 1288–90, 1291, 1294
rule changes at 12th Assembly of the Parties (ASP) 1290–1
Study Group 1285–6, 1288, 1290–1, 1295
Working Group on Lessons Learnt (WGLL) 1288–90, 1292
lex generalis 843, 847
lex lata 749–51
lex specialis 739–40, 843, 847
lex talionis 936
liability:
anticipated or collective 592–3 assistance 602–3
charging war crimes 760, 917–18
common purpose 500, 513, 596
complicity 501–6
joint criminal enterprise (JCE) 594, 597–600
models 511–13
organizational 509–10
principal 511, 557, 567, 626 principal and accessorial distinction 467, 510, 530–1, 539
sexual violence and gender-based crimes: OTP's policy paper 835–7 strict 758–9
victim redress and reparations 1209
see also accessorial liability; command responsibility Liberia 13, 18, 1271–2
liberty, right to 435, 440
Libya 7, 9, 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, 24, 27, 273–5
admissibility challenges 229, 232, 235, 237–8, 242, 244, 250, 252, 253, 257
African Court jurisdiction 81–2
African Union (AU) 69–70
charging war crimes 752
complementarity and meaningful national prosecutions 309, 313–14, 1281
deterrence and public policymaking 1242
funding 89, 93
non-states parties 280
personal jurisdiction 160
prosecutions and political calculations 1227, 1235
self-referrals, non-state actors and problems of inactivity and inability 212, 218–19
situations and cases selection 366
United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 35, 37–8, 40, 41–2, 53, 54
and United States 276
see also Al-Senussi; Gaddafi

Lubanga*:
accountability of prosecutors 382, 388, 392
aiding, abetting and otherwise assisting 588
appeals 969, 973–6
characterization of armed conflict 766, 768–72
charges - from confirmation to adjudication 916, 918–20
command responsibility 629
common purpose 594
confirmation of charges 894, 896–7, 901, 902–3, 905
co-perpetration 522–8, 532–7, 757
default rule 657–9
deterrence and public policymaking 1240–1
disclosure challenges 1012–13, 1016–17, 1020
exculpatory information or that which assists the defence 1044
interim release 1068, 1070, 1079–80, 1082
judicial oversight and accountability 389–92
jurisdiction 172–3
legal recharacterization of facts 982–3, 985–90, 995–6, 997–8, 1002–3
Lessons Learnt initiative 1284, 1286
mental elements and jurisprudence 661–3
non-disclosure to the public 1055–6
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) investigative management 334–6
perpetration and participation 499–500, 506–7, 510–12, 515
proper disclosure of evidence 923–5
proportionate sentencing 958
redactions 1051–2
self-referrals and inactivity and inability 215–17
sexual and gender-based violence 809–11, 818–19, 820, 822, 826
sources of law and interpretive process 462, 465, 467, 471, 479–81, 487–9, 496
trial procedures in Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909–10, 912, 913, 927–9
victim participation 1142, 1151, 1158, 1164–7, 1170–1, 1173, 1177–9, 1183, 1191–2
victim redress and reparations 1203, 1209, 1216–17, 1219–20
witness protection 1107, 1113–15, 1117, 1118–19, 1132
Lubanga, T. 543, 932, 935, 944, 1063, 1078, 1225, 1230

macro-delinquency 840
Madagascar 75
Malawi 48, 132, 196–7, 1210
immunities and cooperation 287, 289, 290, 294, 296, 299–301
Mali 51, 52, 68, 210, 213, 831, 1235
Management Committee 1265
marginalization 17, 1140–1 material elements of crime 590, 643, 784, 978
aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 579–84
instigating 570–2
planning 575–6
see also under genocide and Al Bashir case-law Mbarushimana 724–9
accessorial liability 561, 570
aiding, abetting and otherwise assisting 579
appeals 969–70
common purpose 597–600, 604
completion strategies 1260
confirmation of charges 895
interim release 1071, 1078
jurisdiction 175
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) investigative management 342, 344–5
policy element of crimes against humanity 705, 713
sexual and gender-based violence 816–17, 822
Mbarushimana, C. 72, 724, 969–70, 1230, 1241
Media Review Network (MRN) 75
mens rea 652
charging war crimes 734, 741, 747, 760, 917
complicity liability 505
co-perpetration 519–20, 534
genocide 690, 702
ordinary course of events and conscious risk-taking 657–8, 663–4 see also under command responsibility
mental elements 649–68
accessorial liability 590–1
aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 584–7, 588
command responsibility 613
instigating 572–4
intent, specificity and proportionality, balance between 649–50
planning 576–7
sexual violence and gender-based crimes: OTP's policy paper 837
see also default rule military intervention, threat of 1237 military necessity, imperative 745
Milošević 101, 1127
Milošević, S. 13, 17, 19–20, 23–4, 351, 825, 1239, 1244
minimum threshold/less than substantial 599, 607
minimum voting requirements 127–8
Minister for Foreign Affairs 202–3, 287
Minister of Justice 179–80, 201–5
mini-trial 897, 931
mirroring test for admissibility 239, 242–3, 253 mistakes of fact 785 mistakes of law 785
mobile gender courts 73
monitoring 248–53, 258, 405
most responsible persons policy 361
Mozambique 26
Mudacumura 560, 857
Mudacumura, S. 72, 839
multiple acts requirement 711
Muthaura*:
accessorial liability 568
confirmation of charges 902
disclosure regime 923, 1059–60
sexual and gender-based violence 817–18, 835
see also Muthaura and Kenyatta
Muthaura, F. 839, 1017, 1029–30, 1035
Muthaura and Kenyatta*:
charges 920
proper disclosure of evidence 924
Trial Chamber, role of 927
witness protection 1129–30

Nahimana 172, 617
naming and shaming approach 1237
nationality:
of alleged offenders 151–2
at time of offence 156
at time of prosecution 155–6 double or multiple 154–5 effective 153–4
immunities and cooperation 284
national prosecutions, meaningful see under complementarity national security interests 1017 naturalized epistemology 878–9 necessity principle 776, 1047
needs assessment 1254–5 negligence 643, 644, 647
neighbourhood watch 1126
Netherlands 513, 1103
see also interim release (from detention centre in the Netherlands)
neutral contributions 598–9, 607
neutrality impairment 24–5 neutral (lawful) acts of assistance 604
New Zealand 748, 869
Ngudjolo Chui*:
appeals 970
human rights 441
mental elements and jurisprudence 661
perpetration and participation 507
sexual and gender-based violence 820–1
sources of law and interpretive process 467, 486, 494–5
see also Katanga and Ngudjolo Chui
Ngudjolo Chui, M. 348, 526, 544–6, 554, 810–11, 821, 863, 912–13, 1084, 1230
Nigeria 132
Non-Aligned Movement 779
non-cooperation 44–50, 70, 106, 131–3, 272–3
non-disclosure to the public 1054–8
non-discrimination 354, 379
non-governmental organizations (NGOs) 18, 78, 184, 1052
funding 90–2, 94, 103
victim participation 1134, 1144
victim redress and reparations 1204–5
non liquet* notion 492 non-refoulement 440, 1086–7 non-retroactivity 144, 490
non-states parties 260–80
cooperation 265, 268–70
immunities 263–4, 268–9
non-cooperation 272–3
third parties 262–80
Libya 273–5
nature of obligations after Security Council refusal 266–71
Palestine 277–9
Security Council referrals 271–5
Sudan 271–3
United States 261–4, 275–7, 278–9
non-state 'terrorists' 220–23
norm competition 844–5, 851
North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and forces 21, 23, 38, 169
Ntaganda*:
accessorial liability 561, 570
command responsibility 617–18
interim release 1070, 1072
proper disclosure of evidence 923
sexual and gender-based violence 835
trial procedures in Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909
victim participation 1153, 1158–9, 1163, 1191
Ntaganda, B. 72, 809, 839, 1122, 1230–1
nulla poena sine lege* principle 776
see also legality principle
nullum crimen sine lege* principle 257–8, 509–10
sources of law and interpretive process 421, 447, 457, 476, 493, 496, 497
see also legality principle
Nuremberg Tribunal 4–5
aggression, crime of 778
cases, selection of 375–6
command responsibility 610, 613, 619, 644–5
complicity liability 501, 503
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 781, 782, 795
mitigation for aiding and abetting 513, 516
perpetration 515–16
selection of situations and cases 350–1, 369
sources of law and interpretive process 450–2, 457–8

objective contribution required 596–607
factual nature 596, 597–604
legal nature 596, 604–7
objective imputation or attribution theory 603
objectivity 354, 379
common purpose 595–6, 606
control theory 507
co-perpetration 519–20, 523, 532–3, 536
genocide 684
selection of cases by Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 361
sources of law and interpretive process 446
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP):
accountability and effectiveness 383–4, 385–6, 406
administrative oversight 111–14
and African Union 65, 68–9 attrition problem: charges for sexual and gender-based crimes 805–13
capacity building and complementarity 152
cases, selection of 376–80
catalysing national proceedings 316–20
charging war crimes 737, 926
Colombia: prosecutions and political calculations 1231–2
complementarity and meaningful national prosecutions 305, 309, 314, 315
completion strategies 1264–5, 1268, 1272
confirmation of charges phase 893, 897–8, 900–1, 905
cooperation 1280
Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) 72
detained witnesses and human rights protection 1102

deterrence and public policymaking 1240, 1241–2
disclosure challenges 1009, 1014–15, 1018, 1021–4, 1026, 1030, 1059, 1062
Draft Strategic Plan (2013-15) 330 evidence problem: Ocampo and investigations 813–24
Executive Committee (Ex Com) 331–4, 336 funding and budgets 87, 92–3, 95, 116, 338–9 future strategy: Bensouda and the Policy Paper 824–39
impartiality 358
independence 358
Independent Oversight Mechanism (IOM) 397–8, 402
informal sanctions 404
interim release 1070, 1079
internal oversight and accountability 386–8
internal sources of law 422
Investigation Division 98, 331
Investigations Coordinator 331–2 Investigation Teams 338–9 investigative management, strategies and techniques 328–49 organization and administration 331–4 size and composition of investigation teams 334–41 sufficiency of evidence 341–8 joint team 332–4
judicial oversight and accountability 389, 392
Jurisdiction, Complementarity, and Cooperation Division (JCCD) 331, 332
Kenya and Mali: prosecutions and political calculations 1235
legal recharacterization of facts 982–5, 987–92, 994–9, 1001–2, 1004, 1006
non-discrimination 359
objectivity 358–9
Operational Manual 331, 334
Palestinian declaration (2009) 183–4
policy element of crimes against humanity 706, 727
pre-confirmation disclosure 1032–3 preliminary examinations 354–6
preventive measures 405
Prosecution Coordinator 331–2
Prosecution Division 98, 331
selection of cases 358–63, 365, 372, 380–1 governing principles 358–9 judicial review of exercise of prosecutorial discretion 362–3 moving forward 359–60 what crimes must be prosecuted 361–2 when not to prosecute 362 who must be prosecuted 360–1 selection of situations 353–7, 365, 372, 380–1 outcome 354–6 process 353–4
  triggering mechanisms, observations on 356–7
self-referrals, non-state actors and problems of inactivity and inability 213–15
sexual violence and gender-based crimes 804 small team approach 335–7 standard of proof: beyond reasonable doubt or reason 863
  and United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 38, 62
  victim redress and reparations 1212–13, 1215–16, 1221
  witness protection 1105, 1110–11, 1113–17, 1119–21, 1125–6, 1128–30, 1132
Office of Public Counsel for the Defence (OPCD) 1160–1
Office of Public Counsel for the Victims (OPCV) 991, 1154, 1160, 1181–3, 1198 omission, crimes of, and quasi-causality 626, 643
Open Debate States Parties 8
Open Society Justice Initiative 314 operational capacity problems 1256
operational challenges 1278–84
  complementarity 1281–2
  cooperation 1279–80
  global membership 1278–9
  judicial integrity 1282
  judicial proceedings, efficient management of 1283–4
  'lessons learnt' initiative to increase efficiency of criminal process 1284–93
Operational Mandate/Manual 113, 114 opt-in or opt-out regime 144–6, 162–3, 788–9, 791
ordering 560–9, 574, 576, 587–9, 590, 591
  material elements 561–4
  mental elements 564–7
organizational control 521, 545–8, 549, 551–3, 556, 840
organization level 769–71
Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) 251, 1270 Organized Structure of Power (OSP) 509–10, 514 outcomes-based approach 22 outreach programmes 91, 1142, 1262, 1271–2 oversight:
  internal 386–8
  judicial 388–94
  political 394–6
  see also administrative and professional oversight; Independent Oversight Mechanism
Oversight Committee 107

Palestine 183–4, 277–9
  Attorney General of Gaza 179–80
  Minister of Justice 179–80
  National Authority 185
  Operation Cast Lead 179, 186, 277
  Operation Protective Edge 199
  selection of situations by Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 354, 373–4 Solidarity Alliance (PSA) 75
  see also jurisdiction - Palestinian situation Paper on Some Policy Issues before the Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 1213 parallel proceedings management 255
parameters, jurisdictional 141–7
par in parem non habet imperium*/act of state 797–8
parsimony principle 939, 941, 956, 958
peace see politics of peace and justice
Peace and Security Council 53–4, 59–60

peer review process 347–8 Perišić 583–4, 586–7
perpetration:
accessorial liability 567–9, 574, 577–8
aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 589
direct 557
organizational 521
restrictive 626–7
see also co-perpetration; indirect perpetration; perpetration and participation
perpetration and participation 499–516
categorization and fair labelling 510–11
direct perpetration 509, 513 joint criminal enterprise (JCE) and complicity liability 501–6 expansion and weak theoretical basis 504–6
non-categorization in normative terms 502–4 liability models 511–13
mitigation for aiding and abetting 513–14
naturalistic or empirical approach 503 non-physical/functional/intellectual perpetration 507–8, 512 Organized Structure of Power (OSP) and control 514 physical perpetration 507
see also control theory of perpetration; co-perpetration; indirect co-perpetration; indirect perpetration personality:
active 142, 151, 156, 158, 162, 163, 181
passive 142
Peru 206, 717–18
Philippines 160
physical elements of crime 784
Pinkerton* doctrine 518
Plan of Action for achieving universality and full implementation of Rome Statute 134–5
planning 575–8, 587–9
plausibility of story 878
Poland 795
police prosecutorial misconduct 384 policing prosecutors 392
Policy Paper on the Interests of Justice (OTP) 1213
Policy Paper on Preliminary Examinations 372, 379 Policy Paper on Sexual and Gender-Based Crimes 360, 805
policy-setting and strategic planning 109–12 political calculations see deterrent effect of ICC on commission of international crimes by government leaders political considerations 108, 385
political oversight 394–6
politicization 373–5, 396, 399, 407 politics of peace and justice 13–29 consequences 19–20 democracy 15–16, 18
deterrence 16–17, 19, 25
displacing the local 23–4
justice, arguing for 15–18 justice, raising the stakes for 25–7 neutrality impairment and legitimacy 24–5 peace 15
rewriting justice 28–9
sequencing justice 20–3
Popović 850, 852, 858
Portugal 26
positive complementarity 71, 323, 1262, 1268, 1273–4, 1276
admissibility 233, 236, 252
capacity building 1252–4, 1257–8
positive effects standard 21 potentially exculpatory evidence (the bulk) 389, 893–4, 923, 973, 1040–7 predictability (fair warning) 144, 490 pre-inspection report 923
preliminary examination 326, 371, 373
preliminary investigation 363
pre-mini-trial 895
Preparatory Commission (PrepComm):
jurisdictional parameters 144
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 779–80
legal recharacterization of facts 990
legislative decisions 116
United States 276
victim participation 1138
victim redress and reparations 1205
Preparatory Committee 542–3, 1065, 1112
Preparatory Committee Report (1996) 475
Pre-Trial Chamber:
procedural avenues see under confirmation of charges
see also trial procedures preventive programmes 383–4 Prlić 1075, 1081
probability 872–3
inductive (Baconian) 874–7, 882
objective or frequentive 873 Pascalian 874
subjective 873
proportionate sentencing/proportionality 746–8, 760–1, 776, 932–62, 1047
cardinal desert, absence of norms regarding 951–2 cardinally retributive proportionality 948–51
desert 937, 938, 939, 940, 944, 952–4
deterrence 959–60
ends proportionality 939
expressive proportionality 939–41 first sentencing judgment 933–5 general prevention 940–1
general proportionality principles derived from national systems 947–8 gravity determination 941–2, 943–5, 958 harm and culpability 941–2, 944–5, 954, 958 implications 941–3 incapacitation 959–60
international retributivism, rejection of 948–56 means proportionality 939
norm expression 957–8
norm promotion 942–3
ordinal retributive proportionality 937–8, 940, 942, 949–50, 952–3, 961
parsimony principle 939, 941, 956, 958
preventive international proportionality 943, 956–62
restorative justice 960–1 retributive proportionality 936–8, 939, 940–1, 942–7, 961 rhetoric, narrative and danger of undeserved international punishment 955–6 Rome Statute and Rule of Procedure and Evidence (Rules) 943–5 shared intuitions of relative desert, absence of 953 shared norms of retribution, absence of 950–3 treaties and customary international law 945–7 utilitarian proportionality 938–9, 941, 942–3, 944, 945, 948

proprio motu* powers:
ad hoc declarations of acceptance of jurisdiction 194, 196
admissibility challenges 248
deference and monitoring 256
immunities and cooperation 284–5, 292
non-states parties 265
selection of situations by Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 356–7
prosecutorial discretion 385
prosecutorial independence 385–6
Prosecutorial Strategy document (2009-12) 828
Prosecutorial Strategy Report (2006) 828
Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's Decision Denying Leave to Appeal (2006) 426 protective measures and redactions 1047–8 Public Information Documentation Section (PIDS) 1219
purpose-based approach 694–5, 701–2

qualitative probability - argumentation theory 880–2 quantitative model 882
questioning witnesses 1176–80

race for judgment (ne bis in idem) 248 reasonable basis to proceed 357
reasonable grounds 896, 1068–70 reciprocal specialty (interference) 843, 852
redactions 924–6, 1047–54
REDRESS 1163
Referral Bench 250–51
referrals:
framing 35–8
funding 38–42
selectivity 7
see also self-referrals
Registry:
Common Administrative Services Division 98
Court Management Section 98
relevant variables model - inductive probability 874–7 reparations 488–9, 1206–16, 1287, 1292–3 collective 1217–18 determination of 1218
orders 976, 1206
scheme 1203–4
see also Victims Participation and Reparations Section (VPRS) reprimands and fines 396 reputation 388
Residual Special Court 1270–2
Responsibility to Protect doctrine 1225
restorative justice 960–1, 1176, 1186–7, 1194, 1202
retributive justice 1186–7, 1194, 1202
retributivism 384, 937
rejection of 948–56
Review Conference 79, 124, 133, 136, 144, 787, 1252–3, 1273
Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims 1189, 1195
Roadmap of steps 1288–90, 1291, 1294
rogatory commissions 1103–4 rule of law 384, 386
Russia 7–8, 9, 778
charging war crimes 741
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 791, 795
personal jurisdiction 161
United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 32, 34
and United States 277
Ruto 601, 857, 982
see also Ruto and Kenyatta; Ruto and Sang
Ruto and Kenyatta 982, 1001–2
Ruto and Sang*:
accessorial liability 561, 568–9, 570
aiding, abetting and otherwise assisting 579
appeals 968
charges - from confirmation to adjudication 903, 920–1
proper disclosure of evidence 923–4
trial procedures in Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909, 911, 915, 926, 927, 929
victim participation 1142, 1180, 1198
witness protection 1128
Ruto, W. 56–7, 418, 1001–2, 1235
Rwanda 9–11
ad hoc declarations of acceptance of jurisdiction 203
Forces Démocratiques de la Libération du Rwanda (FDLR) 724, 727, 728, 729
Gacaca judicial process 1214 Patriotic Front 5
victim redress and reparations 1214–15
see also International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR); Mbarushimana

same conduct test 231, 233, 236–7, 241–3, 255, 258
sanctions 61, 383, 387, 402–4, 1237, 1238 Sang, J.A. (Ruto and Sang) 56, 598 scale of crimes 360
Scandinavia 940
sea-going vessel, crimes committed on 163
Search Committee 129–31
Security Risk Assessment (SRA) 1107, 1119–21
selection of situations and cases 365–81
admissibility 371–3, 377–80
distinguishing situations and cases 366–8
jurisdiction 371–3, 377–80
preliminary examination 371, 373
selection of cases 375–80
selection of situations 368–75
self-referrals and inability to cope with non-state actors 210–27 genuine inability or insidious attempt to frame one's enemies 212–15 inactivity and inability in Trial Chambers 215–20
non-state 'terrorists' 220–23
state-centred paradigm of International Criminal Justice 223–6 sentence reductions 393 sentencing see proportionate sentencing Serbia 14, 20, 298

sexual abuse of protected witnesses 113
sexual and gender-based violence 50, 72–3, 272, 464–5, 509–10, 514, 801–39
Bemba 834–6
Gbagbo 822–3
Katanga 811–13, 819–20, 833–4, 836
Lubanga 809–11, 818–19, 820, 822, 826
male rape 807, 834–5
Mbasrushimana 816–17, 822
Muthaura 817–18, 835
Ngudjolo 820–1
Ntaganda 835
Office of the Prosecutor (OTP):
attrition problem: charges 805–13
evidence problem 813–24 future strategy: Policy Paper 824–39 should have known standard 643, 644–8, 760, 768, 918
Sierra Leone 1236
Peace Museum project 1273
Police 1271
Revolutionary United Front (RUF) 23
Witnesses Protection and Assistance Unit 1271
witness protection officers 1271
see also Special Court for Sierra Leone significant contribution 598, 599–601
Simić 1081 situations see selection of situations and cases Slovenia 793
'soft' harmonization 19, 1137, 1190–3
solicitation and inducement 570–2
sources of law and interpretive process 444–98
codification of judicial interpretive restraint 448–54 consistency with international human rights law 484–9 control of crime theory 467, 469, 471–2
co-perpetration 467–8, 471–3
direct co-perpetration 479 disciplining rules 446–7 external sources 461, 484 identification of applicable law 454–60
indirect co-perpetration 467–70, 472–3, 479, 486, 494
internal sources 461, 484
interpretive freedom and strict construction requirements 489–97 judicial function and prioritization of textual interpretation 460–84 customary international law, general principles of law and internal and external precedent 478–84 hierarchy of sources and potential impact on interpretive judicial function 473–8 interpretation: textualism, betrayal of 466–73 legality principle 476, 478, 480, 483, 485–6, 489–90, 493–4
objectivity 446
subjectivity 446
teleological or ends-focused interpretation 446–7, 465, 467, 472
textual interpretation 446–8, 470, 478–9, 495–7
South Africa 74–9
Crimes Against the State (CATS) unit 74–6
Department of International Relations and Cooperation 77
Directorate for Priority Crimes Investigation (DPCI) 74–5
National Prosecution Authority (NPA) 74–6
Priority Crimes Litigation Unit (PCLU) 74–5
South African Police Services (SAPS) 74
Special Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) 74
Truth and Reconciliation Commission 74
victim redress and reparations 1210
Southern African Litigation Centre 75
Spain 26, 865–7
special consent requirement 799–800
Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) 23, 24, 86, 1239, 1259, 1263, 1265–7, 1269–73
accessorial liability 561
aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting 578, 579–81, 584, 586
burden of proof 1065
capacity building and complementarity 1247
completion strategies 1269
cumulative charges and convictions 846, 848, 853, 857
external sources of law 428–9
immunities and cooperation 288–9
instigating 570
interim release 1063, 1071–2, 1077
planning 575
policy element of crimes against humanity 718
proportionate sentencing 934
sexual violence and gender-based crimes 803
sources of law and interpretive process 463–4
witness protection 1106–7, 1127
Special Fund for Relocations 1125
Special Gender Advisor 838–9
Special Government Commission for Directing the Nuremberg Trials 376
Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL) 222, 429, 854–5, 858, 1247
Special Working Group on the Crime of Aggression (SWGCA) 780, 782, 783, 786–7, 789, 794, 795 specific direction 583–4, 586, 606 spillover logic 18
Sri Lanka 1242
Stakić 283, 468, 470, 545, 683, 693, 848
Stakić, M. 540
standard operating procedure 1293–4
standard of proof 896
see also International Criminal Standard of Proof standard of review 974–5
Status of Forces Agreements (SOFA) 161, 164
Status of Mission Agreements (SOMA) 161 stay of the proceedings 424–5 stigma of conviction 947
Strategic Plan (2005) 109
Strategic Plan (2012-15) 111, 361–2, 837
Strategic Plan (2013) 405–6
Strategic Plan 138, 829, 836–7
strict construction principle 489–97, 549, 675, 740
Study Group on Governance 107, 118, 119, 768–9, 1285–6, 1288, 1290–1, 1295
subjective approach 595–6, 606
co-perpetration 519–20, 523, 532–3, 536

genocide 684, 690
sources of law and interpretive process 446
standard of proof 864, 865–71, 882, 889–90
subsidiarity or subordination 843–4 subsidiary facts 919
substantial contribution 599–601
substantial effect 580–1
substantial grounds 896–7, 904
Sudan (Darfur) 7, 13, 17, 19, 27, 271–3, 1233–4
admissibility challenges 235
African Union Mission in Sudan (AMIS) 37
African Union-United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID) 37
completion strategies 1266
Darfur Commission Report (2005) 684, 693, 695, 704
deterrence and public policymaking 1241, 1242
funding 93
genocide 669
immunities and cooperation 290, 292, 293, 295–8
instigating 569
investigation teams: size and composition 335, 340
non-states parties 268–70, 280
personal jurisdiction 159, 160, 162
prosecutions and political calculations 1227
sexual violence and gender-based crimes: OTP's evidence problem 819–20
situations and cases selection 366
Special Courts 309
temporal parameters 176
United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 35–6, 42, 45, 46, 53–4, 58
victim participation 1142
see also Al-Bashir; Banda
sufficient basis/evidence 896 summons to appear 367 supervision practices 388 surrender requests 263–4
Syria 7–8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 21, 22, 279–80
complementarity and meaningful national prosecutions 313
personal jurisdiction 161
prosecutions and political calculations 1227
system criminality 501

Tadić*:
aiding, abetting and otherwise assisting 583–4
characterization of armed conflict 766–8, 771–3
common purpose 600
co-perpetration 518
detained witnesses and human rights 1096
indirect perpetration 541
perpetration and participation 505–6
policy element of crimes against humanity 708–10, 718, 722
sources of law and interpretive process 457
Tadić, D. 351, 825
Taiwan 208
Taylor 514, 584
Taylor, C. 13, 15, 24, 1236, 1239, 1244
technical analysis of national proceedings 320–6 technical assistance 1294
teleological or ends-focused interpretation 446–7, 465, 467, 472, 671–2
temporal parameters 168–78, 246–9
Terms of Reference 112–13
territoriality 142, 163–8, 181, 284, 1093 testifying behind bars see detained ICC witnesses and human rights protection
textual consistency 490
'thoroughly organized' standard 713
Tokyo Tribunal 4–5, 350–1, 369, 457–8, 613, 781, 795 totality rule 922
training 387–8, 405, 1256–7 transparency 63, 363
travaux préparatoires*:
external sources of law 426
genocide 671, 675–6, 699–701
internal sources of law 421
sources of law and interpretive process 474, 476, 495
witness protection 1106, 1112–13
Trial Chambers see trial procedures: Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers trial procedures: Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers 909–31, 1287, 1292
charges - from confirmation to adjudication 916–22
disclosure of evidence 922–6
document containing the charges (DCC) 917–21, 927
post-confirmation disclosure 922–5
pre-confirmation disclosure 922–3, 925
pre-trial and trial process, relationship between 913–16 standardized disclosure scheme 925–6
Trial Chamber, role of 926–30
trial experiences 910–13
Trust Fund for Victims 87, 91, 1137, 1190, 1203–6, 1215–17, 1219, 1221
tu quoque* defence 1020–1 Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) 190–1, 208

Uganda 15, 27, 77–9
accessorial liability 560
ad hoc declarations of acceptance of jurisdiction 185, 201
capacity building and complementarity 1251
completion strategies 1266
Constitutional Court 78
deterrence and public policymaking 1241, 1242
funding 93
High Court 77
instigating 569
internal sources of law 415
International Crimes Division (ICD) 77–9
investigation teams: size and composition 335, 340
Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) 16–17, 23, 27, 77–9, 210, 213–14, 368, 1227–30
People's Defence Force (UPDF) 213–14, 368
self-referrals, non-state actors and problems of inactivity and inability 212–14
situations and cases selection 366
witness protection 1121–2
Ukraine 355, 1242

ulterior intent/dolus specialis 567, 569, 574, 576–8, 585
unilateral specialty 843
United Kingdom:
ad hoc declarations of acceptance of jurisdiction 189
disclosure challenges 1019
forces in Iraq 320–2
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 786
and Libya 274
subjective standard of proof 868
and United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 34, 54, 60
and United States 276
victim redress and reparations 1205
United Kingdom Law of War Manual 748
United Nations Detention Facility 1097
United Nations General Assembly (UNGA) 39–41, 44
Administrative and Budgetary Committee (Fifth Committee) 40
external sources of law 434
genocide 671
jurisdiction 191
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 781, 787
legislative decisions 124
Palestinian declaration (2009) 183–4, 188
sources of law and interpretive process 448–51
United Nations Humanitarian Air Service (UNHAS) flights 52
United Nations Mission in the DRC (MONUSCO) 51–2
United Nations Office of Legal Affairs 444
United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 8–9, 22, 30–64
action or inaction 798–9
characterization of armed conflict 771
charging war crimes 752
complementarity and meaningful national prosecutions 309–10, 314 decision-making 7
deferrals 52–60, 63
conditions and criteria for invoking Article 16 57–60 containing deferrals 60
explanation of deferral decision 60 deterrence and public policymaking 1240, 1241–3
double standards 37
executive enforcement organ 34–5
external sources of law 442–3
funding dilemmas 62
genocide 669, 672
immunities and cooperation 284–5, 288–9, 293, 295–8, 301
immunity removal 289–91
institutional autonomy 33–4
international peace and security, ICC as instrument of 31–3
judicial integrity 1282
jurisdiction 145–6, 178, 191–2
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 780, 781–2, 786–7
Lessons Learnt initiative 1289
multiple challenges 11 negative pillar 30, 32
non-cooperation and enforcement 44–50, 132–3
communications to the Council 46–8 findings on non-cooperation 48–9 responses to non-cooperation findings 49–50
obligations to cooperate 42–4
operational challenges of ICC 1278
and Palestine 183–4, 278
personal jurisdiction 157–62
political and operational support for situations not referred by the Council 50–2 positive pillar 30–1, 32
referrals 3–4, 6–7, 12, 21, 289–91
referrals, framing of 35–8 referrals, funding of 38–42
selection of situations by Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) 357
sexual violence and gender-based crimes 802
Sixth Committee 675
Sudan (Darfur): prosecutions and political calculations 1233–4
temporal parameters 168–71
territorial parameters 163
and United States 275
Working Group on Tribunals 61
United Nations (UN) 208–9, 741, 778
funding 84, 93, 103
sanction committees 61
sexual exploitation and abuse by peacekeepers (2004) 112
United Nations War Crimes Commission 613
United States 8, 32, 261–4, 274, 275–9, 1011–12
African Union-United Nations Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID) 37
charging war crimes 741, 753–4
command responsibility 640
co-perpetration 519
disclosure challenges 1018–19
dolus directus of the first degree 653
external sources of law 433
internal oversight and accountability 387
internal sources of law 416
judicial integrity 1282
jurisdictional parameters 142
Kampala amendments on the crime of aggression 783, 786, 791
ordinary course of events and conscious risk-taking 654, 656–7, 662
Palestine's new status and effect on first and second declaration 200
personal jurisdiction 159, 162
policy element of crimes against humanity 719, 729
situations, selection of 373
subjective standard of proof 867, 868–9, 870
Sudan (Darfur): prosecutions and political calculations 1234
Supreme Court 1017
and United Nations Security Council (UNSC) 34, 36, 39, 53–4
victim redress and reparations 1205
Uniting for Peace 44
universality 1293
unsatisfactory conduct 386–7

values test 855
Venezuela 354–5, 373
victim-mapping processes 1219
victim participation 1133–202
admissibility of evidence 1168–76
application process 1147–63
applications at pre-trial stage 1161–2
Assembly of States Parties (ASP) 1187–93
Banda 1142
Bemba 1143, 1151, 1158, 1162, 1166–8, 1173, 1179–80, 1183, 1192, 1198
Bureau on Victims and Affected Communities (ASP) 1188–90, 1192, 1197
challenges 1138–46
collective approach 1198
decision-making by judges on status of victims 1161
Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) 1142 differentiated approach 1198–9 effectiveness 1141
evolving perceptions and approaches 1187–90
formal requirements 1147–9 fully collective process 1159–63
funding 101, 104
Gbagbo 1142, 1153–5, 1156, 1158–9, 1160, 1163, 1191, 1198
as governance matter 1187–200 harmonization, optimal and amendments 1197–2000 implementation: problems and solutions 1146–87
internal sources of law 419
judicial experimentation and system review 1153–9
Katanga and Ngudjolo 1142, 1158, 1165–6, 1173, 1178–9, 1183
Kenya cases 1142, 1153, 1155–8, 1160, 1162–3, 1167, 1183, 1185, 1191, 1198–9, 1201
Kenyatta 1142
Lubanga 1142, 1151, 1158, 1164–7, 1170–1, 1173, 1177–9, 1183, 1191–2
marginalization 1140–1
Mbarushimana 1151
meaningful participation 1140, 1181, 1184–5
Ntaganda 1153, 1158–9, 1163, 1191
Office of Public Counsel for the Victims (OPCV) 1181–3, 1198
outreach programmes 1142
participation at trial: key modalities 1164–80
partly collective approach 1153–5, 1159–60, 1163, 1198 personal interests 1172–7, 1180, 1181, 1186, 1197 pragmatic system and evolution or devolution of regime 1184–7 provision of Registry report as basis for observation 1161 questioning witnesses 1176–80
real representation 1181
Registrar 1142, 1149–50, 1151, 1153–4
registration process 1163
and reparations cluster 1287, 1292–3
representation 1181–4
restorative complex of retributive court 1193–7
restorative justice 1176, 1186–7, 1194, 1202
retributive justice 1186–7, 1194, 1202
Revised Strategy in Relation to Victims 1195
Ruto and Sang 1142, 1180, 1198
'soft' harmonization 1190–3
sources of law and interpretive process 488
Sudan (Darfur) 1142
sustainability and resources 1149–52 symbolic representation 1181–2, 1184 system review 1159–63
Trust Fund for Victims 1137, 1190
utilitarian approach 1175
Victims Participation and Reparation Section (VPRS) 1142, 1149–52, 1154, 1158–9, 1161
victims rights advocacy groups 1134, 1144
Victims' Rights Working Group (VWRG) 1163
views and concerns 1164–70, 1172–3, 1176, 1178, 1181, 1185
victim redress 1203–21
applications-based approach 1217–18 failure at national level 1211–16 fines or forfeiture 1206 flexible system 1216–20 individual approach 1217
overview 1204–7
restitutions, compensation and rehabilitation 1206
Trust Fund for Victims 1203–6, 1215–17, 1219, 1221
victim-mapping processes 1219
victims' lobby 1204
Victims Participation and Reparations Section (VPRS) 1219 victim support mandate 1215
victims' lobby 1204
Victims Participation and Reparations Section (VPRS) 91, 1142, 1149–52, 1154, 1158–9, 1161, 1219
victims' rights advocacy groups 1134, 1144
Victims' Rights Working Group (VWRG) 1163, 1231
victim support mandate 1215
Victims and Witnesses Unit (VWU) 113, 1107, 1109–17, 1119–26, 1128–32
charges 924, 926
detained witnesses and human rights protection 1084, 1100
exculpatory information or that which assists the defence 1043
judicial oversight and accountability 390
non-disclosure to the public 1056
video-linking/virtual transfer of court proceedings 1100–2, 1104 vote trading 128

Waki commission 1022
War Crimes Research Office (WCRO) 907, 1163
widespread or systematic test 707–8, 710, 714, 730 wilful blindness 567, 664–5
witnesses, anonymous 436
Witnesses Protection and Assistance Unit 1271
witness P-118 1129
witness P-524 1128–9
witness proofing 432, 927
witness protection 1105–32, 1271
admittance into witness protection programme 1113–15

witness protection (cont.):
Chambers 1108–9
charges - from confirmation to adjudication 924, 926
developed practices 1118–31
disagreements about responsibilities for protective measures 1113–18
disclosure 1014–15, 1110
Individual Risk Assessment (IRA) 1119–21
Initial Response System (IRS) 1121–2
Katanga and Ngudjolo 1107, 1115–17, 1127, 1132
legal framework 1107–13
limitations to disclosure of witness identities 1117–18
Lubanga 1107, 1113–15, 1117, 1118–19, 1132
physical protective measures 1113–17
preventive relocation 1115–17
prosecutor 1109–10
Registry 1105–6, 1110–12, 1118, 1123, 1125–7, 1132
rolling disclosure 1127–31
Security Risk Assessment (SRA) 1119–21
travaux préparatoires 1112–13
Victims and Witnesses Unit (VWU) 1107, 1109–17, 1119–26, 1128–32
Witness Protection Programme (ICCPP) 1107, 1115–16, 1120, 1123–7, 1131–2
witness protection officers 1271
Witness Protection Programme of the ICC (ICCPP) 351, 924, 1107, 1115–16, 1120, 1123–7, 1131–2
witness security 1018
Women's Caucus for Gender Justice 803
Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice 193, 807–8, 838
Women's Institute for Gender Justice 1052
Working Group of the Assembly 118, 135–6
Working Group on Lessons Learnt (WGLL) 119, 769, 1197, 1285, 1288–90, 1292
Working Group on Tribunals 61
World Health Organization 209

zero-growth budget 85, 90–4, 103, 115, 339, 1124, 1193
Zimbabwe 27
Exiles Forum 75